- 2. Imports from the U.S. fell steeply after 1974. The direct cause of this fall was the arms embargo imposed by the U.S. following the Cyprus operation.
- 3. The share of Turkey's principal trading partner, West Germany, showed a high degree of stability.

We can now turn our attention to foreign policy.

Box 5-7. Some Comments on the 12 September Coup

The violence and anarchy that had plagued Turkey until TI September 1980 abruptly ended on 13 September, when law and order was restored by the military coup of 12 September. This led some to conclude that anarchy had been artificially fomented in the country.

According to this theory, advanced by Uğur Mumcu, it was necessary to create a climate of anarchy in Turkey in order to be able to carry out the illegal arms and drug trade. There would be an outflow of drugs from Turkey, balanced by an inflow of arms. Those engaged in the struggle would need arms, so they not only would overlook the drug trade but would help those engaged in it. Even if martial law was declared, this trade could continue as long as the cash flowed. In fact, even official vehicles would be employed to carry on this illicit trafficking.

Another theory claimed that violence between the Left and Right was contrived and both sides were being used. Dark forces within the state that were determined to interrupt the democratic process and provoke the army to intervene deliberately instigated the events. This theory is supported by the large illegal flow of arms during those years, which were used to kill people both on the Left and on the Right (Cumhuriyetin 75. Yili, Vol. 2, p. 721). An example is cited from the trial of a leftist organization in the Istanbul Martial Law Command's Third Military Tribunal. In this trial, registered under the file number 1981/689, a Unique-brand handgun with the serial number 8477356 was used by that leftist organization to commit murder. The same gun was used by Nationalist Action Party (MHP) gangs in a shooting incident in a cafe on 27 August 1980 and was confiscated in the MHP headquarters in the district of Eyup in Istanbul on 6 October 1980 (Yetkin, p. 183; also see Uğur Mumcu, "Soru İşaretleri," Cumhuriyet, 15 November 1990). Another curious example is the parcel bomb that killed the rightist Hamit Fendoğlu (MHP), which led to Malatya being turned into a battleground. The same type of parcel bomb had been sent one day earlier to a former CHP county chairman of the Pazarcik district of Kahramanmaras, which exploded in the post office in the process of delivery (Cumhurlyetin 75. Yili, vol. 2, p. 758).

A concurring theory holds that the blame for the coup of 12 September can be laid on those who carried it out. According to this theory, at a time when the Kurdish nationalist ideology was on the ascendancy and the streets were taken over by thugs of the Left and Right, the only viable remedy for the situation would be a military takeover. For the coup to have any semblance of legitimacy, people had to be in a situation where they could not leave their homes. That is why anarchy was allowed to escalate in the two years of martial law prior to 12 September.

This theory is supported by statements of certain top political leaders. Demirel claimed that all of the government's orders and efforts to get the army unit stationed in Siverek (whose population had fallen from 50,000 to 25,000 because of terror and anarchy) to return to the town after the unit was withdrawn by its commander proved fruitless. Ecevit was even more explicit: "At the time, I called for martial law in a number of provinces in Central Anatolia that had become operational centers for rightist terrorists. Evren, the chief of the General Staff, turned my requests down, claiming that the forces at his disposal did not allow him to impose martial law on these extra provinces. Strangely enough, Evren concluded that it was possible to impose martial law in all the 67 provinces of Turkey on 12 September 1980" (Milliyet, 23 and 29 November 1990, quoted in Yetkin, pp. 173-74). When the coup took place, Gen. Bedrettin Demirel was commander of one of the four army groups. In 1988, when he was asked by the journalist. A. Kahraman why the coup had not occurred a year earlier, the general replied: "This could not be done before the public had been brought to the same focus and its tacit approval had been obtained. All of the citizens had to become fully conscious of the fact that there was no other road to salvation" (Milliyet, 15 September 1988)

These theories about 12 September would gain further credence after the traffic accident at Susurluk on 3 November 1996, when part of the intricate web of dark relationships between some officials and the mafia came to light (Boxes 7-5 and 7-6 in Section 7).

(B. ORAN)

The Years of Purposeful Foreign Policy

1. The years from 1960 to 1980 marked a period when important foreign policy decisions were made and implemented. For a strategic medium power like Turkey, these were truly years of relative autonomy.

At a time when the 27 May coup was still recent, and everything that the DP stood for in foreign policy was being rejected, Turkey voted in favor of self-determination for Algeria at the UN General Assembly. This was done even though the Cyprus question and its sequel of pursuing an autonomous foreign policy had not yet arisen. Turkey gave a firm reply to Johnson's letter in 1964. At the UN in September 1965 Turkey opposed the U.S. position on Vietnam. Again in 1965 Turkey refused to participate in the U.S. sponsored Multilateral Nuclear Force (MNF). In the 1967 war between Israel and the Arab states, Turkey supported the Arab side for the first time and distanced itself from Israel from then on. It also concluded a new bilateral agreement with the U.S. in 1968, revising the Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) in its favor. Turkey concluded a Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement (JDCA) in 1969, consolidating all the U.S.-Turkish bilateral agreements and bringing them under proper control. It also prohibited the use of the bases for out-of-area operations (see Box 4-9 in Section 4 for the out-of-area concept).

Throughout the 1970s Turkey defied the U.S. and pursued its quarrel with Greece over the Aegean Sea. In 1971 it inaugurated a program of aid to the Third World. After the Memorandum of 12 March, the production of opium poppies in Turkey had been banned at America's request. In July 1974 the ban was lifted. In the same month, a successful operation was carried out in Cyprus. Ankara stood

Table 5-3. Share of Selected Countries in Turkey's Foreign Trade, 1961–1980 (%)

| ٠      | Þ                          | USA     | W. GER             | W. GERMANY | FRANCE  | NCE     | BRITAIN | AIN     | IT.     | ITALY   | SWITZERLAND | RLAND   | TOTAL FOR SIXCOUNTRIES | ORSIX   |
|--------|----------------------------|---------|--------------------|------------|---------|---------|---------|---------|---------|---------|-------------|---------|----------------------------|---------|
| YEAR   | EXPORTS                    | IMPORTS | EXPORTS            | IMPORTS    | EXPORTS | IMPORTS | EXPORTS | IMPORTS | EXPORTS | IMPORTS | EXPORTS     | IMPORTS | EXPORTS                    | IMPORTS |
| 1961   | 18.8                       | 27.5    | 14.7               | 16.7       | 6.9     | 3.5     | 8.6     | 13.2    | 6.6     | 4.5     | 4.5         | 1.5     | 63.4                       | 70.8    |
| 1962   | 19.6                       | 29.1    | 17.7               | 17.1       | 3.7     | 4.6     | 9.4     | 11.3    | 13.5    | 5.4     | 4.9         | 1.1     | 68.8                       | 9.89    |
| 1963   | 13.5                       | 30.6    | 16.8               | 15.1       | 4,4     | 5.0     | 12.8    | 11.2    | 11.8    | 5.1     | 5.7         | 1.2     | 65.0                       | 68.2    |
| 1964   | 17.8                       | 28.8    | 15.1               | 14.9       | 6.1     | 3.8     | 10.9    | 10.4    | 7.0     | 5.9     | 5.7         | 1.7     | 62.6                       | 65.5    |
| 1965   | 17.8                       | 28.1    | 15.6               | 14.7       | 4.3     | 3.7     | 8.9     | 7.6     | 9.9     | 6.4     | 3.1         | 2.2     | 56.3                       | 64.8    |
| 1966   | 16.4                       | 24.0    | 15.6               | 15.7       | 5.0     | 6.0     | 9.5     | 11.0    | 6.5     | 7.5     | 4.0         | 2.6     | 57.0                       | . 8.99  |
| 1967   | 17.8                       | 17.9    | 16.1               | 19.5       | 5.5     | 4.0     | 9.9     | 12.9    | 6.9     | 7.3     | 5.2         | 5.8     | 58.1                       | 64.4    |
| 1968   | 14.6                       | 15.8    | 17.4               | 20.4       | 4.4     | 3.5     | 8.9     | 12.9    | 4.9     | 8.8     | 5.4         | 3.0     | 53.5                       | 64.4    |
| 1969   | 11.2                       | 19.3    | 20.9               | 18.4       | 5.2     | 3.3     | 5.6     | 11.8    | 8.0     | 4.6     | 5.3         | 4.      | 56.2                       | 9.99    |
| 1970   | 9.6                        | 21.7    | 19.9               | 18.6       | 6.7     | 3.4     | 5.7     | 9.6     | 9.9     | 7.8     | 7.5         | 4.7     | 56.0                       | 65.8    |
| 1971   | 10.2                       | 14.7    | 19.4               | 17.9       | 7.2     | 6.4     | 4.8     | 9.5     | 5.8     | 10.3    | 9.6         | 4.9     | 57.0                       | 63.7    |
| 1972   | 11.7                       | 12.3    | 21.1               | 19.3       | 5.7     | 6.7     | 5.2     | 10.9    | 0.9     | 10.6    | 8.6         | 4.7     | 58.3                       | 64.5    |
| 1973   | 6.6                        | 8.9     | 16.8               | 21.0       | 5.5     | 6.4     | 7.6     | 10.7    | 8.8     | 8.2     | 88          | 6.0     | 57.4                       | 61.2    |
| 1974   | 9.4                        | 9.3     | 22.4               | 18.0       | 4.3     | 6.5     | 5.3     | 7.1     | 5.9     | 7.2     | 6.1         | 5.5     | 53.4                       | 53.6    |
| 1975   | . 10.5                     | 9.0     | 21.8               | 22.3       | 4.4     | 5.9     | 5.0     | 7.3     | 5.9     | 7.6     | 6.8         | 5.9     | 54.4                       | 58.0    |
| 1976   | 8.6                        | 8.5     | 19.2               | 18.4       | 5.5     | 6.0     | 7.0     | 8.0     | 8.7     | 7.5     | 9.2         | 5.5     | 59.4                       | 53.9    |
| 1977   | 6-9                        | 8.7     | 22.2               | 16.3       | 5.4     | 5.7     | 5.4     | 6.9     | 9.3     | 7.8     | 6.2         | 5.8     | 55.4                       | 51.2    |
| 1978   | 6.7                        | 6.2     | 22.1               | 17.8       | 5.6     | 7.9     | 5.0     | 4.4     | 7.7     | 6.3     | 5.0         | 5.8     | 52.1                       | 48.4    |
| 1979   | 4.6                        | 7.4     | 21.9               | 13.1       | 6,1     | 6.4     | 4.6     | 4.7     | 9.4     | 9.1     | 5.0         | 5.0     | 51.6                       | 45.7    |
| 1980   | 4.4                        | 5.5     | 20.8               | 10.7       | 5.6     | 4.8     | 3.6     | 4.1     | 7.5     | 3.6     | 4.3         | 4.2     | 46.2                       | 32.9    |
| Commen | Daniel of Patentiately II. | 1       | min (Dit) then the |            |         |         |         |         |         |         |             | -       |                            |         |

Source: Devlet İstatistik Enstitüsü (DİE), İstatisfik Göstergeler 1923-1998, pp. 419-31. (Compiled and interpreted by Hikmet Uluğbay) up against the U.S. arms embargo imposed in 1975 as a consequence of the Cyprus landing. In July 1975 it abrogated the JDCA, because the arms embargo had not been rescinded. That same month, the use of the U.S. bases (officially called "joint defense installations") in Turkey was ended. In 1976 Ankara made a unilateral decision to freeze relations with the European Economic Community. Even though the question of Cyprus remained unresolved, the U.S. arms embargo was loosened in August 1977 and repealed in September 1978, as a direct result of Turkey's efforts. In 1978 and 1979 Turkey cooperated closely with the nonaligned countries, and Ecevit enunciated a "National Defense Doctrine" (Box 5-8). Turkey concluded a four-year, $1 billion agreement with the U.S. in 1979 even though this did not conform to the policy practices of the U.S. administration. Despite strong U.S. pressure, Turkey continued to resist the return of Greece to the military structure of NATO in 1979. It refused to join the U.S. sanctions imposed on Iran as a consequence of the hostage crisis. As a result of the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) of 29 March 1980 signed with the U.S., the basis for a local defense industry was established, the use of bases for out-of-area operations was prohibited, controls on the flow of supplies and materials into bases were imposed, and the right to suspend the status of bases in special circumstances was acknowledged. No U-2 flights were allowed throughout the period.

For a medium country like Turkey, these were difficult decisions. They were made at a time when the economy was a shambles and the country was going through a veritable civil war. In addition, even in situations where Turkey had to submit, it was able to stiffen its resolve and derive benefits. When, during the 1962 Cuban missile crisis, the Jupiter missiles at Çiğli, near İzmir, were dismantled without consulting Turkey, the realization took hold in Ankara that Turkey's national interests were being sacrificed for the interests of major powers (Hale, p. 136). Although Turkey lacked the means to carry out a landing in Cyprus in 1964, the idea that the U.S. had prevented it became prevalent. These events were the precursors of the subsequent anti-American sentiments that gripped the public and made it possible for the government to take firm stands in the field of foreign policy. In other words, in this period, even setbacks served a useful purpose by stiffening Turkey's resolution.

During this period Turkey took foreign policy initiatives that were intended to loosen its political and economic dependence on the West.

When the U.S. and the West refused to countenance the financing of certain industrial projects after 1967,

Box 5-8. A New National Defense Doctrine for Turkey

When Turkey intervened militarily in Cyprus in 1974, the U.S., acting under the influence of the powerful Greek lobby, imposed an arms embargo on Turkey that lasted three years. During this period Turkey could not take delivery of weapons that had already been bought and paid for. Even the delivery of spare parts was stopped. Although this action had negative effects on Turkish-American relations and weakened Turkey's defense capabilities, its consequences were similar to those of the famous Johnson letter and compelled Turkey to reconsider its U.S. and NATO-centered defense and foreign policies.

As a result of this, Turkey developed a new National Defense and Foreign Policy doctrine in 1978 when Ecevit was prime minister. The first pillar of this doctrine was the decision to free Turkey from depending on a single source for its arms. In conformity with this decision, Turkey looked into the possibility of producing arms jointly with countries such as Iran and Libya and even explored the possibility of procuring arms from the USSR. This was indeed a radical move in the period of the Cold War. Gen. Kenan Evren went to Moscow on behalf of the General Staff to hold talks on the subject of arms procurement.

The second pillar of the doctrine was the policy of establishing a security belt around Turkey. This approach was also known as the "region-oriented policy," which consisted of establishing cordial relations with neighbors to eliminate the need for expensive armament programs. In the framework of this policy, Turkey undertook to establish close relations with Balkan, Middle Eastern, and African countries as well as with the USSR

The third pillar of the doctrine placed Greece at the fore-front of threats confronting Turkey. The Cyprus operation and the Greek problems forced Turkey to reappraise its perception of threat. For Turkey, the main threat was no longer from the Soviet Union but from Greece. Western circles interpreted this new doctrine as "Turkey's Ostpolitik" (Turkey's new opening to the East). This new policy created apprehension in the U.S. Ecevit's resignation and the 1980 coup, however, prevented this policy from being implemented. Nevertheless, these developments allowed a new conceptual dimension to be introduced into the sphere of defense. The real breakthrough in the establishment of a defense industry occurred during the Özal era, even though it was dependent on the U.S. and consisted primarily of assembly work.

(İ. UZGEL)

Turkey's exports to and imports from the Soviet Union rose to 6%. This was how Prime Minister Demirel described the situation:

The West did not want Turkey to industrialize, or perhaps it considered this to be unfeasible. So the West recommended that we concentrate on agriculture...and light industry. It did not look kindly upon heavy industries and other sectors of

Box 5-9. The Nonaligned Movement and Turkey

Turkey's serious error at the 1955 Bandung Conference had completely alienated the emerging nonaligned movement. The negative effects of this alienation became especially noticeable in connection with the Cyprus issue at the UN. Most of these non-aligned countries had minority problems, and they tended to perceive the Turkish-Cypriot community as another minority. They were also hostile to Turkey.

Turkey's first positive contacts with the nonaligned countries occurred in 1964, when it applied to participate in the Cairo Conference as an observer. After its application was turned down, it sent two ambassadors to follow the proceedings from the sidelines. These ambassadors were seated in the spectators' gallery among the freedom fighters of those countries that had not yet won their independence, like Palestine and Oman. It is said that the prime minister of Sri Lanka, Sirimavo Bandaranaika, declared that she would not sit under the same roof with the ambassadors of NATO member Turkey, even though she carried a locket with Atatürk's picture.

The second step was when Turkey, stung by the heavy defeat it had suffered in 1965 in the voting on Cyprus at the UN, sent goodwill missions mainly to Third World countries to explain its views on the Issue. These missions, consisting mostly of university professors, returned empty-handed from countries that they were visiting for the first time.

The third initiative was started by the deputy prime minister for economic affairs, Atilla Karaosmanoğlu, during the 12 March period. This initiative involved a Turkish technical assistance program that lasted for three years. Forty-eight countries received aid within the framework of this program.

Finally, in 1978 and 1979, when Gündüz Ökçün Was minister of foreign affairs, strenuous efforts were made to get closer to the nonaligned countries. Turkey became the first president of the UN's Namibia Council, which was set up to administer that country (then under South Africa's control). Turkey also provided generous financial support to the council and offered arms assistance to national liberation movements. The guerrillas of the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) and Zimbabwean African People's Union (ZAPU), which were fighting the white minority regime of Rhodesia in what is today Zimbabwe, each received a grant of $300,000. Throughout the 1970s Turkey supported all resolutions dealing with Mozambique, as long as Portugal was not explicitly named in the resolution. When Ecevit formed his coalition government with the National Salvation Party, Turkey also lent its support to Eritrea (Ethiopia) and the Muslim Moro Liberation Front (the Philippines).

These initiatives did not become integral parts of Turkish foreign policy, which had a patchy look at the time. First, these policies lacked consistency and coherence, because the Ministry of Foreign Affairs failed to support them. The aid was spread over so many countries that it became negligible in any particular country. After Zimbabwe gained its independence, there was no serious attempt to follow up previous policies. The same was true for Mozambique and Angola when these countries gained independence. All Turkey had achieved was to draw Portugal's anger, Helping Eritrea antagonized Ethiopia. Helping the Moro Liberation Front affected relations with the Philippines.

Nevertheless, the initiatives made an important contribution toward adding a new, non-Western, dimension to Turkey's foreign policy at that time industry... When we negotiated with the Soviets and took steps to carry out our plans, the West was disturbed. In 1967 the U.S. ambassador visited me in my office. I remember the meeting vividly. He entered the room and even before he sat down, he shot the question, "Are you changing axis?" America was really disturbed by our improved relations with the Soviets. (Yetkin, p. 113)

(B. Oran)

By providing low-interest and long-term loans to finance high value-added metallurgical industries, the Soviet Union helped the Turkish economy and contributed to strengthening Turkey's autonomy vis-à-vis the West. This relationship also helped neutralize the USSR on the Cyprus issue even after Turkey landed troops on the island.

Turkey also strengthened its relations with the nonaligned countries (Box 5-9). Naturally, these relations could not be developed beyond a certain point, because of the Cyprus issue and Turkey's alignment with the West. Furthermore, the nonaligned were far from being a homogenous group, and it was not possible to satisfy them all. But during the 1970s Turkey tried, to a large extent, to repair the damage caused by all the mistakes it had committed since the time of the 1955 Bandung Conference. This led to improved relations with these countries. Turkey's efforts may not have provided too many direct benefits, but they did have the indirect benefit of allowing the elaboration of alternative policies without reference to the West.

3. These demonstrations of resolve took place at a time when Turkey was in a state of economic and social turmoil and utterly dependent on the IMF. The relative autonomy was strengthened by the IIS policies, and in essence all countries enjoyed a margin of relative autonomy in their foreign policies. But Turkey's action reflecting its relative autonomy could not be explained exclusively on this basis. There were two other major explanations.

First, and more importantly, the international correlation of forces at this juncture made this autonomy possible, including the new international balance that appeared in the 1960s, the petroleum crisis that preoccupied the West, the gathering strength of the nonaligned movement, the events in Afghanistan and Iran, and the improvement and development of Turkey's relations with the Soviet Union. It was the auspicious atmosphere created by such circumstances that allowed a wise and cautious statesman like İsmet İnönü to observe: "A new international order will be established, and Turkey will find its place within this order" (Milliyet, 16 April 1964; for an eyewitness account of this famous remark, see M. Ali Kışlalı, Radikal, 12 January 2007). This remark created an atmosphere conveying the message that there was a better way outside the Western and Eastern Blocs.

In addition, the steady growth of the global economy during the 1960s and the early part of the 1970s created new possibilities. In its early years, the European Economic Community gave importance to Turkey. This presented opportunities for Ankara, although its negotiating position was constantly undermined by squabbles between the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the DPT. There was also a lot of bureaucratic carelessness, like the time when the Turkish delegation's confidential negotiating brief was published in the Official Gazette or when import quotas were requested for items that were not among Turkey's exports (Keskin, pp. 61 and 67). Also, until the mid-1970s the U.S. was seeking to bring Turkey and Iran even closer to its side at a time when the Soviet Union had focused its interest on the Middle East. The U.S. did this by giving these two countries the opportunity to move into the semiperiphery by allowing them to develop (see Box Intro-5 in the Introduction). In this period Turkish industrialists engaged in business activities in Libya and Pakistan acted as the businessmen of a country that was a candidate to join the semiperiphery (Keyder 1976, pp. 131-32). Another reason was the climate of freedom that prevailed within Turkey. This climate of free discussion brought foreign policy issues into the daily lives of citizens. It also intensified anti-American sentiments. This environment made it relatively easier for governments to oppose U.S. policies. Incidents such as the U.S. Sixth Fleet sailors being thrown into the sea in Istanbul by leftist students and preventing the aircraft bringing Cyrus Vance, the mediator on Cyprus, from landing in Ankara's main airport in 1967 were used as arguments for resisting U.S. demands at the negotiating table. The anti-American sentiments prevalent among the public were pushing governments, whether they liked it or not, toward a certain degree of autonomy.

Against this, the right-wing movement remained solidly pro-American, both in its actions and in its ideology, notwithstanding its nationalistic rhetoric. When rightists, traditionally hard-line nationalists, beat up people protesting the presence of the Sixth Fleet, they were driven strictly by their anti-communism. An example of their orientation can be found in Türkeş's remarks in connection with the lifting of the ban on the cultivation of the opium poppy. "The issue has been used as an open defiance of the USA. The press—and even official government publications—has committed every stupidity to inflict damage to Turkish-American relations. The first thing to do is to reestablish the old feeling of mutual trust and cooperation by rapidly entering into negotiations with America to deal with outstanding issues and, above all, the issue of opium poppy cultivation" (MHP Basın Bülteni, 17 July 1974, quoted in Oran, p. 31).

The Nature of Foreign Policy

In the prevailing circumstances of the period, Turkey's foreign policy gained a degree of relative autonomy vis-àvis the West but did not change fundamentally for a number of reasons.

The philosophical attraction of the West and the nature of relations kept Turkey aligned with the West. Turkey received Western aid and loans with relative ease up to the mid-1970s. Between 1960 and 1964 Turkey received an average of $243 million and between 1965 and 1969 an average of $284 million (through the OECD Consortium) in aid and loans each year. This represented more than half of Turkey's annual external earnings from trade and other sources (Hale, p. 152). If the dependence on spare parts for weapons from the West is added to this picture, it will become clear that Turkey could not leave the Western camp, even if it had the inclination to do so. And this book contends that Turkey never had such an inclination. Its relationship with the nonaligned was in the nature of an academic exercise. In any case, there was no question of the nonaligned showing a better way for Turkey. Whatever arguments there might have been to consider the option of leaving NATO after 1960, these were quickly hushed when the Soviet fleet sailed into the Mediterranean and Soviet tanks rolled into Prague. As a result, Turkey remained in NATO, did not drift toward the USSR, remained loyal to its basic tenets, maintained its links with Israel, and supported the Pax Americana in the Middle East. It did become more autonomous from the West, however, especially with respect to Cyprus and the Middle East.

The changes made in the tenor of Turkish foreign policy were aimed in essence to find allies on the Cyprus issue and to find alternative resources to alleviate economic problems. To aim for anything further was difficult. It is noteworthy that at this time Ecevit was able to talk about "crossing over to the other side of the wall" while at the same time reassuring everyone that "Turkey would fill any gap that might result from Greece's withdrawal from NATO's military structure" (Gerger 1998, p. 122).

IV. GENERAL APPRAISAL

- 1. For the first time since before World War II, Turkey formulated a foreign policy without wearing ideologically tinted glasses. Even if it was forced to do this by the need to obtain new foreign resources, Turkey adopted a policy toward the USSR based on Realpolitik. This allowed it to differentiate between the USSR and communism and to derive substantial economic and political benefits.
- 2. As noted earlier, the lack of full freedom within the country and the suppression of the Left influenced Turkey's foreign policy. Turkey's relative autonomy in this period was not as marked as in the period from 1930 to 1939. When the Left was suppressed during the 12 March period, Turkey bowed to U.S. pressure and imposed a ban on opium poppy cultivation. We shall see a similar development in the following period from 1980 to 1990, when the 12 September administration accepted the Rogers Plan.
- 3. Although this period was one of relative autonomy thanks to changes in the international political scene, there was also a dependence on foreign resources, which had its roots in the 1945 to 1960 period. This period contained the seeds of the dependence that would come in the 1980s. As the international political scene changed, the relative autonomy was lost. The weakening of democracy at home had a drastic effect on foreign policy. The economic basis for the relative autonomy enjoyed during this period was the IIS policy. The IIS policy depended on foreign resources, however, and this situation led to the submission to the global economy that occurred after 1980.
- 4. The most autonomous and important event during this period of purposeful foreign policy was the military intervention in Cyprus in 1974. But this operation was undertaken without full knowledge of where it would lead. The second phase of the operation also violated "the rules" (see the Introduction), so it created a host of problems for Turkey. As a strategic medium power, it had engaged in a too radical form of a behavior not approved by the hegemonic power.

Sources (Appraisal of the Period)

- Akat, Asaf Savaş. Alternatif Büyüme Stratejisi, İktisat Politikası Yazıları. İstanbul: İleşitim Yayınları, 1983.
- Avcıoğlu, Doğan. Türkiye'nin Düzeni. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1968.
- Cumhuriyetin 75. Yılı. 3 vols. İstanbul: Yapı Kredi Kültür Sanat Yayıncılık, 1998.
- Gerger, Haluk. Soğuk Savaş'tan Yumuşama'ya. Ankara: Işık Yayıncılık, 1980.
- . Türk Dış Politikasının Ekonomi Politiği, Soğuk Savaştan Yeni Dünya Düzenine. İstanbul: Belge Yayınları, 1998.
- Gülalp, Haldun. Kapitalizm, Sınıflar ve Devlet. İstanbul: Belge Yayınları, 1993.
- Gürsel, Seyfettin. "Dış Borçlar" and "IMF." In Cumhuriyet Dönemi Türkiye Ansiklopedisi, vol. 2, pp. 470–85 and 486– 506.
- Hale, William. Turkish Foreign Policy, 1774–2000. London: Frank Cass, 2000.
- Keskin, Yıldırım. Avrupa Yollarında Türkiye. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 2001.
- Keyder, Çağlar. Emperyalizm, Azgelişmişlik ve Türkiye. İstanbul: Birikim Yayınları, 1976.
- . Türkiye'de Devlet ve Smıflar (original title: State and Class in Turkey). Trans. Sabri Tekay. 2nd ed. İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 1990.
- "Türkiye Demokrasisinin Ekonomi Politiği" (trans. Nail Satlıgan). İn Geçiş Sürecinde Türkiye, ed. İrvin Cemil Schick and E. Ahmet Tonak, pp. 38–75. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Belge Yayınları, 1992.
- Oran, Baskın. Azgelişmiş Ülke Milliyetçiliği, Kara Afrika Modeli. 3rd ed. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1997.
- Özdemir, Hikmet. "Siyasal Tarih, 1960–1980." In Türkiye Tarihi: 4, Çağdaş Türkiye, 1908–1980, ed. Sina Akşin, pp. 189–260. İstanbul: Cem Yayınevi, 1989.
- Sönmez, Attila. "Türkiye'de 1950 Sonrası Sanayileşme Politikası Üzerine Gözlemler." In Bilanço 1923–1998, pp. 59–71. İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.
- Sosyalizm ve Toplumsal Mücadeleler Ansiklopedisi (STMA). 8 vols. İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 1988.
- Yetkin, Çetin. Türkiye'de Askerî Darbeler ve Amerika, 27 Mayıs, 12 Mart ve 12 Eylülde Amerika'nın Yeri. Ankara: Ümit Yayıncılık, 1995.

Relations with the USA and NATO

I. THE PERIOD FROM 1960 TO 1965

The 27 May Coup and the U.S.

The military officers who took over Turkey's administration on 27 May 1960 declared that the country would remain loyal to NATO and CENTO and would continue to carry out all of the responsibilities arising from these alliances. The reason for their hasty assurances was the officers' concern that the U.S. might take a stand against the coup.

When it became apparent that the National Unity Committee (MBK) was effectively in control of the country and would honor its international commitments, the U.S. recognized the newly formed government on 30 May.

The thing that preoccupied the Americans was the fate of the bilateral agreements that the U.S. had signed with Turkey during the Menderes era. Most of these had been put into effect without parliamentary approval. On I June the new minister of foreign affairs, Selim Sarper, confirmed that Turkey would honor all agreements entered into by the previous regime. This announcement was received with satisfaction in Washington.

Washington was also interested in whether Turkey would meet its debt obligations to the U.S. At a press conference held on 4 July, the leader of the military administration, Gen. Cemal Gürsel, stated that Turkey would never disavow its debts. But he added that in repaying its debts Turkey would be left weaker militarily and economically, which should be a matter of concern for NATO. He therefore requested additional aid from Europe and America. As in the Menderes era, Turkey had to continue to incur new debts in order to service its outstanding debts.

A. Relations during the Cuban Crisis

The Background of the Crisis and Its Evolution

Starting in the spring of 1962, the Soviet Union began installing medium-range missiles, similar to the Jupiter, in Cuba. On 16 October 1962 U.S. intelligence got word of the existence of Soviet missiles in Cuba. To prevent the Soviet vessels bringing the launch mechanisms from arriving in Cuba, the U.S. declared on 22 October that it was imposing a blockade on its neighbor.

Actually, the U.S. already had started placing restrictions on merchant vessels bound for Cuba in September. In the framework of its economic sanctions on Cuba, the U.S. had turned back a number of vessels carrying goods to that country, including two Turkish vessels with cargos of wheat. The U.S. State Department announced on 27 September that U.S. ports would be closed to the shipping of countries transporting goods to Cuba.

When the U.S. started implementing its sanctions against Soviet ships, the crisis escalated. The USSR declared that it would defy the U.S. sanctions, while the U.S. announced that it would maintain the blockade. The world was at the threshold of a nuclear war.

On 22 October president John F. Kennedy declared that the U.S. would confront the Soviet defiance and sink any Soviet vessel entering Cuba's territorial waters. Although Khrushchev initially refused to recall the Soviet vessels already underway to Cuba, he agreed later on not to place missiles in Cuba when he received a U.S. undertaking to remove the Jupiter missiles deployed in Turkey. On 28 October Khrushchev announced to the world that the Soviet Union would not install missiles in Cuba, and the U.S. lifted its blockade.

Turkey's Stance in the Face of the Escalating Crisis

The Cuban crisis also affected Turkish-American relations. The installation of medium-range Jupiter missiles in Turkey was completed toward the end of 1960. But the launch mechanisms and warheads were installed only in the middle of 1962. As the assembly of the missiles was completed, the Soviet reaction started making itself felt. In May 1962 the Soviet leader Khrushchev paid a visit to Bulgaria, where he condemned the U.S. action in installing missiles on Turkish soil and warned that it would be met with an appropriate response. On 11 September the Soviets condemned the Jupiter missiles once again and repeated the warning about an appropriate response.

The Soviet response consisted of installing Jupitertype missiles in Cuba. This led to serious tension between the U.S. and the USSR. With Jupiter missiles on its soil, Turkey was inevitably drawn into this crisis, because Moscow had openly declared that it would withdraw its missiles only on condition that the Jupiters were removed from Turkey. On 25 October the Soviet permanent representative at the UN, Nikita Ryzhov, met with minister of foreign affairs Feridun Cemal Erkin and called for the early removal of the Jupiters from Turkey.

Kennedy initially opposed the removal of the Jupiters as a quid pro quo for the Soviet missiles in Cuba, claiming that the Soviet missiles were installed for the purpose of attacking the U.S. while the Jupiters were defensive weapons. But Kennedy and his secretary of defense, Robert McNamara, faced a dilemma. If the U.S. removed the Jupiter missiles, it would lose standing among the NATO countries, especially Turkey and Italy. Refusing to remove the missiles, however, created the danger of unleashing a war with the USSR. The president and his men decided to seek the views of their NATO allies.

The U.S. ambassador in Ankara, Raymond Hare, informed the White House on 24 October that Turkey was absolutely against the removal of the Jupiters. On the same day, the U.S. representative at NATO reported that the Turks attributed great symbolic significance to the Jupiters. If these missiles had to be removed, he proposed that Polaris-launching submarines be shifted to the Mediterranean to reassure the Turks.

At this time, the concern felt in Turkey over the possible removal of Jupiters at Soviet insistence was reflected in the press as well as in the ranks of the opposition. Some pundits were claiming that the U.S. was ready to engage in bargaining with the USSR. Others accused the government of being "more royalist than the king" over the issue.

On 24 October president Cemal Gürsel declared that Turkey would stand behind its friend and ally the U.S. all the way in the Cuban crisis. Prime minister İsmet İnönü also announced that Turkey was in full solidarity with the U.S.

The minister of foreign affairs, Feridun Cemal Erkin, met with the U.S. ambassador and told him about the concern of the Turkish public over the Soviet threat. After informing the ambassador that Turkey stood shoulder to shoulder with the U.S., he requested that the deliveries of F-104s be accelerated and that spare parts for F-100s be delivered at an early date.

At the meetings held on 25 and 26 October at the White House, Kennedy proposed that the question of the removal of Jupiters be taken up by the NATO Council. This would allow the NATO countries to make their own decision, sparing the U.S. a possible loss of prestige. But undersecretary of state George Ball was against this idea. He reminded the president that NATO Council decisions were made by consensus; if Turkey said no, their hands would be tied, and the possibility of engaging in secret bargaining with the USSR would then be lost. In any case, the other NATO members had also informed the U.S. through informal channels that they were against secret bargaining.

Kennedy proposed that pressure be applied to get Ankara to ask for the removal of the Jupiters. This time, Secretary McNamara opposed the president. McNamara recalled that the U.S. had proposed to Turkey in 1961 that the Jupiters be replaced by Polaris-launching submarines, only to receive a firm negative reply. The Turkish military establishment, however, was by no means willing to give up completely its role in the deterrence (Harris, p. 94). Consequently, it would not be wise to insist on an issue about which the Turks were known to be adamant.

Agreement between the U.S. and the USSR

On 27 October Khrushchev sent Kennedy a letter requesting that the Jupiters be removed from Turkey and declaring that the USSR had no intention to invade Turkey. He asked that Kennedy give a similar assurance about its intentions toward Cuba.

On that day, a U-2 reconnaissance plane was shot down over Cuba. Under U.S. plans, such an incident would call for a U.S. military intervention. But the fear that a small clash could easily escalate to a nuclear exchange caused Kennedy to hold back.

At the meetings held in the White House, it was decided that the president's brother, attorney general Robert Kennedy, would meet with Soviet ambassador Anatoly Dobrinin and inform him that the U.S. would refrain from invading Cuba if the USSR removed its missiles there. Robert Kennedy was also to inform the ambassador that the U.S. also agreed to remove the Jupiter missiles from Turkey at an early date. This part of the bargain would be kept confidential and would not be revealed to anyone not attending the White House meetings. Khrushchev would be asked to cooperate in keeping this information confidential.

Robert Kennedy conveyed the U.S. message to the Soviet ambassador on 27 October. Simultaneously, President Kennedy wrote a letter to Khrushchev, informing him that the blockade of Cuba would be lifted when the missiles were removed, but made no mention of the removal of Jupiter missiles. Dobrinin informed Khrushchev of this aspect of the bargain.

When the Soviet vessels turned back from a confrontation with the blockading U.S. navy, President Kennedy sent all heads of government of the NATO countries a letter informing them that the U.S. had not used Jupiters as a bargaining chip.

. The Dismantling of the Jupiters

When the crisis was over, the first reactions from Turkey came in the form of lavish praise for the U.S. Foreign minister F. C. Erkin expressed his admiration for the U.S. policies, which had averted a nuclear war, and especially stressed that Turkey had not been made part of the bargaining that had gone on.

When the U.S. proposed the dismantling of the Jupiters on 23 January 1963, the Turkish leaders evaluated this as a positive step in which a weapons system would be replaced by the more advanced Polaris system. Although the leadership failed to react to this development, the feeling was taking hold among the public that the Jupiters had been bargained away to end the Cuban missile crisis.

As the opposition in parliament sought clarifications from the government, Erkin's response was that Turkey's importance and role had increased within NATO through the replacement of Jupiters with Polaris missiles. He added that relations with the U.S. had never been better. Erkin reassured everyone that the Polaris-launching submarines would enhance Turkey's security and pointed out that NATO's new flexible response strategy did not lessen Turkey's importance. He added that, on the contrary, conventional warfare would now take a more prominent place; and with its large land forces, Turkey's strategic value would rise to new heights.

The dismantling of the Turkish Jupiters was completed in April 1963.

Prime minister İsmet İnönü had given his support to the U.S. during the crisis. Eight years later, however, in January 1970, İnönü would make the following statement in the TGNA: "The Americans told us that the Jupiters would be removed because they had become obsolete. These missiles would be replaced with Polaris missiles. It was only later that we learned that they had been bargaining with the Soviet Union. These events demonstrate that Turkish leaders must be careful and must not allow the country to be dragged into crisis by the Americans" (TBMM Zabit Ceridesi, 22 January 1970, session 1, vol. 2, pp. 291–92, quoted in Uslu, p. 165).

The Consequences of the Crisis

The crisis had important consequences for Turkish-American relations.

- 1. After the removal of the Jupiter missiles, the U.S. accelerated the delivery of F-104 and F-100 fighter aircraft to Turkey. In this manner, Turkey's ability to wage conventional warfare was enhanced at a time when NATO was changing its strategy from all-out nuclear retaliation to a flexible-response strategy (see Box 4-10 in Section 4).
- 2. The crisis demonstrated that decisions made in Washington might jeopardize Turkey's security and even its very existence. The belief that the U.S. was a sincere and faithful ally of Turkey was badly shaken. This helped stoke the fires of anti-Americanism in Turkey.
- 3. Turkey saw the shortcomings of pursuing a singledimension foreign policy. This led to accepting the need to establish relations with parts of the globe other than the U.S. The multidimensional foreign policy that gradually took shape in the 1960s received its first impulse from the Cuban crisis.
- 4. During the crisis Turkey noted from Kennedy's actions that in matters dealing with its national interest a good way to proceed was first to take unilateral action and then to consult allies. In the future, when taking bold steps like expanding cooperation with the USSR, lifting the ban on opium poppy growing, or intervening in Cyprus, Turkey would rely on this "national-interest-first" foreign policy model.

B. The Question of Cyprus and the Johnson Letter

The U.S. Approach to the Question

Starting in December 1963, the Greek Cypriots, unwilling to abide by the provisions of the 1960 Constitution, stepped up their attacks on the Turkish Cypriots. After the Greek-Cypriot onslaught of 21 December 1963, which came to be known as "Bloody Christmas," Turkish president Cemal Gürsel wrote U.S. president Lyndon Johnson a letter asking the U.S. immediately to put pressure on the Greek Cypriots to stop the massacres taking place on the island.

In his reply Johnson expressed his "deep concern over the tragic events taking place in Cyprus" and stated that he had written to President Makarios and Vice-President Küçük on the subject. Johnson also said: "You may be sure that I will continue to do everything I can to support any and all actions proposed by the three guarantor powers which offer any reasonable hope of assisting in a peaceful solution" (Department of State Bulletin, vol. L, no. 1282, 20 January 1964, p. 90).

The language employed by Johnson in his letter to Gürsel revealed clearly that the U.S. president looked upon the question from a perspective that was quite different from Turkey's. Johnson wrote: "Dear Friends. My Christmas holiday hours, and those of my fellow Americans, are saddened by the thought that Cypriots of both communities whose hands I have pressed less than eighteen months ago are killing and wounding one another. I will not presume to judge the root causes, or rights and wrongs as between Cypriots of the two communities. This is, in any case, inappropriate when innocent human lives are at stake. I cannot believe that you and your fellow Cypriots will spare any efforts, and sacrifice, to end this terrible fraternal strife. I hope and trust that tomorrow will find all Cypriots living at peace with one another and with the three nations which have special treaty responsibilities for the security of Cyprus" (Department of State Bulletin, vol. L, no. 1282, 20 January 1964, p. 90).

Johnson preferred to remain passive in the dispute in order to avoid taking the Turkish side and because he did not want to lose the votes of 3 million organized Greek Americans in the 1964 presidential election. In the letter Johnson carefully avoided mentioning either Greeks or Turks, preferring to refer to them as "Cypriots belonging to the two communities" and "killing each other." This revealed his concern about losing votes in the coming election.

When Turkey failed to receive the support it was seeking from the U.S., it sent a message to the president of Cyprus, Archbishop Makarios, on 13 March 1964: if the attacks on Turkish Cypriots did not stop, Turkey would protect their rights, lives, and property. The intention was to convey the impression that Turkey was preparing for military intervention. It was expected that the U.S. would put pressure on the Greek Cypriots to forestall such an intervention. But the expectation was not fulfilled, and the U.S. continued to remain passive. Hence, at prime minister Ismet Inönü's request, the TGNA adopted a resolution on 16 March, authorizing the government to intervene militarily in Cyprus whenever it felt such action was warranted.

Based on this authorization, the government made three separate attempts to intervene. But these attempts proved fruitless for a number of reasons. In early June, at a time when preparations were going ahead for an intervention, Johnson sent Inönü a letter, which dissuaded Turkey from entertaining the notion to intervene for quite a long time.

Johnson's Letter

On 5 June 1964 President Johnson sent Prime Minister İnönü a comprehensive letter on the question of Cyprus. Although the Turkish public learned about the letter from a White House statement released on 6 June, nothing was said in the statement about the letter's content except that İnönü had been invited to Washington. The content of the letter was kept confidential for a long time, but the full text was eventually leaked to the newspaper Hürriyet, which published it on 13 January 1966, eighteen months after it had been delivered.

Johnson's letter contained the following introductory paragraph:

I am gravely concerned by the information which I have had through Ambassador Hare from you and your Foreign Minister that the Turkish Government is contemplating a decision to intervene by military force to occupy a portion of Cyprus. I wish to emphasize, in the fullest friendship and frankness, that I do not consider that such a course of action by Turkey fraught with such far-reaching consequences, is consistent with the commitment of your Government to consult fully in advance with us. Ambassador Hare has indicated that you have postponed your decision for a few hours in order to obtain my views.

In his letter Johnson made the following points.

- 1. The U.S. has demonstrated staunch support for Turkey over the years. Turkey should not confront an ally with such a unilateral decision without prior consultation.
- 2. Turkey appears to believe that an intervention in Cyprus is permissible under the provisions of the Treaty of Guarantee of 1960. But this intervention will be for effecting partition, which is specifically excluded by the Treaty of Guarantee. Turkey should not take action without consulting the other Guarantor Powers (Britain and Greece).
- 3. An intervention would lead to a military engagement between two NATO members, Turkey and Greece. This is something that NATO considers completely unacceptable. By adhering to NATO, both countries have accepted that they will not wage war on each other.
- 4. "Furthermore, a military intervention in Cyprus could lead to a direct involvement by the Soviet Union. I hope you will understand that your NATO allies have not had a chance to consider whether they have an obligation to protect Turkey against the Soviet Union if Turkey takes a step which results in Soviet intervention without the full consent and understanding of its NATO allies" (Foreign Relations, 1964–1968, vol. 16, Cyprus; Greece; Turkey, Doc. No. 54, and Johnson Library, National Security File, Head of State Correspondence, Turkey, Prime Minister Inonu, Secret; Flash; Exdis, drafted and approved by Rusk and cleared by Bundy for the White House). In other words, in such a situation, the NATO countries might opt out of their responsibility to come to Turkey's defense.

- Turkey's unilateral intervention might also obstruct the UN's ongoing mediation effort.
- 6. "Under Article IV of the Agreement with Turkey of July 1947, your Government is required to obtain United States consent for the use of equipment and material provided through military assistance for purposes other than those for which such assistance was furnished... The United States cannot agree to the use of any United States supplied military equipment for a Turkish intervention in Cyprus under present circumstances."
- 7. Johnson would welcome the possibility of holding consultations in Washington with İnönü before any Turkish move was made.

The contents of the letter revealed clearly that the U.S. did not want Turkey to intervene in Cyprus. The U.S. had put forth all the necessary arguments to check a possible Turkish intervention and had even hinted that it might refuse to come to the assistance of its loyal ally if intervention resulted in a Soviet attack.

When President Johnson failed to get an answer to his letter a week after it had been sent, he decided to send undersecretary of state George Ball to Ankara on 11 June to dispel the frosty atmosphere. Meanwhile İnönü was making a brave effort to prevent the public from learning about the contents of the letter, in order to prevent Turkish-American relations from suffering a fatal blow while the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was engaged in drafting a reply.

Inönü's reply was longer and more comprehensive than Johnson's letter and was delivered to Ambassador Hare on 13 June for onward transmission to Washington (Armaoğlu, pp. 270–76). In the introductory paragraph, Inönü made these remarks:

Both the tenor and the content of your letter addressed to an ally like Turkey that has always shown great concern for its relations of alliance with America have caused profound disappointment. There is a serious divergence of views between us on a number of aspects of our alliance relations. I sincerely hope that the divergence of views that has emerged and the general tone of your letter are the result of well-intentioned efforts based on views put together in great haste at a moment when time was of the essence.

İnönü's letter contained the following elements:

- 1. The statement that Turkey did not consult with the U.S. prior to making the decision to intervene does not correspond to the facts. On all four occasions when intervention was being contemplated after the events of December 1963, Turkish officials have informed their U.S. counterparts.
- 2. When Turkey drew attention to the need for outside intervention to restore calm on the island, the U.S. declared that Makarios would be taught a lesson and that a plan was being prepared that would secure the protection of the rights and interests of the Cypriot Turks. But the delays in the deployment of the UN force have increased the intensity of the Makarios administration's attacks and the destruction caused by the attacks.
- 3. Turkey is fully conscious of its responsibility to consult with the guarantors in accordance with the Treaty of Guarantee. It has carried out this responsibility on a number of occasions over the last six months. But one of the guarantors, namely Greece, has frustrated Turkey's efforts and has even claimed that the agreements it has signed are no longer valid:

When Turkey appealed to Greece jointly to seek solutions to the flagrant violation of international treaties by the leaders of the Greek Cypriots, not only did Greece turn this appeal down, it went further and defended the illegal and inhuman actions of these leaders and even gave them encouragement...

The U.S. Government has seen fit to remind Turkey of its duty to consult, something which it has faithfully done in full sincerity. Should it not also remind Greece, which has repudiated the treaties it has signed, that it should comply with the basis of international law, which is the principle of "pacta sunt servanda"?

4. "The statement in the letter that the purpose of Turkey's intervention in Cyprus is to bring about the partition of the island has led to astonishment as well as profound dismay... If Turkey is ever placed in the position where it must intervene militarily in Cyprus, this could only be in full compliance with the provisions and purposes of international treaties."

- 5. A Turkish-Greek conflict that would cause concern for NATO members could only come about if Greece attacked Turkey. In the event of an intervention in Cyprus, the intention of the Turkish government would be to invite Greece and Britain, as guarantors, to engage in active cooperation in order to restore the constitutional order in Cyprus. "If Greece should attack Turkey in these circumstances, how could Turkey be held responsible for the consequences of this action?"
- 6. The passage in the letter stating that NATO allies would hesitate in coming to Turkey's assistance in the event of Soviet action arising from a possible Turkish intervention in Cyprus gives the impression that there is a vast discrepancy between U.S. and Turkish views about the nature of the NATO alliance and its fundamental principles. This is "a source of regret and apprehension. Any attack by an aggressor against one of the NATO allies will always be qualified as justified by the aggressor. If NATO's edifice is so flimsy that it would be swayed by the claims of an aggressor, then it appears to be in need of repair." The NATO Treaty requires its members to come to the immediate assistance of a member that finds itself under attack. "If the allies start debating whether the member that is under Soviet attack is justified or not and whether the member has brought the attack upon itself by its own actions and then decide on whether they will undertake their responsibilities to help the victim, then the main pillars of the NATO alliance will be undermined and the alliance will lose its raison d'être."
- 7. Turkey is respectful of the UN and its principles. But the activities of the UN on the island have not been able to stop the cruelty the Turkish Cypriots are being subjected to.
- 8. The present situation on the island is the consequence of the Cyprus Republic's repudiation of the treaties and abrogation of the Constitution. Security can only be restored through some authority imposing its will on the Cyprus government.
- 9. "Greece has the inclination to set the course of events in the question of Cyprus by all means until the treaties are completely invalidated... Turkey is finding it difficult to convey its righteous concerns to its allies... The question will be amenable to a solution if President Johnson makes himself helpful by using his authority to impose the sense of justice that is characteristic of the American nation."
- 10. Prime Minister İnönü agrees to go to Washington to discuss the issue with President Johnson.

İnönü's Talks in the U.S.

Inönü went to Washington, where he held talks with President Johnson and State Department officials on 22 and 23 June. While İnönü was still in Washington, another visitor was Greek prime minister Georgios Papandreou, who was also visiting at President Johnson's invitation. As President Johnson played host to both leaders at the same time, the impression spread that he was acting as mediator. Johnson met with the two leaders separately, however, and no three-party meeting took place.

In a joint communiqué released after the İnönü-Johnson meeting, the U.S. agreed that the London and Zurich agreements continued to be valid. There was also agreement on the need to find solutions to differences on the basis of talks.

In statements made by Prime Minister İnönü after the talks, he underlined that Johnson wanted a solution to the question and that the positions of Turkey and the U.S. on Cyprus were similar. But it was obvious that Johnson's letter had softened Turkey's original hard-line approach to military intervention in Cyprus. The letter would have far-reaching effects on Turkish-American relations.

The Consequences of Johnson's Letter

Johnson's letter had lasting effects on Turkish foreign policy as well as on Turkish-American relations.

- 1. The suggestion that Turkey might not be defended in the event of a Soviet attack led to a heated public debate over the extent to which NATO was ensuring Turkey's security. The view that Turkey should leave NATO began to get a better hearing than before.
- 2. The letter was an important milestone in the transformation of Turkish foreign policy as it became more multidimensional. After the letter, Turkey sought ways to develop economic and political relations with countries with which it previously had minimum contacts. Among these were especially the USSR and countries of the Third World.
- 3. Turkey stopped supporting all U.S. initiatives unquestioningly. Now it wanted to make sure that these initiatives were in conformity with the goals and principles of Turkish foreign policy. To cite an example, Turkey stopped supporting the U.S. policy on Vietnam. At the debate held in the UN General Assembly in September 1965, Turkey opposed the use of force by the U.S. in Vietnam.
- 4. The currents against the U.S. and its military presence in Turkey gained strength. At Turkey's request, the bilateral agreements were reviewed and in 1969 consolidated under the rubric "Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement."

5. Turkey initiated the policy of approaching the new military structures established within NATO at U.S. initiative with greater caution. As explained in greater detail below, it refused to participate in the Multilateral Force (MLF).

6. Johnson's letter revealed the drawback of having an army that was equipped predominantly with U.S. weapons. To overcome this, Turkey sought to diversify its sources of supply, while at the same time establishing a domestic defense industry. Efforts were intensified to give the navy the capability to carry out amphibious operations.

At this point it should be noted that there were those who argued that İnönü deliberately provoked the U.S. in order to ensure that it took action to prevent a Turkish intervention in Cyprus. In his book Gece Gelen Mektup (The Letter That Came at Night), Haluk Şahin claims that Turkey lacked the military capability at the time to intervene in Cyprus (no landing craft, no parachutes, etc.), so it feigned an intervention in the expectation that the U.S. would take the necessary preventive action.

If this claim is correct, then the withholding of the contents of Johnson's letter from the Turkish public and the sharp tone of the Turkish response demonstrate that İnönü did not expect such a far-reaching letter, containing dire threats that would cause so much apprehension in Turkey. If the prevention of an intervention in Cyprus was deliberately provoked by İnönü in order to lay the blame on the U.S. for any domestic criticism of the government's inaction, then this seasoned statesman unwittingly got Turkey involved in a foreign policy row, which he neither expected nor desired.

The Multilateral Force (MLF)

The Establishment of the Multilateral Nuclear Force

In May 1961 President Kennedy announced that he would place five nuclear Polaris submarines at the disposal of NATO in order to ensure a more effective defense of Western Europe. He declared that the creation of a nuclear naval force, to be known as the Multilateral Force, would enhance NATO's deterrent power and invited all NATO members, especially France, Britain, and the Federal Republic of Germany, to join the force.

The first positive response to Kennedy's proposal came from Britain. In an agreement signed by the U.S. and Britain on 21 December 1962, it was decided that Britain's Polaris submarines would be integrated with the force.

The main U.S. objective in proposing this force was to prevent France from becoming an independent nuclear power. After de Gaulle came to power, France accelerated its efforts to develop its own nuclear capabilities. The U.S., however, did not want to share its nuclear monopoly within NATO with any challenger. If France had independent nuclear forces, it would become harder for the U.S. to make decisions within NATO single-handedly. De Gaulle's wish to stoke French nationalism and develop an independent foreign policy that would challenge American policies was a direct threat to U.S. interests. In Kennedy's view, it would be easier to keep France's nuclear ambitions under control within the framework of the MLF.

The efforts to create the MLF continued under the Johnson administration. The U.S. wanted the MLF to consist of a fleet of surface vessels and submarines armed with nuclear weapons and under the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (SACEUR). According to the estimate of the U.S. Department of Defense, the cost of this new fleet would amount to $5 billion. This sum would be apportioned among NATO members according to their share in the force. The personnel of the force would be mixed and would come from different NATO countries.

Turkey's Approach to the MLF

This project offered few benefits for Turkey, but neither did it have any drawbacks. At first Turkey informed the U.S. that it would join in the MLF. By participating in the force, Turkish naval personnel would gain experience in the operation of vessels with nuclear capability.

The expenses arising from Turkish participation were expected to amount to about $50 million. This was 1% of the total sum needed for the force and showed that Turkey's participation would be merely symbolic. Turkish personnel would serve primarily in support units. Furthermore, the minimum term of service would be three years. This would make it difficult to meet Turkey's goal of familiarizing as many men as possible with the operation of such vessels.

Nevertheless, in early 1964 Turkish naval personnel took up their posts on board the U.S. warship USS Ricketts. This meant that Turkey was taking part in the MLF even before it was formally established within NATO.

Turkey's Refusal and the End of the MLF

Turkey adopted a more cautious approach toward the U.S. after the Johnson letter and announced in January 1965 that it had changed its mind about joining the MLF. The men serving on board the USS Ricketts were recalled. It was clear that this decision was the result of the new approach toward the U.S. that became apparent among Turkish politicians and soldiers after the Johnson letter. Turkey was also taking into account the USSR, which had taken a negative stance toward the MLF from the very beginning. By abandoning a project to which the USSR was opposed, an obstacle was being removed from the path of improved economic and political relations with the Soviet Union over the medium term.

Another factor influencing Turkey's decision was that most European NATO members failed to support the new initiative. The Turkish General Staff conducted a new appraisal, concluded that Turkey had nothing to gain from participating in the MLF, and asked the government to withdraw from the force.

Having failed to obtain the support of its NATO allies, the U.S. gave up the project in 1965. This initiative would be replaced by a new project for joint control of the nuclear weapons of NATO countries. The MLF was finally stricken from the international agenda.

THE PERIOD FROM 1965 TO 1971 Questions Arising in Connection with American Military Personnel

Increased Discontent over U.S. Military Personnel
The Cuban crisis and Johnson's letter had created a climate where anti-U.S. views and activities were on the increase in Turkey. The misbehavior of American personnel started drawing sharp criticism. The main cause of resentment among the public was the buying and selling of merchandise originating from a Post Exchange (PX) or Army Post Office (APO). A PX was a military shop established in American bases and installations, while the APO provided mail services for U.S. personnel.

Some American soldiers were violating Turkish laws by buying duty-free articles from PXs and reselling them for profit to Turkish citizens. The principal items traded in this fashion were alcoholic drinks and American cigarettes. The liquor in question was either unavailable on the market or extremely expensive because of high taxes and duties. In addition, American personnel were importing a wide range of items (from transistor radios to refrigerators) into the country without going through customs formalities. When the quantity of such illegally traded goods increased, shops started appearing in localities with American bases nearby. These shops were known as "American markets" and sold goods purchased from U.S. military personnel. As these shops grew in number, they began to harm the local economy.

After 1960 leftist currents were growing throughout the country, and their main activity was organizing antiAmerican demonstrations. These demonstrations gained in intensity when units of the American Sixth Fleet paid visits to the ports of İzmir and İstanbul. On one occasion, demonstrators hurled American sailors into the sea. This contrasted sharply with the cordial reception accorded to American sailors during similar visits in the 1950s and reflected the growing anti-American sentiments of the populace.

During this period problems also arose between Turkish personnel working in American installations and the commanders of the installations. The commanders did not allow the Turkish personnel to use the canteens, shops, and sports facilities on equal terms with American personnel. On military bases there were differences between the American and Turkish base commanders over whether the flag-raising ceremonies were to be carried out according to U.S. or Turkish regulations. Furthermore, the American base commanders did not always observe the customary courtesies when dealing with the senior Turkish officer of the district. All of this led to growing displeasure among the Turkish military.

Eventually the American government became aware of the growing discontent in Turkey and moved the installations away from urban centers to more isolated locations. Concurrently, the number of U.S. military personnel stationed in Turkey was reduced. From 1968 to 1970 their numbers fell from 24,000 to 16,000. All of this was designed to reduce the American military profile in Turkey. But these measures did not suffice to reduce the irritation in Turkey.

The Turkish-American Bilateral Agreement of 24 September 1968

When the government headed by Süleyman Demirel came to power on 27 October 1965, it felt the displeasure gripping the public as well as the armed forces and entered into negotiations with American officials for the purpose of both consolidating the large number of bilateral agreements into a single document and revising the status of U.S. military personnel so as to eliminate the causes of tension between them and the Turkish public. The Turkish side wanted the agreements concluded up to that date renewed and tidied up.

The first item taken up was the revision of the 1954 NATO Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA), which had been a major source of difficulties in Turkey. SOFA was revised through the Agreement on Offenses Committed While Carrying Out Official Duties signed by Turkey and the U.S. on 24 September 1968, and the restrictions placed on the competence of Turkish authorities in connection with the trial of American personnel were relaxed somewhat. It was agreed that the new system would function in the following manner.

The public prosecutor of the locality in which an offense was committed would inquire from the Turkish General Staff, through the Ministry of Justice, whether the offense was committed while carrying out official duties. This question would then be directed by the General Staff to the top officer of U.S. forces in Turkey. If the offender was indeed carrying out official duties, a document to this effect would be sent to the Turkish General Staff, with a copy to the commander of the offender's unit. If this document was found acceptable by the General Staff, it would forward it, by way of the Ministry of Justice, to the public prosecutor of the locality where the offense was committed, whereupon the judicial authorities would halt the proceedings and send the file of their investigation to the General Staff.

If the General Staff did not agree with the determination that the offender was carrying out official duties, and the U.S. side did not insist on its finding, the accused would be tried in a Turkish court. If the American side insisted on its original finding, the matter would be taken up by the two sides at a political level. If no agreement was reached within a period of two months after negotiations were undertaken, the defendant would then be tried according to U.S. legislation (Tunçkanat, pp. 243–48).

It should be noted that, in cases where the U.S. side insisted on its position, the defendant could not be tried in conformity with Turkish legislation. Nevertheless, the new procedure was a vast improvement over the original procedure foreseen in the 1954 agreement.

B. The Public Perception of Relations with the U.S.

The Views on Turkey's NATO Membership

The leftist movements that began to gather strength in the mid-1960s started coming out against one of the main pillars of Turkish-American relations, which was Turkey's membership in NATO. The position of the Turkish Labor Party (TİP), which led this opposition, can be summarized as follows (Uslu, pp. 196–98).

1. All of the Turkish Armed Forces have been brought under NATO control. They cannot operate independently. The most senior Turkish general is always under the orders of the NATO commander-in-chief.

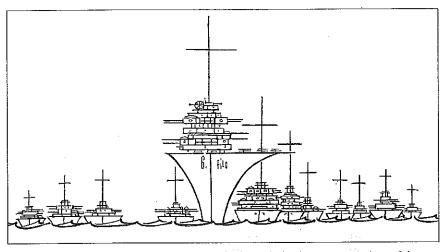

Figure 5-2. Cartoon depicting the U.S. Sixth Fleet (Turhan Selçuk, Akşam, 23 December 1969).

- As demonstrated by the Cyprus episode, Turkey is unable to use NATO weapons and equipment to pursue its national interest outside the scope of NATO.
- 3. Because the Turkish army has been structured according to NATO defense strategies, it is incapable of meeting Turkey's own defense and foreign policy priorities.
- 4. Because the U.S. has supplied the entire weapons and equipment inventory of the army, Turkey has become politically and militarily dependent. The weapons acquired through American military aid programs are obsolete and are sold at prices above their true value. NATO does not allow Turkey to establish its own defense industry.
- NATO membership impairs Turkey's freedom, independence, and sovereignty. Turkey should develop its own strategies designed to achieve regional deterrence.
- 6. The Johnson letter has proved that in certain circumstances NATO will not protect Turkey from the USSR. Some articles of the North Atlantic Treaty are interpreted differently by Turkey and the other members.

While the TİP held these views and called for Turkey's withdrawal from NATO, other left-wing groups that were more moderate defended the view that Turkey should reduce the level of its involvement with NATO.

Liberal pro-Western groups, rightists, and extreme rightists wanted to develop Turkey's relations with NATO even further. Here is a sampling of their thinking (Uslu, pp. 196–98).

1. The USSR continues to be a threat for Turkey. The magnitude of the threat can be measured by Moscow's growing interest in the Middle East and its everdeveloping relations with Egypt and Syria. In these circumstances, Turkey needs the protective shield of NATO.

- 2. Turkey is in a very strategic location and cannot opt to be neutral in Cold War conditions.
- 3. The benefits that NATO has brought to Turkey since 1952 far outweigh any burdens it has imposed.
- 4. Without the military and economic aid obtained by virtue of NATO membership, Turkey could never have established a modern army.
- 5. In the event of a withdrawal from NATO, Turkey would find itself weakened in the face of NATO member Greece. This would lead to the other NATO members supporting Greece in all sorts of questions, starting with Cyprus and the Aegean dispute (Uslu, pp. 198–200).

Even if there was a public debate over Turkey's membership in NATO, Turkish governments never considered leaving NATO. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, the public heatedly debated the question, but even CHP governments never gave any thought to leaving the alliance.

The Peace Corps Issue

Starting in 1962, the Peace Corps, established at President Kennedy's initiative, started operating in a large number of countries. It was made up of young teachers and experts and was intended to help developing countries improve their educational facilities and living conditions in rural areas.

The agreement for sending Peace Corps volunteers to Turkey was concluded in August 1962 through an exchange of notes. The agreement allowed the Peace Corps volunteers some customs privileges and made provisions for them to work in urban and rural areas throughout Turkey, with the emphasis on eastern Anatolia. Following the agreement, large numbers of volunteers started working in Turkey. By the time the text of the agreement came to the TGNA for ratification, their numbers had reached 600.

In the parliamentary debate, the opposition criticized the government for taking three years to submit to the TGNA an agreement that gave aliens the right to work in Turkey. There were also complaints that the volunteers were carrying out missionary activities and were abusing their customs privileges. Despite all this, the TGNA ratified the agreement.

The activities of the Peace Corps began to attract a lot of negative comment in the media and among the public. Much of the criticism was directed at the concentration of volunteers in parts of eastern Anatolia inhabited by Kurds, where they appeared to be engaged in unspecified research activities. When the claims that the volunteers were gathering intelligence on behalf of the CIA reached a high pitch, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs took steps in late 1966 to end rural development activities by the Peace Corps in eastern Anatolia.

There were also complaints about volunteers teaching English in schools in large cities. They were accused of carrying out cultural imperialism and directing bright students toward an American education. On 25 November 1969 the Academic Board of the Faculty of Political Sciences of Ankara University unanimously adopted a report prepared by Professor Fehmi Yavuz, in which the Peace Corps volunteers were described as people engaged in activities contrary to Turkey's interests. This was followed by a boycott of classes on the part of English teachers in secondary schools, who were demanding higher salaries and wanted the Peace Corps to leave Turkey.

The CIA Scare and the Incident with Ambassador Komer

Throughout the 1960s the alleged covert operations conducted by the Central Intelligence Agency in Turkey were preoccupying the Turkish public. The left-wing press frequently carried stories about alleged CIA involvement in events. It was claimed that the CIA was behind the two unsuccessful coup attempts carried out in January and May 1963 by the commander of the War College, Col. Talat Aydemir. The intent of the CIA was to eliminate the Left in Turkey, which was then in the ascendancy. Leftist circles were also convinced that the rise of the conservative Justice Party was due to CIA backing.

This preoccupation with CIA activities was not confined to the press. Political parties were also in this mood. In July 1966 the secretary-general of the CHP, Bülent Ecevit, declared: "The CIA is involved affecting politics in friendly and allied countries. It pours money into elections in order to bring those it wants into power and to unseat those it does not want" (Harris, p. 136).

The leadership of those making claims against the CIA belonged to TÎP. In September 1965 the leader of TÎP, Mehmet Ali Aybar, called on everyone to unite against Anglo-American imperialism. He even claimed that some leaders of the Federation of Labor Unions (Türk-İş) were in the pay of the CIA.

The Johnson administration ignored the increasing sensitivity of Turkish public opinion over the CIA and in 1968 appointed the president's advisor for CIA affairs, Robert Komer, as ambassador to Turkey. This created further controversy in Turkey, because Komer was a former CIA official who had carried out covert operations in Vietnam.

After Ambassador Komer's appointment, anti-American student demonstrations began to increase. The favorite slogan in these demonstrations was "Turkey shall not become Vietnam." The demonstrators demanded that Komer leave Turkey. TİP and the left-wing press were claiming that the CIA had assigned Komer to Turkey with the mission of eliminating the leftist movement.

When Ambassador Komer visited the Middle East Technical University in January 1969, the students set his official limousine on fire. This incident in front of the rector's office led to tensions between left- and right-wing students, which quickly turned into violence. Student demonstrations demanding that Komer leave Turkey became more frequent.

These developments led Washington to recall Komer in May 1969, but this did not end the anti-American protests. In addition to demonstrations, there were attacks on U.S. installations and personnel that grew in intensity until the military intervention of 12 March 1971.

C. The Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement (JDCA) of 1969

Following negotiations between Turkish and American officials, all of the bilateral agreements concluded prior to 3 July 1969 were collected into a single agreement called the Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement and signed on that date. In compliance with the Constitution of 1961, the text of the agreement remained classified. In January 1970 the National Assembly and the Senate held a joint closed session at which the text was submitted to the members of the TGNA. On 7 January 1970 prime minister Süleyman Demirel held a press conference at which he informed the nation about the main provisions of the agreement.

According to this information, the agreement stipulated that no operation would be conducted against a third country from U.S. bases without Turkey's prior consent. The U.S. agreed that Turkey owned the U.S. bases on Turkish soil and Turkish authorities had the right to oversee their activities. Turkey could place restrictions on the operation of U.S. bases for national security reasons.

These provisions failed to satisfy the left-wing opposition. The mainstream opposition, however, displayed a more positive attitude. The daily Hürriyet published the full text of the 1969 JDCA in its issues of 16 and 17 March 1975.

According to article 2 of this text, the number, location, facilities, and supplies at the disposal of U.S. bases in Turkey in time of peace, imminent attack, or war would be regulated according to implementation agreements negotiated by the two governments. In times of national emergency, the Turkish government would have the right to take all necessary measures throughout the emergency to protect itself, bearing in mind the objectives of this agreement.

The provisions of the implementation agreements to be concluded within the framework of this article had to conform to the letter and the spirit of the agreement. If there were any differences of interpretation of the implementation agreements, the difference would be overcome through immediate consultations between the responsible officials. If the differences could not be overcome through this procedure, the question would be referred to the two governments for a solution.

Article 3 specifically stated that American bases could be used only for the purpose of carrying out defensive measures approved by NATO. In other words, these bases could no longer be used for out-of-area operations. The details of how this participation in defensive measures would take place were also specified. According to this provision, there would be a separate implementation agreement for each case when the U.S. was to participate in the defensive measures. Officials of the two governments would negotiate this implementation agreement. In other words, Turkey had preempted the use of the bases without its approval and in a manner that would be detrimental to Turkey's national interest.

The same article provided that the Turkish government would have to give prior approval to the purpose, nature, location, duration, and composition of joint defense installations, the composition of the permitted personnel, and the overall category and type of the equipment to be supplied by the U.S. There would be no addition to or deductions from the permitted personnel without first informing and obtaining the approval of the Turkish government in situations other than those that were in compliance with the purposes of the agreement or the related implementation agreement.

It also stipulated that the materials, equipment, and supplies needed to operate the joint defense installations established in compliance with the agreement could not be removed from Turkey without first holding consultation meetings between officials of the two parties. The reason why Turkey insisted on this provision was to prevent a repetition of the Jupiter missile episode. Turkey did not want to see American weapons systems, which it considered important for its strategic defense, removed from the country.

Article 5 regulated the question of the ownership of the bases and installations. According to this article, Turkey would have ownership of the land allocated for the purpose of setting up a base or installation. In addition, all buildings constructed by the U.S. or on its behalf on the allocated land, including equipment fixed to the ground, would become the property of the Turkish government from the time of their construction or installation. The cost of operating and maintaining joint defense installations, including those operated and used by Turkish personnel, would be shared by the two sides in accordance with the share of each side in the installation's use. This share would be determined by mutual agreement.

Article 13 concerned the supervision of the bases and installations, stating that the responsibility for the supervision of the joint defense installations would rest with the Turkish authorities. It also provided that the number, ranks, and duties of the military and civilian personnel, both Turkish and American, authorized to have access to the joint defense installations in the performance of their official duties would be determined by the officials of the two governments.

Another issue that had occasionally created problems in the past was the question of conflicts of competence between Turkish and American commanders. This question and the issue of which country's regulations would be applicable in flag-raising ceremonies were also addressed in the new agreement. Article 14 provided that the duties and responsibilities of Turkish and American commanders assigned to joint defense installations would be determined by officials of the Turkish and American governments in accordance with implementation agreements. Article 17 stipulated that the display of national flags and signs to be fixed at the entrances and perimeters of joint defense installations would be regulated by special rules established in accordance with Turkish legislation, bearing in mind the principle of mutual respect.

The agreement would be valid as long as Turkey and the U.S. were in NATO. If one of the parties wanted changes in the provisions of the agreement, it would notify the other party, and changes would be made through negotiations. If one of the parties wanted to end the agreement, bilateral negotiations lasting not more than six months would take place, after which the agreement would come to an end two years after serving notice of the intention to end it.

The agreement consolidated the bilateral agreements in one text and was designed to eliminate occasional sources of tension between the two countries caused by the previous agreements. But the agreement was short-lived. When the U.S. imposed an arms embargo on Turkey in 1975, the JDCA came under heavy criticism in Turkey: when the U.S. maintained the embargo, Turkey denounced the JDCA on 25 July 1975.

D. Economic and Military Aid Economic Aid

In the late 1950s the U.S. started cutting down foreign aid in an effort to cope with America's growing current account deficit. When John F. Kennedy became president, he proposed that the industrialized European countries and Japan share the burden of foreign aid with America. In 1961 the Federal Republic of Germany responded to this appeal by announcing that it would take over part of the economic aid being provided by the U.S. to Turkey.

At the proposal of the U.S., a Turkish Aid Consortium was established in 1962 to enable OECD countries to provide aid to Turkey. But the consortium got off to a slow start, disappointing Washington. In 1963 the U.S. decided to direct the aid that it was planning to give Turkey through the consortium. The U.S. provided $66 million and requested that the remainder be provided by the other members of the consortium.

Europeans were not generous in their approach to aid. In 1964 the amount of aid to Turkey fell from $237 million to $147 million. When the consortium's aid failed to match its expectations, Ankara announced that it would not implement the consortium's stability package. Turkey was very displeased with the inadequacy of U.S. economic aid.

A development in 1963 led to further discord in Turkish-U.S. economic relations. When the USSR lowered its prices for chromium, U.S. companies switched from Turkish to Soviet chromium. This development tilted the balance of trade between the two countries against Turkey.

In 1965 the director of the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID) declared that U.S. economic aid to Turkey would be phased out by 1973. By making this announcement, the U.S. was seeking to prevent its aid from being used for purposes not foreseen in the five-year development plan. The U.S. felt that a period of eight years was sufficient for Turkey to attain its economic objectives.

But Turkish governments failed to heed the U.S. and continued their practice of using foreign aid to further their domestic political objectives. They assumed that if U.S. foreign aid did actually dry up one day, they could always plug the gap with aid from other sources. Foremost among these sources was the USSR, which had demonstrated in the 1960s that it was eager to develop its economic relations with Turkey. The general impression among the Turkish leadership was that the U.S. would never cut off aid to Turkey, since it was fully aware that the USSR would gladly step in should it decide to take this course. In effect, despite reductions, the U.S. never did bring its aid to Turkey to a complete end.

The American aid provided during this period was designed to help the Turkish economy to make the transition from protectionism to a free market system. American economists were advising Turkey to privatize the state sector, encourage the growth of tourism, and promote exports. Left-leaning politicians and the intelligentsia perceived this advice as an effort to eliminate Turkey's national industry.

In 1968 the U.S. sharply revised its foreign aid policies. Bowing to public opinion, which wanted to see a reduction in foreign aid in order to help balance the budget, the U.S. administration made sharp cuts in its foreign aid programs. In 1968 the aid channeled to Turkey through the consortium was cut in half. Although this was partially compensated through increases in the Federal Republic of Germany's aid level, the total level of aid to Turkey fell from $155.7 million in 1967 to $106.6 million in 1968.

As the amount of aid decreased, the pressure on the Turkish government to devalue the currency was stepped up. The aid to Turkey consortium, the World Bank, and the IMF, led by the U.S., demanded that Turkey take urgent economic measures to redress the ailing economy. Prime minister Süleyman Demirel, concerned about his party's prospects in the general election due in 1969, resisted these demands for a while. But as the pressure on his government increased, devaluation took place in August 1970. The value of the lira went from 9 to 15 to the U.S. dollar. The U.S. provided an additional $25 million to cushion the effects of the devaluation.

As in the 1950s, in the 1960s the development of the Turkish economy depended in large measure on the flow of U.S. aid. Economic policies not well suited to Turkey's conditions were frequently implemented in order to avoid a scaling down of foreign aid. This prevented the economy from ever regaining its health.

Military Aid

Unlike economic aid, U.S. military aid to Turkey never went through large fluctuations. But as in the case of economic aid, the U.S. was the decision-maker with respect to how the military aid would be utilized. In 1966 the U.S. wanted Turkey to use the aid to modernize its land forces. The air power that the U.S. maintained in Turkish bases ensured the air security of NATO's southern flank, and the U.S. Sixth Fleet ensured the security of the seas.

This U.S. policy was designed, in large measure, to prevent Turkey from achieving the capability of carrying out an amphibious operation in Cyprus. Needless to say, the Turkish government and the General Staff were against this policy. In September 1966 the commander of the Turkish navy went to Washington to discuss the issue of modernizing the navy. Turkey's efforts paid off, and the U.S. had to relax its policies. Washington agreed to the sale of five destroyers to Turkey by 1969.

With the 1970 decision to sell new submarines to Turkey, it became clear that the U.S. effort to refashion the Turkish armed forces according to its own design had failed.

III. THE PERIOD FROM 1971 TO 1980 A. The Opium Poppy Question

The Background of the Question

Following World War II, there was a large increase in the illicit use of narcotic drugs in the U.S. A particularly sharp rise in drug use in the early 1960s prompted the U.S. government to take drastic measures to deal with the scourge.

Measures such as education, rehabilitation, increasing awareness, and strengthening the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) did not suffice to curb the use of drugs or stem their flow into the U.S. Public alarm and pressure on the administration to do something increased when children under sixteen began to die in 1966 from drug overdoses.

Richard Nixon conducted his 1968 presidential campaign on two platforms: he would put an end to the Vietnam War and solve the problem of drug addiction.

When Nixon assumed power, he intensified the struggle against drugs and diversified the antidrug measures. The main strategy was to cut off the flow of illegal drugs into the U.S. This naturally turned the attention of the administration and the DEA to countries producing narcotic substances. In 1968 there were around half a million U.S. heroin addicts. Opium, the raw material for this drug, was extracted from opium poppies that were produced legally in about ten countries, including Yugoslavia, India, and Turkey. The UN had sanctioned the growing of opium poppies in these countries in order to meet the global demand for opium used for scientific and pharmaceutical purposes. In addition to these countries, opium poppies were being produced illegally in a great number of regions. Much of the heroin entering the U.S. came from these areas. The chief among them was the so-called Golden Triangle (parts of Thailand, Burma, and Laos).

Starting in 1969, the Nixon administration launched a campaign to prove that Turkey was the main source of the drugs entering the U.S. No attempt was made to determine with certainty where the main source of drugs lay. The DEA officials frequently alleged that Turkey was the source of 80% of the heroin entering the U.S. The press picked up these allegations and started publishing stories accusing Turkey.

The opium poppy had been in cultivation in Turkey's western and central regions for thousands of years. After signing the Geneva Opium Convention in 1931, Turkey had developed effective means to combat the illegal traffic of opium. The bulk of the opium produced by Turkish farmers was sold to the TMO, the government's agricultural purchasing agency. Some farmers, however, were seduced by the higher prices paid by drug dealers. But the amounts diverted were far below the figures being quoted by U.S. officials. According to one estimate, even if all the opium produced in Turkey had been diverted to smugglers, this would only meet the U.S. demand for heroin for a single month.

Despite this background, there was no letup in the Nixon administration's anti-Turkish campaign. The U.S. wanted a total ban on the cultivation of opium poppies in Turkey. The campaign was focused on Turkey for three reasons.

- 1. The Golden Triangle, which was the real source of drugs, lay in regions outside government control, with cultivation mostly carried out by guerrillas. Obviously, the U.S. was in no position to press guerrilla leaders to stop the cultivation of opium poppies. In addition, the Nixon administration could not intervene to stop production there because the guerrillas fighting Communist administrations in the region were procuring their weapons with funds earned from the sale of opium.
- 2. For Nixon the important thing was that the American public should perceive the issue of drugs as solved rather than actually solving the question once and for all. Nixon was looking for a short-term success that would allow him a second term, rather than pursuing a long and difficult slog that would yield a tangible ultimate victory over the drug problem.
- 3. NATO member Turkey was economically and militarily dependent on the U.S. Therefore Turkey could be expected to carry out the American demands more willingly. The aid being provided to Turkey could be used as a lever to secure the banning of opium poppy cultivation.

The Banning of Opium Poppy Cultivation in Turkey
The U.S. pressure on Turkey started building up after 1970. Prime Minister Demirel knew that many of the votes that went to his Justice Party came from farmers who lived in regions that grew opium poppies. Consequently, he stood up against U.S. demands for quite a long while. After resigning on 11 February 1970, following the rejection of the government's budget at the TGNA, president Cevdet Sunay asked Demirel to form the government once again. By then, Demirel was really weakened in the face of mounting U.S. pressure.

When acting U.S. secretary of state Elliot Richardson repeated the allegation that 80% of the drugs entering the U.S. came from Turkish sources and threatened to consider suspending aid if opium production did not cease, the Turkish cabinet met in October 1970 and decided to put restrictions on opium poppy cultivation. But the U.S. was far from satisfied with a decision that did not impose an outright ban on poppy growing. The suspension of aid to Turkey became one of the main topics on the congressional agenda.

When Nihat Erim became prime minister after the military intervention of 12 March 1971, there was a change in the government's approach to poppies. Unlike Demirel, Erim did not have to worry about going to the people to solicit their votes. He was also aware that a government of an interim regime like his could not last for long without solid U.S. backing. Shortly after he took over the reins of government, negotiations between Turkey and the U.S. were undertaken to impose a total ban on the cultivation of the opium poppy.

The U.S. proposed to give $30 million to compensate Turkish farmers for their loss of income when the ban came into effect. The Erim government accepted this proposal and imposed a total ban on the cultivation of the poppy and the production of opium as of June 1971. The U.S. disbursed only one-third of the promised sum, however, which led to much hardship among the 100,000 families who were affected by the ban.

The Lifting of the Ban and a Return to Tense Relations

After the election of 1973, Ecevit formed a coalition government composed of the CHP and the National Salvation Party. In order to cut the farmers' losses, this government lifted the ban on poppy growing on 1 July 1974.

The U.S. reacted sharply to this development. The U.S. Senate and House of Representatives adopted a joint resolution on 2 July 1974, freezing all loans to Turkey and suspending economic and military aid. Other resolutions calling for the imposition of a total embargo on Turkey followed. The Turkish government responded by declaring that all the necessary measures were in place to prevent the illegal flow of opium and that the ban on production would not be restored. This only increased the tension between the two countries.

The Nikos Sampson coup in Cyprus in mid-July 1974 and the subsequent Turkish intervention on the island helped in removing the opium issue from the agenda of Turkish-U.S. relations. From then on, the U.S. legislators who advocated the imposition of an embargo on Turkey would use the intervention in Cyprus as their justification rather than the issue of opium poppy production.

The opium issue was ultimately solved by the Turkish government by introducing in cooperation with UN a new opium extraction method known as straw processing. In earlier practice, the farmers incised the still fresh opium poppy sods, collected the oozing opium, and sold it to the authorized government agency (TMO). Some of this gum was diverted to the illegal market. In the new system, an alkaloid factory was set up to process the unlaced opium poppy pods to produce opiates necessary for the pharmaceuticals industry. A UN resolution declared this method an example to be followed by all countries that cultivated opium poppies.

B. The Arms Embargo and the 7:10 Ratio The Shaping of American Policy after the Cyprus Intervention

Starting in the second half of the nineteenth century, large numbers of Greeks from Greece and the Ottoman Empire had migrated to the U.S. These migrants were able to exercise a considerable influence over the U.S. Congress and the country's leaders. Immediately after the 1974 Cyprus operation, the various Greek-American organizations intensified their efforts to have sanctions imposed on Turkey.

The organization that included the largest number of Greek-Americans among its membership was the American Greek Orthodox Church. In 1974 the church had 503 parishes in all of the states of the union. Through their information network, Greek-Americans were kept informed about developments in Cyprus after the Turkish intervention. Archbishop Iakovos called on all church members to pressure their local and national representatives to punish Turkey. This resulted in a flood of letters and telephone calls to members of Congress and the media.

There was also a campaign to help Greeks who had suffered material losses in Cyprus. This campaign netted a total of $1 million. Greek-American families adopted Greek-Cypriot orphans.

Like the church, the American Hellenic Educational Progress Association (AHEPA) started lobbying the Congress. With its 50,000 members organized into 430 chapters, AHEPA's efforts proved extremely effective.

The campaign was also supported by the American Hellenic Institute, United Hellenic American Congress, and American Hellenic Council.

The influence of Greek organizations on the U.S. leadership proved to be even more effective than expected.

After Nixon resigned following the Watergate scandal, new president Gerald Ford and secretary of state Henry Kissinger invited Archbishop Iakovos to the White House and informed him that they considered the Greek-American reaction to be justified. President Ford also asked the archbishop to help in calming down his flock. The resounding success of the Greek-American lobby was also due to the approaching congressional election in November 1974. A large majority of the members of Congress did not want to antagonize their Greek-American constituents on the eve of an election.

On 15 August 1974 a congressional delegation consisting of Greek-Americans led by congressman John Brademas visited Kissinger to express their displeasure at the U.S. failure to prevent the Turkish intervention. According to Brademas, the use of American-supplied weapons in the Cyprus operation constituted a violation of bilateral agreements and U.S. laws. Kissinger informed the press that the source of the weapons and the legitimacy of both phases of the Cyprus operation would be investigated and a decision with respect to Turkey would be made after the investigation.

Without waiting for the conclusion of Kissinger's investigation, Congress started preparations for an embargo on Turkey. The views expressed by senators and congressional representatives in the course of the debate can be summarized as follows.

- 1. The first phase of the Turkish military operation could perhaps be regarded as serving the objective of rescuing the island's inhabitants. But the second phase in August had no legal justification.
- 2. In the course of its intervention, Turkey violated its agreements by using American weapons.
- 3. The most effective means of persuading Turkey to evacuate the territories it had occupied was to impose an arms embargo. If this stern measure was not applied, Turkey would have been rewarded for its unlawful behavior.

Because of the Watergate scandal, Congress had lost its confidence in the executive. This is why legislators refused to wait for the president and the Department of State to take action before proceeding on their own. Congress was under criticism for not being able to check the administration on the issues of Vietnam, Cambodia, and Chile, and this time it wanted to set the policy.

Kissinger and the other members of the administration found the congressional action too severe and defended their views in the following terms (Uslu, p. 200).

- 1. To punish just one of the parties would only make it harder to solve the question. To humiliate Turkey with an arms embargo would make it harder to find the peaceful solution being sought by the U.S.
- The embargo would needlessly alienate Turkey, a valuable member of NATO. The embargo would also jeopardize the continued existence of U.S. military bases in Turkey.
- 3. For Congress to take on the responsibility of the executive and impose an embargo on Turkey was an open violation of the principle of the separation of powers embodied in the U.S. Constitution. The intemperate actions of the Congress would limit the administration's freedom of action in its efforts to uphold U.S. interests.
- 4. An arms embargo imposed on Turkey could have harmful effects on U.S. relations with Israel, which had used U.S.-supplied weapons in its wars against the Arabs in 1967 and 1973.

The Decision to Impose an Arms Embargo

The decision on the Suspension of the Sale of Arms and the Provision of Military Loans to Turkey was adopted on 19 September 1974 in the Senate and on 24 September in the House. President Ford vetoed the decision on 15 October. In the voting that took place in the House of Representatives to override the veto, the majority voted for upholding it.

At this point the Library of Congress published the investigation carried out to determine the legality of the use of American weapons during the Cyprus operation. According to the investigation, Turkey had violated both bilateral agreements and American laws by employing U.S. arms in its Cyprus operation. Section 502 of the Foreign Assistance Law of 1961 provided that "arms and defense services shall be used exclusively for legitimate self-defense and maintaining internal security." Section 505/d of the same law stipulated that "no further aid shall be provided to states that do not use the arms in the intended manner." Section 3/c of the Law on Foreign Military Sales of 1968 provided that "if the aid is used for a purpose other than legitimate self-defense or internal security, all aid shall be stopped."

Immediately after the publication of this investigation, the House of Representatives passed a bill on 16 October, which stipulated that "aid shall be stopped if a determination is made that American weapons have been used in Cyprus." President Ford also vetoed this bill on 17 October.

Despite the opposition of Ford and Kissinger, the Congress kept on pressing for an embargo. The administration could no longer keep defying the growing pressure of both Congress and public opinion. The Senate voted 49 to 43 on 17 December, and the House of Representatives voted 209 to 189 on 18 December in favor of a bill that called on the president to impose an embargo no later than 5 February. President Ford signed the bill on 30 December 1974.

With this law, a new paragraph was attached to section 620 of the Foreign Assistance Law of 1961:

All military assistance, all sales of defense articles and services (whether for cash or by credit, guaranty, or any other means), and all licenses with respect to the transportation of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war (including technical data relating thereto) to the Government of Turkey, shall be suspended on the date of enactment of this subsection unless and until the President determines and certifies to the Congress that the Government of Turkey is in compliance with the Foreign Assistance act of 1961, the Foreign Military Sales Act, and any agreement entered into under such Acts, and that substantial progress toward agreement has been made regarding military forces in Cyprus. (U.S. House of Representatives, Committee on Foreign Affairs, Congressional-Executive Relations and the Turkish Arms Embargo [Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1981], p. 42)

With the passing of this law, the sale of U.S. weapons to Turkey came to an end on 5 February 1975. The disbursement of $200 million in aid already earmarked for Turkey was also suspended.

Turkish Reaction to the Embargo

As the U.S. Congress was passing a bill calling for an embargo, the CHP-National Salvation Party (MSP) coalition government resigned on 19 September 1974 over disagreements between the partners on domestic issues. When Demirel and Ecevit failed to form a new coalition government, president Fahri Korutürk asked senator Sadi Irmak to form a government. The Irmak government of technocrats lasted until Demirel formed his Nationalist Front—1 government on 31 March 1975. The confused situation in Turkey's internal political scene prevented Turkey from getting more fully involved in the congressional procedures that led to the embargo decision in Washington. It remained for the Turkish diplomats to try to influence the course of events by making the following points to their American interlocutors (Uslu, pp. 200–201):

- 1. The Cyprus intervention was carried out in conformity with international treaties and was based on legitimate reasons. It was unfair to impose an arms embargo in these circumstances.
- 2. The embargo decision would encourage the intransigence of the Greek-Cypriot side, while placing Turkey under psychological pressure. This would make it more difficult to start negotiations.
- 3. Turkish-American relations and the question of Cyprus were completely unrelated issues and should not be linked.
- 4. The provision of arms to Turkey by the U.S. was not done as a favor but as an obligation stemming from a defense alliance.
- 5. The embargo would lead to a weakening of the southeastern flank of NATO.

None of these arguments prevented the adoption of the embargo decision, so on 9 February 1975 the Turkish Ministry of Defense warned that Turkey might shut U.S. bases on Turkish soil if U.S. aid to Turkey stopped. When the Süleyman Demirel government came to power, it repeated the warning that the bases would be shut unless the embargo decision was rescinded.

Seeing that Turkey was serious about shutting U.S. bases, President Ford declared on 10 April 1975 in his State of the World speech that the Congress had gone beyond its duties and responsibilities in adopting the decision on the arms embargo. On 19 May the Senate decided to lift the embargo. But the House of Representatives stuck to its previous position. U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger traveled to Ankara on 21 May and asked Demirel not to proceed with the shutting of U.S. bases.

The Turkish opposition had been united by the embargo decision and was pressing the government hard. In response, the Demirel government made the decision on 25 July 1975 to unilaterally abrogate the Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement and stop the activities of U.S. bases in Turkey. In the decision, it was stated that the Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement of 3 July 1969 and the other related agreements had lost their legal validity. Consequently, the activities of all joint defense installations would cease as of 26 July 1975. Only the NATO responsibilities of the İncirlik joint defense installation would be exempt from this decision. All the affected installations would now come under the full control of the Turkish Armed Forces.

This decision affected twenty-one U.S. bases and installations, including İncirlik. About five thousand U.S. personnel were serving in these facilities. Their privileges to import goods free of duty were canceled. All imported automobiles would henceforth be taxable. Communications facilities for the personnel, including the APO, would be restricted. Unrestricted flights of aircraft between bases in Turkey would cease.

The Turkish press was highly critical of the embargo decision. In particular the left-leaning press underlined that it had been confirmed once again that the U.S. was an unreliable ally. Some newspapers advanced the view that Turkey should assume full control of U.S. nuclear weapons in Turkey. Maps were published showing the locations of these weapons. Demirel found himself obliged to declare that the seizure of U.S. nuclear weapons was not being contemplated.

The public reaction in Turkey and the government's determined actions led to urgent moves in the U.S. to lift the embargo.

The Process of Lifting the Embargo: The DECA of 1976 and the 7:10 Ratio

The U.S. administration wanted to conclude a new agreement to replace the defunct JDCA and thereby guarantee the operation of the bases and installations, before lifting the arms embargo.

The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) was signed in Washington by Turkish minister of foreign affairs Çağlayangil and U.S. secretary of state Kissinger on 26 March 1976. According to article 2 of DECA, the defense cooperation within this agreement would be limited to the commitments undertaken within NATO. The installations could not be used for purposes not specifically approved by the Republic of Turkey. Unlike the JDCA, this provision allowed Turkey to stop the use of bases for purposes not serving its national interest.

Articles 3 and 4 contained provisions that were more detailed than those in the JDCA. According to these provisions, the Turkish government approved the U.S. government's carrying out defense measures at monitoring installations, at intelligence-gathering systems and networks to be mutually determined, and at the Kargaburun station and the İncirlik installation. It was specified that all of these facilities were Turkish military installations commanded by Turkish officers, where only the Turkish flag would be displayed. Activities and technical operations at installations would be carried out for purposes approved by the Turkish Republic in accordance with mutually agreed programs.

Article 6 provided that personnel at bases could only perform those duties approved by the government of the Turkish Republic, that the areas where personnel would operate and the distribution of personnel would be determined jointly, bearing in mind the particular requirements, and that the level of the Turkish personnel at special installations would be established at around 50%, through mutual agreement of the parties.

Article 7 of DECA contained a provision that also existed in JDCA: the construction of new buildings, their demolition, and their modernization in order to modify their function at installations and related facilities located on bases could only be carried out after obtaining the authorization of the Turkish authorities. Article 8 stipulated that the weapons, ammunition, and essential materials necessary for carrying out activities in the bases could not be removed from Turkey without the agreement of the parties; nor could they be moved in a manner that would affect the fulfillment of NATO duties.

Unlike JDCA, DECA specified the amount of defense equipment that the U.S. would provide Turkey. Article 19 read as follows: "In the first four years of this agreement, the Government of the U.S. will transfer to Turkey defense materials in the amount of one billion dollars through grants, loans, and leases. This amount will be disbursed in equal, yearly programs that will be agreed upon by the officials of the two governments. Unless otherwise agreed, 25% of the total amount, the equivalent of $250,000,000, shall be authorized four years in advance. In the first year the grant component will amount to $75,000,000 and will not be below $200,000,000 for the four-year period."

This article, which did not exist in the previous agreement, created difficulties in the U.S. Congress because it involved future financial commitments for the U.S. The U.S. budget is approved by the Congress on an annual basis before the beginning of the fiscal year. Congress can make additions or deductions in the budget for political reasons. If the government committed itself in advance to providing Turkey a certain amount of aid for a number of years, and Congress approved this commitment, it would not be possible, as in the case of the embargo decision, to suspend or to end the provision of aid to Turkey on political grounds.

In this context, two conditions had to be met before the agreement could come into effect. The U.S. Congress had to ratify the agreement and lift the embargo on Turkey. In January 1977 Congress refused to ratify the agreement, so DECA never came into effect (Armaoğlu, pp. 288–96).

In March 1976, when the DECA negotiations were still going on, the U.S. proposed the conclusion of a similar agreement with Greece. The U.S. contemplated giving Greece aid amounting to $200 million over a four-year period, when Turkey had been offered $1 billion under DECA. When the Greek government learned of the amount of aid on offer to Turkey, it refused to negotiate an agreement.

Prime Minister Karamanlis declared that the negotiations could not be resumed unless Greece was offered 70% of the aid that was being offered to Turkey. Karamanlis submitted the figures on U.S. military aid to Greece and Turkey starting in 1947 and concluded that the ratio was 7:10. Consequently, he wanted at least $700 million in military aid for Greece. President Ford accepted Karamanlis's argument and secured a defense cooperation agreement with Greece in July 1977. But this agreement also failed to get the ratification of Congress.

This 7:10 ratio that first appeared in the U.S.-Greek negotiations came up once again during the process of lifting the arms embargo on Turkey, and successive U.S. administrations consistently operated on the basis of this ratio.

The Lifting of the Embargo and Its Consequences

On 4 August 1977 the U.S. Congress adopted Public Law 95-384, by which it authorized $175 million in Foreign Military Sales (FMS) to Turkey in fiscal 1978. This law stated:

[T]he President has determined and certified that resuming full, military cooperation with Turkey is in the national interest of the United States and in the interest of NATO, and that the Turkish Government is making a sincere effort to achieve a just and peaceful solution to the Cyprus question and a peaceful and early return of the refugees to their homes and properties and to continue withdrawing the Turkish forces in Cyprus within the framework of a solution to the Cyprus question... Consequently, subsection x of section 620 of the foreign Assistance Law of 1961 will no longer be applicable.

But the Military Assistance Program (MAP), which was of great importance to Turkey because it consisted of grant aid, was not restored.

Public Law 95-384 also contained provisions with respect to the basic principles of America's eastern Mediterranean policy. One of these was that there must be a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus question. Congress felt that the following conditions must be met in order to attain this objective.

- 1. A just solution in Cyprus calls for the establishment of a free and independent government on the island guaranteeing the full protection of the human rights of all the people of Cyprus.
- 2. A just solution must include the withdrawal of the Turkish forces on the island.
- 3. The principles established in February 1977 in Nicosia for the resumption of intercommunal talks and the UN resolutions on Cyprus constitute the basis for negotiations leading to a just solution in Cyprus.
- 4. U.S. policy toward Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey aims at establishing a stable and peaceful environment in the eastern Mediterranean.
- 5. The defense materials furnished by the U.S. to the countries of the eastern Mediterranean shall only be used in conformity with this law, the law on the control of arms exports, and the agreements concluded with respect to these defense materials.

Although it had lifted the embargo, Congress demonstrated that it continued to be sensitive on the Cyprus issue. The new law contained a provision declaring that care would be taken to ensure that the materials of the security assistance being provided to Greece and Turkey would only be used for defensive purposes. It was also emphasized that care would be taken to preserve the military balance among the regional countries, including Greece and Turkey. The balance referred to in this instance was the 7:10 ratio (Armaoğlu, pp. 297–99).

As the U.S. administration restored its influence over the Congress, the embargo was lifted completely on 12 September 1978. Although Ankara received this news with satisfaction, it added that the 7:10 ratio was unacceptable. The nonratification of the DECA of 1976 meant that there was no basic text on which to base the relations between the two countries in the military field. After the lifting of the embargo, the preparations for concluding a new DECA gathered pace.

By imposing an embargo, Congress intended to force Turkey to back down on the Cyprus issue. As a matter of fact, it had the opposite effect: on 13 February 1975 Turkey responded to the embargo by establishing the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus. U.S. attempts to direct Turkish policies on Cyprus, both during and after the embargo, failed to yield any results.

Another objective pursued in particular by the legislators of Greek extraction was to punish Turkey because of its intervention in Cyprus. This objective was partially attained. American military aid, which was of vital importance for the modernization of the Turkish army, was interrupted for three years. Being deprived of spare parts for its existing weapons also harmed the Turkish army.

The embargo strengthened anti-American tendencies among the Turkish public. The standing of the U.S. in Turkey was badly shaken. The army in particular started demanding the development of a domestic defense industry in order to avoid a repetition of the embargo experience. (On the lifting of the embargo, also see "Relations with Iran" in "Relations with the Middle East" in this section.)

The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) of 1980

Problems That Emerged in the Course of Negotiations

When the U.S. arms embargo was lifted, negotiations were undertaken between Turkish and American officials in the winter of 1979 to conclude a new and comprehensive agreement that would replace the JDCA of 1969 and the DECA of 1976 that had never come into effect. When Prime Minister Ecevit resigned after his party's poor electoral performance in October 1979, Demirel became prime minister. His government was eager to conclude a new DECA as early as possible.

But a number of differences emerged between the parties that prolonged the negotiations.

- 1. Turkey wanted the agreement to specify the military and economic assistance that the U.S. would furnish Turkey over a number of years. It was expected that a large lump sum of aid would undo the damage done by the lack of aid during the embargo. But the U.S. side explained that, under the U.S. Constitution, Congress approved the budget (and with it the foreign aid bill) on an annual basis and that it was not possible to include a provision in the agreement that would specify the amount of aid over a number of years. At Turkey's insistence article 3 was included: "The Government of the United States shall use its best efforts to provide the Government of the Republic of Turkey with defense equipment, services, and training in accordance with programs to be mutually agreed upon" (U.S. Treaties and Other International Agreements, TIAS 9901 [Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1980], p. 3326).
- 2. It was foreseen that minister of foreign affairs Hayrettin Erkmen and U.S. ambassador James Spain would sign DECA. But Turkey was insisting that a document be signed by president Jimmy Carter in order to give more weight to the commitment contained in article 3. Having suffered from the embargo, Turkey wanted to ensure that the president would not approve a similar decision in the future. The question was overcome by having the U.S. ambassador deliver to the Turkish side at the time of the DECA signing a side letter indicating that President Carter would make every effort to implement the provision in this article.

3. The two sides also disagreed over the quantity of arms and materials that would be delivered within DECA. The Turkish side wanted a detailed list of what was to be furnished attached to the agreement. The U.S. side contended that conditions might change and that it might become impossible to deliver some items in the future and opposed the idea of compiling a detailed list on these grounds. The question was overcome by agreeing to have Turkish and U.S. experts concur on the composition of the aid prior to the signing of DECA.

4. There was a further disagreement on the type and number of aircraft that the U.S. would be allowed to locate on Turkish bases under the terms of DECA. Turkey made it clear that it would not allow the aircraft located in Turkey to be used for purposes not related to NATO (see Box 4-9 in Section 4). The U.S. side had no choice but to agree with Turkey on this issue.

5. The manner in which the expenses of Turkish personnel at the bases would be met also created difficulties. The U.S. declared that Turkish personnel would have access to messes if they paid for their meals. The Turkish side eventually agreed to cover the costs of canteens and other places used exclusively by Turkish personnel and to meet the expenses of Turkish personnel.

Once these difficulties and differences were overcome, DECA was signed in Ankara on 29 March 1980. Because the TGNA was involved with electing the president of the Republic, it never got around to ratifying the agreement. After the military coup of 12 September 1980, it was approved by a decree of the Council of Ministers on 18 November 1980 and came into effect on 1 February 1981, when it was published in the Official Gazette (Armaoğlu, p. 300).

DECA's Provisions

DECA was the most comprehensive agreement between Turkey and the U.S. In addition to the main text consisting of nine articles, it contained three supplementary agreements and thirteen related implementation agreements (Armaoğlu, pp. 301–63).

Article 1 provided that "the parties shall maintain and develop close cooperation between them comprising economic, defense and related scientific and technical fields." Article 2 declared: "Recognizing the interrelationship of economic and defense matters and the fact that a sound defense rests on a sound economy and in order to assist each other to fulfill their mutual responsibilities as members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, the Parties, as envisaged in Article II of the North Atlantic Treaty, will exert maximum efforts to develop economic cooperation, including commercial, economic, industrial, scientific and technological relations, between the two Countries." In this way, for the first time since the two countries engaged in intensified relations starting with the agreement of 12 July 1947, military and economic cooperation became subjects of the same agreement.

The subject of developing a domestic defense industry in Turkey was also taken up within the framework of DECA. Article 4 included a passage declaring that the U.S. government "shall assist the Government of the Republic of Turkey in mutually agreed efforts aimed at enhancing the production, maintenance, repair and modernization of defense material and equipment in Turkey and will encourage new defense production projects and two-way trade in defense material."

Like the JDCA, the DECA also contained provisions regulating the principles upon which activities at American bases and installations would rest. Article 5 stated: "The activities and technical operations of the installations shall be conducted in accordance with mutually agreed purposes and programs... The extent of the defense cooperation envisaged in this agreement shall be limited to obligations arising out of the North Atlantic Treaty." This provision was intended to prevent the U.S. from using the bases and installations for non-NATO purposes, especially to support unilateral operations in the Middle East.

Article 7 provided that the agreement would be valid for a period of five years and would continue to be in effect for further one-year periods unless one of the parties notified the other of the termination three months before the end of this initial five-year period.

Supplementary Agreement Number 2 dealt with cooperation in the field of defense industries. Article 1 of the text provided that the parties "will cooperate in order to increase their defense equipment production and maintenance capabilities and to enable their armed forces to acquire more economically and efficiently modern armaments and equipment needed for self and common defense." Article 9 read: "Third party transfer of defense articles or technical data made available under this Supplementary Agreement and of defense articles produced with such data will be subject to the agreement of the Government that made available the defense articles or technical data, except as otherwise agreed." Under the terms of this agreement, Turkey exported F-16 combat aircraft made in Turkey to Egypt in the 1990s, after obtaining U.S. approval.

Article 4 stipulated that the U.S. would "provide to the Government of the Republic of Turkey or assist the Government of the Republic of Turkey in obtaining, wherever possible at no cost or at terms no less favorable than those extended by the Government of the United States to any other NATO country, industrial property rights for the purpose of promoting the defense equipment production and enhancing the rationalization, standardization, and interoperability of equipment and services of the NATO Alliance." In this framework, it was envisaged that the two sides would engage in cooperation for the production of antitank guns, fuses, gunpowder, explosives, and rockets in addition to enhancing aircraft-overhauling capabilities. Thus the U.S. agreed to apply to Turkey a sort of mostfavored-nation treatment in the field of defense. Despite this, especially after the mid-1980s, some members of the U.S. Congress, acting in unison with anti-Turkish Armenian and Greek lobbies, would seek to impose restrictions on cooperation with Turkey in the field of arms production and maintenance.

Supplementary Agreement No. 3 regulated the American bases and installations in Turkey. According to this agreement, Turkey allowed the U.S. to operate the following facilities: electromagnetic monitoring at Sinop; radar early warning and space monitoring at Pirinçlik; air operations and support at İncirlik; communications facilities at Yamanlar (İzmir), Şahintepe (Gemlik), Elmadağ (Ankara), Karataş (Adana), Mahmutdağ (Samsun), Alemdağ (İstanbul), and Kürecik (Malatya); seismic monitoring at Belbaşı; and radio navigation at Kargaburun.

According to article 2 of the supplementary agreement, technical activities and maintenance at facilities whose main function was to gather information and provide communication and radio-navigation services would be carried out jointly by Turkish and American personnel.

Article 3 provided that the bases and installations would be commanded by Turkish and American officers of the same rank, who would be responsible for jointly administering the facilities. All services dealing with security, however, including area security, would be the responsibility of the Turkish commander. The American flag would be hoisted only at the headquarters building of the U.S. forces.

As in previous agreements, this agreement also provided that American personnel and their dependents would be free to import their personal equipment, food, supplies, and other goods. But this time it was specified that these items would be in reasonable amounts and would be listed in a manifest that would be presented to the Turkish authorities at the point of entry into the country or when they were being removed from the country. It was also provided that the arms, munitions, and main items of equipment needed for the operation of an installation could not be removed from Turkey without prior notification. This included equipment that was due to be replaced because of obsolescence.

The agreement stipulated that the land allotted to the U.S. and all structures built on this land would be the property of the Turkish Republic and be registered as such.

Finally, it was stated that in extraordinary circumstances it was the inherent right of the Turkish government to take, in conformity with international law, whatever restrictive measures were necessary to defend its national existence. This provision would allow Turkey, if it deemed it necessary, to suspend some articles of the agreement and impose certain restrictions on the U.S. bases, installations, and personnel in Turkey.

D. The Effects of Iran's Revolution on Turkish-American Relations

The new administration that came to power in Iran following the overthrow of the shah in 1979 severed diplomatic relations with the U.S. U.S. citizens who sought refuge in their embassy were not allowed to return to the U.S., and shortly afterward the embassy compound was occupied by Iranian revolutionaries. This was the cause of the "hostage crisis" between the two countries.

In April 1980 President Carter appealed to the governments of friendly states to join the U.S. in imposing sanctions on Iran, including severance of diplomatic relations, banning trade, and denying visas to Iranians.

Turkey fully supported the U.S. in its efforts to get the hostages out of Iran. But it was reluctant to take measures against a country from which it imported a substantial part of its oil requirements. Furthermore, tough sanctions could easily push Tehran into Moscow's orbit, and Turkey did not want a pro-Soviet neighbor on its eastern border.

On 17 April the U.S. decided to ban the import of Iranian oil and forbade U.S. citizens from traveling to Iran. It also called on Turkey to do likewise. Turkey declined to take such measures, citing its special circumstances. The Turkish government declared that the embassy of at least one NATO country should remain in Tehran to look after Western interests, and Turkey was the country best placed to take on this task.

At this point the newspaper Hürriyet revealed that the U.S. had delivered a note demanding that Ankara immediately sever diplomatic relations with Iran. This allegation was denied by the U.S. At the end of April, however, Ambassador Spain appealed to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs once again for Turkey to apply sanctions to Iran.

Turkey stood firm in its decision not to join the sanctions. It refused to allow the use of İncirlik air base for the purpose of freeing the hostages, because this would be an "out-of-area" operation within the context of NATO. On 25 June the U.S. mounted a salvage operation with helicopters taking off from the Persian Gulf, but the operation ended in failure. Turkey thereupon informed the U.S. that, while not participating in the sanctions, it would be ready to act as mediator to resolve the hostage crisis.

The U.S. was seeking sanctions from Ankara, however, and not mediation. The Iranian administration released the hostages on 20 January 1981. After refueling in Turkey, the Algerian aircraft charged with this mission lifted the U.S. citizens out of Tehran and flew them to Ankara's Esenboğa Airport.

Turkey's stance in connection with the hostage crisis drew sharp criticism in the U.S. Doubts were expressed about the reliability of Turkey as an ally. Turkish public opinion in this period, however, took the position that Ankara should not jeopardize its national interest in order to defend the interests of another state. The hostage crisis was one of the few instances when Washington asked for Ankara's help and failed to get satisfaction.

Cağrı Erhan

Sources (Relations with the USA and NATO)

Altuğ, Kurtul. 27 Mayıs'tan 12 Mart'a. İstanbul: Koza, 1976.

Arcayürek, Cüneyt. Demirel Dönemi 12 Mart Darbesi 1965–1971. Ankara: Bilgi, 1985.

Armaoğlu, Fahir. Belgelerle Türk-Amerikan Münasebetleri. Ankara: TIK, 1991.

Çağlayangil, İhsan Sabri. Anılarım. İstanbul: Güneş, 1990.

Campany, Richard C. Turkey and the United States: The Arms Embargo Period. New York: Praeger, 1982. de Conde, Alexander. A History of American Foreign Policy. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1971.

Erhan, Çağrı. Beyaz Savaş Türk-Amerikan İlişkilerinde Afyon Sorunu. Ankara: Bilgi, 1996.

Fırat, Melek M. 1960–71 Arası Türk Dış Politikası ve Kıbrıs Sorunu. Ankara: Siyasal Kitabevi, 1997.

Harris, George. Troubled Alliance: Turkish-American Relations in Historical Perspective 1945–1971. Washington, D.C.: American Enterprise Institute, 1972.

İpekçi, İsmail Cem. Tarih Açısından 12 Mart. İstanbul: Cem, 1977.

May, Ernest R., and Philip D. Zelikow. The Kennedy Tapes. Cambridge, Mass.: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1997.

McNamara, Robert. Out of the Cold. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989.

Mungo, Alfred. Turkey: A Delicately Poised Ally. Beverly Hills: Sage, 1976.

Olaylarla Türk Dış Politikası (OTDP). 6th ed. Ankara: AÜSBF Dış Münasebetler Enstitüsü, 1987.

Orkunt, Sezai. Türkiye-Amerika Askeri İlişkileri. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1978.

Ponomaryov, B., and Andrei Gromyko. History of Soviet Foreign Policy 1945–1970. Moscow: Progress Publishers, 1973.

Rustow, Dankwarth A. Turkey: America's Forgotten Ally. New York: Council of Foreign Relations, 1987.

Şahin, Haluk. Gece Gelen Mektup. İstanbul: Cep, 1987.

Sander, Oral. Siyasi Tarih 1918-1994. Ankara: İmge, 1994.

———. Türk-Amerikan İlişkileri 1947–1964. Ankara: SBF, 1979.

Shaked, Haim, and Itamar Rabinovich. The Middle East and the United States. London: Transaction Books, 1980.

Sönmezoğlu, Faruk. ABD'nin Türkiye Politikası 1964–1980. İstanbul: Der, 1995.

Soysal, İsmail. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları C. II (1945–1990). Ankara: Türk Tarih Kurumu, 1991.

Spain, James. American Diplomacy in Turkey. New York: Praeger, 1984.

Spainer, John (ed.). American Foreign Policy since World War II. Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 1988.

Tunçkanat, Haydar. İkili Anlaşmaların İç Yüzü. İstanbul: Tekin,

Uslu, Nasuh. Türk-Amerikan İlişkileri. Ankara: 21. Yüzyıl, 2000. Yavuz, Turan. Satılık Müttefik. İstanbul: Doğan, 2000.

Relations with Greece

I. BACKGROUND OF THE PERIOD

Throughout the 1950s, when the Cold War was pervasive, the Menderes government in Turkey and the Papagos and Karamanlis governments in Greece tended to identify their national interest with Western interests. Starting with Cyprus, all differences between the two countries were perceived by Washington as weakening NATO's southeastern flank and therefore being to Moscow's advantage. As a result, these differences were resolved without turning into problems through Washington's intercession.

This era came to an end in the 1960s when international developments and developments within Turkey and Greece created a new situation and led to the poisoning of relations between the two countries by conflicts and disputes that have lasted to this day. The fundamental dispute in the 1960s was over Cyprus, with the additional disputes over the Aegean Sea in the 1970s. From time to time, these disputes threatened to get out of hand and turn into armed conflict. To understand how and why the era of friendship of the 1950s came to an end, we must examine the changes that came about in the 1960s.

In that decade the Cold War gradually started giving way to détente. The first signs of détente appeared with Stalin's death in 1953, developed after the Cuban missile crisis in 1962, and became institutionalized with the Helsinki Final Act of European Security and Cooperation in 1975. Détente affected not just relations between the two blocs but also relations within the blocs. Détente diminished the threat perceived as coming from the other bloc. This led to a more nationalistic and independent stance vis-à-vis the leading power in both camps. At the same time, disputes within blocs were able to resurface and attain dangerous proportions. In this new setup, the leadership of the U.S. and the USSR began to be challenged. France within the Western Bloc and Czechoslovakia and Romania within the Eastern Bloc started questioning

Washington's and Moscow's policies and steering more independent courses. As perceived threats and the influence of bloc leaders diminished, it became harder to prevent intrabloc differences from turning into conflicts. Within the Eastern Bloc, one such nationalistic conflict was seen in Moscow's relations with Peking; in the Western camp, Turkey and Greece confronted each other over Cyprus. The changed international situation, which allowed the Cyprus question to fester during the 1960s and led to a military operation in 1974, brought these two countries to the brink of war.

In the 1960s the political and economic structures of Turkey and Greece underwent significant changes. The economic aid provided mostly by the U.S. in the 1950s had led both agricultural countries in the direction of capitalism. Mechanization had been introduced to agriculture, and the rural sector became more integrated with the market due to investments in the road network. Without land reform, the surplus farm labor drifted into the cities. Because of the absence of industrialization, a mass of unemployed and uprooted lumpenproletariat arose in the cities. This phenomenon was observed in both countries and led to a strengthened opposition in the 1960s and a corresponding weakening of the political parties that had been in power throughout the 1950s.

The economic and social changes in Turkey led to even more sweeping consequences. On 27 May 1960 the armed forces, with the backing of the intelligentsia, took over the administration. The founders of Turkey's regime, the military and civilian bureaucracy, were reacting to the bourgeoisie, which had come to power in 1950 and was seeking to shift the balance in its own favor. The changes that had taken place in Turkey's social fabric, however, did not allow the bureaucracy to stay in power for long. The regime established on 27 May prepared the most democratic Constitution in Turkey's history, eliminated the DP from the political scene, and restored power to the civilians in 1961. There was a transition period from 1961 to 1965, when coalition governments were formed by Ismet İnönü until the Justice Party came to power in 1965. The bourgeoisie was in charge of the country once again. The period from the coup of 27 May 1960 to the military's memorandum of 12 March 1971 was one in which democracy was allowed to function freely for the first time in Turkey's history. In the heady atmosphere of freedom introduced by the 1961 Constitution, all shades of political opinion found it possible to organize themselves and all political currents, from extreme Right to extreme Left, were able to voice their dissent.

This dissent was also felt in the area of foreign policy. Traditionally foreign policy in Turkey had been bipartisan, but now it was coming under critical scrutiny. Previous governments had been autonomous in this sphere, but now they were being held accountable, and their freedom of maneuver became more restricted. When the Cyprus crisis erupted in the 1960s, the government was operating under the pressure of strong public opinion. Student unrest gathered momentum toward the end of the 1960s, as did Kurdish nationalism. The regime's founders considered all of this to be a direct threat to the political regime. Finally, the armed forces submitted a memorandum to the government, which led to an interim regime lasting until 1973. After the election of 1973 came a period of unstable coalition governments that ended in 1980. The disputes over the Aegean between Greece and Turkey and the Cyprus operation took place during this period of instability in Turkey.

Like Turkey, Greece went through a similar process. During the 1950s Western aid allowed Greece to embark on the road to capitalism. But the process did not go hand in hand with structural adjustment. This led to an uneven distribution of income, unemployment, emigration, and inadequate funds for education and health. The resulting social discontent was suppressed, and critics, especially the Communists, were either imprisoned or forced to flee the country. When the Karamanlis government was pressed by the U.S. to reach an agreement with Turkey over Cyprus, the opposition was able to make political capital out of this in the 1961 election. The Union of the Center Party of Georgios Papandreou used the issue of Cyprus as a tool to give expression to widespread internal discontent. When it started looking like the government might lose the election, the mobilization of the army and, in particular, the pressure of the gendarmerie in the rural areas allowed the National Radical Union of Karamanlis to score another victory. Papandreou protested the election results, which he claimed were illegal, and launched his Anendotos (Struggle All the Way) campaign, which went on for two years. The campaign paid off: in the 1963 election, the Union of the Center emerged as the first party but failed to get an overall majority in the parliament. Another election was held in February 1964, and this time Papandreou won a landslide victory and formed a government. During his term, Papandreou sought to establish a fully functioning democracy in Greece. For this, he tried to introduce constitutional limitations on the king's powers and sought to loosen the army's links with the palace and turn it into an impartial institution detached from politics. When he tried to dismiss the promonarchy minister of defense, rumors began circulating that his son, Andreas Papandreou, was conspiring with young officers to carry out a coup. The elder Papandreou found himself confronting both the palace and the army and was forced to resign.

After two years of unstable coalition governments, a junta of colonels took power on 21 April 1967. The junta consisted of Georgios Papadopoulos, Nikolaos Makarezos, and Stylianos Pattakos and had the backing of the CIA. A military dictatorship was established after the coup and ran the country until 1974. As the junta progressively lost popular support, it became more repressive. In 1973 Dimitrios Ioannides carried out a coup against the coupmakers and concentrated all power in his own hands. The next year, Turkey's Cyprus operation led to the collapse of the military dictatorship. Karamanlis, who had been living in Paris in voluntary exile since 1963, was summoned to form the government. Karamanlis's second term in power was to last until 1981. In this period Greece carried out its democratization process peacefully. In foreign policy, it set new objectives under the slogan "Greece is European" and made substantial progress toward integrating itself with the European Community. Since the 1950s Turkey and Greece had been going through similar economic, social, and political processes and had been pursuing similar foreign policies. It was the sharp digression that occurred after 1974 that can explain the different relative positions of the two countries in the present-day political arena.

In the two decades from 1960 to 1980 both countries went through significant economic and social transformation and suffered from unstable coalition governments, political upheavals, and military coups. Their foreign policies and bilateral relations were also quite unstable. First the question of Cyprus and then the Aegean disputes marred bilateral relations and led to significant changes in the foreign policies of the two countries.

II. THE PERIOD WHEN THE CYPRUS QUESTION WAS THE DETERMINING FACTOR (1960–1974)

The first phase of the Cyprus question came to an end with the signing of the London Treaties in 1959. Turkey and Greece were engrossed in their internal affairs. Cyprus was trying to get used to independence, and relations between Greece and Turkey remained unruffled. The events of 1963 ushered in the second phase of the Cyprus question, which was to last until 1974 and differed markedly from the first phase (from 1945 to 1960). In the first phase the Cyprus question concerned only Turkey, Greece, and Britain. Now there was an independent and nonaligned Cyprus, with its Greek and Turkish communities. Turkey, Greece, and Britain continued to be parties through treaty rights. As leaders of the two blocs, the U.S. and the USSR were also involved. The question was on the UN agenda as well as on the agenda of the nonaligned movement. The issue had been thoroughly internationalized and therefore became more complex.

A. The Independence of Cyprus and the Cyprus Policy of the 27 May Administration

Cyprus went through a preparatory stage from the time the London Treaties were signed up to independent statehood, which occurred on 16 August 1960. After an absence of three years, Makarios returned to the island on 1 March 1959. In his statements, he catered to the sensitivities of both communities. On the one hand, he paid homage to the EOKA martyrs and gave thanks to Grivas. On the other hand, he affirmed that freedom did not consist only of rights and privileges but also involved responsibilities and duties and that it was necessary to cooperate freely and sincerely with the Turkish community. Makarios said that Cyprus would be a bridge uniting opposing camps, rather than an element of discord. It would become a physical and moral bond between North and South and East and West.

In the election held on 13 December 1959, Archbishop Makarios was elected president and Dr. Fazıl Küçük vice-president. Although the provisional government approved the Constitution consisting of 199 articles on 6 April 1960, there were differences with Britain over the size of the British sovereign bases, which delayed the independence of Cyprus.

Once this question had been sorted out, the Republic of Cyprus proclaimed its independence on 16 August 1960. On the same day, the London Treaties, which had been signed by Turkey, Greece, and Britain but had only been adhered to through declarations made by the leaders of the Greek and Turkish communities, were signed once again by the original signatories and this time also by the Republic of Cyprus. The treaties would now become the Nicosia Treaties. The British governor, Hugh Foot, left the island the next day, and Cyprus joined the UN on 24 August.

While these developments were taking place, the military administration of 27 May in Turkey was pursuing a policy of denigrating the policies of the DP, including its foreign policy. While the military leaders were giving assurances to the West by declaring their loyalty to NATO and CENTO, they were also criticizing the DP government for neglecting the nonaligned countries. The Committee of National Unity (the military junta) issued a statement on 28 May 1960, announcing that it stood by the London Treaties. The government program released on 11 July declared that Turkish-Greek relations were expected to develop now that the Cyprus question was solved. The program noted that the London Treaties were about to come into effect, which would allow the Turkish Cypriots to take their rightful place within the structure of the Republic of Cyprus. The program added that the Turkish Cypriots would always be able to rely on the support and affection of the Turkish people and government. Turkey's interest was directed mainly at the Cypriot Turks and Greece rather than at the Republic of Cyprus.

Two days after the Republic of Cyprus came into being on 16 August 1960, retired colonel Emin Dirvana presented his credentials to Makarios as Turkish ambassador. He was one of five foreign ambassadors accredited to Cyprus at that time. The first embassies established by Cyprus were located in Ankara, Athens, Washington, London, and Bonn. The administration of 27 May was taking great care to avoid any disagreement that might convey the impression that it was veering away from its traditional policies with Greece or one of its other allies. In this context, it was acting with particular circumspection vis-à-vis Cyprus. Ambassador Dirvana, who was himself originally from Cyprus, did his best during his tenure, which lasted until 26 September 1962, to maintain good relations. For the sake of good relations, he often found himself in disagreement with the Cypriot Turkish leadership. He never approved the moves for setting up the Turkish Resistance Organization (TMT) that was designed to protect the Turks against a possible Greek attack. He maintained his impartiality with respect to the Turkish-Cypriot opposition, which was seeking to form an alternative party to the Küçük-Denktaş duo.

Despite the policies of the 27 May administration and the conciliatory efforts of Ambassador Dirvana in Cyprus, the nationalist hawks from both the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities had entrenched themselves in key positions in the political structure of the new state. This would prevent the emergence of a collective sense of belonging to Cyprus and frustrate the functioning of the Republic of Cyprus in the manner foreseen in its Constitution.

B. The 1964 Crisis and Its Consequences The Emergence of Disputes in Cyprus and Makarios's Proposal to Amend the Constitution A year after the intercommunal clashes erunted in Cyp

A year after the intercommunal clashes erupted in Cyprus in 1963, they led to a crisis between Turkey and Greece, within NATO, and between the two blocs. To understand how this came about, we must examine the process that led to these clashes in 1963 and their causes.

Immediately after the establishment of the Republic of Cyprus, the first disputes emerged over the collection of taxes, the formation of the armed forces, the participation in public services, and the drawing of the limits of single-community municipalities.

To replace the tax laws taken over from the British administration, it was necessary to obtain majorities in both Communal Chambers. When it proved impossible to obtain a majority in the Turkish Communal Chamber, it was decided to extend the old legislation by three months, up to 31 March 1961. When this term expired, the Turkish Communal Chamber failed to pass the new legislation or to extend the old laws for a second term. To implement the five-year development plan, it was essential to collect taxes in an orderly fashion. This led Makarios to decree that taxes would be collected from all taxpayers according to the old tax laws starting from 1 April. Denktaş claimed that this decree was unconstitutional and called on Turkish-Cypriot taxpayers not to pay their taxes. He also went to the Constitutional Court to have the decree quashed.

The second dispute arose over the formation of the armed forces. The Turkish Cypriots wanted the Turkish-Cypriot units to be constituted as separate formations to be commanded by Turkish-Cypriot officers, while Makarios wanted the armed forces to reflect national unity and consist of units with Greek-Cypriot commanders and Turkish-Cypriot deputies. Fazil Küçük maintained that differences of language, religion, and habits would lead to a breakdown of discipline if mixed units were established and this in turn would lead to social turmoil. On 20 October 1962 he vetoed the bill, based on these arguments.

On the questions of participation in the public service and municipalities, it was the Greek-Cypriot side that displayed intransigence. The Constitution provided that Turks would make up 30% of the public service, with the remaining 70% of posts assigned to Greek Cypriots. Makarios claimed that there were not enough qualified Turks to fill the allocated posts and declared that the constitutional provision could therefore not be implemented. The differences over municipalities were also very deep. In early 1962 Makarios declared that the separate municipalities foreseen for the five main cities imposed a heavy burden on the budget and called for amalgamating these municipalities. On 29 December 1962 the Turkish Communal Chamber voted for maintaining the separate municipalities. While the Greek-Cypriot members of the cabinet decided to disband the separate municipalities, the Turkish-Cypriot municipalities ignored the decision.

Makarios then declared that there was no way to make the state function with the existing Constitution and proposed changes in it. Küçük complained that Makarios was acting unconstitutionally by restricting his veto rights. These differences within the state were strengthening the hands of the hawks within the two communities who advocated enosis or partition. At the same time, acts of terror were adding to the tension. The perpetrators of the terror went undetected, with both sides blaming the other for these outrages. The first sign that it was becoming more difficult to resolve outstanding questions came with the resignation of the Turkish ambassador, Emin Dirvana, who had been ready to fall out with the Turkish-Cypriot leadership for the sake of intercommunal harmony and who said he would not tolerate any act of terrorism.

Makarios was convinced that the Constitution had to be amended. He also felt that the conditions were ripe for imposing his views on Turkey. The government in Ankara was an unstable coalition, there was discontent in the army, and Turkey's foreign policy had been shaken by the Cuban missile crisis. Makarios visited Ankara from 22 to 26 November 1962 to sound out the government but failed to obtain the results he was expecting. When he explained his position to Prime Minister İnönü, he was sharply rebuffed. Turkey would never agree to a unilateral amendment that would alter the relative balance established between the communities by the Cypriot Constitution.

Developments in Cyprus were also frustrating Makarios. The Constitutional Court reached a decision on taxation on 8 February 1963 and a decision on municipalities on 26 April 1963. Neither decision could overcome the deadlock. The court decided that the existing tax law remained valid but that there was no mechanism for collecting taxes in accordance with the law because Turkish members of the House of Representatives had been applying a veto since 1961. With respect to the municipalities, the court ruled that the government's decision to unite all the municipalities was invalid, as was the decision of the Turkish Communal Chamber to maintain the separate municipalities. On 15 July 1963 the president of the Constitutional Court, the German professor Ernest Forsthoff, resigned, citing the pressure applied on the court as his reason.

At this point Makarios decided to carry out his intentions by relying on his country's political clout in the international arena. In a statement made on 5 August 1963, he made allusions to the utopian character of the Cyprus Constitution. He also held talks with Küçük about the constitutional impasse. When he saw that these talks were getting nowhere, on 30 November 1963 he made his proposal to amend thirteen provisions of the Constitution. His main proposals were as follows. (1) The president and vice-president must be stripped of their veto rights, and their election should take place in the House of Representatives by a joint ballot of all members. (2) The separate veto should be abolished in the case of certain taxation laws. (3) Separate municipalities should be abolished. (4) The judiciary should be consolidated with the police, the gendarmerie, and the security forces. (5) The numerical distribution of posts in the administration and army should be in proportion to the population. (6) The numerical distribution of posts in the police force and the army should be determined by law. (7) The Public Services Commission should be able to decide by a simple majority. (8) The Greek-Cypriot Communal Chamber should be abolished.

Makarios's proposals were not simple amendments of the Constitution. They were designed to get rid of the balance established in 1960. If these amendments could be carried through, the balanced partnership established on the basis of equality of the two communities would come to an end and be replaced by a unitary state with guaranteed rights for the minority.

The president's proposals were formally conveyed to Britain, Greece, and Turkey through diplomatic notes. Turkey replied on 6 December and categorically rejected the proposals. In response, Makarios declared that his purpose in sending the notes to the three states was just to inform them of his position and not to ascertain their positive or negative reactions.

The Events of 1964 and the London Conference

The tension between the two communities in Cyprus and between the Republic of Cyprus and Turkey quickly degenerated into intercommunal violence. The Cypriot Turks feared attacks from their neighbors, the Greek Cypriots, while the Greek Cypriots were fearful of a military intervention from Turkey.

The events were triggered by an incident on 21 December 1963, when a Greek-Cypriot policeman on duty in the Turkish quarter of Nicosia attempted to conduct a search in a car with Turkish-Cypriot occupants. The occupants of the car refused to submit to the search, and Turkish Cypriots quickly came to their aid. This led to clashes with the police, who resorted to firearms, resulting in the death of two Turkish Cypriots. A Greek-Cypriot police officer was injured when Turkish Cypriots fought the police with stones and sticks. The violence spread to all parts of the island where the two communities lived in close proximity and lasted until 31 December. Greek-Cypriot youths surrounded all Turkish villages and districts to isolate the inhabitants and prevent them from receiving outside aid. In response, the Turkish military force stationed on the island in accordance with the 1960 treaties took up positions on the Nicosia-Gönyeli line to prevent the Greek Cypriots from overrunning this district. This was the beginning of the green line, which divided Nicosia in two and led to the establishment of two separate de facto administrations in Cyprus. New steps followed in 1964. The Cypriot Turks established their own postal administration, Küçük removed the vice-presidential standard from his car, the Turkish ministers did not attend cabinet meetings, and the Turkish police officers removed the Republic of Cyprus insignia from their uniforms.

To grasp the true significance of the events of 1963, we should examine the Akritas plan, which was revealed in the Cypriot newspaper Patris on 21 April 1966. Akritas was the code name of the minister of the interior, Polikarpos Yorgacis, one of the EOKA leaders. The plan underlined the need to grant the right of self-determination to the Cypriot people and described the methods to be employed at home and abroad to bring this about. According to the plan, it was necessary to create the impression internationally that the Cyprus question had not been solved and had to be examined once again. The plan foresaw the elimination of the constitutional provisions that prevented the state from functioning. Also to be eliminated were the agreements preventing the Cypriot people from deciding their own future. In the event that the Turkish Cypriots resisted these demands, military measures would be taken against them. (This "top secret" plan was revealed in a newspaper because of the feud between Makarios and Grivas. Grivas was convinced that Makarios had abandoned the enosis ideal and was a traitor. Grivas ordered the ultranationalist newspaper Patris under his control to publish the Akritas Plan in order to expose how the archbishop had betrayed the national cause.)

It is open to argument whether the 1963 events were the result of implementing the Akritas plan, as claimed by Turkey and the Cypriot Turks. But it is known that even in December 1963, when the plan still had not come to light, the Turkish-Cypriot leadership suspected that such a plan might exist and saw the violence as a manifestation of it. This would explain how the violence between the communities allowed the hawks to gain influence because of the mutual lack of confidence. As a result, it was not possible to restore calm, and the events led to a full-fledged international crisis.

When violence broke out in Cyprus, Prime Minister Inönü met with the army brass and diplomats to appraise the situation. İnönü ordered a flight of jets to overfly the island as a warning and to launch bombs if the violence did not cease. Military preparations got underway. The fleet was ordered to proceed from İstanbul to Mersin. Units from central Anatolia were redeployed to the Greek frontier. The next day, Turkish jets were flying over Cyprus. In accordance with a decision made at the meeting, Britain and Greece were handed notes, calling on their forces on the island to take action in conjunction with Turkish forces and interpose between the two sides. If this did not stop the violence, Turkey would intervene unilaterally. The message also went to NATO.

Greece proposed a meeting of the foreign ministers of the three guarantor states to consider the issue. Taking into account the gravity of the situation, Turkey proposed that the violence be stopped as a precondition for the meeting. For its part, Britain proposed that the situation be considered at a conference to be held in London, to which Turkey gave its assent.

The London Conference convened on 15 January 1964. Denktas articulated the Turkish side's proposals, which subsequently became Turkey's official position. He declared that the 1960 agreements failed to provide security to the island's Turks and that effective guarantees were needed. In this context, the only solution was the establishment of a federal state consisting of two communities. To achieve this end, the communities must be separated geographically through a transfer of populations.

In a way, this once again placed the thesis of partition on the agenda, but this time in a different guise. Supported by Greece, Glafkos Clerides set forth the Greek-Cypriot thesis, which was a new Constitution for Cyprus that would ensure the interests of the majority and would be easier to implement than the present one.

Turkey, Greece, and the Turkish Cypriots eventually agreed to a NATO force of 10,000 men under the command of a British officer being stationed in Cyprus to restore order and security. But the U.S. undersecretary of state, George Ball, who traveled to the island, was unable to persuade Makarios to agree. The Cypriot president was determined to follow a nonaligned course in his foreign policy. He insisted on a solution that involved a UN force, in the knowledge that the nonaligned countries and the Soviet Union would make their weight felt in the world body.

The Cyprus Question and the UN

When it became clear that a solution within NATO was not feasible and intercommunal violence continued, Britain referred the question to the UN Security Council on 15 February 1964.

Initially the U.S. and Britain introduced a draft resolution, which provided for sending a peacekeeping force to Cyprus. The draft resolution kept in mind that the government of Cyprus consisted of two communities and in each reference to that government clearly stated that it was constituted with the participation of the Turkish-Cypriot and the Greek-Cypriot communities. This was a way of indicating that a government representing only one of the communities could not be regarded as the legitimate government of Cyprus. But it was Turkey's stand that prevented this draft resolution, which reflected Turkish views, from being adopted. Ankara insisted on including in the draft a paragraph condemning the cruelty inflicted on the Turkish community. As a result, Britain and the U.S. withdrew their draft, and the nonpermanent members prepared a new draft.

The new draft was adopted as resolution 186 on 4 March 1964. It provided for the setting up of a UN Peace Force, with the approval of the government of Cyprus, and asked the secretary-general to designate a mediator to help find a peaceful solution.

The dispatching of the UN force was being delayed. Upon Turkey's threat to intervene, the first units of the force (UN Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus, known as UNFICYP) arrived in Cyprus on 14 March. The force was fully deployed by 27 March. Secretary-general U Thant appointed the Indian general G. J. Gyani to command the force, and Sakari Tuomioja (a Finn) became mediator.

The arrival of UNFICYP did not bring violence on the island to an end. Turkey sent notes to London and Washington, reminding them that it was ready to intervene if it became necessary. On 16 March 1964 the TGNA authorized the government to intervene militarily in Cyprus if such action was needed.

U.S. Efforts to Solve the Cyprus Question

Even before UNFICYP arrived on the island, the members of EOKA in Cyprus got in touch with Grivas, who was in Athens at the time, and elected him president of the National Council of Cyprus. Through his efforts, Greek soldiers were being smuggled into Cyprus. In turn, the Turkish Cypriots were taking their countermeasures by reviving the TMT and introducing weapons from Anatolia. At a time when both sides were busy arming themselves, Makarios announced on 4 April 1964 that he was repudiating the Treaty of Alliance. The Turkish government declared that it did not recognize this decision, which it considered to be devoid of a legal basis.

The main reason for Makarios's tough stand was the support he was getting from Georgios Papandreou, whose Center Union Party had won a landslide victory at the election held in February 1964. In April Makarios went to Athens, where he reached an agreement with Papandreou. This agreement went a long way in explaining the policies of the Greek and Cypriot governments in the following months. It contained the following provisions. (1) The search for a solution in Cyprus would be conducted at the UN and not within NATO or through bilateral talks between Turkey and Greece. (2) The ultimate objective would be enosis. (3) All action that might provoke the Turks should be avoided so as not to lose the moral high ground and in order to achieve enosis without violence. (4) In the event of an attack from Turkey, Greece would come to the assistance of the government of Cyprus. In this framework, Greece sent 20,000 soldiers and arms clandestinely to Cyprus.

As the tension in Cyprus escalated, the pressure of Turkish public opinion on the government was also rising. On 16 April 1964 prime minister İsmet İnönü gave an interview to the correspondent of Time magazine in which he warned that the Western alliance might well come apart if the allies did not change their course. He concluded by remarking that "[a] new international order will be established, and Turkey will find its place within this order" (Milliyet, 16 April 1964). This signaled that a Turkish intervention could now be expected. But the army was not prepared for such an operation. Furthermore, İnönü was in favor of a cautious approach in foreign policy. He was fully aware of the existence of disgruntled elements in the army, despite the fact that the two coup attempts of Col. Talat Aydemir had been foiled. In addition, his coalition government had internal problems, and the international situation was not all that propitious.

But İnönü knew that these factors could not be cited as an excuse for inaction. On 4 June 1964 he decided to ignore the opposition of minister of foreign affairs Feridun Cemal Erkin and notified the U.S. of his intentions. He expected that the U.S. would not allow a conflict among allies and would apply the necessary pressure on Greece and Cyprus and solve the problem. He was wrong. The letter that Johnson wrote on 5 June had the effect of a bombshell and led to significant changes not just in Turkey's Cyprus policy but also in its overall foreign policy.

Johnson's letter had two immediate effects. It provided the official pretext for Turkey's decision not to intervene in Cyprus. It also led the Turkish leadership to question the basic assumptions on which Turkey's foreign policy rested. Despite its tough tone, the Johnson-İnönü correspondence did not bring relations between the two allies to an end. On the contrary, İnönü accepted Johnson's invitation, and a new opportunity was found to consider the question in all of its ramifications.

The Washington visits of İnönü and Papandreou: Johnson's ultimate objective was to settle the Cyprus question through a U.S. initiative that would lead to an agreement between Turkey and Greece, as had been the case in 1959. That is why Georgios Papandreou had also been invited to Washington along with İnönü. What Johnson failed to note was that conditions had changed since 1959. With the thaw in the Cold War, the "Soviet threat" was no longer a factor drawing the two countries closer together. In fact, the opposite was true. Moscow was now seen in both countries as a possible counterweight to Western pressure. Unlike the 1950s, when there were strong governments based on comfortable majorities in both countries, political power was now in the hands of unstable governments in both Ankara and Athens. Finally, Cyprus had ceased to be a question concerning just the Ankara-Athens-London trio. Now there was a new factor in the equation: the government of Cyprus represented by Makarios. There was no way to ignore this: it was the principal element determining the course of events. By failing to take the new factor into account, Johnson was unable to achieve the expected result from the visit to Washington by the Turkish and Greek leaders.

The U.S. president wanted to take up Cyprus in a summit of three, but Georgios Papandreou refused to attend a meeting with İnönü. Consequently, Johnson received İnönü alone on 22 June 1964. At the meeting, an effort was made to dispel the negative effects of Johnson's letter on bilateral relations. A joint communiqué was released, which confirmed that the Zurich and London treaties continued to be legally binding. At these talks, Turkey made no mention of federation and got Washington to reject the Papandreou-Makarios thesis that these treaties had lost their validity. Turkey also got Washington to agree to an attempt being made to seek a settlement of the Cyprus question through talks conducted within NATO rather than through the UN.

The Johnson-Papandreou meeting of 24 June 1964 did not go all that smoothly. Papandreou had become prime minister in spite of the U.S. He was against the notion that the Cyprus question was a question between Turkey and Greece and affirmed that he would not accept a search for a solution that excluded Makarios. A U.S. attempt to apply pressure on Papandreou failed to produce results. U.S. secretary of defense Robert McNamara told Papandreou that the Turkish air force was extremely powerful and capable of inflicting untold damage throughout Greece in case of an armed conflict and added that the U.S. would do nothing to stop Turkey in such a situation if Papandreou maintained his intransigence. Papandreou replied: "Mr. Secretary, thank you for providing Turkey with such a powerful air force. But if you will allow me, I shall remind you that Turkey borders on a country with an even more powerful air force. If Turkey attacked, the participation of this air force in the conflict would not remain a mere probability." He was demonstrating that Moscow could now be used as a tool in a possible dispute between NATO members. The joint communiqué released after the Johnson-Papandreou talks reaffirmed the mandate of the mediator and acknowledged the need to find a new form of settlement. Greece claimed that this joint communiqué dispelled the impression conveyed by the Turkish-U.S. joint communiqué that the 1959 London Treaties continued to be valid.

Although the Washington talks produced no settlement, the U.S., which was concerned that Cyprus would undermine the strategic balance in the eastern Mediterranean, got a chance to learn the views of its two allies and to determine the conditions under which the two sides could come together. Armed with this insight, the U.S. initiated preparations for new talks.

The Geneva Talks and the Acheson Plans: the U.S. devised a procedure that would allow negotiations among its allies over the Cyprus question to get underway. Turkey, Greece, and Britain would meet in Geneva. Former secretary of state Dean Acheson would participate in the meeting as mediator. The UN mediator, Tuomioja, would oversee the deliberations. The government of Cyprus was also invited, but Makarios refused to attend the meeting.

The Geneva talks got underway on 9 July 1964. At the insistence of Greece, the Turkish and Greek delegations did not sit around the same table. Acheson was conferring with each delegation separately and then conveying the views of one delegation to the other. Nihat Erim led the Turkish delegation, with Gen. Turgut Sunalp as his military advisor. D. Nicolareisis headed the Greek delegation.

Acheson submitted his plan for a settlement on 14 July. It consisted of the following elements.

- 1. A certain amount of land would be set aside in the Karpas peninsula located in northeastern Cyprus where Turkey would enjoy sovereign rights. This land would be considered an integral part of Turkey. The limits of this territory would be determined through negotiations. Turkey would have the right to station troops there at its discretion, and in emergency situations Cypriot Turks would have free access to this territory as a safe haven.
- 2. The rest of Cyprus would be under the sovereignty of Greece or the Greek Cypriots. In two or three districts of this territory where the Turkish Cypriots were in a majority, they would enjoy full autonomy but would continue to be bound to and responsible to the central authority.
- 3. The Turks living on the island would enjoy the same rights granted in the Treaty of Lausanne to the Muslim minority in Greece. A commissioner to be appointed by the UN or the International Court of Justice would oversee the observance of these rights.
- 4. Greece would cede the island of Megisti (Kastellorizo) to Turkey in order to allow Turkey to defend itself against an attack coming from the Mediterranean.

The Acheson Plan satisfied the demands for both partition and enosis and met Turkey's strategic concerns. The island was brought under NATO's control, and the eastern Mediterranean was made safe for Western interests.

But a number of new developments had been ignored in formulating the plan. President Makarios had been distancing himself from enosis as he began to appreciate the benefits of being a head of state. Gradually, Cyprus was beginning to exert more pressure on Greece than the other way around. It was no longer possible to impose solutions on Makarios against his will, as his domestic and international standing kept steadily growing. Makarios was quick to detect the intent of the Acheson Plan, which was enosis by stealth, and rejected the plan. Thereupon Greece too rejected it.

After a few days, the Geneva talks were resumed on 20 July. Turkey had accepted the Acheson Plan as a basis for negotiation. Greece wanted the negotiations to be based on the 1959 treaties. When it became clear that the Geneva talks would not lead to a settlement, Makarios met with Papandreou in Athens. Greece made a new proposal in early August. An area covering thirty-two square kilometers at Cape El Greco would be leased to Turkey for a period of twenty-five to thirty years for use exclusively as a naval and air base. Although the area was extended to fifty square kilometers and the lease prolonged to fifty years, Turkey rejected the offer because it would result in enosis. The Geneva Conference ended in failure on 31 August.

From Greece's point of view, the Acheson Plan was an important opportunity missed. This was the closest that Greece ever came to achieving enosis. Turkey was ready to go along with the plan. To reject it under the influence of Makarios was a serious blunder for Greek diplomacy.

These events and the Geneva Conference revealed that, even if Greece and Turkey were ready to agree under American prodding, it was no longer possible to find a settlement without the consent of the Republic of Cyprus, which pursued objectives that were quite different from the orientation of either Ankara or Athens. Makarios was determined not to allow his country to come under NATO control.

Turkey's First Intervention

Starting in March 1964, the two Cypriot communities especially the Greek Cypriots, who had the upper hand began to arm themselves and prepare for an eventual outbreak of violence. The breakdown of the first phase of the Geneva Conference increased the tension between the communities. The first clashes occurred in the district of Mansura (Erenköy) on the northern shores of Cyprus, which was under the control of the Turks or more precisely the TMT. The government of Cyprus suspected that the arms being sent to the Cypriot Turks from Anatolia were entering through the port of Erenköy and was seeking to segregate the Turkish Cypriots living in this district from the sea. Greek-Cypriot soldiers commanded by Grivas attempted to gain control of the road linking Erenköy with the port on 6 August. Fighting started when the TMT responded to the Greek-Cypriot attack with fire. The Turkish Cypriots were forced to retreat to Erenköy and were surrounded by government forces. With their lives in danger, the only hope of the Erenköy resistance was a Turkish intervention by air.

After Ankara applied to the UN and to NATO, Turkish planes flew over the island as a warning on 7 August. This warning went unheeded, and the National Guard under Grivas continued its operation and tightened the siege. On 8–9 August Turkish aircraft attacked the unit of the National Guard engaged at Erenköy. The operation was carried out by 64 jets and resulted in 33 dead and 230 wounded Greek-Cypriot fighters. Following this, Greek jets flew over Nicosia to reassure the Greek Cypriots. Makarios announced that he would comply with the Security Council's call for a cease-fire and would lift the siege of Erenköy. Then Turkey also gave a positive reply to the Security Council. The clashes had come to an end but were replaced by the Greek-Cypriot economic embargo on the Turks.

The Soviet Union's Policy vis-à-vis the 1964 Cyprus Crisis

The Soviet Union took a close interest in Cyprus from the day it became an independent state. Cyprus pursued a nonaligned policy in the eastern Mediterranean, kept reiterating that it would not join NATO, maintained good relations with the states of the Eastern Bloc, and allowed the activities of the Communist AKEL party. The existence of such a state in the eastern Mediterranean under the leadership of Makarios was extremely important for the USSR. In the 1964 crisis, the USSR pursued a two-track policy: supporting Makarios and thereby preventing the region from coming under the full control of NATO and developing relations with Greece and Turkey by taking advantage of the fissure in the southeastern flank of NATO.

When fighting broke out between the two communities in 1963, Pravda wrote that the explanation lay in the 1959 London Treaties, which had been imposed on Cyprus by NATO's leaders. According to Pravda, these treaties had created an artificial division between the Cypriot Turks and Greeks and constituted a serious violation of the sovereignty of Cyprus. Pravda's opinion was important, because it reflected the official view. Immediately after this opinion appeared, the Soviet government handed the Turkish government a mildly worded note on 31 December 1963, protesting the flight of Turkish jets over Cyprus.

When the London Conference was convened to discuss what was considered to be an internal NATO issue, Moscow described this as an assault on the sovereignty, independence, and freedom of the Republic of Cyprus and declared that it would not allow this and would continue to support Makarios. When Turkish aircraft bombed Cyprus in August, Moscow declared on 9 August that this was part of the NATO plan and called on Turkey to put an end to its military action in an extremely threatening tone. On the same day, Khrushchev also sent Makarios a message and promised to assist Cyprus in the event of a foreign invasion. Moscow did not confine itself to tough rhetoric and posturing. On 1 October 1964 a military aid treaty was signed between Cyprus and the USSR. According to this treaty, Moscow would supply equipment to modernize the Cypriot army. This treaty did not yield the results that were expected in Cyprus. On the contrary, it had negative effects and a caused a rift between Makarios and Papandreou. Although Papandreou was committed to rendering all possible assistance to Cyprus, he was also a committed anti-Communist and was not prepared to allow the rapprochement with Moscow to lead to practical cooperation on the ground.

Until late 1964 Soviet policy was to support the government of Cyprus and Makarios. The USSR portrayed the Cyprus question as an international issue involving the interests of the imperialists in the Mediterranean. After the visit of the minister of foreign affairs, Erkin, to Moscow from 30 October to 6 November 1964, Moscow started changing its tune. The joint communiqué issued after the talks mentioned the independence and territorial integrity of Cyprus but also contained references to respect for the legitimate rights of the two national communities and recognition of the presence of two communities on the island. Moscow was beginning to reveal its desire to develop its relations with Turkey while deemphasizing its political support for Makarios. In recognizing the existence of two communities, it was also accepting the thesis of a federation.

In effect, after visiting Turkey from 4 to 13 January 1965, member of the Presidium N.V. Podgorny gave a statement to the news agency TASS in which he said that all possible solutions for Cyprus could be discussed, including federation. On 17–22 May 1965 Foreign Minister Gromyko visited Turkey, where he declared that Moscow was opposed to enosis and favored federation. When the next Cypriot crisis came in 1967 during the period of the Fascist junta in power in Greece, Moscow would appear even more distant from its rhetoric and policies of 1964 and decidedly closer to Turkey.

The 1964 Cyprus Crisis and the Nonaligned Countries

The approach of the nonaligned countries to the Cyprus question was shaped by two considerations. With many of these countries having multiethnic and multireligious populations, they felt a natural aversion to the Turkish thesis and its stress on the existence of two distinct communities in Cyprus: If Cyprus was divided as a result of the Turkish thesis finding general acceptance, this could set a dangerous precedent for these multiethnic societies. The second consideration had to do with the policies of Turkey and Cyprus toward the nonaligned countries up to 1964. At the 1955 Bandung Conference, Turkey had declared it was against nonalignment and, adopting the position of representative of the Western Bloc, announced that the policy of nonalignment would serve the interests of Moscow. Although Turkey softened its stand after 1960, it never formulated a coherent policy toward the nonaligned. But, from the very day he was elected archbishop and assumed the leadership of the Greek-Cypriot people, Makarios took his place in the nonaligned movement and applied its principles.

For these reasons, the nonaligned movement naturally supported Makarios throughout the dispute. In the resolutions adopted at the second Nonaligned Conference, there were calls for respecting the territorial integrity of Cyprus, for outsiders to refrain from interfering in its internal affairs, and for accepting the principle that the Cypriot people, as a whole, had the right to self-determination. This amounted to a rejection of the London Treaties of 1959 and Turkey's right of intervention. These resolutions were important, because they determined the way the nonaligned countries would vote when the issue was taken up at the UN. In fact, each time the matter was put to a vote at the General Assembly of the UN, the nonaligned countries supported Cyprus against Turkey.

The attitude of the nonaligned countries during the 1964 Cyprus crisis forced Turkey to appraise its foreign policy critically and revealed the need to engage in economic, financial, and technical cooperation with these countries to a greater degree than countenanced by NATO. Concrete steps were taken in this direction in 1965. Turkey sent goodwill missions to a number of Asian and African countries. But these initiatives failed to erase impressions of the past or produce results in the short term.

The Effect of the Cyprus Crisis on Minorities

The 1964 Cyprus crisis had negative effects on both the Turkish minority in Western Thrace and the Greek minority in Istanbul.

During the crisis, the İnönü government had adopted moderate and conciliatory policies in its international dealings but adopted very tough policies toward citizens of Greek origin living in Turkey.

When the events of Cyprus started occurring, the Turkish public's attention was drawn to the patriarchate, the Greek minority, and Greek nationals resident in Turkey. "Citizen! Speak Turkish!" campaigns and frequent articles in the press about the wealth of the Greek minority helped stir up hostile feelings among the Turkish public toward those of Greek origin.

When it became clear that there would be no physical intervention in Cyprus, the government began to examine the options at its disposal to force Greece to come to terms on the question of Cyprus. The expulsion of the patriarchate was considered but dropped, because it would create a negative international reaction and Greece might even welcome it. Attention then became focused on the Greek nationals residing in Turkey.

In 1964 there were 12,724 Greek citizens living and working in Turkey, of which 2,990 were from Western Thrace. These Greek citizens had come to Turkey under the terms of the Treaty of Residence, Commerce, and Navigation signed on 30 October 1930. Turkey issued a decree unilaterally repealing this treaty on 16 September 1964. According to article 36 of the treaty, the act of repealing would take effect six months after the act. But Turkey decided to put this into effect immediately, based on article 16, which stated that the privileges granted reciprocally by the two countries to one another's exports and imports could be rescinded if defense and general security considerations made it imperative.

Turkey forthwith deported 997 individuals who were deemed to have been engaged in improper activities, without waiting for the six-month grace period. With the termination of the treaty, 7,603 Greek citizens whose residence permits were not extended were compelled to leave the country. Those among them who subsequently applied for a visa were turned down. Turkey allowed 1,134 Greek citizens to remain, due to old age, illness, or other humanitarian reasons.

As a result, 8,600 Greek citizens in all left Turkey. But many of these were married to Turkish citizens of Greek origin. Consequently, many members of the Greek minority in Turkey also left the country for family reasons or in order to get away from the anti-Greek atmosphere reigning in the country as well as the repressive measures in force. This general atmosphere even affected the Greek minority living in the islands of Gökçeada (Imbros) and Bozcaada (Tenedos). Land was expropriated in Gökçeada to construct a correctional facility and establish state farms. As a result of such measures, many of the island's Greek minority also joined the migration to Greece. In 2000 only 1,500 to 2,000 members of the Greek minority had remained in Turkey.

After the Greek citizens departed from Turkey, measures were taken against their property. Decree No. 6/8301 of 2 November 1964, which was not published in the Official Gazette, contained measures to prevent them from disposing of their real estate in Turkey and to freeze the income derived from their real estate. Those who continued to reside in Istanbul were allowed to use a portion of this blocked income that would be sufficient to meet their living expenses. Many Greeks were economically penalized by these measures, which were lifted on 5 February 1988 after the thaw that started in Davos (see "Relations with Greece" in Section 6).

Turkey's measures against Greek citizens did not remain unanswered by Greece. Turkish citizens residing in the Dodecanese Islands were deported. When Turkey allowed 1,134 Greeks to remain on humanitarian grounds, Greece allowed about 500 Turks to remain in Rhodes.

The measures adopted by Turkey in 1964 also had more long-lasting negative effects. With the departure of the bulk of the Greek minority, the balance struck at Lausanne came to an end. After this, Greece had fewer qualms about applying repressive measures to the Turkish Muslim minority in Western Thrace. When the colonels took power in Greece in 1967, they continued the general policy of repression and, especially after the fresh outbreak of violence in Cyprus, expropriated the lands of the minority. They repealed the Papagos Law (recognizing the identity of the Turkish minority in Western Thrace), the gendarmes became more abusive, and Turkish villages came under military siege after each Cyprus crisis.

The unchanging rule of Turkish-Greek relations was that the minorities were made to pay the price when these relations went sour, and this sad sequence was repeated once again in 1964.

The Galo Plaza Report and the Resolution of the UN General Assembly

A "tacit cease-fire" was observed by the two sides in Cyprus after 1964, which helped reduce the tension somewhat. The Turkish Cypriots were still under economic blockade, but there was no fighting. Upon the death of the UN mediator Sakari Severi Tuomioja, Galo Plaza (whose report was to cause a new flare-up) replaced him.

In his report, Galo Plaza declared that the solution in Cyprus should come from the two communities in the island and should not be imposed by outsiders. The events that took place after 1963 made it psychologically and politically impossible to return to the status quo ante. The 1959 London Treaties could no longer be implemented. The solution was to set up a fully independent Cyprus, which would uphold the right to security of all segments of the island's population. According to Galo Plaza, the fully independent state of Cyprus would enjoy the right of self-determination but would commit itself not to unite with any other state.

Greece and the Greek-Cypriot leadership described the report as constructive and positive but questioned the attempt to place limitations on self-determination. The report created deep disappointment in Turkey. The statement that there could be no return to the 1959 London Treaties completely undermined Turkey's Cyprus policies.

After seeing the Galo Plaza report, Turkey understood the likely result of a debate on the question at the UN General Assembly and redoubled its efforts to influence the nonaligned countries. These last-minute efforts could not erase the impressions of the past, however, or alter their positions, which were largely determined by the sociopolitical conditions of these countries. The question was taken up on 16 December 1965, and the General Assembly approved resolution 2077 by forty-seven votes, with five against and fifty-four abstentions. The resolution stipulated that the General Assembly, bearing in mind the resolutions of the Cairo Conference of 10 October 1964 and the Galo Plaza report, acknowledged that the Republic of Cyprus, as an equal member of the UN, had the right to enjoy full sovereignty and independence without any outside interference. It also called on all member states to respect the sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus and refrain from any intervention against it.

With the resolution, the UN General Assembly declared the Republic of Cyprus to be a fully sovereign state and thereby rejected the right of intervention. In a sense, the resolution was denying the validity of the 1959 London Treaties. The resolution was also a full endorsement of the views of Makarios. It was the worst of all the resolutions adopted by the UN as far as Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots were concerned. The only countries, in addition to Turkey, that opposed the resolution were the U.S., Iran, Albania, and Pakistan. The U.S. was concerned about the growing confrontation between its two allies over Cyprus and by siding with Turkey was sending a message to Athens to tone down its intransigence. Iran, Albania, and Pakistan were attached to Turkey by historic ties of friendship and always stood with Turkey on the question of Cyprus.

C. The Thaw between the Demirel Government and the Greek Junta and the 1967 Cyprus Crisis

Important political developments occurred in both Turkey and Greece in 1965. The Justice Party (JP) came to power in Turkey after winning the election. The Greek government headed by Georgios Papandreou, a constant source of aggravation for the U.S. because of its hard line, resigned. This government was replaced by a succession of unstable coalitions. Although for different reasons, both countries depended on U.S. economic and military aid. In order to continue receiving this aid, they needed to get together to resolve a conflict in the southeastern flank of NATO that was causing much concern to the U.S.

To this end, Ankara and Athens conducted secret talks in 1966 and 1967, while pursuing policies designed to reduce tensions in Cyprus. Ankara got the student members of the TMT, who had been armed since 1963, to lay down their arms and return to Turkey to resume their studies. Col. Kemal Coşkun, who had organized the TMT, was recalled. Athens helped by applying pressure on Makarios in 1966 to abandon his deal for the delivery of arms from Czechoslovakia. This deal had produced strong objections from both the U.S. and Turkey.

As a result of these developments, rifts appeared between the hawks led by Denktaş and Ankara as well as between Makarios and Athens. Denktaş objected to Ankara's decisions regarding the TMT and made statements to the effect that this amounted to a sellout of the Turkish Cypriots to the Greek Cypriots. This was a marked deviation from Küçük's policy of subservience to Ankara. Denktaş was seeking to influence Ankara's policies.

The rift between Makarios and Athens became more visible when the junta of colonels came to power in Greece on 21 April 1967. As noted earlier, the rift first became apparent when Makarios started perceiving the advantages of being a head of state. He was convinced that an independent and nonaligned Republic of Cyprus could not pursue the same policies as Athens, which depended on the U.S. and was therefore obliged to implement fully the NATO policies of the U.S. Makarios's first overt move was to ask for the removal of Grivas and the Greek forces under him from the island. He was seeking to reduce any potential Greek pressure in order to be ready to disown any diplomatic decision that Athens might reach without consulting him.

Ignoring the opposition of the hawks in their respective camps, the two countries' prime ministers decided to hold talks over Cyprus. They were motivated by the desire to eliminate the Cyprus question as a source of discord so that they could concentrate on development programs and return to harmonious foreign policies within NATO. The preparations for these talks had been going on since 1966, but the two sides had not yet been able to find common ground. It was clear from the start that the talks would not yield the expected results.

The Demirel-Kollias Talks

The junta of colonels, in power since 21 April 1967, needed a success in foreign policy to gain popular support. The colonels felt that a successful step on the question of Cyprus would bolster their popular support and give satisfaction to the U.S., their main supporter. But the junta gave no sign of having abandoned the goal of enosis. In fact, the government's program talked of achieving enosis in Cyprus by peaceful means, with due regard for minority rights, which meant in agreement with Turkey. This was the aim of the proposed summit. Athens would make certain concessions to Ankara, but these were not revealed until the Demirel-Kollias summit.

Prime ministers Süleyman Demirel and Konstantinos Kollias met at Keşan in Turkey on 9 September and at Alexandroupolis in Greece on 10 September. At the Keşan meeting, Kollias summarized the Greek views and argued that enosis could be achieved without jeopardizing Turkey's strategic requirements. If this could be achieved, the Cypriot Turks would enjoy full equality within the Greek state, and special emphasis would be given to their religious, linguistic, and cultural rights. The way of life of the Turks in Western Thrace could be considered the guarantee of this commitment. After his report, Kollias addressed the following questions to Demirel, based on the assumption that his proposals were acceptable. (1) Would Turkey accept enosis if it was awarded sovereignty over the Dikelia base, where NATO would be allowed to maintain a symbolic presence? (2) What guarantees would Turkey be ready to give that the Dikelia base would not be used against Cyprus?

Demirel was taken by surprise by this unexpected proposal. He replied that Turkey could not negotiate a settlement based on enosis and would therefore not reply to questions on how enosis might be achieved. Demirel declared that a solution had to be found that did not involve enosis and, in response to a Greek query, enumerated Turkey's conditions. (1) Cyprus could not be annexed by either one of the two sides. (2) Treaties could not be changed unilaterally. (3) Neither community could be placed under the sovereignty of the other. (4) The balance struck at Lausanne had to be maintained. When Kollias announced that the Turkish side had agreed to enosis in earlier talks under certain conditions and the Turkish delegation denied this, the talks became deadlocked. One of the junta members, Papadopoulos, instructed Kollias to suspend the talks for a day.

The two prime ministers and their delegations met the next day at Alexandroupolis. At this meeting, Demirel submitted proposals for an alternative solution. (1) Turkey's security requirements must be met. (2) The balance between the two countries as well as the two communities must not be upset. (3) The Turkish community must be given special guarantees. (4) The Turkish community must be able to participate in the administration on an equal footing. (5) Measures must be taken to ensure that the new settlement was not upset once again. (6) The economic future of the Turkish community must be safeguarded (see Tülümen, pp. 117–20, for the Demirel-Kollias talks).

It was now clear that the two sides would not be able to reach an agreement. The joint communiqué released after the talks sought to convey a hopeful message for the future. The two sides had agreed to continue the talks aimed at bringing their views closer. They would also take measures to prevent tension on the island from rising. But all hopes for the future were dashed when an outbreak of violence in November led to a new crisis.

The Cyprus Crisis of 1967: Clashes at Geçitkale and Boğaziçi

The failure of the summit stimulated the hawks on both sides into action. The Makarios administration had denied Rauf Denktaş the right to return to the island after attending the 1964 London Conference, and he was now living in Ankara. When he attempted to enter Cyprus illegally, the Greek-Cypriot police apprehended him on 31 October 1967. This incident escalated quickly into a diplomatic crisis. As his relations with Athens deteriorated, Makarios tried to lessen tensions with the Turkish Cyp riots. Now he was confronted with a dilemma. If he pu Denktaş on trial, he would anger the Turks; if he released him, he would upset the Greeks. A political rather than a legal solution to the dilemma was found through the intercession of Denktaş's friend Glafkos Clerides. Denktaş wrote attorney general Nikos Tornarides a letter in which he requested that he not be prosecuted. In return, Denktaş asked for his deportation to Turkey and gave an undertaking not to attempt another illegal entry into Cyprus. This request was granted, and Denktaş departed from the island twelve days after his arrival. The most significant outcome of this crisis was the surfacing of negative feelings vis-à-vis Turkey among the Turkish Cypriots. For the first time, they were openly criticizing Turkey's policies. The community had been under blockade since 1963 and was perpetually awaiting a Turkish intervention that never seemed to come. The Turkish Cypriots were getting impatient at what they perceived to be Ankara's passive stance. Those who considered Denktaş to be the leader of their cause took this opportunity to organize a demonstration in Nicosia in which they marched on the Turkish Embassy and shouted hostile slogans.

Although the Denktaş incident led to tension between the Turkish Cypriots and Ankara, it also brought about a thawing of relations between the two communities on the island. This angered Grivas, who went into action with the Greek-Cypriot National Guard and captured the villages of Geçitkale and Boğaziçi on 15 November. These villages with Turkish majorities were at highly strategic locations controlling the main road linking Limassol to Nicosia. In two days of clashes, the villages suffered heavy damage. In addition, twenty-two people were killed and nine injured, most of them Turks.

The Turkish cabinet held an emergency meeting that night. In 1964 the TGNA had authorized the government to intervene in Cyprus, and that authorization was still valid. Demirel announced the decision to intervene. At the cabinet meeting, however, it was revealed that the army had no plans for an intervention and did not possess the equipment to transport a force large enough to ensure a successful operation on the island. Once again, the government had no other choice than to solve the question by diplomatic means. The demarches made in Athens produced results, and Kollias ordered the National Guard to evacuate the villages. This order was duly carried out the next day. Turkish jets flew over the island throughout the week. On 17 November Çağlayangil delivered a note to Greece, containing the following demands: (1) removal from the island of Greek soldiers introduced in contravention of the Treaty of Alliance; (2) removal from the island of General Grivas; (3) disbanding of the National Guard; (4) full withdrawal of Greek-Cypriot forces from the districts where the clashes took place; (5) granting the Turkish community the right to establish its own local administration and law enforcement units in their districts; (6) compensating the Cypriot Turks for their losses in the recent events.

In its note of reply, the Greek government declared itself ready to engage in talks to examine the causes of the crisis. The Turkish government retorted that it was not prepared to negotiate with Greece until the threat directed at the Turkish community of Cyprus was removed.

When both sides rejected the measures proposed by NATO, it was announced in Washington on 22 November that President Johnson had appointed Cyrus Vance, his personal representative, as mediator.

After contacts with the three countries, Vance got the parties to agree on the following points.

- 1. Turkey and Greece will confirm that they will continue to honor their commitment to respect the independence and territorial integrity of the Republic of Cyprus.
- Within a period of one and a half months, Turkey and Greece will progressively remove their troops stationed in Cyprus above the amount permitted in the treaties. Greece will do so first, and in the shortest possible time.

- 3. The reinforced UNFICYP will be given a mandate to oversee the removal of these troops.
- 4. When these operations are completed, Turkey will lift its emergency military measures.
- 5. Compensation will be paid for damage done to property in the villages of Boğaziçi and Geçitkale. Payments will also be made to the families of those who died in the recent clashes.
- 6. A committee with the participation of the parties and under the supervision of UNFICYP will take charge of the illegal arms on the island.
- 7. Grivas will not return to the island under any circumstances.
- 8. The "national" forces established on the island by the two communities will be disbanded in stages.

Greece had accepted practically all of Turkey's demands. This was due to U.S. pressure on Greece, because the junta administration in Athens lacked popular support that might allow it to resist Washington's demands. At the same time, there was an increasingly effective anti-U.S. sentiment among the Turkish public. University students had blocked the runway at Ankara's main airport, forcing Cyrus Vance's plane to be diverted to the military base at Mürted. A second reason for Greece's compliance was that Makarios also wanted to be rid of Greek troops as well as Grivas. A third factor was the USSR. Compared to the 1964 crisis, this time the Soviet reaction was much milder. This was because Cyprus would come under the control of the fascist junta if enosis took place and would then really become a NATO base. Furthermore, the USSR now had considerable economic dealings with Turkey. Finally, Greece found itself excluded from Europe because of the colonels' junta. There was no Western nation from which it could seek backing other than the U.S.

The Establishment of the Provisional Turkish Administration of Cyprus (PTAC)

In the aftermath of the 1967 crisis, the Turkish Cypriots took advantage of the favorable circumstances and based their de facto separate existence since 1964 on a legal foundation by proclaiming the establishment of the Provisional Turkish Administration of Cyprus (PTAC) on 28 December 1967. This was the first step toward a federation. Fazil Küçük became the president of the PTAC, and his vice-president was Rauf Denktaş. A list of nineteen principles was proclaimed regarding the administration of the Turkish Cypriots. According to the nineteenth of these, the principles would apply until such time as the 1960 Constitution would begin to be implemented once again in its entirety. In other words, the principles introduced were of a provisional nature. Nevertheless, the legislative, executive, and judicial affairs of the Turkish community had been arranged in a manner that fully corresponded to those of a federated state. On 13 April 1968 Denktas returned to the island and assumed his new post.

Following these developments, the Turkish Cypriots understood that Ankara was not going to intervene militarily. They made the decision to start intercommunal talks in order to gain time and persuade the Greek-Cypriot administration that they were a separate entity. The Greek Cypriots were receptive to this initiative. Makarios's relations with Athens had taken a turn for the worse. If he should succeed in finding a solution to intercommunal problems within the island, he could burnish his international reputation. The intercommunal negotiations got underway on 24 June 1968 and went on, in four stages, until September 1971.

Putting aside technical details, eventually the Greek Cypriots arrived at a point where they agreed to a unitary state consisting of the two communities and their autonomous local administrations. The Turkish Cypriots agreed to make do with political autonomy for their community. Despite the mutual concessions made, one side or the other, and sometimes both, would recoil every time a solution appeared to be within grasp, and a comprehensive solution was never achieved. Both sides appeared to be playing for time.

D. Turkey's Military Operations in Cyprus in 1974 and Their Consequences

To get a full picture of Turkey's intervention in Cyprus in 1974, we must bear in mind the U.S. position vis-à-vis developments in the Middle East after 1967, the Cyprus policy of the colonels' junta in Greece, and Turkey's internal developments.

The Circumstances That Led to the 1974 Operation

The U.S. Position

After the six-day war between Israel and the Arab states in 1967, the Middle East began to be perceived by the U.S. as a region of instability, and the movements of the Sixth Fleet in the region were restricted. Even the visits of the fleet to Turkish ports were causing mass demonstrations and serious crises. Meanwhile Soviet activities in the region after 1967 were on the increase. The Soviet fleet was using Syrian ports, and Egypt, Iraq, and Southern Yemen were following pro-Moscow policies. Muammar Khaddafi had seized power in Libya. From a U.S. perspective, these developments increased the strategic importance of Turkey and Greece. But, because of the dispute over Cyprus, NATO's southeastern flank was being weakened. Furthermore, a Cyprus under Makarios's control was also posing a danger to NATO's regional interests. A solution based on partition, which would result in the elimination of Makarios, appeared to be highly desirable. The U.S. would view favorably a move against Makarios that would not lead to a Turkish-Greek confrontation.

The Cyprus Policy of the Colonels

The colonels had no popular backing. For internal political reasons, they were also on bad terms with King Constantine. After the 1967 crisis, the king tried to take advantage of the junta's failure and on 13 December encouraged the military units in northern Greece, who were loyal to him, to rebel. The rebellion was easily crushed and the king, stripped of his powers, was forced to flee to Rome with his family. With the royalists now joining the opposition, those against the junta had become stronger. Because relations with Europe were already strained, only the U.S. remained to support the junta.

As Greece's standing in the world diminished, the standing of Makarios and Cyprus grew. The first objective of the colonels was to bring about a Cyprus without Makarios, who had earned the sobriquet of "the eastern Mediterranean Castro."

After trying and failing to get rid of Makarios through political means, three assassination attempts were made to eliminate him. In the first attempt, on 8 March 1970, Makarios's helicopter was attacked and shot down, but he survived unhurt. Subsequently, on 28 August 1971, Grivas was smuggled back into Cyprus, where he undertook the formation of an armed organization known as EOKA-B. When Makarios started reinforcing the police force, which was loyal to him, with arms purchased from Czechoslovakia, Athens accelerated the arming of EOKA-B and the National Guard, which was loyal to Grivas.

At the instigation of the junta, the bishops of Kition, Paphos, and Kyrenia declared on 2 March 1972 that under church law a person could not carry out spiritual and temporal duties simultaneously and called on Makarios to resign as president. Subsequently they went further and announced on 8 March 1973 that he had been stripped of his position as archbishop. Makarios turned the tables on the bishops and convened the grand synod, which decided that it was the bishops who had violated church law. The synod found the Cypriot bishops to be guilty of insubordination and heresy and decided to defrock them.

In November 1973 General Ioannides displaced the Papadopoulos administration in a palace coup and took over the government in Athens. The justification for the coup, according to Ioannides, was that the previous administration was ineffective. Ioannides believed that the Cyprus question could be solved by eliminating Makarios and that Turkey would not be against his removal from the scene, Military aid to Grivas was stepped up. Grivas's death on 27 January 1974 did not change the Cyprus plans of Ioannides.

Makarios had the support of all the political parties in Cyprus without specific links to the EOKA-B. Because of his anti-junta stand, he also enjoyed great popularity in Greece. On 2 July 1974 he sent an open letter to the president of Greece, Gen. Phaedon Gizikis. He demanded the immediate disbanding of EOKA-B and the recall of Greek officers in Cyprus. Makarios held the Greek government responsible for undermining the state in Cyprus. He reaffirmed that he wanted to maintain his cooperation with Athens. He reminded Gizikis, however, that he was not a governor appointed by Greece but a leader elected by a large segment of "Hellenism" and called on Athens to fashion its policies to conform to this reality. Athens replied by pressing the button to bring the Aphrodite Plan into operation. The implementation of the plan led to the coup against Makarios on 15 July 1974.

Developments in Turkey Up to 1974 and Their Effect on Cyprus

Turkey had drawn an important lesson from the November 1967 crisis. At the time, it lacked the means to intervene militarily in Cyprus. After this, it undertook serious military preparations to carry out a landing and took measures to overcome its deficiencies in equipment and know-how.

When the military delivered a memorandum to the government on 12 March 1971, Demirel was forced to resign. An interim regime lasting two and a half years followed. As in previous interim-regime periods, this one too resulted in deviations from Turkey's traditional foreign policy. Under the Demirel governments, economic realities and the pressure of anti-American public opinion had forced Ankara to pursue a multidimensional foreign policy. After 12 March there was a return to Western (U.S.)-oriented policies. During this period Turkey was unable to derive political advantage from the feud between Makarios and the colonels' junta. Ankara was unable to reappraise its policies or adopt a tough line toward the colonels, who had Washington's backing.

This interim period was followed by a return to democratic life with the legislative election of 14 October 1973. The government formed by the CHP and the National Salvation Party (MSP) introduced new policies. With his left-of-center policies, Bülent Ecevit adopted the federation thesis in Cyprus. He counted on the support of the public, which was against imperialism and the U.S. Much of the rhetoric of Necmettin Erbakan, the leader of the Islamist MSP, was also anti-West and therefore anti-U.S. When the coup against Makarios took place on 15 July 1974, Prime Minister Ecevit was on his way to Afyon, where he intended to defy American pressure and announce the lifting of the ban on opium poppy cultivation. At the time of the coup in Cyprus, Turkey not only was prepared militarily but also had a government with the political will to intervene.

2. The First Cyprus Operation

The Aphrodite Plan was set in motion on 15 July 1974, when soldiers of the Greek-Cypriot National Guard, under the command of Greek officers, started bombing the presidential palace. Radio broadcasts announced that Makarios was dead and that everything was under control. The formation of a provisional government was also announced. Meanwhile it was emphasized that the move was in no way directed against the Cypriot Turks, in order to calm both the Turkish community and Turkey and soften any possible reaction. But the announcement that the Hellenic Republic of Cyprus had been established and that the head of state would be none other than Nikos Sampson was enough to rouse the Turkish Cypriots and Turkey. Sampson was known to favor enosis. He was a member of EOKA and the publisher of the ultrarightist magazine Mahi (Struggle).

In the course of the coup, Makarios succeeded in fleeing from his palace through a secret passage. He contacted the UN force, managed to reach his hometown of Paphos, made a radio announcement in which he informed Cypriots that he was alive, and called on them to resist the coup-makers. With the help of the UN, he proceeded to one of the British bases and from there flew to New York via Malta and London.

When news of the coup reached Ankara, the National Security Council convened and made the first announcement: "This is a Greek intervention. The constitutional order in the island has been overturned and an illegal military administration established. Turkey considers this to be a violation of the treaties and guarantees" (Sarıca, Teziç, and Eskiyurt, p. 180). The prime minister ordered the Turkish Armed Forces to prepare for a military intervention in Cyprus. The resolution of the TGNA adopted in 1964 authorizing the government to intervene in Cyprus in case of need was still valid.

Meanwhile the European allies, and notably Britain, agreed that the constitutional order in Cyprus had broken down and condemned the Greek government for its action. Only the U.S. seemed to have a different attitude. Washington agreed that the constitutional order had collapsed and the status quo was upset but refrained from condemning the Greek government. Nor did it refuse to recognize the Sampson government. The reaction of the USSR and the Third World was highly critical, with nothing but condemnation for Greece. Turkey's expectations were fulfilled, and international public opinion had turned against Greece and the Sampson government that it supported.

As military preparations and plans were being reviewed on 17 July, Ecevit received Kissinger's message. Washington was proposing talks between Turkey and Greece to forestall war between the two countries. Ecevit replied that Turkey would consult with Britain under the terms of article 4 of the Treaty of Guarantee, that it would not talk with Greece, the other guarantor state, because it was in breach of its treaty commitments, that it would have recourse to all peaceful means to solve the problem, but that, if it failed to find a solution, Turkey would exercise the rights and fulfill the obligations arising from treaties. Immediately thereafter, Ecevit flew to London. When he returned on 19 July, all military preparations had been completed. The undersecretary of the U.S. State Department, Joseph Sisco, had been unable to convince the Greek government of the Turkish government's determination to act. When Sisco came to Ankara and was conferring with Ecevit, Turkey's landing force had already left Mersin on its way to Cyprus.

On Saturday, 20 July 1974, Ecevit announced to the world that Turkey had landed troops on Cyprus. The prime minister declared that Turkish soldiers were going to Cyprus not to wage war but to restore peace not just to the Turkish Cypriots but also to the Greek Cypriots.

The most serious losses suffered by Turkey during the two-day operation occurred when the Turkish Air Force mistook the Turkish destroyer Kocatepe for a Greek warship due to a breakdown in communications and sank it. Despite this setback, the first part of the operation was successful from a military point of view. Troops had been landed on the northern beaches and dropped from the air without serious losses, Greek counterattacks had been repulsed, and the Kyrenia-Gönyeli-Nicosia triangle had been occupied. When a cease-fire was declared on 22 July, however, the situation on the ground did not appear all that favorable. The Turkish army held only 7% of the island; and because of their dispersed condition, 65% of the Turkish Cypriots remained in areas under Greek control and in danger of being massacred by EOKA-B. Furthermore, approximately forty thousand soldiers were crammed in an area of 348 square kilometers with little room for maneuver in case of an attack.

As soon as Turkey landed its troops in Cyprus, the Security Council met on 20 July and adopted resolution 353. After calling for a cease-fire, the resolution also called for an immediate end to foreign interference in the Republic of Cyprus, demanded the immediate removal from the island of all foreign military personnel not allowed by international treaties, and asked Turkey, Greece, and Britain to enter into negotiations without delay for the purpose of bringing peace to the region and restoring the constitutional government in Cyprus.

Having remained passive in the face of the anti-Makarios coup engineered by the Greek junta, the U.S. refrained from reacting forcefully against the Turkish intervention. Kissinger, the architect of U.S. foreign policy, believed that a peaceful settlement of historic disputes could only be achieved after an armed conflict and considered Arab-Israeli relations to be a vindication of his belief. Furthermore, the U.S. government was engrossed with domestic politics at the time because of the Watergate scandal. The point that Washington kept stressing was that it would not permit developments to lead to a Turkish-Greek armed conflict.

At this point, Athens was in complete disarray. Sisco was unable to find a responsible person to talk to. Finally, Admiral Dimitris Arapakis informed Sisco on 22 July that they would accept a cease-fire. The next day, the Greek commanders held a meeting and made the decision to hand the government over to a civilian, despite the strong opposition of Ioannides. On the same day, Konstantinos Karamanlis, who had been living in voluntary exile in Paris for eleven years, returned to Athens and took over the reins of government. Turkey's intervention had given Greece the chance to return to democracy. Greece was now ready for negotiations. The junta's fall from power also affected Cyprus: on 25 July Clerides replaced Sampson as head of state.

Turkey's acceptance of the UN's call for a cease-fire and refraining from extending the military operation were the subject of extended public debate in Turkey. In particular the MSP wing of the government started making extremist statements designed to inflame public opinion and use the Cyprus intervention to gain political advantage. Actually, the military situation on the ground was not all that favorable. Given the possibility of an armed conflict with Greece, the army had been compelled to disperse its forces. The force that landed in Cyprus had not been able to advance much and was concentrated within a limited perimeter. There was heavy international pressure for a cease-fire. Turkey considered the return of Karamanlis to be a favorable development and felt that it could extend the area under its control through political and diplomatic means, so it agreed to the cease-fire on 22 July and declared that it would participate in the Geneva Conference.

3. The Geneva Conference and the Geneva Protocol

The first Geneva Conference was held from 25 to 30 July 1974. It was attended by the foreign ministers of Turkey, Greece, and Britain: Turan Güneş, Georgios Mavros, and James Callaghan. The U.S., the Soviet Union, and the UN followed the proceedings with their observers.

Turkey made these proposals at the meeting. (1) A formal decision should be made regarding a cease-fire and a new setup in Cyprus. (2) A binding decision to achieve a federation was needed. (3) The security of the Cypriot Turks should be ensured by a police force consisting of Cypriot Turks. (4) No text should refer to a date for the withdrawal of Turkish forces. (5) The width of the buffer zone around the Turkish forces should be fixed at ten kilometers, and no UN forces should be stationed on its perimeter. (6) Denktaş should immediately resume his duties as vice-president. (7) A broader Cyprus conference should be convened within a week, with the participation of the Cypriot communities.

Greece made the following proposals at the conference. (1) The only subject to be discussed would be the implementation of the UN's cease-fire resolution. (2) All Turkish forces would be withdrawn from the island immediately. (3) Constitutional issues and the new setup in Cyprus would not be discussed; nor would there be any reference to the conference that would follow in a week's time.

The conference lasted five days, with the UN acting as secretariat. The Turkish delegation was anxious to keep the UN involvement at a minimum level and thus was opposed to the holding of records. The proceedings were taking place under difficult conditions. The Greek delegation was concerned about the way Turkish forces kept expanding the area under their control, while the Turkish delegation worried about the continuing danger of attacks on Turkish enclaves in areas under Greek control. The Turkish delegation drew its strength from the knowledge that its intervention in Cyprus was right and legitimate and also from the Turkish military presence on the island. The Greek delegation was in a much weaker position, because it represented a government that had just come to power and still lived in fear of a new military coup. With the mediation of Britain, the Turkish delegation was able to include almost all of its proposals in the protocol that was adopted on 30 July 1974.

The Geneva Protocol, signed by Turkey, Greece, and Britain, cannot be described as just a cease-fire agreement. The protocol also laid the foundation for the new status of Cyprus. The Geneva Protocol consisted of six articles, which were related to three topics: (1) the present status; (2) urgent measures; and (3) the future status of Cyprus.

Article 1 of the protocol stated that "taking into consideration the international agreements signed in Nicosia on 16 August 1960 and United Nations Security Council Resolution 353, the Ministers accepted the importance of the urgent and sustainable implementation of measures that will rearrange the situation in Cyprus within an appropriate period of time. However, the Ministers agreed that certain urgent measures needed to be taken immediately." This article confirmed that the status of Cyprus and the 1960 treaties were still in effect and acknowledged the legitimacy of Turkey's intervention in Cyprus on the basis of the rights conferred by the treaties.

Articles 2 and 3 related to urgent measures that had to be taken in Cyprus. Article 2 declared: "The three Ministers stated that the armed forces that were in the island to stabilize the situation should not expand the regions under their control in the Republic of Cyprus at 22:00 (Geneva) hours on 30 July 1974. The Ministers called on all forces, including irregulars, to refrain from attacks and all other hostile action." What is noteworthy about this article is that it specified that the regions not to be expanded were not the regions controlled at the time the cease-fire was declared on 22 July 1974 but those controlled on 30 July 1974. In other words, the regions brought under Turkish control between 22 and 30 July would remain under Turkish control. Therefore the forces in this region and the Turkish population living there could be supplied without hindrance. Furthermore, under article 3, the ministers agreed on measures that should go into effect immediately:

(1) A security zone, the width of which is to be determined by the representatives of Turkey, Greece, and the United Kingdom, shall be established in agreement with the United Nations Peace Force (UNFICYP). The zone shall start from the region controlled by Turkish Armed Forces at the hour and date stated in the foregoing article 2. No forces shall be allowed into the current region between the two forces until the extent and makeup of the security zone is determined. (2) All Turkish-Cypriot regions invaded by Greek or Greek-Cypriot forces shall be evacuated immediately. The United Nations Peace Force will continue to protect these regions, and the regions shall revert to the previous security arrangements. Other Turkish regions that are not controlled by the Turkish armed forces shall continue to be protected by the United Nations Peace Force, and they shall maintain their own police and security forces as previously. (3) The United Nations Peace Force shall carry out security missions in mixed villages. (4) The military personnel and civilians arrested during the latest hostilities shall be swapped as soon as possible or released under the supervision of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Articles 4 and 5 contained provisions regarding the future status of Cyprus. Article 4 regulated the withdrawal of foreign troops: "The three Ministers of Foreign Affairs... agreed on measures to phase out security forces, weapons, ammunition, and other combat equipment in the Republic of Cyprus as part of the plan to restore peace, security, and mutual confidence in the Republic of Cyprus within the framework of a fair and lasting solution acceptable to all relevant parties." This meant that the withdrawal of Turkish troops was conditional on a fair and lasting solution and required the establishment of peace, security, and mutual confidence. Furthermore, the withdrawal would be in stages. Article 5 contained provisions regarding the future status of the Cypriot state:

The three Ministers of Foreign Affairs agreed to continue talks as soon as possible in order to achieve the following: (a) Restoration of peace in the region; (b) Reestablishment of the constitutional government in Cyprus. They decided to continue their talks in Geneva on 8 August 1974. At the same time, the ministers agreed that the representatives of the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities would participate in the negotiations on the Constitution at an early stage. The constitutional problems to be negotiated will include the immediate restoration of the constitutional legitimacy with the Vice-President assuming the duties assigned to him by the 1960 Constitution. The ministers noted that there were actually two autonomous administrations, Turkish and Greek Cypriot administrations, in the Republic of Cyprus. The ministers agreed to review the problems arising from the existence of these two administrations in future meetings.

This text confirmed that there were two autonomous administrations in the Republic of Cyprus. The guarantor states were confirming in an international document that the Turkish-Cypriot administration was autonomous. Article 6 called for sending the protocol to the UN secretary-general with a request that he take the necessary measures in the light of the protocol.

The Geneva Protocol adopted at the first Geneva Conference can be regarded as a brilliant success for Turkish diplomacy. Turkey had been able to obtain the confirmation of the lawfulness and legitimacy of its military intervention in Cyprus, the approval of the conditions for withdrawing its troops, the reaffirmation of the existence of two communities as the constitutional basis of Cyprus, and the acceptance of the autonomous character of the Turkish-Cypriot community.

Nevertheless, in retrospect it was a mistake not to include a provision in the protocol to the effect that the government of Cyprus would be represented by the leaders of the Turkish and Greek Cypriot communities, Denktaş and Clerides, until the final settlement was reached. Turkey was in a very strong position at Geneva; if it had succeeded in inserting such a provision in the protocol, it could have minimized the difficulties created by the Security Council's resolution 186 of 4 March 1964, which acknowledged the Greek-Cypriot administration as the legitimate government of the island.

The second Geneva Conference was supposed to meet in order to discuss mainly the issues related to the constitutional status of Cyprus. Before going to the conference, Turkey finalized its preparations to press its case for a federation. In Turkey's formula, there would be a central government of limited power, with most responsibilities left to the two federated states. Before the Turkish delegation left for Geneva, Prime Minister Ecevit told the head of the delegation, Foreign Minister Güneş, that a second operation might become necessary if a satisfactory solution could not be obtained. As a matter of fact, the military leaders were pressing him for a second operation, because they feared it would be difficult for the Turkish forces, concentrated in a narrow strip of land, to withstand a resolute attack.

At the second Geneva Conference on 12 August, Rauf Denktas, as leader of the Turkish-Cypriot community, announced the Turkish plan: there would be a federal form of government based on geography in Cyprus. When determining the responsibilities of the central government, it should be kept in mind that the Cypriot state consisted of two nations. The Turkish Federated State would extend over 34% of the island's surface and be located north of a line running from Lefka in the west all the way to the port of Famagusta in the east. The Turkish quarters of Nicosia and Famagusta would remain within the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus.

Foreign Minister Güneş told his British counterpart Callaghan on the evening of 12 August that, although Turkey favored a geographically based federation, it did not insist on a federal state with two regions. His new proposal could be described as a solution based on cantons.

For Clerides, the aim of the conference was not a fundamental alteration of the existing status. It would be enough to revise the constitutional setup in a way that would inspire mutual trust in the two communities. On this basis, the Greek and Turkish villages and municipalities would be listed separately and all responsibilities and duties would be undertaken by their respective Greek and Turkish communal administrations. According to Clerides, the communal administration in mixed villages would be in the hands of whichever community happened to be in a majority.

It was clear that it would be difficult to reconcile these two proposals. To overcome the difficulty, Callaghan announced the "cantonal solution" that had been conveyed to him by Güneş the previous evening. According to this proposal, there would be an autonomous Turkish region consisting of six cantons within the Republic of Cyprus: one main canton plus five others located at Lefka, Poli, Paphos, Larnaca, and Rizokarpaso, with a total area of 34% of the island's territory. These cantons would be administered by the Turkish administration, and the Greek and Greek-Cypriot armed forces and police would withdraw from the main canton of the autonomous Turkish-Cypriot region within forty-eight hours of the signing of the declaration.

Mavros and Clerides requested a period of thirty-six hours to consult their capitals, but Güneş refused to agree to this request. He claimed that the representatives had full powers and were requesting this period as a delaying tactic. When Güneş received a coded message from Ecevit that the second operation was about to be launched, the conference broke up at 2:20 AM on 14 August without achieving any results.

4. The Second Cyprus Operation

Turkey launched its second operation at 4:19 AM on 14 August. By 16 August the Turkish Armed Forces had reached their objective, which had been code-named the Attila Line. The line had been drawn between Famagusta and Lefka. Once it had been reached, a cease-fire was announced and the operation ended.

The second Cyprus operation was carried out more purposefully and quickly attained its military objectives. This time, however, the international reaction to the operation was very negative. First, whereas the first operation was considered a legitimate and justified reaction to the Greek junta's coup to overthrow Makarios and achieve enosis, the second operation was seen as an occupation. Now that the Karamanlis government had been installed in Greece and democracy had been restored, the prevailing view was that the new government should be supported rather than pushed into a corner. Second, Turkey had carried out the operation while negotiations were in progress. Finally, with the de facto division of the island in two, the Republic of Cyprus, as established in 1960 and a member of the UN, had been deprived of its very foundations.

For these reasons, those opposed to the second operation saw the presence of the Turkish army in Cyprus as an "occupation." They argued that the Turkish army had landed on the island in compliance with article 4 of the Treaty of Guarantee. The article grants the guarantor powers the right to intervene to restore the constitutional order. But Turkey had continued its intervention even after the reason for intervention had ceased to exist and, instead of restoring the constitutional order, had established its own order.

Turkey responded to these legal objections with the following argument. With the Geneva Protocol of 30 July 1974, the parties had accepted the existence of two communities and two autonomous administrations. Consequently, the de facto situation created by Turkey could not be considered a unilateral act.

The international reaction came with the UN General Assembly's Resolution 3212 of 1 November 1974. This resolution called on all states to respect the sovereignty, independence, territorial integrity, and nonalignment of the Republic of Cyprus and to refrain from actions and interference directed against this state. There was a call for all foreign military forces to be withdrawn and all military intervention to end. All refugees were to return to their homes in safety, and all interested parties were requested to take urgent measures to make this possible. Finally, there was a paragraph stating that the constitutional system of the Republic of Cyprus was a matter that concerned the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities and called upon these communities to undertake negotiations under the aegis of the UN secretary-general and on a footing of equality in order to be free to reach an acceptable political settlement that would be based on their fundamental and legitimate rights.

Ankara accepted this resolution with certain reservations. It could not agree with the provisions calling for the immediate withdrawal of foreign troops and the return of refugees to their homes. Nevertheless, the resolution did not mention the government of Cyprus. It was also acknowledged that the Greek and Turkish communities had equal rights on the island. These were positive elements for Turkey and Turkish Cypriots.

Turkey's intervention in Cyprus in 1974 was a turning point in Turkish foreign policy, in Turkish-Greek relations, and in the question of Cyprus itself. Aside from Korea, this was the first time that the Turkish Republic engaged its troops beyond its frontiers. Soon it started getting negative reactions from its Western allies. Its relations with both the U.S. and the European countries came to be increasingly affected by the question of Cyprus. Cyprus took its place at the center of Turkish-Greek relations. Although the central issue between the two states from the viewpoint of their national interests was the question of how the Aegean Sea would be shared, after the 1974 operation Greece put forward Cyprus as the obstacle preventing the negotiation of the Aegean questions. Furthermore, Greece accelerated the militarization of the Aegean islands on the pretext that it was threatened from the east, while Turkey established the 4th Army with headquarters in İzmir, claiming that it was threatened from the west.

The 1974 operation was also the beginning of a new phase in the question of Cyprus. The de facto partition of the island meant that the question was settled from Turkey's perspective. But because there was no legal settlement, the subject of Cyprus continued to remain on the international agenda even as the world entered the new century. Nevertheless, the question had acquired a new character after 1974. Now the search was for a solution based not on the 1960 treaties but on the new de facto situation that emerged in 1974.

III. THE PERIOD WHEN THE AEGEAN QUESTION CAME TO THE FOREFRONT (1975–1980)

Cyprus had been at the center of Turkish-Greek relations since the 1950s. In the second half of the 1970s Cyprus was displaced by the questions relating to the Aegean. The main reason for this was that in both Turkey and Greece internal developments after 1974 had a direct influence on their respective foreign policies.

Following the 1974 Cyprus operation, Ecevit's disagreements with his coalition partner Erbakan grew worse. Assuming that his Cyprus success would enable him to obtain an absolute majority in parliament and thus form a government without a coalition partner, Ecevit resigned on 16 September. This initiated a long period of political instability in Turkey. His resignation did not lead to early elections. Instead the Sadi Irmak, Nationalist Front, Ecevit, and Demirel governments followed.

At a time when everyone's attention was focused on domestic politics, Turkey was confronted with serious foreign policy issues. The U.S. had started implementing an arms embargo because of Cyprus. The USSR was concerned about Cyprus coming under NATO control, so it started applying serious pressure after the second operation to secure a return to the status quo ante in Cyprus. In applying this pressure, Moscow also had the backing of the nonaligned movement. As Greece's relations with the European countries steadily improved, these countries started raising the question of Cyprus in Turkey's negotiations to secure credit. At a time when Turkish governments were preoccupied with internal politics, they were unable to address critical foreign policy issues. In Greece, the Karamanlis government took maximum advantage of Turkey's domestic problems and its external isolation and brought the Aegean questions to the forefront.

The most significant effect in Greece of the 1974 Cyprus operation was that it allowed the restoration of democracy. Faced with a crisis of its own making, the junta came apart and left the scene to Karamanlis. After assuming the office of prime minister, Karamanlis considered declaring war on Turkey after the second operation but gave up the idea because of the poor state of preparation of the Greek army. Instead he withdrew from the military structure of NATO on 15 August to protest the U.S. failure to stop Turkey.

After this, Karamanlis undertook a revision of the Greek foreign policy to set apart the hitherto (since 1945) parallel tracks of the two countries in a way that would favor Greece. The foreign policy line of the New Democracy Party, which remained in power until 1981, can be summarized with the slogan "Greece belongs to the West." This meant not so much the U.S. but rather the EEC. In setting Greece's course toward full membership of the EEC, Karamanlis was seeking to prevent an attack from Turkey, while protecting the regime from another coup. Realizing that dangerous disputes with Turkey might obstruct full membership, he lowered tension with Ankara, held the door open to a dialogue, and kept reiterating that Greece was ready to go to international adjudication on the Aegean issue.

While keeping tension with Turkey from turning into a crisis in order to permit relations with Europe to develop, Karamanlis took advantage of the political vacuum in Ankara and the U.S. arms embargo in his dealings with Turkey. The strategy of his relations with Turkey rested on the Aegean. His goal was to maintain the status quo, which was favorable to Greece and which Turkey was anxious to change. Ankara understood that the status quo would not be changed through talks, so it set out on the course of pressuring Greece by provoking a crisis. Karamanlis sought to maintain the status quo by preventing Ankara from precipitating a crisis.

What Karamanlis sought to change was the military balance, which favored Turkey in the Aegean. As long the U.S. embargo lasted, Turkey would be prevented from making a move in the Aegean, while the Greek army could be built up. Karamanlis was keen to see the embargo maintained in order to neutralize Turkey's air superiority in the Aegean. He also pressed for the 7:10 ratio in U.S. military assistance and saw it adopted by the U.S. Because there was no stable government in Turkey that could accurately analyze and take adequate measures to counter Karamanlis's consistent and successful policies, Turkish policies tended to follow an erratic course from time to time.

A. Questions Relating to the Sea Areas in the Aegean

In the 1970s Turkey and Greece were involved in a dispute over the sharing of the sea in the Aegean. This involved both territorial waters and the continental shelf.

1. The Question of Territorial Waters

At the signing of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne, the breadth of the territorial waters in the Aegean Sea was set by Turkey and Greece at three miles. In the atmosphere of friendship prevailing in the 1930s, Turkey did not oppose the unilateral announcement by Greece in 1936 that it was extending its territorial waters to six miles. On 15 May 1964, at a time when relations between the two countries were tense due to events in Cyprus, Turkey enacted Law No. 476, which declared that in principle its territorial waters would be extended to six miles. A provision in article 2 of this law declared that the principle of reciprocity would apply in the case of countries that set a higher limit.

Map 5-1. Territorial Waters in the Aegean (Six- and Twelve-Mile Limits)

When the question of territorial waters and the question of the continental shelf became acute between the two countries in the 1970s and at a time when the tendency in international law was to extend territorial waters to twelve miles, Turkey delivered a note to Greece on 27 February 1974 that contained the following elements: The general rules did not apply in enclosed or semiclosed seas like the Aegean; when a state was determining the extent of its territorial waters, it could not and must not block a neighbor's access to the high seas.

Law No. 2674 enacted in 1982 specified that in principle Turkey's territorial waters extended six miles from the shoreline. This general rule of six miles could be extended further by the Council of Ministers in specific seas, however, bearing in mind all the characteristics and circumstances of that sea and provided it was equitable. Consequently, Turkey's territorial waters in the Black Sea and the Mediterranean were fixed at twelve miles, but Law No. 2674 led to no change in the Aegean Sea.

After 1982 Greek leaders made frequent statements claiming the right to extend their territorial waters in the Aegean to twelve miles. Such statements met with sharp responses from Turkey, which declared that this would be a violation of international law and that it would not be recognized and would be considered a casus belli. Although Greece continued to maintain from time to time that it had a right to extend its territorial waters to twelve miles, it did not put this claim into practice (Box 5-10).

2. The Question of the Continental Shelf

In 1959 Greece granted petroleum exploration rights in areas of the Aegean continental shelf that it claimed belonged to Greece and published the law to this effect in its Official Gazette. When it was announced that there was a strong indication that oil would be found around the northern Aegean island of Thasos, Turkey took action and granted exploration rights to the Turkish Petroleum Company (TPAO) in the continental shelf of the Aegean on 18 October 1973. The area covered in the Turkish concession included the zones lying off the Anatolian coast and outside of the territorial waters of the islands of Samothraki, Lemnos, Agios Efstratios, Lesbos, Khios, Psara, and Antipsara. These areas provided no continental shelf to these islands, with some of the areas located to the west of the islands. This led to a Greek protest on 7 February 1974. On 27 February 1974 Turkey rejected the protest, on the grounds that the concession areas were located on the natural prolongation of Turkey, and called for negotiations on the question of the continental shelf. On 25 May Greece replied that it was prepared to hold negotiations in conformity with international law as codified in the 1958 Geneva Law of the Sea Convention.

Turkey greeted the Greek reply as a positive step, while also sending the seismic research vessel Çandarlı to the Aegean. On 29 May 1974 the Çandarlı, escorted by Turkish warships, sailed into the concession area in the Aegean and conducted seismic explorations over six days. During this period Athens and Ankara exchanged notes, protesting the Turkish action and rejecting the Greek protest. On 18 July Turkey granted new concessions for oil exploration in the continental shelf claimed by Greece. Meanwhile developments in Cyprus temporarily pushed the Aegean tensions into the background.

Box 5-10. The Turkish and Greek Theses on the Issue of Territorial Waters

The Greek Position

- 1. The width of twelve miles for territorial waters is confirmed by article 3 of the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS). It has been put into practice by the signatory states and has become an accepted norm in general international practice. As a signatory of UNCLOS, Greece has the right to extend its territorial waters to twelve miles.
- 2. The Greek islands and the Greek mainland constitute a territorial whole. Since the Islands are an Integral part of Greek territory, there are no grounds for applying an exceptional rule for them. Consequently, the twelve-mile rule also applies to the Islands.
- The determination of the width of the territorial waters is an attribute of sovereignty and cannot be restricted.

The Turkish Position

- 1. There cannot be a single rule with universal applicability for the width of the territorial waters. The twelve-mile measure contained in UNCLOS constitutes a maximum limit and cannot be applied automatically to all situations. Furthermore, as stipulated in article 300 of the convention, this right cannot be abused. Finally, the twelve-mile rule cannot be binding on Turkey, because Turkey opposed it during the negotiation of this issue at the Third Law of the Sea Conference.
- 2. In determining the width of the territorial waters, the special geographic features of the sea must be taken into account. At present, Greece and Turkey apply the six-mile rule to their territorial waters in the Aegean. Of the roughly 3,000 islands possessed by Greece, 2,383 are located in the Aegean. In these circumstances, 35% of the Aegean Sea consists of Greek territorial waters, 8.8% of Turkish territorial waters, with the remaining 56.2% being the high seas.
- If the twelve-mile rule applied in the Aegean Sea, Greek territorial waters would cover 63.9% of the Aegean, while Turkish territorial waters would rise to just 10%, and the high seas would be reduced to 26.1% of the sea's surface. In these circumstances a ship sailing from Istanbul to Izmir would have to sail in Greek territorial waters. Nor could Turkish ships leave Turkish ports to reach the high seas without sailing through Greek territorial waters. In these circumstances, Greece would have brought under its sovereignty, a substantial part of the Aegean's seabed and its subsoil.

(M. Firat) (Source: Wilson; Pazarci)

After the resignation of Ecevit, the Sadi Irmak government that followed did not enjoy much popular support. At a time when Turkey was facing strong international disapproval because of the second Cyprus operation, Greece was under the leadership of Karamanlis, who enjoyed both domestic and international backing. It was in these circumstances that Ecevit declared on 12 January 1975 that the government was neglecting the Aegean. The question of the continental shelf became a burning issue once again. The next day, Irmak announced that the seismic exploration ship Longva, chartered from Norway by the CHP-MSP coalition government, would conduct explorations in the Aegean both in the Bay of Saros and off the coast of İzmir. He added that Turkey would defend its interests if there was any interference.

Upon this announcement, Athens arranged through a partner in the Norwegian company who was a Greek national to have the ship return to the port of Mersin. At the same time, on 28 January, Karamanlis proposed that the two countries apply to the International Court of Justice to arrive at a settlement of the question.

Irmak consulted party leaders on this proposal. Ecevit expressed the opinion that it would be necessary to hold bilateral talks before going to international adjudication. But Irmak gave a speech in which he asserted that, "since our position is just, we have no reason to fear going to the international tribunal" (Keesing's Contemporary Archives, 10–16 March 1975, p. 27011). The U.S. wanted to see a Turkish-Greek rapprochement in the Aegean, and this was having an effect on the Turkish government's stand on the issue.

As on previous occasions of political instability in the country, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs adopted a cautious approach and tried to prevent hasty steps from being taken in preparing Turkey's official response. On 6 February the ministry informed the Greek side that the Greek initiative was approved in principle, but it was necessary to have preliminary talks at ministerial level on matters of procedule. When the Irmak government failed to obtain a vote of confidence, it was replaced by the right-leaning Nationalist Front-1 government, consisting of the Justice Party, the National Salvation Party, the Republican Reliance Party, and the Nationalist Action Party. Both Prime Minister Demirel and the minister of foreign affairs, İhsan Sabri Çağlayangil, continued the foreign ministry's line, returning to Turkey's traditional policy, and declared that Ankara sought a political and not a legal solution. Meanwhile the dialogue with Greece went on.

On 19 May 1975 the two foreign ministers, Dimitrios Bitsios and Çağlayangil, met in Rome. At the meeting, the Greek side sought the preparation of a compromise to refer the question of the continental shelf to the International Court of Justice, while the Turkish side maintained that the talks had priority and there was no question of preparing a compromise. The matter was referred to the Karamanlis-Demirel summit due to take place soon.

Demirel and Karamanlis met on 31 May 1975 on the occasion of the NATO summit held in Brussels. The American arms embargo imposed on Turkey was in effect, and the U.S. was pressing Ankara to make a conciliatory move. In the joint communiqué issued following the Demirel-Karamanlis talks, the following sentences were inserted despite the efforts of Turkish diplomats to prevent it: "The Prime Ministers had occasion to review outstanding questions between their two countries. They agreed to settle these questions by peaceful negotiations and to refer the question of the Aegean continental shelf to the International Court of Justice" (Milletlerarass Münasebetler Türk Yıllığı, p. 126).

When accusations started being hurled in Turkey, however, Ankara backtracked and delivered a note to Athens on 30 September, stating that the Aegean continental shelf should be solved primarily through bilateral talks and that the International Court of Justice should be resorted to only in case of need. In its reply of 2 October, Athens accused Turkey of reneging on the agreement made by the two prime ministers earlier in Brussels.

Greece's Application to the UN Security Council and the International Court of Justice

Whenever the Turkish and Greek governments took a decision to engage in a dialogue, internal politics forced them to take extreme positions in the talks. Despite the fact that in 1975 Greece remilitarized the Aegean Islands and Turkey established the 4th Army in İzmir, Karamanlis delivered a speech in the Greek parliament on 17 April 1976 in which he made an offer to Turkey to abandon the arms race, sign a nonaggression pact, and settle all questions in a peaceful manner, which, as members of the NATO alliance, they were already supposed to be doing. Demirel responded to this offer by calling for talks to be undertaken at a technical level. He also proposed a meeting of foreign ministers. Just as a dialogue was about to start, Ecevit resorted to the same old game and accused the government of allowing Greece to tilt the balance in the Aegean against Turkey. Demirel could not afford to appear to be the politician who forfeited the gains achieved by Ecevit, so he announced that the Hora (which would later be renamed Sismik I) was being made ready to sail into the Aegean. Although this claim was made repeatedly, the ship remained tied up at the Maritime Bank's shipyard and lacked the technical equipment to set sail.

The Hora eventually sailed into the Aegean on 6 August 1976, escorted by eleven warships, and entered into the sector located between the islands of Lemnos and Lesbos. Greece considered this sector to be Greek, while Turkey claimed that it was part of the high seas. Greece delivered a strongly worded note, demanding an end to the violation and declining all responsibility for the consequences of Turkey's action. Turkey's reply was unequivocal. The exploration being conducted was of a scientific nature. If an attack took place against an unarmed ship, Greece would have to shoulder the responsibility.

Turkish-Greek relations had come to the brink of war. On 10 August the Hora returned to the port of Çanakkale; a few hours later Greece took the issue to the UN Security Council and referred the dispute unilaterally to the International Court of Justice.

When Greece applied to the UN Security Council, it argued that Turkey was endangering international peace and security by violating Greece's sovereignty over the continental shelf of the Aegean Sea. In its resolution 395, dated 25 August 1976, the Security Council avoided going into the substance of the issue. Instead it called on the two sides to resume their talks on the question and consider taking the case to the International Court of Justice. Greece had failed to obtain what it was seeking from the council. Its application to the International Court of Justice also proved fruitless (Box 5-11).

After the International Court of Justice rendered its opinion, Turkey and Greece started negotiations on the delimitation of the continental shelf in 1976 but were unable to make any progress.

The 1976 Bern Declaration and the Montreux Summit

The threat of armed conflict in the Aegean led the U.S. to intercede once again. As a result of the successful action of the Greek Lobby, the U.S. Congress maintained the embargo imposed on Turkey, notwithstanding the president's efforts, preventing the White House from effectively carrying out its regional policy.

Bitsios and Çağlayangil decided to start talks that led to the Bern Declaration of 11 November 1976. This declaration contained the principles that would apply in the demarcation of the continental shelf between the two countries (Box 5-12). It was a good first step. According to these principles, (1) the negotiations would be conducted in total secrecy; and (2) the parties would refrain from actions that would obstruct the talks or humiliate the other side.

The Bern Declaration resulted in a positive atmosphere in the relations of the two countries. But the question of the airspace of the Aegean, the military balance, and Cyprus, compounded by the problems with the U.S. over the embargo and the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement, prevented relations from advancing much beyond the frosty stage.

When the Ecevit government was formed in 1978, an opportunity emerged to take fresh initiatives. For Karamanlis, Demirel had become a leader who could not be trusted because of his backtracking from the decision of the Brussels Declaration of 1975 to refer the question of the continental shelf to the International Court of Justice.

Box 5-11. The Opinion of the International Court of Justice on the Continental Shelf of the Aegean Sea

In its unilateral application to the international Court of Justice concerning the delimitation of the continental shelf of the Aegean Sea, Greece made two requests. (1) In granting the Turkish Petroleum Company (TPAO) exploration rights in the Aegean Sea, Turkey has inflicted irreparable damage to Greek rights on the continental shelf. This action is also damaging the friendship between the two countries. Consequently, the court should take preventive measures, pending an opinion on the substance. (2) The court should determine the rules by which the continental shelf between the Greek Islands and Turkey will be apportioned.

Upon this application, the court informed Turkey of the situation and sought its views on the issue. Although Greece appointed an ad hoc judge, Turkey refrained from doing so and did not participate in the proceedings of 25–27 August. On 26 August Ankara submitted a letter to the court in which it questioned the court's competence in the matter. In its decision of 11 September, the court ruled that Turkey's seismic exploration would not cause irreparable damage even if the area was assumed to be part of the Greek continental shelf, so no preventive measures were called for.

Immediately after this decision, the court addressed the question of its competence before taking up the substance of the case. Meanwhile talks were getting underway between the parties. In this phase of the proceedings, Turkey again refrained from participating. All it did was submit a letter on 10 October 1978 in which it challenged the Greek arguments that the court was competent to consider the case. Greece based its case on two arguments. (1) Turkey and Greece were both parties to the General Covenant on the Peaceful Settlement of International Disputes of 1928. Article 17 of the covenant stated that the parties could submit a legal dispute to arbitration after the lapse of a certain period. (2) Turkey had agreed in the joint communique adopted after the Brussels talks between the two prime ministers on 31 May 1975 to refer the dispute over the continental shelf to the International Court.

On 19 December 1978 the court rendered its opinion that it was not competent to consider the dispute between Turkey and Greece over the continental shelf. It based this opinion on the following elements. (1) When Greece became a party to the General Agreement of 1928, it reserved its position regarding questions of territorial competence, which it specifically excluded. Since the delimitation of the continental shelf is a territorial question, the court is not competent to consider the case. (2) In the joint communique of 31 May 1975, Turkey did not grant Greece the right to refer the case unilaterally to the court. Therefore the International Court cannot consider the case.

(M. FIRAT)

Ecevit, however, enjoyed a completely different image in international as well as Greek circles. On 10–11 March 1978 the two prime ministers met in Montreux to bring about an atmosphere of trust. They decided that the secretariesgeneral of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs would meet on 14 April.

But when it emerged that the new U.S. president, Jimmy Carter, would ask Congress to lift the embargo on Turkey, Greece was thrown into turmoil. The leader of

Box 5-12. The Turkish and Greek Theses on the Continental Shelf

The Greek Thesis

1. The question of the demarcation of the continental shelf in the Aegean is a legal question, and the best method for resolving this is international adjudication. The basis for resolving the question should be the 1958 Geneva Convention and the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, of which Greece is a signatory.

 Under these conventions, islands also have a continental shelf.

3. Greece is a state consisting of the mainland and its islands. Under the rule in international law of the territorial integrity and the indivisibility of the state, it cannot be accepted that a foreign marine environment intrudes between the Greek mainland and the islands making up the political and territorial integrity of the state. (With this argument, Athens was seeking to have Greece recognized as an archipelagic state, which would allow a line to be drawn around the outermost islands, with all areas within this perimeter becoming an inner sea. Inner waters enjoy the same status as a country's territory.)

4. The demarcation of the continental shelf should be along a line midway between Turkey and the easternmost Aegean Islands.

The Turkish Thesis

1. The demarcation of the continental shelf in the Aegean cannot be regarded as a purely legal question. In the context of Turkish-Greek relations and the balance in the entire Aegean region, it is primarily a political question. This situation calls for a solution through mutual agreement.

2. In the demarcation of the continental shelf, the most important criterion is natural prolongation. Islands located on the natural prolongation of Anatolia cannot have a continental shelf.

3. The demarcation of the continental shelf should also be based on the principle of equity. (a) The existence of islands in a region constitutes a special circumstance; consequently, there are special circumstances in the Aegean Sea. (b) The Aegean is a semienclosed sea with special circumstances.

4. At Lausanne, a balance was struck between Turkey and Greece in 1923, which came to be known as the Lausanne balance. It consists of demilitarized islands, equal territorial waters, an unallocated continental shelf, and broad areas of high seas. This balance should not be upset, and both countries should be allowed to benefit from the Aegean under equal conditions.

(M. FIRAT) (Source: Wilson; Pazarci)

the opposition, Andreas Papandreou, began to assail Karamanlis for starting a dialogue with Turkey. Karamanlis was forced to back off. He had been driven into the same corner in which Demirel had found himself in 1975. The result was the cancellation of the 14 April meeting.

The Ecevit-Karamanlis summit marked the end of the dialogue on the Aegean dispute. After this, Ecevit also hardened his position and came up with the New National Defense concept that declared Greece to be the primary threat to Turkey. Leaving aside the Davos process in the late 1980s, during the T. Özal administration, Turkish-Greek relations entered an extended period of crisis and no communication that was to last until the end of the 1990s.

B. Questions Relating to the Airspace of the Aegean

The differences between Turkey and Greece were not confined to the maritime environment. They also had differences over the sharing of the airspace. The airspace claimed by Greece as well as the Flight Information Region (FIR) line also became sources of tension between the two countries after 1974.

The Airspace

The airspace is the column of air above a state's territory and territorial waters. On 6 September 1931 Greece issued a presidential decree by which it extended its airspace from three miles from the shoreline to ten miles. Although the width of Greece's territorial waters at the time was only three miles, Turkey showed no reaction to this move. After 1974 Turkey came out against Greece's claim on the grounds that it violated the Chicago Conventions of 7 December 1944, of which both countries were signatories. Turkey would only recognize the Greek claim of national airspace up to a distance of six miles from the Greek coast, which overlapped the Greek territorial waters. To keep the issue permanently on the agenda, Turkish military aircraft systematically and periodically flew into the four miles of airspace that Turkey did not recognize. Each time this happened, Greece delivered a note protesting the violation of Greek airspace by Turkish aircraft (Box 5-13).

The FIR Line

The Flight Information Region (FIR) is designed to ensure the security of civil aviation within the framework of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), which sets its boundaries. Within these limits, the state in charge provides flight information and search and rescue services and operates warning systems.

At the meeting of the ICAO held in Istanbul on 23 May 1952, a decision was made, with the participation of Turkey, granting the responsibilities for providing FIR services in the Aegean to Greece starting from that date. According to this decision, the air traffic over the Aegean would be controlled from Athens, while Turkey would be responsible only for the traffic in the airspace over its territorial waters. In the atmosphere of Turkish-Greek cordiality reigning in the 1950s, Turkey agreed to this arrangement, bearing in mind that most of the traffic in

Box 5-13. The Turkish and Greek Theses on the Subject of Airspace

The Greek thesis on the ten-mile airspace rested on two premises.

- To declare an airspace of ten miles was in conformity with international law.
- 2. This was confirmed by the fact that from 1931 to the 1970s Turkey never complained about this issue.

Turkey was opposed to both of these views.

1. Turkey maintained that the differences of opinion regarding the legality of the ten-mile airspace were the result of different ways of interpreting articles 1 and 2 of the International Civil Aviation Convention of the Chicago Conventions of 1944. Article 1 states that signatories have full and exclusive sovereignty in the airspace over their territories. Article 2 states that (for the purposes of this convention) territory signifies the land under a state's control, sovereignty, protection, or mandate as well as the contiguous territorial waters.

Greece claimed that the Chicago Conventions contained provisions only in connection with matters pertaining to the subjects regulated by the conventions. They were not designed to define the airspace legally but only to indicate that states exercise sovereignty over their airspaces as well as their territories and territorial waters. Consequently, Greece's practice did not violate international law. Furthermore, as the tendency to extend the territorial waters to twelve miles became generalized, this question would become irrelevant.

Turkey claimed that the above-mentioned articles clearly defined the airspace and that this airspace corresponded directly to the territory of a state, including its territorial waters. According to this argument, the airspace could not extend beyond the territorial waters. Consequently, it was against international law for Greece to set its airspace at ten miles beyond its shoreline when its territorial seas extended to only six miles.

2. The Greek contention that Turkey's failure to react to a situation that had existed since 1931 was proof that Turkey accepted this situation was also rejected by Turkey. Turkey's first complaint against Greece's claim to ten miles came in 1975, because the first official notification to this effect made to the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO) was on 2 June 1974, even though the extension occurred through a decree promulgated much earlier. Turkey reacted when Greece announced its practice internationally and sent a telex message to the ICAO on 15 April 1975, declaring the space beyond six miles from Greece's shores to be a dangerous area. Furthermore, it confirmed this position by notifying Greece on 5 May 1975 that it only recognized Greek airspace up to six miles from the Greek shoreline.

(M, FIRAT)

the Aegean consisted of Greek aircraft and ships. It also meant avoiding substantial financial burdens by not having to purchase the technical equipment needed to carry out FIR responsibilities.

그는 항상 무슨 얼마를 가는 사람이라면 있다.

The deterioration in relations between Turkey and Greece in 1974 caused the FIR question to surface as one more source of tension. After the first Cyprus operation, Turkey issued Notam (Notice to Airmen) No. 714 in order to protect itself from possible threats coming from the Aegean and enhance its security. This notice required all aircraft, including military aircraft, crossing a line drawn halfway across the Aegean from north to south to inform Turkey in advance. In other words, Turkey had shifted the FIR line from the line separating Turkish and Greek territorial waters to the middle of the Aegean Sea.

In response, Greece issued Notam No. 1157 on 13 September, declaring that the air corridor between Greece and Turkey was unsafe. This forced all air traffic to use circuitous routes in order to avoid the Aegean corridors.

When the Demirel government finalized its defense arrangements with the U.S. on 22 February 1980, it unilaterally canceled Notam No. 714. Greece responded by canceling Notam No. 1157, and this question was resolved. Turkey had a number of reasons to take this step. First, as a result of the Turkish and Greek notices, international air traffic had to be rerouted, resulting in airfare hikes that gave rise to complaints from airlines. Second, because Greece's relations were overwhelmingly with the West, the closure of its eastern air corridor did not affect it much. Turkey was the major loser, because it also was westward-looking in its international relations. Finally, the probability of an attack from Greece had by then practically disappeared.

At present, the major dispute between the two countries relates to military aircraft. Greece claims that the FIR arrangements encompass all aircraft, civilian and military, whereas Turkey claims that only civilian aircraft are obliged to provide information under the FIR arrangement, while the movements of military aircraft should be regulated by bilateral agreements.

C. Questions Relating to the Military Balance in the Aegean

Following the 1974 Cyprus operation, Turkey and Greece took significant steps to change the military status quo in the Aegean. Greece considered Turkey a serious military threat after the Cyprus operation and accelerated the militarization of the islands lying closest to Anatolia. In addition, the Karamanlis government displayed its displeasure at the U.S. by leaving the military structure of NATO. In 1975 Turkey established the 4th Army, also known as the Aegean Army, with headquarters in İzmir. To indicate that it was intended to confront a threat emanating from the Aegean and as a reaction to the continuing U.S. arms embargo, the new army was kept under national control and not assigned to NATO.

These developments affected not only Turkish-Greek

Box 5-14. The Turkish and Greek Theses with Respect to the Militarization of the Aegean Islands

There are three categories of Aegean islands from the point of view of their demilitarized status. (1) The Islands off the entrance of the Turkish Straits, Lemnos and Samothraki, which were demilitarized under article 4 of the Lausanne Straits Convention. (2) The Islands of Lesbos, Chios, Samos, and Ikaria, demilitarized under article 13 of the Treaty of Lausanne. (3) The Dodecanese Islands, which were transferred from Italy to Greece under the terms of the 1947 Parls Peace Treaty on condition that they remain demilitarized in accordance with article 14 of the treaty.

The Greek Thesis

Because the Montreux Straits Convention of 1936 replaced the Lausanne Straits Convention, the Islands of Lemnos and Samothraki in the first category gained the right to be remilitarized in the same manner as the Turkish Straits were remilitarized under the new regime. The Turkish foreign minister of the time, Tevfik Rüstü Aras, acknowledged this right in a speech delivered at the TGNA. Since Turkey acquired the right to remilitarize the Islands off the Dardanelles, Greece has an equal right to remilitarize the other Islands off the Straits under its sovereignty.

The Islands in the second category are faced with an actual threat and are being remilitarized for legitimate defense purposes. The principle of rebus sic stantibus applies in this case. The basic right of legitimate self-defense overrides any rights derived from treaties. Furthermore, Turkey too is failing to carry out its commitments under Lausanne. The circumstances are completely changed, and, having served their function, the provisions for the demilitarization of the islands no longer apply.

Finally, the Dodecanese Islands and the Island of Megisti were demilitarized under the 1947 Parls Peace Treaty. The freaty binds only those who are a party. Since Turkey is not a signatory, Turkey has no right to make any claim on the basis of this treaty.

The Turkish Thesis

None of the three Greek arguments with respect to Lemnos and Samothraki has any validity for Turkey. The preamble of the Montreux Straits Convention does state that this convention replaces the Lausanne Straits Convention. But the same convention declares that its purpose is to ensure Turkey's security. Therefore, those provisions of the Lausanne Straits Convention that do not conflict with the Montreux Straits Convention remain valid. Turkey does not deny that in his speech of 1936 Aras made positive comments on the remilitarization of Lemnos and Samothraki. For these comments to have legal validity, however, the interested parties must subsequently express their approval with their actions. But Turkey kept sending notes expressing opposition to the Greek action and made public statements in the same direction, Finally, the Greek and Turkish islands off the Dardanelles need not have the same regime. The preamble of the Montreux Straits Convention approved the rearming of the Turkish islands within the context of Turkish security.

As for the islands of Lesbos, Chios, Samos, and Ikaria, Greece bases its right to remilitarize these islands on the legitimate right of self-defense. In International law, this right can only be invoked in the event of an actual attack and cannot be claimed on the grounds of a threat. There is no threat to the islands originating from Turkey, but even if such a threat existed, that would still not give Greece the right to remilitarize the Islands.

On the subject of the Dodecanese Islands and Megisti, the view that Turkey cannot claim any rights under the 1947 Paris peace treaty is unacceptable. Any country of the region can demand the observance of the demilitarized status of these Islands, which constitutes an objective fact. Furthermore, the Dodecanese Islands are not devoid of any legal ties with Turkey. Article 16 of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne recognizes that Turkey has rights with respect to the future status of these Islands. As a matter of fact, the text of this article was distributed as a conference paper at the Paris Feace Conference. This is proof of the validity of Turkey's claims to this effect.

(M. FIRAT)

relations but also the regional policies of NATO and the U.S. Fundamental problems arose in connection with the Aegean military balance, which have persisted to this day despite the improvement in the relations of Turkey, Greece, and the U.S. These problems involve the militarization of the eastern Aegean islands, the NATO Early Warning Line (the area of responsibility for air defense), and NATO's command and control areas.

The Question of the Militarization of the Aegean Islands

The issue of the militarization of the Aegean islands emerged in the 1960s when relations between Turkey and Greece became strained because of the Cyprus crisis. On 29 June 1964 Turkey delivered a note to Greece, calling for it to comply with treaty provisions and stop the construction of fortifications in Rhodes and Kos. Greece delivered a reply in which it claimed that no fortifications were being built and that it was in compliance with international treaties. In April 1969 Turkey delivered a new note in which it asked for militarization activities in Lemnos to be ended. Greece claimed for the first time that the Montreux Straits Convention gave it the right to militarize Lemnos. After 1974 Greece announced that it was indeed militarizing the Aegean islands and developed various arguments to prove that it had the right to do so (Box 5-14).

Despite Turkey's objection, Greece continued to militarize the islands. In the 1990s the ownership of islets and rock formations in the Aegean emerged as a new dispute.

The Question of the NATO Early Warning Line and Command and Control Areas

In the wake of the 1964 Cyprus crisis and at the request of Greece, the commander of Allied Forces in Europe released a message on 22 February, stating that the NATO Early Warning Line in the Aegean corresponded to the Istanbul-Athens FIR line. This implied that the defense of the Aegean was under Greek responsibility. When Greece left NATO's military structure in 1974, provisional arrangements had to be made. After the implementation of the Rogers Plan (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" in Section 6) and the return of Greece to NATO's military structure in 1980, the subject was to emerge once again. Turkey announced that it would not accept the pre-1974 arrangement and demanded that areas of responsibility for air defense be redrawn to meet Turkish defense requirements. Specifically, Turkey wanted a notice time of ten minutes for eastbound flights in the international airspace over the Aegean.

The issue of the command and control areas within NATO is closely related to this Early Warning Line: which country will assume responsibility for command and control in the air defense area?

The question of command and control of naval forces in the Aegean first came up in NATO's Military Committee on 17 January 1957, when this task was entrusted to Greece with the concurrence of Turkey. Because this decision did not obtain the approval of the Defense Planning Committee, the higher political organ, it never became a NATO decision; nevertheless, Greece exercised this right until 1974. When Greece left NATO's military structure in that year, Turkey announced that it did not want to recognize the existing arrangement. After Turkey approved the Rogers Plan (and, with it, the return of Greece to the military structure), this dispute was supposed to be taken up in accordance with the Rogers Plan. Despite Turkey's friendly gesture in allowing Greece to return to NATO's military structure, the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) government that came to power in 1981 in Greece refused to discuss the command and control question.

The differences over military questions between the two allied Aegean countries would continue to plague NATO until the end of the 1990s.

IV. DEVELOPMENTS IN CYPRUS (1975-1980)

Turkey's international isolation increased after the second Cyprus operation. The U.S. arms embargo on Turkey and relations with the EEC were linked to Cyprus. There was mounting pressure for intercommunal talks to begin and for a return to the previous state of affairs with a withdrawal of Turkish troops from the island. The Cypriot Turks and Turkey, however, had no intention to give up recently gained rights. They were pressing for a new arrangement, based on the decisions of the First Geneva Conference, that would reflect the new situation on the island. At first Turkey pursued this policy with some diffidence. But after 5 February 1975, when the U.S. imposed its arms embargo, concrete steps began to be taken in Cyprus.

A. Proclamation of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus (TFSC)

The Turkish Federated State of Cyprus (TFSC) was proclaimed on 13 February 1975. In a statement made on that day, Denktaş explained why it had become necessary to take this step and added that the ultimate goal was to unite once again with the Greek-Cypriot community, but within a bizonal federation. Resolution 367 of the UN Security Council, dated 12 March 1975, deplored this action and called on the sides to engage in talks under the aegis of the UN secretary-general.

The proclamation of the TFSC was actually a delayed decision. Turkey had been able to establish its military rule over Northern Cyprus but had not been able to legitimize the new status quo. Makarios had returned to the island. Now that the constitutional order was restored, Turkey was expected to withdraw its troops. The decisions made at the first Geneva Conference were gradually being forgotten.

Before the proclamation of the TFSC, there was a debate going on in the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs. When it was decided to provide Northern Cyprus with a legal foundation, one of the proposals was to declare an independent state in the north. The Irmak government and some diplomats were unsure of the international reaction to such a move, however, so this option was discarded. The view that prevailed was that proclaiming a federated state would be more suitable.

The TFSC had been established, but it faced many difficulties. The original population of 234,000 in the north had fallen to 70,000, including 20,000 Greek Cypriots who had not fled their villages. The operation had caused considerable destruction, bringing the economy to a standstill. Farming and animal husbandry had come to an end, and all vital requirements were being secured from Turkey. A strong political authority that could revive the economy was missing. There were five separate administrations: the Turkish army; the Bayraktarlık, which has organized the irregular Turkish-Cypriot fighters; the Turkish Embassy; the Cyprus Coordination Council established in September 1974 under the chairmanship of Ziya Müezzinoğlu; and finally the TFSC.

The first action was to issue an ordinance on 2 May 1975 that would make up for the shortage of workers in Northern Cyprus with laborers brought over from Turkey. Although the intention was to bring over 100,000 workers, only 40,000 were admitted in the first stage. This decision would change the population composition of Cyprus and met with a negative reaction from the Greek Cypriots. It continues to attract criticism to this day, including from Turkish Cypriots.

B. The Intercommunal Talks

The two sides heeded the UN Security Council's resolution 367 and engaged in intercommunal talks in Vienna under the aegis of the secretary-general of the UN. The only tangible result of these talks, which lasted from 28 April 1975 to 21 February 1976, was the Population Exchange Agreement. According to the agreement, the Greek-Cypriot population in the north would move to the south, with the Turkish Cypriots moving from south to north. The transfer operation would be supervised by UNFICYP. The transfer of populations would be on a voluntary basis, and priority would be given to the reunification of families. In addition, the two sides took up the issue of the opening of Nicosia's international airport and the case of Városha (a large Greek-Cypriot neighborhood of Famagusta, which had been abandoned by its inhabitants fleeing the Turkish army), but nothing emerged from the talks because no progress was made on the question of maps and border adjustments. An agreement on maps would have entailed giving up territory, and Demirel could not afford the loss of political prestige that would result from being the politician who gave up what Ecevit had won.

On the Greek-Cypriot side, negotiations were being conducted by Clerides; but he was beginning to feel the pressure of Makarios, who was now back on the island. The U.S. had persuaded itself that Clerides was being conciliatory and supported him against Makarios, while Makarios saw Clerides as his chief rival and did everything to prevent an agreement. Makarios's tactic was to gain international support for the Greek Cypriots by presenting the Turkish side as intransigent. He was successful in depicting the Turks as the obstacle to a settlement.

By 1976 Turkey and the Turkish Cypriots found themselves quite isolated in the international arena. In his election campaign in 1976, President Carter had announced that the arms embargo against Turkey would not be lifted until the Cyprus question was settled to the satisfaction of the Greek Cypriots. Although the EEC made proposals for a solution that included a federal constitutional structure with two fairly autonomous zones, it also supported the right of refugees to return to their homes and freedom of circulation and settlement, plus the immediate withdrawal of foreign troops. In practice, such proposals would nullify any benefits the federal structure might provide for the Turkish Cypriots. When the Cyprus report by the Human Rights Commission of the Council of Europe condemning Turkey was submitted to the Ministerial Council, the council promptly adopted it on 20 August 1976.

The unfriendly attitude of the West was also evidenced by the Islamic countries. Although the Organization of the Islamic Conference made a decision to support the TFSC at its Islambul meeting held on 10 to 18 May 1976, the same Islamic countries endorsed a resolution strongly condemning Turkey that had been adopted by the Conference of Nonaligned States in Colombo on 2 August 1976.

In these circumstances, the Demirel government decided to take a new initiative. On 9 January 1977 Denktaş wrote Makarios a letter in which he proposed the resumption of talks. Contrary to expectations, Makarios agreed to the proposal in order to gain political advantage against his rival Clerides.

The Agreement on Four Principles between Denktaş and Makarios

On 12 February 1977 Denktaş and Makarios signed the Agreement on Four Principles.

- 1. A federal republic would be set up that was independent, nonaligned, and bizonal.
- 2. The amount of territory to be allocated to each community would be determined according to the criteria of economic viability, productivity, and land ownership.
- 3. The three freedoms (freedom of circulation, freedom of settlement, and freedom of property) and other questions of principle as well as other specific subjects would be open to discussion. But the basis of a bicommunal federal system and possible practical difficulties for the Turkish-Cypriot community would be borne in mind.
- 4. The responsibilities and functions of the central federal government would be established in a manner that would preserve the unity of the country, bearing in mind the bicommunal character of the state.

Denktaş agreed to this round of talks at Ankara's behest, but he felt that Makarios was the winner. The notion that the Cyprus question could not be solved with Makarios had been dispelled, and Makarios was now free from the fear that Turkey would declare an independent state as long as he kept the talks going. Makarios could also chip away at the Turkish demands for land and extra security within a federal structure. Finally, Makarios was free to stop the talks at any moment and accuse the Turkish side of intransigence.

The signing of the Agreement on Four Principles gave a new impetus to the Vienna talks. In the session lasting from 31 March to 7 April 1977, both sides submitted their proposals. For the first time, the Greek side prepared a map, which gave 20% of the land to the Turkish side.

As the two sides examined each other's proposals, Makarios died suddenly. When Spyros Kyprianou was elected president on 26 January 1978, there was another break in the negotiation process. Kyprianou did not have the charisma of Makarios and did not want to weaken his standing with the Greek-Cypriot public by accepting a federation, because he knew well that only a Makarios could induce the Greek Cypriots to come to terms with a federal solution.

Despite all this, 1978 saw important developments. The Carter administration was sensitive to the Soviet threat and favored lifting the arms embargo but wanted to see some prior steps from Turkey. When Ecevit became prime minister in 1978, he sought to accommodate the U.S. position. A group of experts, with the advice of Professor Mümtaz Soysal, prepared a draft constitution for Cyprus, consisting of 100 articles. It included a bicommunal, bizonal, federal state structure, territorial adjustments in six places, and reopening Varosha to settlement. These Turkish proposals, however, were rejected by the Greek-Cypriot delegation. Between 1974 and 1977 it had been the Turkish side that was trying to avoid negotiations and a settlement, but now this role had passed to the Greek side. As the economic condition of the Greek side improved and the economic and other difficulties of the Turkish side multiplied, the Greek side was quite prepared to live with a deadlocked situation.

The Ten-Point Agreement between Denktaş and Kyprianou

The negotiations, which had been interrupted for a year, were resumed on 18–19 May 1979, when Denktaş and Kyprianou signed the Ten-Point Agreement. This was a reaffirmation of the 1977 agreement between Denktaş and Makarios. The negotiations would be conducted on the basis of both the principles agreed to by Denktaş and Makarios on 12 February 1977 and the UN resolutions on Cyprus. All territorial and constitutional issues would be taken up. Agreement would be reached on reopening Varosha to settlement under the supervision of the UN, and this agreement would be implemented without delay. Questions regarding the final objective of a demilitarized Republic of Cyprus would be discussed. The discussion would also include measures to ensure the independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, and nonalignment of the Republic. These measures would also ensure that Cyprus would not unite, partially or fully, with any other state or be partitioned or annexed.

The Ten-Point Agreement also failed to secure any tangible progress. Cyprus remained on the agenda of the UN as an unresolved question until 1983. The developments in Turkey and Greece after 1980 and the proclamation of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus in 1983 would alter the nature of the question fundamentally.

MELEK FIRAT

Sources (Relations with Greece)

Akar, Rıdvan, and Hülya Demir. İstanbul'un Son Sürgünleri. 3rd ed. İstanbul: İletişim, 1994.

Alexandris, Alexis. The Greek Minority of Istanbul and Greek-Turkish Relations 1918–1974. Athens: Center of Asia Minor Studies, 1983.

Alford, Jonathan (ed.). *Greece and Turkey: Adversity in Alliance.*Aldershot, Hampshire: Gower, 1984.

An, Ahmet. Kıbrıs'ta Fırtınalı Yıllar (1942–1962). Lefkoşa: Galeri Kültür, 1996.

Attalides, Michael. Cyprus: Nationalism and International Politics. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1979.

Aziz, Aysel. "Sovyetlerin Kıbrıs Tutumları 1965–1970." SBF Dergisi 34, no. 4 (1969): 201–44.

Bahcheli, Tozun. Greece-Turkish Relations since 1955. San Francisco/London: Westview, 1990.

Barutçu, Ecmel. Hariciye Koridoru. Ankara: 21. Yüzyıl, 1999.

Birand, Mehmet Ali. Diyet: Türkiye ve Kıbrıs Üzerine Pazarlıklar 1974–1979. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1979.

-----. 30 Sıcak Gün. 7th ed. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1980.

Bitsios, Dimitri. Cyprus: The Vulnerable Republic. Selanik: Institute for Balkan Studies, 1975.

Bölükbaşı, Süha. Turkish-American Relations and Cyprus. Lanham, N.Y./London: University Press of America, 1988.

Clerides, Glafcos. Cyprus: My Deposition. Lefkoşa: Alithia, 1989.

Clogg, Richard. Modern Yunanistan Tarihi (original title: A Concise History of Greece). Trans. Dilek Şendil. İstanbul: İletişim, 1992.

Couloumbis, Theodore A. The United States, Greece and Turkey: The Troubled Triangle. New York: Praeger, 1983.

Denktaş, Rauf. Rauf Denktaş'ın Hatıraları. Vol. 4. İstanbul: Boğaziçi, 1996–97.

Drevet, Jacques. Chypre: Île Extrême. Paris: Syros, 1991.

Ehrlich, Thomas. Cyprus 1958–1967: International Crisis and the Role of Law. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.

Fırat, Melek M. 1960–1971 Arası Türk Dış Politikası ve Kıbrıs Sorunu. Ankara: Siyasal, 1997.

- Gürel, Şükrü S. Tarihsel Boyut İçinde Türk-Yunan İlişkileri. Ankara: Ümit, 1993.
- Güvenç, Nazım. Kıbrıs Sorunu, Yunanistan ve Türkiye. İstanbul: Çağdaş, 1984.
- Kızılyürek, Niyazi. Ulus Ötesi Kıbrıs. Lefkoşa: n.p., 1993.
- Marliadis, Kyriacos. The Rise and Fall of the Cyprus Republic. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1977.
- Mayes, Stanley. Makarios: A Bibliography. London: Macmillan Press, 1981.
- Milletlerarası Münasebetler Türk Yıllığı 15 (1975). Doc. No. 4. Ankara: AÜSBF Dış Münasebetler Enstitüsü, 1977.
- Mütercimler, Erol. Bilinmeyen Yönleriyle Kıbrıs Barış Harekâtı. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Arba, 1998.
- Oberling, Pierre. Bellapais'ye Giden Yol: Kıbrıs Türklerinin Kuzey Kıbrıs'a Göçü (original title: The Road to Bellapais [The Turkish Cypriot Exodus to Northern Cyprus]). Trans. Mehmet Erdoğan. Ankara: Genelkurmay Askerî Tarih ve Stratejik Etüt Başkanlığı, 1987.
- Olaylarla Türk Dış Politikası 1919–1973 (OTDP): 5th ed. Ankara: AÜSBF Dış Münasebetler Enstitüsü, 1982.
- Oran, Baskın. Türk-Yunan İlişkilerinde Batı Trakya Sorunu. Updated 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi, 1991.
- ———. Yunanistan'ın Lozan İhlalleri. Ankara: SAEMK, 1999.
- Papandreu, Andreas. Namlunun Ucundaki Demokrasi (original title: Democracy at Gunpoint: The Greek Front). 2nd ed.

- Trans. Semih Koray and Mehmet Emin Yıldırım. Ankara: Bilgi, 1988.
- Pazarcı, H. "Hukukî Açıdan Ege'deki Deniz Sorunlarında Türk ve Yunan Görüşleri." İn Ege'de Deniz Sorunları Semineri, pp. 79–93. Ankara: AÜSBF Yayınları, 1986.
- Polyviou, Polivios. Cyprus: Conflict and Negotiation, 1960–1980. London: Duckworth, 1980.
- Sarıca, Murat, Erdoğan Teziç, and Özer Eskiyurt. Kıbrıs Sorunu. İstanbul: Fakülteler Matbaası, 1975.
- Sönmezoğlu, Faruk. Tarafların Tutum ve Tezleri Açısından Kıbrıs Sorunu (1945–1986). İstanbul: Fakülte Yayınları, 1991.
- Stephens, Robert. Cyprus: A Place of Arms. London: Praeger, 1966.
- Toluner, Sevim. Kıbrıs Uyuşmazlığı ve Milletlerarası Hukuk. İstanbul: Fakülteler Matbaası, 1977.
- Tülümen, Turgut. Hayat Boyu Kıbrıs. İstanbul: Boğaziçi, 1998.
- Vaner, Semih (ed.). Türk-Yunan Uyuşmazlığı (original title: Le Différend Gréco-Turc). Trans. Süleyman Aksoy. İstanbul: Metis, 1990.
- Wilson, Andrew. The Aegean Dispute. Adelphi Papers, No. 155. London: International Institute for Strategic Studies, 1979.
- Yavuzalp, Ercüment. Kıbrıs Yangınında Büyükelçilik. Ankara: Bilgi, 1994.

Relations with the USSR

Domestic and Foreign Policy of the USSR

The USSR entered the 1960s with the Twenty-second Congress of the CPSU, which met from 17 to 31 October 1961. At the congress, it was announced that the transition to the communism stage had begun in the USSR. A determination was made that capitalism was in deep crisis. The U.S. would be overtaken in 1970, and communism would be established in the USSR in 1980.

According to theory, the difference between socialism and communism was that in the latter stage a prosperous society would be attained in which it would be possible to apply the principle "from each according to his means, and to each according to his needs." In reality, however, the USSR was far from reaching that stage. The "great leap forward" campaign in China had a great influence on the decision to enter the stage of transition to communism in the USSR. The USSR itself was making the greatest leap by announcing that it was entering the construction of communism stage. It was conveying the message to the other socialist states that had yet to reach this stage that they, naturally, had to follow its example.

When the plans failed to be fulfilled, especially in the agricultural sector, Khrushchev was dismissed on 14 October 1964. This was the only time in the history of the USSR that something like this had happened. By the time Gorbachev similarly left his post in 1991, the USSR experiment had already come to an end. After Khrushchev, Brezhnev took over as first secretary of the CPSU in October 1964. At the Twenty-third Congress of the CPSU, held from 29 March to 9 April 1966, Brezhnev assumed the title of general secretary of the party, which had been in disuse since Stalin's time, and became the "leader" of the USSR until his death in 1982.

Under Brezhnev's leadership, the USSR continued to be plagued by the problem of agricultural inadequacy and waste. Its industrial growth also began to falter. In the final stage of this period, there was a phase of stagnation before the onset of the crisis. Corruption and alcoholism were on the rise. Technological progress had come to an end. The USSR was unsuccessful because it could not keep pace with the scientific and technological revolution carried out by the U.S. in the 1960s. It was unable to adopt new production techniques like automation; nor was it able to adjust its social structure to new requirements. Economic growth fell from the level of 11.3% attained in 1951-55 to a miserable 3% in 1976-80. Central planning of the economy was no longer functioning properly. Quantity came before quality. The bureaucracy was an obstacle that prevented the system from functioning. Internal development came to depend on imported Western technology. The privileged and highly conservative leadership (consisting of bureaucrats and technocrats) was unable to make room for economic renewal. During Brezhnev's rule, the system gradually turned into a gerontocracy, with high-level bureaucrats holding onto their jobs up to their deaths.

In the sphere of relations among socialist states, the salient event was the split between the USSR and China, which had repercussions throughout the socialist bloc.

The split within the bloc led to its radical transformation. In 1953 the only maverick state not under Soviet influence was Yugoslavia. By the mid-1970s only six of the sixteen socialist regimes in the world remained on the Soviet side. The truth of the matter was that the USSR had lost its leadership position within the bloc. The Soviet Union was forced to intervene by force even in the countries that acknowledged its leadership, as in the case of Czechoslovakia in 1968 (Box 5-15). The 1971 initiative to restore the cohesion of the bloc within the framework of the COMECON remained on paper because of the undue weight given to the USSR within this organization.

When it came to relations with nonaligned countries, the USSR was helping them economically and extending loans without demanding ideological allegiance in return. The USSR was motivated by the need to compete with

Box 5-15. The Brezhnev Doctrine

表表的表示。

Leonid Brezhnev's rule coincided with the period of détente in the Cold War. Détente allowed centrifugal forces to emerge in both camps. In January 1968 Alexander Dubcek came to power in Czechoslovakia and started questioning communism on the Soviet model. When he attempted to establish his version of socialism based on the democratic model, the armies of the Warsaw Pact overran the country on 21 August 1968. This was the end of the "Prague Spring." This event demonstrated that the USSR was not prepared to allow any of the Eastern European countries to slip out of the bloc. On 12 November 1968 Brezhnev enunciated the doctrine that Communist countries only enjoyed a limited sovereignty. If socialism came under threat, the USSR had a responsibility to intervene.

Under the conditions of détente, the Brezhnev Doctrine was a vehicle for the USSR to impose its leadership on Communist countries. The doctrine created a great commotion in Western European Communist circles and led to the appearance of "Euro Communism." The doctrine was dealt a great blow by Mikhail Gorbachev when he declared in 1987 that Moscow would look kindly upon "national" socialism. The doctrine was dealt a deathblow in August 1989, when the Kremlin remained silent after a non-Communist government came to power in Poland.

(E: Tellal) (Source: STMA, vol. 5, p. 1680)

the West and the desire to free developing countries from overdependence on the West, to increase its influence and gain new markets.

The USSR pursued the policy of peaceful coexistence with the West despite the Berlin crisis of 1961 and the Cuban missile crisis of 1962. These relations can be broken down into three interrelated parts: disarmament negotiations, good political relations both multilaterally within the CSCE and bilaterally, and expanding trade relations.

Despite all of this, the bipolar structure remained intact in the international system. In negotiating the SALT treaties, the USSR was motivated by the urgent need to relieve itself of the heavy burden of the arms race and had to override the opposition of the military-industrial complex.

In the U.S., defense industries were controlled by the private sector, which received contracts from the state. That is why the military-industrial complex was extremely powerful. Even as the disarmament talks went ahead, the two superstates kept up their research to develop more advanced arms. The USSR wanted to keep the situation from getting out of control, so Brezhnev, the author of détente, hardened his position. He intervened in Afghanistan in 1979 and imposed the Wojciech Jaruzelski regime in Poland in 1980.

To sum up, by the end of the 1970s there was a growing gap between the brave economic plans of the USSR and grim reality and a similar gap between the rhetoric and actions in political life. The role that the USSR played in the international system bore no relationship to its actual strength.

II. FROM "NORMALIZATION" TO COOPERATION

A. Factors Influencing Relations

During the twenty years examined in this chapter, relations between Turkey and the USSR were influenced by developments in the world as well as the region, as summarized in the following paragraphs.

The first development was the Cuban missile crisis. The American decision following the crisis to dismantle the Jupiter missiles deployed in Turkey without consulting Ankara led Turkey to review its relations with the U.S., while removing an impediment to developing relations with the USSR.

A second factor was the changes taking place within NATO. These changes in NATO's military strategy during the 1960s were placing strains on relations among the allies. Compared to the massive retaliation strategy, the new strategy of flexible response allowed the allies more room for maneuver (see Box 4-10 in Section 4).

The third factor was the question of chromium. In 1963 the USSR lowered its price for the mineral, which led the U.S. to shift its purchases from Turkey to the USSR. As a leading exporter of chromium, Turkey was badly affected by this decision. This led Ankara to review its policies based on bloc solidarity.

The fourth factor was Cyprus. The Cyprus events of 1964 and 1974 and the Soviet response to these developments influenced bilateral relations to an important degree. The U.S. military embargo and Turkey's response of closing U.S. bases also contributed to the development of bilateral relations with Moscow.

The fifth development was détente. In the 1970s the intensity of the Cold War abated, with events such as the disarmament negotiations and the Helsinki process. This allowed for improved relations. The USSR's relations with the capitalist states began improving with détente, and the volume of trade expanded. Turkey shared in these developments. Soviet leaders repeatedly declared that the postwar demands for territory and bases in the Turkish Straits were misguided and blamed Stalin and Beria for this. This too helped improve bilateral relations. As Turkey's relations with Moscow improved through détente, this did not happen at the expense of the Western alliance but in step with it.

Socioeconomic developments in Turkish society also played a role. There is a general impression in Turkey that no improvements in Turkish-Soviet relations occurred in the 1970s. Turkey's economic difficulties in the 1970s made it imperative to seek loans and aid from the USSR, however, and economic cooperation was the driving force behind the development of relations. Furthermore, it became evident that Moscow was not behind the leftist groups and those who resorted to arms in an atmosphere of anarchy in Turkey during the 1970s. As the suspicion that Moscow was responsible for Turkey's domestic troubles abated, this too had a positive effect on bilateral relations.

Finally, the USSR's intervention in Afghanistan in December 1979 had a negative effect on Turkish relations with the USSR, while helping to develop relations with the U.S.

B. Normalization (1960-1964)

Soon after the coup of 27 May, ambassador Nikita Ryzhov called on Gen. Cemal Gürsel, the new head of state, on 31 May 1960 to inform him that the USSR was recognizing the new government. He also expressed the hope that the new administration would have the strength to improve relations with the USSR. After this, the USSR went on the offensive to develop relations. Ryzhov made a major contribution toward this effort. He ask the Turkish government not to postpone the planned visit to Moscow by the prime minister. Cemal Gürsel made a statement on 28 May, however, announcing that he would be unable to carry out the planned visit to "our big neighbor who has made significant material progress" (PRO, FO 371/153041), but added that he would be glad to carry out the visit at a future date.

The USSR also took initiatives at a high level to improve relations with the new administration. On 28 June 1960 Khrushchev wrote Cemal Gürsel a letter in which he established a link between Turkey's situation and its alliances and expressed the wish to see Turkey pursuing a more independent line in its foreign policy. Nevertheless, he went on to say that "we have no desire to see Turkey's relations with America and the other Western states deteriorate. We would not harbor such feelings. We ourselves are seeking to establish good relations with all Western states, including the United States" (Tellal, p. 264). He was emphasizing that Turkey's alliance commitments need not prevent the development of relations with the USSR.

Gürsel replied on 8 July, stressing Turkey's attachment to its alliances. He added that reductions in military spending could only come about through arms limitation agreements. Good relations depended on a display of goodwill by the USSR.

This suggested that no change had occurred in Turkey's foreign policy. But developments over the medium term were to lead to a normalization of relations between the two countries. One of these developments was the appointment of a new ambassador to Moscow. After the coup on 27 May, it was announced that the new minister of foreign affairs would be Fahri Korutürk; but this decision was subsequently changed when Selim Sarper accepted the post. The administration of the National Unity Committee appointed Korutürk to the Moscow Embassy, thus demonstrating the importance it attributed to relations with the Soviet Union. Selim Sarper was the ambassador in Moscow who conducted the ill-fated negotiation with Molotov on 19 March and 7 June 1945 (see Box 3-6 in Section 3). Korutürk took over his new post on 6 August 1960, when he presented his credentials to Brezhnev.

As minister of foreign affairs, Sarper met with Khrushchev in New York in October 1960. This was the first highlevel meeting since the Saracoğlu-Stalin meeting in 1939. The meeting in New York was at Khrushchev's request. He made a series of proposals ranging from economic aid to an invitation for Gürsel to visit Moscow. These proposals were all turned down by Sarper. The most noteworthy Soviet initiative was the offer to withdraw its military units "several hundred kilometers" (PRO, FO 371/153039, 371/153041) from the Turkish border. Turkey would be expected to withdraw its units only to a very limited extent, and the USSR was prepared to accept joint verification (PRO, FO 371/153039, 371/153041). Joint verification was of significance because the USSR had been rejecting this condition in the arms-limitation talks then in progress. This too was rejected by Sarper, however. Even if this meeting produced no tangible results, its significance cannot be discounted. Turkey was no longer shying away from high-level bilateral talks with the USSR.

Another development that contributed to improved bilateral relations was the signing of various technical agreements. On 27 April 1961 the two countries signed the agreement that allowed the establishment of direct railway links between the USSR and Turkey. The Agreement on the Establishment of the Cable Telephone Service was signed in 9 June 1962. This agreement extended Turkey's telephone link with Bulgaria and Romania all the way to Moscow. A protocol to build a joint irrigation dam on the Arpaçay River, which formed the border between the two countries, was signed on 25 April 1963.

There were also impediments in the course of normalization of relations. One of these was the "CENTO Documents Crisis" that occurred in August 1961, when the USSR published the secret CENTO documents that it had obtained by covert means in the past. These documents dated from 1958 and contained CENTO's war plans and the measures to be taken in the event of a nuclear exchange. The documents that the USSR published on 18 August had probably been obtained from Iraq after the coup in that country. There were various explanations as to why the USSR had chosen to publicize these documents after a lapse of three years. One explanation was that Khrushchev wanted to remind the Soviet public of the serious nuclear threat. Others claimed that it was designed to distract public opinion, which had focused on the Berlin crisis at that time. Just when it looked as if the matter had been forgotten, the Soviet consul-general in İstanbul, Volov, briefed the Turkish press on the subject of the documents, without obtaining permission from the authorities. The Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs informed the ambassador that the consul-general had exceeded his competence and his responsibility in publicizing documents on Turkish soil implicating Turkey and therefore violated international law and diplomatic etiquette. The crisis was eventually overcome without doing serious damage to bilateral relations, because the two sides acted in a positive manner and also because the incident involved the two blocs and only concerned bilateral relations indirectly.

The removal of the Jupiter missiles following the Cuban crisis removed an impediment to the development of relations. In 1963 a parliamentary delegation led by Suat Hayri Ürgüplü, Speaker of the TGNA, went to the USSR from 29 May to 14 June 1963. This trip was significant, when it is borne in mind that all initiatives emanating from Moscow had been systematically rejected by Turkey since the 1950s. Otherwise the visit produced nothing concrete. As a matter of fact, Turkey was wary of receiving Soviet aid that might be accompanied by Soviet experts.

The minister of foreign affairs, Feridun Cemal Erkin, paid an official visit from 30 October to 6 November 1964. This was the first visit by a Turkish foreign minister to the USSR after a lapse of twenty-five years and was regarded as a turning point in the relations between the two states.

Actually, the visit had been planned for 23 March 1964, but the Cyprus crisis brought about a postponement. After the intensification of the crisis in August, it was decided not to postpone the visit any further. Greece, the champion of enosis, enjoyed the support of both Britain and the U.S. Cyprus had just signed a trade agreement with the USSR. Turkey was confronted with a dangerous situation in which its allies had left it isolated, while Makarios was gaining the support of the USSR. Furthermore, Turkey was the only NATO member that had not yet improved its relations with the USSR. Two weeks before the visit, Khrushchev was replaced by Brezhnev, but both sides displayed their determination by not putting off the visit once again.

During the visit, Erkin had talks with Anastas Mikoyan (president of the Presidium), prime minister A. N. Kosygin, minister of foreign affairs A. A. Gromyko, and minister of foreign trade N. S. Patolichev. He was assured by Kosygin that the USSR was not supplying arms to Makarios. The Turkish-Soviet Cultural and Scientific Cooperation Agreement was signed on 5 November. The visit came to an end the next day with a joint communiqué. The agreement that was signed got stalled for a long time in the TGNA because of opposition from the Nation Party (Millet Partisi).

When he returned to Turkey Minister Erkin addressed the TGNA. First, he first gave a summary of the Turkish-Soviet relations since World War II and then outlined his talks in Moscow. The postwar problems between the two countries had their origins in the anti-NATO policy of the USSR as well as the policy it followed in the Middle East, where Turkey took initiatives to secure the defense of the region.

Second, Erkin touched upon the Cuban crisis, during which the USSR had tried to make a deal over the medium-range missiles in Turkey but had given up when the Turkish and U.S. governments resisted. Later on, when removal of the missiles became a matter to be considered, Turkey adopted a constructive approach that made a solution possible.

Third, Erkin reminded the TGNA of the letter sent by Khrushchev to President Gürsel on 28 June 1960, in which he declared for the first time that Turkish membership in NATO was not an obstacle for improved bilateral relations.

Fourth, as for the results of his visit to Moscow, Erkin pointed out that the agreement signed on cultural cooperation was less comprehensive than similar agreements concluded between other NATO countries and the USSR.

Finally, after mentioning the decision in principle made to increase bilateral trade during his talks with the minister of trade, Erkin came to the subject of Cyprus. He recalled that there were divergent views on this matter before the visit and added that differences had now been overcome. "A noteworthy similarity of views" (Tellal,

p. 224) was achieved, as reflected in this passage from the joint communique:

[A]s stated in the Charter of the United Nations, respect for commitments arising from agreements and the other sources of international law, recognition of the equality of the rights of nations large and small, and respect for basic human rights are essential for developing international cooperation and strengthening and preserving peace.

The Turkish side has provided the Soviet government with detailed information regarding the Turkish position with respect to the question of Cyprus. The two sides have declared that they favor a peaceful solution of the Cyprus question based on respect for the independence and territorial integrity of Cyprus and for the legitimate rights of the two national communities and recognition of the existence of two national communities on the island. (Tellal, pp. 287–88)

For the first time since World War II, Turkey and the USSR were able to share the same view on a regional issue like the question of Cyprus as it presented itself in 1964. At least the two countries' positions were not opposed.

This visit proved very fruitful in a number of ways. Turkey had secured the backing of the USSR on the question of Cyprus. A cultural agreement had been signed by the two states. It also paved the way for other high-level visits that were to follow. The visit was an important turning point and indicated that relations were becoming normal and that cooperation could begin.

c. Cooperation (1965-1980)

From 1965 until the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, Turkish-Soviet relations included high-level visits in both directions, the conclusion of two important agreements, economic aid to Turkey from the USSR, and the opening of an era of broad-ranging cooperation.

1. High-Level Visits

Following the visit to the USSR of the parliamentary delegation led by Urgüplü, a delegation of ten Soviet parliamentarians visited Turkey from 4 to 13 January 1965. The head of the delegation was N. V. Podgorny, a member of the Supreme Presidium of the Soviet Union, who addressed the TGNA on 5 January. During the course of the visit, Turkey announced that it was reversing its original decision and would not participate in NATO's multilateral nuclear force (MLF). The U.S. nuclear-powered vessel Savannah was denied permission to visit İstanbul. In return, the USSR was asked to support a Cyprus solution based on federation. Following the visit, Soviet foreign minister Gromyko made a statement to the newspaper Izvestiya in which he announced that the USSR supported Turkey's thesis of federations. The USSR had revised its Cyprus policy.

The second visit, from 17 to 22 May 1965, was by Gromyko. This was the first visit by a Soviet foreign minister after Litvinov's visit in 1931. In April, prior to the visit, Ambassador Ryzhov proposed the renewal of the 1925 Treaty of Friendship. The offer was repeated during the visit, but Turkey did not look favorably on the proposal. The minister of foreign affairs, Hasan Esat Işık, informed the OECD aid consortium that Turkey could turn to other countries that were not members of the consortium for loans, including the USSR. The visit ended on 22 May with the release of a joint communiqué.

From 9 to 16 August 1965 Prime Minister Ürgüplü visited the USSR. Thus the visit that Menderes had been scheduled to make took place after a delay of five years. During this visit, the two sides discussed Soviet economic aid and the question of Cyprus and signed a cultural cooperation agreement. The decision to expand trade relations was reflected in the joint communiqué released on 16 August. "Furthermore, the parties have reached an understanding to maintain trade exchange between the two countries at a high level. The Turkish side shall procure from the Soviet Union machinery and equipment for the purpose of establishing industrial enterprises, while the Soviet side shall increase its purchase of commodities from Turkey" (Disisleri Belleteni 11 [August 1965]: 69).

On 30 September a Soviet delegation with twenty-two members came to Turkey to hold talks on the USSR's economic aid. On 7 December the preliminary agreement regarding Soviet aid was signed. When Demirel became prime minister after the elections of October 1965, he proceeded more cautiously in his relations with the USSR. The ratification of the cultural cooperation agreement was delayed. Demirel opposed the purchase of oil from the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, there was a significant development in relations during the Demirel-Çağlayangil era.

Kosygin's visit on 20 to 27 December 1966 was the first visit by a Soviet prime minister to Turkey. At the talks, Turkey raised the issue of Czechoslovak weapons being provided to the Makarios administration. Kosygin disclaimed any responsibility for Czechoslovakia's actions. He also disclaimed responsibility for the broadcast of Bizim Radyo (Our Radio), which was beaming Communist propaganda to Turkey, because the radio stations were located in East Germany. The reference to the Vietnam War in the joint communiqué was considered to be a Soviet diplomatic success. Demirel rejected the Soviet offer to sell oil. Kosygin's visit demonstrated that the warming of bilateral relations was not dependent on the question of Cyprus but was rather based on long-term economic benefits for both countries.

The Economic and Technical Cooperation Agreement of 25 March 1967 was an important milestone in the development of bilateral relations. This was followed by Prime Minister Demirel's visit to Moscow from 19 to 29 September 1967. With the visit by Çağlayangil, the minister of foreign affairs, from 8 to 12 July 1968, high-level visits became a routine affair. Even though the visit to Moscow of the delegation headed by Senate president I.Ş. Atasagun was postponed after the Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia in August 1968 and Turkey's announcement of its participation in the Multilateral Force to be established in the Mediterranean and agreement to sign the Defense Cooperation Agreement with the U.S. on 3 July 1969, President Sunay proceeded with his visit to the USSR from 12 to 21 November 1969. This was the first time a Turkish head of state visited the USSR. He was accompanied by a delegation of thirty-four officials, including Minister Çağlayangil. With the release of the joint communiqué on 21 November 1969, it became clear that relations were developing on the basis of economic cooperation.

As relations with the USSR improved in the 1960s, relations with the U.S. took a turn for the worse. On the question of improved relations with the USSR, there was no difference between the policies of the Justice Party and the CHP. Several factors were responsible for the improved relations. One was détente, and the other was the diminished Soviet security concerns over the Straits after the development of intercontinental ballistic missiles. Another factor was the USSR's aloofness during the suppression of national leftist movements in countries like Iraq, Syria, Iran, and Turkey. The USSR did nothing while these groups were being suppressed because it was aware that any move on its part would spoil relations with these countries and possibly provoke a U.S. intervention. The most striking instance was the Soviet reaction to the 12 March 1971 memorandum in Turkey. After the memorandum, Nihat Erim formed two governments, one in March and the other in December. The minister of foreign affairs in his first government was Osman Olcay, deputy secretary-general of NATO. This was interpreted as a sign of the importance attached to relations with the U.S. The foreign minister in the second government was Haluk Bayülken, who pursued the same policies as his predecessor. As in 1960, Moscow followed a "wait and see" course. Although the Soviet press was critical of the persecution of leftists, this did not affect relations adversely. At a time when leftist movements were being hounded, Podgorny came to Turkey and signed a document with his Turkish hosts. This was an indication that in bilateral relations the USSR was really sticking to the policy of not interfering in domestic affairs.

2. The Declarations on the Principles of Good Neighborliness of 1972

On 11–17 April 1972 Podgorny, the president of the Supreme Soviet Presidium, visited Turkey. In the course of this visit, the Declaration on the Principles of Good Neighborliness was signed. Consisting of eight paragraphs, this document was one of the indications of the good relations between the two countries. One of the members of the Soviet delegation was Gen. V. G. Kulikov, first deputy minister of defense and chief of the General Staff. His presence caused some irritation in Turkey. The Soviet proposals for cooperation in the military field and the renewal of the 1925 treaty were considered premature by the Turkish side. The question of Bizim Radyo was raised once again, but the Soviets again denied responsibility.

The content of the declaration was drawn from the twelve-paragraph declaration of basic principles signed by the U.S. and the USSR during Nixon's visit to Moscow in June, as well as the articles contained in the CSCE. "They declare that the following principles will guide the bilateral and international relations of their countries... (4) Noninterference in the internal affair of states; (5) Respect for the inalienable right of all countries to choose and develop their own political, economic, social, and cultural systems; (6) Nonrecourse to force or to the threat of force and abstention from using one's territory for aggression or subversive activities directed at another state." Articles 4, 5, and 6 signified that the bases located on Turkish soil could not be used for aggressive purposes, while the USSR agreed not to support the Communist currents in Turkey. The disorder experienced in Turkey, especially during the 1970s, had always been attributed to the USSR, whereas now the USSR was rejecting these allegations by giving formal assurances through the declaration.

"(7) Respect for obligations arising from treaties and the other sources of international law; (8) Resolving international disputes through peaceful means." On 16 April Podgorny arranged a dinner in Nihat Erim's honor at which he declared that articles 7 and 8 should be understood to mean that the USSR supported Turkey on the question of Cyprus. The joint communiqué released following the visit contained references to the common position of two countries on Cyprus.

Further economic and political developments followed the declaration. Minister of state Zeyyad Baykara, who was in Moscow in December 1972 on the occasion of the commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of the USSR, signed an agreement for the expansion of the İskenderun Iron and Steelworks. This was followed by two Technical Protocols, one signed on 17 April 1973 to delineate the frontier between Turkish and Soviet territorial waters in the Black Sea and the other signed on 29 December to demarcate the border between the two countries better.

Although the Cyprus events of 1974 affected relations, they were not decisive. The USSR supported the first intervention but opposed the second. Moscow held the view that the question should be resolved within an international framework. The USSR took into consideration that Greece had left the military structure of NATO and the danger of Cyprus being partitioned that emerged after Turkey took possession of 35% of the island. Still, the USSR was very circumspect in its reaction to Turkey's Cyprus operation and avoided condemning it. Moscow stressed the independence, integrity, nonalignment, and the equal rights of the two peoples of the island. Turkey's military presence on the island was creating problems within NATO, so in a sense the USSR was benefiting by the question of Cyprus remaining unresolved. The question of Cyprus contained two important elements: Makarios and his nonalignment and the AKEL, the oldest Communist party in the Middle East. Nevertheless, Cyprus never had a decisive effect on relations with the USSR, because it was a source of discord between Turkey and its allies.

When the U.S. imposed its arms embargo on Turkey in February 1975, this created security concerns for Turkey. On 9 September 1975 ambassador A.A. Rodionov was received by President Korutürk. The two men noted with satisfaction the development of bilateral relations. During a visit to Denmark on 10 December, Ecevit, the leader of the CHP, had made a reference to the possibility of Turkey signing a nonaggression pact with some of its neighbors. This was followed by the visit of Prime Minister Kosygin to Turkey from 26 to 29 December 1975. Kosygin participated in the opening ceremony of the Iskenderun Iron and Steelworks on 28 December and made proposals for stepping up cooperation.

Starting in 1976, cooperation also extended into the military field. Previously, permission had been given for Soviet planes bound for Egypt to fly through Turkish airspace during the October 1973 war. Now Turkish experts were invited to the military exercise code-named Caucasus, to be conducted from 25 January to 6 February 1976 by Soviet units on the territory of Georgia and Armenia. After observing the exercise, Turkish military personnel visited Moscow, where they met with Soviet minister of defense A.A. Grechko. This was followed by the visit in April 1976 of the deputy chief of the General Staff, Kenan Evren, to the USSR, accompanied by a large delegation. This military cooperation took place on the basis of the first basket of the CSCE's Final Act of Helsinki, which included "Confidence Building Measures and Documents Relating to Some Aspects of Security and Disarmament" (see Box 5-1 above). According to this document, signatories engaging in large military exercises were to inform the other signatories of the nature and content of the exercises and were to invite their military observers to attend. After 1976 both countries conformed to this arrangement. On 28 April 1979 Turkey allowed the Soviet aircraft carrier Kiev to sail through the Straits, although this was not foreseen under the regime of the Turkish Straits (see "The Issue of the Turkish Straits" in Section 6).

When Çağlayangil, the Turkish minister of foreign affairs, went to the USSR on 13–18 March 1977, the question of arms procurements from the Soviet Union also came up, but Ankara was not prepared to take this course. During this visit, the Agreement for the Development of Turkish-Soviet Economic Cooperation, the Agreement for Scientific and Technical Cooperation, and the Agreement for the Prevention of the Highjacking of Civilian Aircraft were signed. It was also decided to sign a political document that would determine the level of bilateral relations.

The Political Document on Good Neighborliness and Friendly Cooperation of 1978

In the late 1970s the new perception was that the real threat to Turkey came not from the north but from the west. When the budget of the Ministry of Foreign Affair was being debated in the TGNA on 23 February 1978, Haluk Ülman, speaking on behalf of the CHP, declared that the threat to Turkey came from Greece. In April 1978 Marshal N. V. Ogarkov, chief of the Soviet General Staff, visited Turkey. The last time that such a visit had taken place was in 1920s. The first invitation had been issued in June 1977 by the Demirel government. The invitation was renewed by the Ecevit government in February 1978 at a time when the Carter administration was seeking to have the U.S. Congress lift the arms embargo on Turkey. Ogarkov announced that the USSR was ready to provide arms aid to Turkey. The Justice Party was opposed to procuring Soviet arms, however. The JP's reasoning was: if Moscow is not a source of threat, what are we doing in NATO?

As these arguments went on, Prime Minister Ecevit went to the USSR on 21-25 June 1978. Before his visit to Moscow, Ecevit had been to Washington on 29 May, when Carter had indicated that the arms embargo would be lifted. Nevertheless, Ecevit did not postpone his visit to the Soviet Union and went ahead and signed three agreements on 23 June. The first was a political document that had been prepared in the final weeks of the Demirel government. It was based on the 1972 declaration of principles and also incorporated the principles of the CSCE's final act. The second instrument signed was a cultural protocol. Finally, there was the Agreement for the Delimitation of the Continental Shelf in the Black Sea, which was traced along the median line, as proposed by Turkey. On 24 June a three-year economic and trade cooperation protocol was signed along with the joint communiqué. It provided for the conclusion of three-year protocols to regulate trade relations. The USSR was to sell Turkey 3 million tons of petroleum annually, amounting to a quarter of Turkey's import requirements. Therefore the political significance of this transaction was greater than its economic importance.

In the second half of the 1970s a greater rapprochement with the USSR might have been expected as a consequence of the U.S. arms embargo, but several factors prevented this from happening. The second Cyprus intervention had caused apprehension in the USSR. Another factor was the firmly anti-Soviet stance of the Nationalist Action Party, which was a coalition partner in both the Nationalist Front-1 and Nationalist Front-2 governments. Finally, the military bases in Turkey were reopened for American use following the rescinding of the U.S. arms embargo, two months after the signing of the political document. This was followed by the USSR's military intervention in Afghanistan in December 1979. Turkey was among the countries that strongly condemned the intervention and gave sanctuary to thousands of Afghan refugees. The occupation of Afghanistan had an adverse effect on U.S.-Soviet relations and also caused serious concern in Turkey, leading to warmer relations with the U.S. after 1980.

To sum up, Turkey's relations with the USSR improved as a consequence of the Cyprus question and the cooling of relations with the U.S. and the EEC. They tended to worsen, however, as a result of Turkey's domestic politics. The turmoil in Turkey was being attributed to Soviet action. Many people made no attempt to differentiate between the Turkish Communist Party, which was closely aligned to Moscow, and the other leftist groups. As a matter of fact, Turkey had several leftist organizations, antagonistic to one another; unlike the general public, the state was able to differentiate among them. One of the pillars of the modern Turkish state was anti-communism. To the extent that this was not equated with antagonism toward the Soviet Union, it was possible for bilateral relations to improve. Although Demirel initially proceeded with caution, there was no substantial difference between the policies of the CHP and the JP in regard to improved relations with the USSR. Among the governments in the 1970s, only the Ecevit administration's programs explicitly mentioned improvement of relations with the USSR. The Melen government formed in May 1972 and the Nationalist Front-2 government formed in July 1977 had programs stating that international communism was bent on overthrowing the regime in Turkey and that all the necessary measures would be taken to combat this menace. At the same time, the programs contained the view that good relations with the USSR benefited both countries and would contribute to the preservation of peace in the region. Relations were also developing with Bulgaria, Romania, Yugoslavia, Hungary, and Albania. In view of this, it can be said that in the 1970s belated relations developed positively within the framework of the CSCE. Economic relations made a major contribution to this development.

III. ECONOMIC RELATIONS

Starting in the 1960s, trade relations between Turkey and the USSR were conducted on the basis of bilateral clearing agreements.

Another dimension of economic relations was the economic aid and credits being obtained from the USSR. The desire to establish links with the USSR originated from the Turkish commercial bourgeoisie, which was seeking new markets. The trade delegation that visited Moscow in October and November 1960 made a contribution to the development of trade ties. Starting in 1960, a Soviet enterprise was awarded the contract for the expansion of Sümerbank's Shoe and Leather Goods Factory at Beykoz. The plate-glass factory at Çayırova, which had given rise to controversy in 1957, was inaugurated on 23 May 1961.

The government of the National Unity Committee that was formed after the 27 May 1960 coup and the succeeding coalition government turned down the offers of aid and investment coming from the USSR. But the implementation of the First Five-Year Development Plan starting in 1963, the inadequacy of credits coming from

S.B.F. EUTUPHANESI the West, and the efforts to attain the targets set in the plan led once again to consideration of the idea of seeking loans from the USSR. The first time this had been considered was during the final phase of the Menderes government. In 1962 Coşkun Kırca, speaking on behalf of the CHP in the TGNA, drew attention to the fact that the USSR was providing loans to developing countries and the repayment of these loans was effected through the sale of agricultural products to the USSR. In an address to military cadets, Cemal Gürsel noted on 14 June 1962 that the USSR could also furnish aid to Turkey. These remarks appeared in the press on 20 July but led to no changes in Turkey's policies. Soviet offers of aid were renewed in 1963 during the visit of the Turkish parliamentary delegation and also by Ambassador Ryzhov. They also came up during Erkin's visit in 1964 and in subsequent visits.

In 1967 Turkey started accepting Soviet offers of credits and aid. The Economic and Technical Cooperation Agreement signed on 25 March 1967 provided funds for the establishment of seven industrial plants. Among these were the petroleum refinery at Aliaga, the aluminum factory at Seydişehir, the sulphuric acid factory at Banduma, the lumber factory at Artvin, and the iron and steelworks at İskenderun. The development of economic relations contributed to the growth of the Turkish economy, which attained 6.4% in 1968 and 9% in 1969. These relations also helped in alleviating the deficit in Turkey's foreign accounts. The volume of trade with the USSR grew from $17 million in 1964 to $44.5 million in 1966. By the end of the 1960s the number of Soviet economic advisors in Turkey had reached 1,000, and Turkey became one of the largest recipients of Soviet aid among the developing countries.

The industrial plants established under the terms of the March 1967 agreement have been criticized on the grounds that their technology was obsolete. Even if true, this allegation is unjustified. To begin with, Turkey was not able to obtain these industrial plants from its allies. Second, the plants made an important contribution to Turkey's industrialization. It should also be borne in mind that this was the technology at the disposal of the USSR at that time. It was a case of doing the best with what was available, and it would be wrong to claim that the results were all bad.

Relations were maintained during the 1970s, when Turkey was in the throes of a serious economic crisis. On 10 August 1970 the Turkish lira was devalued from 9 TL to the dollar to 15. Starting in the second half of the 1960s, Turkey's foreign trade deficit grew to alarming proportions. This deficit could be managed up to 1974 thanks to workers' remittances. When these remittances could no longer cover the deficit after 1975, it became impossible to import even the most essential requirements. In addition to the trade deficit, the balance of payments had to contend with the rise in oil prices following the energy crisis of 1973, the financial burden imposed by the Cyprus crisis, and the arms embargo that resulted from this crisis.

As the projects foreseen in the March 1967 agreement were gradually completed, new projects were undertaken in the second half of the 1970s. After the second Economic and Technical Cooperation Agreement was signed on 9 June 1975, Prime Minister Kosygin visited Turkey in December. Under the terms of the agreement, $700 million in industrial investment was to be carried out over a period of five years. Repayment would be effected over ten to twelve years, and the rate of interest was set at 3 to 4%. The capacity of the İskenderun steelworks would be raised from 1 million tons per annum to 4 million tons by 1980. The aluminum plant at Seydişehir would be expanded, and coal-fired power plants would be constructed at Çan and Orhaneli.

Until 1976 the economic and technical cooperation was carried out on the basis of individual projects. In 1976 a Joint Commission was set up to oversee the cooperation. In 1977 a ten-year economic aid agreement was signed in the amount of $1.3 billion. In addition to the growing trade volume, by 1978 Turkey was the country that received the largest amount of Soviet aid among the developing countries. At the joint Turkish-Soviet Economic Cooperation Commission that held its third session in Moscow on 14 to 19 October 1978, a protocol was signed that provided for $3.8 billion in external resources. With the agreement signed on 5 June 1979, Turkish-Soviet economic relations reached their peak. This agreement foresaw a package of aid and credits amounting to $8 billion, which included the construction of a nuclear power plant and the expansion of existing refineries, steelworks, and aluminum plants.

The USSR provided Turkey only with project loans. Their rate of interest was more favorable than the rates of Western loans, and they were repaid with commodities. Since the aid went directly to industrialization projects, it contributed to long-term development. From 1967 to 1981 Soviet loans reached a total of $972,610,000. Starting in the 1960s, Turkey became one of the few countries receiving aid from both superpowers.

EREL TELLAL

Sources (Relations with the USSR).

- Altan, Mehmet. Süperler ve Türkiye. İstanbul: Afa Yayınları, 1986.
- Armaoğlu, Fahir. "1974 Cyprus Crisis and the Soviets." Foreign Policy 4, nos. 2–3 (1975): 178–83.
- Bilge, Suat. Güç Komşuluk, Türkiye-Sovyetler Birliği İlişkileri, 1920–1964. Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası Kültür Yayınları, 1992.
- Boll, Michael M. "Turkey's New National Security Concept: What It Means for NATO." ORBIS 23, no. 3 (Fall 1979): 609–31.
- Chauvier, Jean-Marie. Sovyetler Birliği: Ekonomik ve Siyasi Gelişmeler (1917/1988) (original title: URSS: Une Société en Mouvement). Trans. Temel Keşoğlu. İstanbul: BDS Yayınları, 1990.
- Cutler, Robert M. "Domestic and Foreign Influences on Foreign Policy Making: The Soviet Union in the 1974 Cyprus Conflict." Soviet Studies 37, no. 1 (Jan. 1985): 60–89.
- Disisleri Belleteni 11 (Aug. 1965): 67–70.
- Golan, Galia. Soviet Policies in the Middle East from World War Two to Gorbachev. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.

- Knudsen, Olav Fagelund. "Did Accommodation Work? Two Soviet Neighbours 1964–88." Journal of Peace Research 29, no. 1 (1992): 53–69.
- Ok, Mustafa. Niçin Türk-Sovyet Saldırmazlık Paktı. Ankara: Maya Matbaacılık, 1976.
- Public Record Office (PRO) of Great Britain. Ankara to Foreign Office, 16.10.1960, FO 371/153041; Ankara to Foreign Office, 21.10.1960, FO 371/153039.
- Sander, Oral. Siyasi Tarih, 1918–1994. 4th ed. Ankara: İmge,
- Sönmezoğlu, Faruk, et al. Uluslararası İlişkiler Sözlüğü. İstanbul: Cem Yayınevi, 1992.
- Sosyalizm ve Toplumsal Mücadeleler Ansiklopedisi (STMA). 8 vols. İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 1988.
- Tellal, Erel. SSCB-Türkiye İlişkileri, 1953–1964. Ankara: Mülki-yeliler Birliği Vakfı Yayınları, 2000.
- Wallace, Cissy E. G. "Soviet Economic and Technical Cooperation with Developing Countries: The Turkish Case." Ph.D. dissertation, London School of Economics, 1990.

Relations with the Middle East

I. RELATIONS WITH ARAB STATES

Turkey's relations with Arab states underwent great changes in the 1960s. Developments in Turkey's political situation and changes in the world forced Turkey to review its foreign policy. This in turn affected Turkey's ties with the Arab states. At this time, the Arab states were undergoing a structural transformation that led to drastic changes in Turkey's policies compared to the 1950s. Formerly, Turkey played an active role in the Middle East, acting as the spokesperson of the West. These policies were unsuccessful and yielded no results. Now there was a regional policy designed to develop bilateral relations with Arab states based on equality and mutual respect. Turkey had to expend efforts over a whole decade to overcome the bitterness of the Arab states occasioned by its policies during the 1950s.

The process of reviewing past policies started after the coup of 27 May 1960, when all aspects of the DP government's policies came under critical appraisal. In the atmosphere of freedom prevailing after the adoption of the 1961 Constitution, the tradition of keeping foreign policy above partisan politics was abandoned; these issues began to be debated by the public. Another cause for change was the advent of détente. As the intensity of the Cold War began to abate, intrabloc differences emerged and the question of Cyprus flared up between Turkey and Greece once again. Turkey became aware of its isolation among the newly independent countries, which now made up the majority of the international community. To remedy this situation, priority was accorded to mending fences with neighboring Arab states.

The 1960s were years of structural change for the Arab states. The traditional order was being shaken by young officers who seized power in Iraq and Syria to modernize their backward societies. This process started in 1952 in Egypt and resulted in Nasser assuming a leadership role in the Arab world. In the 1950s Nasserism became the ideology of the modernizers of the regions. In the 1960s the Baath movement, describing itself as socialist and Arabnationalist, came to the fore in Iraq and Syria and freed these countries from Nasser's influence (Box 5-16).

A. A Different Way of Seeing the Arab States after the Coup of 27 May

The officers who seized power on 27 May 1960 worried that the U.S. might misinterpret the coup and intervene in Turkey on the basis of the 1959 agreement. To prevent such an intervention, the declaration issued on 27 May laid particular stress on loyalty to NATO and CENTO. It was obvious that the new administration had no intention of bringing radical change in Turkey's foreign policy. The new leadership was uncomfortable with the policies of its predecessors toward those countries carrying out national liberation struggles, however, bearing in mind that Turkey itself had emerged from a successful war of national liberation. It wanted to put Turkey's relations with the nonaligned countries, and the Third World in general, on a new basis.

The Turkish government's program of 11 July 1960 merely mentioned that development of relations with the Middle East would be given priority. But a clearer Middle Eastern policy on the issue of Algeria's war of independence, much different from that of the DP, was announced a short while later. On 16 September 1960 a group of members of the National Unity Committee (MBK) issued a declaration that in the future Turkey would support those nations waging wars of national liberation and in this context would support Algerians in their war against France. The next day, head of state Cemal Gürsel recalled that Turkey had emerged from a war of national survival, so it was only natural that it should support Algeria. He also offered to mediate between France and the Algerian nationalists. The Algerian side accepted the offer, but France refrained from giving a formal reply.

The new Turkish administration's approach to the Algerian question was well received in Arab capitals.

Box 5-16. The Baath Movement

The Baath Party was established in Damascus in 1940 by Michel Eflak, a Greek Orthodox Christian, and Selahaddin Bitar, a Sunni Muslim, "Baath" means rebirth in Arabic. Political parties that wished to bring about an Arab renaissance by pursuing the path of Arab socialism called themselves Baath. Following the slogan of "unity, freedom, socialism," the Baath movement wanted to establish an Arab society that was united, secular, and governed according to socialist tenets. The ideology could be described as nationalist and socialist, but with an Arab interpretation. The Baath ideology accepted Arab unity as its basic premise and concluded that the borders separating Arab nations had been imposed by colonialists and had to be eliminated.

The Baath movement rejected all religious and sectarian cleavages and developed an understanding of nationalism based on Arab unity, but it was not anti-Islamic. On the contrary, Baath Ideology accepted Islam as a fundamental and inseparable part of Arab culture. But contrary to Sunni Arab nationalists, the Baathists considered Islam to be not a national religion of the Arabs but an important component of their national cultural heritage. Islam was the essence of Arab nationalism, and when Christian Arabs fully assimilated nationalist sentiments, they would understand that the essence of Arabism is Islam.

Baath socialism was also laden with Arab motifs. It rejected Marxism and internationalism. According to the Baath Ideology, socialism had to be national: an individual could not be revolutionary without being nationalistic. According to Bitar, it was not the concept of class warfare that was going to mobilize the masses of Asia and Africa against colonialism but national unity. Bitar also accepted, however, that a national socialist revolution could not be carried out without applying Marxist principles to economic planning. Baathist socialism accepted private property and based its philosophy on the principles of fair distribution of income, the close control of internal and external trade, restrictions on land ownership for the public good, the nationalization of mines and natural resources, economic development through central planning, and workers' participation in the management of enterprises.

In 1963 the Baathists came to power in Iraq and Syria. The military took power in Syria in 1966. On 21 November 1970 Hafez Assad came to power in a coup and remained at the helm until his death. The Baathists carried out another coup in Iraq in 1968, when Gen. Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr became head of state and Saddam Hussein vice-president. Another coup in 1979 brought Saddam Hussein to the top.

(M. FIRAT)

But Turkey itself was in a dilemma. The members of the CNU felt that they had seized power to further Atatürk's reforms and used every opportunity to reiterate their support for the Algerian nationalists out of respect for Turkey's history and tradition. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs, however, was fully aware of the complications that would result from a confrontation with Turkey's NATO ally France, also bearing in mind Turkey's application for membership in the European Common Market. That is why no tangible action was taken on the Algerian issue, with support confined to the verbal level. But Turkey did support the UN resolutions of 20 December 1961 that called for self-determination for the Algerians. Turkey was formulating its foreign policy on the basis of a new approach compared to the policies of the DP government. The Turkish intelligentsia was also in favor of supporting wars of national liberation and developing relations with the nonaligned countries.

The change of approach to the Middle East that appeared after 27 May found its reflection in day-to-day relations only after a time lag. The administration that came to power in Syria following the coup of 29 September 1961 decided to break away from the United Arab Republic formed with Egypt in 1958. Turkey declared this to be Syria's internal affair and recognized the new administration in Damascus, in second place after Jordan. When this position is compared with the position taken by the DP government that contemplated intervening in Iraq after the coup of 1958, the change in Turkey's Middle Eastern policy becomes very clear. Turkey's decision to recognize the new Syrian administration did not go well in Cairo, however, and Egypt broke diplomatic relations with Turkey on 30 September Turkey was somewhat more apprehensive about developments in Iraq. Ankara was following closely Gen. Abdulkarim Kassem's efforts to reinforce his hold on power by seeking the support of Communists and Kurds and developing Iraq's relations with the USSR. Unlike the DP government, the regime set up in Turkey after 27 May had gone back to the tough Kurdish policies of the past. On 1 June 1960 it arrested 485 Kurds and sent them to a camp in Sivas. After being detained there for four months, fifty-five clan elders and chieftains were sent into exile in the western provinces under the terms of a law enacted on 19 October 1960. When Kassem made concessions to the Kurds of Iraq, Ankara grew concerned over the possibility that this might encourage the Kurds in Turkey to make demands for similar treatment.

In April 1962 there was a parting of ways between the Kurds of northern Iraq and the Kassem regime, when they resorted to arms under the leadership of Mullah Mustafa Barzani. The Kurds quickly took control of their region and declared their intention to establish an independent Kurdish Republic in northern Iraq. Turkey was pleased to

Box 5-17. The Kurdish Rebellion in Northern Iraq, 1962-1975

After Iraq gained independence in 1932, the Kurds of northern Iraq under their leader Mullah Mustafa Barzani started clamoring for an independent Kurdish state in their region. Barzani escaped from detention in Suleymaniyah in 1943, returned to his region, and went into action. When the Kurdish Republic of Mahabad was established in 1946 in northern Iran, then under Soviet occupation, Barzani left Iraq with ten thousand armed tribesmen and crossed into Mahabad. After the USSR evacuated northern Iran the next year, the Tehran administration got rid of the Kurdish state, whereupon Barzani returned to Iraq. He was unable to hold on in his region, however, and took refuge in the USSR with five hundred of his peshmerga fighters. Barzani stayed there for eleven years and only returned to Iraq in 1958 following the coup in Baghdad, when Kassem improved his relations with the USSR. After Kassem failed to honor his pledge to give the Kurds autonomy, an uprising broke out under the leadership of Barzani, it continued until 1970. Moscow persuaded Saddam to grant the Kurds autonomy and, in return, promised to support Iraq. The autonomy plan was announced on 11 March 1970. (1) In the northern region of Iraq where the Kurds were concentrated, they would have an autonomous administration. (2) They would be represented in the central government, and one of the vice-presidents would be a Kurd. (3) The three oil fields in northern Iraq would be placed under the supervision of the Kurds as of 1974. Baghdad was signaling in a roundabout way that autonomy would come in four years.

After this announcement, the USSR and Iraq signed a fifteenyear Friendship and Good Neighborliness Treaty on 9 April 1972. Barzani was summoned to Moscow and told to end all rebellious antigovernment activities. This new situation in Iraq created some nervousness in Iran and Israel. When Moscow's aid to the Kurds dried up, Iran stepped in. With Washington's approval, Tehran established contacts with Barzani and gave promises of aid. Israel had already promised to provide him with weapons.

In 1972 the Kurds rebelled once again in northern Iraq. Iran entered into negotiations with Baghdad, which was ready to reach an agreement on condition that the aid given to the Kurds would cease to flow. The agreement of Algiers was signed on 6 March 1975. Iran would stop its aid to the Kurds and get border rectifications in its favor in return.

On 7 March Baghdad sent its army into action against the Kurds, giving rise to refugee problems. The fleeing Kurds began to amass on the Turkish and Iranian borders. When Iran closed its border, a massacre of Kurds by the Iraqi army took place. The fifteen-year-old rebellion was finally suppressed. Barzani had sought U.S. aid and led the rebellion in 1972, relying on Washington's promises; but now that the conditions had changed, he could no longer make himself heard in Washington. Mullah Mustafa Barzani dled in the U.S. in 1979 without having brought autonomy or independence to his people. He had been used first by the USSR and then by the U.S. and Iran. His son Masud Barzani would emerge under different circumstances in the 1990s as the leader of one of the Kurdish factions in northern Iraq. He would rely on the U.S. and collaborate with Turkey from time to time against the PKK.

(M. Firat)

see the Iraqi regime in trouble but was fearful of a similar uprising by its own Kurdish population. The uprising in Iraq did not spill over into Turkey, however, as Ankara took no direct action; but the uprising and the efforts to suppress it gave rise to numerous incidents that strained bilateral relations (Box 5-17).

On 8 July 1962 two Iraqi aircraft entered Turkish airspace and bombed the town of Gerür in the vicinity of Hakkari. When Turkey protested, Iraq announced that this action was the result of an error and would not recur. But on 15 August a similar incident occurred when Iraqi aircraft carried out a further attack in the region of Hakkari, leading to the death of three Turkish soldiers. Iraq was having difficulty in fully suppressing the Kurdish uprising and accused Turkey of supporting the separatist Kurds. The next day, Turkish aircraft fired on the Iraqi aircraft that had intruded into Turkish airspace. These incidents caused tension between Ankara and Baghdad, but this did not last for long.

Turkey steered clear of the numerous attempted coups that took place in Iraq and Syria. At the time, Turkey was seeking to establish internal political stability by thwarting the coup attempts of Col. Talat Aydemir and pursued a cautious policy toward its Arab neighbors by not getting involved in their internal affairs. It was at this juncture that the Cyprus question flared up and drew Turkey's attention in that direction.

The question of Cyprus revealed to Ankara the consequences of its Arab policies of the 1950s. The Arab countries refused to side with Turkey either at the second conference of the nonaligned in October 1964 or at the Twentieth Session of the UN General Assembly when the issue was debated on 16 December 1965. They were solidly behind the government of Cyprus, headed by Makarios.

Before the voting in the General Assembly, Turkey had sent goodwill missions to explain the Turkish position on Cyprus to nonaligned countries, including Algeria, Morocco, Iraq, Kuwait, Libya, Lebanon, Syria, Tunisia, and Jordan. But it was too much to expect that a single such visit seeking support on Cyprus might bring the Arab countries to change their foreign policies. The vote in the General Assembly on 16 December 1965 was the most crushing defeat suffered by Turkey on the Cyprus question and clearly revealed the failure of Ankara's policies. After this, Turkey no longer confined itself to ineffective methods like the sending of goodwill missions and undertook changes in its foreign policies designed to develop political, economic, and cultural relations with the Arab States.

B. The Period of Rapprochement (1965–1971)

The Justice Party (JP), which came to power in the election held in 1965, clearly saw the international isolation of Turkey brought on by the DP governments in the 1950s when Ankara acted as the spokesperson of the West when dealing with the Arab states. The JP decided to pursue a new policy based on a sounder foundation. Its conservative constituency was also in favor of mending relations in this fashion. The Demirel government's program of 1965 announced that, starting with the "fraternal" Muslim and Arab countries of the Middle East and the Maghreb, a multifaceted foreign policy would be developed toward the countries of Asia and Africa. To get rid of Turkey's negative image in the nonaligned countries of the Third World, Ankara had to start with the Arab countries with many historical and cultural links. The Middle East policy of the IP government differed fundamentally from that of past governments, which saw their Middle East policy as a function of their Western policy. The JP government also developed close relations with so-called progressive countries. In this manner, the government gained the support of its conservative constituency by coming closer to regional states through the use of Arab and Islamic motifs, while deflecting the disapproval of its leftist critics by its positive approach to independence movements.

The first positive response to Ankara's new message to the Middle East came from Iraq. The Iraqi minister responsible for foreign affairs, Adnan Pachachi, visited Turkey on 7 to 11 February 1966 and declared that Baghdad also wanted to develop bilateral relations. He gave Iraq's support to Turkey on Cyprus by stating that Iraq considered the cause of the Turkish Cypriots to be just and that rights based on treaties had to be respected.

Turkey started the process of developing commercial and cultural ties with various Arab countries after this visit, and a succession of visits followed. When the secretary-general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Haluk Bayülken, went to Egypt, he signed a trade agreement on 16 March 1966. On 15 April a parliamentary delegation visited Saudi Arabia and the minister of foreign affairs, Ihsan Sabri Çağlayangil, went to Iraq from 23 to 26 May. On 29 August King Faisal of Saudi Arabia came to Turkey, and Turkey's President Sunay visited Tunisia from 1 to 6 December.

Turkey's efforts to mend fences with Arab states coincided with the initiative of King Faisal to set up an Islamic Pact or an Islamic Conference, which was the subject of an intense debate in the international community. Upon the invitation of the World Islamic Union, eighteen Muslim countries got together in May 1965 in Mecca, where the prime minister of Somalia proposed holding a summit conference and the king of Saudi Arabia agreed to make the necessary arrangements for such a meeting. At a time when the memory of the 1960 coup in Turkey was still fresh in people's minds, the reaction of the conservative JP government was arousing interest. On 17 February Demirel announced that Turkey might participate in an Islamic Conference that did not pursue political objectives and did not lead to the formation of rival groups. When the news started circulating that Turkey would join the Islamic conference and sever relations with Israel, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs issued an official denial. Turkey's position was clear: secular Turkey was wary of getting involved with the Arab countries within a political organization. The policy of rapprochement with the Arab states had two objectives. One was to develop economic cooperation and trade, and the other was to break out of isolation when Cyprus and other questions affecting Turkey's national interests came up for discussion in international forums.

The Arab countries expected much more from Turkey, however. They wanted to see Turkey on their side on the question of Palestine. They were always uncomfortable with Turkey as a CENTO member that defended the interests of the West and of the U.S., the supporter of Israel. Without living up to Arab expectations, it would be difficult for Turkey to bring its relations with the Arab states to the desired level. This became even more obvious in the Arab-Israeli War of 1967.

Throughout 1967 relations between the Arab states and Israel were becoming tense. This was most noticeable in the case of Syria, and a new war appeared to be imminent. Between 22 and 24 May 1967 Ankara held a meeting of its ambassadors in the Middle East and reformulated its Middle Eastern policy. Three principles were established in this context. (1) Efforts would be made to develop bilateral relations in all fields with all of the Arab states. (2) Turkey would stay out of inter-Arab quarrels and would refrain from taking sides. (3) Turkey would also stay out of pacts designed to divide the Arabs.

When war broke out between the Arabs and Israel on 5 June 1967, Turkey followed a course that was markedly different from the course followed during the previous Arab-Israeli War of 1956. Çağlayangil declared that there would be no question of using the bases in Turkey against the Arabs. When Israel emerged as the victor, he stated that Ankara was against acquiring territory and gaining the upper hand through the use of force. Ankara's actions were not confined to giving Arabs verbal support. It also sent Arab countries, starting with Syria, food, clothing, and medical supplies to alleviate their heavy war losses.

During the debates at the UN on 22 June, Turkey sided openly with the Arabs. In a speech delivered at the General Assembly, Çağlayangil expressed the friendly feeling of Turkey toward the Arabs and recalled that he had already declared Turkey's opposition to the acquisition of land by the use of force. He wanted the General Assembly to insist on Israel evacuating the Arab territories that it had conquered. Turkey joined the Arabs in supporting resolution 242, calling on Israel to evacuate Arab lands occupied after 5 June. The Arab countries, and especially Egypt and Syria, thanked Turkey for its stance during the 1967 war; subsequently, this signaled that relations were developing on a firm basis.

Turkey continued to pursue its pro-Arab polices after 1967. Each time there was an armed clash between the Arabs and Israel, Turkey protested Israel's action. When British forces evacuated the region east of Suez and left a military vacuum in the Persian Gulf, the U.S. proposed that Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait conclude a security agreement to remedy this situation. Turkey refused to go along with this proposal.

Turkey's policies based on common sense also included issues that were dividing the Arab states, such as the Jordanian crisis of 1970. After the war of 1967, the guerrillas who took refuge in Jordan were carrying out activities that the government did not approve. When the Jordanian government tried to bring these activities under control, bloody clashes erupted, and Syrian forces intervened on the side of the Palestinian guerrillas. Nevertheless, the Jordanian army mastered the situation. On 27 September 1970 King Hussein and Yasser Arafat signed an agreement bringing this inter-Arab conflict to an end in a ceremony witnessed by ten Arab heads of state. On 22 September Turkey issued a statement declaring that the events were Jordan's internal affair, that foreign intervention would make matters worse and make it harder to end the clashes and bring the affair to a peaceful conclusion. Turkey also withheld permission for the U.S. to intervene in the crisis from the Incirlik air base.

Turkey had demonstrated that it was no longer the unquestioning representative of the West's interests in the Middle East. It had interests of its own in the region and wanted to pursue policies corresponding to these interests even if its policies diverged from the policies of the West. In formulating this new policy, the JP government was guided by the inclinations of the Turkish electorate as much as it was by the reactions of the Arab states. The Right in Turkey was favorably disposed toward the Arabs, while the Left saw the Palestinian cause as a struggle against imperialism and appraised the government's Middle Eastern policies in this light. On the issues of Arab-Israeli conflict and bilateral relations with Arab states, the government was able to count on the support of a broad spectrum of the public. On the issue of joining an organization like the Islamic Conference, however, the government had to proceed with caution, because some segments of the population harbored misgivings about this matter. Nevertheless, despite the initial arguments over the issue, Turkey's membership in the Islamic Conference made an imprint on Turkish relations with the Arab members of the organization throughout the 1970s.

C. The Organization of the Islamic Conference and Turkey

When the al-Aqsa mosque, located in the Arab quarter of Jerusalem under Israeli occupation, was damaged by a fire on 21 August 1969, there was deep indignation in all Muslim countries, especially the Arab countries. Jordan's King Hussein sent a message to all Arab heads of state proposing a summit conference. Saudi Arabia and Morocco undertook to make the necessary arrangements for holding such a conference.

President Sunay also received an invitation to attend the conference. In his reply, he explained that Turkey was a secular state and that he would not participate in a conference with an Islamic label. He added that the issue came within the responsibility of his government. For the Turkish government, the decision to attend would have both domestic and international implications. Turkey's Constitution declared it to be a secular country, and attending a meeting with an Islamic common denominator would cause many reactions at home. In particular, the army was uneasy about the government's policy and was beginning to make its uneasiness felt more openly. Most of the countries seeking such a meeting were in the reactionary category; in addition to their intention of arranging a mass demonstration against Israel, they were also seeking to push Egypt and the revolutionary Arab states into the position of a minority. This would allow them to challenge Nasser, who aspired to lead the Arab world, and to turn the Arab League into an Islamic League. Turkey was aware that such a polarization in the Middle East would be against its interest. Eventually, Demirel announced that the Rabat meeting was of a political and not a religious nature and that the participation of Islamic states in the meeting would not make Turkey's participation a violation of the principle of secularism—to think otherwise would require the avoidance of anything associated with the words "Islamic" and "Muslim." Furthermore, participation in the Rabat meeting would not be inconsistent with the foreign policy of the Turkish Republic. Turkey made the decision to participate in the meeting as an observer and at the level of foreign minister.

At the Islamic Summit Conference of Rabat, two important decisions were made. A permanent secretariat would be established to secure Israel's evacuation of all the occupied territories; and a meeting at the level of ministers of foreign affairs would be held on an annual basis. This was the first step toward the establishment of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC). The proposal to sever diplomatic relations with Israel was not adopted, however, and the old divisions within the Arab world surfaced once again. At the conference, Cağlayangil declared that Turkey supported the contents of the joint communiqué to the extent that they were in conformity with the resolutions of the UN that it had approved. Like Iran, it refused to sever diplomatic relations with Israel. Since no issue was discussed that conflicted with Turkey's secular status, Cağlayangil's reservations were confined to the area of foreign policy. Even so, Turkish participation in the meeting attracted criticism from opposition quarters in Turkey. The Arab countries also criticized Turkey for not cutting its diplomatic ties with Israel, and CENTO's Islamic member countries were accused of acting as the spokespersons of the West at the conference.

When the Islamic Conference of Ministers of Foreign Affairs met in March 1970 in Jedda, where the first steps were taken toward institutionalization, Turkey heeded past criticisms and participated at a lower level, sending the secretary-general of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Ankara refrained from getting involved in the activities of the newly established secretariat. It also submitted a letter to the secretary-general of the Islamic Conference in which it declared that it would accept the decisions of the conference only to the extent that they were compatible with its Constitution and the principles of its foreign policy. Thus Turkey was stating that it would bear in mind its secular status and accept decisions only to the extent that they did not contradict this status. Despite this, the Islamic countries were satisfied with Turkey's presence at the conference.

In September 1970 Turkey reaped the first benefits of the policy of rapprochement with Arab countries that it had been pursuing since 1965. At the Lusaka meeting of the nonaligned, the Arab countries refused to accept Makarios's proposals on Cyprus and drew attention to the need to safeguard the rights of the Turkish Cypriots.

In the aftermath of the military intervention of 12 March 1971, there was a short pause in Turkey's efforts to develop closer ties with Arab and Islamic countries. When the Charter of the Islamic Conference came up for signature in Jedda in March 1972, Turkey failed to sign it. The charter contained no provision that could be construed as being incompatible with secularism, but the preamble did contain the following passage: "Believing that their common faith constitutes a powerful element to establish affinity and solidarity arming Islamic peoples; Determined to defend the spiritual, moral, social, and economic values of Islam, which shall remain an important factor in mankind's progress." These words were not in conformity with the principles of secularism. But nevertheless Turkey continued to participate as a de facto member of the OIC.

Whether Turkey is legally a member of the OIC remains a moot question to this day. Turkey has complied with none of the conditions for membership described in article 8 of the charter. Consequently, and despite Turkey's even closer relations with the OIC, it can be argued from the point of view of international law and domestic law that Turkey's situation was not based on a legal foundation (Alpkaya, pp. 59–66).

After the 12 March interlude, Turkey's relations with the OIC during the 1970s developed in line with the steady development of its relations with the Arab countries. At the conference of Ministers of Foreign Affairs held in Jedda in 1975, Turkey attended at ministerial level for the first time, with Cagalayangil representing Turkey, rather than the secretary-general of the ministry. The conference responded by inviting the president of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus, Rauf Denktas, minister of state Vedat Çelik, and the mufti of Cyprus to attend the conference as "guests." At the conference, Denktaş spoke about the problems and aspirations of the Cypriot Turks. The declaration adopted at the end of the conference contained a paragraph on Cyprus: "The conference expressed its sympathy for the striving of the Turkish community to defend its legitimate nights and its Islamic character within a bizonal, federal, independent, sovereign, neutral Republic of Cyprus free of foreign bases" (Cumhuriyet, 16 July 1975). At this meeting, Turkey proposed and the conference accepted that the Seventh Conference of Ministers of Foreign Affairs be held in İstanbul.

The conference met in Istanbul on 12–15 May 1976. Whether to participate or not in the 1969 Rabat meeting had posed a grim dilemma for Turkey at that time. Now the idea of developing relations with the Arab states had taken such a strong hold that the question of whether having the conference in Istanbul was contrary to the secular character of the state never came up. The Istanbul conference opened with the reading of a message from President Korutürk. Prime Minister Demirel addressed the conference. He reiterated that Turkey would proceed in step with the Arabs on the question of Palestine. At Turkey's initiative, it was decided to set up two centers to promote cultural and scientific cooperation. One was the Islamic Conference's Center for Historical, Cultural, and Artistic Studies, established in İstanbul in 1981; and the other was the Statistical, Economic, and Social Research and Education Center of the Islamic Countries, located in Ankara. At this session, the Turkish government undertook preparations for acceding to the Charter of the Islamic Conference with a reservation. The bill to this effect went to the parliamentary committee for consideration; but early elections took place in 1977, and the bill did not come up for adoption by the TGNA.

There was a significant development at the Conference of Ministers of Foreign Affairs held in Morocco in 1979. It was decided to upgrade the status of the Muslim Turkish community of Cyprus from guest to observer. Also, an appeal was made for providing assistance to the Turkish Cypriot community to alleviate the hardship inflicted by the Greek Cypriot embargo.

Turkey's relations with the OIC kept developing during the 1970s, and important changes were obtained in the Cyprus policies of the Islamic states. Turkey went on reiterating that it was a secular state, although less frequently than formerly. Starting in 1980, the 12 September military administration became a part of Washington's Green Belt Strategy (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" in Section 6), and the principle of secularism was gradually pushed well into the background. Even closer relations were established with the OIC and particularly with the "reactionary" regimes in the OIC, starting with Saudi Arabia. There were important and disturbing differences between the policies toward the OIC pursued in the 1970s and the 1980s.

D. Warm Relations (1973–1979)

The interim regime of 12 March 1971 abandoned the multifaceted policies being pursued by the JP government since 1965 and turned its face once again toward Washington, especially with its decision to ban the cultivation of the opium poppy. This caused Turkey to distance itself from the Arab countries. At this time, events took place that affected the existing balance in the Middle East. The Baathist regimes in neighboring Iraq and Syria were developing their relations with the USSR. In particular the Treaty of Friendship and Good Neighborliness concluded in 1972 between Iraq and the USSR gave rise to concern among America's allies Iran and Israel, as well as in Turkey. Another negative factor affecting relations with Syria was the flow of armed revolutionary youths from Turkey to Syria, who preceded from there to Lebanon, where they received military training in Palestinian camps before returning to Turkey. As relations soured, this allowed the questions of Hatay and sharing of water resources to resurface. These questions would remain on the agenda throughout the 1980 and 1990s (see "Relations with the Middle East" in Section 6).

As relations with Iraq and Syria deteriorated, important events were taking place in Egypt. Anwar Sadat, who succeeded Nasser upon his death, closed all Soviet military installations in Egypt on 18 July 1972 and asked Soviet military advisors to leave the country. These were the first signs that Egypt was improving its relations with the U.S. In September 1973 the Turkish minister of foreign affairs, Haluk Bayülken, visited Egypt. Turkey's Middle Eastern policy was being revised. As Syria and Iraq improved their relations with the USSR, their place was being taken up by Egypt, which now pursued a more pro-Western policy.

When the 12 March interlude ended in October 1973, the policies that were abandoned in 1971 were resumed. The coalition governments headed by Ecevit and the Nationalist Front governments sought to maintain relations with the Arab countries at a reasonably good level. The reason for this was that Ankara's relations with the West cooled after the 1974 Cyprus operation. Another reason was that the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) imposed an oil embargo in 1973, forcing oil prices to triple and creating serious economic problems for Turkey. Ankara was eager to develop its relations with Arab countries in order to overcome the shortage of oil and promote trade relations with those countries.

Ankara had supported the Palestinians and Arabs in the 1967 Arab-Israeli War and pursued the same policy in the fourth war, which broke out on 6 October 1973. This war was different, because the Arab objective was no longer the destruction of the state of Israel but the recovery of occupied Arab lands. The war also destroyed Israel's myth of invincibility when Arab armies were able to score initial successes. In the 1973 war Turkey announced that Incirlik base could not be used by the U.S. to supply Israel, while it allowed Soviet aircraft supplying the Arabs to overfly its territory. The reward came on 20 November, when members of OPEC announced that Turkey would be exempt from the oil embargo. On 25 August 1973 an agreement was signed by Turkey and Iraq to construct a pipeline from the Kirkuk oil field to a terminal to be located in Turkey's Mediterranean port of Yumurtalık. This oil pipeline went into operation on 3 January 1977, when it started supplying two-thirds of Turkey's oil requirements while also providing an income from the flow of oil. Another positive result of the development of relations with Arab countries occurred during the 1974 Cyprus operation, when Libyan leader Muammar Khaddafi supplied fuel and tires for the Turkish combat aircraft engaged in the operation.

On 10 November 1975 Turkey supported the resolution adopted by the UN General Assembly, declaring that Zionism was a form of racism. This was another demonstration of Turkish support for the Arabs in their struggle against Israel.

Turkey had remained at a distance from the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) since its establishment in 1964. Ankara knew that some of the people engaged in terrorist activities in Turkey had been trained in PLO camps. Nevertheless, in the second half of the 1970s Ankara started developing its relations with the PLO. When the Arab summit meeting in Rabat in October 1974 recognized the PLO as the sole representative of the Palestinians and decided that the organization should be their representative at the UN, Ankara recognized the PLO in January 1975 and established relations with it through the Turkish Embassy in Cairo. In August the chairman of the Political Bureau of the PLO, Faruk Khaddumi, visited Turkey and discussed with Turkish officials the development of relations and the establishment of an office in Ankara. Turkey indicated that at the Seventh Conference of Islamic Ministers of Foreign Affairs it would be announced that the PLO would be granted permission to establish a political office in Ankara. When four Palestinian guerrillas occupied the Egyptian Embassy in Ankara on 10 July 1979, Ankara did not go back on its decision. The PLO's Ankara office was opened by Yasser Arafat on 5 October. As Turkey's relations with the Arabs developed during the 1980s and relations with Israel cooled, Ankara's relations with the PLO got closer.

Despite the rapprochement with the Arabs and the PLO, it must not be forgotten that Turkey never deviated significantly from its main foreign policy orientation. Ankara never severed relations with Israel. When the Camp David agreement was signed in 1977 and the Arab world suspended relations with Egypt, Turkey announced that it supported the peace agreement.

After the Islamic revolution in Iran in 1979, the U.S. devised new plans to safeguard its interests in the Middle East, relying on Turkey, Egypt, and Israel. The coup of 12 September 1980 would enable Turkey to fit neatly into these plans and would also bring to an end the multifaceted foreign policy that it had been pursuing since 1965. Starting in 1980, Turkey's relations with Saudi Arabia, the Gulf states, and Egypt—all good friends of the U.S.—would grow closer as its relations with Syria deteriorated.

Melek Firat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Arab States)

- Alpkaya, Gökçen. "Türkiye Cumhuriyeti, İslam Konferansı Örgütü ve Laiklik." Prof. Dr. Muammer Aksoy'a Armağan 46, nos. 1–2 (1991): 55–68.
- Fırat, Melek M. 1960–71 Arası Türk Dış Politikası ve Kıbrıs Sorunu. Ankara: Siyasal Yayınevi, 1997.
- Korkud, Selçuk. "İstanbul Islamic Conference of Foreign Ministers." Foreign Policy 5, no. 4 (1975): 18–22.
- Kürkçüoğlu, Ömer. "An Analysis of Turkish-Arab Relations." SBF Dergisi 27, no. 1 (1972): 117–34.
- ——. "Orta Doğu'daki Yeni Gelişmeler ve Türkiye." SBF Dergisi 29, nos. 1–2 (1974): 151–60.
- -----. "Turkey's Attitude towards the Middle East Conflict." Foreign Policy 5, no. 4 (1975): 23–33.
- ------. "Türk-Irak İlişkilerinde Son Gelişmeler." SBF Dergisi 22, no. 4 (1972): 247–54.
- ———. Türkiye'nin Arap Ortadoğusu'na Karşı Politikası (1945– 1970). Ankara: AÜSBF Yayınları, 1972.
- Parlar, Suat. Ortadoğu Vaat Edilmiş Topraklar. İstanbul: Bibliotek, 1997.
- Soysal, İsmail. "Turkish-Arab Diplomatic Relations after the Second World War (1945–1986)." Studies on Turkish-Arab Relations (Annual, 1990): 43–115.
- ——. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları C. II (1945–1990). Ankara: TTK, 1991.
- Türk Dış Politikası 1919–1973 (OTDP). 5th ed. Ankara: AÜSBF Dış Münasebetler Enstitüsü, 1982.
- van Dam, Nikolaos. Suriye'de İktidar Mücadelesi (original title: The Struggle for Power in Syria: Politics and Society under Asad and the Ba'th Party). Trans. Semih Îdiz and Aslı Falay Çalkıvık. İstanbul: İletişim, 2000.
- Yalçıntaş, Nevzat. "Economic Relations between Turkey and Islamic Countries." Studies on Turkish-Arab Relations (Annual, 1986): 317–26.

II. RELATIONS WITH NON-ARAB STATES

- A. Relations with Israel
- 1. Stagnating Relations
- a. The Arab-Israeli War of 1967 and Turkey Turkey sided openly with the Arabs during the period when tension was escalating prior to the Arab-Israeli War of 1967, during the fighting, and at the UN debates over this issue.

The first reason for Turkey to adopt this position was Cyprus. When Turkey decided to exercise its right to intervene following the Cyprus events that erupted toward the end of 1963, it was rebuffed by the unexpected Johnson letter of 5 June 1964. From then on, Ankara decided to review its international relations and make the transition to a multifaceted foreign policy. When the question of Cyprus came up for discussion at the UN and other international forums, Turkey wanted to be able to count on the support of the Arabs. The best way to garner this support was by siding with the Arabs in the ongoing Arab-Israeli conflict.

Second, some political parties in Turkey were attaching greater importance to carrying out closer relations with the Arab countries in order to generate an advantage in domestic politics. The Justice Party, which came to power in 1965, had the support of the conservative religious masses and favored closer ties with the Arab states, with which Turkey shared religious and cultural values. This policy was also supported by the Left and by the general public that held anti-American views.

A third reason was Turkey's expectation of economic benefits from closer ties with the Arab states. The energy crisis that resulted from the 1973 war drove Turkey closer to the Arabs, because it was almost completely dependent on imported petroleum. The energy crisis had induced a recession in the world economy, and Turkey was seeking new markets for its products, which were now in low demand in Europe and elsewhere. The new markets were in the now rich Arab oil-producing countries. This meant that Turkey had to deemphasize its relations with Israel.

The fourth reason was that leftist movements were in the ascendancy in the second half of the 1960s. These movements had an aversion to Israel, which they regarded as the unquestioning ally of the U.S. in the Middle East. Many segments of Turkish society shared these views. Both the legal leftist organizations and the illegal ones were pro-Arab in the Arab-Israeli conflict. The militants of illegal leftist organizations were heading for the Lebanese camps of Palestinian terrorist organizations, where they received training and then carried out attacks on Israeli targets in Turkey, especially during the 1970s.

The first signs of Turkey's pro-Arab policies appeared in May 1967. A series of dangerous developments occurred in quick succession. The United Arab Republic (Egypt), Syria, and Jordan on the one hand and Israel on the other started challenging one another and brought their armies to a high state of alert. At Nasser's request, the UN peacekeeping force was removed from the Sinai Peninsula on 19 May. Then Cairo closed the Strait of Tiran to Israeli shipping, blocking off the Gulf of Aqaba on 23 May. These moves were interpreted as precursors of war in Ankara and elsewhere. After a conference of Turkish ambassadors posted in the Middle Eastern countries held in Ankara on 28 May 1967, the Turkish government issued a statement and emphasized that "the government of Turkey is also taking into consideration the existing close relations with Arab countries in the framework of its policy of friendly relations with its neighbors."

Turkey maintained the same course during the war. On 6 June 1967 Turkish minister of foreign affairs Çağla-yangil declared that it was out of the question for the bases on Turkish soil to be used against the Arabs. This was an unusual declaration: when the U.S. used these bases for an operation out of NATO's area during the landing in Lebanon in 1958, no one except the opposition questioned this action. But this time, in line with the multifaceted foreign policy, Ankara was forestalling the possibility of the use of the bases.

Furthermore, in the course of the war, the Turkish Red Crescent sent food aid worth $100,000 to Jordan, Syria, and Egypt. Following the war, a further $500,000 in aid was dispatched, primarily to Syria (Armaoğlu, p. 273).

Turkey continued to display an anti-Israeli policy at UN meetings after the war. When the issue came before the UN General Assembly's special session, Minister Çağlayangil declared in his speech there: "Turkey's foreign policy rests on respect for political independence and territorial integrity and opposition to the acquisition of territory through the use of force" (Dışişleri Bakanlığı Belleteni 35 [August 1967]: 47-49). He added: "The Turkish nation takes a close interest in the fate of the holy sites in Jerusalem and regards with displeasure Israel's attempts to carry out a fait accompli in that city." Çağlayangil also underlined that Turkey harbored feelings of deep friendship and sympathy for the peoples of the Arab countries and called on the General Assembly to demand Israel's immediate evacuation of the occupied territories. Turkey became a co-sponsor of the resolutions calling on Israel not to alter the status of Jerusalem and appealing to all countries to assist the Palestine Refugees Agency. Turkey also voted with the Arab countries on resolutions calling on Israel to withdraw to the prewar borders.

In all of the armed clashes that occurred between the Arab countries and Israel following the war, Turkey sided with the Arabs and protested Israel's actions.

Although there was a certain stagnation in Turkish-Israeli relations as a result of the war and subsequent developments, no radical change in these relations took place. Turkey gave general backing to the Arabs and voted for resolutions condemning Israel, but it did not sever diplomatic relations, which were maintained at chargé d'affaires level. The 1967 war gave Turkey the opportunity to display the changes in its perception of the Arab Middle East. The 1967 war should be seen not as a time when Turkish-Israel relations took a turn for the worse but as the beginning of a period when Turkish-Arab relations started improving.

Turkey's Reactions to the Burning of the Masjid al-Aqsa

Another reason for the stagnation in Turkey's relations with Israel was the fire caused at the Masjid al-Aqsa on 21 August 1969. This was a holy site for Muslims, located in Israeli-occupied East Jerusalem.

The burning of this mosque sharpened the hostility of the public toward Israel in all Islamic countries. On 22 August Prime Minister Demirel declared that Turkey stood with the other Muslim countries in the face of the disastrous fire at the Masjid al-Aqsa. The public reaction had its effect on Turkey's diplomacy. On 28 August 1969 twenty-five countries, including Turkey, called for an emergency meeting of the Security Council. The council adopted resolution 271 on 15 September, in which Israel was asked to repeal all measures aimed at changing the status of Jerusalem.

Twenty-five countries subsequently decided to hold an Islamic Summit in Rabat, the capital of Morocco. The summit conference was held on 22–25 September and considered the issue of the fire. From the mid-1960s on, Turkey had been pursuing a policy of seeking international support for its Cyprus policies. With the expectation that it could gain the backing of the Muslim countries, Turkey participated in the Islamic Summit with a delegation led by Çağlayangil.

At the summit, Turkey adopted a position demonstrating that it did not want its relations with Israel, already stagnating because of the 1967 war, to deteriorate further. Although Turkey supported the resolution calling on Israel to evacuate East Jerusalem and the territories occupied after the 1967 war, it stood against the resolution that called on the participants of the summit that had recognized Israel to sever diplomatic relations with that country. In the document adopted at the end of the summit, Çağlayangil inserted a phrase stating that his government supported the decisions of the summit "to the extent that they were in conformity with the resolutions approved at the UN" (Dışişleri Bakanlığı Belleteni 60 [September 1969]: 45). This signaled that, although Turkey wanted to have close relations with the Islamic countries, it also wanted to keep its relations with Israel from cooling further.

2. The Worsening of Relations

a. Turkey and the Arab-Israeli War of 1973

On 6 October 1973 the Egyptian and Syrian armies launched a surprise attack on Israel. The resulting war and its aftermath led Turkish-Israeli relations, already frayed, to deteriorate further. As in the 1967 war, Turkey declared its neutrality in the conflict, but in practice it sided with the Arabs. While Turkey prevented the U.S. from using the İncirlik air base to assist Israel, it allowed Soviet aircraft to use its airspace to supply military equipment to the Arab countries engaged in the conflict. The Turkish position was based on the following considerations.

As in the 1967 conflict, Ankara expected the Arab countries to reward its pro-Arab stance in this conflict with support for Turkey on the question of Cyprus in international forums. A second consideration was the joint statement of the Arab countries at the beginning of the war that countries supporting Israel would be subjected to an oil embargo. As a country that procured 70% of its oil from Arab countries, Turkey wanted to insulate its economy from the global slump that such an oil embargo would produce. The third consideration was the close interest of the Turkish public in the struggle of the PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization), starting in the late 1960s, to free the Palestinians living under Israeli occupation. The Turkish government could not ignore the fact that public opinion linked the Arab-Israeli dispute directly with the Palestinian question.

After the cease-fire of 27 October, Turkey kept its relations with Israel at a low level because of the decision of OAPEC (Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries) at its meeting in Algiers on 26–28 November 1973 to impose an oil embargo on all countries supporting Israel. At the meeting, it was also decided to establish a committee consisting of the ministers of foreign affairs and petroleum of the OAPEC members to classify all countries as "friendly," "neutral," and "supporters of the enemy" and treat them accordingly in supplying them with oil.

At the meeting of OAPEC in Vienna in March 1974, the oil embargo was lifted, but this did not improve Turkey's relations with Israel. Turkey continued to follow a more pro-Arab foreign policy.

b. Turkey and the PLO

One of the reasons for the coolness in Turkish-Israeli relations during the 1970s was the closeness of Turkey's links with the PLO. The first contacts between Turkey and the PLO were established when the organization participated in the Islamic summit in 1969 as an observer. At Rabat in 1974, the Arab League declared the PLO to be the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. This was followed by a similar decision of the Islamic Conference. Finally, on 22 November 1974, the UN General Assembly decided to allow the PLO to participate in the work of all UN organs as an observer. In parallel with these developments, Turkey changed its cautious approach toward the PLO.

In January 1975 Ankara announced its recognition of the PLO and established relations with the organization through the Turkish Embassy in Cairo. In August 1975 the chairman of the Political Bureau of the PLO, Faruk Khaddumi, visited Turkey. In the course of the visit, the possibilities for developing relations further were explored.

Turkey's improved relations with the PLO troubled Israel, which regarded the PLO as a terrorist organization. But Ankara was influenced by the pro-PLO atmosphere prevailing in the UN General Assembly and was in no mood to mend fences with Israel. Ankara went even further and, on 10 November 1975, voted for the resolution in the General Assembly that equated Zionism (the national policy of Israel) with racism. This resolution was to be rescinded by the General Assembly in 1991.

In May 1976 the Conference of Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Islamic countries met in İstanbul. On that occasion Ankara announced that the PLO would be allowed to set up a representative office in Ankara. When the vice-chairman of the Political Bureau of the PLO, Said Kamal, visited Ankara in early 1977, Ankara agreed to grant diplomatic status to the representative of the PLO in Ankara. The representative office of the PLO was officially opened by the organization's leader, Yasser Arafat, on 5 October 1979, when he came to Ankara upon the invitation of prime minister Bülent Ecevit.

Meanwhile Turkey followed closely the U.S. initiative that led to the conclusion of an agreement on 17 September 1978 between Egypt and Israel, following negotiations at Camp David. By this agreement, the two countries reached an understanding on resolving outstanding questions between them. This was followed by the Peace Agreement between Egypt and Israel signed in Washington on 26 March 1979, which resulted in the establishment of diplomatic relations between the former enemies (see Box 7-57 in Section 7). After the signing of the Camp David agreement, the minister of foreign affairs, Gündüz Ökçün, made a statement on 3 October 1978 in which he said that it was still too early to make a full assessment of the event but that a just solution could not be achieved unless Israel pulled back its forces to its pre-1967 border and the PLO was included in a future settlement. This was an explicit reaffirmation of Turkey's support for the PLO.

After the signing of the Egypt-Israel peace agreement, Ankara issued a communiqué in which it declared that the Middle East question had to be settled by peaceful means, that peace could come to the region only through a comprehensive agreement, and that the precondition for this was Israel's withdrawal from the occupied territories and granting the Palestinians the right to establish their own state.

With these statements, Turkey indicated that it shared some of the concerns of the Arab countries other than Egypt, which claimed that the Camp David and Washington agreements could not, by themselves, solve the Middle East questions. But, unlike these Arab counties, Turkey did not sever its diplomatic links with Egypt for having made peace with Israel. Turkey's approach differed from that of the other Arab countries, because Egypt's recognition of Israel relieved Turkey of the stigma that it had carried since 1949 of being the sole Muslim country to recognize Israel. The U.S. backing for the Egyptian-Israeli peace process also affected Turkey's approach to this issue.

During the period from 1960 to 1980, Turkish-Israeli relations went from stagnation to frostiness, which lasted into the 1980s; but starting in the early 1990s these relations entered a period of restoration and improvement.

Çağrı Erhan and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Israel)

Armaoğlu, Fahir. Filistin Meselesi ve Arap-İsrail Savaşları (1948–1988). 2nd ed. Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası Kültür Yayınları, 1991.

Bölükbaşı, Süha. "Türkiye ve İsrail: Mesafeli Yakınlıktan Stratejik Ortaklığa." Liberal Düşünce (Winter 1999): 138–52. Cattan, Henry. Palestine and International Law. Beirut: Longman, 1973.

Dışişleri Bakanlığı Belleteni 35 (Aug. 1967): 47–49. Dışişleri Bakanlığı Belleteni 60 (Sept. 1969): 45. Dursun, Davut. Orta Doğu Neresi. İstanbul: İnsan, 1995. Erhan, Çağrı. "Hilal ve Sion Yıldızı Türk-İsrail İlişkilerinin Dünü ve Bugününe Kısa Bir Bakış." Mülkiyeliler Birliği Dergisi 21, no. 202 (Aug.—Sept. 1997): 32–38.

Gruen, George E. "Turkey's Relations with Israel and Its Arab Neighbors." Middle East Review 17 (Spring 1985): 33–43.

Karaosmanoğlu, Ali. "A Turkish View of Bilateral Relations with Israel." In Actual Situation and Prospects of Turkey's Relations with Israel, pp. 1–6. Ankara: Friedrich-Naumann Foundation in Turkey, 1992.

Kürkçüoğlu, Ömer. Türkiye'nin Arap Orta Doğu'suna Karşı Politikası (1945–1970). Ankara: Sevinç Matbaası, 1972.

Kut, Şule. "Filistin Sorunu ve Türkiye." In Orta Doğu Sorunları ve Türkiye, pp. 5–34. İstanbul: Türkiye Sosyal Ekonomik Siyasal Araştırmalar Vakfı, 1991.

Nachmani, Amikam. Israel, Turkey and Greece: Uneasy Relations in the Eastern Mediterranean. London: Frank Cass and Company, 1987.

Robbins, Philip. Turkey and the Middle East. London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1991.

Yavuz, M. Hakan, and Mujeeb R. Khan. "Turkish Foreign Policy toward the Arab-Israeli Conflict: Duality and the Development (1950–1991)." Arab Studies Quarterly 14, no. 4 (Fall 1992): 69–95.

B. Relations with Iran

In the final years of the Pahlavi dynasty, Turkish-Iranian relations were in a satisfactory state. The two countries were able to maintain generally good relations because both were allies of the U.S. and both were in the anti-Communist camp. Despite this, five basic questions remained unresolved and kept relations from developing beyond a certain point. During this period these questions constituted the agenda of Turkish-Iranian relations, and much time was spent in trying to resolve them. These issues are discussed here according to their order of importance.

1. Iran's support for dissident Kurdish groups in Iraq: when Turkey made the decision in the 1960s to relax its tough policy line toward its Arab neighbors, Iran was shifting to a policy of confrontation with Iraq. Just as Turkish-Iraqi relations started improving, Iraqi-Iranian relations deteriorated. This discordance led the shah to look upon Turkey with suspicion. But it was really Turkey that had reason to be suspicious. Turkey informed Tehran that it considered the shah's policy of supporting and even instigating the Iraqí Kurds in their efforts to set up autonomous structures to be dangerous from the point of view of regional stability, but to no avail.

Actually, Turkey's concerns went beyond the worry that a Kurdish federated state in Iraq would constitute an undesirable precedent for its own Kurdish population. The shah was pursuing a general policy of "Persification" in his own country and was aspiring to be the protector of those with Persian roots in the Middle East. According to the shah, the Kurds were Persians who spoke a different dialect. This implied that he could claim the "right" to support Turkish Kurds just as he supported Iraqi Kurds. In fact, Turkey had some reasons to believe that the shah was already using this "right," especially in the first half of the 1970s. For this reason, Turkey became uncomfortable when the shah traveled to Turkey in an aircraft named Kurdistan, even though it was considered quite natural in Iran.

To overcome the differences arising from the shah's Kurdish policies and Turkey's efforts to achieve a rapprochement with Iraq, President Sunay undertook his first foreign visit to Iran in October 1966. Prime Minister Demirel subsequently went to Iran in May 1967 to convey Turkey's good wishes. At a time when the northern Iraq question was most acute, in 1973, the shah came to Turkey to discuss the effects of the Ramadan War on the regional balance of power. Two years later, President Korutürk returned this visit. As a result of these visits, the mutual suspicion in both countries was abated but never fully eliminated. The 1975 Algiers Agreement played an important role in improving not just Iran-Iraq relations but also Turkish-Iranian relations.

2. Iran's role as regional policeman: starting in the early 1960s, the shah established the objective for Iran to become the dominant power in the Persian Gulf and started to establish Iran's influence in the region. Supporting the Kurds in Iraq was part of this plan.

This was in conformity with the Nixon Doctrine. Until the first oil crisis in 1973, however, the shah did not have the resources necessary to achieve his objective. When the hike in oil prices provided him with the needed resources, the shah extended his goals and decided that Iran would become the regional superpower. For this, he undertook a rapid rearmament program and launched vast infrastructure projects.

At the time when the shah was undertaking these grandiose plans, Turkey was coping with extreme difficulties. Its army was losing strength because of the U.S. arms embargo, and its economy was in a chronic state of crisis. The balance between Iran and Turkey was tilting rapidly in Iran's favor. When the shah paid a visit to Ankara in October 1975 to participate in the Republic Day festivities, Turkey's expectations of Iranian loans and oil sales with deferred payments remained unfulfilled.

Although Ankara was satisfied with the outcome of the Algiers Agreement of 1975, it continued to be uneasy about Iran's role as regional policeman, which prevented bilateral relations from developing to their full potential.

In 1978 street riots broke out in both Iran and Turkey. While the extremist and marginal groups were demonstrating and taking over the streets in Turkey, large masses dominated Iranian streets. This situation led the U.S. to change its policies in favor of Turkey and to lift the arms embargo. Turkey had responded to the embargo by closing U.S. installations in Turkey, and the U.S. had tried to compensate for this by setting up similar installations on Iran's Caspian Coast. But developments demonstrated that there were no satisfactory alternatives to installations located on Turkish soil. As Iran's relations with the U.S. went from bad to worse during the 1980s, Turkey's standing in the U.S. was steadily rising.

The shah left Iran in January 1979, never to return. This began a new era in Turkish-Iranian relations.

The impression that CENTO was not adequate to meet the Soviet threat: in the 1960s a series of meetings took place in order to erase the shah's impression that Turkey did not attach the necessary importance to CENTO. In 1961 Turkey informed Iran that it had no forces available to allocate to CENTO because all of its units were under NATO command. Ankara insisted that this did not weaken CENTO, however, since the two alliances shared the same objective of checking communism and that the Turkish command structure was also able to carry out joint activities within CENTO. In 1962 the minister of foreign affairs, F. C. Erkin, took up the issue of CENTO once again in Tehran. That year the shah traveled to Ankara to discuss the issue with president Cemal Gürsel. Despite these contacts, the shah remained unpersuaded. His misgivings about CENTO were not confined to Turkey's contribution to the alliance. He also complained about the inadequacy of U.S. military aid to Iran. The shah was convinced that the U.S. preferred Turkey to Iran as a partner.

The military adequacy of CENTO was not a topical issue anymore in the second half of the 1960s, because both Turkey and Iran were busy trying to develop their relations with the USSR. As relations with the Soviets mellowed, the military dimension of CENTO was pushed into the background, and the economic and cultural dimension of the organization came to the fore.

4. The discord between democracy and monarchy:

the Turkish public became much more sensitive about freedom after the coup of 27 May 1960. The authoritarian nature of the Iranian regime, which had been ignored in the past, now came under critical scrutiny in the Turkish press. In particular, the brutal suppression of protest demonstrations by the Iranian police after the White Revolution (Box 5-18) caused anger in Turkey. The anti-shah propaganda of Iranian exiles living in Turkey, including Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (who lived for a while in Bursa) as well as Iranian students in Turkish universities, seriously damaged the shah's image.

The first hitch in bilateral relations occurred at the inaugural session of the TGNA in November 1965 when Iranian students carried out a demonstration against the shah. The shah asked Turkey to punish the demonstrations severely, but Ankara refused to comply, reminding him that the Turkish judiciary was independent and could not be given instructions. In 1966 the Turkish Labor Party gave its support to Iranian students in Turkey that Tehran wanted to have deported back to Iran. The matter was brought to the attention of parliament by Çetin Altan, a deputy of the Labor Party.

As opposition to the shah grew in his own country, so too did the criticism in Turkey directed at the Pahlavi dynasty. When the monarchy finally collapsed in 1979, the revolution enjoyed a great deal of sympathy among the Turkish public.

5. The failure of economic cooperation to yield tangible results: as the economic and cultural dimensions of CENTO gained in importance, it became apparent that a new organization to cater to these needs would be desirable. Also, mainly in response to Pakistan's request for an economic and cultural organization free from any need for nonregional countries, Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan established the Regional Cooperation for Development (RCD) in Istanbul on 21 July 1964. The new organization would have its headquarters in Tehran and would seek to accelerate economic development by engaging in cooperation in the fields of communications, transport, trade, petroleum production, tourism, banking, insurance, and culture. After this, RCD would displace CENTO as the principal vehicle for cooperation among the three regional countries until it was superseded by the Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO) in 1985.

Although RCD brought the three countries closer in their cultural contacts and helped develop transport and communications, their trade volume did not grow significantly. After the oil crisis, this situation caused vexation in Turkey, because the rise in oil prices led to a growing imbalance in its trade with Iran. Turkey was not receiving

Box 5-18. Iran's Islamic Revolution

The basic reason for the Islamic Revolution was the shah's attempt to transform Iran into a nation-state under the protection of a U.S. umbrella. The shah felt that he would have trouble attaining his goal. First, the business community of shopkeepers/merchants (known as the bazaaris) and the large landowning class were determining forces in the economic life of the country. Second, the Shifte clergy, representing these two economic groups, wielded great social authority. So he started off by eliminating these two economic groups and the Shlite clergy. His first radical step in this direction was the White Revolution of 1962, when he launched a land reform program. Through this reform, the shah sought to direct the large landowners into agribusiness and manufacturing. This would turn Iran's agricultural economy into a capitalist structure in which the commercial and industrial bourgeoisie would be dominant. At the same time, the lands controlled by the Shilte clergy would be distributed, thus dealing a blow to both their economic independence and their standing in society.

The shah also saw the bazaaris as an impediment to his nation-building plans and sought to eliminate this group by encouraging foreign investments. He refused to take protectionist measures in favor of the bazaaris. On the contrary, he resorted to tactics of intimidation and harassment in order to break their power. By breaking the back of the bazaaris, the shah hoped to cut off the funds that flowed from them to the Shirte clergy.

Toward the end, the modern bourgeoisie, which had begun to take shape as a consequence of the shah's measures in their favor, also turned against him because of their political disaffection. Finally, the growing numbers of industrial workers also joined the opposition, because the shah never allowed them to form independent organizations.

The White Revolution had triggered a large migration of farmers to the urban centers. The 1973 oil crisis provided Iran with vast amounts of oil revenue that worsened the uneven distribution of income. These developments led to the growth of new groups of malcontents: unemployed slum dwellers in urban centers.

The struggle undertaken by the shah in 1962 to attain his goals resulted in those that he dispossessed economically coalescing with those who opposed him politically. This coalition took to the streets in 1978 with hostile demonstrations against the shah's policies and in February 1979 drove out the imperial family along with the industrial bourgeoisie. In April 1979 a referendum transformed Iran into a constitutional theocracy, headed by the Ayatolah Khomeini, who had been living in exile in Paris.

(A. AKDEVELIOĞLU)

any contracts for the multitude of construction works in progress in Iran; nor was there much Iranian investment flowing into Turkey. During the second half of the 1970s the "eternal friendship" of former times had pretty much evaporated, and Turks complained that economic relations were stagnating. Turkish-Iranian trade would only reach satisfactory levels after the outbreak of war between Iran and Iraq.

The Islamic Republic

At first the declaration of the Republic in Iran was well received in Turkey, although Ankara later would have second thoughts. Turkey formally recognized the new regime on 13 February 1979, only two days after regime change had taken place, while the Republic was declared in April. Turkey was well disposed toward the new regime, in the expectation that the problems encountered with Shah M. Reza would be surmounted in the new era. Ankara had been concerned about the shah's policies toward the Kurds of the Middle East and was relieved that the nationalist ideology of the Pahlavi dynasty had come to an end. Furthermore, the CHP government in power at the time and its leader, Bülent Ecevit, did not approve of the shah's undemocratic regime and its disdain for human rights. If another party, such as the Justice Party, had been in power in Turkey at the time, it would not have looked with as much sympathy on the overthrow of the shah through a popular uprising, given that he was a loyal ally of the U.S. and a totally committed anti-Communist.

The new regime in Iran was determined to get rid of all its Western entanglements. The provisional government in Tehran announced Iran's withdrawal from CENTO on 11 March 1974. Because CENTO could not survive geopolitically without Iran, Pakistan announced its withdrawal on 12 March, followed by Turkey's announcement on 16 March. This development did not disturb Turkey much, because it sought economic and not military cooperation with Iran. Although Iran was leaving CENTO, it announced that it would continue its membership in RCD. This was enough to satisfy Turkey.

Turkey looked upon the new anti-Western regime in Iran very favorably. In June 1979 the minister of foreign affairs, Gündüz Ökçün, paid an official visit, during which an oil-purchasing agreement was concluded and, more significantly, the charismatic leader of the Islamic Revolution, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, met with Ökçün. Another significant aspect of Ökçün's visit was that he also met with Ayatollah Mohammad Kazem Shariatmadari, who opposed the Iranian leadership and whose followers consisted almost entirely of Azerbaijanis. This visit stirred Iranian apprehension that henceforth Turkey might support Azerbaijani nationalism in its dealings with Tehran. Even as the struggle against pro-shah elements raged on in the streets, Khomeini's backers attacked and attempted to burn down the Turkish Consulate General in Tabriz, in the fear that Turkey might wield too much influence in Iranian Azerbaijan and might decide to support Shariatmadari.

The early cordial relations were soon marred in November 1979, when the CHP government resigned and was replaced by the JP government led by S. Demirel. This coincided with the occupation of the American Embassy in Tehran by Iranian militants. Embassy personnel and U.S. citizens were taken hostage by the militants, consisting mostly of university students, and the hostage crisis, which was to last for 444 days, got underway. Demirel qualified this action as an "inhuman event rarely seen in history" (Çetinsaya, p. 150). Khomeini replied that "the Ankara government, like the former shah, could only maintain itself in power at the point of a bayonet." This started a verbal duel that would be a feature of the Turkish-Iranian relations for a while.

The worsening of relations was not only due to the differing views of the CHP and the JP regarding the Iranian regime. The real reason was that it soon became apparent that the new regime was not about to meet the expectations or hopes that were aroused in Turkey by the Islamic Revolution. At a time when Turkey continued to suffer from the oil crisis, however, Ankara still entertained some hopes of economic benefits from its relations with Iran. Therefore the JP government did not want to alienate the new regime too much. The U.S. was informed that the bases in Turkey could not be used to carry out an operation against Iran. Nor would Turkey participate in the U.S. sanctions imposed on Iran.

As Iran and Turkey entered the 1980s, their main concern was to achieve internal stability. The coup of 12 September 1980 in Turkey purportedly aimed to accomplish this objective, but it could have marred relations. The Iranian regime was convinced that the CIA was behind the coup and looked askance at the Kemalist tone of the military leaders who took over the administration. The coup, however, did not wreck the bilateral relations; on the contrary, they improved after 12 September. The reason was the Iraqi aggression against Iran, which occurred ten days after 12 September. It was clear that this would be a long war of attrition. In October Turkey declared its neutrality. The economic reform package of 24 January 1980 required Turkey to find new export markets, and the Iran-Iraq War presented many opportunities in this area.

Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Iran)

- Arı, Tayyar. Basra Körfezi ve Ortadoğu'da Güç Dengesi, 1978–96. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Alfa, 1996.
- Armaoğlu, Fahir. 20. Yüzyıl Siyasî Tarihi, 1914–80. 4th ed. Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası, 1987.
- ———. 20. Yüzyıl Siyasî Tarihi, 1914–90 (C. II: 1980–90). 3rd ed. Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası, 1991.
- Bölükbaşı, Süha. Türkiye ve Yakınındaki Orta Doğu. Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, n.d.
- Çetinsaya, Gökhan. "Türk-İran İlişkileri." In *Türk Dış Politika*sının Analizi, ed. Faruk Sönmezoğlu, pp. 135–58. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Der, 1998.
- Fırat, Melek. "İran İslâm Devrimi ve Türk-İran İlişkileri (1979–87)." Postgraduate thesis, Ankara Üniversitesi Sosyal Bilimler Enstitüsü, 1989.
- Griffith, William E. "Iran's Foreign Policy in the Pahlavi Era." In Iran under the Pahlavis, ed. George Lenczowski, pp. 365–88. Stanford, Calif.: Hoover Institution, 1978.
- ——. "The Pahlevi Autocracy: Muhammad Reza Shah, 1941–79." In The Cambridge History of Iran, Vol. VII, ed. Peter Avery, pp. 244–93. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Güney, Ayşegül Dora. İran'da Devrim. İstanbul: Haziran, 1979. Gürün, Kamuran. Dış İlişkiler ve Türk Politikası; 1939'dan günümüze kadar. Ankara: Ankara Üniversitesi Siyasal Bilgiler Fakültesi, 1983.
- Kayabalı, İsmail, and Cemender Arslanoğlu. İran'ın Anadolu'ya Uzanan Gölgesi, 1453–1989. Ankara: n.p., 1990.
- Olaylarla Türk Dış Politikası, 1919–90. 8th ed. Published by AÜSBF Dış Münasebetler Enstitisü. Ankara: Siyasal, 1993.
- Ramazani, Rouhollah K. Iran's Foreign Policy, 1941–73. Charlottesville: University of Virginia, 1975.
- Saikal, Amin. "Iranian Foreign Policy." In The Cambridge History of Iran, Vol. VII, ed. Peter Avery, pp. 426–56. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Sander, Oral. Siyasi Tarih; Birinci Dünya Savaşının sonundan 1980'e kadar. Ankara: İmge, 1989.
- Şimşir, Bilal N. Bizim Diplomatlar. Ankara: Bilgi, 1996.
- Soysal, İsmail. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları, C. II. Ankara: Türk Tarih Kurumu, 1991.
- Tülümen, Turgut. İran Devrimi Hatıraları. İstanbul: Boğaziçi, 1998.

Relations with the EEC

I. THE ORIGIN OF THE TÜRKEY-EEC RELATIONSHIP

After World War II, there was a determination to ensure that Europe would never again become a battleground. To this end, leaders and nongovernmental organizations undertook efforts to achieve an integrated Europe that had overcome its political and economic problems. The first fruits of this effort began to appear in the early 1950s.

Actually, the origins of European integration date back to the thirteenth century. Even in the works of Dante Alighieri we can see references to a united Europe made up of Christian states. It only became possible to talk realistically about a Europe united economically and politically following World War II, however, when people started warming up to the subject. There were two reasons for this: the belief that enmity among the states of Europe could only be overcome through integration and the conviction that it would take a strong and united Europe to prevent the spreading Communist menace in Eastern Europe from also threatening Western Europe.

On 7 May 1948 a European Congress was held, with the participation of 750 delegates from a number of Western European countries. The European Movement was established at this Congress and did much to accelerate the tendencies toward integration. A new political organization to be known as the Council of Europe was set up on 5 May 1949. The Organization for European Economic Cooperation was also established that year for the purpose of allocating Marshall Plan aid funds to recipients.

At a time when the European countries were pooling their efforts to overcome the ravages of war, the French minister of foreign affairs, Robert Schuman, issued the Schuman Declaration on 9 May 1950. This declaration provided for the establishment of a supranational organization bringing together a number of European countries to manage the coal and steel production of member states. It was hoped that bringing France and Germany together as members of the organization would overcome the lengthy bloody rivalry between them and prevent the recurrence of internecine strife in Europe.

The Schuman plan was speedily implemented, and the institutions at the core of today's European Union were set up one by one. France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, Italy, and Luxembourg met in Paris and signed on 18 April 1951 the treaty establishing the European Coal and Steel Community. When the treaty became effective on 23 July 1953, these six countries pooled their coal and steel production. The European Defense Community of 1952 and the European Political Community of 1953 (other projects envisioned to promote European cooperation), however, failed to materialize. Acting on the conviction that political union could only be built upon an integrated infrastructure, Europe's leaders decided to concentrate on promoting economic cooperation and launched the European Initiative at their Messina meeting held in 1955. In this framework, a committee was set up under the chairmanship of Belgium's foreign minister, Paul Henri Spaak. The committee was charged with the task of drawing up a draft treaty that would secure the integration of all sectors of the European economy.

As a result of the committee's work, the European Economic Community (EEC) and the European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM) were formed. The governing bodies of the European Coal and Steel Community, the EEC, and EURATOM were merged in two stages through the 1958 Treaty of Rome and the 1967 Merger Treaty. After this the three bodies came to be known as the European Communities (ECs) (Box 5-19). Before their fusion, each of these bodies had its own institutional structure, but after fusion they became bodies serving the overall requirements of the European Communities (boxes 5-20, 5-21, and 5-22).

From these purposeful beginnings, the European integration movement proceeded to success, even though it was occasionally beset by crises, and toward the end of the

Box 5-19. The Process of Deepening the EU

The term "deepening" is used within the context of European integration to denote the extension of the areas of competence and activities and the changes within the institutional structures of the integration process. In general, the deepening process has taken place through the amendments of the founding treaties and has occurred in five stages.

- The Convention on Certain Institutions Common to the European Communities (25 March 1957) was signed on the same date as the Rome Treaty in 1957, according to which the Assembly (which would develop into the European Parliament) and the Court of Justice of the three communities would be merged into single organs.
- 2. With the Treaty Establishing a Single Council and a Single Commission of the European Communities (the Merger Treaty, which was signed in 1965 and entered into force in 1967), the councils and the commissions for all three communities would be merged into single organs.
- The Single European Act of 1987 was designed to turn Europe into a single internal market through institutional changes and a broadening of areas of competence.
- 4. The Maastricht Treaty (see Box 7-18 in Section 7) was signed in 1992 and came into force the following year. This treaty established the basis for a single and common monetary policy, extended the areas of competence and activities of the EU, changed the name of the European Economic Community to the European Community, and laid the foundations for political integration (that is, a European Union) by extending cooperation into the fields of defense, security, justice, and home affairs.
- 5. The Amsterdam Treaty entered into force in 1999 (see Box 7-20 in Section 7). The institutional structure of the EU was revised in preparation for the enlargement of the union with the treaty. Some amendments were also introduced to the EU's competences, and the founding treaties were consolidated to avoid confusion.

Finally, the Nice Treaty was signed in December 2000 (see Box 7-21 in Section 7). This treaty introduced important institutional changes necessary for the enlargement of the EU. After completion of ratification procedures, this treaty came into force in February 2003.

(S. BAYKAL)

twentieth century turned into the supranational political organization known as the European Union (Box 5-23).

Turkey was going through a period of economic and political difficulty in the second half of the 1950s and for this reason initially remained aloof from the growth of the integration movement in Europe. Turkey had previously accorded the highest priority to joining the OEEC, the Council of Europe, and NATO. This time it remained somewhat indifferent to the new integration, because its future seemed uncertain.

Despite its internal difficulties and the somewhat uncertain future of the "Six," Turkey started seeking ways to establish some links with the EEC (the principal organi-

Box 5-20. The Institutional Structure of the EU

The institutional structure of the European Union is highly complex. As the process of European integration progressed, the structure underwent a series of changes through revisions in the founding treaties. The EU consists of three pillars. The first is made up of the European Coal and Steel Community. EURATOM (the European Atomic Energy Community), and the European Community, which are the elements of economic integration. The second and third pillars were introduced by the Maastricht Treaty (see Box 7-18 in Section 7); a common foreign and security policy and cooperation in justice and home affairs. Within this structure of three pillars, the EU has a single institutional structure, as confirmed by treaties. The EU Treaty declares in article 3: "The Union shall be served by a single institutional framework, which shall ensure the consistency and the continuity of the activities carried out in order to attain its objectives while respecting and building upon the acquis communautaire." Article 5 states that the EU's institutions shall carry out their responsibilities within the framework and the terms of the treaties establishing the European Communities and the EU Treaty. The powers and duties of the EU's institutions will differ according to their area of responsibility.

The EU's institutional structure consists of the "basic structural institutions": the European Parliament, the Council of Ministers, the European Commission, the European Court of Justice, and the European Court of Auditors (see Box 5-21 below). The "functional institutions" are the Economic and Social Committee, the Committee of Regions, the European Investment Bank, the European Ombudsman, and the European Central Bank (see Box 5-22 below) zation of European integration) from 1959 on, due to historical, ideological, economic, and political factors.

(S. BAYKAL)

Ankara was interested solely in the EEC and not the other two organizations, because it was primarily motivated by the need to overcome its economic difficulties. Turkey made its application to the EEC on 31 July 1959, and the Ankara Agreement was signed on 12 September 1963. The following discussion examines this period when Turkey formalized its relations with the EEC and considers the factors that influenced Turkey's actions and the EEC's reactions. Then it analyzes the Ankara Agreement and the changes it brought to Turkey's relations with the EEC and how the association functioned.

A. The Factors Influencing Turkey's View of the EEC

The Historical and Ideological Factors

Historically, all developments in Europe have tended to attract Turkey's attention. Turkey was eager to join both the Council of Europe and the OEEC. Although the Turkish approach to the EEC was more cautious, that or-

Box 5-21. The Basic Structural Institutions of the EU

The European Parliament is the democratic representative of the European peoples. It carries out the democratic supervision function in the EU and participates in various ways in the decision-making process. Its 785 members (as of 1 January 2007) are directly elected for five years by the people of the member states. The members of the parliament form groups according to their party affiliation. The parliament participates in the decision-making procedures, approves the budget, takes part in the appointment of the commission and dismisses this organ, approves the ratification of international agreements, and gives its assent to the accession of new members into the EU.

The European Commission is the institution where the EU's supranational character is most apparent. The commission identifies and pursues the common interest and promotes further integration. After being selected by the qualified majority of the member states and approved by the parliament, the twenty-seven members currently serve for a term of five years. They can be dismissed by a vote of censure in the European Parliament.

According to the treaty establishing the European Community, the commission is the body that initiates the decision-making process. The commission also investigates breaches of EU rules and regulations by member states and individuals and ensures the enforcement of EU legislation. As the executive organ, the commission makes the necessary arrangements for carrying out the decisions of the Council of Ministers. It represents the EU, negotiates international agreements, and implements the budget.

The EU's Council of Ministers is the institution that directly reflects the interests of the member states and provides the framework for their participation in the decision-making mechanisms of the European integration. While acting according to the instructions coming from member states, it also looks after the EU's goal of advancing integration. Within the institutional structure, the council is the supreme decision-making organ and shares some of its powers with the European Parliament. Each state is represented in the council by a government minister empowered to enter into binding commitments on behalf of his or her government. The composition of the Council of Ministers changes according to the subject matter under discussion. The presidency of the council rotates among members and lasts for six months.

The European Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance established by the Single European Act perform the Judiciary function. The Court of Justice currently has twenty-seven members, one Judge from each member state. Its duty is to ensure that the law is observed in the interpretation and implementation of the founding treaties. Within its function of judicial review, the Court of Justice is empowered to secure proper and effective implementation of community legislation. Within its function of interpretation, the Court of Justice ensures the uniformity in the interpretation and application of community legislation. It also has the functions of settling some legal disputes arising from community law and filling gaps in community legislation.

The European Court of Auditors has been included among the main structural institutions of the EU by the Maastricht Treaty. Its twenty-seven members examine the accounts of all revenues and expenditure of the EU to determine their legality and to ensure that they conform to regulations. The annual report of the commission can only be approved by the European Parliament after it has been cleared by the Court of Auditors.

(S. BAYKAL)

Box 5-22. The Functional Institutions of the EU

The Economic and Social Committee is an advisory body that assists the European Council and European Commission. The committee consists of interest groups from the member states. The treaty establishing the European Community contains provisions requiring the council and the commission to seek the opinions of the committee in specific situations.

The Committee of Regions is an advisory body consisting of the representatives of local and regional communities. It was established by the Maastricht Treaty. The council and the commission are required to consult this committee in specific situations.

The European Investment Bank was established to finance investments that contribute to the attainment of the EU's goals. The bank is a corporate body that enjoys financial autonomy. Its priority objective is to provide loans to projects that contribute to the balanced development of the EU.

The Ombudsman as an institution was established by the Maastricht Treaty. The Ombudsman is appointed by the European Parliament. The person who holds this position examines claims of maladministration regarding all EU institutions, with the exception of the European Court of Justice and the Court of First Instance. All citizens of the EU as well as persons and corporate bodies resident in the EU may apply to the Ombudsman. The results of the Ombudsman's investigations are submitted to the European Parliament.

The European Central Bank is responsible for formulating and implementing the monetary policies of the EU.

(S. BAYKAL)

ganization also appeared attractive to Turkey, like other organizations open to wider European participation. Ever since the establishment of the Ottoman Empire, Turkey has turned its face to the West and has been more interested in developments in Europe than in developments in the East. This westward orientation developed into the objective of becoming Western and European toward the middle of the nineteenth century; "modernization" and "Europeanization" came to be synonymous for Turkey.

From the early years of the Republic, Turkey strove to

Box 5-23. Types of Economic Integration

Economic integration is a process that goes through phases, with its pace depending on the readiness of the members to unite and the time frame in which they want to come closer. In the final phase, it can end with political integration, when the different countries become a single political entity. Each phase can lead to further integration, but integration might also be arrested at a determined stage.

These phases can be classified as follows.

Preferential trade agreements: these agreements are designed to increase the volume of trade between the parties. Within the framework of such agreements the parties seek to reduce the obstacles to the flow of trade by customs tariff reductions on all or specific products and by increasing cooperation in the area of customs formalities. As a rule, such agreements are concluded bilaterally; but, like GATT, they can be concluded as a multilateral agreement. Preferential trade agreements do not attempt to change the structure of international trade because they are based on the existing volume of trade, which such agreements seek to expand. The level of economic integration among the parties of these agreements is minimal, although the agreements can be the first step toward further integration.

Free trade areas: the purpose of these arrangements is to secure the full liberalization of the exchanges of goods produced by the member countries. To this end, customs barriers and all similar barriers preventing or restricting trade among the members are removed. But the members have no obligation to apply uniform customs to countries outside the free trade area; nor do they have to apply harmonized trade policies toward nonmembers. Since the regime applying to goods originating in countries outside the free trade area will differ, the rules applying to origin are of some importance in this form of integration. The European Free Trade Association (EFTA) is an example of this form of integration.

Customs unions: countries that enter into a customs union must eliminate all customs duties and duties with similar effects, quotas, import and export restrictions, and all other restraints on trade with their partners. They must also apply uniform customs barriers and common trade policies toward third countries. Customs unions constitute a more advanced stage of integration because the freedom of members to pursue independent trade policies is restricted. In such unions, common institutions are established.

Common market: this is the form of integration in which, in addition to goods, other factors of production are also allowed to circulate freely. That is, labor, services, and capital move without restrictions. Consequently, a common market can be described as a customs union plus factor mobility. An important feature of a common market is the removal of noncustoms barriers to trade. In a common market, licenses, border controls, customs formalities, differing standards and arrangements regarding public security, health, and the environment, differing tax structures, state aid, competition policies, and other trade impediments have been removed. The making and the implementation of common policies require a developed institutional structure. European integration was originally designed to achieve a common market, but at present it has advanced beyond that stage.

Economic and monetary union: In this form of integration, the members move on from a customs union to achieve integration in their monetary and macroeconomic policies. This kind of integration, requiring a highly developed institutional structure, can also lead to political union. The European Union is a monetary union. It is not yet a full economic union, but a very important step in that direction has been taken.

BAYKAL)

establish close relations with the nations at the vanguard of Western civilization and turned its back on Asian nations, even though most of its territory lay in Asia. After World War II, Turkey failed to participate in the 1949 conference of Asian states; although it did participate in the Bandung Conference in 1955, it took a pro-Western stand. Turkey took part in European sports tournaments rather than Asian tournaments and displayed interest in Western initiatives. These were all signs of the Turkish bias toward things Western and European.

The Economic Factor

Turkey's perception of the EEC was also colored by the belief that association with the group might provide additional means to overcome the bottlenecks plaguing its economy. The years when European integration accelerated and the EEC started turning into the European Common Market were precisely the time when Turkey's relations with the U.S. started becoming strained, even though Ankara was completely dependent on the U.S.

economically. As U.S. aid, Turkey's main source, started to slacken and became conditional, Turkey found itself forced to seek new sources for long-term loans. In these circumstances, Turkey saw the EEC as a lifesaver that could help to pull it out of its economic difficulties.

In addition, three lesser factors should be kept in mind.

- 1. The concepts of economic integration and a common market were getting broader acceptance throughout the world, and the idea that such initiatives would be successful was gaining ground.
- 2. The members of the EEC were traditionally Turkey's principal trading partners. Turkey was familiar with their markets and their trading practices.
- 3. Turkey's geographical location vis-à-vis the EEC countries could allow it to serve as a transshipment center for European products headed for the Middle East and Africa. The prospective profits to be derived from this trade also influenced Turkey's decision to seek a partnership with the EEC.

The Political Factor

A group within the DP believed that the acceptance of Turkey by the EEC, made up of advanced European countries, could be presented as a foreign policy success of the ruling party. Although Adnan Menderes and Celal Bayar were cognizant of the political benefits that EEC membership might confer, they were also aware that membership would increase economic dependence, which might in turn strengthen the hand of the opposition. A group led by the minister of foreign affairs, Fatin Rüştü Zorlu, however, was in favor of applying immediately for membership. Members of this group felt that membership in the Common Market would enhance Turkey's position economically and politically and thereby strengthen the DP government domestically.

The hesitations within the DP ended with the victory of the pro-EEC group when Greece applied for membership.

This was a turning point in the process of Turkey's application for membership of the EEC. Although Turkey had been able to set aside the differences over Cyprus with its NATO ally through the Zurich and London agreements of 1959, it did not want to see Greece joining groups in which it was not represented for fear of finding its position weakened economically and politically. In this context, it was following Greece's policies toward the EEC with close interest.

In any case, Turkey and Greece had been following similar courses toward European integration all along. Both countries approached the activities of the Six with some caution. They also stayed out of the European Free Trade Association (EFTA), led by Britain, after that country was kept out of the EEC by France's opposition (Box 5-24). In a joint communiqué issued after the Zurich and London agreements, the prime ministers of Greece and Turkey declared that the two countries would closely examine developments in connection with the establishment of the EEC with a view to following similar courses whenever necessary.

Greece took radical steps to reform its economy and made its currency (the drachma) convertible. Having succeeded in improving its economic position, Greece realized that participating in European economic integration would help its economic restructuring efforts. At a time when the question of joining the Six or the Seven was being debated within the Greek government, a meeting was convened in London to consider the establishment of EFTA, to which Greece was not invited. This left Athens no alternative other than the EEC. On 15 July 1959 Greece applied for membership in the EEC, which was seen as

Box 5-24. EFTA

In 1958 some members of the OEEC proposed the establishment of a free trade area among the countries that did not want to join the EEC. The European Free Trade Association (EFTA) was established through the Stockholm Convention signed in 1959 by Austria, Denmark, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom. It became a practice to refer to these countries as the Seven, just as the EEC members were known as the Six. EFTA came into effect in May 1960. Finland (in July 1961) and Iceland (in March 1970) Joined the group as associate members.

EFTA was purely a economic organization with no supranational features. Two of the founder members of EFTA, Britain and Denmark, left the group in 1973 to join the EEC Within the process of European integration, the EEC called on EFTA members to join the EEC. As a result of these appeals and the negotiations that followed, the Agreement on the European Economic Area was signed at Porto on 2 May 1992. At first the members of EFTA expected certain gains from creation of the European Economic Area; but when they saw that the European Community was pushing strongly toward full economic integration, they decided to apply for membership in the community, to avoid being left out of what was becoming "Fortress Europe." By 2000 all EFTA countries with the exception of Switzerland, Norway, Iceland, and Liechtenstein had become members of the EU. Although EFTA has lost its effectiveness, it still exists legally.

(C. ERHAN)

the first victory of the Six over the Seven. The news of Greece's application created a stir in Turkey for a number of reasons.

- 1. Although the Greek prime minister had undertaken to act in concert with Turkey, Athens submitted its application to the EEC without consulting or even informing Ankara. It could not have acted in this way unless it expected substantial benefits.
- 2. Greece's principal export products were similar to Turkey's. Greece's unilateral application to join the EEC could result in its capturing some of Turkey's traditional markets, causing an important setback in Ankara's trade with Europe.
- 3. Through a possible membership in the EEC, Greece might strengthen its economy and its political structure. This would place Greece at an advantage vis-àvis Turkey in all international forums and particularly in NATO.
- 4. Although the Cyprus question had been resolved in a friendly manner, the Turkish public still looked upon Greece with suspicion. There was a widely held belief that a strengthening of Greece implied a weakening of Turkey. The ruling party would have difficulty in explaining to its electorate how Greece all by itself had become a member of an organization that contributed to the economic development of its members.

5. If Turkey was to derive any benefit from being a member of the EEC, its application for membership had to be made right away. As in the case of membership in the Council of Europe and NATO, it was correct to assume that the same criteria for admission to the EEC would apply to both Greece and Turkey. By delaying its application for membership, Turkey would be missing a great opportunity.

As a result of these considerations, Turkey submitted its application for membership sixteen days after Greece did so. Before examining the circumstances of this application, it is useful to see how the EEC members appraised Turkey in the late 1950s.

B. The Factors Shaping the EEC's Perception of Turkey

The Historical and Ideological Factors

The EEC's ideological approach to Turkey in the late 1950s can be examined on two different planes. On a formal plane, in those years European leaders and political parties did not dwell much on the factor of religious and cultural differences that weighed on Turkish-EEC relations after the 1980s. At that time, the EEC as an organization and its members tended to emphasize similarities rather than differences among countries. Some circles would have Western Europe constructed on the basis of the cultural heritage of the Holy Roman Empire. For them, Muslim Turkey and Orthodox Greece were equally alien. But, in consideration of economic and political factors, this dissimilarity was downplayed and not formally voiced. At a time when the Cold War was at its height, Turkey was seen as a country confronting the Soviet menace within the Western alliance, and its Western credentials were brought to the fore.

This was a time when Europe was still struggling to overcome the economic, political, and social damage wrought by World War II. Concepts such as human rights, democracy, and pluralism—the core of the arguments used against Turkish membership in later years—were not yet the main concern of the European public. As a result, such arguments were not formally advanced against Turkey.

On an informal and social level, the situation was quite different. When Turkey started showing an interest in the EEC, Turks and Europeans had been interacting for nine hundred years. Over a large part of this long period, the two sides had been engaged in conflict. This process started when the Turks became neighbors with Europeans when they entered Baghdad in 1048 to save the Islamic caliph and developed further when they first set foot in Europe in 1353. During the ensuing period, all European countries and most notably the papacy (the symbol of Christian Europe's religious and occasionally political unity) had occasion to confront Turkey. This long confrontation naturally colored the European view of the Turks, who were perceived in the popular culture as heathen, plundering, lazy, foul-mouthed, opium-growing, lecherous, ignorant, despotic, cruel, barbaric, and so forth.

Historically, four basic factors shaped the European view of the Turks (Güvenç, pp. 79–81).

- 1. The widely held belief among the European public that the Turks disparaged and spurned Christianity as they converted to Islam.
- 2. The feeling of superiority developed by European states vis-à-vis Eastern peoples, including Turks, as a result of acquiring a dominant economic and political position in the world through the commercial and industrial revolutions.
- 3. The anti-Turkish feelings that emerged in Europe in the nineteenth century as a consequence of the national uprisings of Christian peoples living under Ottoman domination.
- 4. The European displeasure at seeing the emergence of the Turkish Republic from the ashes of the Ottoman Empire, which had been dismembered following World War I.

In the context of these factors, the negative Turkish image was still fresh in European minds in the 1950s. This did not turn into an ideological opposition, however, and did not extend from the popular plane to a political plane until after the 1980s, under the influence of other factors.

The Economic Factor

The Turkish economy was weaker and more unstable than the economies of the EEC members. This negative factor led the economist of the EEC to conclude that the Turkish economy could not meet the challenge of increased competition that EEC membership would bring. The statist structure of industry made it difficult for this sector to compete, even behind protectionist walls. Stateowned banks were providing loans without proper supervision or planning. Despite the Cold War, 20% of Turkey's exports were going to the countries in the socialist bloc. The economy was constantly threatened with upheaval due to political instability. All of these factors conspired to diminish Turkey's attractiveness.

Others, however, saw Turkey (with its large population, its geographic location, and its growing economy) as an attractive market. The defenders of this view felt that Turkey's EEC membership need not be accomplished in one stroke. Furthermore, the Common Market was in its early stages, and its institutions were not yet in place. In these circumstances, relations with Turkey could be established at a privileged level but short of full membership. Within this relationship, the Turkish economy could be groomed to attain acceptable EEC standards within a process to be mutually accepted. Even if the pursued objective was not met, the EEC would have nothing to lose. The ultimate decision-maker in the community was the council, at which each EEC member had an equal say.

In spite of the arguments of those who looked upon Turkey's closer association with the EEC with benevolence, all the member countries felt considerable unease over the parlous state of the Turkish economy. In these conditions, the decision to maintain relations with Turkey at a gradual, controlled pace was made under the influence of political rather than economic factors.

The Political Factor

Despite the difficulties caused by cultural differences and the worries about possible economic incompatibilities, these concerns, although not completely forgotten, were pushed into the background in the political approach of the EEC countries to Turkey. This positive approach was based on three fundamental reasons.

- 1. Turkey was a country with a Western orientation, whose policies of modernization and becoming more European led it to pursue goals that were parallel to the goals of the EEC countries. This was clearly demonstrated in its activities within the Council of Europe and NATO. In all questions that involved European states, Turkey invariably took a pro-European stand. Turkey's strategic location had been a factor in its admission to NATO. In the future, the Six were contemplating a degree of integration that went beyond mere economic integration, and Turkey's strategic location also carried weight for these countries.
- 2. The biggest rival of the economic integration that the Six were intent on achieving was EFTA, led by Britain. No matter how different its cultural components were and how weak its economic infrastructure was, a European country's choice of the EEC rather than EFTA was seen as a victory over EFTA by the Six.
- 3. If Greece, whose economy was not all that much better than Turkey's, was accepted as an associate and Turkey was kept out, this might lead other European countries to lose their trust in the ideals of the EEC and drift away from it. Actually, the application of both Greece and Turkey to the EEC in quick succession had left the Six in a quandary. If both were turned away, they might seek to join EFTA. If only one was accepted, this might raise doubts about the EEC's objectivity at a time when the detailed criteria for membership had not yet been fully spelled out. If both were accepted, their weak economies would impose an undue burden on the EEC.

At that point it was decided to give equal treatment to Greece and Turkey and to establish closer relations with both countries by stages, as they met the conditions set by the EEC.

II. THE ASSOCIATION PERIOD

A. Toward Association

The Environment in Which Turkey Applied to the EEC

Greece's application for membership in the EEC on 15 July 1959 pushed Turkey into making a similar move. The minister of foreign affairs, Fatin Rüştü Zorlu, was the sole member of the cabinet who was following these developments at the time. When the news reached Ankara of Greece's application, Zorlu contacted Bayar and Menderes and persuaded them that Turkey must not be left out of a group that could bring great economic benefits to Greece. With the exception of a few diplomats in the ministry, no one in Turkey had a clear idea of the EEC, how it functioned, and how application for membership was made. Despite the lack of technical information, swift action was taken: the documents of application were prepared.

Zorlu was seeking to get Turkey's application for membership submitted as soon as possible after the Greek application, while trying to dispel the doubts in the minds of Bayar and Menderes. The DP leadership had two major concerns. First, would membership in the EEC, about which little was known, be of benefit to the Turkish economy or would it result in a return to the old regime of the capitulations? Second, how would the U.S., with which Turkey had close political, economic, and military links, look upon Turkish membership in the EEC?

To allay such fears, Zorlu went about persuading Bayar and Menderes directly, without wasting time trying to convince his fellow cabinet members. As a result of these contacts, the two leaders were able to agree that Turkey could not remain indifferent to the Greek application in view of the possible negative consequences of the Greek move for Turkey. In any case, an application did not imply Turkey's membership in the EEC. When the accession agreement was being negotiated, Turkey's economic and political interest would be duly taken into account. In the event of the application being turned down, however, the opposition would be able to use this to hurt the government, so it was decided to keep the application as concealed as possible from public opinion.

After receiving the green light from the president and the prime minister, Zorlu sought to determine the U.S. position on the matter. Washington had no objections to such a move by Turkey.

With these hurdles cleared, Turkey made its bid on 31 July 1959, two weeks after the Greek application. The application was made without notifying the Turkish public. The newspaper Akşam had a news item claiming that Turkey was not being admitted to the Common Market. One day before the application, this claim was officially denied, with the argument that no application had been made. In any case, at that time the Turkish public was more interested in the news about Western loans than in Turkey's application for EEC membership. When the news of Turkey's application started appearing in the press, the semiofficial mouthpiece of the DP, the newspaper Zafer, was forced to reveal the "secret" to the public on 3 August, with a news item entitled "Our Application" (Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 1, pp. 127–28).

As Ankara awaited the reaction of the EEC Council of Ministers to Turkey's and Greece's applications, two positive developments occurred.

The European press, with one or two exceptions, looked upon Turkey's application favorably and did not consider it strange or misguided. In fact, the Europeans were gratified that two southeastern European countries had applied to join the EEC and not EFTA.

The minister of economics of the Federal Republic of Germany, Ludwig Erhard, came to Turkey at the end of August 1959. He declared that his country considered it essential for Turkey to join the EEC. He also promised that Germany would intercede in European quarters and exert effort to secure Turkey's admission to the EEC.

These two developments heartened Menderes and Zorlu. On 11 August the cabinet, presided over by Celal Bayar, took up the issue of Turkey's application for membership in the EEC. Some ministers pointed out that the question had been decided upon without a broad-ranging debate over its implications and that a negative outcome would create difficulties for the government. Menderes replied emphatically that the application decision would not be reviewed and that Turkey would not be placed at a disadvantage vis-à-vis Greece.

The decision from the EEC was quick in coming.

On 11 September 1959 the EEC's Council of Ministers accepted Greece's and Turkey's applications. This would be followed by a long and tortuous process of negotiations to determine the nature of the cooperation between Turkey and the EEC.

The Initial Contacts

Following Turkey's application, the first negotiation took place in Brussels on 28 to 30 September 1959. The EEC participated with the negotiating team that had met with the Greeks, while Turkey's negotiating team was led by Semih Günver, head of the Department of International Economic Relations of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and composed of representatives of different ministries.

As the application had come without much notice, both sides were somewhat unprepared for the negotiation. Consequently, the first encounter was more in the nature of a consultation, where each side tried to understand the position of the other side.

The Turkish side submitted a memorandum indicating that Turkey's ultimate goal was a speedy accession to the Common Market and that Turkey understood association with the EEC to mean a customs union. It was clear that for Turkey the priority was the establishment of a customs union.

In the first negotiating session, Turkey indicated the privileges and concessions that it was seeking during the association process.

Turkey was asking for five basic privileges. (1) The Treaty of Rome had fixed the span of time to be given to candidates for accession to the customs union. But since the state of Turkey's economy did not allow it rapidly to join a customs union, Ankara wanted this span to be extended to twenty-two to twenty-five years. The first six years would be the preparatory stage, and the remainder would be the transition stage. (2) The Treaty of Rome had also fixed the responsibilities of candidates during the preparatory stage. Turkey, however, wanted to limit its responsibilities to harmonizing its tariffs with the common tariff and removing quotas. (3) Ankara wanted to sign long-term agreements with the EEC in connection with some of its traditional exports like tobacco and cotton. (4) Turkey wanted long-term and low-interest loans and incentives to European investors to invest in Turkey. (5) Ankara wanted to be represented in the organs of the EEC and participate in its decision-making process.

The Turkish delegation was asking for much more than it was ready to grant at the negotiations. The delegation was unprepared and failed to make a clear and forceful case. The EEC delegation was disappointed with the Turkish stand and indicated that Ankara's request for a term of twenty-two to twenty-five years was much too long. After this first consultation, the EEC prepared an appraisal report in October in which the Greek and Turkish negotiating positions were compared. According to the report, Turkey wanted the same privileges as Greece, but the commitments it was ready to make were few and vague as compared to those that Greece was willing to accept. Ankara was also seeking an accession period that was much longer than Greece's. The report insisted on the need to have commitments that were commensurate with the privileges being sought.

The findings of the report corresponded to the views of the EEC capitals, so it was to be expected that the negotiations being conducted with Turkey and Greece would differ in their form, content, and duration. The EEC took action in this direction and decided to end the preliminary talks with Greece and move on to the formal association negotiations, while it would prolong the preliminary talks with Turkey.

The second preliminary get-together with Turkey took place in Brussels on 2-4 December 1959. Although the Turkish side continued to defend the position it had adopted at the first meeting, it put forward proposals that were more detailed and precise, especially in connection with tariff cuts. Turkey was now prepared to make a 10% cut in tariffs during the preparatory stage and in addition two extra cuts of 5% each. This proposal received a positive reaction from the EEC, which insisted on the cuts being linked to a firm calendar. Turkey was reluctant to provide this right away. It pleaded that it was engaged in harmonizing its tariff schedules and customs structure with those of the EEC. It was also seeking to determine which products and sectors would need extra protection, and all of this would take some time. At this meeting, the subjects of the protection to be provided for Turkish export products like cotton and tobacco, the aid to be furnished to Ankara, and Turkey's representation in the governing organs of the EEC were also on the agenda. Although no definite position was adopted by the EEC on the first two subjects, Turkey's wish to be represented in the Council of Ministers of the Common Market before membership was firmly rejected. The request of the head of the Turkish delegation, Semih Günver, at least to allow a Turkish minister to participate as an observer was also turned down. The EEC agreed to set up a council of association and association committees, however, in which the EEC and Turkey would participate on an equal footing. The Council of Association eventually was established and came into operation.

Problems Slowing Down the Negotiations

The second meeting had once again failed to define the nature of the future association. While preparing for the third meeting, Turkey held a meeting with Greece, at the recommendation of the EEC, at which their problems with the EEC were discussed and compared. At a meeting held in Athens on 7–9 January 1960, the two sides exchanged views on their respective approaches to the EEC.

As a result, it became apparent that the two countries approach differed in three ways.

- 1. In the preparatory stage Greece divided the products to which it would apply tariff reductions into two main categories. The first category consisted of raw materials, capital goods, and transport vehicles. The tariffs on these products would be reduced over twelve years to conform to the Treaty of Rome. The products in the second category would also have their tariffs eliminated over twelve years, with the exception of a long list of products that would be protected. In contrast, Turkey was asking for a period of twenty-two to twenty-five years to eliminate tariffs.
- 2. Greece had made important strides toward harmonizing its tariffs with those of the EEC and had entered into talks with the GATT to complete this process by May 1960. Turkey had done nothing in the way of tariff reductions.
- 3. Greece had asked the EEC to eliminate tariffs on olives, dried figs, raisins, and citrus fruits immediately and requested generous quotas for tobacco and cotton. Turkey was seeking long-term trade agreements with the EEC for its traditional export products.

Although Greece was as demanding as Turkey with respect to its export products, it was moving toward accepting the EEC's demands in other areas. After the Athens talks, the Turkish side came to the conclusion that Turkey's demands were more comprehensive than Greece's, which would give the Turkish side more room for maneuver in the negotiations. What Turkey considered to be more room for maneuver in the negotiations, however, was an approach that was full of ambiguities and unacceptable demands and unlikely to lead to common ground. In the light of the preparatory meeting with Greece and Turkey, the EEC concluded that Greece was more accommodating and engaged in serious negotiations with Greece while remaining distant to Turkey.

The EEC's Decision to Go Slowly

With the first two meetings yielding scant results, it was to be expected that further meetings would occur. But the EEC was taking its time in holding a third meeting. There were two explanations for the EEC's reluctance to move.

The EEC had become aware that Turkey was being dragged into a period of instability as a result of internal events. The tough and repressive measures adopted by the DP government to deal with political and social developments were in conflict with the principles of the EEC countries. The Turkish government exercised tight control over the press, prevented trade unions from engaging in international contacts, banned strikes, and repressed the opposition. This was causing concern in the EEC, which feared that political and social upheaval in Turkey might spread into the EEC. As a result, the Six decided to follow a "wait and see" policy vis-à-vis Turkey and slowed the pace of the preliminary negotiations.

Another explanation was that the different organs of the EEC had not yet adopted a common stand with respect to Turkey. This was also slowing down the preliminary negotiations.

The commercial attachés of the Six in Ankara prepared a joint report on 19 December 1959 in which they argued that the weak Turkish economy would be unable to shoulder the burdens that an association with the EEC would impose. Turkish industry was operating only thanks to protectionist barriers and had no chance of survival in the competitive environment that would come about as a result of association with the EEC. Instead of rushing into an association, it would be in the EEC's interest to follow developments for a few years to see how things unfolded.

Furthermore, the EEC Commission prepared a report, dated 23 November 1959, in which similar views were expressed. The commission stressed that Turkey, with its population of 25 million, was more likely to create serious problems for the EEC than Greece was. The heavy debt burden threatened economic stability, and it was difficult to be optimistic about the future, because the government's economic policies did not conform to any rational pattern.

Against these two reports, the decision-making organ of the EEC, the Council of Ministers, stressed the political interests of the Six rather than the economic problems that might be created by Turkey's membership. The council's report of 8 September 1959, which was the basis for approval of Turkey's application, was still valid. The EEC held a very important place in Turkey's foreign trade. Despite shortcomings, the country was carrying out its essential investments. Membership in the Common Market would be an important factor in anchoring Turkey in the Western camp. A Turkey within the EEC and with a viable economy could provide major benefits to EEC counties.

Despite the council's positive approach, the events in Turkey seemed to confirm the warnings of the trade attachés and the commission. At the council's meeting held on 1–2 March 1960, the ministers appraised the preliminary meetings held with Turkey and Greece. In the light of the developments up to that point and the positions adopted at the preliminary negotiations, they decided to conclude the preliminary negotiations with Greece and move on to the formal association negotiations. Preliminary negotiations with Turkey would continue. Having started negotiations at the same time, Greece had overtaken Turkey at a crucial juncture.

Turkey's Concern over EEC-Greek Relations

The council's decision was very badly received in Ankara. The president of the EEC made a statement declaring that "our preliminary negotiations with Ankara have not advanced to the point where we can reach a decision; but I can tell you right away that our association with Greece will differ from our association with Turkey" (Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 1, p. 143). This soured Turkey's attitude even more.

Ankara had always held that the EEC should treat Turkey and Greece even-handedly. Turkey's application to the EEC had been made in order not to be left behind by Greece. But now Turkey had indeed been left behind, and the gap was going to widen.

Turkish minister of foreign affairs Zorlu was among the first to realize that things were not going well for Turkey in its relations with the EEC. On 17 March 1960 he met with the ambassadors of the Six individually to convey Turkey's displeasure. Zorlu placed the responsibility for the failure of the formal negotiations between Turkey and the EEC to get underway squarely on the attitude of the Six, accusing them of wanting to alienate Turkey from the West and force it to tighten its economic relations with the Eastern Bloc. Zorlu wanted the EEC countries to declare openly whether they were ready to help Turkey in achieving its political and economic goals. Finally, he declared that it was unacceptable for the EEC to be granting priority to Greece.

All six EEC countries found it necessary to review their positions in the face of this sharp Turkish reaction. The Federal Republic of Germany was at the forefront of those who felt that Turkey should not be antagonized and Ankara's sensitivities should be heeded. In this context, Germany's proposal was accepted at the meeting of the Committee of Permanent Representatives (COREPER) held on 22 March 1960. According to this decision, the preparations for the negotiations with Turkey would be accelerated with a view to undertaking formal negotiations, as was done with Greece.

Following this, on 21 April 1960, the committee considered the nature of the proposed association with Turkey, being fully aware of the Turkish sensitivity over Greece. The COREPER decided that the agreement with Turkey would be known as an association agreement, as in the Greek case, but the content of this agreement would depend on the outcome of the negotiations.

The Effect of the 27 May Coup on Relations

The EEC's Council of Ministers met on 10 May 1960 to consider the Turkish issue once again. It discussed the question of whether the process of Turkey's association would be identical with that of Greece or not. Developments in Turkey and the precarious situation of the Menderes government were on everyone's mind. Rumors were circulating about a possible military intervention. In these circumstances, ministers found it difficult to reach a decision. Either the Greek example could be followed (whereby formal negotiations with Turkey would be undertaken, with a customs union to be achieved in twelve years) or formal negotiations would lead to a customs union in twenty-two to twenty-four years, as Turkey was requesting.

The Federal Republic of Germany and Dutch ministers took a pro-Turkish stand. They stressed that it was important for the EEC to be even-handed when dealing with Greece and Turkey; an EEC approach favoring Greece was likely to produce very negative reactions in Turkey's collective psyche. The other ministers agreed with this appraisal. To start formal negotiations immediately, it was necessary for the EEC to reach an agreement with Turkey about the length of the transitional period leading to a customs union. The council decided that the preliminary negotiations would be considered completed and the commission would be authorized to enter into talks with Turkey to determine the possible nature of the association.

Turkey's efforts to stay abreast of Greece had been successful. The date for the beginning of the formal negotiations for accession to the customs union was set for 7 June 1960. But the coup of 27 May prevented this meeting from taking place.

The coup would be followed by a period of uncertainty in relations with the EEC. Upon instructions from Ankara, Turkey's representative in Brussels, Tevfik Saraçoğlu, informed EEC officials on 1 June 1960 that the new government would not act in haste with respect to Turkey's relations with the EEC. Ankara would follow developments in Greece's relations with the community and would formulate its policy in the light of these developments. This meant that Turkey was suspending its relations with the EEC. True, the declaration of the Committee of National Unity broadcast over the radio on the day of the coup had announced that Turkey would honor all of its commitments and be bound by its alliances. But it was difficult to see to what extent this promise would apply to the negotiations with the EEC, which had not yet resulted in any agreement.

During this period of uncertainty that followed the coup, the new government in Turkey released its program on 11 July, which stated that, in order to facilitate Turkey's entry into the Common Market, new economic, trade, and financial policies would be pursued and broadranging reforms would be undertaken. The declaration contained this sentence: "An effort will be made to determine, together with the members of the Common Market, the means for carrying out our rapid economic development and the protection of our infant industries, while at the same time securing own gradual adaptation to the obligations arising from the Common Market agreement" (Öztürk, p. 476). This demonstrated that Turkey stood ready to pursue the negotiations with the EEC initiated during the DP period. But the approach for the Six to Turkey during the summer continued to remain cool for three reasons.

- 1. The members of the EEC, which all had democratic regimes, were deeply disturbed by the coup that had taken place in a country with which they were about to enter into formal association negotiations. Furthermore, a large number of individuals, including the prime minister, the minister in charge of relations with the EEC, and officials, had been taken to a remote island to face a special court. European capitals were also disturbed by rumors of possible death sentences being handed down by this special court
- 2. The nature of the relationship that Turkey wanted to establish with the EEC was not very clear. The government's program made reference to both liberal reforms and protectionist measures. In addition, the new government was undecided about the authority that would be in charge of relations with the EEC. The Department of International Economic Cooperation, which had been conducting the negotiations with the EEC, was detached from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and attached to the Ministry of Finance, but its mandate to conduct negotiations with the EEC was transferred to the new minister of trade, Cihat İrem. There was a great deal of ambivalence, both institutional and substantive.

3. The EEC was also worried about the "new approach" to Turkish-EEC relations being elaborated by the interministerial Common Market Committee in Ankara under the coordination of the Ministry of Trade during the summer of 1960. Although no final decision was reached in the two preliminary meetings conducted with Turkey, there had been a decision in principle to eliminate all tariff barriers after a predetermined period. Those who were charged with the elaboration of the "new approach" in Ankara, however, included officials who were not well disposed toward the EEC. These officials insisted on maintaining tariff barriers to protect domestic production. Even if Turkey's new approach turned out to be quite moderate thanks to the minister of trade's moderate stand, the EEC continued to view Ankara with suspicion.

Ankara wanted to overcome this suspicion and, with this in mind, appealed to the EEC to hold a third meeting.

The New Turkish Thesis

Turkey and the Six met once again from 12 to 21 October 1960. This meeting was quite different from the previous two meetings. When the Turkish government indicated its desire to hold a meeting with the EEC without delay, Brussels agreed but declared that the meeting would be of a consultative nature and only for the purpose of hearing Turkey's views. The formal meeting originally scheduled for 7 June had been postponed indefinitely due to the coup of 27 May. Fully aware that Turkey was in a state of flux, the EEC was wary of entering into any firm commitments without knowing where Ankara stood and what obligations it was ready to assume.

When the talks got underway in Brussels on 14 October, the EEC noted that its cautious approach to Turkey was fully justified. Contrary to its previous stand, the Turkish delegation stated that it was ready to enter into an early customs union with the EEC within the terms of the Treaty of Rome. There was no mention of the twenty-two to twenty-four years of transition requested earlier. The Turkish delegation declared that the twelve-year transition period would suffice for Turkey to enter the customs union, with only very few conditions. This sudden switch in the Turkish position surprised the representatives of the Six.

Ankara was aware that the EEC's negotiations with Greece were making rapid progress and would result in an agreement within a relatively short time, so it developed a new position, which was conveyed to the EEC negotiators under the heading "New Turkish Thesis" (Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 1, pp. 147–48).

- 1. The Turkey-EEC association would conform to the principles of the customs union foreseen in the Treaty of Rome.
- 2. In the case of the EEC's agricultural exports, Turkey would gradually remove all tariffs and duties over a period of twelve years, on condition of reciprocity.
- 3. In the case of industrial products, Turkey would accept a composite system under which 30% of these products would be protected for periods exceeding twelve years, depending on the development of their local production. Tariffs on the remaining 70% of industrial products would be gradually reduced and in the end completely eliminated.
- 4. In the case of agricultural products, 75% would be completely liberalized, with no quantitative restrictions. This ratio would amount to 40% in the case of manufactured products.
- 5. The harmonization with the Common Customs Tariff would be carried out gradually over twelve years in cases where the Turkish duties were close to those of the EEC. Where they diverged by a wide margin, as in the case of the bulk of products, harmonization would commence after twelve years.

Unlike 'Turkey's previous commitments, these were comprehensive and detailed. Turkey also conveyed to the EEC its previous requests that it considered fundamental.

- 1. Turkish exports to the EEC would be subject to the customs regime that applied to trade among EEC members.
- 2. A loan of $100 to $120 million would be provided to Turkey to support the implementation of its development plan.

This time the EEC delegation found itself confronted with a Turkish delegation that had done its homework and came with a new position involving specific commitments. The EEC would have to review its position fundamentally, which could only be done by the Council of Ministers. The EEC delegation reacted in a preliminary way to the New Turkish Thesis, however, and provided some clues to the attitude of the EEC.

- 1. The tariff reductions that Turkey contemplated making for manufactured products were insufficient both in their amount and in their time schedule. Furthermore, it was inadmissible that almost one-third of manufactured goods would be protected.
- 2. The quantitative restrictions contemplated by Turkey were not in compliance with GATT requirements and therefore did not conform to the expectations of the EEC.
- The EEC could not apply its internal customs regime to all Turkish agricultural products, although it was ready to apply this regime selectively to specific agricultural products.

4. The EEC was not against providing financial assistance to Turkey. But the amount of aid and its timing would be geared to the development plan, which had not yet been completed.

Following the Turkey-EEC meeting, the EEC's Council of Ministers met on 26 October and took up the issue of the level at which relations with Turkey would be conducted. Despite certain inadequacies, Turkey appeared to be ready to undertake substantial commitments. The Federal Republic of Germany called for an early engagement in formal negotiations with Turkey in view of the size of the country's current account deficit and the possibility that Ankara might intensify its economic relations with the Soviet Union. The other members of the council pointed to the need for the situation in Turkey to be clarified and asked for the extension of the preliminary negotiations.

The Greek Factor Once Again

The fourth meeting with the EEC was scheduled to take place on 27 February 1961. At that meeting Turkey expected to get the official reaction to Turkey's new thesis submitted at the third meeting. The EEC Commission postponed this meeting, however, on the grounds that the formal negotiations with Greece were about to be finalized and the workload of the commission did not allow for another meeting at that stage. The British application for accession had just been vetoed by France, and the EEC was anxious not to give the impression that it was closed to new applicants. This had led the EEC to be generous in granting the Greeks most of their demands. Turkey was following these developments closely and was getting ready to seek all the concessions that the EEC had granted to Greece.

The agreement signed in Athens on 10 July 1961 contained the following provisions (İKV, pp. 1–30; Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 1, pp. 150–54; Birand, pp. 74–76).

- 1. At first there would be a customs union with Greece, to be followed by full membership in the EEC. The transition to a customs union would last twelve years, and questions still pending after twelve years would be resolved before the end of twenty-two years.
- 2. The preparatory and transition stages foreseen prior to the establishment of the customs union would expire automatically without requiring a decision of the Council of Association.
- 3. The Six would apply the customs regime applicable to EEC countries to all Greek agricultural products, apart from certain products considered sensitive, and to all manufactured goods. All quantitative restrictions would be removed.

- 4. Greece would remove customs barriers and quantitative restrictions on practically all agricultural and industrial goods produced in EEC countries within twelve years, with certain exceptions where the removal of restrictions would extend to twenty-two years.
- 5. If the sides found themselves in disagreement over the implementation of the agreement or if a situation emerged that was damaging to their economies, they would be free to take unilateral measures to remedy the situation.
- 6. Workers with Greek citizenship would enjoy the right of free circulation within EEC countries after twelve years.
- 7. The EEC countries would grant a 50% reduction in customs duties to Greek basic export products as soon as the agreement came into force.
- 8. Over a period of five years the EEC would extend loans in the amount of $125 million to Greece to carry out projects.

Turkey's path to integration with the EEC was blocked when Greece reached an agreement with the Six on the principles of its association with the EEC. The vast majority of the political and economic experts in the EEC countries were of the opinion that the concessions made to Greece under unusual circumstances could not be granted to any other state. The next country in line was Turkey, and the Turkish authorities considered the agreement reached with Greece to be a good precedent for Turkey. But the EEC was in no mood to grant the same concession to Turkey. Brussels demonstrated this by postponing the fourth meeting from 21 February 1961 to 10 April and also issued reports probing the different options for a possible association with Turkey.

According to the EEC Commission, the economic conditions in Greece and Turkey were quite different (Birand, pp. 75–78). The commission was proposing that Turkey be given a five-year preparatory stage, with negotiations for a customs union to follow if progress was made during this stage. This five-year stage was to be flexible, with the possibility of shortening or extending it, depending on the circumstances.

This proposal demonstrated that the commission wanted to proceed with utmost caution toward a possible customs union with Turkey. But the commission also submitted another report to the council, which contained an alternative approach. According to this alternative, a close association would be established with Turkey without entering into a full customs union. The commission proposed that Turkey's development efforts be supported with economic and financial aid and indicated that it favored this second alternative (Birand, pp. 78–80).

Eventually, the Six agreed to hold the fourth meeting on 10 April. They also proposed that the meeting be held at a high level and that the nature of the association be placed on the agenda for detailed discussion.

The Beginning of Normalization

The fourth meeting took place from 10 to 21 April 1961. The EEC declared that Turkey could extricate itself from its economic difficulties through a preparatory stage, during which it would receive economic and financial aid from the EEC. The Turkish side put forward three concrete demands. (1) The agreement to be reached between Turkey and the EEC must bear the heading "association agreement." (2) The agreement must clearly state that the priority aim was a customs union. (3) In the course of determining the length of the preparatory stage and the conditions for entering the subsequent stage, flexible formulas should be devised for reconciling the provisions of the Treaty of Rome with the condition of the Turkish economy.

In the course of the fourth meeting, the parties merely took note of their respective positions, as in the case of the preceding meetings. But two things emerged from this meeting. First, Turkey considered a customs union to be the principal goal of an association. Ankara would not be satisfied with just economic and financial aid. Second, Turkey wanted equal treatment with Greece.

After the meeting, the interministerial body in Ankara in charge of accelerating and coordinating economic decisions called for a continuation of the talks with the EEC on condition that the principle of a customs union be kept in sight. Ankara had decided that its long-term interests called for compromise and a flexible approach (Tekeli and Ilkin 1993, p. 161; Saraçoğlu, vol. 1, p. 20).

Negative and Positive Factors Affecting the Negotiations

The Association Agreement was signed on 12 September 1963. During the process of negotiation, various negative and positive developments affected the course of relations between Turkey and the EEC. Ankara was determined to be conciliatory, and all of the negative developments were overcome in a spirit of compromise.

Three negative elements affected the negotiations in 1961 and 1962.

The high regard for the EEC among the Turkish public was diminished when the association agreement between Greece and the EEC was signed in Athens on 9 July 1961. A mood of pessimism set in when it became clear that Turkey had been left behind by Greece. A second element was the British decision to apply for membership on 31 July 1961. This raised the possibility that the agreement that Turkey contemplated signing might be postponed by the EEC. Furthermore, Turkey's trade was likely to suffer if the members of EFTA, to which Turkey did not belong, joined the EEC. A third negative element was the National Unity Committee's decision on 15 September 1961 to confirm three of the fifteen death sentences imposed by the special court set up to try the leaders of the Democratic Party. Within a few days, former prime minister Menderes, minister of foreign affairs Zorlu, and minister of finance Polatkan were executed. This led to very negative reactions in EEC countries and notably in France. The EEC was unable to reach a common decision on how to proceed, but it was agreed that relations with Turkey would be allowed to cool considerably (Birand, pp. 100-102).

Three positive developments also occurred during this same period. First, Turkey undertook the preparation of a document containing the commitments that Turkey was ready to make and what it expected to receive from the EEC. This document was prepared in the light of the deliberations at the fourth meeting and was submitted to the EEC on 24 August 1961. The document confirmed that Turkey wanted full integration with the EEC, while underlining Turkey's concern that the process of integration must not hinder Turkey's planned development model.

Turkey and the EEC would enter into a customs union in two stages (Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 1, pp. 165–66).

In the first stage, the necessary measures would be taken to prepare the Turkish economy for the extra competition that would come with the customs union. After five years, this stage might be extended, if necessary, by another two years. The Council of Association would decide on passing into the second stage.

The second stage would last no longer than twenty-two years, including the first stage. At the end of this stage, all tariff barriers and quantitative restrictions would be eliminated. As in the case of the Greek agreement, however, Turkey wanted to maintain protective barriers for specified products for a certain period even after the customs union came into force. An annex to the document referred to Turkey's importance to the West and to NATO and emphasized the need to integrate Turkey with the EEC on political grounds. While Turkey was admitting its economic weakness, it was also stressing its political importance. This argument would be used again when the 1987 application for memberships was made, at the time when Turkey entered the customs union, and when Turkey became a candidate for EU membership in 1999. With this document, containing the Turkish thesis, it became possible to accelerate the negotiations that led to the association agreement.

A second positive development was the holding of a general election in Turkey on 15 October 1961, which allowed a return to multiparty democracy after the interlude of military rule. The responsibility for relations with the EEC was entrusted to the minister of state and deputy prime minister, Turhan Feyzioğlu, who gave the task of coordinating relations with the Six to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The Interministerial Committee for Foreign Economic Relations was set up, and Kamuran Gürün, a diplomat specializing in EEC affairs, became its secretary-general (Birand, p. 112).

The third element was the meeting held by F.C. Erkin on 20 March 1962 with French president Charles de Gaulle. Erkin made a special effort to persuade de Gaulle to restart the EEC-Turkey dialogue, which had been blocked by France for political reasons. Erkin reminded de Gaulle that an EEC snub of Turkey could lead Turkey to redirect its trade to the USSR and the Eastern Bloc countries, which would have undesirable political consequences in Turkey. De Gaulle was sensitive to this argument, and Paris softened its stance.

Toward a Solution

The process of negotiation, which had been blocked by France, was restarted with the fifth meeting held from 18 to 22 June 1962. This time the EEC held that integration could be pushed forward without the need for a full customs union and placed emphasis on financial and economic aid. Following the meeting, the Turkish government launched a diplomatic offensive in the capitals of the Six, which yielded positive results. In this framework, Turkey recognized the provisional Algerian government under the tutelage of Paris, while France moderated its stand vis-à-vis Turkey.

In July 1962 the Council of Ministers authorized the commission to undertake formal negotiations with Turkey within specific parameters: the association agreement would conform to article 238 of the Treaty of Rome, would be open ended, and would include a Council of Association on the model of the Athens Agreement; the Council of Association would have to approve the transitions from the preparatory stage to a customs union; and rules applicable during the preparatory stage would be compatible with GATT rules (Tekeli and Ilkin 1993, vol. 1, p. 164).

The council's decision to take the Athens Agreement as a model gave Ankara much satisfaction. After an interval of two years, Turkey was able to look forward once again to the possibility of a customs union on equal terms with Greece. During the twelve months that elapsed before the signing of the Association Agreement, there would be five tough negotiating sessions in which the terms of association were thrashed out.

After the Cuban missile crisis of October 1962, Turkey's ties with the U.S. began to be questioned at different political levels in Ankara, as the need to strengthen links with other groups, including the EEC, became more apparent. Ankara took firm action to accelerate the negotiations. The text of the draft agreement was signed on 12 September 1963 by the foreign ministers of Turkey, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, and Luxembourg and by the president of the council on behalf of the EEC. The agreement came into force on 1 December 1964.

B. The Ankara Agreement

The agreement signed in Ankara consisted of thirty-three articles and annexes, which included a Provisional Protocol, a Financial Protocol, and a Final Act, plus four Declarations of Intent and Interpretation and a letter.

The Main Text

The preamble of the agreement stated that the parties "[h]ave decided to conclude an Agreement establishing an Association between the European Economic Community and Turkey in accordance with Article 238 of the [Treaty of Rome]." Article 1 declared: "By this Agreement an Association is established between the European Economic Community and Turkey."

Article 2 stated: "The aim of this Agreement is to promote the continuous and balanced strengthening of trade and economic relations between the Parties, while taking full account of the need to ensure an accelerated development of the Turkish economy and to improve the level of employment and living conditions of the Turkish people." This sentence confirmed that the association was not a customs union.

Paragraph 2 of article 1 declared: "In order to attain the objectives set out in paragraph l, a customs union shall be progressively established." Paragraph 3 indicated that the association was to include "a preparatory, a transitional, and a final stage."

The nature of the preparatory stage was described in article 3. "During the preparatory stage Turkey shall, with aid from the Community, strengthen its economy so as to enable it to fulfill the obligations that will devolve upon it during the transitional and final stages... The preparatory stage shall last five years, unless it should be extended in accordance with the conditions laid down in the Provisional Protocol."

Article 4 dealt with the nature of the transitional stage, during which the parties would "establish progressively a customs union between Turkey and the Community...[and] align the economic policies of Turkey and the Community more closely...this stage shall last not more than twelve years, subject to such exceptions as may be made by mutual agreement. The exceptions must not impede the final establishment of the customs union within a reasonable period."

Article 5 provided that "[t]he final stage shall be based on the customs union." No time frame was given for this stage, and its duration was left to the agreement of the parties.

The subject of the customs union was dealt with in article 10, which indicated that the customs union would cover all trade in goods and declared that it would involve "the prohibition, between member States of the Community and Turkey, of customs duties on imports and exports and of all charges having equivalent effect, quantitative restrictions, and all other measures having equivalent effect that are designed to protect national production in a manner contrary to the objectives of this Agreement." It also provided that Turkey would adopt the Common Customs Tariff (CCT) of the EEC in its trade with third countries.

One of the subjects to which Turkey attributed importance in the preliminary negotiations was the free circulation of workers. This subject was covered by article 12: "The Contracting Parties agree to be guided by articles 48, 49, and 50 of the Treaty establishing the Community for the purpose of progressively securing freedom of movement for workers." There was no definite provision on this subject or any clear obligation assumed by the EEC, which would lead to serious differences later on.

Article 13 regulated the freedom of establishment. "The Parties agree to be guided by articles 52 to 56 and article 58 of the Treaty...for the purpose of abolishing restrictions on freedom of establishment." Similarly, under article 14, the "Parties agree to be guided by articles 55, 56, and 58 to 65 of the Treaty...for abolishing restrictions on freedom to provide services."

Article 19 contained the following provision: "The Member States of the Community and Turkey undertake to authorize, in the currency of the country in which the creditor or the beneficiary resides, any payments or transfers connected with the movement of goods, services, or capital, and any transfers of capital and earnings, to the extent that the movement of goods, services, capital, and persons between them has been liberalized."

Article 20 provided for consultations "with a view to facilitating movements of capital between Member States...and Turkey that will further the objectives of [the] Agreement. They shall actively seek all means of promoting the investment in Turkey of capital from countries of the Community that can contribute to Turkish economic development... Residents of all Member States shall be entitled to all the advantages, in particular as regards currency and taxation, which Turkey accords to any other Member State or to a third country."

Article 28 contained a provision regarding Turkey's accession to the EEC. In subsequent years, Turkey's applications to the community would be based on this article. "As soon as the operation of this Agreement has advanced far enough to justify envisaging full acceptance by Turkey of the obligations arising out of the Treaty establishing the Community, the Contracting Parties shall examine the possibility of the accession of Turkey to the Community." Although this was not a binding commitment, it did impose a responsibility on the parties when the time was right and the necessary conditions had materialized. The parties were under the obligation not to hinder the development of the appropriate measures to facilitate their coming into existence.

The provision in article 28 did not exist in any other association agreement signed by the EEC, with the exception of the Athens Agreement signed with Greece. Unlike the other agreements, the Athens and Ankara agreements were designed to prepare the associated countries, through gradual economic integration, for full membership (Arat 1995 ["Avrupa Birliği ile Türkiye Arasındaki İlişkiler ve Gümrük Birliği"], pp. 588–92).

The Provisional Protocol

The Provisional Protocol annexed to the main text consisted of eleven articles. This text outlined the trade policies of the parties during the preparatory stage. A passage had been inserted in the preamble at Turkey's request: "Recognizing the importance to the Turkish economy, particularly in the preparatory stage, of exports in tobacco, dried grapes, dried figs, and hazelnuts."

Paragraph 1 of article 1 of the Provisional Protocol read as follows: "Four years after the entry into force of this agreement, the Council of Association shall consider whether, taking into account the economic situation of Turkey, it is able to lay down, in the form of an Additional Protocol, the provisions relating to the conditions, detailed rules, and timetables for implementing the transitional stage." In other words, it would require an Additional Protocol to pass from the preparatory stage to the transitional stage. Paragraph 2 provided that "[i]f the Additional Protocol has not been adopted by the end of the fifth year, the procedure laid down in paragraph 1 shall be set in motion again after a period that shall be fixed by the Council of Association and that shall not exceed three years."

In article 2 of the Provisional Protocol, the members undertake to establish specific annual tariff quotas for their imports of tobacco, dried grapes, dried figs, and hazelnuts from Turkey. The Common Customs Tariff would apply to the remainder of Turkey's exports to the EEC.

The Financial Protocol

The Financial Protocol annexed to the agreement described the financial aid that the EEC would provide to Turkey in order to alleviate some of the economic difficulties that Turkey might encounter because of its association with the EEC. Article I provided that the Turkish state and Turkish private companies could submit requests for the financing of investment projects to the European Investment Bank. Article 2 declared that the financing would be through loans and added that "these loans may be contracted up to a total of 175 million units of account, which may be committed in the five years following the entry into force of this Agreement."

The value of the unit of account was described in the interpretative declaration as 0.88867088 grams of fine gold. Paragraph 2 of the interpretative declaration stated: "The parity of the currency of a member state...in relation to the unit of account defined in paragraph I shall be the relation between the weight of fine gold contained in the unit of account and weight of fine gold corresponding to the par value of that currency communicated to the IMF." Paragraph 3 declared: "The unit of account...shall remain unchanged throughout the period in which the Financial Protocol is in force."

The Organs Established by the Agreement

The Council of Association

To implement the measures foreseen in the agreement, a Council of Association was set up to consider relations between the parties and make all decisions. This was the only body established by the agreement. Article 23 declared: "The Council of Association shall consist of members of the Governments of the Member States and members of the Council and of the Commission of the Community on the one hand and members of the Turkish Government on the other." By providing that the council would act by unanimous agreement, the agreement gave both sides the right of veto.

Article 24 provided that "[t]he office of President of the Council...shall be held for a term of six months by a representative of the Community and a representative of Turkey alternately." The Council of Association had the following responsibilities.

"The council shall determine all the protective rules foreseen in the Treaty of Rome" (article 8).

"The Council of Association shall periodically review the functioning of the Association in the light of the objectives of this Agreement" (article 22/2).

"The Council of Association shall adopt appropriate decisions where attainment of an objective of this Agreement calls for joint actions by the...Parties but the requisite powers are not granted in this Agreement" (article 22/3).

"The Council of Association may settle [a dispute submitted to it] by decisions; it may also decide to submit the dispute to the Court of Justice of the European Communities or to any exiting court or tribunal" (article 25/2).

"Where the dispute cannot be settled [in accordance with article 25/2], the Council...shall determine...the detailed rules for arbitration or for any other judicial procedure to which the Contracting Parties may resort during the transitional and final stages of this Agreement" (article 25/4).

The Committee of Association

The Council of Association established the Committee of Association in accordance with article 24 of the Ankara Agreement, consisting of the permanent representatives of the parties or their deputies. The committee's principal task was to be of assistance to the Council of Association and provide for continuity in the business of the council.

The Joint Parliamentary Committee

This body consisted of thirty members of parliament, of which fifteen belonged to the TGNA and fifteen to the European Parliament. The protocol establishing this body stated that the committee would deliberate on all issues arising from Turkey's relations with the EEC.

2. Appraisal of the Agreement The Legal Aspect

The Ankara Agreement will remain topical as long as the process of Turkey's membership in the EU remains on the agenda. From time to time theoretical discussions take place about the length of the term during which the agreement remains in force and the manner of its expiration. International law has general rules that determine the expiration of an agreement. If there is a specific provision regarding the expiration of an agreement, that provision will naturally determine the manner of expiration. The Ankara Agreement, however, contains no such provision. Consequently, the agreement will not come to an end unless one of the general rules of international law should apply. From this point of view, the Treaty of Rome and the Ankara Agreement are similar. Both represent a first step in an irreversible process of integration (Arat 1995 ["Avrupa Birliği ile Türkiye Arasındaki İlişkiler ve Gümrük Birliği"], pp. 591–92).

If interpreted broadly, however, article 28 (referred to earlier) can give an indication of how the agreement might come to an end. This is because the article provides the basis for Turkey's accession to the European Community when the conditions are ripe. On this basis, it could be argued that the Ankara Agreement will come to an end upon the entry into force of the accession treaty leading to Turkey's full membership.

The association established between the parties by the Ankara Agreement is designed to provide the conditions leading to Turkey's full membership. In this process, the customs union is a preliminary stage (transitional stage). The establishment of the customs union cannot be interpreted as the coming to an end of the Ankara Agreement.

Furthermore, references are made to the Ankara Agreement in decisions by the Court of Justice of the European Communities, in documents signed by Turkey and by the European Community, in the customs union document of 1995, and in the 1999 Helsinki document. In addition, the Council of Association established by the Ankara Agreement continues to meet in order to oversee Turkish-EU relations. All of this demonstrates that the Ankara Agreement remains in force (Arat 1995 ["Avrupa Birliği ile Türkiye Arasındaki İlişkiler ve Gümrük Birliği"], pp. 594–95).

The Political Aspect

When Turkey first made its application to the EEC and entered into negotiations with the European Community, it had not considered this question very thoroughly and had not formulated an EEC policy to guide its actions. Only a few politicians and officials were interested in this issue. As a consequence, when the draft agreement was initialed and came before the Turkish government for approval, it appeared to be coming out of the blue.

The only agency that was interested in and involved with the negotiations was the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The State Planning Organization (SPO) remained distant toward both the agreement and the EEC's tendency to reorder the Turkish economy. It chose to remain silent, however, rather than actively opposing the association. The universities and the media also remained silent on the issue.

When the agreement was submitted to Prime Minister İnönü, he arranged a cabinet meeting to consider the issue. This would be the only time that the cabinet discussed the subject. At the meeting İnönü voiced his concern that the agreement might revive the capitulations, which had been removed after a long struggle four decades earlier. The minister of foreign affairs, F. C. Erkin, succeeded in persuading İnönü, who only agreed to sign when he was given assurances that Turkey could withdraw from the agreement whenever it chose (Birand, pp. 155–58).

At the time, Turkey did not expect much from the agreement. Ankara pursued two basic goals in the course of the negotiations. One goal was to secure a document that would institutionalize its relations with the EEC and place them on a formal basis. The other was to benefit from the possibilities that the EEC was able to offer and not to remain behind Greece in the process of European integration. With such modest goals, it is easy to understand why Turkey did not make the necessary effort to carry out its obligations during the preparatory stage in order to reach the transitional and final stages quickly. Turkey's lax approach to the EEC in the 1960s and 1970s would be repeated during the 1990s when it resisted taking the necessary economic measures in connection with the customs union and refrained from making the economic, political, and legal reforms that would lead to full membership.

The EEC was exceptionally generous to Turkey in the Ankara Agreement. The EEC was aware that, with the agreement, it had entered into an integration process with Turkey that was to all intents and purposes irreversible. As a matter of fact, when relations became strained from 1976 to 1989, the European Community made repeated moves, formally and informally, to secure Turkey's consent to replace the Ankara Agreement with a free trade agreement. It was Turkey's firm stand against this pressure that induced the European Community to change its course after 1989.

The Institutional Aspect

The most glaring shortcoming of the Ankara Agreement was that the institutional aspect had not been elaborated in detail. The architects of the agreement felt that it needed to cover no more than the bare essentials in regard to the institutional structure, because the parties would become more closely integrated as time went by. According to forecasts made at the time, if everything went according to plan Turkey would become a full member within a few years after 1995. Developments after 1976 and especially the military coup of 12 September 1980, however, would seriously disrupt the envisaged timetable.

The agreement established no organ other than the Council of Association and was more in the nature of a framework agreement. But the Council of Association was empowered to set up the organs it considered necessary. The agreement contained the aims, the targets, the basic rules, and the stages. In other words, the agreement contained the general program for the integration of Turkey and the European Community. Matters such as the program's implementation, the required subprograms and arrangements, the measures that had to be taken at each stage, and their timing were left to the legal texts that would be annexed to the agreement and the decisions by the Council of Association (Arat 1995 ["Avrupa Birliği ile Türkiye Arasındaki İlişkiler ve Gümrük Birliği"], p. 594).

The Ankara Agreement was a flexible model that indicated the general direction and nature of the relations but left the details to the decisions by the Council of Association.

- The Course of the Association
- The Preparatory Stage
- a. Turkey's Position

The Economic Background

Instead of looking upon the preparatory stage as a time for building the necessary infrastructure to make the transition to the next stage possible, Turkey saw this stage as just a period that it had to go through before passing on to the next stage. From I December 1964, when the Ankara Agreement came into force, to 16 May 1967, when Turkey asked the European Community to commence the work for entering the transitional stage, not a single one of the structural changes foreseen in the agreement to strengthen the Turkish economy was carried out (Arat 1990, p. 169).

One of the main reasons for this was that the First Five-Year Development Plan, prepared before the Ankara Agreement came into force, was based an on inward-looking development strategy. The plan made provisions for eliminating the gap in income between Turkey and the OECD countries by setting a higher target for the rise in per-capita income than that prevailing in the rest of the OECD. The plan also aimed to achieve a balance in external accounts over a period of fifteen years. It would increase exports while replacing imports with local products. Because the plan was inward-looking, the yearly implementation programs only made general references to the agreement with the EEC and subjects dealing with the Common Market. The plan contained only one reference to relations with the EEC, noting that "the economic effects of the Common Market on the Turkish economy have been taken into account in the preparation of the plan and will also be carefully taken into account in preparation of the annual implementation programs" (Kalkınma Plânı 1963, p. 510).

During the preparatory stage, the shape of Turkey's relationship with the EEC was determined by the priorities of the plan as described above. In order to achieve the plan's goal of increasing exports, efforts were deployed to increase the quotas set for Turkey's traditional export products in the Provisional Protocol signed along with the Ankara Agreement: tobacco, dried grapes, dried figs, and hazelnuts. Under article 4, the provisional protocol had made provision for an increase in the tariff quotas from the second year after the entry into force of the agreement. From 1966 on, the quotas on the four products were increased in line with Turkey's request. Because of soaring demand in some EEC countries, Turkey's exports of hazelnuts exceeded the allocated quota by a wide margin.

In 1967 Turkey took advantage of the provision in article 6 to request quotas also for grapes, citrus fruit, olive oil, wine, textiles, and handwoven carpets. The request was granted, and the quotas went into effect on 1 December 1967.

The sending of workers abroad was seen as one of the means for reducing the deficit in the balance of payments. After 1965 the yearly programs began to attribute increasing importance to this issue. Although there was no direct link between this subject and the Ankara Agreement, the yearly programs contained provisions about the conditions of settlement of workers going abroad, their social rights, and the transfer to Turkey of their savings. In this context, Turkey brought the issue to the agenda of the Council of Association. But the EEC wanted this subject to be taken up after the preparatory stage and only agreed to give special importance to the social conditions of Turkish workers and their professional training.

In the Second Five-Year Development Plan, covering the period from 1968 to 1972, the basic strategy of the first plan was maintained in its general form. References to the EEC in the second plan were vague and without any concrete content. It pointed out that the regime that applied to industrial and agricultural products made it necessary to increase the efforts to strengthen the Turkish economy during the preparatory stage. The plan added that, to do this, the preparatory work would have to be followed through and effective measures would have to be taken to secure development within the general framework of the economy (Kalkınma Plânı 1967, p. 123).

Ankara attributed special importance to the EEC's commitment to provide Turkey with loans amounting to 175 million ECUs during the preparatory stage. During the period up to 1967 the EEC committed a total of 103 million ECUs to help finance twenty-two projects submitted by Turkey. Because the number of projects submitted by the Turkish public and private sectors remained inadequate, however, only 29,160,000 ECUs of the sum committed by the EEC could be utilized (Saraçoğlu, vol. 2, pp. 99–109; Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 2, p. 29).

The Haste of Governments

The government of Süleyman Demirel that came to power in 1965 started approaching the EEC capitals to secure the transition to the next stage without having completed the reforms that were supposed to take place in the preparatory stage. Demirel was in a hurry because he wanted integration with the EEC, which had been on Turkey's agenda for years, to take place during his tenure as prime minister. Furthermore, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was also pressing for quick action. Officials in the ministry felt that with the signing of the Ankara Agreement the customs union and eventually full membership in the EEC were as good as assured. The necessary institutions had been established, and there was no need to prolong the preparatory stage any further.

Indeed, the Council of Association, the Committee of Association, and the joint Parliamentary Committee were carrying out useful work. In addition, in March 1964 the Central Bureau of the Common Market was established in Ankara, composed of officials from the Ministries of Foreign Affairs, Customs and Monopolies, Finance and Tourism, and Trade. Officials representing the Ministries of Industry and Labor plus the State Planning Organization and the Union of Chambers of Commerce would also join the bureau later. The private sector led by the Istanbul Chambers of Commence and Industry set up the Economic Development Foundation in late 1965. The foundation was commissioned to create the conditions for optimizing Turkey's relations with the EEC.

Despite this institutional underpinning, Turkey had not carried out the necessary structural reforms foreseen in the Ankara Agreement. Nevertheless, Ankara wanted to move into the transitional stage.

There were two reasons for Turkey's haste. The first was the possibility that Britain might join the EEC (even though its application had been turned down by de Gaulle) and oppose Turkey's membership. Ankara was anxious to cover as much ground as possible on the path to integration before Britain's accession to the EEC. The second reason was Ankara's desire to take advantage of the freeze in relations between Greece and the EEC because of the military takeover in Athens and close the gap between Greece and Turkey in the field of relations with the EEC. At the meeting of the Council of Association held in Brussels on 16 May 1967, Turkey asked for the necessary steps to be taken to enter the transitional stage.

Although the EEC understood Turkey's motives for wanting to move swiftly, it felt that it was still too early to pass into the second stage. The EEC avoided giving Turkey a definite answer at the Brussels meeting and left the issue in abeyance for the time being (Birand, pp. 210–12; Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 2, p. 34).

Bureaucratic Objections: Planners vs. Diplomats

Gradually relations with the EEC started becoming a recurring issue among the general public. A group led by Demirel's Justice Party strongly supported closer ties with the EEC. Big business also favored such an approach. Those who felt that EEC membership would turn Turkey into a country with an industry that consisted merely of assembly plants came from the ranks of the CHP and the Turkish Labor Party. The majority of university faculty members defended the view that the EEC provided an economic structure suitable for industrialized countries and would lead to arrangements that would run counter to Turkey's efforts to develop its economy.

While the debate on this issue went on among different segments of society, a big controversy arose within the administration over the question of which government agency would be responsible for conducting relations with the EEC. On one side stood the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which had guided Turkey's relations with the EEC from the beginning. On the other side was the State Planning Organization, established in accordance with the 1961 Constitution. The SPO enjoyed enormous prestige and quickly became the platform for dealing with all of Turkey's economic problems.

Turgut Özal was the SPO's undersecretary in 1967. The personnel of the SPO included two distinct camps: those who held left-leaning views and those who were of a religious bent. Members of both camps were opposed to integration with the West, however, while favoring a policy of industrialization based on national resources. On the basis of this consensus, the SPO adopted policies designed to delay all developments that might lead to closer integration with the EEC.

This tendency of the SPO was clearly reflected in the agency's reports published after early 1968. In these reports the SPO underlined the need for Turkey to raise its economic level to the level of the EEC countries and industrialize without delay before entering the Common Market. A Turkey that was not industrialized and was facing economic difficulties would create problems both for itself and for the EEC. To overcome its problems, Turkey would have to raise its GNP at an annual rate of 7% and its industrial production by 11 to 12%.

All of this led the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the SPO to adopt differing positions over the years. These differences came to a head in March 1968, when Turgut Özal got the government to sign a decree that transferred responsibility for Turkey's relations with the EEC and RCD from the MFA to the SPO. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs reacted to this action divesting it of the responsibility for conducting relations with the EEC. Minister Çağlayangil retracted his signature from the decree. Eventually, a compromise was found by arranging for responsibility to be shared by both agencies. According to the arrangement, the technical aspects of the question that would be handled with the participation of the public and private sector would be the SPO's responsibility, while foreign representation, negotiations, and their coordination would be the responsibility of the MFA.

This redistribution of responsibilities did not end the feuding between the two agencies. During the negotiations in connection with the Additional Protocol, the planners and the diplomats would be arrayed in opposing camps.

b. The EEC's Policy of Delay

The Economic Reasons

While Turkey wanted to finalize the Additional Protocol and pass into the transitional stage as soon as possible, the EEC considered this to be premature, because Turkey had not profited from the preparatory stage to put its economy in order. Turkey had not carried out structural reforms and had made efforts only to secure increases in quotas. The transitional stage would provide Turkey with fewer advantages than the preparatory stage but would impose greater burdens. It was unlikely that a Turkey that was weak and unprepared could assume the responsibilities of the transitional stage and move on to the customs union.

The Political Reasons

In addition to the economic objections, the EEC also demurred for political reasons. One reason was the EEC's internal difficulties at that juncture. The EEC countries were more interested in establishing closer relations with industrialized countries of Europe that could keep pace with them rather than with countries like Greece and Turkey with which they had association agreements. Britain, Ireland, and Denmark topped the list of countries that the EEC was eyeing. De Gaulle's objections kept these countries from becoming members. Brussels wanted to keep Turkey at the preparatory stage in order to avoid overloading its already crowded agenda.

A second political reason was that the EEC had been formulating a new policy toward Mediterranean countries since the 1960s. The EEC signed agreements with Israel in 1964, Lebanon in 1965, and Morocco and Tunisia in 1969. With the preferential trade agreements signed with these countries, the EEC tended to see the Mediterranean basin as its own backyard. Greece and Turkey also had a place within this Mediterranean policy. But voices were being heard that these countries should be seen not as potential full members but as partners, along with the other Mediterranean nations. Consequently, Turkey had to be prevented from proceeding too rapidly in the process of becoming a full member.

c. The Process Leading to the Additional Protocol

Turkey's request to launch the preparations for the transition to the second stage remained unheeded at the meeting of the Council of Association held on 11 May 1967. At the sixth meeting of the Council of Association, held on 9 October 1967, however, the EEC did not object to the decision to undertake the preparatory work to determine the substance of the transitional stage.

The EEC report of April 1968 declared that Turkey's performance in the course of the preparatory stage did not allow for the commencement of the transitional stage. Lowering the prevailing tariffs on imports by Turkey would take longer than the original estimates. Unless substantial additional foreign resources were found, Turkey could not eliminate the existing restrictions on imports (Birand, pp. 234–35).

The report made it clear that Turkey was not ready to enter the transitional stage. But it also pointed out that Turkey had repeatedly requested a rapid transition to the second stage, that Ankara saw this as the only way to catch up with Greece, and that denying Turkey's request would have negative political and psychological consequences—something that should not be allowed to happen. If the transitional stage was postponed, the report foresaw a danger that the present economic situation would continue as before. In view of all this, the EEC would do well to approve passage into the transitional stage.

Hence both sides undertook the preparation of the Additional Protocol, which would allow the transition to the next stage. As in the case of the negotiation of the Ankara Agreement, the negotiations over the Additional Protocol were arduous. Compared to the previous negotiations, however, Turkey's hand was much weaker this time. Still, Turkey tried to improve its negotiating position by setting its initial demands at the highest possible level.

Ankara was seeking to get the EEC to agree to three things (Birand, pp. 249–52). First, Ankara wanted to delay for as long as possible the time when it had to reduce the tariffs on its imports from the EEC to zero. But it sought an early elimination by the EEC of tariff barriers on Turkey's exports of agricultural products.

Turkey's second demand had to do with the movement of its citizens. The EEC was being asked to fix the conditions under which Turkish workers could freely circulate and work.

The steps that the two sides would have to take to harmonize the economic and trade policies that would lead to full membership should be specified. In view of the losses that Turkey would incur in this process, it would have to receive high levels of financial aid. In this framework, a new financial protocol would have to be prepared along with the additional protocol.

In any case, under the Ankara Agreement, all three subjects were bound to be discussed in the course of the negotiations. Ankara was seeking to keep its obligations at a low level while obtaining maximum concessions from the EEC. On 3 January 1969 Ankara raised the guarantees required on imports by 20%, imposed a 25% stamp tax on liberalized imports, and banned the import of a great number products under the allocated category (Birand, p. 264). This was done to minimize possible losses. At the same time, a working group within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs prepared a list of products for which protection would be sought for a period of twenty-two years. This list constituted the backbone of Turkey's negotiating position. On 15 March 1969 the main briefing note that would be handed to the Turkish negotiating team was adopted by the Council of Ministers and given the status of a government decree. In the briefing note, the concessions that Turkey would be able to make were specified in great detail. This important and obviously classified document was declassified and published in the Official Gazette on 27 March. The public revelation of Turkey's negotiating position in this fashion caused a great commotion in Ankara. The State Planning Organization, which was against integration with the EEC and constantly feuding with the MFA, was accused of being responsible for this, but that was never proven (Birand, p. 261).

The Additional Protocol negotiations between Turkey and the EEC got underway in March 1969. By the Council of Association meeting in Brussels on 9 December 1969, the negotiations had revealed the positions of both sides. The EEC side was giving signs that it had reached the limit and was seeking to force Turkey to accept its conditions. When the council met, the positions of the sides were still divergent. Although both sides made certain concessions, agreement could not be reached. Çağlayangil returned to Ankara to consult the government.

The Turkish government had commissioned two reports to guide it through the negotiations with the EEC. One report, prepared by the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Finance, defended the view that the commission's proposals put before the Council of Association should be accepted, thus paving the way for entry into the transitional stage. The other report, prepared by the undersecretary of the SPO, Turgut Özal, and submitted directly to prime minister Süleyman Demirel, claimed that Turkey was not getting enough for the heavy obligations that the commission wanted Ankara to accept and that there was no advantage for Turkey in moving into the second stage.

This was a time when Demirel's position was weakened by opposition from within his own party and the CHP was in the ascendancy. Relations with Washington were tense because of increasing anti-Americanism among the public and because of the row over the cultivation of opium poppies in Turkey. Demirel felt that he could gain political advantage by presenting the transition to the second stage as a success for his government. In addition, the frayed relations with the U.S. could be compensated by closer ties to the EEC. So Demirel gave instructions to the negotiators to do whatever was necessary to start the transitional stage while seeking improvements in some of the economic conditions (Birand, pp. 314–18).

Aside from raising the amount of the loans to be granted to Turkey from $185 to $195 million, the EEC maintained its previous position in the Council of Association. In line with the prime minister's instructions, the Turkish negotiators were forced to accept the EEC's terms.

The agreed text was signed in Brussels on 23 November 1970. Aside from the Additional Protocol, the parties signed a Financial Protocol and the Agreement on Products Relating to the Area of Competence of the European Coal and Steel Community. While a parliamentary committee was considering the agreements signed in Brussels, the military intervention of 12 March 1971 took place, and the Demirel government was forced to resign.

The newly formed Nihat Erim cabinet was in favor of pursuing the previous course toward the EEC. After going through the various parliamentary committees, the agreements were approved by the TGNA in July 1971. A Provisional Agreement was concluded between Turkey and the EEC in Brussels, containing the trade regulations that would apply pending the coming into force of the Additional Protocol. On 1 September 1971, when the Provisional Agreement was scheduled to come into effect, Turkey raised its tariffs by 120%. By setting its tariffs at a high level, Turkey would be able to carry out its tariff cuts from these high levels (Birand, p. 347). The EEC considered this sleight-of-hand to be a sign of Turkey's bad faith. But in order to safeguard the new trade regime, which was the result of long negotiations, the EEC Council chose to remain silent over Ankara's action. The Additional Protocol came into force on 1 January 1973, following the completion of the ratification procedures in the member countries.

2. The Transitional Stage

a. The Documents of the Transitional Stage The Additional Protocol

The Additional Protocol consists of sixty-four articles covering nine separate subjects: (1) free circulation of goods (reciprocal elimination of customs duties, Turkey's adoption of the Common Customs Tariff of the EEC, elimination of quantitative restrictions), (2) alignment of Turkey's policies with the common agricultural policy, (3) the arrangements regarding the products subject to special procedures for import into the EEC, (4) free circulation of people, (5) free circulation of services, (6) right of establishment, (7) alignment of transport policies, (8) alignment of economic policies, (9) alignment of trade policies.

The preamble of the protocol declared that "the contracting parties shall, during the transitional stage, on the basis of mutual and balanced obligations, undertake joint measures to align the economic policies of Turkey and the Community with a view to establishing progressively a Customs Union between Turkey and the Community and ensuring the proper functioning of the Association." From this, it can be understood that the Additional Protocol established the conditions that would lead to the objective of a customs union.

The Additional Protocol contained detailed technical arrangements in three areas.

- 1. The Additional Protocol contained the calendar of the transitional stage. Article 1 stated that the methods, order, and duration of the conditions for carrying out the transitional stage as set out in article 4 of the Ankara Agreement would be regulated by this protocol. Article 61 declared that, unless otherwise specified in the protocol, the duration of the transitional stage would be twelve years. During this period Turkey would gradually lift internal restrictions and introduce, step by step, the common customs tariff. The EEC, however, would carry out its obligations in one step. In fact, it carried out these obligations in 1971, before the Additional Protocol came into force. Articles 7 to 30 of the protocol contained the measures regulating foreign trade that Turkey and the EEC would adopt.
- 2. The protocol introduced a new regime that transformed the structure of Turkish foreign trade. Turkey was committing itself to carry out reductions and adopt measures according to a predetermined calendar. Customs duties would be reduced step by step so that Turkey would conform to the Common Customs Tariff (CCT) by 1985. Starting at 35% in 1971, the proportion of products in the freely imported list would gradually rise to 60% in 1984. Turkey was slated to join the customs union in 1985. But sensitive products would continue to be protected for twenty-two years, until 1995. The full alignment of legislation would also occur in 1995.
- 3. The protocol also imposed substantial financial, economic, and social obligations on Turkey and the EEC. The Financial Protocol regulated the aid that the EEC would extend to Turkey in order to help it meet its considerable obligations during the transitional stage.

The Financial Protocol

The Financial Protocol consisted of thirteen articles. Article 3 provided that Turkey would receive by 23 May 1976 a maximum of 195 million units of account in loans. Article 9 declared that the EEC would examine the possibility of increasing this amount by 25 million units of account.

Article 5 specified that the rate of interest of the loans would be not less than 2.5% for long-term investments with low profitability and not less than 4.5% for investments with normal profitability.

The Features of the Additional Protocol

The Additional Protocol imposed a whole array of obligations on Turkey, while committing the EEC only to eliminate customs duties on Turkish products. When seen from this perspective, the protocol would appear to be lacking in balance. If Turkey had prepared itself adequately during the preparatory stage, however, the obligations of the transitional stage could easily have been carried out. Aware that it was still unprepared, Ankara sought to obtain the maximum financial aid from the EEC to alleviate the economic burdens of the transitional stage.

At the time when the Additional Protocol was signed, the new arrangements evoked much politically motivated opposition. The opposition was led by the SPO, which had displayed a negative attitude toward the EEC from the very beginning (Tekeli and İlkin 1993, vol. 2, pp. 117 and 130).

The SPO published a five-volume report in March and April 1971, entitled "The Preparatory Work of the EEC-Turkey Additional Protocol." This was done shortly before the TGNA started its consideration of the protocol in July 1971, at which time the SPO published a report entitled "The Question of the European Economic Community." The gist of these reports was that the agreement removed the means for protecting national industry and therefore Turkey could not sustain a high rate of growth without large-scale foreign investments. The SPO claimed that the new economic environment that was being created would make it impossible to carry out economic planning as foreseen in the Constitution and that the SPO would be reduced to following the business cycle in the EEC Common Market. The report also asserted that, in the new economic order, investments would be made not according to a plan based on national priorities and interest but according to the decisions of large corporations in the Common Market. By accepting the Additional Protocol, Turkey would be abandoning the development strategy of the last few years and the goal of establishing a national industry.

Unlike the first two five-year plans, the Third Five-Year Development Plan was based on a model that took account of the developing relations with the EEC.

The haste with which the Additional Protocol was prepared and the consequent shortcomings would give rise to many interagency squabbles in Ankara and widespread discontent among the public. The differences that led to the freezing of relations in 1976 can be traced to the mistakes that were made when the Additional Protocol was being rushed through.

Questions Arising during the Transitional Stage and the Freezing of Relations Economic Questions

In addition to the problems arising strictly from the manner in which the Additional Protocol was prepared, other difficulties in the period from 1971 to 1973 led Turkey to call on the EEC to agree to changes in the protocol. These developments can be grouped in four categories.

1. As Turkey was negotiating the Additional Protocol, the EEC increased its membership from six to ten. With the completion of the negotiations in 1971, the United Kingdom, Denmark, Norway, and Ireland joined the EEC. It became necessary for Turkey to conclude agreements with these countries to include them in the association (subsequently Norway's membership in the EEC was rejected in a referendum, so the Six became the Nine instead of the Ten). Ankara was expecting to obtain certain advantages with these agreements that it had not been able to obtain with the Additional Protocol.

With the expanded membership, Turkey would get increased quotas for fish and wine. Against this, Turkey would suffer disadvantages in manufactured and agricultural products. For example, Turkey was able to send its agricultural products to Britain with very low customs duties. When the new members adjusted their low tariffs to the common customs tariff of the EEC, Turkish exports would be penalized, and the market for these products would shrink.

There was a similar situation with respect to manufactured goods. Whereas Turkey had a trade deficit of $73 million with the Six, the deficit rose to $135 million with the expanded EEC. Furthermore, whereas 16.7% of Turkish manufactured products enjoyed preferential treatment from the former EEC, this ratio would fall to 9% for the expanded EEC. To compensate for this loss, the two sides came up with proposals that proved difficult to reconcile. There would be much tension in the negotiations, which lasted two years, until the Additional Protocol was finally concluded. The Additional Protocol took care of the adjustment that became necessary after expansion.

- 2. As the EEC expanded, it was also concluding free-trade agreements with EFTA members like Finland, Sweden, Austria, Switzerland, and Norway. In these circumstances, Turkey's exports of manufactured goods benefiting from the special clauses of the Ankara Agreement and the Additional Protocol were losing their privileged status in the face of powerful competition.
- 3. By a decision made on 30 March 1971, the EEC granted ninety-one countries belonging to the Group of Seventy-seven within the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) tariff reductions under the Generalized System of Preferences. The beneficiaries were all developing countries from Asia, Africa, and Latin America. In addition the EEC signed the Lomé Convention with a good number of African, Caribbean, and Pacific countries, establishing a special association with them, and was in the process of extending this convention to other areas of cooperation. To the extent that this arrangement included products that were among Turkey's export products benefiting from its agreements with the EEC, Turkey's advantages were being eroded.

At its meeting of 13 December 1973, the Council of Association found Turkey's demands for a rectification of this situation justified. Any disadvantage to Turkey caused by the application of the Generalized System of Preferences in the sphere of agricultural products would be gradually corrected.

4. Turkey was also disturbed by the comprehensive trade agreements concluded by the EEC with countries of the Mediterranean basin within the EEC's Mediterranean policy. These countries were mostly exporters of the same products as Turkey. Ankara used the argument that these new competitors were harming Turkey's exports to justify its demand for revising the Additional Protocol.

Political Questions

The most serious political question between the EEC and Turkey following the signing of the Additional Protocol arose over the military intervention of 12 March 1971. About one month prior to the intervention, Emile Noel, the secretary-general of the commission, visited Turkey at the invitation of the Economic Development Foundation. He reminded his hosts that relations between Athens and Brussels remained suspended because of the military government in Greece and that a similar procedure would apply to Turkey in the event of a military takeover. Noel emphasized that there could be no room for a nondemocratic regime within an EEC based on democratic values.

But Turkish-EEC relations were not frozen as a consequence of the memorandum of 12 March, because the intervention did not take the form of a direct military coup. Furthermore, the civilian Nihat Erim government, which succeeded the outgoing Demirel government, steered the Additional Protocol easily through the parliamentary ratification procedure and demonstrated its attachment to good relations with the EEC. As the antidemocratic actions of the 12 March administration began to emerge, however, the EEC started raising the tone of its voice.

All of the practices that were incompatible with democracy and respect for human rights came under harsh criticism. For the first time, there were interventions in the European Parliament on the subject of human rights abuses in Turkey. The meeting of the European Parliament held on 3 December 1971 brought calls for the EEC to review its relations with Turkey. Around this time, the king of Belgium canceled his planned visit to Turkey in protest against the death sentences passed by Turkish courts (Birand, p. 510).

Relations were able to weather the storm of 12 March without too much damage, but Turkey had become a subject associated with human rights abuses in European minds. This would cause many headaches for Turkey in the years to come.

Turkey's Request for Revisions in the Additional Protocol

After mid-1971 the Turkish efforts to obtain revisions in the Additional Protocol started gathering pace. The economic justification for the revisions has already been described. The revisions were to be included in the Additional Protocol, which had become necessary after accession of new members to the EEC. To secure the desired revisions, the minister of foreign affairs, Haluk Bayülken, and the undersecretary of the SPO, Memduh Aytür, visited the EEC members but made no headway. A memorandum was delivered to the EEC, requesting that tariff reductions on chemical products, metal goods, and machine tools be suspended and quantitative restrictions be introduced. If these measures failed to make up for Turkey's losses, Ankara wanted to resort to additional measures. But the Council of Ministers rejected these requests at its meeting held in June 1972. All that the EEC was ready to grant to support the development of Turkish industry was to allow for some flexibility in the Association Agreement. The Additional Protocol between Turkey and the EEC was signed on 30 June 1973, based on this understanding.

The Straining of Relations and the 1976 Crisis

The signing of the Additional Protocol helped ease relations somewhat, but this did not last very long. The tensions brewing between Turkey and the EEC had not been eliminated but merely placed on ice. New developments taking place in mid-1974 and later created new tensions and caused old problems that were dormant to resurface in even greater intensity. In the period from 1974 to 1976 relations reached the highest level of tension ever for five reasons.

1. At first Turkey's military intervention in Cyprus in July 1974 did not affect Ankara's relations with Brussels the way it affected relations with Washington. But Turkey's second intervention in August led to the overthrow of the colonels' regime in Greece and its replacement by the Karamanlis government, which effected a change in the EEC's perception of Greece and Turkey. The restoration of democracy in Greece was warmly welcomed by the EEC, while Turkey was condemned for its Cyprus operation at the EEC's Paris summit in October 1974. Despite all of Turkey's protestations and efforts, this anti-Turkish and pro-Greek attitude persisted. If anything, it got worse. In June 1975 the EEC held a Council of Association meeting with (Greek) Cyprus. Relations between Brussels and Ankara kept getting frostier.

2. The flexibility in trade matters introduced by the Additional Protocol was considered insufficient by Ankara. Turkey had suffered grievous economic losses because of the global oil crisis of 1973. This came at a time when the EEC was allowing new competition to emerge in its markets for Turkish export products. These events made revision of the Additional Protocol the priority issue for Turkey during the 1970s.

Throughout 1975 Turkey's trade with the EEC continued to be in deficit. The deficit of $991 million in 1974 had grown to $1.722 billion in 1975. Ankara wanted to deal with the growing deficit by seeking further concessions in agricultural products and textiles. The EEC's resistance to Ankara's demands would bring relations to the breaking point at the Council of Association in March 1976.

3. The uncertainty over the free circulation of Turkish workers was also casting a shadow on Ankara's relations with Brussels. According to article 36 of the Additional Protocol, free circulation would be introduced in the period between 1 December 1976 and 1 December 1986. But in 1975 Germany asked the commission to have this article removed, demonstrating openly that it was against free movement. The change that Germany was seeking depended on Turkey's approval, which Ankara would not grant. The article also contained a provision requiring the conclusion of an agreement before the end of 1973 giving Turkish workers enhanced social benefits. On this issue too, there was no identity of views.

4. Turkey's exports to the EEC were already facing difficulties because of both unfavorable world conditions and the restrictive clauses of the Additional Protocol. In March 1975 Britain imposed further restrictions on the import of cotton yarn from Turkey. Turkey wanted to retaliate by imposing restrictions on the import of certain British products, but Turkish industrialists who depended on these goods for their own production opposed the measure. The unresolved question continued to poison relations (Birand, p. 403).

5. On 12 June 1975 Greece announced that it was seeking full membership in the EEC. This move put Turkey in a spot, because Ankara had always pursued a policy visà-vis Brussels based on the objective of not being left behind by Greece. Now Athens was making its bold move at a time when Ankara's relations with Brussels were at their worst because of unresolved political and economic questions. With Greece's move, Turkey not only was being left behind but was facing the danger of Brussels getting directly involved with the disputes over Cyprus and the Aegean.

To deal with this dangerous development, Ankara considered three possible courses of action. One was to try to prevent Greece's full membership. This option was dropped as impractical, however, in view of Ankara's poor standing in Brussels. A second option was for Turkey also to apply for full membership, but this idea too was dropped. Turkey's economic situation was too precarious, and Ankara had not met the conditions for the transitional stage. Furthermore, Demirel did not want to alienate his coalition partner in the Nationalist Front Coalition, the Nationalist Action Party, which was against the EEC. The last remaining option was to demand more concessions and guarantees from the EEC to prevent Greece's full membership from damaging Turkey's interest. In practical terms this amounted to a wait-and-see policy, the only course that Ankara could take, given its weak hand. After following parallel courses over many tears, the EEC policies of Greece and Turkey diverged for good in 1975.

Turkish-EEC relations were already tense because of the five issues described above. These relations would receive a further blow at the Council of Association meeting in Luxembourg in March 1976. Since 1974 the Council of Association meetings had become routine affairs, which took place only because they were scheduled. As a rule, the EEC turned down Turkey's proposals at these meetings, while Turkey raised the same issues over and over again, knowing full well that they were unacceptable. For some time, Turkey had made no concrete, reasonable proposals at these meetings. But the parties had never said openly that the meetings were futile and of no use. They had always left the door open to a compromise at the next meeting. This tradition was broken at the Luxembourg meeting.

Çağlayangil dwelled on Turkey's difficulties and asked for revisions in the current regime. Gaston Thorn, the president of the council and minister of foreign affairs of Luxembourg, declared that this matter had already been discussed in the council of the EEC and that no new concessions to Turkey were being contemplated. Çağlayangil then declared that the meeting should be postponed and left the table.

The EEC sought to placate Turkey by offering more financial aid instead of providing concessions in the area of agricultural products. A new financial protocol amounting to $372 million was prepared. But the package of EEC proposals that would be submitted to Turkey contained no concessions in agriculture because of Italy's opposition and no concessions on the free movement of labor because of Germany's opposition. These two areas, however, constituted the backbone of Turkey's demands. Ankara considered the EEC's package to be nothing but an empty shell, and the Council of Association meeting scheduled for 23 July 1976 never took place. The meeting that was postponed to October was also canceled.

When the Council of Association eventually did meet in Brussels on 20 December 1976, after a break of eight months, the frosty atmosphere prevailing in March had begun to dissipate with the passage of time. The decision of the parties to be more constructive contributed to the thaw. The EEC decided to grant Turkey small concessions on thirty-three agricultural products from a list of sixty-five products submitted by Turkey. In addition, it guaranteed that no new restrictions would be placed on the regime that applied to Turkish workers in Europe. Finally, Turkey would receive loans amounting to $380 million. But no concessions were made in connection with Turkish workers, one of Ankara's main demands.

The Turkish Freeze in Relations

Just five days after the agreement reached in Brussels, Turkey made a unilateral decision and announced that it was suspending for one year all of its commitments arising from the Additional Protocol, under the terms of article 60. This meant that the 10% reduction in tariffs on the products contained in the so-called twelve-year list due to enter into force on 1 January 1977 would be suspended for a year. The adjustment of Turkey's tariffs to the EEC's Common Customs Tariff would also be postponed for a year. This came as a surprise to the EEC, even though the protocol contained the following provision: "If serious economic difficulties arise that endanger a particular sector of the Turkish economy or affect the balance of its foreign payments, or if these difficulties cause economic difficulties in a particular region of Turkey, Turkey may resort to the necessary protectionist measures."

While relations with the EEC went through their usual ups and downs, they were also being affected, directly or indirectly, by Turkey's internal political upheavals.

The first signs of this were reflected in the Ecevit government's program when it came to power in 1978. The program declared that the protocols regulating the transitional stage of Turkey's association contained certain rules that posed serious obstacles to Turkey's efforts to develop and industrialize. The following passage in the program clearly stated that the new government would address new requests to the EEC: "Our government will insist on placing our relations with the Community on a new basis, so as to ensure that these relations serve the interest of our country and our economy. But, beyond that, our government will strive to build up the Turkish economy so that it will not be handicapped in its dealings with the Common Market and will shore up Turkey's independence" (Türkiye Cumhuriyeti Hükümetleri 1960–1978, p. 476).

Ecevit displayed his determination in this respect when he visited Brussels in May 1978. Prior to this visit, the Supreme Planning Board decided to request comprehensive concessions (particularly for agricultural products) and additional financial support from the EEC. Ecevit conveyed these requests to the president of the EEC Commission. The prime minister returned to Ankara in a hopeful mood, because the EEC had agreed to give due consideration to Turkey's concrete proposals.

When Turkey's proposals were forwarded to the commission on 9 October 1978, the reception was not very favorable. Turkey made the following requests.

- 1. Turkey should be allowed to suspend its obligations to the EEC for five years (that is, for the duration of the Fourth Five-Year Development Plan). In addition, Turkey should be given the right to amend the twelveyear and twenty-two-year lists of protected products.
- 2. All restrictions on Turkey's exports of manufactured goods, including textiles, to the EEC should be removed. Turkey should be included among the beneficiaries of the Generalized System of Preferences in regard to agricultural products and should be granted the right of free circulation of workers and the social security benefits enjoyed by Turkish workers in EEC countries.
- 3. The EEC should provide Turkey with $8 billion in the form of grants and loans to support the implementation of the Fourth Five-Year Development Plan.

The EEC promised to consider these requests and give its reaction at an early date. No response came during 1978, however; nor did the Council of Association hold a meeting for the second year in a row. In view of Turkey's deteriorating economic position, the Ecevit government was unable to await the EEC's response any longer. On 28 December 1978 the Official Gazette published the decree of the Council of Ministers by which Ankara suspended the implementation of Turkey's obligations to the EEC. When the Justice Party's minority government took office in November 1979, it would try to remedy this situation; but the military coup of 12 September 1980 would end all efforts to restore Turkey's good relations with the EEC.

The EEC's response to the Ecevit government finally came on 21 May 1979. Brussels accepted the Turkish request for a five-year grace period. But it also proposed changes that did not correspond to some of the other Turkish requests.

- 1. Turkey was to drop its request for concessions for textile products.
- 2. The right of free circulation could not be granted, but workers would get additional rights in the fields of language and professional training.
- 3. A six-year calendar would be introduced that would grant Turkey automatic tariff reductions for its agricultural products. The modalities of this arrangement would be determined in 1982, however, and implemented in 1983. All nontariff barriers applying to agricultural products would be lifted.
- 4. Turkey's request for financial assistance would be met with a $600 million financial protocol.

The EEC's counterproposals fell far short of satisfying Turkey. A meeting was held in Ankara in September 1979, with the participation of officials from the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Finance, at which it was decided to press on with Turkey's request. But before a meeting of the Council of Association could be held where a decision might have been reached, the Ecevit government was forced to resign as a result of the partial election of October 1979. A new period of uncertainty had set in.

The Intention to Seek Full Membership That Was Never Formalized

The minority government that Demirel formed in November 1979 was supported by the Nationalist Action Party and the National Salvation Party. The new government's program did not contain a single phrase about relations with the EEC. Unlike Ecevit, however, Demirel intended to mend fences with the EEC. Hayrettin Erkmen, the minister of foreign affairs who participated in the meeting of the Council of Association held in February 1980, gave proof of the new government's good intentions.

Erkmen declared that Turkey was no longer seeking a grace period but wanted concessions from the EEC in the fields of agricultural products, free movement of workers, and further loans. According to Erkmen, the main problem between Brussels and Ankara was the lack of political will. If Brussels demonstrated its political will, all difficulties would be swiftly overcome.

At the Council of Association, the Turkish side dwelled at length on Greece's application for full membership. The treaty of accession providing for full membership had been signed by the EEC and Greece on 25 May 1979. But the document had not yet been ratified by Greece and the members of the EEC. Ankara feared that, if Greece became a full member while Turkey remained outside the EEC, Athens could veto Turkey's request. Erkmen sought and obtained the insertion of a sentence in the council's final report to the effect that Turkey would soon accede to the EEC within the context of the rights deriving from the Ankara Agreement.

Turkey made no application for full membership to the Council of Association, however, at either the February or June 1980 meeting. Nevertheless, Erkmen kept the issue on the agenda and gave assurances that Turkey looked upon full membership with favor. As indicated, Turkey did not raise the issue of full membership at the June 1980 meeting of the council. But Ankara did accept the EEC's package of proposals made in connection with Turkey's request for changes in the Additional Protocol, including the following items.

- 1. All customs duties on agricultural products would be removed by 1987, but nontariff barriers like quotas would remain.
- 2. Although free movement of workers would not be granted, broad-ranging improvements would be made in the workers' social rights.
- 3. A five-year financial protocol would provide Turkey with $600 million in loans and $75 million in grants.

Although Turkey had not formally applied for full membership, this did not imply that it had given up its goal. Erkmen was striving to convince Demirel to make the formal application with minimum delay. Erkmen was dismissed on 5 September 1980, however, following a censure vote in parliament. A few days later, the coup of 12 September 1980 caused the formal application for membership to be postponed indefinitely.

ÇAĞRI ERHAN AND TUĞRUL ARAT

Sources (Relations with the EEC)

Arat, Tuğrul. "Avrupa Birliği ile Türkiye Arasındaki İlişkiler ve Gümrük Birliği." AÜ Hukuk Fakültesi Dergisi, 44, nos. 1–4 (1995): 587–606.

- . "Gümrük Birliği Çerçevesi'nde Mevzuat Uyumu Çalışmaları." İn *Gümrük Birliği Sürecinde Politikalar ve Uygu*lamalar, pp. 73–92. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1998.
- ——. "Türkiye'de AT Mevzuatına Uyum Çalışmaları." In Avrupa Birliği El Kitabı, pp. 219–46. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1995.
- ——. "Türkiye ile Avrupa Toplulukları Arasındaki İlişkilere Toplu bir Bakış ve Bu Bağlamda Hayvancılığımıza Dair Bazı Gözlemler." In Hayvan ve Hayvansal Ürünler Sanayii I. Milli Sempozyumu, 29–30 November 1989, p. 169. Ankara: Tarım ve Köyişleri Bakanlığı, 1990.

Avrupa Birliği El Kitabı, Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1995.

- Bacık, Gökhan. "Türkiye ve Avrupa: Yeni Dönem Yeni Model." Avrasya Dosyası 5, no. 4 (Winter 1999): 294–304.
- Birand, Mehmet Ali. Bir Pazar Hikayesi. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1978.
- Bozkurt, Ömer (ed.). Avrupa Topluluğu ve Türkiye. Ankara: TODAİE, 1987.
- Cornell, Erik. Türkiye Avrupa'nın Eşiğinde (original title: Turkiet på Europas tröskel). Trans. Gülseren Ergün. İstanbul: Cem, 1998.
- El-Agraa, Ali. The European Union: History, Institutions, Economics and Policies. London: Prentice-Hall, 1998.
- Günuğur, Haluk. "Avrupa Birliği Bütünleşmesinin Tarihsel Gelişimi." In Avrupa Birliği El Kitabı, pp. 13–21. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1995.
- Güvenç, Bozkurt. "Avrupa ve Türkiye İlişkilerinin Tarihi Kaynakları, Gelişmesi ve Bugünkü Sorunları." In Avrupa Siyasi Birliği ve Türkiye, pp. 79–81. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1999.
- İktisadi Kalkınma Vakfı (İKV). Gümrük Birliği Yönünden Türkiye ve Yunanistan Ortaklık Anlaşmalarının Mukayesesi. İstanbul: n.p., n.d.
- Kalkınma Plânı: Birinci Beş Yıl (1963–1967). Ankara: Devlet Planlama Teşkilatı, 1963.
- Kalkınma Plânı: İkinci Beş Yıl (1968–1972). Ankara: Devlet Planlama Teşkilatı, 1967.
- Kuruç, Bilsay. "Katma Protokolü Okurken." AÜ SBF Dergisi 26, no. 2 (1971): 183–211.
- McAllister, Richard. From EC to EU: An Historical and Political Survey. London: Routledge, 1997.
- Olaylarla Türk Dış Politikası I–II (OTDP). 6th ed. Ankara: AÜSBF Dış Münasebetler Enstitüsü, 1987.

- Olcay, Osman. Ortak Pazar ve Türkiye İlişkileri. İstanbul: İKV, 1971.
- Oran, Baskın. "AET'ye Tam Üyelik Başvurusu ve Yunanistan."

  Mülkiyeliler Birliği Dergisi 11, no. 84 (Dec. 1986): 29–60.
- Özen, Çınar. "Neo-Functionalism and the Change in the Dynamics of Turkey-EU Relations." Perceptions 3, no. 3 (Sept.-Nov. 1998): 34-57.
- Öztürk, Kâzım. T.C. Hükümetleri ve Programları. İstanbul: Ak Yayınları, 1968.
- Saraçoğlu, Tevfik. Türkiye ile Avrupa Ekonomik Topluluğu Arasında Ortaklık Yaratan Anlaşma. 2 vols. İstanbul: İktisadi Kalkınma Vakfı, 1981.
- Şen, Faruk. Türkiye'nin Ufukları. Cologne: Önel-Verlag, 1994. Soysal, İsmail. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları C. II (1945–1990). Ankara: Türk Tarih Kurumu, 1991.
- Tekeli, İlhan, and Selim İlkin. "Küreselleşme Ulus-Devlet Etkileşimi Bağlamında AB-Türkiye İlişkilerinin Yorumlanması." Doğu Batı 10 (Feb.–Apr. 2000): 113–38.
- . Türkiye ve Avrupa Topluluğu I Ulus Devletini Aşma Çabasındaki Avrupa'ya Türkiye'nin Yaklaşımı. Ankara: Ümit, 1993.
- ———. Türkiye ve Avrupa Topluluğu II Ulus Devletini Aşma Çabasındaki Avrupa'ya Türkiye'nin Yaklaşımı. Ankara: Ümit, 1993.
- Türkiye Cumhuriyeti Hükümetleri 1960–1978. Ankara: Başbakanlık, 1978.
- Türkiye ve Avrupa Entegrasyonu. Ankara: DPT Müsteşarlığı, 1995.

SECTION 6

1980-1990

Turkey in the Orbit of the Western Bloc—2

 $^{\rm f}$  Table 6-1. The Administration of the Period 1980–1990

| PRESIDENTS  | GOVERNMENTS  | ministers ofForeign affairs                   | SECRETARIES-GENERALOF MFA                   |  |  |
|---|--|---|---|--|--|
| Fahri Korutürk(6 Apr. 1973–6 Apr. 1980)   | 6th S. Demirel Government AP(12 Nov. 1979–12 Sept. 1980)   | Hayrettin Erkmen(12 Nov. 1979–5 Sept. 1980)   | Özdemir Yiğit(6 July 1979–27 Aug. 1980)     |  |  |
|   | ,Bülend Ulusu Government                                   | İlter Türkmen                                     | İlter Türkmen(27 Aug. 1980–20 Sept. 1980    |  |  |
| Kenan Evren(13 Sept. 1980–7 Nov. 1982, head ofthe MGK and of the state)(7 Nov. 1982–9 Nov. 1989, president) | (20 Sept. 1980–13 Dec. 1983)                                   | (20 Sept. 1980–13 Dec. 1983)                      | Kamuran Gürün(20 Sept. 1980–1 Mar. 1982)    |  |  |
|   | 1st Turgut Özal Government ANAP                                |   | Ercüment Yavuzalp(1 Oct. 1982–18 Jan. 1985) |  |  |
|   | (13 Dec. 1983–21 Dec. 1987)                                    | Vahit Halefoğlu(13 Dec. 1983–21 Dec. 1987)    | Necdet Tezel(18 Jan. 1985–9 Jan. 1987)      |  |  |
|   | 2nd T. Özal Government ANAP(21 Dec. 1987–9 Nov. 1989)      |   | Nüzhet Kandemir(9 Jan. 1987–27 July 1989)   |  |  |
| Turgut Özal(9 Nov 1989–17 Apr. 1993)  | Yıldırım Akbulut Government ANAP(9 Nov. 1989–23 June 1991) | Ahmet Mesut Yılmaz(21 Dec. 1987–20 Feb, 1990) | - Tugay Özçeri(27 July 1989–1 July 1991)    |  |  |

ANAP (Anavatan Partisi): Motherland Party.
AP (Adalet Partisi): Justice Party.
MGK (Milli Güvenlik Konseyi): National Security Council.
(Table by Atay Akdevelioğlu)

Appraisal of the Period

I. THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

A. International Developments

1. Globalization and Its Effects

As we have already seen, globalization is the result of the spread of the infrastructure (international capitalism) and the superstructure (rationalism, democracy, human and minority rights, etc.) of the West throughout the globe (see Box Intro-7 in the Introduction).

The spread of the capitalistic model of production (i.e., production for the market based on private property and maximization of profits) occurred in two waves between the end of the fifteenth century and mid-nineteenth century. Then globalization was interrupted for half a century. This interruption was due to the exhaustion caused by World War I and the split between democracies and fascism, followed by the challenge of the USSR after World War II. The spread of globalization resumed in the 1980s, this being the third wave (Oran 2001, pp. 1–26).

The economic underpinning of this resumption of globalization was the coming into being of the multinational companies in the early 1970s. These companies were spread throughout the world, and their production, management, distribution, and marketing systems were so organized as to maximize profits. Above all, the shareholders in these companies were individuals from different countries. All of this led naturally to production and sales on a multinational scale as these companies came into being and consolidated their positions in the market. The need to produce and sell on a global scale called for the relaxation of tariff barriers and other impediments under the banner of "free trade." All of this resulted in an increased mobility of goods and capital. This increased mobility inevitably had its political consequences. Unable to control the new situation adequately, the nation-state went into decline, at first effectively and then juridically.

The technological underpinning of the new era was the development of the microchip, optic cable, and computer in the 1980s, which started the communications revolution. The first industrial revolution had appeared in Britain in the eighteenth century and was based on steam power. The second industrial revolution occurred in the U.S. in the nineteenth century. This revolution was based on "Taylorism," which relied on the assembly line and mass production. These two revolutions strengthened, in the long run, the factors of both capital (supply) and labor (demand).

The third industrial revolution led to the "information society," based on information technologies. The new revolution had a significant impact in the social and political spheres. First, the mobility and productivity of capital increased. Production and distribution spread beyond national borders and rapidly acquired global dimensions. As the market expanded, capital (supply) gained strength at the expense of the consumer (demand). Second, as the nature of production changed, the need for labor, and especially unskilled manual labor, progressively declined. While the bargaining power of labor decreased, its mobility was hampered by methods like the imposition of visas. The use of robots also increased rapidly. As production spread outside traditional factories, the class consciousness of labor went into decline.

In these circumstances, the demand aspect of the economy was neglected, while the supply side became all important. Keynesian policies (J.M. Keynes, Cambridge School), which stressed the social welfare state with full employment, were gradually abandoned. These were replaced by monetarist policies that advocated lower wage increases and later retirement to make companies more competitive internationally. These policies, which squeezed the consumer, were formulated by Milton Friedman of the Chicago School.

These developments made the major capitalist states even more powerful. The disintegration of the USSR in the beginning of the 1990s constituted the political dimension of the third globalization, which left the West unrivaled and deeply affected the world order.

2. The Rise of the West and of the U.S.

As a major oil producer, the U.S. was not as badly affected by the oil shock as Europe was, even though American oil reserves were expected to last for only about ten years and Washington was intent on keeping these as a strategic reserve. Europe began to recover from the shock by 1980, with measures such as conservation, new technologies (solar energy, natural gas, etc.), and allowing the prices of its products to reflect the additional cost of oil. In fact, it could even be argued that the oil shock had a salutary effect on the West.

Meanwhile the oil producers had few clues on how to spend their bloated petrodollar income. In addition to lavish spending, buying hotels and retail chains, they deposited their funds in Western banks or bought shares in Western companies. As a result, these companies grew stronger, and the banks recycled their petrodollar deposits by extending loans to countries that were impoverished by the high cost of oil.

Human Rights, the "Green Belt," and the Carter Doctrine

When Jimmy Carter was president from 1977 to 1981, he took advantage of the third basket of the Helsinki Final Act (see Box 5-1 in Section 5) to launch an international campaign in favor of human rights to hit the USSR where it was weakest. This was done even as Washington failed to notice the torture chambers in some developing countries that happened to be within the U.S. camp.

Subsequently a "Green Belt," consisting of moderate Islamic countries, was formed around the USSR. This idea was inspired by Carter's advisor Zbigniew Brzezinski. A man of strong religious beliefs, Carter was forming an Islamic shield against the USSR. It was hoped that moderate Islam would also be useful in circumscribing radical movements like Hezbollah as well as Iran. The implementation of this new strategy would take place as the 12 September military regime was being established in Turkey.

In January 1980 the U.S. president proclaimed the Carter Doctrine. This was a new version of the Truman Doctrine, but adjusted to suit the conditions of the Persian Gulf. According to the Carter Doctrine, an attack on the oil fields of the Persian Gulf would be considered an attack on the vital interests of the U.S.

A U.S. intervention in the Gulf would be carried out in accordance with the so-called Wohlstetter Doctrine. To prevent the Soviet Union from reaching the Gulf via eastern Anatolia, the plan envisaged the construction of new air bases in this region. These air bases would also be used to strike at the Caucasus if it became necessary.

The Reagan Doctrine and the "Second Cold War"

During the McCarthy era, Ronald Reagan had actively taken part in the persecution of actors and other artists. Along with John Wayne, he was among the most conservative figures in Hollywood. When he became president in 1981, he went far beyond the Carter Doctrine, by declaring that the U.S. would lend its full support to all anti-Communist movements everywhere on the globe. Reagan was reversing the U.S. retreat symbolized by the 1969 Nixon Doctrine.

The Reagan Doctrine did not just remain on paper. It was given a powerful impulse by the events in Iran and Afghanistan in 1979 and was implemented in countries such as Afghanistan in Asia, Nicaragua in Latin America, Angola in Africa, and Cambodia in the Far East. The pro-American regimes in these countries were given armed assistance, while the opposition groups in countries with anti-American regimes were furnished with aid and arms. In this context, the U.S. got involved in the sale of weapons through Israel to its archenemy, the Khomeini regime, to secure funds for the rightist Contras fighting the government in Nicaragua, in a region that the U.S. considered to be its own backyard (see Box 6-7 below).

At a time when Iran and Afghanistan were beyond U.S. control, when Soviet missiles were installed in Syria, and when Andreas Papandreou was blatantly displaying his hostility toward the U.S. in Greece, Reagan was waging the "Second Cold War" against the USSR. Reagan's most significant move in this period was the launching of the multi-billion-dollar "Star Wars" project without regard to the ABM treaty that had been concluded in 1972 (see Box 6-5 below). This project would be an important factor in bankrupting the USSR and represented the resumption of the U.S. role as global sheriff.

3. The Collapse of the USSR

As a major producer of oil, the USSR was not affected by the oil shock. On the contrary, it stood to gain from the rise in oil prices. The windfall profits led the USSR into complacency, however. The extra income was diverted to armaments and space research; because of the inherent weaknesses in the Soviet system, the by-products of such research did not improve the daily lives of its citizens. This was in marked contrast to the West, where space research led to many civilian applications like Teflon-coated pans, derived from materials used as heat-shields for spacecraft reentering the earth's atmosphere.

Three elderly Soviet leaders (Leonid Brezhnev, Konstantin Chernenko, and Yury Andropov) died at the helm at the advanced ages of seventy-six, seventy-four, and seventy, respectively. They were succeeded in April 1985 by an energetic leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, who was only fifty-four years old. His first task was to reduce tensions with the West so that he could concentrate his efforts on domestic questions. In August he came up with a proposal that took the West by surprise: both sides would agree to end nuclear testing. When the West failed to respond, Gorbachev declared a unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing. At first a skeptical Western press started referring to the Soviet leader as "Gorba-show." Gorbachev then came up with a four-point program.

- 1. Gorbachev introduced the concept of the "Common European home," designed to achieve integration with Europe in the realm of ideas (see Box 6-22 below).
- 2. To reduce the drain caused by military expenditures, Gorbachev signed an agreement with the U.S. in November 1987 on limiting medium-range missiles. This was followed by a similar agreement for short-range missiles. In March 1988 he announced that Soviet forces would evacuate Afghanistan. In December came the decision to reduce Soviet forces in Eastern Europe by 50,000 soldiers. This decision shook the regimes of Eastern Europe by creating the impression that the USSR was withdrawing its support and abandoning the regimes to their fates. With the demobilization of 500,000 military personnel in April 1989, the minister of foreign affairs, Eduard Shevardnadze, would declare that the Iron Curtain had begun to rust.
- 3. Gorbachev gave the green light to national forms of socialism and reforms in Eastern Europe. With this decision, the Brezhnev Doctrine had come to an end (see Box 5-15 in Section 5).
- 4. Gorbachev launched a policy of liberalization within the USSR. After a lapse of forty-seven years, a Party Conference was held in July 1988. In December 1989 the foremost dissident, Andrey Sakharov, was released from detention. In March 1990 private ownership rights over the means of production other than land were recognized.

These were momentous changes for the Communist superpower. While carrying out these reforms, Gorbachev was also battling three different crises that had been plaguing the USSR over the years (see Box 6-1).

As Gorbachev wrestled with these crises, the crisis of nationalities broke out unexpectedly in 1987 (Box 6-21 below). As a result of the reforms and the unstoppable cultural influence of the West as a consequence of the

Box 6-1. The Political, Structural, and Cyclical Crises in the USSR

The most pervasive and profound crisis in the USSR was political and resulted directly from the lack of democracy. Due to this, there was no popular participation in the rule of the Communist Party. As a result of the inbreeding that this created, the USSR rotted from within.

The structural crisis was due to the inability of the USSR to make the transition from the "Extensive Development" model based on the utilization of surplus labor to an "Intensive Growth" stage based on raising efficiency of resource allocation and technical progress, The first model was used in the early years of the USSR, and industry was spread throughout the land in order to reduce unemployment. Once this aim was achieved, the country should have been able to pass into the second stage, where economic efficiency would be the guiding criterion. This was never achieved, however, Meanwhile capitalism had been able to pass through both stages and had entered the stage of the third industrial revolution: the information revolution.

The cyclical crises were experienced sporadically. The socialist state had met the citizens' basic needs by providing education, health care, employment, housing, and so forth. In these circumstances, savings were channeled to consumption, creating a shortage of goods that was compounded by the inability to increase production. To eliminate the disparity between supply and demand, Stalin had resorted to monetary operations from time to time through which savings in banks were reduced.

To overcome these crises, Mikhail Gorbachev felt the need to carry out far-reaching structural reforms in the economy. He came up with the concept of perestrolka (restructuring) (see Box 6-79 below). This required eliminating the privileges of countless individuals and institutions, however, and Gorbachev could not count on the support of any particular institution or group. To gain popular support for his reforms, he resorted to the concept of glasnost (transparency) (see Box 6-20 below).

To carry out perestrolka, it was necessary for Gorbachev to cut down demand. Doing this by means of monetary measures would have led the rich to transfer their savings abroad and perhaps even to seek the dismissal of Gorbachev. Another way to cut demand would have been to seek the IMF's help. But this course would hurt the people and negate glasnost. As the USSR vacillated between difficult alternative courses, production was plunging.

(B. ORAN) (Source: Interview with Korkut Boratay)

communications revolution, incidents broke out in Kazakhstan in January 1987, which spread to Lithuania in August and to Nagorno Karabakh in February 1988 (see Box 7-30 in Section 7). This was followed by incidents in Crimea in March, Estonia in November, and Moldavia in August 1989, followed by Georgia. The refusal of Georgia to provide athletes for the Soviet national team was highly significant.

In August 1989 the Kremlin remained silent when a non-Communist government came to power in Poland. This signified the effective end of the Brezhnev Doctrine. In October 1989 there was a wave of East German migrants fleeing to the West via Hungary. In November 1989 the Berlin Wall came down. In February 1990 the USSR was obliged to agree to the reunification of Germany. In July the USSR felt the need to seek the IMF's help. Gorbachev was powerless to prevent any of these events. When he felt that the USSR's existence was at stake, his forceful actions led to bloodshed, as when he ordered the invasion of Azerbaijan in January 1990 and Lithuania in March. Lithuania's oil supplies were cut off, and in March 1991 all strikes and demonstrations throughout the USSR were banned. In March of that year a referendum was held in which the citizens voted for maintaining the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, the superpower USSR disintegrated only seventy-four years after coming into existence. Before this disintegration the USSR surrendered to the Third Basket of the second OSCE summit meeting, held in 1990 in Paris.

The U.S. now remained unchallenged as the global hegemon, and the West became the unrivaled system. From then on, the world would be solely shaped by models based on the infrastructure, international capitalism, and the superstructure (in particular the Western values concerning human rights) of the U.S. and the West.

B. Developments in the Balkans and the Middle East

Regional developments of special interest to Turkey were taking place in the Balkans and the Middle East.

In the Balkans, the most significant development was the campaign of repression directed at the ethnic Turks of Bulgaria in 1984. This bizarre action by the Todor Zhivkov regime caused much tension in that country and led to the migration of ethnic Turks to Turkey in successive waves. This question would also have an effect on the Kurdish question in Turkey.

One of the fundamental requirements of Turkey is the need to keep at least one of the two Balkan routes leading to Europe through Bulgaria and Greece open at all times (as noted in the Introduction). Throughout this period Turkey was at odds with Greece under Papandreou. When relations with Bulgaria became strained, not only did the second route to Europe come under threat, but there was also the danger of relations with the USSR being soured.

Between 1980 and 1988 Iraq and Iran were at war in the Middle East. Throughout the war Turkey observed strict neutrality, which allowed it to develop its trade with both belligerents. At the same time, the war caused a power vacuum to develop in northern Iraq. This allowed the PKK, Turkey's major concern in the latter part of the 1980s, to become entrenched in this region. The Palestinian Intifada, which broke out in this period, would also aggravate the Kurdish question in Turkey.

II. THE DOMESTIC ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

A. The Economy

The following observations can be can be made after examining Uluğbay's table (Table 6-2; see Box 2-1 in Section 2).

1. During this period GNP increased by a factor of 2.1, imports by 2.5, exports by 2.75, and foreign debts by 3. All of these figures represented very high rates of growth.

The average ratio of foreign trade to GNP during the period was 25.14. This ratio had been 11.8 for the period from 1961 to 1980 and 15.8 in 1980. The average ratio of foreign debt to GNP during the period was 35.6, while the corresponding figure had been 10.7 for the period from 1961 to 1980 and 23.0 for 1980. This meant that the external dependency of the economy was rapidly increasing during this period.

- 2. While Turkey's trade deficit was $5 billion in 1980, the deficit doubled to over $9 billion in 1990. This huge deficit would progressively rise in the subsequent period.
- 3. In 1981 the U.S. dollar was worth TL 110. At the end of the period in 1990 this figure had reached TL 2,606. The rate of inflation increased from 36.8% at the beginning of the period to 54.8% at the end, with the average for the period standing at 44%.

With the economic restructuring package of 24 January 1980, the currency was devalued from TL 35 to TL 70 to the U.S. dollar. This step induced large-scale price increases. Despite the introduction of a large-scale restructuring measures, the economic program failed to achieve its objectives.

4. In the 1980–90 period there was a considerable increase in the inflow of direct foreign capital, especially after 1984. This came about as a result of several factors. Turkey restructured its foreign debts as a complementary measure to the 24 January economic package. In this context, commercial debts not guaranteed by the state were also rescheduled. This led creditors, eager to recover their unguaranteed loans as early as possible, to market their stocks below their real value. At the same time, the new foreign investment legislation in Turkey allowed foreign investors to meet 50% of their capital through unguaranteed commercial loans if they obtained the other half in foreign exchange in cash. This arrangement was attractive to foreign investors. They would thus get an opportunity to own large registered capital by using less foreign exchange. When this practice started, it was possible to buy unguaranteed commercial stock worth one U.S. dollar for twenty-five cents. Commercial stocks later began selling at a premium. Other factors contributing to increased direct foreign investment were the improvements made in the foreign investment legislation and the policy introduced for privatization of state-owned companies.

Furthermore, rules relating to inward capital movements were eased. Foreign banks allowed to establish subsidiaries and to open branch offices also contributed to the inflow of foreign direct investment.

The Implementation of the 24 January Package of Measures from 1980 to 1987

The regime that took over on 12 September 1980 allowed Turgut Özal, who had been a candidate of the National Salvation Party (which was Islamist in nature) in the election of 1977, to take charge of the economy. His appointment was proof that the 12 September regime wanted to integrate the Turkish economy with the global economy, since Özal was the architect of the 24 January package, which was designed to achieve this objective (see Box 5-3 in Section 5).

Özal pursued two basic strategies to open up the economy. The first strategy was to cut down demand by raising prices. Imports were made more expensive through devaluation. Real wages were allowed to fall, so that by 1983 they stood at roughly one-half of their 1977 level. The Confederation of Revolutionary Workers' Unions (DİSK) was shut down, labor leaders were placed under arrest, and the political power of labor was crippled. In practice, collective bargaining ceased to function. The cap on the rate of interest was removed so that people would be encouraged to save with the lure of high nominal interests, thus cutting down on demand. Dubious bankers were allowed to attract savings with offers of high interest rates.

The second strategy was to encourage exports. This was done with continuous devaluations to keep the price of exports competitive. Monetary incentives and tax rebates were offered to exporters to allow them to hold down prices. This led to a boom in exports. The ratio of exports to GNP, which stood at 2.77% in 1979, rose steadily until 1989, when it reached 10.7%. The value of exports climbed from $4.7 billion in 1981 to over $12.9 billion in 1990.

Table 6-2. Basic Economic Indicators of Turkey, 1981–1990

|                         | 1                       |           |           |           |           |            |           |           |           | $-\frac{\epsilon}{2}$ |            |   |
|-------------------------|-------------------------|-----------|-----------|-----------|-----------|------------|-----------|-----------|-----------|-----------------------|------------|---|
| FOREIGNDIRECT       | INVESTMENT (MILLION $) | . 141     | 103       | 87        | 162       | 158        | 170       | 239       | 488       | 855                   | 1,005      |   |
| FOREIGN                 | AS % OFGNP          | . 22.75   | 27.07     | 30.22     | 34.29     | 37.72      | 42.10     | 45.96     | 44.81     | 38.43                 | 32.18      |   |
| FOREIGN                 | DEBT(MILLION $)    | 16,559.00 | 17,857.00 | 18,814.00 | 20,823.00 | 25,660.00  | 32,206.00 | 40,326.00 | 40,722.00 | 42,751.00             | 49,035.00  |   |
| FOREIGNTRADE        | AS % OFGNP          | 18.74     | 22.12     | 24.04     | 29.18     | 28.37      | 24.27     | 27.75     | 28.60     | 25.23                 | 23.14      |   |
|                         |                         | * , : |           |           |           |  . |           |           | 11        |                       |            |   |
| IMPORTS                 | AS % OFGNP          | 12.28     | 13.41     | 14.84     | 17.72     | 16.67      | 14.52     | 16.14     | 15.77     | 14.53                 | 14.64      | : |
|                         | IMPORTS(MILLION $) | 8,933.40  | 8,842.70  | 9,235.00  | 10,756.90 | 11,343.40  | 11,104.80 | 14,157.80 | 14,335.40 | 15,792.10             | 22,302.10  |   |
| EXPORTS                 | AS % OFGNP          | 6.46      | 8.71      | 9.20      | 11.75     | 11.70      | 9.75      | 11.61     | 12.83     | 10.70                 | 8.50       | . |
|                         | EXPORTS (MILLION $)    | 4,702.90  | 5,746.00  | 5,727.80  | 7,133.60  | 7,958.00   | 7,456.70  | 10,190.00 | 11,662.00 | 11,624.70             | 12,959.30  |   |
| ·                       | GNP (MILLION $)        | 72,775.30 | 65,957.20 | 62,251.00 | 60,720.20 | 68,032.40  | 76,504.80 | 87,737.90 | 90,879.40 | 108,652.30            | 152,387.80 |   |
|                         | TL/$RATE           | 110.24    | 160.89    | 223.82    | 365.08    | 519.61     | 669.04    | 855.04    | 1,421.39  | 2,120.25              | 2,606.36   |   |
| INFLATION(WHOLESALE | PRICES) (%)             | 36.8      | 25.2      | 30.5      | 50.3      | 43.2       | 29.6      | 32.0      | 68.3      | 9.69                  | 54.8       |   |
|                         | YEAR                    | 1981      | 1982      | 1983      | 1984      | 1985       | 1986      | 1987      | 1988      | 1989                  | 1990       |   |

Sources: Devlet Isratistik Enstitüsü (DİB), İstatistik Göstergeler 1923-1998, pp. 404, 495, and 588; Hazine Müsteşarlığı, Hazine İstatistikleri 1980-1998 pp. 74 and 161.

These improvements were accompanied by other developments, however, that were not so positive. Imports were rising faster than exports, with the trade gap growing ever wider. While exports stood at $4.7 billion and $12.9 billion in 1981 and 1990, imports reached $8.9 billion and $22.3 billion in the same years.

Furthermore, the opening of the economy had come about with the support of the IMF and the major powers. Success for the IMF in Turkey would be a welcome reference for the institution in other developing countries. At a time when the world had experienced the setbacks in Iran and Afghanistan, the U.S. could not afford to lose a forward outpost like Turkey. As a consequence, Turkey's foreign debts rose from $16.6 billion in 1981 to $49 billion in 1990. At the same time, the IMF allowed Turkey to restructure and reschedule its foreign debts to ease the burden of servicing the debt.

As explained earlier, the Turkish economy became overly exposed to the influence of foreign financial institutions.

During this period the economic programs that were implemented could be described as conforming to the model of "wild capitalism." The economy was being managed through monetary policies that weakened labor while strengthening capital. The system of taxation was regressive, and competition was unfair. The chief objective was to achieve high accumulation of capital in the shortest possible time through this model of capitalism. With this objective in mind, no effort was made to make the tax system progressive, and the weak were allowed to succumb to the powerful. The tax rebate system intended to stimulate exports led the way for abuses by which the treasury was fraudulently milked by a method known as "imaginary exports." In the previous period, the slogan had been "industrialization at any price." Now it had become "earn foreign exchange at any price" (Kepenek, p. 235). Abuses were prosecuted only in instances when the media made a big fuss over a particularly egregious case.

Turgut Özal favored the building of motorways, claiming that motorways meant democracy while railroads were the choice of communism. A program of privatization was undertaken in order to free the budget of the deficits incurred by publicly owned enterprises. This resulted in the abandonment of the government's industrial programs. Industry's share in the government's investments fell from 20.7% in 1978 to 4.5% in 1990 (Sönmez, p. 16). In June 1986 the government's monopoly over the manufacture, sale, and import of tobacco was abolished. This meant that the tobacco monopoly was handed over to the major international producers.

At first the results of restructuring or joining in the process of globalization were positive. With massive devaluation and price hikes, both inflation and internal demand were substantially cut. Import restrictions and limitations were curbed, leading to an abundance of goods in the market for those who could afford to buy them. As a consequence of the government's incentives, entrepreneurs raised exports to record levels. Exports jumped by 61% in 1981. Contractors started undertaking construction projects in foreign countries. Inflation fell from a high of 107% to 26%, and the economy grew by 4%. Idle industrial capacity came back into use. Instead of the usual one-year agreements, the IMF concluded a three-year agreement for the first time, allowing Turkey to incur massive debts. For the IMF, Turkey had become a model country.

But this positive trend could not be maintained for long. To cope with the rising cost of living, pensioners and many others with limited incomes placed their savings in pyramid schemes that promised returns of up to 140% on their savings. When the bankers who operated these schemes were unable to honor their extravagant promises, tens of thousands of victims found their savings wiped out. This became known as the Bankers' Scandal. As agricultural subsidies were cut, farm production declined. By 1983 alarm bells started ringing as the budget deficit soared, inflation jumped to 30%, and the growth in exports came to an end. As purchasing power started accumulating in the hands of a relatively small group of people, a leisure class living off unearned income came into being. The growth in industrial capacity was falling, and investments in new industries were in decline. As a consequence of the rigid implementation of the restructuring program, the value of the Turkish currency had fallen from TL 70 to the dollar in 1980 to TL 14,000 to the dollar in 1993, when Turgut Özal died. By 2001 the dollar was worth TL 1,630,000, and Turkey had become utterly dependent on international financial institutions.

The Economy after 1987

Two significant events occurred after 1987: the economy took a turn for the worse and politicians who had been proscribed returned to politics.

By 1987 the package of measures launched on 24 January 1980 had been drained of any effectiveness. With IMF support, large amounts of external resources had been used and high levels of exports achieved. In preparation for the 1987 legislative election, agricultural subsidies were raised, public service salaries were increased, and infrastructure projects were undertaken to reduce unemployment, causing the budget deficit to soar. These measures were not able to prevent the Motherland Party's votes from falling from 41 to 36%. To deal with the budget deficit, the government started borrowing from the public by issuing treasury bills and state bonds. This practice grew from year to year and by the 1990s made up a substantial part of the government's revenues. As poverty spread, support for Islamists increased to the extent that they were able to share power in the coalition government. The failure of the 24 January package became manifest with the problems encountered in the 1990s.

B. Politics

The coup of 12 September brought about a wave of liberalization and privatization in the economy. It was the other way around in politics, where rules and norms similar to those of a garrison were imposed.

The Efforts to Stem Anarchy

The five-member National Security Council (NSC; this junta, called Milli Güvenlik Konseyi in Turkish, should not be confused with the National Security Council called Milli Güvenlik Kurulu in Turkish, a constitutional body composed of the president, prime minister, certain cabinet ministers, and the five top military leaders) that carried out the 12 September coup (see Box 6-29 below) assumed full executive and legislative powers and declared martial law almost everywhere in the country. This was followed by a wave of arrests. According to a publication put out by the office of the chief of the General Staff in May 1982, 17,374 individuals belonging to 167 different organizations were brought to trial. Of these 14,086 were "leftists," 2,941 were "separatists," and 347 were "rightists." The Association for Human Rights (established later) arrived at the following tally for this period: 650,000 people were detained, 210,000 cases were brought to the courts, 230,000 individuals were tried in court, and 1,683,000 individuals were registered by security services and police (Cumhuriyetin 75. Yılı, p. 812).

The news of the death of the publisher Ilhan Erdost on 10 November 1980 as a result of a beating by soldiers as he was being taken to Ankara's Mamak military prison drew attention to "unnatural deaths under custody." It was determined by courts that 17 of these deaths were directly caused by torture. The authorities claimed that 43 deaths were suicides, 16 occurred while attempting to flee, 74 as a result of shootouts, 14 as a result of hunger strikes, 2 from indeterminate causes, and 144 were of a suspicious nature. Only 73 deaths were due to natural causes.

Between 1980 and 1984 prosecutors sought the death penalty against 5,000 defendants; 517 received a death sentence, 124 of which were confirmed. Of these, 18 leftists, 8 rightists, 1 ASALA member (see Box 7-33 in Section 7), and 23 common criminals were executed. In one case

Erdal Eren, a minor, was declared to be older and fit for execution on the basis of bone X-rays. In a speech delivered in Muş on 3 October 1984, the head of state, Kenan Evren, remarked: "Why should we have to keep feeding these traitors instead of just hanging them?" These events would leave a deep mark in the collective psyche of Turks (Cumhuriyetin 75. Yılı, pp. 791–92).

As unrest in the country was being suppressed in this fashion, the regime also went about changing the legal system, demonstrating that it was determined to alter the country's complexion permanently. The NSC operated on the premise that it was the basic freedoms, labor rights, and autonomous universities of the 1961 Constitution that were at the root of the anarchy reigning in the country. As soon as it seized power, it directed its attention at associations, labor unions, and university students and faculty. Political parties, the parliament, and associations were shut down, labor leaders were arrested, and the activities of the labor union DISK were suppressed. All universities were brought under the control of YÖK, the newly established Council for Higher Education, which ran the universities according to a unified model. Under this model, the democratic election system was put aside and the university administrators were appointed by YÖK. Martial law commanders were empowered to remove from public office and from private business those individuals, including university professors, deemed inconvenient or unreliable (Box 6-2).

The provisional Constitution approved on 27 October 1980 but made retroactively effective as of 12 September 1980 established the legal framework for the country. All of the powers and responsibilities of the TGNA would be vested in the five-man NSC, and the powers of the head of state would be held by the NSC's president, General Evren. The constitutionality of the legislation to be approved by the NSC could not be contested. The military administration would not be held accountable for its decisions: those affected by its actions would not be able to seek legal redress.

The new Constitution came into effect after it was approved by a majority of 91.3% in a referendum on 7 November 1982. It was based on the principle of protecting the state and the administration from society and the individual. The principle of "inviolability of the essence of fundamental rights and freedoms" embodied in the Constitution of 1961 was eliminated, and the powers of the executive and the police were reinforced at the expense of those of the judiciary. In particular, restrictions were placed on collective rights such as the right of association, and the powers of administrative tribunals and the constitutional court were trimmed.

Box 6-2. The Implementation of Law No. 1402

Martial Law No. 1402 reflects perfectly the philosophy of the 12 September regime. Its article 2 was amended on 19 September 1980 to allow the martial law commanders to request the immediate dismissal of any public or private-sector employee without having to show any cause. This sweeping power was used to get rid of a good number of people working in agencies and institutions and mainly at the universities. The law was amended again on 28 December 1982, to forbid those removed in this way from ever holding a public job.

When rumors spread that Dicle University faculty members in Diyarbakir had voted against the 1982 Constitution in the referendum, the prime minister's office issued a circular containing the following passage. "Some members of the faculty got involved in various activities in the past without leaving any incriminating evidence. They could not be prosecuted because of lack of evidence" (Özen, pp. 49–50). After this circular dated 4 February 1983, members of university faculties began to be dismissed on the basis of Law No. 1402. Among these was Server Tanilli, who was already retired from the University of Istanbul.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) declared this practice to be discriminatory. Because of the provision that such individuals could never hold public jobs again, there was a general impression that the victims of Law No. 1402 could not reapply for jobs in universities. Dr. Metin Günday, however, a public administration lawyer, claimed that this provision was valid only during the state of emergency and did not apply in normal times. Hence a number of faculty members of Ankara University applied for reemployment in July 1985 after martial law was lifted in Ankara. When their application was turned down by the university, they went to the administrative court for a ruling.

After four years of legal proceedings, the Council of State (administrative high court) annulled the ruling of the University of Ankara on 7 February 1989, allowing the victims of Law No. 1402 to return to their former university positions and thus bringing to an end one of the more objectionable features of the 12 September regime.

(B. ORAN) (Source: Haldun Özen, Entellektüelin Drami: 12 Eylül'ün Cadı Kazanı (Ankara: İmge Yayınevi, 2002))

The 12 September Coup and Islam

Although the memory of Atatürk was constantly invoked during this period, the Turkish Language Council and the Turkish Historical Council were merged as the Atatürk High Council of Culture, Language, and History (AKDTYK). This ended the autonomy of the two institutions and violated Atatürk's testament. Atatürk had willed that the income derived from his personal shares in Türkiye İş Bankası be allocated to these two institutions that he founded. When the bank increased its capital in 1981, the secretary-general of President Evren refused to allow the two institutions to acquire new shares, so that Atatürk's ownership in the bank fell from 27.57% to 0.03% (Oran 1999, p. 146).

The newly created merged institution (AKDTYK) was given the task of instilling the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis in society (Box 6-3). Although this course was contrary to the precepts of Kemalism, the core of the ideology of the armed forces, it fitted neatly into the prevailing conditions at the time. The economic policies of the day were impoverishing the masses, who, having lost all hope of improving their lot in the foreseeable future, were turning to religion for solace. At the same time, the new regime was using religion as a means to strengthen its legitimacy. Furthermore, this synthesis was considered to be a useful social cement against communism and Kurdish separatism. The synthesis was also in full conformity with U.S. president Jimmy Carter's anti-USSR strategy of creating a "Green Belt." It was natural for Turkey to move closer to the U.S. as friction increased with Europe over human rights abuses.

The idea of the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis found its reflection in the Constitution (article 134) as well as in daily life as it permeated all segments of society. The real impact of this orientation toward Islam, however, was to come to fruition in the early 1990s.

On 28 August 1982 the Ministry of Education made religious instruction compulsory in primary and junior high schools and decreed the saying of grace before meals in state boarding schools. At the proposal of the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations and the Union of Chambers of Agricultural Engineers, article 24 of the 1982 Constitution was amended to make Islamic religious instruction compulsory in high schools for the first time in Turkey. Religious instruction was also introduced into prisons. The head of state, Kenan Evren, peppered his speeches with quotations from the Quran and the sayings of the Prophet and even used this method to advocate the education of girls (Oran 1989, pp. 161-63, 188-90, 197, 202, 209, 221, 242). The budget of the Religious Affairs Directorate grew to unprecedented levels toward the end of this period, reaching a level 1.5 times higher than the budget of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and 7 times that of the Ministry of Labor and Social Security. In one year 1,500 mosques were built, representing a new mosque every six hours. The Religious Affairs Directorate started publishing books containing religious edicts on all sorts of subjects, ranging from dietary rules and sexual practices to banks and interest rates. It established a religious foundation (Türkiye Diyanet Vakfı) that developed into a group of eight enterprises engaged in business activi-

Box 6-3. The Turkish-Islamic Synthesis

The so-called Turkish-Islamic Synthesis appeared in the 1970s. It brought together the two main streams of the Turkish Right, the Islamic and the ultranationalist. By uniting its forces, the Right felt that it could deal more effectively with leftist tendencies that had been gathering strength since the 1960s. The chief proponent of the concept was the association known as the Aydınlar Ocağı (Hearth of the Intellectuals [aydınlar; enlightened]), set up in 1970. The association defended this concept as the appropriate cultural framework for Turkey.

At a time when the U.S. was seeking to form a "Green Belt" and the authors of the 12 September coup were seeking to gain popular support, the concept came as a handy tool. While the Aydinlar Ocagi supported the 12 September regime, the 12 September military regime was putting its ideas into practice. Its members were planted in key positions in the Council for Higher Education, the Ministry of Education, and the Ministry of Culture. The National Culture Committee of the State Planning Organization prepared a report in 1983 outlining a "national culture" framework for Turkish society.

The Turkish-Islamic Synthesis continued to remain topical during Turgut Özal's term in office. This was reflected in appointments and other practices. The most striking example of these practices was the report adopted in June 1986 by the Ataturk High Council of Culture, Language, and History, an institution created by the 12 September administration. The report established a national culture policy and was entitled "The Methods and Responsibilities in the Elaboration of the Elements and Policies of Culture." Those who attended the meeting that adopted the report included President Evren, Prime Minister Özal, Gen. Necdet Üruğ (chief of the General Staff), Ihsan Doğramacı (president of the Council for Higher Education), and the other council members.

The basis of this approach was the notion that the national culture drew sustenance from two main sources, Turkish and Islamic culture. It was presumed that Turkey was under the assault of foreign and especially imperialist culture and that the best safeguard against this assault was the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis. The presumption rested on the belief that Turks would lose their identity without Islam and that Islam was the religion that was most suited to Turks. According to the proponents of this idea, the notion that a culture developed within a historical time frame under the influence of economic and social developments was not valid. There was an immutable cultural essence that had to be protected, come what may. This was the duty of the state, which had to disseminate "national culture."

Although the system was originally based on two pillars, more weight gradually was given to Islam, under the influence of the internal and external conditions of the day. An effort was made to reconcile all this with Ataturk's teachings and to use his image to bring Islam to the fore. It was claimed that the aim of Ataturk's precepts was to advance this synthesis. This approach was bound to dilute the principle of secularism.

Both the state and society had to struggle in the 1990s and 2000s with the grim consequences of these policies that stressed Islam during the 1980s, including the proliferating religious preacher schools and other manifestations. It would take the army's "postmodern" intervention of 28 February 1997 to rid the state of this vestige of the 12 September regime.

(İ. UZGEL) (Source: Bozkurt Güvenç, Gençay Şaylan, İlhan Tekeli, and Şerafettin Turan, Türk-İslam Sentezi İlstanbul: Sarmal Yayınlan, 1994l)

ties, including publishing, tourism, education, insurance, film-making, and food processing, and owning over seven thousand real-estate properties throughout the country. From 1980 to 1982 twenty-three faculties of theology were established in different universities (Oran 1999, pp. 145–47). A Saudi Arabian institution known as Rabitat al-Alam al-Islami started paying the salaries of Turkish religious instructors sent abroad on official duty. This fact was exposed by the journalist Uğur Mumcu in March 1987. The administration at first tried to deny this but was forced to admit later that there was indeed a decree dated 28 April 1981 allowing this practice (Cumhuriyet, 19 March 1987).

This official approach to Islam also had its effect on society at large. The minister of education, Vehbi Dincerler, sent a circular to schools in March 1985, ordering that Charles Darwin's theory of evolution not be taught as an accepted truth. The prefect of the district of Banaz ordered a 10% cut in the salary of a teacher who explained the theory in class (Cumhuriyet, 11 July 1985). Again, it was Dincerler who decided that non-Muslim students would also attend courses on religion (Milliyet, 10 August 1985). This practice, which was implemented by the undersecretary of the ministry, Professor Cemil Kıvanç, would be rescinded in January 1987 upon objections coming from Germany. Toward the end of the period Professor Cemal Mıhçıoğlu published the information that 40% of the students attending the courses of the Public Administration Department in the Faculty of Political Science of Ankara University in the 1987–88 academic year were graduates of high schools that trained religious preachers and clerics. These students would later go on to become district administrators and provincial governors (because this faculty is the main source of high civil servants in the country) (Cumhuriyet, 9 January 1989).

The 12 September Coup and the Kurdish Question
After 1984 the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis began to be used by the state against the stirrings of Kurdish nationalism, just as it had been used as a tool against communism. Military aircraft dropped tracts bearing verses of the Quran

Box 6-4. Law No. 2932 on Publications/ Broadcasting in Languages Other Than Turkish

Article 26 of the Constitution of 1982 stated that "in the expression and dissemination of thoughts, no language can be used that is proscribed by law." Article 28 stipulated that "no publication/broadcasting is allowed in a language that is proscribed by law."

The law referred to in these provisions was enacted one year later, in October 1983. Law No. 2932 declares in article 2 that "it is forbidden to express, disseminate, or publish thoughts in any language other than the official first language of the states recognized by the Turkish state."

This convoluted language was carefully devised to mean Kurdish without using the term, bearing in mind that Kurdish was the second official language of Iraq. Introduction of the phrase "state recognized by the Turkish state" foresaw a possible independent Kurdish state in Iraq and took the necessary precaution. Article 3 declared that "the mother tongue of Turkish citizens is Turkish."

Law No. 2932, a direct violation of Article 39/4 of the Peace Treaty of Lausanne, was repealed by the Turgut Özal administration on 12 April 1991. At this time the state broadcasting system, TRT (Türkiye Radyo Televizyon Kurumu), was broadcasting news in four different languages and Kurdish publications were constantly appearing in Turkey. But the provisions to this effect remained in the Constitution until they were removed in October 2001.

(B. ORAN)

and sayings of the Prophet calling for respect and obedience to elders and to the state over Kurdish-populated areas.

Following the Tunceli operation of 1937–38 (see Box 2-3 in Section 2), Kurdish nationalism had been dormant. The first signs of reawakening came in the 1960s with various kinds of publications. This was followed by the establishment of the Revolutionary Eastern Culture Hearths (DDKO) in 1969, when the Kurds broke away from the mainstream Left and became autonomous. In the 1970s there was intensive publishing activity at a time when the Kurdish nationalist movement was getting organized. Some Kurdish nationalists were taking action aimed at Kurdish tribes in the southeast. After 12 September most of these nationalists fled to Arab countries to escape capture.

In the 1980s the Turkish state considered the Kurds to be a "Turkish clan," and the Kurdish question was reduced to "PKK terror." After the outbreak of the Iran-Iraq War, the terrorists moved to bases outside the country. This allowed the regime to claim that this growing problem was the result of foreign meddling. The state was reluctant to admit that it had anything more than a security and socioeconomic problem arising from the underdevelopment of the regions populated by the Kurds. Consequently, the measures it took were inadequate to the task at hand. All it did was to seek to repress the terror and forbid the use of the Kurdish language (Box 6-4).

While the state attempted to deal with the Kurdish question by resorting to the system of Village Guards (apparently modeled on the Hamidiye Regiments established in 1890 by Sultan Abdulhamid), the PKK established its political base in foreign countries with the ERNK (National Defense Front of Kurdistan), its political bureau founded in 1985. At this time, even uttering the word "Kurd" was considered very risky in Turkey. When Prime Minister Özal wanted to refer to the Iraqi Kurds, he used the formula "the kinsmen in northern Iraq of our citizens in the southeast." In 1988 Saddam Hussein used chemical weapons against the Iraqi Kurds, who fled in large numbers to Turkey to save their lives. The chief of the Turkish General Staff used the term "Kurd" for the first time at that point, and the ban on the use of the word was effectively lifted.

The methods used to deal with the question would stain Turkey's reputation in the field of human rights and become Turkey's chief internal and external concern in the early 1990s. Furthermore, the attempt to deal with the Kurdish question by using Islam as a tool was to backfire and create the problem of Hezbollah in the late 1990s.

After the adoption of the new Constitution, an election was held in 1983. The regime wanted to ensure continuity by backing the Nationalist Democratic Party led by retired general Turgut Sunalp in the election. But the victor in the election was the Motherland Party of Turgut Özal. Despite this, the regime of 12 September did secure a measure of continuity through the presidency of Kenan Evren until 1989.

After Evren, Özal was elected president in October 1989 and ran the government from the presidency when Yıldırım Akbulut was prime minister. The Motherland Party lost power at the election in 1991, and Özal died in April 1993 while serving as president. Özal, the innovator, while in power was able to change many aspects of public life that had ceased to serve any useful purpose but could not be eliminated because they had become ossified. But he will also be remembered as the man who unheedingly opened up Turkey to rapacious international capital. The concept of public good was replaced with blatant private greed. Instead of encouraging participatory democracy, the masses were depoliticized. Culture and aesthetics gave way to kitsch.

III. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE PERIOD

Before taking up this subject, two tables should be examined (Tables 6-3 and 6-4; see also Box 2-1 in Section 2).

1. Table 6-3 includes seven countries, although previous tables contained only five or six. Nevertheless, Turkey's volume of trade with its seven main trading partners accounted for only less than 60% of its trade, whereas Turkey's trade with only five countries in previous periods comfortably exceeded 60%. This demonstrates that Turkey had succeeded in diversifying its trading partners.

2. In 1990 the EEC countries' share in Turkey's trade was 53.3% for exports and 44.1% for imports. In other words, the EEC countries continued to be Turkey's major trading partner.

Table 6-4 is included in this analysis because there was a substantial jump in Turkey's domestic and external debts during this period, which led to the economic bottlenecks in the latter part of the 1990s. The following observations can be made in connection with this table.

1. During this period external debts increased by a factor of almost 3. Short-term external debts increased even faster, by almost 4.4 times. The short maturity of external debt is as important as the level of debt in increasing a country's dependency.

2. The level of internal debt increased by a factor of 21

during this period.

3. The ratio of the interest payments from the budget to service the domestic and foreign debt to tax revenues reached 35% during this period. This high ratio was bound to have a snowball effect in subsequent years and required immediate remedial action, which was never taken. As no effort was made to restructure the budget by increasing revenues and the pursuit of populist measures got progressively worse, it was inevitable that this would all end up in the form of a serious economic crisis.

With this economic background in mind, we can now examine foreign policy developments.

A. Factors Affecting Foreign Policy

International developments, the nature of the 12 September coup regime, and the Özal factor affected Turkish foreign policy during this period.

The International Environment

This was the period of globalization, which was forcing all countries to conform to the rules of international capitalism and to connect with it. This development increased U.S. power even while it gathered its strength from U.S.

influence and actions. At this time, Turkey was much affected by the Green Belt policy of the U.S., because the 12 September regime was already predisposed to follow such a course, with its own policy overlapping that of the U.S. Reagan's "Second Cold War" policies did not have much effect in Turkey, however, and Ankara was not called upon to take an active role in this endeavor. First, this was the Özal period, and Turkey's trade with the USSR was growing. More importantly, after Gorbachev came to power in 1984, the USSR turned inward, and his policies led to a more restrained Soviet foreign policy, which also made things easier for Turkey. As we shall see later, the USSR proved unexpectedly cooperative in the negotiation of the Conventional Forces Agreement in Europe in the early part of the next period. Turkey's task was also made easier because the European partners did not show much enthusiasm for Reagan's new Cold War.

The events of 1979 in Iran and Afghanistan increased Turkey's geostrategic importance and created an advantageous position for Turkey in the early part of this period. As the USSR gradually withdrew into its own shell in the middle of the period, however, this advantage for Turkey would quickly disappear.

At a time when the Papandreou administration in Greece was causing problems for Turkey in the Aegean and Western Thrace, Bulgaria created a new problem by ordering the changing of Turkish names in that country. This situation threatened to block Turkey's important access routes to Europe through the Balkans. The row with Bulgaria coincided with the Second Cold War, which meant that Bulgaria cut Turkey off from Europe. Despite this, Turkey resorted to all means to expose Bulgaria's actions in the international arena. The matter was eventually resolved through the collapse of the Eastern Bloc.

Another international development affecting Turkey was the terrorist activity of ASALA, the Armenian nationalist organization. Although thirty-four Turkish diplomats perished and seventeen were wounded as a result of ASALA action, this did not directly affect the course of Turkish diplomacy, because this type of terrorism was not able to attract the backing of the West. After ASALA ceased its terrorist activities, the Armenian bills introduced in Western legislatures during the 1990s, however, would affect Turkish foreign policy.

Similarly, the terrorist activities of the Kurdish nationalist organization PKK would have much less effect on Turkish foreign policy in the 1980s but did have an effect in the 1990s. PKK terror, which emerged in 1984, was ineffective and did not have Western backing. Moreover,

Table 6-3. Share of Selected Countries in Turkey's Foreign Trade, 1981~1990 (%)

|             | Þ          | USA                  | W. GERMANY  | MANY         | FRA     | NCE     | BRIT    | BRITAIN |         | ITALX                   |             | IRAN    | TOTAL FOR SEVEN COUNTRIES | L FORUNTRIES |
|-------------|------------|----------------------|---|--------------|---------|---------|---------|---------|---------|-------------------------|-------------|---------|---------------------------|------------------|
| YEAR I      | EXPORTS    | YEAR EXPORTS IMPORTS | EXPORTS IMPORTS   | IMPORTS      | EXPORTS | IMPORTS | EXPORTS | IMPORTS | EXPORTS | IMPORTS EXPORTS IMPORTS | RIS EXPORTS | IMPORTS | EXPORTS                   | IMPORTS          |
| 1981        | 5.7        | 9.9                  | 13.7  | 10.7         | 4.6     | 4.5     | 3.1     | 4.9     | 5.2     | 4.2                     | 8 5.0       | 5.8     | 41.4                      | 37.5             |
| 1982        | 4.4        | 9.3                  | 12.3  | 11.4         | 3.4     | 3.0     | 3.3     | 4.9     | 5.7     | 4.7                     | 2 13.8      | 8.5     | 45.1                      | 42.9             |
| 1983        | 4.0        | 2.7                  | 14.6  | 11.4         | 3.2     | 2.4     | 4.3     | 4.8     | 7.4     | 5.5 1.5 2.6             | 5 19.0      | 13.2    | 54.0                      | 47.4             |
| 1984        | 5.2        | 10.0                 | 17.9  | 10.9         | 2.8     | 2.3     | 3.7     | 4.1     | 7.0     | 5.9                     | 9. 10.5     | 14.6    | 49.0                      | 50.7             |
| 1985        | 6.4        | 10.1                 | 17.5  | 12.1         | 2.7     | 4.5     | 6.8     | 4.1     | 6.3     | -5.8 2.4                | 13.6        | 11.1    | 55.7                      | 59.6             |
| 1986        | 7.4        | 10.6                 | 19.4  | 16.0         | 4.0     | 4.9     | 4.5     | 4.7     | 7.8     | 7.8                     | 2 7.6       | 2.0     | 52.6                      | 49.2             |
| 1987        | 7.0        | 5.7                  | 21.4  | 14.9         | 4.9     | 4.3     | 5.3     | 4.9     | 8.3     | 7.6                     | 2 4.3       | 6.7     | 52.9                      | 50.3             |
| 1988        | 6.5        | 10.6                 | 18.4  | 14.3         | 4.3     | 5.8     | 4.9     | 5.2     | 8.2     | 7.0                     | 1 4.7       | 4.6     | 49.3                      | 50.6             |
| 1989        | 8.4        | 13.3                 | 18.7  | 14.0         | 5.1     | 4.7     | 5.3     | 4.6     | 8.4     | 6.8 6.1 4.0             | 0 4.8       | 1.5     | 57.3                      | 48.9             |
| 1990        | 7.5        | 10.2                 | 23.6  | 15.7         | 5.7     | 0.9     | 5.7     | 4.5     | 8.5     | 7.7                     | 6 3.8       | 2.2     | 58.9                      | 51.9             |
| Courses Day | matetetich | Tr Dractifice (1     | Courses. Dowlet I that to the Bucktis (DID) I that the Carterial was seen | Cortownal ne | 1       | 25 917  |         |         |         |                         |             |         |                           |                  |

Source: Devlet İstatistik Enstitüsü (DİE), İstatistik Görtergeler, 1923–1998, pp. 419–33. (Compiled and interpreted by Hikmet Uluğbay)

Table 6-4. Structure of External and Domestic Debt, 1981–1990

| TENTE OF THE | Tactar of paterns                     | Table of the decision of partition and possesses problem 1770 | 0//                             |   |   |                              |   |
|--------------|---------------------------------------|---|---------------------------------|---|---|------------------------------|---|
| YEAR         | TOTALFOREIGN DEBT(MILLION $) | MEDIUM- ANDLONG-TERM DEBT(MILLION $)                 | SHORT-TERM DEBT(MILLION $) | SHORT-TERM EXTERNAL DEBT AS % OF TOTAL DEBT | TOTAL DOMESTIC DEBT (BILLION TL) (MILLION $) | DOMESTIC DEBTAS % OF GNP | INTERESTPAYMENTS AS %OF TAX REVENUE |
| 1981         | 16,627.0                              | 14,448.0  | 2,179.0                         | 13.11                                       | 990.9   | 12.35                        | 6.30  |
| 1982         | 17,858.0                              | 16,094.0  | 1,764.0                         | 9.88  | 1,340.8                                       | 12.63                        | 6.67  |
| 1983         | 18,814.0                              | 16,533.0  | 2,281.0                         | 12.12                                       | 3,177.2                                       | 22.80                        | 10.91                                       |
| 1984         | 20,823.0                              | 17,643.0  | 3,180.0                         | 15.27                                       | 4,639.1                                       | 20.93                        | 18.59                                       |
| 1985         | 25,660.0                              | 20,901.0  | 4,759.0                         | 18.55                                       | 6,977.3                                       | 19.74                        | 17.60                                       |
| 1986         | 32,206.0                              | 25,857.0  | 6,349.0                         | 19.71                                       | 10,519.1                                      | 20.55                        | 25.04                                       |
| 1987         | 40,326.0                              | 32,703.0  | 7,623.0                         | 18.90                                       | 5,999.9*                                      | 8.00                         | 25.04                                       |
| 1988         | 40,722.0                              | 34,305.0  | 6,417.0                         | 15.76                                       | 8,931.1                                       | 6.91                         | 34.98                                       |
| 1989         | 41,751.0                              | 36,006.0  | 5,745.0                         | 13.76                                       | 16,617.7                                      | 7.21                         | 32.32                                       |
| 1990         | 49,035.0                              | 39,535.0  | 9,500.0                         | 19.37                                       | 20,901.1                                      | 5.26                         | 30.76                                       |
|              |                                       |   |                                 |   |   |                              |   |

Source: Undersecretariat of the Treasury and Foreign Trade, Monthly Treasury Indicators, March 1989, p. 12.
* In 1987 there is an important reduction in domestic debt. This is because that year accounts were subdivided into bills and bonds and new series were established.
(Compiled and interpreted by Hikmet Ulugbay)

Turkey's abortive application in the latter part of the period to join the European Communities as a full member had not yet created the concerns among members of the European Communities that Turkey's application would evoke in the subsequent period.

In the case of both ASALA and PKK teror, there was a feeling in the West that the circumstances in Turkey in the early 1980s were unusual and a certain measure of understanding was necessary for Turkey's predicament as it wrestled with these twin problems. This wait-and-see policy in the West was to disappear, however, particularly when it became apparent that Turkey was not about to make any reforms to deal with the Kurdish question. This would lead to strong Western reactions against Turkey, which would be exploited to the hilt by both Kurdish and Armenian nationalists.

The Nature of the 12 September Regime

At first the international reaction to the repression, arrests, and executions was muted because the military coup was seen as a result of the anarchy when it reached an intolerable level, even though the identities and motives of those responsible for the anarchy were unclear.

But when it became obvious that the concept of a Constitution (which had been designed to protect the individual against the state since the Magna Carta of 1215) was perverted to cast all associations, labor unions, and universities in a single mold, the international pressure began to build and reached a peak in the 1990s.

Naturally, this reaction came from Europe. For the U.S., it was another story. American public opinion was not concerned with such "details," so Washington continued with its usual diplomacy based on Realpolitik, which pursued the U.S. national interest without being too fussy about democracy or dictatorship. But for European public opinion, human rights were a major issue. Influenced by Turkish political dissidents, ASALA, and the PKK, Europe gradually began to distance itself from Turkey. This left Turkey pretty well internationally isolated, with only the U.S. to turn to.

With the 12 September regime stamping out even the most innocent criticism, public opinion became irrelevant. In an environment where the only influence was that of the U.S., Turkish diplomats could no longer draw strength from Turkish public opinion. During the period from 1960 to 1980 Turkey's autonomy in its foreign policy had increased in step with increasing freedoms in the country. The process was reversed in the period from 1980 to 1990, and repression at home constricted Turkey's diplomacy.

The Özal Factor

Özal had a negative effect on Turkish foreign policy in three ways.

- 1. As explained above, unlike the situation in Korea and Singapore, Özal opened up the Turkish economy without taking the necessary precautionary measures, making the country dependent and thus indirectly weakening its ability to conduct an active foreign policy.
- 2. Özal held the belief that increased trade with a given country would help overcome problems in bilateral relations. In the case of Greece and some countries of the Middle East where the problems were long-standing and ossified, however, this approach did not work.
- 3. Özal had the habit of bypassing the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in conducting diplomacy. Occasionally he would ignore the traditional and tested guiding principles of Turkish foreign policy going back seventy-five years and commit serious errors, causing much embarrassment to the foreign policy establishment. Examples of this behavior are cited in the chapter "The Implementation of Turkish Foreign Policy" in the Introduction. Some other prominent examples of the manner in which Özal conducted foreign policy are given below.

President Özal allowed some nonresponsible members of the Akbulut government to make official statements on foreign policy and conduct international negotiations. A minister conducted negotiations on ethnic Turks in foreign countries without informing the MFA. Three ministers negotiated the delivery of medicines to Iraq without the knowledge of the MFA. Ozal embarrassed the MFA by describing the bills in the U.S. Congress in connection with the Armenian events of 1915 as a one-off thing. This led the U.S. authorities to downplay the official Turkish demarches in connection with the issue. Özal used undiplomatic language toward Bulgaria and precipitated a mass migration of ethnic Turks, for which Turkey was totally unprepared. He remarked: "If Bulgaria expelled a million Turks, we will admit them all... They can't do a shit... Mr. Zhivkov himself can also come; I'll take him to see the GAP Project" (Cumhuriyet, 22 August 1989). The open border was suddenly closed in August 1989 when the inflow reached 300,000, causing a crisis. Foreign minister Mesut Yılmaz was made a scapegoat for this. At a time when Turkey was not prepared for it, Özal announced that the free movement of persons between Northern and Southern Cyprus would facilitate the solution of the Cyprus question. This contradicted Ankara's policy on Cyprus and embarrassed Denktaş.

Through the undersecretary of the MFA, Özal proposed the conclusion of a free trade agreement to the U.S.

government. This created a shock in the MFA, where it was known that this proposal was incompatible with Turkey's commitments to the European Community. The ministry was forced to deny having any knowledge of the proposal. With reference to Azerbaijan, Özal declared: "The Azerbaijanis are Shiites and therefore more attracted to Iran than to Turkey." When he was forced to rectify what he had said, this in turn created misunderstandings with Moscow. At a time when the MFA was trying to avoid a situation similar to that of the ethnic Turks in Bulgaria reappearing in Western Thrace, Prime Minister Akbulut remarked: "Let them come over, we shall share our soup with them" (Cumhuriyet, 9 February 1990, quoted in Oran 1991, p. 303). The "peace water pipeline" project for the Middle East was unveiled by Özal with much fanfare, but it later emerged that no serious technical feasibility study had been made. Furthermore, Syria, Iraq, and other Arab states wondered why Turkey was denying them water if it had surplus water to sell. The rapprochement with Greece, launched in 1987 at Davos, was conducted without the involvement of the MFA. The lifting of the visa requirement for Greek visitors was also done without consulting the MFA. When Özal was conducting negotiations with the U.S., he did not admit the minister of foreign affairs, Ali Bozer, into the room, even though U.S. secretary of state James Baker was present. This snub forced Bozer to resign.

The most serious criticism of Özal's style of conducting foreign policy came during the first Gulf crisis and the subsequent war. As in the case of the 1988 Iraqi-Kurdish refugee crisis, when he concocted scenarios for occupying Kirkuk and Mosul, Özal wanted to join the war "in order to obtain a slice of the Middle Eastern cake." This approach was in direct conflict with one of the two basic tenets of Turkish foreign policy, which was to maintain the status quo. The minister of foreign affairs and the ministry's spokesman learned of Turkey's (i.e., Özal's) decision to cut the flow of oil in the Iraq-Mediterranean pipeline in compliance with UN sanctions from the press. Turkey was prevented from joining the conflict by an alert media and the resignation of the chief of the General Staff, Necip Torumtay.

Furthermore, when Özal became president, he often bypassed the MFA and dealt with other ministries when conducting foreign policy. He also had the habit of dealing directly with specific diplomats in the MFA without regard to the ministry's hierarchy. Özal undermined the Ministry of the Interior by introducing political Islam in that institution. He neutralized the Ministry of Finance by removing the treasury division from the ministry and turning it into an autonomous body. He did the same to the MFA by sidelining it. These three ministries had always been in the forefront in upholding the public interest, the traditions of the state, and the concepts of legality and respect for hierarchy. Their cadres consisted of graduates of the Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), whom Özal regarded as obstacles to his initiatives.

B. The Conduct of Foreign Policy Relations with the Hegemonic Power

It would have been surprising if Turkey had conducted a relatively autonomous foreign policy during this period, when it was internationally isolated, when the domestic public opinion that might have supported such a course had been neutralized, and when it was economically dependent on other powers.

As a matter of fact, during this period Turkish foreign policy was in retreat on all the fronts that it had been able to hold against the U.S. in the previous period.

1. Within the framework of NATO, Kenan Evren accepted the Rogers Plan, which involved agreeing to the return of Greece to the military structure of NATO without obtaining any countervailing concession for his cooperation. In defending his action, Evren used the argument that, by doing so, Turkey had eased the pressure that was being exerted against it. This was reminiscent of the argument of those who used the glib phrase "give it up and be done with it" with respect to the Kurdish question in the early 1990s.

2. In October 1982 a NATO exercise was held in Turkey with the participation of the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force (Box 6-6). As part of the implementation of the Wohlstetter Doctrine, the building of air bases in eastern Anatolia was undertaken in November 1982. In 1984 transit facilities were granted to the Rapid Deployment Force with the Host Country Support Agreement (Gerger, p. 157).

In 1987 the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement with the U.S. was extended for a further five years through a side letter. The Congress was a stumbling block once again, and the U.S. did not sign the agreement. Although part of the FMS debts of Egypt and Israel had been written off, Turkey's debts were not forgiven. The U.S. administration would only agree to promise to do its best to persuade Congress. Congress relented in the end but reduced the amount promised by the administration by 45%. All that Turkey could do was attempt to suspend the side letter and the secret protocol. But after eleven months Ankara had to relent and gave its consent in February 1988. At the time, Özal had not informed the MFA when giving this consent.

When the U.S. intervention in Panama was condemned in the UN by a wide margin in 1989, Turkey voted with the U.S. (Cumhuriyet, 31 December 1989, mentioned in Gerger, p. 148).

In 1983 the U.S. condemned the establishment of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC). Washington dissuaded Pakistan and Bangladesh from recognizing the TRNC. By proclaiming 24 April "Man's Inhumanity to Man Day" in September 1984, the U.S. gave a moral boost to the Armenian lobby. Nevertheless, Turkey remained the third largest recipient of American aid during this period, after Israel and Egypt.

Turkey was able to stand up to the U.S. on just two issues. By saying no to the deployment in Turkey of Cruise and Pershing missiles in January 1985, Ankara refused to undertake new nuclear obligations. It could do this because Europe did not agree with the U.S. on this issue and on the initiation of the Second Cold War. The second issue was the Armenian bill on the congressional agenda. As long as the bill remained on the agenda, Turkey would not agree to U.S. flights from its bases or visits to its ports by the Sixth Fleet.

The Diversification of Relations

Turkey developed its relations with the Islamic countries during this period and entered into trade relations with more countries. As we have already seen in the tables on Turkey's foreign trade, whereas previously five Western countries accounted for more than 60% of Turkey's trade, in this period the first seven countries accounted for less than 60%. There was a marked shift from the EEC countries to the Middle East in Turkey's trade. Between 1979 and 1984 Turkey's exports to the EEC countries fell from 48.5% to 38.3% and its imports from 36.1% to 27.6%. In the same period Turkey's exports to Islamic countries rose from 18.1% to 40.6% and its imports from 22.2% to 35%.

This situation arose not because of Turkey's autonomous foreign policy but from the pressure of events. The steadily increasing oil prices starting in the mid-1970s and Turkey's foreign exchange shortages forced Ankara to develop its trade with oil-producing countries. The U.S. arms embargo imposed after the 1974 Cyprus operation compelled Turkey to seek alternative sources for its arms and spare parts. After the package of measures adopted on 24 January 1980, the currency was devalued and export incentives were introduced, which helped develop new export markets for additional Turkish export products. This was a consequence of the international isolation brought on by the 12 September coup and the implementation of the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis ideals (see Box 6-3 above). The Iran-Iraq War of 1980–88 brought about new opportunities for Turkish traders, especially up to 1984, before the warring sides began to experience payments difficulties. After 1980 there were few growth opportunities other than the Middle East. Consumers in Arab countries were not very quality conscious and did not question Turkey on its human rights record.

The Internationalization of the Armenian and Kurdish Questions

The ASALA nationalist terror campaign of assassinations began with the killing of two Turkish diplomats in Los Angeles in 1973 and ended in 1983 when a bomb exploded at Orly Airport in Paris. The deaths of two Turks and six non-Turks in this incident brought on a sharp Western reaction, which ended the ASALA (and also JCGA) terror campaign. This was replaced by the Armenian bills in legislative bodies of various countries, which proved more effective than assassinations.

Turkey's reaction to these moves was to reassert its traditional stand of negating the existence of a genocide without attempting to devise a new stand to deal with the issue. The only exception to this was that Özal introduced the new method of using the awarding of lucrative international contracts to counteract the bills. The firms of countries that adopted the Armenian bills were denied contracts in Turkey. But this method lost its effectiveness when the countries that were affected started issuing warnings. Furthermore, the exclusion of certain firms was proving counterproductive on economic and technical grounds. The Armenian bills issue would really begin to sting in the 1990s.

Unlike the ASALA organization, the PKK would not be subdued during this period. On the contrary, its effectiveness increased toward the end of the period throughout the southeastern region of Turkey, until it reached the level of an undeclared civil war or, to use the military jargon, a "low-intensity conflict." The vast funds that were needed to deal with this conflict were another important cause of the budget deficits during this period. These expenditures would reach an annual level of around $10 billion at the beginning of the subsequent period.

During this period several international developments nurtured Kurdish nationalism: the self-immolation of Buddhist priests in Vietnam; the Palestinian Intifada, where children and women hurled stones at Israeli soldiers; the effects of the CSCE, which brought human rights to the fore; the autonomy of the Kurds in Iraq; intense efforts by Turkey to render Turkish Cypriots autonomous; and, finally, Turkey's strong reaction to Bulgarian attempts to change Turkish names. This last event had a profound effect on the Kurds, who were not allowed to register their own Kurdish names on birth certificates.

From these beginnings, the Armenian and Kurdish questions would turn into major issues in the subsequent period.

IV. OVERALL APPRAISAL

1. A number of foreign-policy lessons could be learned in the aftermath of the 12 September coup.

The first lesson was that a regime without the backing of public opinion and, most notably, leftist public opinion in a country like Turkey could easily end up by having to make concessions in its foreign policy. This was seen in connection with the ban on the cultivation of opium poppies after the 12 March 1971 military intervention and also in connection with the Rogers Plan in this period.

The second lesson was that a regime that was at odds with its own population would end up by damaging the credibility and reputation of the state in the international arena. The practice of humiliating travelers bearing Turkish passports began after 12 September 1980. This treatment was subsequently extended to those bearing special and diplomatic passports when it became apparent that mafia members employed by the state for covert operations also held such passports.

The third lesson concerned the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis espoused by the 12 September regime. This resulted in Turkey's alienation from the European Communities. It also prepared the ground for the pompous rhetoric of "the Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China," which was to cause serious complications in the subsequent period.

Important lessons could also be learned from the implementation of foreign policy during the Özal period.

It became obvious that newfangled practices such as bypassing the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or operating on the notion that an increased trade relationship by itself would resolve foreign policy questions could be dangerous. An active foreign policy did not necessarily mean correct foreign policy.

It also became apparent that diverging from Turkey's traditional foreign policy was not a realistic option. In the First Gulf War, Turkey abandoned its policy of supporting the status quo as well as the principle of preserving a balance between opposing sides. This brought Turkey to the brink of war and caused it to incur great economic losses after the war. Countries like Jordan that did not side so openly with the U.S. suffered less than Turkey.

Another lesson was that excessive reliance on the U.S. administration could bring about disappointments, because Congress also wielded power in foreign policy. Furthermore, the more a country yielded to the U.S., the harder it became to obtain concessions and favors from it, other than loans.

In an environment where torture was a common occurrence, it was not possible to enjoy a good international standing merely by signing conventions designed to protect human rights. Even as Özal agreed to the principle of Turkish citizens applying to the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) to redress grievances in order to strengthen Turkey's hand in connection with Ankara's application for accession to the EU, Turkey's Court of Cassation ruled that to reach a verdict of torture it was necessary to obtain a medical report certifying that a victim had been incapacitated for at least ten days. Adhering to such conventions, however, did gradually bring Turkey to conform with international norms in the subsequent period.

In summary, this period's foreign policy was similar to the Menderes foreign policy from 1950 to 1960. It was active but also highly risky and very much dependent on the U.S.

Baskin Oran

Sources (Appraisal of the Period)

Cumhuriyetin 75. Yılı. İstanbul: Yapı Kredi Kültür Sanat Yayıncılık, 1998.

Gerger, Haluk. Türk Dış Politikasının Ekonomi Politiği, Soğuk Savaştan Yeni Dünya Düzenine. İstanbul: Belge Yayınları, 1998.

Gürsel, Seyfettin. "1980'li Yıllar ve Sonrası." In Cumhuriyetin 75. Yılı, pp. 804–7. İstanbul: Yapı Kredi Kültür Sanat Yayıncılık, 1998

-----. "Dış Borçlar" and "IMF." In Cumhuriyet Dönemi Türkiye Ansiklopedisi, vol. 2, pp. 470–85 and 486–506.

Kepenek, Yakup. "Türkiye'nin 1980 Sonrası Sanayileşme Süreci." In 75 Yılda Çarklardan Çiplere, pp. 229–40. İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.

Kuruç, Bilsay. "Cumhuriyet Döneminde İktisat Politikaları Üzerine Gözlemler." In Bilanço 1923–1998, pp. 21–32. İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.

Oran, Baskın, "Kemalizm, İslamcılık, Küreselleşme (Türkiye'de

- 'Yüce Sadakat Odağı' Kavramı Üzerine Düşünceler)." SBF Dergisi 54, no. 2 (Apr.–June 1999): 133–62.
- . Kenan Evren'in Yazılmamış Anıları. Vol. 1. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1989.
- . Türk-Yunan İlişkilerinde Batı Trakya Sorunu. Updated 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1991.
- Sönmez, Mustafa. "75 Yılın Sanayileşme Politikaları." În 75 Yılda Çarklardan Chip'lere, pp. 1–19. İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.
- Yetkin, Çetin. Türkiye'de Askerî Darbeler ve Amerika, 27 Mayıs, 12 Mart ve 12 Eylülde Amerika'nın Yeri. Ankara: Ümit Yayıncılık, 1995.

Relations with the USA and NATO

Toward the end of the 1970s Turkey's internal turmoil and economic difficulties were compounded by a number of problems in relations with the U.S. In the 1980s, and especially after the 12 September coup, relations improved markedly and Turkey became a close ally of the U.S. again.

These developments had a political as well as an economic basis. Politically, Turkey's strategic value increased as a result of developments in the Middle East in the aftermath of the Islamic revolution in Iran in 1979 and the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan later that year. In the 1980s Turkey not only was a barrier to the spread of radical Islam in the Middle East but also had an important role in the intensifying struggle between the USSR and the U.S.

Economically, Turkey entered the process of closer integration with the world of capitalism after it began implementing the 24 January 1980 package of economic reforms. In this context, Ankara's relations with the U.S. acquired greater importance.

BASIC FACTORS AFFECTING RELATIONS U.S. Domestic and Foreign Policy in the 1980s

The Carter administration that came to power in 1976 pursued a foreign policy that laid particular stress on respect for human rights. The feeling in Washington was that the threat of the USSR and of communism had been exaggerated, and the prevailing tendency tilted toward more disarmament. This was a reaction to the preceding foreign policy conducted by the Nixon-Kissinger team, based exclusively on Realpolitik. There was a certain continuity in U.S. policy, however, because Carter's stress on human rights was designed to weaken the Eastern Bloc. During Carter's term, a division was set up at the State Department to deal with human rights, and observance of human rights became a criterion when providing aid. This practice would be maintained in subsequent years and would constitute one of the problems between the U.S. and Turkey.

U.S. foreign policy had to face numerous challenges during Carter's presidency. The use of human rights to undermine the USSR in an area where it was most vulnerable created problems for the U.S. itself. When Washington withheld its support from Nicaragua's dictator Anastasio Somoza in 1978, the left-leaning Sandinista guerrillas took power in 1979. In February 1979 there was an Islamic revolution led by Ayatollah Khomeini in Iran, a country that had been one of the principal allies of the U.S. in the Middle East. The USSR was able to extend its influence in the Middle East and occupied Afghanistan in December 1979.

After the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, the U.$. Congress refused to ratify the SALT II agreement, which was designed to secure the limitation of nuclear arms. All of this demonstrated that the Carter administration's foreign policy was passive and ineffective, and it received much criticism for this.

The U.S. economy went through a recession in the second half of the 1970s. By 1980 the economy had ceased to grow. At the same time, the annual rate of inflation reached 10% and unemployment stood at 7.5%. The effects of the Vietnam War, the collapse of the Bretton Woods system, the oil shock, and Japanese competition, plus the usual dip in the U.S. business cycle, had all conspired to bring about this recession.

At this time, the combination of adverse political and economic developments raised concerns that the U.S. had entered a period of decline and would lose its dominance in world affairs. While the U.S. GNP accounted for 40% of global production in 1950, this share had fallen to 20% in 1980.

By 1980 the combined effect of domestic economic problems, the loss of ground to the USSR, allies drifting away, and diminished influence in the world created

Box 6-5. Star Wars (The Strategic Defense Initiative)

U.S. president Ronald Reagan advocated a bolder policy in the ideological and technological struggle with the USSR, in this context, he initiated the National Space Program in July 1982 and launched the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI), which came to be known popularly as "Star Wars," in March 1983. The use of space for military purposes actually had started much earlier, and both the U.S. and the USSR had orbited numerous military satellites. Reagan's initiative, however, would greatly accelerate the arms race in its space dimension. The intention of the U.S. was to deploy a system in space that would destroy incoming Soviet ballistic missiles and thereby enhance America's deterrent capability. But this system would eliminate the balance of terror, which rested on the ability of both parties to achieve each other's destruction. This was one reason why the initiative met with opposition. Furthermore, it was claimed that the initiative would violate the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) agreement concluded in 1972

Even if the initiative was seen as a phase of the ongoing arms race, SDI was also designed to hasten the economic collapse of the USSR by forcing it to undertake a similar scheme at a time when it was already facing serious economic challenges. SDI was also important because the huge project would generate many innovations with military and civillan applications. That is why SDI, which was abandoned when the Cold War came to an end, was resurrected by president george W. Bush under the guise of the National Missile Defense System (Missile Shield).

(I. Uzgel)

a reaction that led to Reagan's electoral victory. The new president's priority was to restore the international standing of the U.S.

Reagan represented the "New Right." He espoused the economic policies of Milton Friedman and his fellow academics from the University of Chicago, whose supply-side economics stood for cutting public spending, tight monetary policies, and lower taxes. The champion of these policies in Europe was British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, while Turgut Özal followed the same course in Turkey.

The New Right's political agenda included restoring U.S. power, the destruction of the USSR, which Reagan described as the "Evil Empire," a firm stand against anti-American regimes, and increased defense spending.

This increase in defense spending had three main objectives. The first (political) objective was to allow the U.S. to stiffen its stand vis-à-vis the USSR and increase America's international influence. The second objective was to strengthen the U.S. economy with new military projects through "Military Keynesianism." The third objective was to force the USSR to engage in an arms race that would exhaust it economically. This new arms race consisted of technologically advanced and extremely costly projects like the Strategic Defense Initiative (Box 6-5).

These policies resulted in hefty increases in defense spending from 1981 to 1989. The neutron bomb, which would kill people but spare buildings, was launched in August 1981. Other projects dating from this period were the Stealth and B-1 bombers, which were invisible to radar, as well as increases in the CIA's budget.

The U.S. administration also pursued an active policy toward the countries of the Third World, with a view to restoring its dwindling influence there. Known as the Reagan Doctrine, this policy was designed to eliminate Soviet influence in these countries. This was done by helping groups that were in opposition to leftist or pro-USSR administrations. In this context, the U.S. supported the Mujahidin in Afghanistan, the Contra guerrillas in Nicaragua, the UNITA (União Nacional para a Independência Total de Angola) in Angola, and the opposition in Ethiopia. The U.S. sent the marines to Lebanon in 1982, intervened in Grenada in 1983, and conducted an aerial strike against Muammar Khaddafi in 1986. After arresting Panamanian president Manuel Noriega in his own country, Washington tried and convicted him in the U.S. for drug dealing. The U.S. supported repressive regimes like the white minority South African government and the Ferdinand Marcos government in the Philippines so long as they pursued a pro-U.S. course.

During this period, also known as the Second Cold War, Turkey's importance increased, due to its involvement in some of the developments cited above.

B. The U.S., Islam, and the Policy of the Green Belt

Historically, the U.S. relationship with Islam and Islamic movements underwent numerous ups and downs. Depending on the circumstances, Islam was seen as an ally or perceived as a threat. As a superpower, the U.S. viewed Islam as a tool of its foreign policy to sustain its international influence, maintain friendly regimes in power, and undermine rival countries.

The U.S. interest in Islam and its propensity to use it as a tool of foreign policy go back to the days following World War II. The U.S. had become a world power after the war, and Washington realized that Islam could be of use in its growing rivalry with the USSR. The U.S. began to take an interest in Islam in the Middle East, starting in the 1960s, given the political and social influence of this religion in the region. During this period the dominant current in the Middle East was anti-Western nationalism, also known as Pan-Arabism, under the leadership of Egypt. To undermine this trend, the U.S. supported Islamic movements.

Islam's place in U.S. foreign policy became even more important toward the end of the 1970s within the context of relations with the USSR and the continuing rivalry with socialism. Zbigniew Brzezinski, the well-known strategist and Carter's national security advisor, held the view that Islam could serve as a shield against communism. This view of moderate Islam was quite prevalent in the U.S. during this period. The U.S. looked upon radical Islam as a threat to its interests, however, and kept its distance from groups like Hezbollah, Amal, and Hamas. The only exceptions were the Afghan Mujahidin groups who were engaged in fighting the USSR.

The U.S. strategy was to try to infiltrate the Turkic republics located in the southern regions of the USSR by using Islam while preventing radical Islam, which was violently anti-American, from implanting itself in this region in the Iranian manner. At the same time, Islam was seen as a counterweight to leftist movements in countries like Turkey. To put it in a nutshell, the "red" danger would be countered with a "green" antidote. Furthermore, rising Islam would be used as a buffer against Soviet encroachment into the Gulf region while providing legitimacy to the conservative regimes of Saudi Arabia and the other oil-rich countries, thus ensuring their stability.

In summary, the U.S. policy was to support moderate and controllable Islam and use it against the USSR and communism and seek to temper radical Islam and turn it moderate, or—where this proved impossible—to suppress or isolate it.

In the 1980s this U.S. policy would affect Turkey in two ways. In the field of foreign policy, Turkey would develop its relations with Arab countries that could be considered moderate. In domestic politics, the effects would be more far reaching. Economically, Turkey would undergo a structural transformation that would help it to become integrated with the global capitalist system. Politically, the repressive 12 September regime would be set up to prevent a social reaction to the ongoing structural transformation. The 12 September regime would resort to the ideology of the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis, as described earlier (see Box 6-3 above).

II. THE 12 SEPTEMBER PERIOD (1980–1982) A. The 12 September Coup and the U.S.

In the third coup since 1960, there was more talk about the U.S. connection than in the two previous ones. This can be explained by developments in Turkish-U.S.

relations before and after 12 September 1980 and international political and economic developments.

There is a widely held belief among both political observers and the Turkish public that the U.S. was involved in the 12 September coup. This should not be understood to mean a coup directly planned and carried out by the U.S. The U.S. role concerned preparing the conditions that led to the coup and getting in touch with the coup-makers in advance and promising them political and economic support in return for favors that civilian governments were not in a position to grant. The suspicion of U.S. involvement in the coup is based on the following evidence.

The U.S. record of involvement in coups in Iran in 1953, in Greece in 1967, and in Chile in 1973 naturally led people to look to Washington after the 12 September coup in Turkey.

Suspicions were also strengthened by international developments at this time. The loss of Iran in 1979 and the occupation of Afghanistan, which brought the USSR closer to the Persian Gulf, plus Moscow's growing military links with Syria, increased Washington's need for a stable and reliable Turkey.

In addition, developments related directly to Turkey pointed to a U.S. involvement. In 1979 and 1980 Turkey turned down a number of U.S. requests. Ankara refused to allow Turkish bases to be used for U-2 flights over the USSR and to station the U.S. rapid deployment force in Turkey. Ankara also vetoed the Greek request to return to NATO's military structure. Ankara was quick to recognize the new revolutionary regime in Iran. After 12 September Ankara's position on all of these issues shifted noticeably.

Before the military intervention of 1971, the commander of the air force, Muhsin Batur, had gone to the U.S. Likewise, prior to 12 September, the commander of the air force, Tahsin Şahinkaya, visited the U.S. In fact, he returned to Turkey just one day before the coup.

Washington's reaction to the coup also helped feed the suspicion of U.S. involvement. Carter received the news of the Turkish coup when he was at an opera performance. Paul Henze of the CIA broke the news to the president with the words "Our boys have done it" (Hürriyet, 16 March 2003) to put Carter at ease.

There were also those who supported their view that Washington was aware of what was going on in Ankara by noting that U.S. news agencies gave the news of the coup on the evening of 11 September. This can be explained by the fact that it was still 8:00 PM on 11 September in Washington and New York when the coup was announced in Ankara at 4:00 AM on 12 September 1980. Notwithstanding this explanation, it is understood that the U.S. authorities knew about the coup at least two hours before the event. The Turkish general staff informed the head of the U.S. military mission in Turkey two hours before the coup was announced that the lives and properties of U.S. citizens in Turkey would be protected and that Turkey would remain within the Western alliance.

The official U.S. reaction to the event came in a statement issued by the State Department on the day of the coup. The statement expressed concern at the overthrowing of a democratically elected government but added that the new administration that had seized power was intent on restoring the democratic system that had broken down. Turkey had been struggling with political terrorism and economic difficulties for a number of years, and the U.S. and the other NATO allies would continue to aid Turkey to secure economic stability. The statement concluded that the expectation was that democracy would be restored and economic and political stability ensured as early as possible.

In the days following 12 September the U.S., on the advice of its Ankara embassy, kept stressing the need to restore democracy at an early date. It was also decided that the Sixth Fleet would stay away from Turkish ports for a while in order not to give the impression that the U.S. might be involved in the coup in any way.

To sum up, the suspicion of a U.S. involvement was never proven by fact. But there was no doubt that the coup provided a huge strategic advantage to the U.S., and Turkish-U.S. relations were excellent after the coup.

B. Developments during the Period of Military Administration

American policy-makers were pleased that Turkey had a military administration well disposed toward the U.S. at a time when an Islamist regime had taken over in Iran and the USSR was in possession of Afghanistan. From then on, relations between Turkey and the U.S. would be very close. Turkey's importance for the U.S. had grown at a time when the domestic policies of the military regime were driving a wedge between Ankara and Western Europe.

Following the coup, the four armed forces commanders formed the National Security Council (NSC) under the presidency of the chief of the General Staff, Kenan Evren. In a statement to the press on the day of the coup, Evren followed the example of the 27 May 1960 coupmakers and announced that Turkey remained attached to all its alliances and agreements, including NATO.

The NSC decided to appoint a government headed by the former commander of the navy, Bülend Ulusu. The new government was formed on 21 September, with Turgut Özal as deputy prime minister in charge of the economy. Gen. Haydar Saltık, an officer in the General Staff in charge of relations with NATO and therefore close to both NATO and U.S. officials, became secretary-general of the NSC.

The most significant development in Turkish-U.S. relations after the coup was the ratification of the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement on 18 November 1980 by the Ulusu government. Turkey previously had withheld ratification of the agreement in order to use it as a bargaining chip. With the ratification, the legal framework was established between the two countries, covering the use of Turkish bases by the U.S., defense cooperation, and economic and military aid until 1985.

The military regime was able to find external financing, which allowed Turkey to service its debts and increase its imports. This made it possible to overcome the acute shortage of consumer goods. As the flow of imported raw materials and intermediate goods increased, industrial production picked up and empty shelves in stores began to fill, boosting popular support for the regime.

The NSC had selected retired admiral Ulusu as prime minister because he was perceived as a moderate. But the real holders of all executive and legislative power and the makers of foreign and domestic policies were Evren and the four force commanders. This became obvious with Greece's return to the military structure of NATO.

1. The Rogers Plan and Greece's Return to the Military Structure of NATO

When Turkey launched its second Cyprus operation on 14 August 1974, Greece left the military structure of NATO to protest the organization's unwillingness to stop Turkey, even though it remained a member of the alliance. The Greek withdrawal added a new dimension to the Turkish-Greek disputes over the Aegean and also affected Turkey's relations with the U.S. and NATO.

It will be recalled that the question dates back to 1957, when the NATO military committee adopted document MC 38/4, which determined the command and control regions of the Aegean that would be allocated to Turkey and Greece (Soysal, p. 467). When the Southeastern Europe Land Forces Command (Comlandsoutheast) and the Sixth Tactical Air Force Command (CONSIXATAF) were established in İzmir, the control of the sea and airspace in the Aegean was allocated to Greece all the way up to Turkey's territorial waters. This could be done because there was no serious dispute between the two countries at the time. When Greece left the military structure of NATO, Turkey assumed responsibility for the control of the Aegean. Furthermore, Turkey issued Notam (Notification to Airmen) No. 714 in July 1974, which declared that all flights within fifty miles of its Aegean coastline had to be cleared in advance.

Having lost its command and control responsibilities in the Aegean, Greece sought to return to the military structure of NATO in 1976. It was also important that Prime Minister Karamanlis had consolidated his position and democracy in the country in the meantime. Turkey replied that it would agree to this on condition that command and control responsibilities in the Aegean be reallocated on a new basis.

The question remained dormant for a few years until the USSR started becoming more active in the Mediterranean. The developments in Iran and Afghanistan further increased the security concerns of Western nations over Greece's absence from NATO's military structure.

After 1978 new initiatives emerged in connection with this issue. NATO's supreme commander in Europe, Alexander Haig, and his successor, Bernard Rogers, appealed in vain to both Ecevit and Demirel. Turkey maintained that circumstances had changed since Greece left the military structure and that it could not return under the same conditions. Command and control areas had to be redesignated in accordance with Turkey's requirements.

In the run-up to the Greek election scheduled to take place in late 1980, Andreas Papandreou conducted a campaign with anti-U.S. and anti-NATO themes. He declared that, when the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) came to power, Greece might withdraw from NATO altogether (see "Relations with Greece" in Section 5). This made it imperative for NATO to resolve the question of Greece's return to NATO's military structure before the Greek election.

After the 12 September coup, U.S. and NATO officials redoubled their efforts to resolve the question. Some weeks after the coup, U.S. ambassador in Ankara James Spain met with Evren on 6 October and delivered a message from President Carter in which the president drew attention to NATO's state of disarray in its southeastern region and declared that it would be a tragedy for all concerned to prolong this state of affairs.

Finally, Rogers arrived in Ankara on 17 October and told Evren that Greece might be lost as an ally if the socialists emerged victorious in the approaching Greek election. When Evren voiced his concern about Greece's likely response to a goodwill gesture from Turkey, General Rogers replied that he was giving his "word as a soldier" (Güldemir 1985, p. 84). Eventually Rogers persuaded Evren and returned to Brussels. Concerned that Turkey might reconsider its decision, NATO officials hastily convened NATO's Defense Planning Committee on 20 October 1980 and approved Greece's return to the military structure.

The title of the Rogers Plan was "Interim Arrangement concerning NATO Command and Control in the Aegean." The plan consisted of four paragraphs and was written in a language that was not easy to understand. Its most important paragraph was the first, which read as follows: "The arrangement concerns the return of Greece to NATO's military structure and does not concern other aspects of Turkish-Greek relations. This is an interim military-technical arrangement designed to allow the Greek armed forces to rejoin the Allied Command Structure."

Paragraph 3 provided that the Sixth Allied Tactical Air Force Command and the Seventh Tactical Air Force Command to be established in Greece would make interim arrangements that would enable their subordinate units to exchange information derived from NATO's combined air defense radar systems. The interim arrangements would be formulated in consultation with the Southern Europe Allied Air Force located in Naples.

Paragraph 4 dealt with naval forces and contained the following provision. Until questions of command and control at sea were resolved in accordance with NATO rules and procedures, the commander of Allied Forces in Southern Europe and the commander of Allied Naval Forces in Southern Europe would determine whether the control of operations of forces allocated to them would be delegated to the concerned NATO subcommand's naval commander (Soysal, pp. 467–68).

Thus the text of the agreement consisted of complicated provisions that did not have much practical significance, because the important thing was that Greece was able to rejoin the military structure through a verbal agreement of the two commanding officers.

Turkey had abandoned its basic stand, which had been that there must be a reallocation of the command and control regions of the Aegean before Greece would be allowed to rejoin the military structure of NATO.

From a technical angle, the classified plan's most important feature was its "interim" nature. The final agreement was to be concluded later. Once Greece had rejoined the military structure, however, it was impossible to go back on the agreement or to persuade Greece to agree to a new and final agreement on the Aegean.

Another feature of the agreement from the angle of international law was that it did not have validity because it had been concluded between NATO and Turkey in the absence of the representative of the other interested party. When Turkey made a commitment to lift its veto, it relied only on the word of General Rogers "as a soldier." As a matter of fact, after the Papandreou government came to power in early 1981, it announced on 8 December 1981 that it did not recognize the agreement. It refused to set up the headquarters of the land forces and the Seventh Air Force. The forces that would be allocated to NATO under the arrangement were kept within Greece's national defense system. General Rogers, who had sponsored the agreement, was unable to find anyone in the Greek government who would talk to him on this subject.

Two years later, when Rogers met Evren, the American general expressed his "regrets" over the outcome of the issue. This was the only satisfaction that Turkish diplomacy was able to obtain in this episode.

From the point of view of diplomatic practice, the agreement was also unusual. After 12 September both Evren and General Rogers excluded civilians from the negotiating process. On the Turkish side, only Evren and his entourage were involved in the negotiations: the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was totally out of the picture. When the question came up for discussion at the NATO Defense Planning Committee, the Turkish permanent representative, ambassador Osman Olcay, was not aware that Turkey had agreed to lift its veto and had to consult Ankara to ascertain the true situation. The U.S. ambassador in Ankara was also excluded from the negotiations. It was clear that the U.S. wanted to settle the issue within the military and easily achieved its aim. It was obvious that military administrations were more amenable to foreign pressure than elected governments, which felt the need to heed public opinion when making concessions in the field of foreign affairs. The U.S. had obtained what it was seeking by intensifying its pressure at a time when the military administration was at its weakest, following its international isolation as a result of the coup.

When General Rogers came to Turkey five years after the adoption of the Rogers Plan, he told reporters in an interview that he had not deceived Turkey on the subject. He claimed that Turkey would have become fodder for the Soviets if it had not consented to the plan.

In his memoirs (Evren, vol. 2, p. 98) General Evren would claim that Turkey gained by agreeing to Rogers's proposals based on the assurances of his "word as a soldier." With the agreement, according to Evren, Greece was deprived of the command and control areas of the Aegean that it had held prior to 1974 and Turkey was freed of the pressures that it was subjected to within NATO, thus improving its standing within the alliance.

Although it is true that Greece was deprived of command and control responsibilities, these responsibilities were not reallocated in accordance with Turkey's demands but were merely turned over to NATO.

Evren was probably warned that Greece would leave NATO to obtain his assent. It is significant, however, that the scare tactic used against Evren had not worked on Demirel, although he was also known to be a good friend of the U.S.

Developments in the Middle East and Their Effects on Turkish-U.S. Relations

Developments in the Middle East at the end of 1979 and in early 1980 made it necessary for the U.S. to pursue a more active policy in the region to make up for its losses. The military leaders who took power in Turkey on 12 September 1980 were reinforcing their ties with the U.S., while pursuing a policy of export-led growth that turned their attention to the Middle East. U.S. official reports were speaking of Turkey as a country redefining its Middle Eastern identity, while the State Department was considering the transfer of responsibility for Turkey from the European to the Middle Eastern division, which was not realized.

Aside from its reluctance to allow the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force to use Turkish facilities, Turkey was convinced that its interests in the Middle East were convergent with those of the U.S. and considered it necessary to cooperate with Washington. Like the U.S., Turkey was concerned about the rising influence of the USSR in the Middle East, the establishment of pro-Iranian regimes, and the possibility that Iran might emerge victorious from the conflict. Like the U.S. and other Western countries, Turkey was worried about a possible interruption in the flow of oil from the Middle East.

A number of developments in the Middle East were causing apprehension in Washington.

- 1. The threatening posture of the radical Iranian regime toward the Gulf countries following the Islamic revolution posed a danger both to the regimes of these countries and to the smooth flow of oil.
- 2. At a time when the Iranian crisis was at its height, Babrak Karmal seized power in Kabul in December 1979. Upon his invitation, the USSR invaded Afghanistan with a force of 85,000 soldiers. This placed the USSR within 500 kilometers of the Gulf. U.S. president Jimmy Carter described this development as "the greatest threat to peace since the Second World War" ("Remarks at White House Briefing for Members of Congress, January 8, 1980," Weekly Compilation of Presidential Documents, vol. 16 [14 January 1980], p. 40).

- 3. At this time, the USSR strengthened its position in the region by developing its relations with Southern Yemen, Ethiopia, and Syria. Moscow even proposed a European Conference that excluded the U.S., designed to ensure the security of access routes to the Persian Gulf.
- 4. There was a fear that the USSR, having lost much of its international standing because of its intervention in Afghanistan, might take advantage of the turmoil in Iran to intervene in that country too, with the backing of the Communist Tudeh Party.
- 5. Egypt, one of the key players in Washington's Middle East policy at the time, had signed the Camp David accords and was ostracized by the Arab countries.

All of these developments and events made an imprint on the regional policies of the U.S. and helped change their course. Formerly the U.S. had based its policies on the Nixon Doctrine (see Box 4-3 in Section 4), which relied on the twin pillars of Iran and Saudi Arabia in the Gulf region. Iran, in particular, was receiving large quantities of arms from the U.S. and had acquired a special place in regional security commensurate with its vast potential. The loss of Iran made it necessary to reconfigure the Middle East policy of the U.S.

In the face of these developments, the Carter administration adopted certain measures, which were continued by the Reagan administration. The Seventh Fleet in the Indian Ocean and the Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean were strengthened, the Middle Eastern Command known as Mideastfor (Middle East Force) was reinforced, and a new policy was devised for the Middle East, which became known as the Carter Doctrine. Washington also secured the establishment of the Gulf Cooperation Council in May 1981.

In this framework, the U.S. abandoned the policy of relying solely on the countries of the region and adopted the policy of relying on and strengthening its own ability and capacity for action in the region. After Carter, Reagan pushed this policy further: claiming that the Middle East was a theater for interbloc rivalry, he devised the concept of "strategic consensus," under which cooperation among Turkey, Pakistan, and the countries of the Horn of Africa would be developed.

In the Middle East, the U.S. also sought to extend NATO's area of responsibility (see Box 4-9 in Section 4), formulated the Reagan plan through which the Israeli-Arab dispute would be settled, and searched for ways of further developing relations between Turkey and Israel.

Turkey occupied a central place in many of these policies. When the U.S. sought to contain the influence of the USSR with the Northern Tier (see Box 4-8 in Section 4), NATO's commander-in-chief, Alexander Haig, strove to establish strategic cooperation between Turkey and Pakistan in the early part of the 1980s. The U.S. also established closer ties with China, which disapproved of the USSR's invasion of Afghanistan. Simultaneously, relations between Turkey and China grew stronger, with an increase in high-level visits between the two countries. Turkey also had a role in seeking to alleviate Egypt's isolation when it made an effort to secure that country's return to the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) at its meeting held in January 1981. The 12 September administration was attending the OIC for the first time at the level of prime minister. Turkey also stepped up its economic, political, and military cooperation with the Gulf countries.

The American objective of acquiring the ability to react promptly to regional developments led to the creation of a Rapid Deployment Force (RDF) for the region. This figured prominently in relations between the two countries in the early 1980s.

The Issue of the Rapid Deployment Force

This issue was to cause Turkey much trouble in its relations with the U.S. (Box 6-6). The U.S. was attaching great importance to the Rapid Deployment Force and in 1980 had concluded agreements for facilities in Oman, Kenya, and Somalia. The latter two countries were located relatively far from the Gulf, however, and their infrastructure was inadequate. The U.S. administration considered Turkey to be more suitable because of its NATO membership, developed infrastructure, and more favorable geographical location. The U.S. approached Turkey for the first time before 12 September when the Demirel government was in power, and his government took a negative position on providing facilities to the RDF in Turkey.

After 12 September it became politically harder for Turkey to say no to such proposals, and the U.S. stepped up its pressure on Ankara. But even the military government found it difficult to agree to the use of Turkish bases by the RDF.

Turkey's views on the matter were expressed by the minister of defense, Haluk Bayülken, in June 1981 during a visit to Washington and by the minister of foreign affairs, Ilter Türkmen, in September 1981 when he declared that "the defense of the Gulf is the responsibility of the countries of the Gulf" (Güldemir 1987, p. 134). It should be recalled that Evren had the last word in matters of foreign policy, and U.S. officials usually preferred to deal with

Box 6-6. The Rapid Deployment Force

In the 1970s, as a result of the Arab-Israell War, the subsequent oil embargo, and Soviet-American tensions, the U.S. was increasingly forced to focus its attention on the Middle East and the Persian Gulf region. To protect its vital interests, mainly the uninterrupted flow of Middle Eastern oil to the West, the U.S. started contemplating military intervention in the region through a rapidly deployable mobile force. In August 1977 President Carter signed a presidential directive for the establishment of such a force. For reasons of U.S. domestic politics, the work on this plan was slow until 1979, when, first, Iran was taken over by anti-Western fundamentalists and, second, the Soviet Union invaded Afghanistan. This led to the declaration of the Carter Doctrine in January 1980, warning that an attempt by a foreign power to control the Persian Gulf region would be considered an attack against American vital interests and be met by military force.

The Joint Rapid Deployment Force was established on 1 March 1980. It consisted of 200,000 men and was based at MacDill Air Force Base in Florida.

The Reagan administration maintained this policy, strengthened the force further, and changed its name to U.S. Central Command (Centcom) on 1 January 1983. By 1985 the force consisted of 300,000 troops.

At this time, the U.S. was not seeking new bases in a region contiguous to the Middle East and the Caucasus. What it wanted was facilities to store equipment and provide logistic support. The U.S. had given up on its search for new bases because they were proving to be a political liability and very expensive. The force would be stationed on U.S. soil in Florida and in the event of intervention would be deployed to the region, where the required water, animunition, fuel, and supplies would be pre-positioned to enable the force to go into action without delay. Although this approach appeared practical, there were difficulties in its implementation.

At one stage, the possible use of the force in the event of internal disturbance had also been discussed, leading to some concern among the countries of the region.

When the RDF was first established, it was outside NATO's defense plans. But the Reagan administration moved the head quarters of the force from Florida and attached it in January 1981, to the Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (SACEUR). With this step, the U.S. was making an important move toward placing a future U.S. out of area intervention within the framework of NATO, even if it would not be supported by other NATO allies.

The countries of the Gulf region were ambivalent in their approach to these developments. They wanted U.S. protection against possible threats but worried about the domestic effects of the U.S. protective umbrella and remained cool to the project in their public utterances.

(I. UZGEL)

him because of his greater "flexibility." But in this instance even Evren was unable to give the U.S. full satisfaction. He declared that, if NATO members jointly decided to intervene in the Middle East, Turkey would go along with the decision; otherwise it would not assume any role in an out-of-area operation. In contacts with U.S. officials, the Turkish side pointed out that any Turkish involvement with a unilateral out-of-area U.S. military action would create problems for Turkey both domestically and internationally and would end up by doing harm to the alliance itself.

In formal and informal contacts, U.S. officials made a major effort to persuade Turkey to be more pliant on this issue. In October 1982 the head of the CIA visited Turkey for the first time. The renowned U.S. strategist Albert Wohlstetter and Paul Henze, a member of the National Security Council, also came to Turkey and sought to create awareness among the Turkish public through lectures and speeches about the Soviet threat and the role of Turkey in the region. Henze even claimed that the intensifying ASALA terror was linked to the USSR's effort to detach eastern Anatolia from Turkey.

This was a period when the strategic dimension of Turkey's relations with the U.S. carried great weight. Despite this, the 12 September regime was highly reluctant to commit itself on the RDF for a number of reasons.

- 1. Turkey was just emerging from a period when the Left had been very influential, and the regime worried about possible adverse domestic reaction.
- 2. Turkey was not all that well informed about the political objectives of the U.S. in the region and the sort of mission that the RDF might be involved in. For instance, an involvement of the RDF in a future Arab-Israeli conflict operating from Turkish bases would completely undermine Turkey's standing in the region.
- 3. Turkey was in the process of intensifying its economic links with the Middle East and did not want to jeopardize its growing commercial and economic ties with countries such as Iran, Iraq, and Libya.
- 4. The RDF was regarded with utmost suspicion in the region, and even the Gulf States were reluctant to get involved with the project in a time of peace.

Despite its own misgivings and its opposition to the project in official pronouncements, Turkey eventually agreed to provide storage facilities and installations for the RDF under certain conditions and concluded an agreement to this effect.

4. The 1982 Memorandum of Understanding Two factors primarily made this agreement possible. One was the compromise reached over Turkey's possible contribution to RDF, as explained above; and the other was the need to upgrade the defense infrastructure of Turkey.

In the early 1980s U.S. officials and strategists like Richard Perle and Albert Wohlstetter were claiming that there was a defense gap in eastern Turkey and were urging Ankara to rectify this situation. The balance of conventional forces in the Caucasus was tilted in favor of the USSR, with nineteen Soviet divisions confronting eight Turkish divisions. Furthermore, NATO officials were suffering from the "Central Front Syndrome," according to this view. This led them to accord high priority to the defense of central Europe, which they claimed was more important for NATO defense, while neglecting eastern Anatolia.

Negotiations were undertaken with U.S. officials in order to plug the defense gap in eastern Anatolia while also providing facilities to the RDF for emergency interventions. In this framework, U.S. secretary of defense Caspar Weinberger visited Ankara in December 1981. On that occasion, a high-level Defense Council was set up, which would look into Turkey's defense requirements and the state of the bases on its soil. Gen. Necdet Öztorun and Richard Perle signed a Memorandum of Understanding in Brussels on 29 November 1982. According to the press release, the agreement provided for the modernization of ten air bases in Turkey and the construction of two additional air bases in Muş and Batman equipped with new technology. Because it was a military agreement, its contents were never made public. The newspaper Milliyet revealed its main provisions, however, in its issue of 26 April 1983.

Article 1 stated that the obligations under the agreement would be limited to the obligations undertaken within NATO. Article 2/3 declared that, should the need arise to intervene in a Middle Eastern country lying outside the area of responsibility of NATO, support for the operation could not be provided from Turkish airspace. This reflected Turkey's reluctance to allow the use of Turkish bases for a possible out of area intervention in the Middle East. Article 3/2 provided that U.S. equipment, arms, ammunition, and fuel stored in Turkey could only be removed with Ankara's consent. Article 4/3-2 made it clear that prepositioning would take place but, again, only with Turkey's consent. Article 6 provided that air operations from Turkish bases had to be in support or in implementation of NATO-approved plans. This meant that operations could be mounted only with Turkey's and NATO's approval. Article 3/1 declared that base commanders would be Turkish officers, while article 5/3 stipulated that expenses would be covered by the U.S. Finally, article 9/1 stated that the agreement would be valid for ten years, after which it would be automatically extended for one year, unless notice of expiration was given ninety days in advance.

In official statements and in the press, emphasis was placed on the fact that the bases were to be used only for NATO missions. This would require the approval of other NATO members, so the use of the bases for out-of-area missions would be difficult. Inclusion of restrictive provisions in the agreement reflected Turkey's uneasiness concerning the contribution it was making to the RDF, although official pronouncements declared that it had nothing to do with the RDF. But the agreement had been signed by the U.S. assistant secretary of defense and the U.S. would meet expenses amounting to roughly $200 million, which indicated that the U.S. rather than NATO would utilize the bases.

Turkey had succeeded in incorporating in the agreement its reservations with respect to the use of the bases to intervene in the Middle East. The bases could not be used without Turkey's consent, and Ankara would be able to make its own judgment in each specific case. The air bases, however, would be capable of handling long-range bombers and cargo aircraft. This would make it easier for the U.S. to reach the Persian Gulf and give it an advantage over the USSR. With the new bases, the Caucasus would come within the range of the U.S. air force. Located less than five hundred miles from the Gulf, the new bases would be the closest military bases from which the U.S. could operate. The bases would later come in very handy during the 1991 Gulf war, when U.S. aircraft operating out of the İncirlik air base refueled at Batman, Muş, or Diyarbakır before going on combat missions over Iraq.

The U.S. scored a number of successes in the region during this period. After the military coup, political stability was restored in Turkey, Greece returned to NATO's military structure in October 1980, the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement was approved in November 1980, the RDF was set up, the bases in Turkey were upgraded, cooperation with Pakistan was strengthened in order to reinforce the Northern Tier, and the Islamic factor was used to weaken the USSR.

III. THE OZAL PERIOD (1983-1991)

The first legislative election in Turkey after the coup took place on 6 November 1983. The Motherland Party, established by Turgut Özal, won a resounding victory and emerged as the first party in the election, from which many candidates had been excluded by the military administration. The Nationalist Democratic Party led by retired general Turgut Sunalp, which enjoyed the support of the National Security Council, failed to live up to the expectations of its sponsors, while the Motherland Party was able to attract the votes of the masses, who did not want to return to the sterile political bickering of the pre-1980 period. By waging a campaign stressing its moderation, the party had been able to attract the votes of the center-right, center-left, and far-right groups and the religious groups.

This was the beginning of a new era in Turkey's political development. Helped by international developments and internal conditions, the economic liberalism and political pragmatism of Özal and his party had a determining effect on Turkey's domestic and foreign policies.

The Motherland Party, which was able to form a government without coalition partners, brought about significant changes, especially in Turkey's economic and social structures and in the way foreign policy was made. From this point of view, the Özal period was a turning point in Turkey's development.

A. The U.S. View of the Özal Administration

Özal enjoyed the support of big business domestically and the backing of the U.S. internationally. Both the administration and U.S. financial circles supported Özal's policies.

Özal had long-standing links with the U.S. He had been at the helm of the Union of Manufacturers of Metal Products, a powerful employers' association in Turkey, worked for the World Bank in Washington, and designed and carried out the package of stabilization measures of 24 January 1980 in conjunction with the IMF. After the scandal of the pyramid schemes in 1982, he resigned from the Ulusu government and went to the U.S., where he spent a month and a half, ostensibly "to lose weight," during which time he held talks with U.S. officials.

Two and a half months prior to the legislative election in Turkey, the Wall Street Journal (26 August 1983), reflecting the views of U.S. business, published an article praising Özal's economic performance and declaring that it was essential for him to win the election for democracy to take root in Turkey. The article described Turkey's economic successes and added that the U.S. wanted to see the same policies pursued in the future. Although U.S. quarters declared that it was essential to allow the Motherland Party to contest the election for the sake of democracy, it was significant that there was no reaction from these quarters when the candidacies of the leader of the Social Democracy Party (SODEP; Sosyal Demokrasi Partisi), Erdal İnönü, and twenty-one founding members of that party were vetoed by the generals of the military administration, as a result of which the party was unable to enter the legislative elections of 1983.

U.S. officials were aware of Özal's religious orientation but were not bothered by it. In fact, as pointed out earlier, the U.S. was pursuing policies at the time that were designed to establish a belt based on moderate Islam to contain communism. Özal belonged to the Nakshibendi sect of Islam. He wanted to develop Turkey's relations with the Middle Eastern countries and was eager to implement liberal economic policies at home. He seemed to possess all the attributes that the U.S. would want in a politician in that position. Özal had attended a conference in Paris on 15 November 1985 with the theme "The Contribution of Islam and the West to a New Economic Order." At the conference Özal submitted a paper in which he drew parallels between Islam and capitalism, stated that both relied on the market to set prices, and claimed that the two were not divergent.

B. Political Relations

When Turgut Özal was prime minister, from 1983 to 1989, relations between Turkey and the U.S. were generally excellent. In fact, these relations went through a golden age during the period. Developments in the Middle East and Turkey's transformation helped make both countries more mutually dependent.

Özal's approach to relations with the U.S. was based on the assumption that, if Turkey pursued pro-American policies, the U.S. would reciprocate by being more friendly to Turkey. In Özal's view, if Turkey followed confrontational policies and became intransigent in the manner of Greek prime minister Andreas Papandreou, this would only result in strengthening the anti-Turkish Armenian and Greek lobbies in the U.S., causing much harm to Turkey's interests. Özal was also fully conscious of Turkey's economic constraints.

Özal's first task or priority was to clear away the difficulties in bilateral relations. This is why his approach to questions like the Armenian bills in the U.S. Congress, Turkish-Greek relations, and the Cyprus question gave the impression that he either underestimated their gravity or was about to make concessions on these issues. Özal also strove to develop economic relations. In the early part of his tenure, Özal pursued the traditional Turkish policy of seeking additional aid by stressing Turkey's strategic contribution to the West's defense. The emphasis would later shift from aid to trade.

Despite the cordiality in relations, Turkey was disappointed by the level of U.S. aid. Furthermore, relations with the U.S. continued to be marred by numerous questions, including the Armenian issue, Cyprus, and tense Turkish-Greek relations.

1. Turkey, the Middle East, and the U.S.

Aware of the importance that the U.S. attributed to stability in the Middle East, Özal wanted to turn Turkey into a key actor in the region, enjoying full U.S. backing. During his visit to the U.S. in March 1985, Özal declared that, if Turkey was strong in the Middle East, its influence in the region would grow and that this would be in the interest of the U.S. Turkey was to develop its relations with Middle Eastern countries, boost its exports to the region, play an active role there, and thereby secure additional American aid.

In the meantime U.S. pressure was growing, aimed at securing permission to use Turkish bases, especially Incirlik. The Özal government pursued the policies of its predecessors and concluded nine implementation agreements on 26 April 1985, regulating the technical aspects of the Memorandum of Understanding signed in November 1982. These covered support, air bases, access, communications, installations, purchases, labor, and construction. In this framework, air bases were to be constructed at Muş and Batman and the base at Malatya would be expanded.

While the government was publicly conveying the message that American demands with respect to the RDF were not being met, the press was reporting that the İncirlik base was being expanded, which was the sort of infrastructure upgrading being requested from Turkey to meet the needs of the RDF. The U.S. also wanted to replace its F-4 aircraft based at İncirlik with newer F-16 aircraft. When former president Nixon visited Turkey in September 1985, he declared that Turkey should fill the void left by Iran in the Middle East. This remark was not well received in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

At this stage, the attitude of the Gulf countries to the RDF was still unchanged. Özal believed that the RDF could only receive the green light if there was agreement among the regional countries on the issue, because proceeding without such an agreement would undermine Turkey's position in the region.

Such an agreement between the U.S. and the Gulf countries never became possible during the 1980s. This was to change after Iraq's occupation of Kuwait in August 1990.

The U.S. wanted Turkey to contribute to the stability of the Middle East and tighten its links with Israel. By bringing its two allies closer together, the U.S. would thereby strengthen its position in the region. After Camp David, Egypt had been ostracized by the Arab world. The plan was to free Egypt from its isolation by bringing Turkey, Israel, and Egypt closer together. U.S. officials and strategists were advising Ankara to strengthen Turkey's ties to Israel in order to secure the backing of the U.S. Congress on issues such as aid and the Armenian Genocide.

Being of a pragmatic bent, Özal sought to expand trade links with the Middle East countries and encouraged Turkish contractors to undertake projects in the region, while at the same time cementing ties with Israel. During his visit to the U.S. in 1985, he held secret talks with the leaders of the Jewish lobby and the Israeli ambassador in Washington. The Jewish lobby promised that it would give its backing to Turkey in the U.S. Congress if Ankara developed its relations with Israel. Israel's actions, however, such as its attack on Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981, its invasion of Lebanon in 1982, and its attack on the PLO's headquarters in Tunisia in 1987, had angered the Islamic world. In the face of this antagonism, it was difficult for Turkey to improve its relations with Israel. It would be necessary to wait for the Middle East Peace Process that was launched in the 1990s for the U.S.-backed rapprochement between Turkey and Israel to be consummated (see Box 7-57 in Section 7).

Turkish and American policies in relation to the Iran-Iraq conflict were in general concordant. Neither country wanted either of the combatants to emerge victorious from the war. That is why the U.S. found itself selling arms to Iran and to Iraq, depending on the progress of the war. There were reports in both the Turkish and the U.S. media that the sale of arms to Iran to finance the Contra guerrillas in Nicaragua was effected through Turkey (Box 6-7). Özal attempted to act as mediator between Iran and the U.S., but his efforts came to naught because of Tehran's opposition.

When Iran threatened to overrun Mosul and Kirkuk at the end of 1986, alarm bells rang in both Ankara and Washington. In that event, Iran would acquire the oil wealth of the region, which would help it in spreading its religious influence there. U.S.-based think tanks started issuing statements to the press, reminding people that Turkey had dominated the region for four hundred years and that Ankara should not fail to recall this past association. There were pundits in the Turkish press like former ambassador Coşkun Kırca, who wrote that in such an event Turkey should preempt Iran and take appropriate action. The Iranian push was halted, however, and the issue disappeared from the agenda until it resurfaced in 1991 under different circumstances (see Box 7-11 in Section 7).

Both the Turkish press and the opposition were highly critical of Turkey's U.S. and Middle East-oriented foreign policy, which started under the 12 September administration and continued under Özal. The shift in

Box 6-7. The Irangate Affair

U.S.-Iranian relations were strained because of the Islamic Revolution and the subsequent occupation of the U.S. Embassy in Tehran. In September 1980 war broke out between Iran and Iraq. Having equipped its army with U.S. arms in the days of the shah, Iran was seeking both new weapons and spare parts for its existing armory. It transpired that the Khomeini regime had secretly acquired weapons to meet its needs from the U.S. via Israel and that Lt. Col. Oliver North, a member of the U.S. National Security Council, played a key role in this transaction. The U.S. had sold weapons to its archenemy Iran to secure funds to finance the "Contra" guerrillas that were fighting the leftist Sandinista regime in Nicaragua. This roundabout approach had been devised by the administration because Congress would not provide funds for these activities in Nicaragua in other words, the affair consisted of more than one scandal.

The Turkish and foreign press alleged that there was also Turkish involvement in the Irangate affair, claiming that the airline set up in November 1984 by Kemal Horzum, a businessman in Prime Minister Ozal's entourage, had been used to ferry the arms to Iran.

This affair was dubbed Irangate because it reminded people of the Watergate scandal. In the investigation conducted in 1986, Oliver North was found guilty of obstructing the work of Congress and destroying documents of the National Security Council, but President Reagan was absolved of any wrongdoing.

This event demonstrated that the U.S. was capable of selling weapons even to Iran in order to carry out illegal activities in Central America, while Iran was ready to purchase arms from the country that it kept calling the "Great Satan."

(I. ÜZGEL)

Turkey's foreign policy was also noted by the international media. There were articles in the Turkish press to the effect that Özal was deliberately shifting the emphasis of Turkish foreign policy from Europe to the U.S. and the Middle East in order to allow Turkey to take over the role of Iran in the region. Bülent Ecevit, who was barred from engaging in political activity at the time, wrote that Turkey was drifting away from the democratic principles and values of Western Europe and turning itself into a forward operating base of the U.S. in the region. As a matter of fact, the process of drifting away from Europe that started under the 12 September administration continued during the early part of the Özal government. Özal himself adopted a dismissive attitude toward Western Europe and the European Community. He once declared that the authors of a report critical of Turkey's human rights were hypocrites. In a speech delivered on 21 November 1984 and reported in the newspaper Cumhuriyet, he declared that Turkey had no need for the $600 million that the EEC was to provide under the Second Financial Protocol, which was being blocked by a Greek veto.

When the Middle East market lost its luster starting in the mid-1980s, however, Özal was forced to redirect his attention to the ECs. Furthermore, because of Turkey's open-door development model, its need for foreign aid was inescapable. This subject was always on the agenda in dealings not just with the ECs but also with the U.S.

2. U.S. Aid

Although U.S. military and economic aid to Turkey during the 1980s was substantial, Turkey was not satisfied with either its level or its terms. This cast a shadow on bilateral relations. We shall first examine the general features of U.S. aid.

The U.S. Military Assistance Program, which covered grants, was being implemented within the framework of the 1961 Foreign Assistance Act, as was the International Military Training Program, under which many Turkish officers and military personnel received training. All kinds of surplus U.S. arms and military equipment were being transferred to Turkey under the Military Assistance Program, which came to an end in 1989. Other channels were found to continue with this type of aid throughout the 1990s. In addition, there was the Foreign Military Sales (FMS) program, under which the cost of the supplies had to be repaid along with interest, as well as aid within the Southern Regional Amendment (SRA) program. Finally, economic aid provided through the Economic Support Fund (ESF) was occasionally used by Turkey to procure arms. That is why the ESF program was also referred to as security aid.

The bulk of the military assistance within this framework, which lasted throughout the 1980s, came through the FMS. The FMS credits, which Turkey started receiving in 1972, consisted of short- and long-term credits, which had grace periods of one to three years or ten years depending on the type of credit. The rate of interest ranged from 5 to 14%. One of the features of FMS credits was that part consisted of grants. Until the grant component was abolished altogether in 1993, Turkey received $7:5 billion in FMS credits: 60% as repayable loans and 40% as grants. These U.S. credits could be referred to as aid because of the grant component. (For developments in the 1990s, see "The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement [DECA]" and "U.S. Military and Economic Aid" in "Relations with the USA and NATO" in Section 7.)

The procurement formalities of the weapons systems that Turkey purchased, whether through credits or through grants, were (and are) conducted on behalf of Turkey by U.S. agencies through discussions with the manufacturers of the systems. The costs of training, spare parts, and support equipment that the systems necessitated were not included in the aid programs. In other words, Turkey had to procure these against cash payments (Atalay, pp. 238–47).

Under U.S. law, the administration must obtain congressional approval for all foreign military credits and sales in excess of $14 million. That is why the congressional factor was always present in matters concerning military procurement, giving rise to problems in relations from time to time. The level of aid recommended by the administration goes through a long process, passing from the House of Representatives and Senate's subcommittees on appropriations, after which the Foreign Aid Bill is enacted for the following fiscal year. During this process, the level recommended by the administration for Turkey was usually trimmed.

U.S. aid to Turkey during this period had the following features.

First, the aid was mostly military aid. During this period and especially during the early part of the period, the U.S. and the other Western states were providing the economic assistance that Turkey urgently required through the channels of the IMF and the OECD. During the early 1980s U.S. economic aid was at a high level, because the U.S. was supporting Turkey's economic restructuring and transformation. Economic aid later decreased, while military aid reached a high level in the mid-1980s. Toward the end of the 1980s especially the grant portion of FMS credits fell to low levels.

Second, the U.S. used the aid as a lever in its relations with Turkey and attached conditions to the aid that were unrelated to military or economic relations. The most glaring instance was when the U.S. linked aid to the question of Cyprus. The Greek lobby intensified its activities in the U.S. Congress in November 1983 after the proclamation of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. As a result, an amendment was introduced in the Senate that would make all aid to Turkey conditional on the return of the district of Varosha in Cyprus to Greek Cypriots. Although the amendment was rejected, the administration's request for $930 million in aid for Turkey for 1984 was trimmed by $200 million in the subcommittees of the House and the Senate as a result of the lobby's efforts. As the Congress approved the aid, it asked the administration to work toward the ending of the division of the island and called on Turkey not to engage in activities in Varosha that would make a settlement more difficult. This phraseology meant that Varosha was not to be opened to settlement by Turkish Cypriots. The following year the president was asked to report on progress toward a settlement in Cyprus. The president then started submitting yearly reports to Congress on the question of Cyprus. During the process, Turkey sought to improve the terms and raise the level of the aid by using the extension and approval of the agreement on Defense and Economic Cooperation as a negotiating card.

In September 1986 the House Committee on Appropriations cut the level of aid to Turkey and recommended that Turkish troops be withdrawn from Cyprus. Notwithstanding the Reagan administration's opposition, the House of Representatives introduced an amendment to a bill in February 1987 by which it trimmed military aid by $200 million and forbade Turkey to use this aid in Cyprus.

During the 1980s the U.S. maintained the practice (introduced toward the end of the 1970s) by which the level of aid to Greece and Turkey was apportioned in the 7:10 ratio. The Reagan administration, being fully aware of the role and the strategic importance of Turkey in the Middle East, was opposed to this ratio. The administration pointed out the difficulties in determining the exact value of a piece of equipment and the apportionment of the aid in this ratio to the two countries. Furthermore, the ratio reduced flexibility and caused delays. The administration had been unable to determine the level of aid to Turkey because the Papandreou government was late in submitting its list of requirements to Washington. Finally, the ratio was not contributing to the solution of the disputes between the two countries. Despite all this, the ratio remained, and Turkey reproached the administration for not doing enough to rectify this situation.

Third, in the late 1980s the conditions under which U.S. aid was provided became progressively less favorable, because Gorbachev's policy of glasnost reduced international tensions after 1985.

In 1988 the House Foreign Relations Committee recommended that aid be provided according to the recipient country's standard of living and that Foreign Military Sales to Turkey and Greece be on a cash basis. This recommendation was not adopted, and the grant component of FMS credits was maintained until 1993. From that date on, the interest on FMS credits was raised to the prevailing market rates, which then hovered around 10 to 14%. In any case, economic aid in the 1990s dropped to negligible levels, and the aid that came tied to conditions was turned down by Turkey.

The Özal administration was uneasy over the fall in the level of U.S. aid in the mid-1980s as well as the terms attached to this aid, which were becoming more onerous. In October 1987 Özal declared that Turkey was getting promises from the U.S. rather than aid and called on Washington to raise the level of its assistance. He also asked that Turkey's FMS debts be written off, just as Israel and Egypt had benefited from a forgiveness clause, but this request remained unheeded in Washington.

Turkey remained dependent on U.S. aid throughout the 1980s both for its economic development and for the modernization of its armed forces. Although the level of American aid was the highest since the Menderes era, its volume and conditions were not up to Özal's expectations. The U.S. kept up the practice of tying aid to political conditions and used the lobbies and the Congress as an excuse for cutting down its level.

3. The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement of 1985

The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) that came into effect in 1980 was due to expire on 18 December 1985. Unless it was denounced by one of the parties, it would automatically be extended for another year. Turkey was unhappy with some of the provisions of the agreement, so it submitted a note to Washington three months before the date of expiration, seeking changes in the agreement.

Turkey was not trying to distance itself from the U.S. or to create difficulties. Ankara wanted to use the agreement to ensure the development of its economic relations, raise the level of aid, and improve its terms. In the early years of his term in office, Prime Minister Özal was following the traditional course of Turkish foreign policy: "If we are providing bases, we have every right to seek expanded trade" (Hürriyet, 28 October 1985) (meaning more U.S. purchases from Turkey).

In the negotiations with the U.S., Turkey pointed out that imbalances had emerged over the last five years in the military and strategic components as well as the economic component of bilateral relations and submitted a wish list to the American side consisting of ten items. Most importantly, the U.S. should accelerate the modernization of the Turkish army; it should tie aid to Turkey to a treaty (in order to eliminate the Congress factor); aid should not be tied to unrelated issues (like Cyprus and the 7:10 ratio); debts arising from FMS should be written off; the U.S. should engage in cooperation in the field of defense production in Turkey; the U.S. administration should support Turkey's lobbying activities in the U.S.; and, in the economic field, relations should be diversified and obstacles to Turkish exports should be removed.

The U.S. administration approached some of these requests favorably, while it rejected some others. Washington would make every effort to help in modernizing the army; it agreed with Turkey on the Cyprus condition but could find no solution to this because it concerned the Congress; and Turkey had to handle the issue of lobbying on its own. Washington was in favor of diversifying economic relations but could do nothing about existing trade barriers.

Turkey was unhappy about Washington's negative approach to aid and trade issues during this "golden age" in political relations. At a time when there was a marked coolness in Turkey's relations with Europe, Ankara relied on its cordial relations with the U.S. and was much chagrined at the difficulties it faced in obtaining the amount of aid it was seeking. In these circumstances, Turkey agreed to only a one-year extension of the agreement.

The lack of balance bothered Turkey: while Turkey was committed to carrying out the terms of the agreement as a state, the U.S. administration was able to evade its responsibility to comply with the agreement by hiding behind the Congress factor when trimming the level of aid. That is why Ankara was seeking a formula to deal directly with the administration and bypass Congress. Actually, the administration was using Congress as an alibi and was not prepared to change its system to accommodate Turkey.

The American system was based on the principle of checks and balances between an executive with sweeping powers and a Congress that limited these powers by holding the purse strings. Given this background, Turkey understood that its requests could not be fully met and dropped its political demands, confining itself to technical and economic requests: allowing Turkey to bid for Pentagon contracts; supplying the requirements of U.S. personnel in Turkey from the local market; having Turkey undertake the maintenance and repair work of units of the Sixth Fleet and of U.S. aircraft in Europe; and practical cooperation in defense matters.

It was at this point that the House Subcommittee on Appropriations unexpectedly trimmed by one-third the grants and credits proposed by the administration for the fiscal year 1987. It also recommended that Turkish troops be withdrawn from Cyprus. Meanwhile the administration was seeking to establish a radio station in Turkey that would beam its broadcasts to the Central Asian region.

The Turkish attempt to improve the terms of the aid and obtain economic advantages by using the DECA card had backfired. The U.S. was annoyed by the Turkish maneuver to change the structure of bilateral relations and reacted by raising the stakes and making more onerous counterproposals. In regard to beaming broadcasts to Central Asia, Turkey had always been careful not to disturb its relation with the USSR needlessly and consequently rejected the U.S. request.

The negotiations eventually were completed. The foreign ministers of both countries exchanged side letters on 16 March 1987, by which they extended the validity of DECA for a further five years as of 18 December 1985.

The U.S. side letter contained the following provisions:

The Administration is resolved to and will, in accordance with the purposes of the DECA, and consistent with the U.S. Constitutional procedures, propose annually to the U.S. Congress a high level of support for Turkey, based on mutually agreed recommendations, commensurate with Turkey's important contribution to the common defense. In this context, the U.S. Administration commits to pursue the realization of its full request with vigor and determination no less than it accords to any assistance request. It is also our determination to seek to extend, to the maximum extent possible, the concessional, and especially the grant aid, component of U.S. security assistance. We will extend through all other appropriate means the maximum possible support for the modernization of the equipment of the Turkish Armed Forces. In recognition of the need to alleviate the burden of the FMS debt on the Turkish economy under current conditions, we will search for approaches to debt relief and continue to seek to provide economic assistance to Turkey...

The United States reaffirms its determination to cooperate with the Government of Turkey in the struggle against terrorism and to oppose all actions that sponsor, support or assist terrorist activity...

It is our understanding that both governments will, in this spirit, make their best efforts to remove obstacles to reciprocal trade between the U.S. and Turkey.

Thus the U.S. administration did not conclude a "treaty," did not exclude the Congress factor from the process of providing aid, and did not write off FMS debts.

In addition to the letter, a secret protocol was attached (Güldemir 1991, pp. 152–66) by which Turkey provided certain facilities to the U.S. The U.S. F-4 aircraft based at Incirlik would be replaced with a greater number of F-16 aircraft. U.S. combat aircraft would be able to use the Konya base for training flights, and the modernization of bases would go forward. Pending the production of F-16 aircraft in Turkey, the U.S. would transfer to Turkey, free of charge, forty F-4 aircraft to meet operational requirements. Some of the supplies and equipment required for U.S. military activities in Turkey would be procured locally. The secret protocol also provided that all of the U.S. economic aid, amounting to $100 million, would be in the form of a grant. The grant component of military aid in the amount of $490 million would attain $320 million.

Immediately after the exchange of side letters, Congress made a cut of 45% in the aid to be provided to Turkey. In addition, the House Committee on Foreign Relations attached conditions to the aid, calling for a reduction of Turkish troops in Cyprus and forbidding the transfer of U.S.-delivered arms to Cyprus.

The cuts imposed by Congress, immediately after an agreement had been reached, naturally caused a sharp reaction in Turkey. Officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs made statements to the press suggesting that the agreement might be ended. The government's approach, however, was more measured. Özal declared that the document extending the validity of the agreement and not the agreement itself would be approved by the cabinet. At the same time, the defense contractors that did business with Turkey were informed about Turkey's uncertainties in order to get them to prod the administration and lobby the Congress.

The Özal government eventually announced that the side letter extending DECA would not be approved by the cabinet until the position of the Congress in relation to aid became clear. In the meantime additional facilities in bases would not be provided and the servicing of $400 million in debts arising from FMS would be slowed. As the side letter did not come into force, the secret protocol also remained in abeyance, which strengthened the government's hand.

Özal did not want to extend this standoff for too long, however; overriding the objections of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, he secured the cabinet's approval of the side letter and the secret protocol on 21 February 1988. As was now becoming his practice, Özal kept the MFA out of the picture, and the cabinet's approval took place without the ministry being informed. The press and the opposition were highly critical of the government for having approved the agreement at a time when the Congress had made its terms more onerous for Turkey. Politicians like former minister of defense Hasan Esat Işık and the leader of the Democratic Left Party (DSP: Demokratik Sol Parti), Bülent Ecevit, criticized both the content of the agreement and the manner in which it was approved. While Turkey was engaged as a state, the U.S. was engaged only as a government, and the Congress was allowed to impose its decisions on Turkey.

In these circumstances, it was proposed that (as in the U.S.) the TGNA should have a say in the approval of DECA. Ecevit was critical of Özal's foreign policy, with its emphasis on economic relations, while Demirel struck a more realistic note by pointing out that the approval had come under the pressure of Turkey's heavy foreign debt burden.

Turkey's actions should be assessed against this background. The export-led growth model that had been implemented since 1980 had vastly increased Turkey's foreign debts by the end of the decade. To sustain economic growth and remain in power the Özal administration had to be on good terms with the U.S., and American officials were well aware of this. The U.S. also took advantage of other factors in its dealings with Turkey. In August 1987 the Turkish press reported that Turkey had increased the number of its troops in Cyprus and had sent new tanks to the island, apparently without the knowledge of the government. This kind of spat between the military and the government occurred frequently during the Özal period. The U.S. embarrassed the government by calling for the removal of the tanks. During this period bills dealing with the Armenian events of 1915 were introduced in the Congress, and the Kurds were referred to as a minority in the annual human-rights reports prepared by the State Department. It is of some interest that there were discussions in NATO quarters at this time about the growing Soviet threat against Turkey and speculations about whether NATO members would endanger their security to defend Turkey in the event of an attack. This was unsettling, even if official clarifications were subsequently issued.

During the Özal period Turkey had sought to establish a new basis for its relations with the U.S. by removing the Congress factor but failed in this effort even though Ankara was a close political and military ally of Washington and implemented economic policies that closely corresponded to U.S. wishes. It failed because the relationship was not one among equals but one in which the U.S. was always calling the shots. The process of negotiating and approving DECA in the 1980s demonstrated that the unequal relationship could not be changed by unilateral steps.

4. Turkish-Greek Relations and the U.S. Factor in the Question of Cyprus

One of the distinguishing features of the Özal government was that (unlike its predecessors and, in a way, its successors) it tried to isolate Turkish-U.S. relations from the shadow of Greek-Turkish questions and Cyprus. But this was not easy to achieve because of developments in Greece and Cyprus and the nature of Turkey's internal structure. We shall first examine the U.S. approach to these questions.

The U.S. Position and Role in Turkish-Greek Relations

The U.S. attributed a certain importance to Greece, although to a lesser extent than it did to Turkey. In addition, both the U.S. administration and the public nurtured a deep sympathy for Greece based on historical factors. Furthermore, the Greek lobby wielded considerable influence in America. The U.S. view of Greece was always colored by these factors.

The PASOK party under Papandreou's leadership, which came to power in Greece in early 1981, alarmed U.S. officials when it promised to pull Greece out of NATO and shut down NATO bases. Throughout Papandreou's tenure of power, Greece's relations with the U.S. would remain strained. In the early 1980s anti-Americanism was rife in Greece because of the resentment felt over U.S. support for the Greek military junta from 1967 to 1974 and for allegedly not preventing the Turkish intervention in Cyprus in 1974. In his dealings with Washington, Papandreou made full use of the public antipathy for the U.S.

In his first term in office in the 1980s, Papandreou created problems for the U.S. over a good number of issues, many of which related to Turkey. One of these was his opposition to the presence of nuclear weapons in his country. Ignoring U.S. and NATO objections, he aligned himself with the Eastern Bloc and campaigned for the removal of nuclear weapons from the Balkans. He refused to participate in NATO exercises in the Aegean, citing problems with Turkey as an excuse. Papandreou maintained his threat to shut down NATO bases until the mid-1980s. He built up Greek relations with the USSR and refused to participate in sanctions against that country following its occupation of Afghanistan and the coup in Poland. Athens signed a nonaggression pact with the Warsaw Pact member Bulgaria, condemned the U.S. bombing of Libya in 1986, and did not go along with the sanctions imposed on Libya. Finally, Greece did not participate wholeheartedly in the fight against terrorism, forcing the U.S. to reclassify Athens airport in the "risky" category.

From the U.S. perspective, Greece and Turkey were in remarkably contradictory positions in the 1980s. The Papandreou administration's domestic policies were populist and favored public ownership of enterprises, while its foreign policy was highly nationalistic, even reckless vis-à-vis Turkey and the question of Cyprus, and markedly anti-U.S. On the other shore of the Aegean, there was a Turkish leader who was liberal and pro-privatization in his economic policies and pro-U.S. and conciliatory in his foreign policy. His approach to Greece and the Cyprus question was pragmatic. In these circumstances, Turkey expected to count on the full support of the U.S., but in practice this support was not forthcoming.

One of the reasons for this paradox was that Papandreou allowed Greece's relations with the U.S. to pursue their normal course despite his anti-American rhetoric. Papandreou's policy was not seeking to mar relations with the U.S. but rather trying to improve his bargaining position by adopting the role of a difficult ally and to extract more aid by using the issues of bases and NATO.

Another reason was the existence of the Greek lobby, which helped maintain the links with the U.S. by serving as a healer.

A third reason was that, when confronted with situations that required finding solutions, U.S. policy tended to seek a way out by trying to give satisfaction to the intransigent side that was creating difficulties. As a member of the ECs and relying on the Greek lobby, Greece could afford to confront the U.S., while Turkey was becoming ever more alienated from the ECs because of its human rights record in particular. This alienation would get even worse in the 1990s.

Despite the Papandreou administration's anti-U.S. rhetoric and actions, Washington remained silent in the face of Greece's noncompliance with the Rogers Plan in 1981. The U.S. also adhered strictly to the 7:10 ratio in the allocation of aid to the two countries. In fact, a provision was inserted in article 7 of the U.S.-Greek bases agreement that ensured the maintenance of the ratio. Nor did the U.S. object to the inclusion of the island of Lemnos in NATO plans, even though the island had a demilitarized status under international treaties. Although Washington felt uneasy about Greece's nonaggression pact with Bulgaria, there was no official reaction.

In summary, Özal's policy of trying to draw the U.S. to its side by following convergent policies failed to yield the desired result in Washington's approach to Turkish-Greek relations.

In some instances the U.S. intervened directly in Turkish-Greek relations, such as during the Aegean crisis in March 1987. As in the case of the Kardak (Imia) crisis in 1996, when the tension reached a peak, the U.S. interceded and called on both sides to exercise restraint, putting the question on hold.

The Question of Cyprus and the U.S.

The U.S. attributed importance to Cyprus because this question had a negative effect on the relations between two of its allies, Turkey and Greece, and also because the island had great strategic value due to its location in the eastern Mediterranean. From the U.S. perspective, the important thing was not who owned or controlled the island as long as the island's status conformed to its strategic interests and Cyprus remained within its own sphere.

The U.S. used the British bases in Cyprus on a number of occasions to support its activities in the Middle East, including the time when the multinational force was being withdrawn from Lebanon in 1983. For the U.S., Cyprus was a stepping stone to the Middle East and was seen as a natural aircraft carrier when dealing with the questions of the region.

But the problems that Cyprus caused for U.S. diplomacy often outweighed the advantages conferred by the island. Occasionally Cyprus was capable of putting Washington in the spot, as it did in 1974, when American policy after the Turkish intervention caused anger in both Turkey and Greece. This led Greece to withdraw from NATO's military structure, while Turkey reacted to the three-year arms embargo by seeking ways to develop a new defense strategy.

During the 1980s every U.S. action in connection with Cyprus caused resentment in either Greece or Turkey and occasionally in both countries, even though Washington took care to pursue a balanced policy between the two rivals.

First, it has to be noted that there was a difference between the approaches of the U.S. administration and Congress on the issues of Turkish-Greek relations as well as Cyprus, similar to the differences in matters of aid. Under the influence of lobbies, Congress was more critical toward Turkey, whereas the administration, being guided by strategic concerns, tended to show more consideration for it, in particular until the late 1980s. The Reagan administration was in favor of persuading Turkey to be more conciliatory through a constructive approach rather than by threatening punishment.

Because it saw the Cyprus question as one between two of its allies, Washington wanted a solution of its own making or a solution that did not affect its interests. The USSR was getting more involved with the question on international platforms, however, which could lead to growing Soviet influence in the strategic island.

There were several U.S. initiatives at this time. In November 1983 the U.S. condemned the proclamation of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus and applied pressure on countries like Pakistan and Bangladesh to keep them from recognizing the new state. But the U.S. took no tangible steps to force the Turkish side to rescind its decision, confining its action to a cut of $120 million in Turkish aid to appease the Greek Cypriots and the Greeks.

Another U.S. initiative came on 8 May 1984, when the U.S. announced a "Peace and Reconstruction Fund" of $250 million for Cyprus. The Turkish side responded to this initiative with approval, but the Greek Cypriots and Greece raised objections. Reagan announced that the aim was to find a solution by helping finance projects that would bring the two sides closer, rather than by seeking to punish Turkey. The U.S. wanted 19% of the aid to be disbursed through this scheme to be set aside for the Turkish Cypriots, who made up that proportion of the total population of Cyprus.

Toward the end of the 1980s the U.S. took a stand against Denktaş, insisting that a solution to the question could not be found while he was in charge. It is alleged that the U.S. gave its backing to the project of replacing Denktaş with Asil Nadir (a prominent Turkish-Cypriot businessman), who was expected to be more conciliatory (Yalçın Doğan, "Interview with Asil Nadir," Hürriyet, 24 July 2005). Özal also backed this formula, but the project came to naught when Asil Nadir refused to cooperate.

To sum up, the U.S. saw to it that outstanding questions did not assume acute crisis proportions. The pressures to curtail aid or remove troops from Cyprus were never fully implemented. At a time when the U.S. needed Turkey for strategic reasons, the administration made sure that the question of Cyprus did not get in the way.

5. The Question of the Armenian Bills

Although the question of the Armenian bills arose from the actions of the Senate and the House of Representatives, it did have negative effects on bilateral relations.

This question revealed, once again, the division in Turkey's leadership over foreign policy issues in the 1980s. Özal felt that this was a card that the U.S. used to torment Turkey and was irked that it was being used so frequently. What really bothered Özal was not the significance or possible consequences of the bills but rather their negative effects on Turkish public opinion and the opportunity that the bills gave to the opposition to snipe at the government. For Özal, the Armenian bills were a "one-off thing" that could not hurt Turkey and, once passed, would completely lose their nuisance value. From this dismissive point of view, their adoption might even have a salutary effect.

But the other decision-makers in the administration (like the MFA and the Armed Forces) attached far more importance to this matter and kept up the pressure that restricted Özal's room for maneuver.

The U.S. administration supported Turkey and sought to check Congress until about the mid-1980s. Then the administration's support slackened. As a consequence, the Armenian lobby made a major effort to have the bills approved in the committees so that they could reach the floor.

From the beginning of the 1980s, the Armenian community in the U.S. and the Armenian lobby made every effort to have the administration recognize the Armenian Genocide. In August 1982 the State Department issued a report on ASALA terror that contained the following sentence: "The Department of State does not endorse allegations that the Turkish Government committed a genocide against the Armenian people" (Laipson 1985, p. 33). The Armenians were deeply angered by this report and fought hard to have the offending sentence deleted. When the Armenians failed to achieve their aim after two years of trying, they were able to get two bills introduced in Congress in 1984.

The first bill was introduced in the House on 10 September 1984, when nine representatives took the floor and supported the bill. The bill, which proclaimed 24 April as "Man's Inhumanity to Man Day," was adopted by the House by a show of hands.

At the same time, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee adopted a bill that called for "the prevention of events similar to the Armenian genocide in the making and implementation of American foreign policy."

The adoption of these bills caused a sharp reaction in Turkey at the level of the government, the opposition, and the general public. Commenting on the U.S. action, Özal declared that this was done for internal political reasons prior to an election and that he expected the error to be rectified after the election. If no correction was made, he declared that relations would have to be reappraised in a sober-minded way. He added in another speech that the U.S. action could be interpreted as moral support for future ASALA outrages.

The Armenian bill was introduced in the House of Representatives about a year later and was submitted to a vote on the floor on 4 June 1985. The bill was voted down in the House, with the backing of sixty-nine historians and experts on Turkish affairs, who issued a joint statement warning that a historic error was about to be committed. Still, Turkey was upset that the bill had received the support of 231 representatives (to be adopted, the bill needed 274 votes), and the minister of foreign affairs, Vahit Halefoğlu, gave expression to these feelings.

The Armenian lobby kept up its efforts and on 23 April 1987 succeeded in having the bill adopted in the Postal and Civil Service Subcommittee, which sent it to the floor of the House. Turkey reacted by recalling its ambassador in Washington, Sükrü Elekdağ, to Ankara for consultations. Özal sent President Reagan a message expressing his disapproval. President Evren's reaction was stronger: he announced that he would postpone his visit to the U.S., scheduled to take place in May 1987.

At about this time, the European Parliament adopted a resolution on 18 June 1987, asserting: "2—Believes that the tragic events in 1915—1917 involving the Armenians living in the territory of the Ottoman Empire constitute genocide within the meaning of the convention on the prevention and the punishment of the crime of genocide adopted by the UN General Assembly on 9 December 1948."

The resolution continued: "Recognizes, however, that the present Turkey cannot be held responsible for the tragedy experienced by the Armenians of the Ottoman Empire and stresses that neither political nor legal or material claims against present-day Turkey can be derived from the recognition of this historical event as an act of genocide" (http://en.wikisource.org/wiki/European_Parliament_Resolution_on_Armenian_Genocide). Nonetheless, this increased Turkey's apprehension and forced the Özal government to intensify its efforts with the U.S. administration to forestall a similar resolution being adopted by the House of Representatives. The House voted against debating the bill on procedural grounds on 8 August 1987.

The question of the Armenian bills came up once again in 1989 under different circumstances (Güldemir 1991, pp. 274–93). In the U.S., Reagan had been succeeded by George Bush, who had promised ethnic Armenians during his election campaign that he would secure the passage of the genocide bill when in office. Meanwhile Özal had become president and would now conduct foreign policy directly, without having to cater to the voters' wishes. The Cold War had come to an end, and Turkey's former strategic importance was being questioned. After their failure in the House of Representatives in 1985, the ethnic Armenians were ready to redouble their efforts to achieve their aim at last.

A bill that would mark 24 April as the day to commemorate the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Armenian Genocide was adopted by the Senate's Judiciary Committee on 17 October by eight votes to six. Although the bill had not reached the Senate floor, the way had been cleared. Özal had taken a nonchalant approach to the issue that year in his talks with Bush, which led the administration to adopt a more relaxed stand in its dealings with the members of the Senate committee.

The Turkish MFA and the armed forces were very disturbed by these developments. If the legislature of a superpower and an ally of Turkey could pass such a bill, this could constitute a precedent that would lead other parliaments to pass similar bills. A similar resolution already had been adopted by the European Parliament two years earlier, on 18 June 1987. Consequently, a number of provisional measures were taken as a warning to the U.S. U.S. naval units would be barred from making visits to Turkish ports, and the meeting of the Turkish-U.S. Defense Council would be postponed indefinitely. The message was also conveyed that, if the Senate adopted such a resolution, a new agreement would be negotiated when DECA expired in 1990. Military contacts were suspended, and U.S. F-16 flights from İncirlik were stopped. The MFA sought to get the Jewish lobby to intervene on Turkey's behalf. The Jewish lobby was known to maintain that the Jews were the only people who had suffered a genocide and wanted to see no competition in this area. The lobby also wanted to draw Turkey to Israel's side, so it intervened in the affair. American lobbying firms, some of them with business interests in Turkey, were also hired to defend Ankara's position.

When Özal visited Washington in January 1990, he took up the issue of the Armenian bills when he met Robert Dole, the Senate majority leader, and President Bush. He described to the president the effects of President Johnson's letter to İnönü in 1964 and, with reference to the Armenian-Azerbaijani clashes that erupted during his visit, pointed out that the adoption of such a bill at this time would only encourage the Armenians to further aggression.

The Bush administration was seeking a text that would not damage relations with Turkey and also give satisfaction to the Armenian community, while not employing the term "genocide." At the time of the second vote on the bill in the Senate in February 1990, Robert Byrd, a prominent and respected Democratic senator and leader who supported Turkey, had to filibuster for four-teen hours in three days to prevent the bill from coming to a vote.

While struggling with this question, Turkey used the status of the bases to gain additional leverage, as it had done in the case of the arms embargo in 1975. But this time Turkey's action consisted of temporary measures commensurate with its discomfort and displeasure, such as halting flights from bases and suspending the visit of U.S. warships to Turkish ports. Another difference from the action taken in the 1970s was that this time the public did not hear about the measures that had been taken, because the government did not want to give the impression that relations with the U.S. were strained. When the bill

Box 6-8. The United States and the Kurdish Movement in Northern Iraq Prior to 1990

Historically the U.S. Kurdish policy has been focused on northern Iraq. This region is important because it is populated predominantly by Kurds and produces one-third of Iraq's oil.

Although the U.S. relationship with the Kurds goes back to the time of President Wilson's Fourteen Points in 1918, real contacts started only in the 1960s under Cold War conditions and developed into involvement with the Kurdish question from 1972 onward. That year President Nixon visited Tehran and concluded a secret agreement with the shah to provide arms and financial support to the rebellious Kurds of northern Iraq. At this time, the U.S. used the Kurds to weaken the Iraqi regime, which was developing its ties with the USSR, and keep Iraq out of the fray in the Arabsraeli confrontation, while hiding behind Iran. Kurdish leader Mullah Barzani was extremely close to the U.S. and received millions of dollars' worth of U.S. arms and medical supplies by way of Iran. At one point he expressed his gratitude by remarking that his people were ready to become America's fifty-first state.

At this time, Israel also provided assistance to Mullah Barzani, in the form of arms and military training. During the Cold War, Israel's objective was to relieve the pressure on it by creating a problem that would keep the Muslim countries of the Middle East preoccupied and bring about discord among them. As a result, until the mid-1970s, there was close cooperation by the CIA, SAVAK (the Iranian National Organization for Intelligence and Security), and Mossad (the Israeli Institute for Intelligence and Special Operations) in northern Iraq.

in 1975 Iran signed the Algiers agreement with Iraq. Under the terms of the agreement, Iran-obtained territorial concessions in the Shatt al-Arab region and in return cut off the aid that it was providing to the Kurds. Deprived of this aid, the Kurds fell back in the face of the Iraqi army and were forced to seek refuge in Iran and Turkey. Kissinger, the author of America's Kurdish policy, was oblivious to Barzani's appeals for U.S. assistance. He reminded Barzani that "covert action should not be confused with missionary work" (Village Voice, 16 February 1976).

The Iraqi Kurds rebelled once again during the Iran-Iraq War that broke out in 1980, taking advantage of the weakness of the Baghdad regime. At first the U.S. remained aloof from this rebellion. Toward the end of the war, however, in 1988, it established direct contacts with the Kurdish leadership and made ready to fill any vacuum that might emerge in northern Iraq. Within this framework, Jalai Talabani, another Kurdish leader, went to Washington in April 1988; where he met with U.S. officials. After a cease-fire was signed with Iran, Baghdad redirected its forces to the North, where the Kurdish forces, lacking U.S. support, were quickly dispersed. As a result, 50,000 Iraqi Kurds were compelled to take refuge in Turkey.

The lesson that emerged at the end of the 1980s was that the U.S. was prepared to use the Kurds as pawns in its foreign policy but could readily abandon them to their fate when conditions changed. The Kurds could be used against different countries depending on the circumstances, the situation of the country, and its policy toward the U.S. or the requirements of U.S. regional policies at that particular time.

(I. Uzgel)

was removed from the Senate's agenda, Turkey lifted the temporary measures on 1 March 1990.

Shortly after Turkey lifted the measures, however, President Bush issued a written statement on 24 April 1990 in which he declared that "on the 75th anniversary of the massacre in which more than one million Armenians perished, I want to join those who want to mark this day as a day of remembrance" (Güldemir 1991, p. 282). Until that time, the administration had always supported Turkey in trying to dissuade Congress from passing a hostile resolution. Consequently, the president's statement caused keen disappointment in Turkey. It is probable that Bush was seeking to console the Armenians, who had failed to achieve their aim in Congress. Turkey's hasty lifting of the measures before the critical date of 24 April may also have contributed to the president's action.

6. The Kurdish Question and the U.S.

The Kurdish question came to the fore as a factor in Turkish-U.S. relations during the 1980s (see Box 7-11 in Section 7). There were two aspects to this issue. The first was the policy of the U.S. toward the Iraqi Kurds (Box 6-8), going all the way back to the 1950s, and the second was the U.S. policy toward the Kurdish question in Turkey itself. Both aspects of the U.S. approach were deeply disturbing for Turkey and caused problems in bilateral relations, but the second aspect was the most troublesome for Ankara.

The U.S. started taking an interest in Turkey's Kurds starting in the 1950s. The American Peace Corps volunteers concentrated their attention on Turkey's eastern and southeastern region, causing much debate among the Turkish public as well as in the TGNA. The resulting public pressure led to the curtailment of the activities of the Peace Corps.

The U.S. backed the Iraqi Kurds until the mid-1970s. But Washington also worried about the possibility that their separatist tendencies might spill over into the Kurdish areas of Turkey and Iran. This could lead to the destabilization of the two allies and create opportunities for the USSR. Nevertheless, the U.S. kept up its close interest in the affairs of Turkish Kurds. In his book ABD'nin Kürt Kartı (The Kurdish Card of the USA), Turan Yavuz (pp. 82–87) quotes a CIA report dated 1979, which stated that Turkey kept the Kurdish regions underdeveloped and that the Kurds were not able to enjoy greater autonomy because of their internal squabbles and their lack of strong leadership.

Starting in the mid-1980s, changes began to emerge in the American perception of the Kurdish question. Washington was forced to take a stand and formulate a new Kurdish policy, especially toward Turkey, as a consequence of the Iranian revolution, the Iran-Iraq War, and the actions of the PKK in Turkey.

At this stage the main elements of the U.S. approach to the Kurdish problem in Turkey were as follows.

PKK activities emerged in the summer of 1984 in southeastern Turkey and spread to different parts of the region. When it became clear that these actions could not be quickly suppressed, the U.S. interest in the question grew. It began to be perceived as an element that could be used in bilateral relations.

While taking a close interest in the Kurdish question, the U.S. was careful in all its official pronouncements to balance this by stressing the need to maintain Turkey's territorial integrity in order to ease its ally's concerns.

A sign of growing interest in the Kurdish question during the 1980s was the appointment in September 1984 of William Eagleton as U.S. ambassador in Damascus. Eagleton was a career diplomat and an expert on Kurdish issues. His appointment coincided with the resurgence of PKK activities in Turkey. During his term in Damascus, Eagleton allegedly maintained his links with the PKK and made frequent visits to Turkey, where he had contacts (Yavuz, p. 61). All of this caused apprehension in Ankara about U.S. policy toward the PKK and the Kurdish question in Turkey.

Clues about U.S. policy can be found in the annual reports on human rights prepared by the State Department. These reports showed a perceptible rise in the level of criticism directed at Ankara during the 1980s. In 1982 there were just two sentences devoted to the Kurds in the report. In 1987, however, the report spoke of a "rebellion" in southeastern Turkey. In the February 1988 report it was possible to discern a change in U.S. policy. The report stated that it had always been the aim of Turkish governments to assimilate within the fabric of Turkish society those elements that came from non-Turkish ethnic roots. In this report, the Kurds were referred to as a minority for the first time. If the Kurds continued to be denied their linguistic and cultural rights, the report claimed, they would create more problems, and their rebellion would spread (Country Reports on Human Rights Practices for 1988, Department of State, Washington, D.C., February 1989, p. 1208).

In addition to these reports, the pronouncements of U.S. officials were also disturbing Turkey. For example, the counselor of the U.S. Embassy in Ankara declared that the PKK should be treated according to the 1949 Geneva Conventions on the Rules of War (Box 6-9). In its contacts with the Turkish government on the subject of human rights, the U.S. State Department referred to the need for the Kurds to enjoy the rights of minorities contained in the Helsinki Final Act of 1975. Previously Turkey had also been irked by Jalal Talabani's contacts with State Department officials in April 1988. The reason why the U.S. showed an increased interest in the Kurdish question was the approaching end of the Iran-Iraq War. The U.S. wanted to fill the power vacuum that would emerge in northern Iraq. But this renewed U.S. interest in the Kurdish question did not go unnoticed in Ankara.

Turkish public opinion was incensed over the growing U.S. interest in the general Kurdish question and especially in the Kurdish question within Turkey. The tenor of official Turkish statements, however, was more moderate. The MFA merely declared that the contents of the February 1988 report, coming from an ally, were found to be disturbing. But undisclosed sources made statements to the press that were much harsher, saying that the report was prepared in Turkey and bitterly criticizing the U.S. stance.

At this time the Armenian bills were also on the agenda of U.S.-Turkish relations, so bilateral relations clearly were going through a period of severe turbulence.

The question of whether the U.S. had a policy toward the Kurds of Turkey in the 1980s should be considered in the context of the international conditions of that day. At a time when the USSR maintained its existence, it would be illogical to conclude that the U.S. would pursue policies that might lead to the breakup of Turkey. The policy of the U.S. was not to set up an independent Kurdish state in the Middle East but to use the Kurds as pawns to help it control developments in the region.

U.S. policy on this issue was to become clearer in the 1990s as a consequence of international and regional developments.

c. Economic Relations

Economic and especially trade relations between Turkey and the U.S. during the 1980s did not correspond to the close political relations. The export-led growth model launched on 24 January 1980 with the backing of the U.S. and other Western countries and their financial institutions allowed Turkey to seek new markets for its growing exports.

In this framework, Turkey rediscovered the Middle East as an outlet for its exports. Turkey signed a trade agreement with the USSR, providing for the import of

559

Box 6-9. The Geneva Conventions on the Rules of War (1949) and the PKK

The 1949 Geneva Conventions contain the rules that must be observed by combatants in time of armed conflicts. The first three relate to the protection of the wounded or III on land and sea as well as the protection of prisoners of war, while the fourth relates to the protection of civilians. All four conventions have a common article 2, which declares that these rules shall apply in all declared wars and armed conflicts among two or more states that are parties to the conventions.

There are also two annexed protocols concluded in 1977. The second annexed protocol extended these rules to internal armed conflicts. Turkey is a party to the four Geneva Conventions concluded in 1949 but is not a signatory of the 1977 annexes.

The 1949 conventions did not cover internal armed conflicts but specified that the humanitarian rules contained in article 3 common to all conventions would also apply in internal conflicts. Article 3 contains the following provisions. "In armed conflicts arising within a contracting party and not having an international character, the parties to the conflict shall observe these rules as a minimum. Those who have laid down their arms and those who are no longer able to fight because of illness or injuries or detention or for any other reason, as well as those who are not directly involved in hostilities, shall-be accorded humane treatment in all circumstances without regard to their race, color, or creed, to their sex, background, or wealth, or to any other similar criterion." Accordingly, the following actions were proscribed: violence directed at an individual's person or life, cruel treatment, torture, holding for ransom, attacks against a person's dignity, humiliating or degrading treatment, or the imposition of any punishment not decreed by a properly constituted court. The minimum protection to be accorded by a contracting party in whose territory there was an armed conflict not of an international nature would be at the level specified in this article.

The Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) claimed until the end of 1990s that it should enjoy the status of combatant in accordance with the 1949 Conventions. This claim was based on two premises:

first, that there was an ongoing armed conflict, and second, that PKK cadres were treated as enemies (www.kurdish_info.net/modules.php?name_News&file=article&sid=2344). Turkey never accepted this claim, however, and kept its struggle in the framework of combat against terrorism.

The most important development concerning the definition of an armed conflict was during the Tadic Case of the International Criminal Tribunal for Yugoslavia (ICTY) in 1995. The ICTY stipulated that there is an armed conflict.

whenever, there is a resort to armed force between States or protracted armed violence between governmental authorities and organized armed groups or between such groups within a state. International humanitarian law applies from the initiation of such armed conflicts and extends beyond the cessation of hostilities until a general conclusion of peace is reached, or, in the case of internal conflicts, a peaceful settlement is achieved. Until that moment, international humanitarian law continues to apply in the whole territory of the warring States or, in the case of internal conflicts, the whole territory under the control of a party, whether or not actual combat takes place there. (Decision of 2 October 1995 in Case No. IT-94-1-AR72, 35 ILM [1996] 32)

Because there is no combatant status in noninternational armed conflicts, the applicable international humanitarian law consists of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions where applicable, and customary international humanitarian law, as well as applicable domestic and international human rights law providing for rights of detainees in relation to treatment conditions, and due process.

(F. Keskin)

Soviet natural gas against the sale of Turkish products and contracting services. Turkey also sought to take advantage of the vast possibilities of the U.S. market by placing trade relations with that country on a new basis that would also allow more American capital to flow to Turkey and make it possible to develop joint ventures.

As of the mid-1980s the Özal government sought to change the nature of relations with the U.S. With the backing of the business community, it pursued a policy that sought to replace aid with trade. The approach consisted of reducing U.S. aid and compensating for this reduction with a greater volume of trade. Turkey wanted to take advantage of the huge capacity of the U.S. market to absorb a vast range of goods. Turkey wanted to balance its trade with the U.S., which was consistently showing a deficit. Finally, Turkey also wanted to diversify its relations with the U.S. by introducing a new dimension to the essentially political-strategic character of its relations.

As Turkey expanded its trade with the U.S., it would require less aid from that source and from international institutions. This policy of greater international interaction and building up of exports also enjoyed the support of the U.S.

Özal visited the U.S. in March 1985 in the company of a large number of businessmen. This visit had economic as well as political significance. It was on this occasion that the Turkish-American Business Council was established. During the talks, the U.S. administration proposed that the two countries work toward granting each other an open-market status, similar to the existing arrangement between the U.S. and Israel. This kind of relationship with the U.S. would have damaged Turkey's relations with the ECs, however, which had no such arrangement with the U.S. The U.S. initiative produced no results because of reasons such as the MFA's opposition, based on the initiative's failure to meet Turkey's expectations and its

Table 6-5. Turkish-American Trade, 1980–1989 (in million $)

|         | 1980 | 1981 | 1982 | 1983 | 1984  | 1985  | 1986  | 1987  | 1988  | 1989 . |
|---------|------|------|------|------|-------|-------|-------|-------|-------|--------|
| Imports | 442  | 589  | 813  | 695  | 1,073 | 1,150 | 1,176 | 1,365 | 1,519 | 2,094  |
| Exports | 127  | 267  | 251  | 231  | 368   | 506   | 549   | 713   | 760   | 971    |

Source: Deviet Planlama Teşkilatı, Temel Ekonomik Göstergeler (Ankara: Devlet Planlama Teşkilatı): bimonthly reports for May 1981, November 1984, December 1987, and May 1990.
(Table by İlhan Uzgel)

possible harmful effects on Turkey's process of integration with the ECs.

In this process, Turkey was confronted with serious problems in connection with its textile exports to the U.S. This was due to the strong competitive position of Turkish textiles in the U.S. market and the effectiveness of the U.S. textile lobby. Although U.S. officials assured Turkey that they were flexible on all issues other than textiles, the administration launched antidumping proceedings against Turkish iron and steel products and maintained quotas on certain food items, such as pasta.

In applying quotas to Turkish products, the U.S. was basing itself on legislation that placed a ceiling of an annual increase of 30% in the import of a given product from a specific country. Although Turkish products accounted for only 1% of America's imports, they were limited by quotas because there were annual increases in excess of 30% in their sales in the U.S. market. This made Turkey the sole NATO country to which the U.S. applied quota restrictions, even as Turkey imported twice as much from the U.S. as it sold to that country.

Özal had set a target to bring Turkey's trade relations with the U.S. to the level of its trade with the Middle East or the EEC countries. He considered it anomalous that Turkey's export to the U.S. should amount to only 10% of its exports to the EEC market even though the populations of the two were roughly similar and that, while South Korea exported $10 billion worth of goods to the U.S., Turkey's exports amounting to only $400 million should be restricted by quotas. Özal even tried to use political cards in the negotiations over trade. For instance, he proposed at the negotiations for the extension of the DECA that Turkey be accorded most-favored-nation status and that its products should enjoy unrestricted access to the U.S. market. In addition, Özal suggested at the NATO summit in Brussels in March 1986 that the alliance implement article 2 of the treaty, which read: "member states shall endeavor to eliminate conflicts in their economic policies and encourage economic cooperation with one another."

Not only was Turkey unable to achieve a breakthrough in its trade relations with the U.S. in the 1980s, but it also had difficulty in attracting U.S. investments. In July 1985 the Turkish-U.S. Investments Agreement was signed. This agreement was designed to facilitate U.S. investments by guaranteeing that there would be no expropriation, that bureaucratic formalities would be reduced, and that new taxes would not be imposed. Despite Özal's personal appeals and the assurances of the business community and the favorable legislation introduced, U.S. capital was reluctant to invest in Turkey apart from some investments in the defense sector. Nevertheless, the U.S. was the largest foreign investor in Turkey during the 1980s in terms of the capital involved.

In summary, in its economic relations with Turkey the U.S. was inconsistent with its promotion of free trade policies. On the one hand it was urging Turkey to liberalize its economy and lower its customs barriers, while on the other hand it was applying quotas to Turkey's exports and violating its own principles when importing Turkish goods. As a consequence, the more Turkey opened up its economy, the more its trade deficit with the U.S. grew (Table 6-5).

The reason why the U.S., with its dynamic economy, would apply restrictions on Turkey's export products was political rather than economic. The U.S. was reluctant to change the nature of its bilateral relations based on strategic cooperation, which had been established following World War II, even if this contradicted the principles of economic liberalization that it defended. That is why the formula of "less aid, more trade" adopted by Özal and the Turkish business community was not found acceptable by the U.S. If bilateral trade increased and U.S. aid decreased, U.S. leverage over Turkey would decrease and perhaps lose its effectiveness altogether. The U.S. preferred to see Turkey, located in the Middle East and a neighbor of the USSR, as a strategic ally rather than as an equal trading partner. For this reason, Özal was unable to carry out his project of diversifying Turkey's relations with the U.S.

Box 6-10. Developments in NATO's Strategy in the 1980s

The strategic environment of the 1980s included two salient features. First, the USSR had a superiority in conventional weapons and appeared to have the strategic initiative. Second was the concern that NATO's nuclear deterrent might have lost some of its credibility. Tensions in a bipolar world were also increased by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979 and its increased military presence in the eastern Mediterranean. All of these developments made it necessary to review NATO's strategies (see Box 4-10 in Section 4).

The main issues of the day were the following.

1. Increased military spending and discord between Europe and the U.S.: the Reagan administration pursued a tougher policy line toward the USSR and intensified its defense buildup efforts at a time when the forces in Europe against heavy spending on arms and especially against nuclear weapons were gaining in Strength. The Reagan administration was urging the European allies to shoulder their fair share of the burden, with a target of 3% of each nation's GNP to be devoted to defense spending. At the same time, U.S. moves to develop the neutron bomb and SDI were facing increasing European opposition. These U.S. actions had been taken without consulting Europe and would diminish or eliminate U.S. vulnerability to surprise attack, thereby decoupling the U.S. from Europe. The Western Europeans distanced themselves from U.S. policies that they considered to be harmful to their interests.

 The deployment of intermediate-range nuclear missiles in Europe: in response to the development of SS-20 nuclear missiles by the USSR in the 1970s, MATO undertook the deployment of 572 Pershing II and Cruise nuclear missiles in Europe starting in 1983. Notwithstanding the strong protests of the antinuclear lobbies, each outmoded nuclear warhead that was dismantled was replaced with one of the newer weapons.

3. Changes in NATO's flexible-response strategy: as a result of advances in technology, it became possible to inflict substantial damage on military targets without resorting to nuclear weapons at an early stage. As a consequence, NATO developed a new strategy, starting in the 1980s, that emphasized greater flexibility. In the event of an attack by the Warsaw Pact, there would be more emphasis on defense with conventional weapons and nuclear weapons would be resorted to at a later stage. This doctrine was developed for the U.S. army by Gen. Bernard W. Rogers as Airland Battle 2000 and adopted by the NATO defense ministers in November 1984. This doctrine almed at pushing the battle front into Warsaw Pact territory to a depth of 150 to 300 kilometers by destroying enemy backup forces. The plan was known as FOFA (Follow on Forces Attack).

Europeans were not very happy with these decisions made within the framework of NATO, although they had given their consent. Increased flexibility meant that the nuclear threshold would be reached at a later stage by the U.S. Hence a conventional war would be waged on European soil for a longer time. Furthermore, forward defense and its derivative FOFA meant that NATO's strategy, which had been based on defense, was acquiring a more aggressive character.

(İ. UZGEL)

IV. NATO, TURKEY, AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF DEFENSE INDUSTRIES IN THE 1980S

A. Changes in NATO's Strategy during the 1980s and Their Effects on Turkey

Turkey's cordial relations with the U.S. during the 1980s had an effect on its position within NATO. On strategic matters, relations were conducted bilaterally without having to go through NATO. The first example of this was the handling of the Rogers Plan. During Özal's term in office, however, despite the closeness of relations with the U.S. and Turkey's improved strategic position as a result of the developments in Iran and Afghanistan, there were disagreements in matters relating to relations with NATO. During this period, when Washington was pursuing a policy of applying increasing pressure on the USSR, NATO's priorities, based on developments in defense strategy, did not always correspond to Turkey's expectations. In fact these priorities often conflicted with Turkey's foreign policy and its strategic objectives.

Relations with NATO during this period revolved around issues such as new approaches to NATO strategies, the nuclear weapons threatening Turkey, NATO's attitude to the problems in the Aegean between Turkey and Greece, the Mersin crisis, and the doubts about the security that NATO provided to Turkey.

In its dealings with NATO, Turkey took advantage of the fact that decisions in the alliance were made by consensus. It was this procedure that allowed Turkey to block Greece's return to the military structure of NATO until the time of the 12 September coup. Obviously, this advantage could not be used in the case of every issue. Although Turkey had the power of veto on all decisions, the U.S. and NATO had more and effective countervailing political and economic tools at their disposal.

NATO strategies in the 1980s needed to be revised due to developments in the international system, technological progress, the policies of the Reagan administration, and the emplacement of Soviet missiles in the Middle East and Eastern Europe (Box 6-10). These revisions directly affected Turkey, as the member with the longest border with the USSR.

Flexible Response and Turkey

The first development affecting Turkey within this framework was the increased options of "flexible response." In this context, delay in resorting to nuclear weapons by NATO was a development that would work against the interests of a flank country like Turkey. The new strategy would lead Thrace, the Black Sea region, and eastern Anatolia to become battlegrounds of conventional forces. A limited aggression from NATO's perspective would be total war for Turkey, which did not have the capacity to push the front forward onto Bulgarian or Soviet soil. Because Thrace was flat and its territory was limited, there was a danger that the fighting would quickly spread all the way to the Turkish Straits.

For the new strategies to be applicable, Turkey's conventional force would need to be reinforced and modernized. But Turkey's expectations in this respect were not adequately met by either NATO or the U.S. in the 1980s.

The Question of Turkey Assuming Additional Nuclear Obligations

The second question affecting Turkey was the NATO decision regarding the deployment of nuclear weapons. In October 1983 NATO defense ministers decided in their meeting at Montebello unilaterally to remove 1,400 short-range missiles from the central front in Europe and to make up for this by reinforcing the flanks. This would be done by deploying medium-range missiles along the flanks and replacing existing short-range missiles with newer versions.

Starting in the mid-1980s, U.S. and NATO officials began to press Turkey to assume additional nuclear obligations. NATO's supreme commander Rogers came to Turkey in April 1985 and proposed that, in accordance with the Montebello decision, the short-range Honest John missiles in Turkey be replaced by Lance II missiles with a range of 400 kilometers. Furthermore, he called for increasing the nuclear capability of combat aircraft in Turkey. Rogers also wanted to increase the 200 or so nuclear warheads that were already deployed in Turkey.

The justification for the Rogers proposals was that the signing of the INF Treaty between the U.S. and the USSR on the total elimination of intermediate-range nuclear weapons in 1987 made it necessary to fill the void created by the agreement by deploying short-range missiles and nuclear artillery in a flank country like Turkey.

But Ankara refused to undertake additional nuclear responsibilities. General Rogers's proposals were turned down on five grounds.

- 1. Since 1970 Turkey had favored maintaining the status quo with respect to the nuclear weapons on its soil and would not contemplate a change in their number.
- 2. Turkey did not want to provoke the USSR. To replace the nuclear missiles already on its soil with more modern versions or to increase their quantity would only draw more Soviet pressure on Ankara.

- 3. The Özal government was eager to develop economic relations with the USSR. Turkish contractors had undertaken projects in the Soviet Union, and the agreement for the import of Soviet natural gas in return for the sale of Turkish goods had been concluded.
- 4. With the proposed additional nuclear obligations, Turkey would be more likely to become a nuclear battle-field in the event of war.
- 5. The deployment of new missiles in Turkey would enhance Turkey's nuclear capability, which could lead NATO members to lose interest in the modernization of the Turkish army. For Turkey, however, the threat to its security was not confined to the Warsaw Pact. Ankara was anxious to have conventional forces that were modern and effective.

The Reduction in International Tension and the Question of the Reliability of NATO

Another problem in Turkish relations with NATO arose when reports started to circulate concerning Turkey's position and status in the alliance. Arguments centered around the question of the extent to which NATO would help defend Turkey in the event of an attack. In an interview with Sedat Ergin of the newspaper Hürriyet on 29 November 1987, the former supreme commander of NATO forces, General Rogers, expressed his doubts about whether some northern European member countries would come to Turkey's aid in the event of a Soviet attack in eastern Anatolia. At about the same time, the Turkish press reported that about five to ten Soviet SS-20 missiles were locked onto targets in Turkey. The Long-Term Strategy Report submitted to Reagan in January 1988 stated that some NATO allies were reluctant to come to Turkey's aid in case of need. True, NATO's new supreme commander, John Galvin, announced that NATO would come to Turkey's defense, but this reassurance was not enough to dissipate the existing apprehension. These arguments came at a time when Turkey was being asked to assume additional nuclear burdens and the ratification of DECA was being held up. This created the suspicion in Turkey that "they are trying to scare us into accepting their demands." The perception was gaining ground that NATO membership was not a means to protect Turkey but rather an instrument to coerce Turkey. This was a time (1987) when pressure on Turkey over the Cyprus question was on the increase and the Armenian bills were being resurrected.

An overall assessment shows that, for a long time, Turkey's defense policy was being formulated within the framework of NATO. In this planning framework, even tactical changes were difficult to carry out. Turkey was a flank country and shared a border with the USSR. Geographically, it did not constitute a strategic whole with other NATO members. In the context of NATO's changing strategic approach, it was expected that Turkey would be engaged in a more intense conventional-type war. Given the flexible response strategy and the higher threshold for nuclear engagement, this meant the Turkish army would bear the brunt of an attack; "forward defense" would not work in this theater, which would result in Thrace and eastern Anatolia becoming battlefields and being devastated. At a time when Turkey was having to consider these possibilities, NATO was not being helpful in modernizing the Turkish army and the U.S. was attaching political strings to its aid.

B. The Out-of-Area Issue and Turkey

The out-of-area issue arises from the need for NATO to take measures with respect to events taking place outside NATO's area of defense responsibility because the events in question directly affect the interests of member countries (see Box 4-9 in Section 4).

After the developments in Afghanistan and Iran, the U.S. declared that security questions could not be confined to a specific area and that the security risks originating in the Middle East posed a serious threat to the vital interests of the West. The U.S. wanted NATO to include these regions within its defense planning and called on its European allies to share the financial and military burdens arising from this extension.

This question was taken up in the Defense Planning Committee at the level of defense ministers with the participation of foreign ministers on May 1980. At the Bonn summit in June 1982, it was decided that the allies would consult, help, and compensate one another in connection with out-of-area issues.

But the U.S. approach never received full acceptance from the allies. The Europeans favored defining their security in narrower terms and were against extending their commitments to questions beyond Europe.

The countries of Western Europe were concerned that, if NATO extended its area of responsibility beyond Europe, the resources needed to defend central Europe might be reallocated to these new areas. This would also entail increases in defense spending. That is why decisions on this issue were left to the discretion of individual countries. Contributions to out-of-area operations would not be based on prior commitments, as proposed by the U.S., but would be left to the discretion of individual allies, which would make their decisions on a case-by-case basis.

The out-of-area issue, especially as it related to the Middle East, was of crucial importance for Turkey. This question had come up in connection with the facilities that would be accorded to the U.S. RDF, and Turkey adopted a line that conformed to the approach of its European allies. Turkey was ready to consult and provide facilities as foreseen in NATO decisions and agreed to by the Europeans but was not ready to enter into specific commitments in advance. It adopted this line because, unlike the other allies, it was located in the Middle East. Turkey also emphasized the need for increased Western deterrence in the region through the modernization of the Turkish armed forces.

This subject would be overtaken by events when NATO reappraised its role following the developments of the 1990s. NATO decided that it would intervene in regional crises located outside the territories of its members.

C. The Question of Lemnos

The question of the Greek island of Lemnos posed a dilemma for NATO. The organization's approach to Turkish-Greek relations in the 1980s and its strategic interests were in conflict.

The question arose when Greece gave notice that it would assign a brigade to NATO and, along with units of its air force, deploy this force in Lemnos in the event of war. This meant that Greece was militarizing Lemnos (which had been demilitarized by international treaties) and, furthermore, was seeking to get NATO sanction for its action. This caused an angry reaction in Turkey.

Naturally, NATO's action became crucial in this situation. Turkey insisted that treaties be respected. But, although it was not stated openly, NATO favored including Lemnos in defense plans designed to contain the USSR. Accordingly, pressure was applied on Turkey to make concessions. The U.S. also had designated Lemnos as one of the centers for deploying reinforcements that would be brought in from across the ocean in the event of war and was counseling flexibility to Turkey. Turkey stood its ground, however, and warned that it would veto the proposed plan if the issue appeared on NATO's agenda.

NATO's secretary-general, Lord Peter Carrington, declared on 29 November 1984 that NATO must remain neutral on the issue of Lemnos. By not opposing a course that was a violation of international treaties, however, the secretary-general of NATO was revealing his partiality on this issue.

The question of Lemnos was on the agenda of NATO's Defense Planning Committee when it met in Brussels on 3 to 5 December 1984. At the meeting, the report on the alliance's defense plans for 1985 and the attached country chapters was adopted, but without the chapters for Greece and Turkey. The force levels of the two countries were also not included in the report. Turkey announced that its national responsibilities would be honored and that it would continue to participate in NATO exercises, but Greece declared that it would stay away from exercises. The press release issued after the meeting made no mention of Lemnos, which, from the Turkish point of view, was a positive outcome.

In May 1986 Greece reversed its position on NATO's decision to resume the production of chemical weapons and declared that it would lift its reservation if, in turn, Turkey lifted its reservation on the subject of Lemnos. The program was considered important by U.S. and NATO officials, who once again pressed Turkey rather than Greece to show flexibility.

As a compromise, Lord Carrington proposed that Lemnos not be mentioned in the document on force goals. Instead there would only be a sentence in the NATO decision document declaring that "the views of the Turkish and Greek representatives on the subject of Lemnos were heard" (Güldemir 1991, p. 132). This paved the way for Lemnos to appear in a NATO document, even if only indirectly.

While U.S. officials were pursuing their contacts on the subject in Ankara, Greece lifted its reservation on chemical weapons. In view of Ankara's rigid position, the U.S. sought an alternative course and reached an agreement with Greece on allowing American aircraft to use Lemnos in the event of a crisis. In this way, the U.S. overcame Turkey's opposition and got its way on an issue on which Turkey had the right of veto within NATO.

The Negotiations on the Reduction of Conventional Forces in Europe and the Mersin Crisis

Throughout the 1980s the twenty-three members of NATO and the Warsaw Pact were engaged in negotiations on the reduction of conventional forces in Europe. Toward the end of the 1980s considerable progress had been made in the negotiations, thanks to the changes occurring in the Eastern Bloc and the reduction of international tensions. Turkey wanted to make sure that the reduction of forces by the USSR in central Europe would not lead to the redeployment of these forces to its border. Furthermore, Turkey wanted to exempt the region of southeastern Anatolia, including Mersin, from force reductions because this region was bordering Turkey's Middle Eastern neighbors that would not be reducing their conventional forces. Turkey had obtained the consent of the USSR on this matter, and the other NATO allies raised no objections.

In January 1989 the draft agreement prepared by the sixteen NATO members was ready for submission to the Warsaw Pact when Greece claimed that Mersin should be left out of the region that would be exempt from force reductions because the military forces in Mersin constituted a threat to Cyprus and the port was being used as a supply base for the Turkish forces in Cyprus. At this time, the U.S. was negotiating an agreement on bases with Greece, and Athens wanted to have a provision inserted by which the U.S. would give Greece a guarantee against Turkey. The objection to Mersin was raised in order to strike a bargain on the guarantee.

The U.S. was eager to have the force agreement concluded and was aware of the difficulty of persuading Papandreou, so secretary of state George Shultz bypassed the minister of foreign affairs and tried to solve the question directly with Özal. The Turkish MFA proposed a formula by which Mersin would be removed from the draft agreement and replaced with the phrase "a line descending from Gözne to the sea" on the understanding that the U.S., the USSR, Britain, France, and Germany would send a letter to Turkey stating that by this formula they understood "a line joining the sea at Erdemli" and therefore including the port of Mersin. This formula was eventually agreed to, but in March 1989 the U.S. gave this phrase a more flexible interpretation by stating that the question would be solved later in a manner that would give both sides satisfaction.

Meanwhile the Greek DECA was concluded, with the preamble containing the following provision: "The USA and Greece guarantee to defend one another's sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity against armed attacks and threats endangering peace." This caused a sharp Turkish reaction, so President Bush sent a letter to Ankara declaring that the guarantee given to Greece did not encompass Turkey. But as a result of all this the U.S. had agreed to the insertion of a phrase in the agreement indirectly suggesting a Turkish threat, when it was already committed to defending Greece by virtue of its obligations within NATO.

E. The Modernization of the Turkish Armed Forces and the Development of Defense Industries

The subject of the modernization of the Turkish armed forces has always been dealt with in the context of relations with the U.S., because the armed forces were using mostly American equipment. U.S. officials were convinced that Turkey must have a strong army in the conditions of the Cold War. The interests of Turkey, located

Table 6-6. Turkey's Defense Expenditures, 1980-1989 (as percentage of GNP)

| 1980 | 1981 | 1982 | 1983 | 1984 | 1985 | 1986 | 1987 | 1988 1989 |
|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|-----------|
| 4.3  | 4.9  | 5.2  | 4.8  | 4.4  | 4.5  | 4.8  | 4.2  | 3.8       |

Source: Sipri Yearbook (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990). (Table by İlhan Uzgel)

in an unstable region, and those of the U.S. were convergent. A Joint Defense Industries Steering Committee had been set up to develop defense cooperation. According to a Pentagon study conducted in 1983, it would require $18 billion and roughly ten years to bring the Turkish armed forces up to NATO standards.

The main issue was finding the necessary resources for this modernization. Turkey held the view that an effective Turkish army would contribute directly to NATO's security and called on its allies, and especially the U.S., to contribute to the effort. Although this was a technical question, it also had political overtones because of the obstacles placed by the U.S. Congress.

At the time, there were two possible courses for the modernization of the Turkish army. One was for the U.S., and to a lesser extent Germany, to transfer to Turkey their surplus weapons systems without demanding payment or to provide loans to Turkey so that it could purchase these weapons. The other course was for Turkey to set up its own defense industries. During the 1980s the U.S. helped Turkey in both respects, even if Ankara viewed this as insufficient. We have already examined direct U.S. military assistance, so at this point we shall only consider the U.S. contribution to the development of Turkey's defense industries and its effects on bilateral relations.

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s Turkey was among the NATO countries with the highest defense spending as a proportion of national income and was one of the five largest purchasers of arms (Table 6-6).

Turkey's defense spending during the 1980s reached an average of less than 5% of its GNP. This level of spending placed it in third position after the U.S. and Greece. This of course had very negative effects on the Turkish economy, which was chronically short of resources.

The reasons for this heavy spending were the military operations that Turkey had to conduct in its southeastern region as well as from time to time in northern Iraq and especially the arms race with Greece.

Turkey had a number of reasons for wanting to develop domestic defense industries. The main reason was the need to achieve a measure of self-sufficiency. The U.S. arms embargo from 1975 to 1978 had taught Ankara a good lesson. Even if the likelihood of Turkey being subjected to a similar long-term embargo was remote, difficulties in arms procurement on account of Cyprus and the Kurdish question and conditions placed on their sale made it essential to develop national capabilities. Turkey's periodic foreign exchange shortages also compelled Ankara to move in a direction that would allow arms procurement without having recourse to foreign exchange. If the products of defense industries could find foreign buyers, this would also allow Turkey to earn foreign exchange. In addition to these reasons, the development of defense industries would accelerate the introduction of advanced technologies.

The first attempt at creating a national defense industry goes back to the period between the two world wars when the short-lived Kayseri Airplane Factory was established. After 1945 there were some small steps like the establishment of the Makina ve Kimya Endüstrisi Kurumu (MKE: Machinery and Chemicals Industries Enterprise), but the effort faltered once the delivery of arms from the U.S. started in a big way after membership in NATO. The effort was resumed after the U.S. arms embargd. The "National Defense Doctrine" formulated in 1978 by the Ecevit government had, as one of its main pillars, the development of a national defense industry (see Box 5-8 in Section 5). But Turkey's political and economic instability in the late 1970s prevented the implementation of the new approach. The matter was taken up once again after the coup of 12 September 1980, and the General Directorate of Ordnance was established within the Ministry of National Defense in April 1983. At the end of 1985 this office became the Agency for Developing and Supporting Defense Industries, which in turn became the Undersecretariat of Defense Industries in 1989.

Previously, foundations had been set up to strengthen the three services through public fundraising. In 1987 these three foundations were merged to become the Foundation for Developing the Turkish Armed Forces. In addition, a Fund for Supporting Defense Industries was also set up in that year. A ten-year defense program was launched in 1985.

There were three important aspects to Turkey's efforts to develop a defense industry. One was the joint production undertaken in the early 1980s with financial backing from certain Middle Eastern countries and technological support from the U.S. A second was the bold effort to produce the F-16 combat aircraft. Finally, an effort was made to involve the fast-developing Turkish private sector to a greater extent in the establishment of defense industries.

Defense Industries and the Middle East

At a time when defense industries were being built up, it was important for Turkey to gain export markets in oilrich countries like Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, and Qatar. This policy of developing new markets was actively supported by the U.S. Under this scheme, the U.S. would be indirectly helping these countries in their rearmament efforts while at the same time contributing to Turkey's efforts to establish closer ties with them. Turkey knew that industries whose products could only be sold to the Turkish armed forces would not be economically viable. In the early 1980s agreements were signed with these countries under which MKE would sell them ammunition. This cooperation was not confined to the sale of military equipment. Starting in 1984, a Turkish military mission that included air force pilots undertook the training of military personnel in Saudi Arabia. During this time there was a sharp increase in military contacts with Saudi Arabia. As political and economic relations with Middle Eastern countries expanded, a similar expansion occurred in military cooperation.

The F-16 Project

This $8 billion project, which got underway in 1983, was the main pillar of Turkey's effort to create a defense industry. The aim of the project was to equip the air force with F-16-type combat aircraft while establishing an aerospace industry in Turkey. This work was entrusted to Tusaş (Turkish Aeronautical Industry Corporation), which had been operating in the field since 1973. In this framework, an agreement was signed on 2 May 1984 by the minister of defense and the representative of the U.S. firm General Dynamics to establish TAI (Tusaş Aerospace Industry). Turkey was to own 51% of TAI's shares and General Dynamics 49%. To manufacture the engines for these aircraft, a partnership, TEI (Tusaș Engine Industries), was set up with General Electric and became a partner of TAI. In the first phase of the project, known as Peace Onyx I, 160 aircraft would be built. Production started in February 1987 with the assembly of aircraft at the TAI factory, and the first delivery was made to the Turkish Air Force in November 1987.

Actual manufacturing began in 1989. In addition, under a direct offset program, TAI began to manufacture F-16 parts for the U.S. Air Force and for an assembly plant located in Belgium. This production run went on until 1995, when a total of 152 F-16s had been produced.

Ü

Turkey's main problem in establishing a national defense industry was obtaining the transfer of technology and securing the financial resources. Turkey had acquired considerable experience in this field with the operations of MKE and the existing munitions factories and shipyards. To produce high-tech equipment, however, Turkey needed joint production ventures with the U.S. and others and/or financial aid and technical know-how from abroad.

The degree to which these efforts led to a national industry remained moot. Turkey was able to carry out an important project like the manufacture of the F-16, but the old dependency on the U.S. for arms was replaced with the dependency for essential aircraft parts, which had to be procured from the U.S. This was vividly demonstrated when the U.S. created difficulties in connection with the adjustments of the avionics that went into the F-16s and the delivery of their radars.

Another problem was high cost. Although the American sale price of an F-16 was $17 million, it cost $25 million to produce the same aircraft in Turkey. This price would go even higher for the aircraft models equipped with advanced technology and combat systems that were manufactured in the second production run.

Despite these drawbacks, major projects like the F-16 did make it possible to acquire advanced skills and technological know-how.

The Turkish Private Sector and Defense Industries

Özal was in contact with leading U.S. defense industries and seeking to induce foreign investors to invest in Turkey at a time when they displayed scant interest in civilian industries in the country. He declared that the government should not interfere in the operations of such investors. The U.S. administration had stated that it supported such collaboration in principle. U.S. defense industries were seeking an eight-year guarantee for their investments and said that they had no assurance that their operations would be able to continue when the Özal government left office. But the real snag was that the U.S. was not all that interested in engaging in joint production, with all of the attendant political and economic risks, in a country to which it was already selling large quantities of arms.

Despite this, the Koç group, as well as Alarko, Profilo, Nurol, and Tekfen (all big Turkish companies), displayed interest in this sector. These activities also attracted the attention of European defense producers. In May 1986 the representatives of the French firm Aérospatial visited Turkey and met with Özal. This was followed by the visits of a British delegation and of the French minister of defense.

Özal's efforts to replace state enterprises in this sector with private industries did not bear fruit. Led by Tusaş-TAI, enterprises like Aselsan (Askeri Elektronik Sanayii: Military Electronics Industries), MKE, PETLAS, and the Gölcük and Taşkızak shipyards with their increased capacities constituted tangible evidence that the bulk of defense industries in Turkey remained publicly owned.

Throughout the 1980s the U.S. remained the dominant factor in Turkey in the field of defense.

To sum up, in the 1980s Turkish-U.S. relations were flourishing, but only on the surface. The two allies had many differences in their political, military-strategic, economic, and trade relations. The questions of Turkish-Greek relations and Cyprus, the Armenian bills, the Kurdish question, and aid were fields in which both sides were seeking to extract major concessions from their partner. The two countries had a complete identity of views on some issues, such as the Iranian revolution, but this was the exception rather than the rule.

As a superpower, the U.S. had much more leverage vis-à-vis Turkey and, when necessary, did not hesitate to use this leverage. It would be wrong to qualify Turkey as a country under the influence of the U.S., however, with Turkish foreign and domestic policy dictated by Washington. To cite some examples, despite the pressure it applied, the U.S. was not able to persuade Turkey to allow it to install additional nuclear weapons on Turkish soil. The U.S. was not able to resolve the question of Cyprus even though it was able to count on Özal's support. On the out-of-area question and the Rapid Deployment Force, the U.S. was not able to secure all that it sought from Turkey. This was because the U.S. did not want to lose an important ally like Turkey; nor did it want to alienate the Turkish public completely. So there was a certain balance in the relations between the two countries, with mutual concessions made to allow for sensitivities. A relationship where only the U.S. had its way would not have been in the interest of the U.S. itself.

In the early 1980s the relations of the U.S. with the military junta were very close, and this situation continued during the Özal period. More problems started emerging toward the end of the 1980s, however. Starting in 1985 and especially after the signing of the INF agreement in 1987, international tension began to ease off. In addition, Turkey's economic performance lost its luster, and by 1988 there was a payments crisis brought on by excessive foreign indebtedness. This allowed the U.S. to wield greater influence in its bilateral relations with Turkey.

Numerous developments indicated that the U.S. position had shifted. Until after the mid-1980s the U.S. administration had lobbied to prevent the Armenian bills from being adopted by Congress. At the end of the decade it adopted a passive stance and even made statements supporting the bills. A more critical approach to Turkey became apparent on issues like the Kurdish question and human rights. The amount of U.S. military and economic aid diminished, while its terms became more onerous. The U.S. was applying more pressure on both Turkey and Denktaş over the question of Cyprus. While early in the decade the U.S. did not agree with Papandreou's contention that Turkey threatened Greece, toward the end of the decade it acceded to the Greek request to include a guarantee with regard to Turkey in the Greek DECA. Concern began to grow after 1989 that Turkey's place and importance for the U.S. and the West in general were waning.

İlhan Uzgel

Sources (Relations with the USA and NATO)

Ambrose, Stephen. Dünyaya Açılım (original title: Rise to Globalism: American Foreign Policy since 1938 [New York: Penguin, 1997]). Trans. Ruhican Tul Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, 1991.

Armaoğlu, Fahir. Belgelerle Türk-Amerikan Münasebetleri. Ankara: TTK, 1991.

Atalay, Safa. "ABD Güvenlik Yardımı, ABD-Türkiye İlişkileri." Avrasya Dosyası (Fall 1994): 236–56.

Başara, Levent. "Bir Düşü Gerçekleştirmek." Savunma ve Havacılık 13, no. 5 (1999): 94–96.

Çubukçu, Tuğrul. "Savunma Harcamaları: İç ve Dış Kaynaklar." In Türkiye'nin Savunması, pp. 119–43. Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, 1987

Erbaş, Halit, and Hilmi Çelikoğlu. Gelişen Savunma Stratejileri. Ankara: Kara Harb Okulu, 1991.

Ergüvenç, Şadi. "Türkiye Havacılık Sanayiinin Neresinde?" Savunma ve Havacılık (Aug. – Sept. 1998): 26–31.

Evren, Kenan. Kenan Evren'in Anıları. 2 vols. İstanbul: Milliyet Yayınları, 1991.

Gerges, Fawaz. America and Political Islam. Cambridge/New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.

Güldemir, Ufuk. Çevik Kuvvetin Gölgesinde, İstanbul: Tekin Yavınevi. 1987.

———. Kanat Operasyonu. İstanbul: Tekin Yayınevi, 1985.

——. Texas-Malatya. İstanbul: Tekin Yayınevi, 1991.

Günlük Şenesen, Gülay. "Türk Silahlı Kuvvetlerinin Modernizasyon Programının Bir Değerlendirmesi." In Türk Dış

- Politikasının Analizi, ed. Faruk Sönmezoğlu, pp. 191–203. İstanbul: Der Yayınevi, 1992
- Halliday, Fred. İkinci Soğuk Savaş (original title: The Making of the Second Cold War [London: Verso, 1983]). İstanbul: Belge Yayınları, 1985.
- Harris, George (ed.). The Middle East in Turkish American Relations. Washington, D.C.: Heritage Foundation, 1985.
- Karaosmanoğlu, Ali. "Basra Körfezi Güvenliği ve Doğu Anadolu'daki Havaalanları Tartışması: Yanılgılar ve Kuruntular." Dış Politika 10, no. 1 (1983): 3–9.
- ——. The Middle East, Turkey and the Atlantic Alliance. Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, 1987.
- "Turkey's Security and the Middle East." Foreign Affairs (Fall 1983): 157-75.
- Koniholm, Bruce. "Turkey and NATO: Past, Present, Future." Orbis 27, no. 2 (1983): 421-45.
- Kupchan, Charles. The Persian Gulf and the West. Boston: Allen and Unwin, 1987.

- Laipson, Ellen. "Turkey and the U.S. Congress." In The Middle East in Turkish-American Relations, ed. George Harris. Washington, D.C.: Heritage Foundation, 1985.
- ——. U.S. Interests in the Eastern Mediterranean: Turkey, Greece and Cyprus. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Research Service, 1983.
- Okman, Cengiz. "NATO Stratejileri ve Türkiye Açısından Sonuçları." In Türkiye'nin Savunması, pp. 41–82. Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, 1987
- Oran, Baskın. Kalkık Horoz: Çekiç Güç ve Kürt Devleti. 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi, 1998.
- Soysal, İsmail. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları, Cilt II, 1945–1990. Ankara: Türk Tarih Kurumu, 1991.
- Yavuz, Turan. ABD'nin Kürt Kartı. İstanbul: Milliyet Yayınları,
- Yetkin, Çetin. Türkiye'de Askerî Darbeler ve Amerika. Ankara: Ümit Yayıncılık, 1995.

Relations with the European Communities (ECs)

THE DIFFICULT PERIOD

A. The Military Administration's Efforts to Maintain Ties with the West

Initial European Reaction to the 12 September Coup The coup of 12 September 1980 introduced a period of uncertainty in relations with the European Economic Community (EEC) (Box 6-11). Immediately after the coup, Gen. Kenan Evren declared that relations with the EEC, the Council of Europe, and the other institutions set up by democratic countries would be pursued in conformity with existing agreements. The program of the government of Admiral Ulusu contained the following sentence: "Our relations with the EEC will be directed toward the goal of the Ankara Agreement, which foresees Turkey eventually taking its place within the Community" (Türkiye Büyük Millet Meclisi, p. 10). There were three basic reasons for these overtures toward the ECs by the 12 September regime.

- 1. The coup-makers were well aware that their takeover would only be approved by the international community without too much fuss if it enjoyed Western endorsement. The U.S. stance toward 12 September was not negative. Because it put an end to internal turmoil and strife in an allied country, NATO supported 12 September from the very beginning. But the West for Ankara meant above all Europe, and its attitude was uncertain. An ECs declaration of support for the coup would be a huge relief.
- 2. The coup-makers also needed the economic support of the ECs as much as its political support. The ECs was important for Turkey from the viewpoint of both investments and trade. The new government knew well that the root cause of Turkey's turmoil had been the deteriorating economy. That is why one of the posts of deputy prime minister was assigned to Turgut Özal, the author of the 12 January package of economic measures. The government wanted to reinforce the institutions and implement the rules of the market economy and thereby gain

Box 6-11. Name Changes in the European Economic and Political Integration Process

The main organs of the European Coal and Steel Community, EURATOM, and the European Economic Community were consolidated as of 1 July 1967. After this consolidation, which was termed as "fusion" or "merger," the three communities became the European Communities. The European Economic Community became the European Community under the terms of the Maastricht Treaty Signed on 7 February 1992. The Maastricht Treaty set the goal of political integration in addition to the existing goal of economic integration. The term "European Union (EU)" started being used to denote political integration and all the other dimensions of integration.

In this book, the acronym "EC" is used to denote the European Community, which was called the European Economic Community (EEC) before the Maastricht Treaty (1992), and the acronym "ECS" is used to denote the European Communities, which became known as the European Union after the Maastricht Treaty. In order to remain falthful to sources, no changes have been made to original texts. The reader must bear in mind that all governing bodies of the European Coal and Steel Community, EURATOM, and the European Economic Community were merged in 1967, when the three institutions became known as the European Communities. In 1958, their assemblies were merged into the European Parliament. Also merged were the Council of Justice and, after 1967, the Councils of Ministers and Commission's. At present, the Council of Ministers is the EU Council of Ministers and the Commission is the European Commission (or EU Commission). Summits are called the European Council.

(C. ERHAN)

the support of the West, and in particular the U.S. and the ECs.

3. One of the main elements of Turkey's relations with the ECs was Greece. After the collapse of the junta of colonels in 1974, Greece took important strides in its democratization process and mended its fences with the ECs. After signing the treaty of accession in 1979, Greece had overtaken Turkey once again. In its concern over being left behind by Greece, Turkey needed to maintain good relations with the ECs and take steps to minimize the problems that Greek membership would pose for Turkey. Evren agreed to let Greece return to NATO's military structure within the framework of the Rogers Plan in the expectation that Greece would be more constructive in its bilateral relations and be helpful in allowing Turkey's relations with the ECs to develop.

Although there was no single viewpoint in the ECs regarding the military takeover in Turkey, Ankara was relieved that the statements coming from the members of the ECs were not particularly harsh. Actually, the organization was divided on this issue. One camp led by France, the Netherlands, and Denmark wanted to follow the Greek precedent of 1967 and suspend relations with Turkey. Another group led by Britain and Germany stressed that the democratic system had ceased to function prior to 12 September and that the military had taken power to restore democracy and called for relations with Turkey to continue as usual. This latter view prevailed at the Council of Ministers meeting of the ECs held on 16 September. In the statement issued following the meeting, it was noted that the military had given assurances that democratic institutions would be rapidly restored, human rights would be respected, and politicians under detention would not be mistreated. The ECs stressed that it wanted to see this undertaking carried out. This indicated that the ECs supported the 12 September operation.

A similar division appeared in the European Parliament. When the parliament met on 17 September to consider the situation in Turkey following the coup, the socialist and Communist members called for the immediate suspension of relations with Turkey, while the conservatives and liberals were against this course. The parliament followed the Council of Ministers of the ECs and decided to call for a swift transition to democracy in Turkey.

Public opinion in the ECs took a different view, however: it was overwhelmingly against 12 September and condemned the suspension of multiparty democracy in Turkey. Although this reaction was not taken too seriously by European governments at first, gradually public opinion started making itself felt as the failings of the coup-makers became manifest in the fields of human rights, political rights, and freedoms.

The First Council of Association Meeting after 12 September

Those who carried out the 12 September operation in Turkey were highly satisfied by the moderate reaction of the ECs. But within weeks difficulties began to emerge. The most significant reaction was the decision of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg to impose visas on Turkish citizens in October 1980. These countries were in any case ready to impose visas to keep Turkish workers out but were hesitant because of possible Turkish reaction to what Ankara might consider a violation of the Association Agreement. After 12 September Turkey needed European support and was therefore no longer in a position to protest. Some ECs members took advantage of this new situation to impose visas. This would also serve the purpose of blocking the entry of political refugees fleeing from the repression of the 12 September administration.

In early October Ankara requested a meeting of the Council of Association. One of the organs of the Turkey-EEC association was the Joint Parliamentary Committee, which had been scheduled to meet in İzmir on 22 October 1980. This meeting could not be held, however, because of the dissolution of the TGNA.

When the Council of Association met on 3 December 1980, it did so at the level of ambassadors rather than ministers. This level of representation was not adequate for addressing the question of visas, to which Turkey attributed great importance. Turkey's arguments to the effect that its rights had been violated got a frosty reception. The members of the ECs argued that introducing the visa requirement was in keeping with international law and was not intended to harm Turkey's interests. Turkey returned empty-handed from the first Council of Association meeting after 12 September.

The Consequences of Greek Membership in the ECs for Turkey

When Greece became a full member of the ECs on 1 January 1981, the race between Turkey and Greece, which had been going on since the late 1950s, was settled decisively in Greece's favor. In the years following the signing of the 1963 Ankara Agreement, three new members had been admitted to the ECs (the United Kingdom, Denmark, and Ireland). The mostly economic questions of adjustment arising from this expansion were settled through negotiations with these countries and the ECs. The membership of Greece, however, not only posed minor economic questions of adjustment but signaled the beginning of a new era, when the problems would be of a completely different order of magnitude to be tackled on the basis of different parameters. Greek membership affected Turkey's relations with the ECs in four fundamental ways.

1. Turkey felt that it had been overtaken and the race was lost. There were two alternative paths for Ankara to follow. In the face of anti-Turkish positions that the ECs might adopt with Greece as a member, Turkey could distance itself from the ECs and embark on a new course. Or it could apply for full membership before Greece became fully integrated within the ECs. In the period from 1981 to 1987 Turkey vacillated between these two alternative courses.

- 2. Greece was Turkey's rival not just politically but also commercially. The two countries' export products were in large measure similar. Greece would now enjoy customs-free and quota-free access to the EEC market, which would be to the detriment of Turkey's exports. Furthermore, Greece could now steer the European Communities to take decisions detrimental to Turkey's interests and could block financial cooperation and the provision of loans and grants.
- 3. Greece could now bring contentious issues like Cyprus, minorities, Aegean territorial waters, the continental shelf, airspace, and FIR (Flight Information Region) responsibilities to the agenda of the ECs. As a result, the ECs might apply political or economic pressures on Turkey to secure the settlement of some of these questions.
- 4. With the admission of Greece, an Orthodox country, certain quarters in Western Europe became uncomfortable because of their deep-seated belief that the ECs would group together the countries of the former Holy Roman Empire and that there was no place in this grouping for the Eastern churches. The membership of Greece had made it even more unpalatable for these groups to envisage the membership of Muslim Turkey.

As in the case of previous accessions, it was now necessary for Greece to go through a harmonization procedure in order for it to become a party to the legal undertakings contained in Turkey's agreements with the EEC. The harmonization negotiations began in Brussels on 21 January 1981.

At the negotiations, Turkey's request for additional preferences for its agricultural products got a cool reception from the ECs. Turkey's quotas for certain categories of textile products were raised, however. In addition, on 19 June 1981 the Fourth Financial Protocol, by which Turkey would receive 650 million ECUs (European Currency Units) in aid, was initialed.

In view of Greece's accession to the ECs, the military administration undertook the necessary preparations for Turkey to apply for full membership. Evren and the members of the National Security Council wanted Turkey to catch up with Greece without any delay. Although the veteran Turkish diplomats who had been conducting the negotiations shared this ambition, the State Planning Organization (DPT) raised objections. The administration wanted the MFA to steer the negotiations, and the DPT found itself sidetracked. On 25 March 1981 the NSC decided to undertake the preparations for full membership and gave instructions to carry out a restructuring that would leave the DPT outside the decision-making process (Tekeli and Ilkin, pp. 42–43).

At the meeting of the Council of Association held in Brussels on 5 June 1981, Turkey informed the ECs that it would formally apply for full membership as soon as democracy was restored in the country. The ECs did not respond negatively to this bid because it felt that to do so would only delay a return to democracy. But there was a widely held belief in the capitals of the ECs that an early application without adequate preparation could lead to developments detrimental to Turkey's relations with the ECs.

By the end of 1981 the restructuring ordered by Evren in March had been carried out; but contrary to his instructions, the DPT was assigned a central role in the new structure. A decree was promulgated on 25 December by which the coordination of Turkey's relations with the ECs was entrusted to a committee to be chaired by the DPT. A division responsible for ECs affairs was set up in the DPT. Even the military administration had not been able to overcome the long-standing rivalry arising from turf wars between the MFA and the DPT.

While efforts were being made to end squabbling between institutions, the necessary legislation was being adopted to enable Turkey to gain full membership. The draft Constitution contained the phrase "[s]overeignty belongs to the Turkish nation unconditionally," which had been borrowed directly from the 1961 Constitution.

To this was added the phrase "[t]his principle shall not apply to the provisions of agreements foreseeing membership in organizations with supranational competence." But the NSC removed this second phrase from the draft. The inability to settle the differences between the MFA and the DPT and the failure to establish the legislative basis for membership revealed that Turkey was still not ready to take decisive steps in this direction.

B. Increasing Strains in Relations with the ECs

The relatively lenient approach of the ECs to the coup following 12 September gradually gave way to a much more critical stance in the second half of 1981. This new stance was a reaction to the growing repression of individuals, unions, political parties, associations, and NGOs in Turkey. But in addition to this repression, three other factors would continue to affect Turkey's relations with the ECs in the following years: (1) the policies of Athens toward Ankara after PASOK came to power; (2) the activities of political refugees from Turkey who formed lobbies in Europe; (3) the Jewish lobbies in Europe that withheld their support for Turkey as a result of the military administration's growing rapprochement with Arab countries and Ankara's distancing itself from Israel.

On 10 April 1981 the European Parliament adopted a resolution introduced by the Socialist Group. With this resolution, the EP called on the military administration in Turkey to respect freedoms and to come up with a detailed calendar for restoring democracy. The EP also asked the Council of the ECs to suspend the association established by the Ankara Agreement if the democratic institutions that existed in Turkey were not restored within two months. This last radical point had been introduced by the Communist group, which wanted to apply this sanction on Turkey based on the precedent established by the organization when it applied this measure to Greece after the coup of the colonels' junta. As the violation of human rights of the military administration became more flagrant, the conservative and liberal groups also began to tilt in this direction. The resolution of the EP was interpreted by the Turkish government as the "actions of those who would like to see a return to the terror and the instability of the pre-12 September period" (Tekeli and İlkin, p. 52).

Despite the remonstrations of different organs of the ECs, the military administration maintained its repressive policies. Evren and his companions were aware that Turkey's strategic importance to the U.S. and NATO had grown after the events in Iran and Afghanistan. They were confident that, as the U.S. supported the military administration, it would also apply pressure on the ECs on behalf of Turkey. Developments proved that they were correct in their assumption. The U.S. repeatedly approached members of the ECs and called for a measured approach toward Turkey. Despite this, Brussels hardened its policy toward Turkey in reaction to the military administration's arbitrary and undemocratic practices.

When the NSC dissolved all political parties and confiscated their assets in October 1981 and when the Peace Association was closed down and its leaders were arrested, the European Parliament adopted a decision in the course of its budgetary debate on 4 November 1981 and suspended the Fourth Financial Protocol, which had been initialed on 19 June 1981. True, the Council of the ECs did not formally endorse this decision. But the loan of 600 million ECUs foreseen in the Fourth Financial Protocol, which came into effect on 1 November 1981, was never approved. Thus, even if it remained formally in effect, in practice the Fourth Financial Protocol had been suspended. It must be noted that Greece was in large measure responsible for the council's stand on this issue. These developments caused deep concern in many circles in Turkey and most notably in the MFA. Prime Minister Ulusu, however, reacted to the EP's decision with the remark: "We don't want those who don't want us" (Evren, p. 474).

A good number of ECs members, led by France, wanted to freeze relations with Turkey, but they were met with the opposition of the Federal Republic of Germany. In taking this stand, Germany was motivated by the need to do something about the free circulation of workers. The FRG wanted to extract concessions from the Military Administration, which did not have to be worried about public opinion. When the customs union foreseen in the Additional Protocol of 1971 was due to come into effect in 1985, the FRG was planning to seek measures that would restrict the free circulation of Turkish workers in the ECs that was due to come into force in 1986. When the German foreign minister, H.D. Genscher, visited Ankara in November 1982, this subject was high on his agenda. Genscher bluntly told Evren that he was seeking an agreement that would prevent the free circulation of workers. During 1983 Bonn took a number of measures that encouraged foreign workers to return to their home countries.

As political relations between Turkey and the ECs deteriorated, there was a similar trend in economic relations. Starting in the latter part of 1981, the ECs started restricting the import of Turkish cotton yarn, claiming that it was being dumped. Throughout 1982 new restrictions and quota limitations were imposed on all of Turkey's textile products, which made up the bulk of its exports. The main reason for this was the crisis facing the textile industries in the countries of the ECs, where almost 1 million textile workers were jobless. To keep the situation from getting worse, the ECs felt compelled to take protectionist measures. Under the terms of the Additional Protocol, it should not have been so easy to take such measures. But in view of the negative political developments in Turkey and the anti-Turkish sentiments prevailing in the EP, the ECs found it expedient to follow this course.

On 17 November 1982 the new Turkish Constitution was approved by a large majority in a referendum. Some quarters in Europe, however, considered it undemocratic for the referendum to be held under martial law with strict measures in force. There were also negative reactions in Western Europe to the closing of political parties in 1983 and the NSC's vetoing of the leaders of some political parties. On 13 October 1983 the EP adopted a resolution condemning Turkey for its antidemocratic practices (Tekeli and Ilkin, p. 61).

Following the election on 6 November 1983 and the restoration of civilian rule, relations between Ankara and Brussels would enter a new phase.

The Road Leading to the Application for Full Membership

Özal and Relations with the ECs

The military regime was striving to improve relations with the ECs, but without success. As a consequence, it drew closer to the U.S. and to the Muslim countries, which were usually referred to as "friends and brothers." When the leader of the Motherland Party, Turgut Özal, became prime minister, he maintained the close links with the U.S. and the countries of the Middle East. But he also intended to improve Turkey's relations with the ECs, which had been neglected for three years. It would be difficult to talk about a consistent ECs strategy pursued by the Motherland Party, however. After a hesitant initial phase, relations grew closer from 1983 to 1987, when they reached a climax with Turkey's application for full membership (Tekeli and Ilkin, pp. 71–92).

The Motherland Party's program stressed that Turkey's eventual goal was full membership in the ECs. But it also stated that the process of integration would entail the balancing of the interests of both sides. Özal was not ready to accede to the ECs with his eyes shut and without a process of tough bargaining. He confirmed this by declaring that Turkey would forgo membership if the price to pay was too high.

Such declarations did not make much of an impact on the attitude of Brussels toward Turkey. Brussels insisted that relations must first be normalized before they could develop, and this could not happen before Ankara improved its performance in the field of democratic freedoms and human rights.

The reforms that Brussels demanded could not take place in an environment in which the military still exercised control over elected politicians. Two other developments hindered the process of normalization with Brussels. After PASOK came to power in Greece, Athens carried its disputes with Turkey to the ECs platforms, effectively blocking progress in Turkey's relations with the ECs. Greece was preventing the meeting of the Council of Association from taking place, even though the council had not met for a very long time. The second development in the path of progress was the dispute with the Federal Republic of Germany over the free circulation of workers.

According to the agreements, Turkish workers were due to acquire the right freely to enter and work in the countries of the ECs as of 1986. Germany claimed that this freedom would harm its interests, however, and called for a postponement. It was obvious that the Federal Republic would not allow Turkey's relations with the ECs to develop without first settling this dispute to its satisfaction.

In his first year as prime minister, Özal realized that the process of normalization would not be easy. Starting in December 1984, Özal decided to approach the ECs through a new strategy, as recommended in a report prepared by his chief advisor, Adnan Kahveci (Tekeli and İlkin, p. 72). Özal held that, since relations with the ECs were going from bad to worse, there must be a drastic change in policy to put things right. The moribund relations could only be restored with shock treatment. The shock treatment recommended by Kahveci and fully endorsed by Özal was application for full membership. Turgut Özal announced on 1 December 1984 that the time had come for Turkey to apply for full membership.

The Main Points of Discord

At the time when Özal was hinting that the application for membership would be coming soon, three basic issues separated Ankara and Brussels.

1. The timing of Turkey's application was creating difficulties. Although Turkey had not yet submitted a formal application, even the suggestion of an application had sent tremors through the ECs. Senior officials of the organization declared that neither Turkey nor the ECs was ready for Turkey's full membership and stressed that the chance that a Turkish application would be accepted was very remote. Even Italy, the Federal Republic of Germany, and Belgium, whose friendship and support Turkey was counting on, found the talk about full membership premature. This was the time when the negotiations with Spain and Portugal had been concluded, and the decision had been made to admit these countries in 1986. The industrialized members had accepted the membership of two relatively poor countries, coming on top of Greek membership, only on condition that no other expansion take place for the next ten years. These ten years would allow for the poor to be assimilated by the rich. At this stage there was no room in the ECs for another poor country.

2. The Council of Association had not met at the ministerial level since 1980, and no decisions had been made on important questions. The date of the next council meeting and its agenda had become pressing issues. Özal considered a meeting of the council at an early date to be an indicator of normalization of relations with the ECs, so he made every effort to secure a meeting at the ministerial level. Only Greece and Denmark among the members appeared to be against such a meeting. The reason for Denmark's opposition was the human rights issue in Turkey. The pressure of other members, headed by the FRG, succeeded in persuading Denmark to agree.

Athens would only agree to a meeting on condition that Turkey made certain concessions to Greece on issues of contention between the two countries, even though the holding of the meeting of the Council of Association was required under the Ankara Agreement. Athens was demanding an undertaking from Turkey that it would respect Greece's territorial integrity and respect Greece's rights in the Aegean and that it would withdraw its troops from Cyprus and lift the restrictions placed on the properties of the Greek minority in Turkey. The Greek conditions aroused anger in Turkey. According to a generally held belief in Turkey, Athens had broken its promise made in 1981 when joining the ECs that bilateral questions with Turkey would not be brought up within the framework of the organization. But no such promise had been registered formally in any document signed by Greece. It was perhaps an informal undertaking, like Rogers's "word as a soldier" in connection with the Rogers Plan, and was later forgotten and dropped from the agenda.

Özal believed that the Greek obduracy could be overcome with outside pressure and for this purpose established close personal links with the prime ministers of France, Britain, Italy, and the FRG. These countries felt that it would be expedient to develop relations with Turkey within the existing structure in order to prevent Turkey from pressing for full membership. This approach allowed the Council of Association to meet on 16 September 1986.

This was the first time since the coup of 12 September 1980 that the council was meeting at the ministerial level, which was an important indication that relations were on the way to becoming normalized. But the meeting failed to tackle important issues like the free circulation of workers or the implementation of the Fourth Financial Protocol, which remained suspended. Athens had demonstrated once again that Ankara should not expect normalization of relations with the ECs before it mended its relations with Greece.

3. A third area of fundamental disagreement between Turkey and the EEC was the question of free circulation of workers. At the meeting of the Council of Association held on 2 December 1976, Turkey had already agreed to a lengthy postponement of the implementation of free circulation. At the meeting held on 30 June 1980, Turkey had further agreed that free circulation would come into force gradually and in stages and was satisfied with improvements in the social and legal condition of its workers already in the EEC countries. The Association Council's decision number 1/80, which contained arrangements on these issues, would be the basis on which the European Court of Justice would subsequently adopt far-reaching decisions on Turkey's relations with the EEC.

During the visit of Özal to the Federal Republic of Germany in September 1984 and the talks held in Ankara by German chancellor Helmut Kohl in July 1985, this issue was continually on the agenda. It became clear even then that Bonn had made its mind up on the issue. The German side was approaching the issue from the perspective of its interests, ignoring the legal angle. According to Bonn, the social and legal conditions of Turkish workers had been improved, and in return Turkey should stop insisting on free circulation. Furthermore, countries like France, the Netherlands, and Belgium, which hosted fairly large numbers of Turkish workers, were also opposed to free circulation.

At this point it became apparent that Turkey might agree to postpone free circulation, which was due to come into force in December 1986, and await the outcome of its application for full membership. Ankara would decide on its next step in the light of the outcome of its application. In the meantime bilateral talks would be held with the Germans to secure some sort of monetary compensation for losses arising from the postponement of free circulation. Ankara's flexibility on the issue was received with satisfaction in the capitals of ECs members.

Ankara's flexibility was not of its own choosing, however. Bonn had made it plain that it would not countenance free circulation. Furthermore, the Additional Protocol was not being implemented. As the membership of the EEC expanded, Ankara's trade privileges were being steadily eroded. This was especially true in the case of countries like Spain, Portugal, and Greece, and Turkey's nonmembership was bound to become a growing economic handicap. The Greek veto was preventing the implementation of the Fourth Financial Protocol. The European Parliament had failed to relax its tough line toward Turkey adopted during the time of the military regime. In these circumstances, it was unthinkable for Ankara to drive a hard bargain on the issues of free circulation and at the same time contemplate making an application for full membership. In any case, for free circulation of labor to come into force, it was necessary for the customs union to come into effect in 1985 for all industrial products other than those items considered sensitive. It was also necessary for Ankara to make concessions to members of the EEC on the issue of free circulation in order to overcome their resistance to Turkey's application for membership. Following this logic, Özal decided not to insist on the issue of free circulation before the application for membership had been acted upon. At the same time, Özal did not want to give the impression that Turkey had given up on its treaty-based rights, so the minister of state in charge of ECs affairs, Ali Bozer, applied to the EEC in November 1986 to remove the barriers against the free movement of workers.

In response to this application, the Council of Ministers of the ECs declared on 24 November 1986 that the legal requirements for starting free circulation had not yet been fulfilled and added that the question of implementation had to be decided by the Council of Association following careful preparations carried out in closed session. It was also stressed that at the preparatory talks only the Turkish workers who had been living and working in the EEC countries for at least five years would be considered eligible to benefit from free circulation.

This decision came as no surprise to Ankara. The rights derived from international treaties had been suspended with a unilateral decision of the EEC. This spurred Özal to press on with his decision to apply for full membership.

Moves to Prepare the ECs for the Upcoming Application

Throughout 1986 Özal and his entourage had begun to receive the signs that the reaction of the ECs to an application would be unfavorable and strong. There was no question of Turkey retreating from an application, however, which Ankara saw as a sort of "shock treatment" to put its relations with the organization back on track. The Motherland Party had introduced the European Communities membership issue in domestic politics for the first time and used it in the by-election held in September 1986. This practice would be followed by all subsequent governments. To step backward at this point would allow the opposition to depict it as a major setback and would lead to the Motherland Party losing votes. Consequently, a systematic plan was put into operation to soften the reaction of Brussels to the application, now scheduled to take place on 14 April 1987. The plan consisted of six main elements (Tekeli and Ilkin, pp. 78-79).

1. Although not directly related to the ECs, Turkey granted its citizens the right to make personal applications to the European Commission on Human Rights in early 1987. This was an issue to which all Western European Commission of Human Rights in early 1987.

pean countries attached utmost importance. ECs circles, in particular the European Parliament (which had frequently admonished Turkey on the issues of democratization and respect for human rights), received the news with satisfaction. Turkey's move was followed by changes in its internal legislation to allow for the exercise of this right. This bold move earned much praise for Ankara from the ECs.

- 2. Greece was creating problems in Turkey's relations with the ECs on every occasion. Ankara decided to accede to a Greek request that it had been rejecting and in February 1988 announced that the decree of 1964 forbidding the sale of Greek-owned property in Turkey would be rescinded. After Greece joined the ECs, the agreement with the organization that Turkey had to conclude to make the necessary adjustments for Greek membership had to be approved first by the ECs Council of Ministers without running into a Greek veto. Then it had to be ratified by the Greek parliament. Turkey's decision to rescind the decree would help overcome its image as a trouble-maker and eliminate the possibility of a Greek veto, while Brussels would interpret this as a conciliatory gesture on the eve of the application.
- 3. Concrete signs began to be given in 1986 that Turkey would not insist on the right of free circulation. Özal, his senior advisor Kahveci, and other officials made statements that new employment opportunities would emerge in Turkey as foreign investments increased and that it would not be necessary for Turkish workers to move to Europe to find jobs.
- 4. The Turkish government sought to take advantage of the influence that big business wielded over their governments and steered the contracts for large construction projects to firms of the ECs countries. Many leading firms were invited to participate in tenders for large construction projects like motorways, dams, and bridges in 1986 and 1987.
- 5. Ankara began to stress Turkey's political as well as economic importance for the ECs. NATO member Turkey kept on carrying out the job of helping defend Western Europe at a time when the Cold War was still making itself felt, notwithstanding Gorbachev's perestroika and glasnost policies.
- 6. Another element related to the menace of political Islam. From the first application in 1987 until 1999, when Turkey was formally accepted as a candidate for accession at the EU Helsinki Summit, all Turkish prime ministers except Necmettin Erbakan used the argument that to exclude Turkey from Europe would strengthen radical Islamic currents in the country, with dire consequences for European interests in the region. Özal and his aides were the first to use this argument in their conversations with Europeans.

As Ankara accelerated its activities in all of these six areas in the early months of 1987, the signals coming from ECs embassies in Ankara were hardly encouraging. The member countries were busy trying to gauge the impact of the Single European Act on the ECs. In these circumstances, Özal cut short the campaign to prepare ECs capitals for Turkey's application in order to avoid damaging heated public debates among the Europeans. Özal instructed Ali Bozer to submit Turkey's application for membership on 14 April 1987.

II. THE APPLICATION FOR MEMBERSHIP AND ITS AFTERMATH A. The Reasons for Applying

The minister of state, Ali Bozer, delivered Turkey's letter of application for full membership to the Belgian minister of foreign affairs, Leo Tindemans, who was the president of the ECs Council of Ministers at the time. The application was to the European Coal and Steel Community under article 98 of the Treaty of Paris, to the European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM) under article 209 of the EURATOM Treaty, and to the European Economic Community under article 237 of the Treaty of Rome.

Bozer met the president of the European Commission, Jacques Delors, on the same day and delivered a copy of Turkey's letter of application. According to the procedures, the letter's original was to be transmitted to the commission after a preliminary examination by the council. Turkey was keen to see this stage of the procedure carried out without a hitch. Tindemans informed Bozer that the usual procedure would be followed and gave assurances that there would be no procedural difficulties.

With the application of 14 April, Ankara had taken the first formal step toward realizing the goal of full membership at an early date, which Turkey had been pursuing since 1985. This was a milestone in Turkey's bumpy relations with the European integration. There were important economic and political reasons for Turkey to apply at a time when the attitude of the ECs was aloof and distant.

The Economic Reasons

Because of the 12 September coup and developments like the accession of Greece, Portugal, and Spain, Turkey's relations with the ECs were in limbo. Furthermore, the customs union had not been realized, the Fourth Financial Protocol was not being implemented, and the free circulation of workers, which had been scheduled to commence in 1986, remained suspended. The difficulties created by this situation could only be overcome by breathing new life into relations.

In addition to these reasons stemming from Ankara's relations with the ECs, it was also necessary for Turkey to achieve closer integration with the organization because of its macroeconomic policies. Özal's policies of opening Turkey to the outside world and the structural adjustments that this entailed could only be carried out with foreign credits. Turkey wanted to capitalize on its application to increase confidence in foreign markets and thereby accelerate the flow of funds into the country. At the same time, Turkey wanted to be able to draw on the funds that would be available once the full membership process started. The ECs, however, was reluctant to grant Turkey what it had furnished to Greece, Spain, and Portugal. Ankara was hoping that by making a bid for membership it would also check the demand by Brussels for a customs union prior to membership.

The Political Reasons

Two political considerations had remained unchanged from the time when Turkey had applied for associate membership in the EEC in 1959 to the time when it applied for full membership in the ECs.

The first of these was that Turkey regarded its participation in the European integration process as a natural and necessary outcome of its process of Westernization and modernization. There was a strongly held belief in the country that, after the damage inflicted by the three military interventions on the democratic and pluralistic regime from the end of the 1950s to the middle of the 1980s, integration with the ECs would contribute greatly to the strengthening of political stability and democracy in Turkey.

The second constant consideration was Greece. After joining the ECs as a full member in 1981, Greece had overtaken Turkey once again. Now that it had a say in the decision-making of the ECs, Greece was dragging the organization into all the contentious issues in Turkish-Greek relations. To attain parity with Greece, Turkey would have to seek full membership. This had become much harder, however, now that Greece held the power of veto in the ECs decision-making process.

Another political reason for Turkey's application was that Turkey remained, along with Norway and Iceland, one of the few European members of NATO that was not within the ECs after the expansions of 1981 and 1986. Given that Norway and Iceland had opted to stay out of the organization, Turkey was the sole European NATO member that had been excluded. This situation was causing frustration in Turkey: as Europe developed its political integration, the ECs would also start assuming responsibilities for the defense of Western Europe by acquiring effective military capabilities. If the defense organization known as the Western European Union assumed NATO's role, Turkey would find itself deprived of a valuable defense umbrella. As a member of the ECs, Turkey would also want to belong to the WEU.

577

B. Domestic and International Reactions to the Application

The Reaction of the ECs

Much to Ankara's surprise, Turkey's application for membership got a very negative reaction from the European public. Without exception, the European media were agreed that Turkey's application was an untimely and hopeless move. The European Trade Unions Confederation operating in ECs countries and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and other NGOs shared the views of the media on this issue (Tekeli and Ilkin, p. 91).

Reactions of ECs member countries varied. The strongest reaction came from Greece, which declared unequivocally that it would oppose Turkey's application. Luxembourg took a similar position. Germany characterized the Turkish move as an attempt to revitalize relations with the ECs, which had approached the breaking point. Bonn was opposed to full membership and favored a relationship between the ECs and Turkey through a customs union. This caused concern in Ankara, for Germany's negative stand could lead to rejection of the Turkish application in the ECs Council without it being sent to and considered by the commission.

Özal wrote a letter to Chancellor Kohl in which he appealed for understanding. He declared that Bonn's approach would be interpreted in Turkey as xenophobia, which would greatly damage Turkish-German friendship. Realizing that the perception of xenophobia would do harm to Germany's international standing, Kohl decided to adopt a more positive approach at least when the issue came up for consideration at the ECs Council (Tekeli and Ilkin, p. 92).

Unlike some other members, Belgium and Britain were more measured in their reactions to Turkey's application. As president of the council, Tindemans insisted on giving Turkey's application the same treatment as previous applications; as a consequence, the council decided to refer Turkey's application to the commission for an opinion. At that stage, this was exactly what Ankara had been hoping to obtain.

Domestic Reactions

The application was well received by the Turkish public. The media gave the impression that Turkey's membership was a sure thing, however, which gave rise to unwarranted optimism and high expectations. There was a sharp rise in public support for full membership because of the biased reporting of the media. The press indulged in the same excesses in 1995 in connection with the customs union and in 1999 when Turkey was declared a full candidate for accession at the Helsinki Summit. On all of these occasions the cry was "Turkey is now European."

Professional associations like the Union of Chambers and Commodity Exchanges of Turkey (TOBB), the Turkish Industrialists' and Businessmen's Association (TÜSİAD), and the Federation of Labor Unions (Türk-İş) adopted a more sober approach. These organizations supported the application, which they considered to be overdue. They started giving advice to the government on how Turkey should approach the negotiations from the perspective of their sector's interests. But they too probably had been influenced by the public mood and, ignoring the fact that the application had to be considered by the commission first, started thinking about the accession negotiations.

All of the major parties, with the exception of the Welfare Party, the successor of the banned National Salvation Party, were in favor of the application. The True Path Party (DYP) and the Democratic Left Party (DSP) held the view that the application would enhance Turkey's prestige in Europe. They also felt that this was a step that would facilitate the restoration of the political rights of their natural leaders, Demirel and Ecevit, which were still restricted. The Social Democratic People's Party (SHP) believed that it would be necessary to carry out radical reforms in the area of democratization before the commission would entertain Turkey's application.

C. The Suspension of the Application Turkey's Efforts to Secure the Acceptance of Its Application

Shortly after its application was referred to the commission by the council, Ankara began to understand that this was not very significant and that it was the subsequent procedure that was critical.

From the middle of 1987 to the time when the commission submitted its opinion in 1989, Turkey made strenuous efforts to make sure that the application did not get sidetracked. Bilateral contacts with ECs members were intensified in order to persuade governments. Efforts were also made to secure a meeting of the Council of Association.

Special emphasis was given to bilateral relations with Greece. Ankara assumed that a reduction of tension in relations with that country would go a long way toward improving relations with the ECs. Özal hoped that Papandreou could be persuaded to shift his position on Turkey through close personal contacts. In this framework, Özal met with his Greek opposite number on two occasions in February and March 1988. The first contact took place on the occasion of the World Economic Forum's meeting in Davos, where it was claimed that a new atmosphere of understanding and dialogue had emerged. This came to be known as the "spirit of Davos." But Greece failed to take concrete steps that would indicate that it had softened its hard-line anti-Turkish attitude in ECs organs. It was because of Greek opposition that the meeting of the Council of Association scheduled for 1988 failed to take place.

Nevertheless, Özal continued to court Greece, which was due to take over the presidency of the ECs on 1 July 1988, and paid a visit to Athens in June of that year. Even this failed to budge the Greeks.

Although Ankara was unhappy with the unbending Greek stance, it maintained its bilateral contacts with other ECs capitals in the expectation that they might influence Athens. These capitals shared the negative Greek views with respect to Turkey's application, albeit for different reasons, although they did not declare it as openly as Greece. The entire Turkish leadership (consisting of Evren, Özal, Bozer, and Yılmaz) visited the European capitals, starting with Bonn, London, and Paris, but got little encouragement other than vague expressions of goodwill.

Parallel to the bilateral contacts, Turkey was seeking a meeting of the Council of Association in order to secure the implementation of the Fourth Financial Protocol and secure the clarification of the issue of free circulation of workers. But Greece indicated that it was opposed to such a meeting unless the agenda included the question of Cyprus and the issue of human rights. This Greek attitude, at a time when the spirit of Davos was still fresh, demonstrated to Ankara the difficulty of its task. Furthermore, Greece was supported by the Federal Republic of Germany, which readily declared that the question of Cyprus cast a dark shadow on Turkey's relations with the ECs. Ankara replied that the question of Cyprus would not be made a subject for bargaining. Turkey's hopes for early membership were dealt a hard blow in May 1988 when the members of the European Commission considered the issue of Europe's enlargement and agreed that no new members would be admitted before 1992. They also agreed that Turkey's membership could only come long after 1992 (Tekeli and İlkin, p. 118; "Membership in the EC Is a Dream," Cumhuriyet, 7 May 1988).

In the face of these setbacks, Ankara resorted to its old policies vis-à-vis the ECs, which had become classic by now. Starting in mid-1988, Ankara started emphasizing that the ECs was not Turkey's sole option, while also suggesting that Turkey might start drifting eastward if not admitted to the organization. At different forums, Bozer declared that, if Turkey failed to establish a satisfactory relationship with the ECs, it would tighten its relations with the U.S. and Canada, with the USSR, with the EFTA countries, and with Islamic countries. During his visit to the FRG in October 1988, Evren asserted that by rejecting Turkey the ECs would be pushing it toward an Islamic union. In addition, views were expressed that a Turkey excluded from the ECs might review its membership in NATO.

Concurrently, Turkey sought to use the awarding of large public contracts, made possible by its growing economy, to secure advantages in its dealings with the ECs. It tried to influence countries like Spain and France with enticing defense contracts. But these tactics failed to yield the expected results.

The Commission's Report and the Council's Decision

The European Commission submitted its opinion on Turkey's application on 18 December 1989. The recommendation to the council was that for the time being Turkey's application should be suspended (Tekeli and İlkin, p. 159; State Planning Organization, unpublished internal document dated 18 December 1989 entitled "The Commission's Opinion on Turkey's Application for Full Membership").

The main reason for the commission's opinion was that the ECs did not want to engage in further enlargement before 1993. But the commission also cited reasons directly related to Turkey's application. According to the commission, accession negotiations could be undertaken with an applicant only if there was a possibility or a probability that the negotiations could be concluded within a reasonable period. This was dependent on the applicant's ability to undertake the obligations stemming from membership without delaying the ECs progress as well as the organization's ability to cope with the problems that would come about with the accession of the applicant. After reviewing the case from both the economic and political angles, the commission concluded that it was unlikely that Turkey would be able to meet these criteria in the short term. Despite the measures taken since 1980, the Turkish economy had not reached a sufficient level of economic development. The structural differences in the economic indicators of Turkey and the ECs, the various measures still in force in Turkey to protect national industries, the low income of workers and the inadequacy of their social welfare, and chronic problems like inflation and unemployment rendered full membership impossible.

The commission held that Turkey's political situation also prevented full membership. Although the steps taken to restore democracy after the 12 September interlude were welcome, they were still considered inadequate. Political limitations and restrictions on labor unions needed to be lifted. Turkey was still considerably behind European democracies in areas such as human rights and respect for minorities. Finally, the differences with Greece over Cyprus were preventing Turkey's relations with the ECs from developing satisfactorily.

After enumerating Turkey's shortcomings that constituted obstacles to full membership, the commission also made a reference to the burden that Turkish membership would impose on the ECs. This burden would be greater than that of all the other new members because of the poor condition of the Turkish economy. Because of the free circulation of Turkish workers, unemployment rates would rise in the EEC.

In view of the elements contained in the commission's opinion, the conclusion was that it would not be useful to either Turkey or the ECs to begin accession negotiations. The commission's recommendation to the council was to take no action in connection with Ankara's application. In making this recommendation, the commission stressed that "it wanted to cast no doubt on Turkey's eligibility for membership in the Community" (Commission Opinion on Turkey's Request for Accession to the Community, SEC [89] 2290 final/2, 20 December 1989, paragraph 13 [unpublished paper]). This was designed to preempt a sharp reaction from Ankara if it should get the impression that it had been excluded from the ECs for good.

Treating Turkey's application in a manner that differed from all previous applications, the commission recommended that Turkey's relations with the ECs should develop along four distinct paths. The customs union should come into effect, financial cooperation should be revived, industrial and technological cooperation should be developed, and political dialogue and cultural cooperation should be promoted. These recommendations revealed that, in the commission's view, for the time being Turkey's relations with the ECs should be based on "ties of association."

The opinion of the commission was endorsed by the Council of Ministers on 5 February 1990. It should be noted that in doing this the Council of Ministers did not make any "formal decision" in connection with Turkey's application but merely indicated that the commission's opinion had been endorsed "as the conclusion of the meeting." The council asked the commission to prepare a report on how relations with Turkey could be furthered in the context of association. The report was duly prepared by the commission's president, Abel Matutes, but never got inserted in the council's agenda because of Greece's obstruction.

The Unstated Reasons for the Suspension of Turkey's Application

Although the reasons given in the opinion submitted by the commission and endorsed by the council were perfectly valid from the ECs perspective, two other reasons affecting the course of Turkey's relations with the organization were not stated in the opinion.

The first of these was the change occurring in Europe. After Gorbachev came to power in the USSR in 1985, the accelerating process of transformation in Europe came to a climax with the demolition of the Berlin Wall in the fall of 1989. The countries of Eastern Europe were suddenly liberated from the economic and political models of the past forty years and, with their new orientations, became the priority and main focus of interest for the ECs. The ECs could be instrumental in securing the smooth integration of these countries with the West only if it directed its financial resources generously to them. To be able to manage this, it was necessary for the ECs not to assume inordinately heavy burdens elsewhere.

Furthermore, as the USSR and the countries of Eastern Europe ceased to be a threat to the West, Turkey was beginning to lose its trump card of being a shield against communism, which had served it well ever since the 1950s.

The second reason related to "cultural differences." This was never mentioned or even implied in ECs organs. This concept was beginning to take hold in certain quarters in Europe, however, and was having a damaging effect on Turkey's relations with the ECs. Toward the end of the 1980s these quarters were getting far more extreme and vocal than their counterparts of the 1960s. When they said "cultural differences," they understood historical and religious differences.

These reasons continued to be the determining factors behind the scene in Turkey's relations with integration in Europe during the 1990s.

ÇAĞRI ERHAN AND TUĞRUL ARAT

Sources (Relations with the European Communities [ECs])

Avrupa Birliği El Kitabı. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1995.

Birand, Mehmet Ali. Türkiye'nin Ortak Pazar Macerası 1959–1985. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1986.

Evren, Kenan. Kenan Evren'in Anıları. Vol. 2. İstanbul: Milliyet Yayınları, 1991.

Kaçar, Bayram. Avrupa'daki Ekonomik Bütünleşme Sürecinde AT, EFTA ve Türkiye'nin Yeri. Ankara: HDTM, 1993.

Müftüler, Meltem. Avrupa'da Birleşme Süreci ve Türkiye'nin Yeri. N.p., 1993.

Renksizbulut, Mustafa. Türkiye-AET Ortaklık İlişkileri. Ankara: DPT, 1983.

Şen, Faruk. Türkiye'nin Ufukları. Cologne: Ünes-Verlag, 1994. Tekeli, İlhan, and Selim İlkin. Türkiye ve Avrupa Birliği. Vol. 3. Ankara: Ümit Yayıncılık, 2000.

Turkey and the European Union. Opladen: Leske and Budrich, 1993.

Turkey-EC Relations. Ankara: HDTM, 1993.

Türkiye Büyük Millet Meclisi. "Ulusu Hükümeti Programı." In Hükümetler ve Programları. Ankara: Türkiye Büyük Millet Meclisi, 1981.

Türkiye ve Avrupa Entegrasyonu. Ankara: DPT, 1995.

Relations with Greece

I. DEVELOPMENTS DURING THE PERIOD

In the 1980s two parties and two leaders left an imprint on both Turkey and Greece: the Motherland Party, led by Turgut Özal, in Turkey and PASOK, led by Andreas Papandreou, in Greece. To be able to appraise Turkish-Greek relations in this period, we must understand the philosophies and roles assumed by these two parties and their respective leaders in the changing international scene.

The détente that started developing in the second half of the 1970s came to an abrupt end with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and the Islamic revolution in Iran, which transformed the Middle Eastern scene.

With the victory of the Republicans in the U.S. election and the coming of Ronald Reagan to the White House, the armaments race gained a new impetus, while moderate Islam began to be promoted within the framework of the doctrine of the Green Belt. The 12 September regime regarded Islam as an ally in its struggle with leftist and Kurdish movements and was ready to participate in the implementation of Washington's new doctrine.

The close ties between the U.S. and Turkey in the political and military spheres were also reflected in the economic sphere. The neo-liberal currents in vogue in the Anglo-American world were also being felt in Turkey. The economic reform package of 24 January 1980 was followed by the 12 September coup, which provided the conditions for the implementation of the package. The neo-liberal policies reached their climax during the Özal administration, when policies of export-led growth were vigorously pursued. These policies aligned Ankara with the administrations of Reagan and Bush in the U.S., of Thatcher in Britain, and of Kohl in the Federal Republic of Germany. As such, they made Turkey's foreign policy indexed to the economy and started a process that could dismantle the traditional foreign policy patterns and structure.

Although distant from foreign policy at first, Özal gradually warmed to foreign affairs and became convinced that the foreign policy conducted by the MFA with the close cooperation of the armed forces had to be restructured. Özal believed that foreign policy had to be formulated with economic considerations in mind. In this context, he favored a reassessment of problems that had been troubling Turkey's foreign relations over the years in the light of this philosophy. Top on the list of problems came Cyprus and Turkish-Greek disputes. For Özal, the chronic problem of Cyprus and disagreements with Greece had remained insoluble because of a lack of clear vision. These problems also prevented Turkey's relations with the West from developing smoothly. If economic subjects were given priority, political questions would recede to the background and become easier to resolve.

Özal's approach failed to produce the expected results because of the opposition of traditional foreign policy institutions in Turkey and the lack of a positive response from Greece. The PASOK government in Athens was looking at the world and Turkish-Greek relations from a completely different perspective.

After Greece returned to democracy in 1974, the New Democracy Party under Karamanlis had succeeded during its term in office, which lasted until 1981, in placing Greece's domestic and foreign policies on a sound basis. In the domestic field, political parties of all shades, including the Greek Communist Party (Komunistiki Koma Elladas: KKE), were incorporated within the system. With a referendum held in 1974, the monarchy was abolished. The elections of 1974 and 1977 were held in a free and democratic manner. Despite these important steps, the traditional system of patronage remained a feature of Greece's political life. Those who were close to the New Democracy Party continued to enjoy their political and economic privileges.

The most important development during the tenure of Karamanlis occurred in the field of foreign relations. The decision of the Karamanlis government to withdraw from NATO's military structure did not imply a break with the West. This was merely an expression of displeasure with Washington. The watchword of the Karamanlis foreign policy was "Greece belongs to the West." Relations with the ECs were developed in this framework, and soon Greece applied for membership. Having broken free of the U.S., Greece filled the ensuing void by working toward full membership in the ECs. Deviating from his policies of the 1950s, Karamanlis also developed relations with the socialist countries of the Balkans and Eastern Europe. The most striking change was in relations with the USSR. Karamanlis was the first Greek prime minister to pay a visit to Moscow. His foreign policy can be described as multifaceted, but with an overall European orientation. Despite the ongoing dispute over Cyprus, he sought a dialogue with Turkey. Although nothing emerged from these contacts, the communication channels were kept open and the crises did not degenerate into clashes. In 1980 Karamanlis was elected president and Greece's membership in the ECs was assured. This was an important development. In the relations with the West, which had developed in parallel, Greece for the first time gained an advantage over Turkey that it has maintained to this day.

At a time when Greece was setting off on an independent, multifaceted foreign policy course, on 3 September 1974, Andreas Papandreou founded the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) under his authoritarian leadership. In the 1977 elections, PASOK doubled the number of its votes and, after gaining the support of 25% of the electors, became the main opposition party. With its slogan of alagi (change), the party responded to the yearnings of the electorate and took good advantage of the gaps in the political spectrum. Historically, the only party on the left had been the Greek Communist Party, which was unable to become a mass, mainstream party because of the Greek civil war. Aware of this, PASOK used the campaign issues of the KKE to fill a gap that its rival was incapable of filling. PASOK maintained that it was possible to pass on to socialism within the capitalist system and called this the third way. It also rejected the Marxist-Leninist line. It adopted a populist rhetoric and claimed that there were no class distinctions in Greek society, but only a privileged minority and an underprivileged majority. PASOK was the spokesperson of this majority, with its slogan "PASOK to the government, the people to power."

PASOK had no class base; therefore it adopted a populist approach, which inevitably consisted of a strategy based on criticizing everything that the government did. This was true for domestic as well as foreign policy. Against the Karamanlis slogan "Greece belongs to the West," Papandreou developed the nationalistic counterslogan "Greece belongs to the Greeks." This led him to adopt a stridently anti-Western rhetoric: for PASOK, Greece had to get out of NATO and close all U.S. bases in the country. Relations with the ECs were to be suspended, and a referendum would be held on the issue of ECs membership. Papandreou characterized Washington as the citadel of imperialism. He defended the view that Greece must develop close ties with Moscow, the socialist countries, and the nonaligned countries. In the election held on 18 October 1981, PASOK came to power after gaining 48% of the votes. The party controlled 172 out of the 300 seats in the parliament.

PASOK carried out important reforms during its tenure of power. Among these were the introduction of civil marriages outside the church, decriminalization of adultery, the ending of the dowry, greater empowerment of local authorities, a national health scheme, and increased salaries for civil servants. But economic reforms were not based on increased production and were financed through ECs funds. This quickly led to economic difficulties. Under these circumstances the ECs intervened and imposed its economic program on Greece, which had become a full member since 1 January 1981. PASOK was to govern Greece until 1989; but by its second term (starting in 1985), populist policies had been abandoned.

During its years in power from 1981 to 1989, PASOK's rhetoric and its foreign policy diverged significantly. Notwithstanding its left-leaning rhetoric, PASOK's policies on basic issues did not differ markedly from the right-leaning policies of the New Democracy Party. The PASOK government pursued the negotiations on bases and signed a Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) with the U.S., did not leave NATO, and did not hold a referendum on ECs membership. PASOK maintained its radical rhetoric on secondary issues, cultivated its relations with the USSR and countries of the Third World, but maintained traditional policies on important issues, without regard to the criticism that this attracted.

The dichotomy between Papandreou's rhetoric when he was in opposition and his actions when he was in the government was explained to the Greek electorate by one simple reason: the threat from Turkey. Papandreou blamed Karamanlis for making too many concessions to Turkey and, when he came to power, based his foreign policy on the premise that the threat to Greece came not from the north but from the east. This allowed him permanently to keep on the agenda an issue over which the Greek public was extremely sensitive and find an excuse for maintaining relations with the West on a steady course. Papandreou claimed that, by remaining in NATO and the ECs and by continuing its military cooperation with the U.S., Greece was able to gain a diplomatic advantage over Turkey and also check Turkey's expansionist ambitions in the Aegean. When examining relations between Greece and Turkey during the Papandreou years, we must not lose sight of this background.

II. BILATERAL RELATIONS DURING THE 12 SEPTEMBER PERIOD AND DEVELOPMENTS IN CYPRUS (1980–1983)

Starting in early 1980, U.S. mediation began yielding results, creating a thaw in Turkish-Greek relations. The notams were rescinded, and air traffic was resumed over the Aegean Sea. But the main U.S. goal remained the lifting of the Turkish veto, to allow Greece to return to the military structure of NATO. This would happen after the military seized power in Turkey on 12 September 1980.

A. Bilateral Relations

Whenever the military engages in political intervention in Turkey, deviations appear in Turkey's traditional foreign policy of seeing the West as a single entity. The reason for this is the tendency of the military leaders to push the MFA and its bureaucracy into the background and start making their own decisions. When Europe started snubbing the 12 September administration, Turkey's foreign policy shifted toward Washington. Acting in the spirit of the Cold War (which had taken a turn for the worse after 1979), Turkey became one of the most ardent implementers of the Green Belt doctrine both at home and in the Middle East. At this point Washington made an accurate assessment of Ankara's mood and took a new initiative in the field of Turkish-Greek relations.

NATO's new American supreme commander, General Rogers, met with General Evren and got him to accept the Rogers Plan, whereby Turkey would lift its veto that was preventing Greece from returning to NATO's military structure. Once Greece was back, the two countries would settle the issues of command and control in the Aegean Sea through bilateral negotiations. After Evren approved the plan on 20 October 1980, relying on General Rogers's "word as a soldier," Greece was able to overcome a major hurdle without giving anything in return, and Turkey lost its sole bargaining chip against Greece.

When Greece returned to NATO's military structure without Turkey obtaining any concessions or receiving any guarantees, the negotiations foreseen in the Rogers Plan in connection with command and control areas in the Aegean were undertaken in Athens on 3 December 1980. The secretaries-general of the Ministries of Foreign Affairs of the two countries met in Ankara on 16 March 1981 to sort out technical questions. With the formation of the PASOK government at the end of the year, relations between the two countries took a turn for the worse. The new prime minister, Andreas Papandreou, claimed that questions of sovereignty in the Aegean could not be negotiated with a country that threatened Greece. The only issue to take up with Turkey might be the preparation of a compromise to allow the International Court of Justice to draw the boundary between the Greek and Turkish sectors of the continental shelf in the Aegean Sea. Anything else having to do with Greece's territorial integrity would remain non-negotiable.

This being the basic approach of the PASOK government, it introduced the question of Cyprus into what were essentially bilateral talks on technical issues by saying that nothing could be discussed until Turkey removed its forces from the island. Cyprus was an issue on which Turkey was unable to count on international support. Athens took the position that there would be no negotiations with Turkey unless it agreed to remove its forces from Cyprus. The new government also claimed that the agreement within the framework of the Rogers Plan concerned the previous government and said that it did not consider itself bound by this agreement. Greece not only refused to negotiate the Aegean control and command issue but also insisted on including the demilitarized Greek eastern Aegean islands, notably Lemnos, in NATO's defense plans. Unless its demands were met, it declared it would refrain from participating in NATO's regional exercises. Athens also stated its intention to extend its territorial waters to twelve nautical miles but was unable to implement this in the face of Turkey's warning that such a move would be regarded as casus belli by Ankara. In the negotiations with Washington over the reactivation of U.S. bases in Greece, Athens insisted on having the military balance between Greece and Turkey maintained. In fact, the Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement signed by Greece and the U.S. in 1983 provided for the maintenance of the 7:10 ratio between the two Aegean neighbors.

As usual, the main sufferers from the tension in relations were the minorities of the two countries. In March 1982 about one hundred Turkish Muslim farmers in Western Thrace lost their lands as a consequence of a dispute over ownership with the state. This led them to engage in a protest demonstration in Xanthi. This incident was known as the Inhanli land dispute and received widespread coverage in the Turkish press. This press coverage, at a time when relations with Greece were already tense, drove the repressive 12 September administration to take action. As a response to the practices of the Greek government concerning the Turkish minority in Western Thrace, a law was prepared on 26 March 1982, authorizing the Turkish government to take over the properties of the Greek minority in Turkey. This proposed law never came into effect, however. But on 12 June 1982 the Court of Appeals decided that the properties of Greek citizens in Turkey that remained frozen in accordance with the decree of 1964 could not be transferred to another party.

B. The Proclamation of the TRNC

On 9 August 1980 the two communities in Cyprus resumed their negotiations. The Turkish community wanted to see a federal state consisting of two regions and two communities. The Greek-Cypriot side was ready to accept two communities but balked at two zones. There were also differences between the two sides over the powers that would devolve to the federated states. The negotiations ended in failure at a time when there was political turmoil on the island.

In the Turkish section 1981 was an election year. Criticism directed at Denktaş (president since 1976) and at the ruling party he supported, the National Unity Party (UBP), was mounting. The economy was being propped up with aid from Turkey. Investments were at a standstill; and agricultural production was falling while unemployment was rising. There were serious differences between the local Cypriots and the immigrants from Turkey who had been encouraged to move to Cyprus for political reasons. In June 1981 Denktaş was reelected president, but none of the parties was able to obtain a clear majority. The three parties of the left, the Republican Turkish Party (CTP), Communal Salvation Party (TKP), and Democratic People's Party (DEHAP), decided to form a coalition against the UBP, which was close to Denktaş. The minister of foreign affairs of the 12 September administration, İlter Türkmen, traveled to Cyprus and informed the leaders of the three parties that Ankara was opposed to their coalition. A broader coalition was then set up, with the UBP as the senior partner. In this way, the possibility of a shift in the Turkish position in the intercommunal talks was forestalled.

In the election held by the Greek-Cypriot community on 13 February 1983, Spyros Kyprianou was elected president. With the backing of Papandreou, the new president decided to end the intercommunal talks and internationalize the Cyprus question. This had been the Cyprus policy of the Papandreou government since 1981. In 1982 Papandreou went to Cyprus and became the first Greek prime minister to visit the island. Papandreou asserted that Cyprus was an inseparable part of Hellenism. Although Cyprus affected Turkish-Greek relations, it was not a Turkish-Greek question or a NATO question. For Papandreou, the question of Cyprus had to be taken up within the framework of UN resolutions at an international conference.

Feeling itself under pressure in international forums, the Turkish side hardened its stand. At its meeting of 17 June 1983, the Assembly of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus adopted a resolution declaring that the Turkish community had the right of self-determination and that this right was inalienable

Realizing that this type of action could damage the prospects for intercommunal talks, the secretary-general of the UN, Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, submitted a new plan to the two sides on 8 August. The plan was promptly rejected by Kyprianou, which led to the resignation of his foreign minister, Nicos Rolandis, who declared that the president was not ready to countenance the continuation of the talks. Those wanting a solution sought to keep the talks going in order to prevent the Turkish side from declaring its independence. Those who preferred to see the deadlock continue were practically goading the Turkish side to declare its independence.

Meanwhile in Turkey the Motherland Party of Turgut Özal won in the election held on 6 November 1983. Before the new government assumed power in Ankara, the assembly of the TFSC was convened on 15 November 1983 to proclaim the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) as an independent state. The proclamation affirmed that the assembly continued to hold the view that "the two peoples, who were destined to live side by side on the same island, could and should reach a peaceful, just, and lasting solution to all their problems through negotiations conducted on a footing of equality" (İsmail 1992, p. 162). The proclamation went on to say that the TRNC would "facilitate rather than hinder the reestablishment of the partnership of two equal peoples within a federation and the resolution of outstanding questions" (ibid.). The proclamation also declared that the TRNC would be bound by the principles of the UN, pursue a nonaligned course, join no military bloc, and remain loyal to the treaty establishing the Republic of Cyprus as well as the treaties of guarantee and alliance. As soon as the independence of the TRNC was proclaimed, a constituent assembly was convened to prepare a new Constitution, which came into force in 1985.

On the day of its proclamation, the TRNC was recognized by Turkey. Although Pakistan decided to recognize the new state, it later changed its mind under U.S. pressure. The proclamation of the TRNC was the legalization of a de facto situation and constituted a turning point in the development of the question of Cyprus. The issue ceased to be one between two communities and became a question between two states, although one of these remained unrecognized. This is why the issue caused widespread international reactions and was the subject of intense debates in Turkey as well as in the TRNC itself (Box 6-12).

At the end of the day, the legacy of the 12 September administration to the Özal government was twofold: (1) a tense relationship with Greece with no dialogue after Turkey had lifted its veto on Greece's rejoining NATO's military structure without obtaining anything in return, and (2) an independent TRNC, which meant a qualitative change in the question of Cyprus, with sharp reactions from the international community.

III. RAPPROCHEMENT EFFORTS BY THE ÖZAL GOVERNMENTS AND OUTSTANDING QUESTIONS (1983–1989)

The Özal government's program read out at the TGNA on 13 January 1984 contained indications of how the new government approached the question of relations with Greece. Among the phrases in the program were "extending the hand of friendship to Greece," "the two countries' long-term common interests," and "establishing good relations in the fields of trade, the economy, and tourism" (www.yerelsecim.com/45_hukumet.htm). Özal's gestures to Greece remained unreciprocated, however. One of these gestures was the lifting of the visa requirement for Greek travelers, designed to promote economic and trade relations and also to expose Papandreou's inflexible stand to international public opinion. The goodwill gestures in the field of economic relations failed to resolve or eliminate deep-seated historical questions or to make a contribution to the establishment of good relations.

A. The Question of Lemnos

The question of Lemnos came up in September 1983 in connection with NATO's combined exercise Display Determination-83, which was scheduled to take place from 3 to 5 October 1983. In the course of the preparations for the exercise at NATO's regional headquarters in Naples, the Greek government proposed that one of the operation centers of the exercise be located on the island of Lemnos. This was opposed by the Turkish government,

Box 6-12. The Proclamation of the TRNC: Reactions and Debates

The first reactions to the proclamation of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) came from the Greek part of Cyprus and Greece, Both characterized the action as "illegal" and "unacceptable." On 16 November 1983, Greece delivered a protest note to Turkey. The UN Security Council met on 18 November and adopted resolution 541 with thirteen votes, with Pakistan voting against and Jordan abstaining. According to the resolution, the declaration of independence of the TRNC was legally null and void and had to be rescinded. Turkey declared that it did not recognize the resolution. Denktas pointed out that the Security Council had refused to recognize the existence of China for thirty years and that of East Germany for twenty-five years, and yet both were now members of the UN. He refused to go back on the decision to declare independence.

The proclamation of the TRNC also created a stir in Turkey. The decision made a few days before the new civilian government took office had irritated Ozal. The leading figures in the 12 September administration and especially the Ministry of Foreign Affairs did not look kindly upon the proclamation. The decision was seen as a fall accompli sprung upon Turkey by Denktas. President Evren explained America's acceptance of the decision in the following terms. The Communists were gaining strength among the Turkish Cypriots. If this trend continued, the Left would take power at the next election. This would lead the Communists in the Greek sector to form an alliance with the Communists in the Turkish sector to create a situation in the Mediterranean that could only serve the interests of the Soviet Union.

Although the Turkish Cypriot assembly adopted the proclamation unanimously, the decision was the subject of heated debates. There was a widespread feeling that the decision was made to ensure that Denktas and the UBP would maintain their positions of power. Furthermore, under the 1976 Constitution of the Federated State, Denktas could not seek a third term as head of state. The declaration of independence would result in both the Constitution and the electoral system being replaced. This would prolong Denktas's tenure of power and that of the UBP. In addition to these political considerations, legal considerations were also advanced in criticizing the decision. Whatever the disclaimers, the thesis of federation that the Turkish side had espoused was being abandoned. From the original basis of a two-community solution, the transition had now been made to a two-state solution. This implied moving on from federation to confederation, which contravened UN resolutions to which Turkey had subscribed as well as the 1977 and 1979 agreements.

(M. FIRAT)

which claimed that the inclusion of Lemnos in the NATO exercise was an attempt to militarize the island in violation of existing treaties. As a consequence, the Turkish government insisted that military elements not be introduced to the island and that it not be turned into a military operation zone. When NATO turned down the Greek proposal, Athens announced on 17 September that henceforth the Greek armed forces would not participate in NATO exercises.

Starting with the Lemnos dispute, Turkish-Greek differences within NATO continued during the term of the Özal government. On 17 May 1984 Greece registered its reservation about the NATO decision to deploy harpoon missiles along the Turkish Straits and around Turkish naval bases, while Turkey did the same in regard to the militarization of Crete and its approaches. In international law and organizations, states can register a reserve when they do not agree with a decision.

In the course of the preparations for NATO's exercise Display Determination-84, scheduled to take place from 17 to 24 October 1984, the events of the previous year were played out all over again. Greece sought to include Lemnos in NATO plans once more. On 4 September Greece issued a statement: if the plans and the area of the exercise were not changed, it reserved the right to take all the necessary measures to defend its interests in the region and ensure the safety of international air traffic within the Athens FIR, which came under its exclusive responsibility. Greece further announced that it would conduct large-scale air and naval exercises between 2 and 12 October over an area including Lemnos.

On 11 September Turkey declared that military aircraft were not obliged to divulge their flight plans when entering the FIR; consequently, if Greece took measures in conformity with its statement, Turkey would take appropriate countermeasures. Greece then shut down the air corridor G-18 (Green-18) over the Aegean Sea to civilian aircraft. Turkey responded to this by issuing a notam (notification to airmen) on 24 September, which described its area of operational responsibility in the context of exercise Display Determination-84. This area of responsibility was a line starting at the Greek-Yugoslav border and going on to the Aegean, passing over Lemnos and extending to the south of Rhodes. This area included portions of the G-18 corridor and the Athens FIR.

Shortly after the question of Lemnos had flared up, during the annual review of NATO force plans held on 17 November, the Greek government issued a document in which some forces located on Lemnos were shown as assigned to NATO. The Turkish government pointed out that this was a violation of the demilitarized status of Lemnos and signaled its intention to use its veto in NATO forums to prevent the Greek proposal from being accepted. The efforts by NATO officials to find a way to overcome the differences between the two countries proved fruitless. In the Defense Planning Committee, Turkey exercised its veto against not just the forces located in Lemnos but all the Greek forces assigned to NATO. Greece then vetoed the Turkish forces assigned to NATO. This double veto prevented the Defense Planning Committee from approving the Greek and Turkish country chapters of allied forces for the year 1984. The action of the Papandreou government in dragging its disputes with Turkey into NATO and thereby disrupting NATO's plans was beginning to anger the U.S.

Although it never got as serious as in 1983 and 1984, the question of the inclusion of Lemnos in NATO's operational plans kept cropping up as a dispute between the two countries until the end of the 1990s.

B. Growing Tensions in Relations with Greece and the Attempts to Initiate a Dialogue

We have already noted that Papandreou sought to bridge the gap between his rhetoric when he was in opposition and his actions when he assumed power by constantly harping on the "Turkish threat." He kept this up in 1984: at the PASOK convention held on 10 May, he accused the Turkish leadership of chauvinism and expansionism. Ankara responded to these attacks with restraint. Özal was convinced that these outbursts were designed to impress Greek domestic opinion and proposed that outstanding questions be frozen. After declaring that Turkey had no ambitions on Greek territory, he renewed the call for a dialogue. But Papandleou was getting ready for the election due in 1985 and kept up his attacks to escalate the tension. He also introduced the New Defense Doctrine. Operating from the premise that the real threat to Greece came not from the north but from the east, he announced that the Greek armed forces would be redeployed to conform to the New Defense Doctrine. When the Greek units stationed on the Bulgarian frontier were shifted to the Turkish frontier on 17 December, the Turkish MFA announced that this move was in conflict with the basic philosophy of NATO and that Turkey would take appropriate steps to counter the Greek action. It has to be remembered that at this point Turkey's relations with Bulgaria were very strained because of the campaign to force the Turkish Bulgarians to change their names.

In preparation for the approaching election, the Greek government kept up its tough line toward Turkey in 1985 on all the questions at issue between the two countries, starting with the dispute over territorial waters. This forced Özal to reassess his position and make a statement on 21 March 1985 in which he declared that Turkey would not accept a fait accompli on the issue of territorial waters and an appropriate response would be forthcoming even if it led to a clash.

In the election held on 2 June 1985, PASOK managed to hold onto power, although with a diminished majority. But conditions had changed as the second PASOK term began. As indicated earlier, the economy was in trouble because of the populist policies that had been pursued. The ECs reacted to this by forcing the PASOK government to implement a belt-tightening program prepared in Brussels. To carry this program out, PASOK had to shift funds that had been earmarked for defense, ostensibly to fend off the Turkish threat, and redirect the funds to meet economic requirements. This called for a reduction of tension with Turkey. Until then, Papandreou had been against any dialogue with Turkey on Aegean questions, other than preparing a compromise as a preliminary to referring the issue of the territorial waters to the International Court of Justice. He had been asserting that a dialogue would violate Greece's sovereignty and territorial integrity. Now he began to show signs that he was prepared to engage in a dialogue with Özal, who had been pressing for this ever since he assumed power in 1983.

The preparations for the Papandreou-Özal talks were being conducted by the two foreign ministries under the strictest secrecy. There was concern that the press might find out about the preparations, which would lead to a public uproar that, in turn, might torpedo the talks. It was planned for the two prime ministers to attend a meeting at Davos, to be arranged by Dr. Klaus Schwab, the president of the World Economic Forum. The meeting would be used to engage the two men in a dialogue, without emphasizing any particular issue. Prime Minister Özal traveled to Davos on 30 January 1986. The two prime ministers were scheduled to have breakfast together on 2 February; but when a Turkish newspaper announced the meeting in a headline, Papandreou canceled the breakfast appointment. Although the intervention of Dr. Schwab allowed a breakfast to be held that was attended by all three men, the effort to start a dialogue had failed.

After the first Davos encounter, incidents that heightened tension between the two countries continued to occur in the Aegean. In April 1986 the Turkish navy carried out an exercise code-named Sea Wolf in the northern Aegean. This was followed by the Greek navy's exercise Sea God, carried out between the islands of Lesbos and Chios. On 2 June Greece opened a new air corridor for civilian aircraft located west of Lemnos and hence very close to the Dardanelles Strait in Turkey.

While such reciprocal harassments continued in the Aegean, Papandreou stepped up his efforts to develop Greece's relations with other Balkan states. On 10 September he paid an official visit to Romania. This was followed by a visit to Bulgaria on 11–12 September, when he met Zhivkov. The two leaders issued a Declaration of Friendship, Good Neighborliness, and Cooperation. According to this declaration, the two countries undertook not to engage in unfriendly actions aimed at one another and to prevent their territories from being used by others for such actions. Papandreou not only was creating tension with Turkey but also was using the other Balkan countries (and especially Bulgaria, which was in open confrontation with Ankara) to isolate Turkey in the region. Greece harvested the fruits of this policy during the March 1987 Aegean crisis when the two countries came closest to an open clash in the 1980s.

C. The Aegean Crisis of March 1987

Although the 1987 Aegean crisis appeared to flare up over the issue of oil exploration in the Aegean, in reality it was a contrived situation. Greece had been exploring for oil since the early 1980s, but Özal chose to keep quiet about this in order not to arouse anger in Turkey in the expectation of improving relations.

Greece probably wanted to escalate tension in 1987 in order to frustrate Turkey just before it applied to the ECs for membership. But the question had been festering for years, and it flared up into a full-blown crisis only in March 1987. At the time Özal was out of the country for a heart operation and policy was being made by the MFA, in cooperation with the army's high command. The bureaucracy was unhappy with Özal's conciliatory policies in the face of Greek actions that heightened tensions. Certain analysts claim that, by taking advantage of the opportunity thus provided by Greece, the bureaucracy adopted a firm stand against Greek encroachments and reversed the course.

This is how the crisis unfolded. On 27 February 1987 the deputy foreign minister of Greece informed Turkey's ambassador in Athens, Nazmi Akıman, that Greece would no longer be bound by the Bern Declaration and would be free to explore for oil in the Aegean seabed. After consulting the General Staff, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs submitted a diplomatic note to Greece on 1 March, warning Athens that Turkey would take retaliatory action if Greece went ahead with plans to violate the 1976 Bern Declaration and proceed with the search for oil in the disputed continental shelf of the Aegean. Ignoring this warning, Athens proceeded with its plans and also announced that an exercise would be held in the Aegean on 19 March with the full participation of all three services. On 25 March Turkey's National Security Council recommended to the government that the seismic survey vessel Sismik I sail into the Aegean. With the approval of the cabinet, the Turkish Petroleum Company (TPAO) was awarded a license to search for oil in the Aegean.

On the evening of 26 March, after a lapse of eleven years, Sismik I left Turkish territorial waters to protest Greece's unlawful actions. The next day, the armed forces of both Greece and Turkey were placed in a state of alert. Papandreou called on Bulgarian president Zhivkov to provide political backing. This request was unlikely to be heeded, however, because it would bring about a confrontation between NATO and the Warsaw Pact. Nevertheless, Zhivkov did not shirk from giving Papandreou assurances about the Bulgarian border.

NATO members and above all Washington were alarmed at the prospect of the possibility of a clash between two allies in the Aegean. Britain took on the task of mediation. When Özal indicated that Turkey would not step back unless Greece made the first move, Athens softened its stand with an announcement stating that Turkey had misinterpreted Greece's intentions. With this de-escalation, the crisis was defused. On 28 March both countries announced that, unless there was a provocation, they would not send their research ships beyond their territorial waters.

The crisis had been overcome, but both sides maintained their positions. Submitting to pressures to overcome the situation arising from the lack of dialogue between the two sides, Papandreou indicated on 6 April 1987 that he was ready to engage in talks with Özal but added that he would insist on a decision after the talks to refer the question of the continental shelf to the International Court of Justice.

Turkey's reply came on 8 April. Ankara maintained its position that the question of the continental shelf should be resolved not by going to the ICJ but through bilateral negotiations. Özal was in a bind. On the one hand, he was to apply for membership in the ECs on 14 April and was anxious to avoid a Greek veto. On the other hand, legislative elections in Turkey were scheduled for November, and he could not afford to allow the opposition to brand him as an appeaser. As a matter of fact, it was only after the elections that Özal was able to realize his aim of starting a process of dialogue with Greece and thereby sidestepping the toughest obstacle to Turkish membership: the Greek veto. This would open up new political and economic prospects for Turkey.

It had become a tradition in Turkish-Greek relations to start a process of dialogue soon after overcoming a crisis. The crisis of March 1987 was no exception. In the course of overcoming the crisis, the two prime ministers exchanged letters; but the content of the correspondence was not revealed. This correspondence allowed direct contact to be established. When Özal was reelected in November 1987, Papandreou sent him a congratulatory message, demonstrating that he had given up his previous hard line, given the green light to the process that led to the Davos meeting and spirit, and signaled his readiness to enter into negotiations without a set agenda.

D. The Davos Process

The media referred to this process of dialogue as the "spirit of Davos." Some of the media took it lightly and referred to the dialogue as chimerical. Instead of taking up the contentious and long-standing political issues between the two countries, the two sides studiously avoided them. It had been arranged by private individuals without the benefit of any technical preparatory work conducted by the MFA. Consequently, despite the expectations that were aroused, it produced nothing tangible and even began to draw criticism in both countries after a while. It was significant, however, because the process of negotiations, cut off since 1982, had been resumed.

The Summits of Davos and Brussels

Özal and Papandreou met on 30 and 31 January 1988 on the occasion of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. The joint press release issued after their meeting stated that the leaders had taken up subjects of interest to both sides in a spirit of mutual understanding and goodwill. It went on to make the following points. Outstanding problems between the two countries arising from different approaches must not be exploited. Time, goodwill, and strenuous efforts would be required to overcome differences. The two sides must redouble their efforts to avoid a repetition of the recent Aegean crisis and to build a peaceful and lasting relationship. Rigid attitudes in all segments of both nations were made worse by the tone of school textbooks and official pronouncements. These contributed nothing to improve relations. It was necessary to promote mutual trust.

In addition to these abstract and general conclusions and declarations of good intentions, there were also concrete decisions. Two committees would be established, one political and the other economic. The economic committee was to be known as the Joint Cooperation Committee and would seek ways of promoting cooperation in the fields of joint ventures, trade, tourism, communications, and cultural exchanges. The political committee would identify problems, seek ways of bridging the gap between conflicting views, and search for lasting solutions. The progress to be achieved by these committees would then be reviewed by the prime ministers. Furthermore, contacts would be established between civilian and military officials, business leaders, and journalists of the two countries and would be expanded and intensified progressively. A business council or a joint chamber of commerce and industry would be set up. It was also decided that the prime ministers would meet at least once a year and pay visits to the other country. A direct telephone line would be established, and the representatives of the two countries in international organizations would increase their contacts with one another.

The first positive outcome of the Davos process appeared in Turkey on 5 February 1988 when the decree of 2 November 1964 freezing the rights of Greek nationals over their real estate in Turkey was rescinded.

Immediately after this development, Özal and Papandreou met in Brussels on 3–4 March and issued a joint communiqué in the spirit of the Davos process. The communiqué reflected the agreement to continue with the process of rapprochement and to avoid all actions and statements not in keeping with the spirit of Davos. The communiqué contained the following decisions.

- 1. The conduct of military exercises and questions arising from military flights would be taken up in talks.
- The work of the Committee on Missing Persons in Cyprus would be resumed.
- 3. After the rescinding of the 1964 decree, the Turkish government would, in accordance with Turkish legislation, take all necessary measures to restore the rights of Greek nationals in full.
- 4. Taking into account this positive development, Greece would approve the signing of the adjustment protocol of the 1964 Ankara Agreement along with the supplementary protocol prior to the meeting of the EEC-Turkey Council of Association scheduled for 25 April 1988.
- 5. The committees set up at Davos would meet on 26 May 1988 in Ankara and Athens. Upon the invitation of the Greek prime minister, the Turkish prime minister would pay an official visit to Athens from 13 to 15 June 1988.

Nothing substantial emerged from the meetings of the committees set up in Davos. Expectations were high with respect to Özal's Athens visit, however, which took place, as planned, on 13–15 June 1988. He was accompanied by a delegation of 170 people, most of them businessmen. The main purpose of the visit was to help develop trade and economic relations and thereby provide a basis that would facilitate the resolution of political problems between the two countries. The necessary preparatory work had not been thoroughly conducted, however, and the visit did not yield much more than press headlines.

Despite all the efforts and goodwill, the spirit of Davos remained a cosmetic affair. It became clear once again that the personal wishes and initiatives of leaders could not achieve results unless the political will was backed by adequate technical preparation on the part of the bureaucracy. The dialogue between the leaders continued through 1988 but was interrupted by Papandreou's heart condition as well as his love affair with Dimitra Liani and the banking scandal involving George Koskotas. All of this led the PASOK leader to lose stature not just among the Greek public but also among his own party followers. In 1989 PASOK lost the election, while Özal was elected president. The process set in motion by the two leaders would remain uncompleted.

The Effect of the Davos Process on the Minority in Western Thrace

Starting in 1980, the question of the rights of the Muslim-Turkish minority in Western Thrace began to draw increasing public attention. This was a consequence of the 1975 Helsinki Final Act, which placed human rights, and within this context minority rights, squarely on the international agenda. In addition, after Greece's accession to the ECs in 1981, Greece came under European scrutiny and began to be bound by European standards. Finally, the migration of Western Thracians to the Federal Republic of Germany as workers ended the community's isolation and helped bring it into closer contact with the outside world.

When the Turks of Western Thrace took action to defend their rights, PASOK did nothing to soften its tough policy toward the minority, ignoring its obligations as a socialist party. On 4 November 1987 the Greek High Court of Appeals upheld the court decision to close the Komotini Turkish Youth Association (established in 1938), the Xanthi Turkish Union (established in 1946), and the Turkish Teachers' Union of Western Thrace (established in 1966) because the adjective "Turkish" was used in their titles. The High Court determined that there were no Turks in Western Thrace. When the minority's lawyers learned of the decision of the High Court on 5 January 1988, they organized a demonstration scheduled for 29 January 1988, just before the holding of the Davos talks, in defiance of an official ban. This was the largest demonstration ever held in Western Thrace, with ten thousand participants. Some of the demonstrators had come from remote mountain villages. The action of the police resulted in twenty injuries, three of them serious.

The demonstration was a protest directed at the policies of the Greek government. But it was also a protest directed at the lack of interest in the minority on the part of Ankara. Özal approached the Davos talks with great enthusiasm and was careful to avoid all controversial subjects, such as the minority in Western Thrace. Özal's lack of concern at a time when the closing of the associations was causing much agitation in Western Thrace demonstrated the Turkish leader's determination to prevent any issue from getting in the way of a successful outcome of the Davos talks. The Western Thracians saw that they had been sacrificed for the success of the Davos process. As a last resort, they sent cables to the two leaders, expressing the hope that the outstanding problems of the Muslim-Turkish minority of Western Thrace would also be addressed at the talks.

These hopes remained unfulfilled, and the question of Western Thrace was not taken up at the talks. In fact, the prime ministers described the recent events there as a provocation. This showed how far Özal was ready to go in making concessions. In his conversations with journalists, even Papandreou expressed his surprise over Özal's approach to the question of minorities. He admitted that prior to the meeting he had no inkling about the Turkish prime minister's "sincerity and open mindedness" (Oran, p. 190).

Although the Özal government's position at the Davos meeting and afterward caused disappointment in Western Thrace, it did not halt the struggle to uphold minority rights in the region. The movement gained strength among the Turks of Western Thrace under the leadership of Sadık Ahmet and earned the widespread support of the Turkish public in the 1990s.

IV. DEVELOPMENTS IN CYPRUS DURING THE TIME OF THE ÖZAL GOVERNMENTS (1983–1989)

When the Özal government assumed power with the support of the Turkish bourgeoisie following the 12 September regime, it based its foreign policy on the goal of integrating Turkey with the global economy. For this it was necessary to resolve quickly all problems preventing the achievement of this goal. The government saw the question of Cyprus as the greatest obstacle to Turkey's membership of the ECs and the main cause of the reductions in the flow of foreign aid. As a consequence, the Özal government wanted to see progress in the Cyprus negotiations so that there could be an early resolution of the question.

The proclamation of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) even before the Özal government

Box 6-13. Varosha

Varosha is the modern quarter of the city of Famagusta and has developed as a district catering to holiday-makers. After the 1974 operation, the Greek-Cypriot residents of Varosha fled the district. It was fenced in to keep civilians out and became a ghost town. It has been the subject of several-Security Council resolutions. Resolution 550/84 declared that it was unacceptable for Varosha to be settled by people other than its original inhabitants and called for the district to be placed under UN administration. Resolution 789/92 called for the extension of the area of responsibility of UNFICYP (the UN Peacekeeping Force in Cyprus) to include Varosha. On 19 July 1990. Turkey transferred the administration of the district to the Turkish-Cypriot Security Force. After this, the reports of the UN secretary-general began to stress that the maintenance of the status quo in Varosha was the responsibility of the Turkish government. Although the transfer of the administration of Varosha to the Greek Cypriots was mooted in 1993 as a goodwill gesture, contacts falled to yield concrete results. No one is allowed to settle in the district.

(F. KESKIN)

took over the reins of power, however, demonstrated that it could not easily achieve its objectives in Cyprus. Both the Turkish bureaucracy and Denktaş staunchly defended Turkey's traditional policy and stood up against Özal's policies, which were perceived by the public as an easy way out to be achieved by abandoning the cause.

Denktaş was highly disturbed by these conflicting currents within Turkey. At first, he was unable to determine how far the government was ready to go in its policies and proceeded with extreme caution in order to forestall a fait accompli that might come from Ankara. This led him to be more accommodating in the UN-sponsored intercommunal negotiations during the 1980s. Denktaş wanted to avoid a solution reached without his participation, so he tried not to lose the initiative and formulated different proposals. Meanwhile Kyprianou, who enjoyed the full backing of Papandreou, took up an intransigent stand and showed himself to be the side blocking a solution.

The Beginning of Intercommunal Negotiations

Following the interruption of the intercommunal negotiations upon the proclamation of the TRNC, Denktaş submitted to the UN secretary-general Pérez de Cuéllar a series of goodwill proposals on 2 January 1984, designed to revive the talks. These proposals were meant to establish trust between the two sides and included initiatives with respect to Varosha (Box 6-13), opening Nicosia's international airport to traffic, reviving the Committee on Missing Persons, and identifying fields of cooperation between the two communities.

Denktaş's proposals covered a broad field, but the secretary-general submitted a plan dealing only with Varosha. This district was to be placed under temporary UN control pending a final solution of the Cyprus question. The district's limits would be those contained in the Turkish proposal of 5 August 1981. In addition, the Turkish side would refrain from action designed to reinforce its independence. Kyprianou rejected Denktaş's proposals and had an equally negative attitude toward de Cuéllar's plan.

As the de Cuéllar/Denktaş/Kyprianou contacts were still in progress, with the Greek-Cypriot side participating reluctantly, Turkey and the TRNC raised the level of their missions in the two capitals to full embassy status on 17 April 1984. This drew a negative response from the Security Council and interrupted the ongoing intercommunal contacts. But de Cuéllar would keep up his efforts to find a solution.

Contacts were resumed on 10 September in the form of proximity talks. The secretary-general was talking with the two sides one at a time, because Kyprianou refused to meet directly with the Turkish side so long as the TRNC's declaration of independence was not reversed. A draft of an agreement eventually emerged from the proximity talks. According to the draft, the Federal Republic of Cyprus would be an independent, nonaligned, bizonal, bicommunal state with two official languages: Turkish and Greek. In addition to a federal state with its flag and its Constitution, there would be two federated states with their respective flags and Constitutions. The parliament would have two houses. The Turkish Cypriots would have 50% of the seats in the upper house and 30% of the seats in the lower house. The Turkish federated state would cover 29% of the island's territory. The president would be a Greek Cypriot and the vice-president a Turkish Cypriot. All non-Cypriot forces would withdraw from the island.

The two sides went to New York to sign the draft agreement on 17 January 1985. The two community leaders would be meeting for the first time in six years. Denktaş had come to New York to sign the draft agreement that had emerged from the talks. Kyprianou went to Athens after the proximity talks, however, where he met with Papandreou, who warned him not to sign any agreement before the "Turkish occupation" came to an end. In New York, Kyprianou declared that he came to the meeting not to sign the draft agreement but to finalize it. He wanted to renegotiate some of the points on which agreement had been reached. In response to these stalling tactics, Denktas replied that either the draft agreement would be signed or the meeting would come to an end. He firmly refused to reopen negotiations over points that had already been agreed to. When Kyprianou insisted on not signing the draft agreement, the New York meeting ended in failure.

In New York, Denktaş had reached his limit on the concessions he could make. He had agreed to go below the floor of 30% for the territory that would be retained under Turkish-Cypriot sovereignty. He had agreed to give up on insisting that the presidency rotate between the two communities. Most significantly, he had agreed to replace the Turkish guarantee with an international guarantee. These concessions and the draft agreement later would be sharply criticized in certain Turkish quarters.

To understand what really induced Denktaş to agree to these concessions, we have to consider his predicament at that time. First of all, 1985 was an election year, and the steadily strengthening left-leaning parties were criticizing him for being intransigent in order to remain at the helm. There was a feeling among the public that the economic difficulties were the direct result of the inability to find a solution to the question, which meant that the ruling UBP was steadily losing popular support. Furthermore, the Özal government in Turkey was strongly in favor of reaching an early solution. Denktas feared that, if things were left to Turkey, he might be compelled to make even bigger sacrifices. Finally, as an experienced actor on the Cypriot political scene, Denktaş knew the Greek Cypriots well and felt that they were not prepared to come to terms with the Turkish Cypriots. That is why he chose not to be difficult, so that he could expose the Greek Cypriots as the intransigent party.

After the unsuccessful New York meeting, the TRNC conducted a referendum on 5 May 1985 in which the new Constitution was approved. This was followed by elections on 9 June, when Denktaş was reelected president. Prior to the election, the settlers from Turkey were granted citizenship, resulting in a change in the composition of the electorate. This change enabled the UBP to form the new government. Having strengthened his position after the 1985 elections, Denktaş could now return to his previous uncompromising policies.

The TRNC Policy of the Özal Governments

The proclamation of the TRNC on 15 November 1983 came as a nasty surprise to Özal, who was bent on integrating the Turkish economy with the global economy and urgently needed foreign credits to carry out his plans.

Özal was under constant international pressure because of the Cyprus question, which confronted him in all of his economic initiatives. In order to reduce this pressure, Özal announced on 3 January 1984 that the level of Turkish forces in Cyprus would be reduced by 1,500 men. This did not lead to the expected increase in the flow of foreign loans, however. For Özal, Cyprus appeared to be an insurmountable obstacle that stood in the path of an active foreign policy.

The economic embargo imposed on the unrecognized TRNC by the international community had left the Turkish Cypriots completely dependent on Turkey. The economy was kept going through Turkish handouts and was easily affected by developments in Turkey. Consequently, the neo-liberal economic policies that Özal implemented in Turkey starting in 1983 began to influence the northern part of the island.

Özal started by declaring Northern Cyprus a free zone that would attract foreign investments. The Lebanese civil war and the destruction of Beirut had deprived the Eastern Mediterranean of its commercial center. Özal's dream was for the TRNC to fill the void left by Lebanon. He hoped that the multinational companies that would be established in Cyprus would exert their influence on both sides and make possible a political settlement of the question. As a first step in this direction, in July 1984 the banks in Northern Cyprus were allowed to open foreign exchange accounts. But it became apparent very soon that it would not be possible to carry out Özal's plans under the prevailing conditions. Political pressure and the many uncertainties kept international capital away.

With the failure of the free-zone plan, a second plan was adopted. This would restructure the TRNC's economy along the lines of the Turkish economy. The plan was put into effect when Özal paid an official visit to the TRNC on 2 July 1986. His visit was primarily economic, and he was accompanied by prominent businessmen like Sakıp Sabancı, Halit Narin, Ali Koçman, and Şarık Tara. It was intended that these leaders of the Turkish bourgeoisie would invest in the TRNC. The state would stand ready to guarantee their investments.

In December 1986 the Economic Cooperation Protocol was signed by Turkey and the TRNC. The protocol provided a legal framework for the economic relations between the two countries. On the basis of the protocol, all restrictions on currency transfers between the two countries would be lifted, the TRNC's foreign exchange regulations would be revised, customs levies would be reduced by 30%, public expenditures would be curbed, and the age of retirement would be raised. Although Denktas and the UBP approved these terms, they met with strong resistance from the opposition in Cyprus, and especially the labor unions. The resistance was on economic grounds, but the TKP and the CTP also objected on political grounds. As Turkey and the TRNC became more closely integrated, the gulf between the two Cypriot communities was growing, making it harder to find a solution for the division of the island.

Despite all the efforts, Turkish business leaders could not be induced to invest in Cyprus. They cited the bureaucracy and internal squabbles as reasons for staying away. The desire to help the TRNC could not override the profit motive. Investments could not be made merely to further the national interest. The only exception to this rule was Asil Nadir, a Cypriot tycoon whose investments helped boost the economy of the TRNC in the short term. The real beneficiary of these investments, however, was Asil Nadir himself, who profited from the incentives provided by the state.

In addition to strengthening his hand economically in the TRNC, Özal also wanted to strengthen his hand politically. In order to be able to intervene directly in the TRNC's internal politics, he got the settlers from Turkey to set up their own political party, which was known as the Rebirth Party (YDP). Even though this party had no long-term impact on the political life of the country, the manner of its coming into being met with serious disapproval in Turkish-Cypriot circles.

Although Özal formulated economic and political plans for Cyprus during his term in office, it cannot be said that he made a special effort to get international recognition for the TRNC. In fact, such an effort would be in conflict with his goal of finding an early solution to the question of Cyprus. There was one success during this period, however: the admission of the TRNC to the Organization of the Islamic Conference with the status of observer.

Georgios Vassiliou and Renewed Hope for a Settlement of the Cyprus Question

When Georgios Vassiliou bested his seasoned political opponents, Kyprianou and Glafcos Clerides, to become president on 21 February 1988 by obtaining more than 50% of the votes in the Greek-Cypriot zone, he gave the impression that the question of Cyprus was entering a new phase.

Vassiliou had been an outsider in politics. He was a businessman who was also considered to be a "leftist," and throughout his campaign he declared his readiness to talk to the Turkish-Cypriot side. The election of a moderate who gave priority to economic matters as president immediately after Davos was welcomed in most quarters, especially in the U.S.

The election of an apparently conciliatory candidate as president was a source of concern for Denktaş. With Özal, a man of similar inclination, at the helm in Ankara, it is easy to understand why Denktaş kept dwelling on security concerns as of 1988. The first move to resume talks came from Denktaş. On 3 March 1988 he proposed a series of goodwill confidence-building measures involving cooperation in the fields of trade, tourism, the environment, local government, sports, and culture. Declaring that Denktaş was not his counterpart and that he would only speak to Özal and not Denktaş, Vassiliou rejected this offer. But his call for talks directly with Özal went unheeded.

After the intervention and mediation efforts of the UN secretary-general, a round of talks totaling 100 hours took place between the two community leaders from September 1988 to the summer of 1989. Denktaş and Vassiliou held two summits, one in Geneva in September and one in New York in November 1988. Denktaş agreed to free circulation of people but accepted freedom of settlement and acquisition of property only within certain limits. He indicated that he would be flexible on questions of military balance only to the extent that his counterpart would be flexible on the Constitution and proposed a federal system on the Swiss model. Vassiliou called for the demilitarization of Cyprus, which would come under the UN Security Council's guarantee. He also wanted the prospective federal state to be closely linked to the European Community. It proved impossible to reconcile the differing views of the two sides.

On 25 July 1989 the secretary-general submitted a new plan, which came to be known as de Cuéllar's "Set of Ideas." According to this plan, the Federal Republic of Cyprus would consist of two states and would have a constitutional structure made up of two zones and two communities. There would be a numerically balanced force of Greek and Turkish Cypriot units, and the existing level of soldiers would be cut down. The plan had been prepared without consulting Denktas, who rejected it as unacceptable. The opposition was highly critical of this outright rejection of a plan that had come so close to meeting the concerns of the Turkish side. Denktas was openly accused of adopting the position "deadlock is the solution" to further his selfish political interests.

When the negotiations became deadlocked, Denktas submitted a document to the secretary-general on 11 October 1989, asking for an acknowledgment of the right of both Cypriot communities to separate self-determination and an acceptance of the distinct cultural, religious, and national identities of the communities in order to make meaningful negotiations possible. When Vassiliou refused to acknowledge the Turkish Cypriots' right of self-determination, the negotiations came to an end.

Whatever similarities may have existed between the views of Vassiliou and Özal, it was not easy to overcome the entrenched positions of the two sides in Cyprus. There was a feeling that those who were ready to deviate from the established position with radical ideas would be doomed to lose their positions of power. Both Özal in Turkey and Vassiliou in the Greek sector put forth new ideas and different approaches and made pronouncements not heard before; but at the end of the day they were unable to change established policies.

The difficulties associated with the question of Cyprus did not remain confined to the island. They had a very negative effect on Turkish-Greek relations and also affected strategic negotiations within NATO near the end of the 1980s. A typical example of this was the Mersin crisis.

The changes in the USSR after 1989, Papandreou's loss of power in Greece, and Özal's presidency in Turkey ended the Davos process and halted the search for a solution in Cyprus. When the Greek-Cypriot government applied to the European Communities for membership, the question entered a totally new phase.

MELEK FIRAT

Sources (Relations with Greece)

Aktan, Gündüz. Limni Adası'nın Hukukî Statüsü Üzerinde Türk-Yunan Uyuşmazlığı. İstanbul: n.p., 1985.

Barchard, David. Asil Nadir and the Rise and Fall of Polly Peck. London: Victor Gollancz, 1992.

Cemal, Hasan. Özal Hikâyesi. 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi, 1989.

Cıngı, Aydın. Diktadan Demokrasiye Güney Avrupa'nın Yeni Demokrasileri: İspanya, Portekiz, Yunanistan. İstanbul: TÜSES, 1990.

Clogg, Richard. Greece, 1981–89: The Populist Decade. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.

Ertegün, Necati. The Cyprus Dispute and the Birth of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. 2nd ed. Oxford: Rüstem and Brother, 1984.

Featherstone, Kevin, and Kostas Ifantis (eds.). Greece in a Changing Europe. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1996.

Gürel, Şükrü Sina: Tarihsel Boyutları İçinde Türk-Yunan İlişkileri. Ankara: Ümit, 1993.

- İsmail, Sabahattin, 100 Soruda Kıbrıs Sorunu. Lefkoşa: Dilhan Offset, 1992.
- Necatigil, Zaim M. The Cyprus Question and the Turkish Position in International Law. 2nd ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Nejatigil, Z. M. Our Republic in Perspective. Nicosia: Tezel, 1985. Oran, Baskın. Türk-Yunan İlişkilerinde Batı Trakya Sorunu. Updated 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1991.
- Özgür, Özker. Kıbrıs'ta Demokrasi Bunalımları. İstanbul: Cem, 1992.
- Paran, Bora. Bir İmparatorluğun İç Yüzü: Asil Nadir. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1992.

- Stavrou, Nikolaos (ed.). Greece under Socialism: A NATO Ally Adrift. New York: Caratzas, 1988.
- Stearns, Monteagle. Entangled Allies: U.S. Policy toward Greece, Turkey and Cyprus. New York: Council on Foreign Relations Press, 1992.
- Tahsin, Arif Hasan. Geçmişi Unutmadan Geleceğe Bakmak. 2nd ed. Lefkoşa: Işık, 1995.
- Tamkoç, Metin. The Turkish Cypriot State: The Embodiment of the Right of Self-determination. London: K. Rüstem Publishing, 1988.
- Uzgel, İlhan. "Ulusal Çıkar ve Dış Politika: Türk Dış Politikasının Belirlenmesinde Ulusal Çıkarın Rolü 1983–1991." Ph.D. dissertation, AÜ Sosyal Bilimler Enstitüsü, 1997.

Relations with the Middle East

I. RELATIONS WITH ARAB STATES

To understand Turkey's policies in the Middle East during the 1980s, we must look at the changes occurring on the world scene and the policies pursued by the U.S. in the light of these changes.

With the oil shocks of 1973 and 1978, the West had a better grasp of the importance of the Middle East in international affairs. This called for a revision of NATO strategies, which were geared to fend off an attack directed at Europe, and forced the U.S. to redirect its attention to the Middle East in its military strategies developed to deal with the USSR. The Islamic revolution in Iran and the occupation of Afghanistan by the USSR multiplied Washington's anxieties. The Islamic revolution had not only changed the regime in Iran but, by pursuing the aim of exporting revolution to its neighbors, upset the regional balance in a fundamental way.

When Washington lost an important ally in the region and the USSR took advantage of the void thus created and invaded Afghanistan, the U.S. quickly developed a new policy for a region that was vital for it not only because of its oil resources but also because of its strategic location. This policy was designated the "Green Belt." It was aimed at countering the "radical Islam" ideology of Iran through support for those countries that adopted the "moderate Islam" line centered around Saudi Arabia, an archenemy of communism and ready to help finance the project with its oil money. The policy was designed to contain the USSR with a Green Belt while preventing radical Islam from making inroads into the Middle East.

The countries that formed part of the Green Belt were Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Oman, Qatar, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Turkey, and Egypt: Turkey's strategic importance was further enhanced by the Green Belt project because the U.S. intended to use the Turkish bases in the event of disturbances within the region. The decision-makers in Turkey, however, had not forgotten the U.S. arms embargo in force until 1978. Neither had they forgotten the lessons of the 1950s; and they were not ready to abandon the policies that had been implemented since the 1960s. According to these policies, the defense of the Gulf was the responsibility of the Gulf countries and the bases located in Turkey could not be used to intervene in that region. Above all, Washington had always wanted the countries of the region to be loyal and to have stable administrations. Whether they were democratically governed or not was of secondary importance. The 12 September 1980 military coup in Turkey would create a better atmosphere for U.S. expectations.

When examining the causes of the military coup of 12 September 1980, it must not be forgotten that international factors were as important as internal factors. As a matter of fact, during the three years of military administration as well as during the Motherland Party government that came to power in 1983 under Özal, who was the coup's civilian representative, a manageable version of moderate Islam was allowed to develop and was even promoted (see Box 6-3 above). Turkey drifted away from Europe and became more dependent on the U.S., while relations with other countries of the Green Belt were tightened. Turkey reverted to its role of the 1950s and, with the support of the U.S., took over the duty of defender of the West's interests in the region and above all its oil interests. To carry out this task, Ankara pursued an active policy in the Middle East. The main difference between the Middle East policy of the 1980s and the policies of the Democratic Party governments in the 1950s was that, especially after 1983, there was an emphasis on developing economic relations, which reflected Özal's approach to foreign policy. As tighter political and economic relations were forged with conservative Gulf countries during the 1990s, this led to a rise in political Islam and Kurdish nationalism within Turkey.

A. Relations with the Gulf States

As Turkey drifted away from Europe in the wake of the military coup of 12 September 1980, its relations with the Middle East and especially the Gulf States grew closer.

This tightening of relations was not confined to the political field but also included the military and economic fields. Along with the U.S., Saudi Arabia was among the countries that gave support to the new administration established on 12 September. Saudi Arabia remained silent after the banning of the Islamist-oriented National Salvation Party and arrest of its leader, Necmettin Erbakan. King Khalid was among the first heads of state to congratulate Kenan Evren on 12 September. The ruler of Kuwait, Sheikh Jaber al-Sabah, visited Turkey on 8–10 September 1981, and Evren visited Kuwait on 20–22 March 1982. Thus Turkey was becoming interested in the Gulf region for the first time in the Republican era and in an intense manner.

The political rapprochement that began with the 12 September coup was designed to underpin military cooperation in order to enhance the security of the Gulf. It became clear during the subsequent Özal administration that these developments were hatched in Washington.

Both the USSR and the radical Islamic currents emanating from Iran posed a direct threat to the Gulf States. But these states lacked modern and effective armies to ward off these threats. If Washington intervened directly to bolster their defense capabilities, it was likely to provoke the reaction of both Moscow and Tehran. That is why Turkey was included in Washington's plans to ensure the defense of the Gulf. The bases in Turkey would be developed and placed at the disposal of U.S. forces. NATO member Turkey would train and help bolster the armies of the Gulf States to reinforce the security of the Gulf without giving rise to serious reactions. The Turkish leaders who for "selfish national reasons" prevented the use of Turkish bases by the U.S. on the ground that the Gulf region's security had to be the responsibility of the Gulf countries had been driven out. They had been replaced by "dependable, down-to-earth soldiers who understood well the need to protect the interests of the alliance." This greatly facilitated the task of the U.S. (Güldemir, p. 31). From 1980 to 1983 Turkey was able to conclude cooperation agreements in three specific fields with Saudi Arabia and Kuwait: military training, sale of military equipment, and joint investments.

After President Evren's visit to Saudi Arabia on 21–24 February 1984, defense cooperation between Ankara and Riyadh grew closer. The two countries concluded a Cooperation in Military Training and Education and Temporary Assignments Agreement. Under the terms of this agreement, the signatories would assist each other in training military cadets and officers, in the assignment of Turkish officers to Saudi Arabia to learn foreign languages, in training Saudi Arabian officers in Turkish military schools, and in Turkey's response to Saudi requests for military experts and assistance in building and modernizing military installations. During Evren's visit, the finance ministers of the two countries reached an agreement in principle for the governments to support the Turkish-Saudi Joint Investment and Trading Company. In addition, the head of the Union of Chambers and Commodity Exchanges of Turkey and his Saudi counterparts discussed eighteen separate investment projects, the establishment of an investments financing company, the expansion of trade, and various construction projects. In a statement following the visit, Evren declared that Turkey and Saudi Arabia were two active members of the Islamic community, that the Arab-Islamic unity that Turkey wished to see had not yet been fully realized, and that Turkey attributed importance to the Islamic world, to its Arab brothers, and to its relations with Middle Eastern countries. This signaled Turkey's departure from its traditional foreign policy line.

In July 1984 a group of Turkish officers, including F-5 and F-104 pilots, proceeded to Khamis Mushait air base in Saudi Arabia to train Saudi personnel stationed there. This base was located close to the Yemeni border and was assigned the task of defending the oil fields of the region. When the minister of defense, Zeki Yavuztürk, visited Saudi Arabia on 15 July, he also went to Khamis Mushait, where King Khalid praised the work of Turkish military advisors and asked the minister to convey his thanks to Evren.

In September 1984 a Saudi military delegation visited Turkey. Shortly after this visit, the foreign press reported that the Turkish enterprise MKE and Saudi Arabia would undertake the joint production of chemical products in 1985, with the participation of the U.S. and the Federal Republic of Germany.

At about the same time, Turkey and Kuwait got involved in similar military cooperation, with the backing of Saudi Arabia. Turkish officers were sent to Kuwait to help train the army.

The military cooperation of Turkey, Saudi Arabia, and Kuwait soon began to worry the USSR, Iran, and Greece. The USSR made diplomatic representations in Riyadh in which it claimed that the Turkish military mission in Saudi Arabia was part of the U.S. Rapid Deployment Force. The Greek press began to carry reports about Turkey's activities in the Gulf region. Tehran considered Turkey's military cooperation with Gulf States to be directed against itself and kept this cooperation under close scrutiny.

Turkey's rapprochement with Saudi Arabia after 12 September was not confined to foreign policy. This rapprochement also had long-term repercussions in Turkey's domestic politics and raised hackles in many quarters. From 1982 to 1984 the salaries of religious officials sent abroad by Turkey's Administration for Religious Affairs Directorate were being paid by the Rabitat al-Alam al-Islami, an organization set up in Mecca in 1963. This was done in compliance with a decree of the Turkish cabinet. Although Kenan Evren denied the existence of any link to the Rabitat, the investigative journalist Uğur Mumcu revealed not only that was there such a link but that the Rabitat had also been funding numerous religious foundations in Turkey. Saudi Arabia's growing activities in Turkey were not limited to the 12 September period; nor were they confined to the Rabitat's actions.

When the Özal government was formed after the election in November 1983, Vahit Halefoğlu was appointed minister of foreign affairs. He was born in Hatay and spoke fluent Arabic. This was another sign, albeit symbolic, that the new government would pursue the Middle East-oriented policies of its predecessor. During the Özal period the influence of Saudi Arabia in Turkey's economic life grew steadily stronger. When the Özal government obtained a vote of confidence in the parliament on 14 December 1983, its first action was to enact the law allowing foreigners to acquire real estate in Turkey and to promulgate the decree permitting the establishment of special financial institutions that operated without giving or charging interest, because paying and receiving interest on money deposited in banks is not allowed under strict Islamic law. The Constitutional Court of Turkey would later annul the law on the acquisition of real estate, but by then the oil-rich Arabs had profited from the law to purchase choice properties on the Bosphorus.

This became a favorite subject for the Turkish press at the time, but it was overshadowed by Decree No. 83-7506, signed on 16 December, just two days after the Özal government obtained a vote of confidence in the TGNA. This decree regulated the establishment, structure, activities, and liquidation of special financial institutions. Article 13 of the decree stated that the provisions of the Turkish Commercial Law and the Law on Mandatory Payments and Bankruptcy would not apply in the liquidation of these institutions (Mumcu, pp. 137-46). This decree has to be considered along with the decree published in the Official Gazette of 5 August 1984 regarding the establishment in Turkey of the Faisal Finance Corporation and Al Baraka Türk. When Saudis provided capital to establish these special financial institutions in Turkey, they made sure that their capital would be free of legal impediments. Some of the shareholders in these institutions were Arabs, while others were from the close entourage of the prime minister, including his brother Korkut Özal. Saudi capital had begun to influence not only Turkey's economic life but also its political life.

B. Relations with the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC)

Turkey's relations with the OIC developed in step with the development of its relations with the Gulf States. Turkey attended the Third Islamic Summit held at Mecca and Taif on 25-28 January 1981 at the level of head of government for the first time. Its delegation was led by Prime Minister Ulusu. The report adopted by the conference contained references to the "Islamic Ummah" (Community). It also declared that "the best shield to protect Muslims from the dangers confronting them is strict adherence to Islam and Islamic values as a way of life" (http://www.oic-oic .org/oicnew/French/conf/is/3/3rd-is-sum.htm). These expressions were in clear conflict with Turkey's secular principles. The Turkish delegation claimed that the difficulty had been overcome, however, when Ulusu declared in his speech at the conference that Turkey was a secular state and that its foreign policy would be guided by this principle. Turkey referred to its general reservation made at the time it joined the organization in relation to the conference's resolutions calling on members to sever relations with Israel and recommending the establishment of an Islamic Court of Justice.

The most noteworthy event in the Mecca Conference had to do with Cyprus. Until then, the Cypriot Turkish delegation headed by Denktaş had been participating as an observer at meetings of the OIC. Its nameplate bore the inscription "Muslim-Turkish Community of Cyprus." At this conference, the Turkish-Cypriot delegation's nameplate read "Federated State of Cyprus," and this formulation was inserted in the conference's report. At the Dacca meeting of the OIC held from 5 to 11 December 1983, there was a reference to the existence of two separate communities in Cyprus. Although this was an indication of the positive approach of the OIC to the Turkish thesis, none of the conference members recognized the TRNC, causing much disappointment in Ankara (Soysal, p. 738).

Turkey participated at the Fourth Islamic Summit Conference held in Casablanca from 16 to 18 October 1984 at the level of president. This was a sign of the importance that Turkey attributed to the organization. The Islamic countries were quick to respond to Turkey's gesture. President Evren was elected vice-president of the conference and chairman of the Permanent Committee on Economic and Trade Cooperation. The first meeting of the committee was held on 14 November in İstanbul under Evren's chairmanship.

As Turkey developed its relations with Arab states and became more active within the OIC, it sought to use the organization as a platform that would support its foreign policy objectives. At all the summits and ministerial meetings, Turkey introduced the question of Cyprus and appealed to members to recognize the TRNC. After 1986 Turkey also sought action from the OIC in support of the Turks of Bulgaria, but it was disappointed on both of these issues.

The Question of Palestine and Turkey

Turkey's developing relations with the Arab states in the 1980s led to a worsening of relations with Israel. When Israel formally annexed Jerusalem on 31 July 1980, Turkey announced that it did not recognize this fait accompli. On 4 December the Turkish chargé d'affaires in Tel Aviv was recalled to Ankara for consultations. The mission in Tel Aviv was left in the charge of a second secretary. The consulate in Jerusalem was closed, and the consular section of the Tel Aviv embassy was made responsible for Jerusalem. This signified a lowering of relations to the minimum level. Even though it formally participated in the resolutions of the OIC calling on members to sever all relations with Israel and declaring jihad, however, Turkey did not implement these resolutions. Furthermore, Turkey made every effort to have Egypt readmitted to the OIC after its suspension from the organization following the Washington-sponsored Camp David agreement of 1979. Turkey also supported Egypt's Israeli policies.

Turkey condemned the Israeli operation in Lebanon of 30 May 1981 and the Israeli attack on Iraq's reactor in the vicinity of Baghdad on 8 June 1981. When Israel invaded Lebanon on 6 June 1982 and drove the PLO out of that country, Turkey issued a statement calling on Israel to end its aggression. After the massacre at the Palestinian refugee camps of Sabra and Chatila, Evren and foreign minister İlter Türkmen expressed their sympathy with the victims. On 24 September, which had been proclaimed "Day of Solidarity with the Palestinians" by the PLO, special prayers and memorial services were held in mosques throughout Turkey. Although Turkey appeared to stand firmly against Israel, it was revealed in the 1990s that Ankara had collaborated with Tel Aviv in operations carried out against Armenian terrorists in Lebanese camps during the Israeli invasion.

After 1982 PLO leader Yasser Arafat intensified his efforts to organize an international conference that would take up the question of Palestine. When he failed in these efforts, he began to work for a Palestinian state. This coincided with Arafat's second visit to Turkey in 1986. Arafat was warmly received in Ankara, and it was announced that Turkey would welcome an independent Palestine based on the Palestinians' right to self-determination. In December 1987 the Palestinians started attacking Israeli soldiers in the West Bank and Gaza with sticks and stones. This form of resistance, known as the Intifada (see Box 6-16 below), was to go on for five years.

The second step on the road to an independent state in Palestine came from Jordan. In a statement made on 2 August 1988, Jordan's King Hussein announced that he was relinquishing Jordan's claim to sovereignty over the West Bank and East Jerusalem and declared that he recognized the wish of the PLO, the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people, to establish an independent Palestinian state separate from Jordan. Now that it had been offered this territory, the PLO had obtained the possibility of establishing its own state. On 15 November 1988 the Palestine National Council proclaimed the establishment of the independent state of Palestine at its meeting in Algiers. Turkey had recognized Israel eleven months after its establishment. Now it was the fifth country in the world and the first in the Western Bloc to recognize the Palestinian state. Because it was not in control of its territory, Palestine did not have one of the main attributes of a state. That is why some Arab nations would not recognize the new state. In these circumstances, Turkey's support was of great importance to the Palestinians. This support also demonstrated the pro-Arab bias of Turkey's Middle Eastern policy in the 1980s.

D. Difficulties with Iraq and Syria

While Turkey developed its political, military, and economic relations with the Gulf States during the 1980s and pursued an active foreign policy in the Middle East region, it was a different story with Iraq and Syria. In regard to these neighboring countries, there were two questions that emerged in the 1960s and have continued up to the present time. One was the Kurdish question, the result of the oppressive atmosphere reigning in Turkey in the wake of the 12 September coup and the power vacuum in northern Iraq caused by the Iran-Iraq War. The other was the related question of sharing the waters of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, which became more acute with the implementation of the regional development project known by its Turkish acronym as GAP (Güneydoğu Anadolu Projesi: Southeast Anatolia Project).

1. The Kurdish Question

Developments in Iraq and Turkey:

The Kurdish Question Takes Root in the Region

As a result of developments in Iraq and Turkey in 1979, the Kurdish question acquired a new dimension. On 16 July 1979 Saddam Hussein forced the Iraqi leader Ahmed Hassan al-Bakr to resign and took his place. Saddam's objectives were to make Iraq the leader of the Arab states and to turn Iraq into the strongest power in the Gulf. The international scene facilitated the attainment of these objectives. Iran was reeling under the impact of revolution and was in no condition to assert control over the Gulf, while it was using the Dawa Party in Iraq to foment rebellion against Baghdad among the Shiites. After its ostracism in the aftermath of the Camp David agreement, Egypt had lost all claims to leadership among the Arabs. Saddam Hussein believed that the vacuum left by Egypt should. be filled by Iraq and started by consolidating his hold on power. He took both military and police measures against the opposition organizations of the Kurds, Shiites, and Turcomans. In 1979 the Iraqi Communist Party was declared illegal and disbanded. In February 1980 a purge was carried out within the Baath Party itself,

To prevent a new rebellion, the Iraqi Command Council of the Revolution made a decision in December 1979 to end the practice of appointing members of the legislative assembly of the Kurdish Autonomous Region. From then on, the members would be elected by the people of the region, and the assembly would be empowered to pass legislation to develop the region's agriculture, economy, and culture. This move was far from being a democratic reform, however. The Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) and the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK) were barred from participating in the election, and a new plan would be implemented to establish a security belt. Under this plan, large numbers of Kurds and Turcomans would be forced to relocate in southern Iraq. This policy was quick to draw the ire of Ankara. When five Turcomans were executed in January 1980 and nine more on 9 July 1980, the Turkish ambassador in Baghdad was recalled to Ankara for consultations on 31 July. Prime Minister Demirel issued a statement condemning the Iraqi action (Bölükbaşı, pp. 45-50). The outbreak of the Iran-Iraq War at this juncture prevented the crisis from escalating further.

In 1979 there were further developments in the Iraqi Kurdish front. Following the death of Mullah Mustafa Barzani on 1 March, the KDP's Ninth Congress met in November and elected his son, Masud Barzani (see Box 5-17 in Section 5), as party leader. The congress also decided to transfer the party's headquarters from the city of Rezaiyah in Iran to Revanduz in northern Iraq. The KDP, backed by Iran, was about to escalate its struggle against Baghdad and was repositioning itself in Iraq for this purpose. Meanwhile the PUK, which broke away from the KDP in 1964 under the leadership of Jalal Talabani, installed itself farther south in the region of Suleymaniyah and enjoyed the backing of Syria. With these developments, the stage was set for the future power struggle among the Kurds.

The year 1979 was also an important turning point for the Kurds of Turkey. When martial law was declared in the southeastern region following the events in Kahramanmaraş in 1978, it became difficult for the PKK to operate in the region. In May the decision was made to move out of the country, and in July the PKK leader Abdullah Öcalan went to Syria. Contacts had already been made with the PLO and with Abu Jihad. Following talks in Damascus, the PKK was assigned a sanctuary in the Bekaa Valley in Lebanon. After a short stay in Syria, Öcalan moved on to the Bekaa Valley. This introduced a new element to the Kurdish question. Until 1984 Öcalan was engaged in the task of building up his organization. The PKK fighters in the Bekaa Valley were being given military training by Palestinian guerrillas, while contacts with Talabani resulted in the PUK fundraising for the PKK in Libya. In this way, several Kurdish movements made ready for the struggle to establish a place for themselves in the region, where a power vacuum would emerge after 1980.

The Iran-Iraq War: Syria and the Kurdish Movements Get Together to Fill a Vacuum

On 17 September 1980 Iraq unilaterally abrogated the Treaty of Algiers that it had signed with Iran, and on 22 September Iraqi forces invaded Iran. This was the beginning of the Iran-Iraq War that would go on for the next eight years. The 12 September administration, which had seized power in Turkey a few days earlier, declared its neutrality. This stance was maintained for eight years, into the Özal government's term in office.

The Iran-Iraq War affected both Turkey and the balance of power in the region. As the hostilities were mostly concentrated in the southern theater, Baghdad kept most of its forces there. This left a power vacuum in the north. The Kurdish organizations and especially the KDP and the PUK took advantage of this situation and assumed control of numerous districts in the region. Both Iran and Syria supported the Kurds with material and logistical help. Iran did this as Iraq's adversary, while Syria was seeking to assume leadership of the Arabs by weakening Iraq. On 12 November 1980 the Democratic National Patriotic Front of Iraq was established in Damascus. Among its members were the PUK and the Communist Party of Iraq, and their objective was the overthrow of the Iraqi regime. Soon afterward the KDP, which had been excluded from the group in Damascus, got together with the Communist Party of Iraq and the United Socialist Party of Kurdistan to establish the Democratic Iraqi Front in northern Iraq. The Democratic Iraqi Front enjoyed the support of both Iran and Syria. These developments also had an effect on Turkey. The PKK used the KDP and the PUK to obtain Syrian help and, taking advantage of the instability in the region, completed its preparations for its subsequent action against Turkey.

As Syria, Iran, and the Kurdish organizations stepped up their cooperation, Ankara began to cooperate with Baghdad. This new tilt toward Baghdad was seen when Iraq appealed to Ankara to release more Euphrates water in support of its eight-year plan to irrigate and develop northern Iraq. This was done at a time when Turkey was filling the reservoir of the newly constructed Karakaya Dam. Although Ankara turned down Iraq's request for more water, it did agree to the establishment of a joint technical committee to consider Iraq's requirements. On 19 December 1980 the two governments signed an agreement on cooperation in the fields of petroleum, irrigation, and transport. In addition, important steps were taken to develop economic cooperation. On 10-12 August 1981 the deputy prime minister of Iraq, Taha Ramadan, visited Ankara, where a trade agreement was signed that provided for the import of Iraqi oil in exchange for Turkish export products. Soon Iraq became Turkey's largest export market after the Federal Republic of Germany. In the course of this visit, an agreement was signed to boost the capacity of the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık oil pipeline. Iraq had turned down Turkey's proposal to do this before the outbreak of war. Now that the oil installations in the Persian Gulf had been destroyed by Iranian military action, Iraq depended on the Syrian and Turkish pipelines for its exports. Baghdad proposed that the annual capacity of the Turkish pipeline be raised from 35 million tons to between 45 and 50 million tons.

As relations with Iraq grew closer, tension increased in relations with Syria. The biggest problem was the activities of the Turks and Kurds who fled from Turkey after 12 September and were now collaborating with Armenians in Syria. During the visit of the Syrian minister of justice to Ankara on 15–19 June 1981, an agreement on Extradition and Mutual Judiciary Assistance in Penal Matters was signed. This agreement was not comprehensive enough to give Turkey full satisfaction, however. It did not include political refugees. The agreement had a provision declaring that those resorting to violence could not claim to be political refugees, but this was of doubtful value because in practice the Syrians had a different way of interpreting concepts. When Turkey sought the extradition of terrorists who had fled to Syria after 12 September, Damascus declared that there were no terrorists on its territory and that the Turkish nationals in question were political refugees. Despite the agreement, illegal crossings from Syria to Turkey could not be prevented, and Turkey was forced to construct a road running along the frontier and to establish mobile patrols to police the border.

This Syrian policy had interesting effects on the PKK. Between 15 and 26 July 1981 the organization held its first conference to discuss the Middle East, Turkey, and "Turkish Kurdistan" in its camp located on the Lebanese-Syrian border. The following decisions were made at the conference: to accelerate training programs in the Syriancontrolled region, to establish contacts with all substantial groups in the region, especially the Kurdish groups in Iraq, to "return to the country, and to take the political and military steps to make this possible" (İmset, pp. 88-90). Under these decisions the PKK established its main contact with the Syrian administration. For the first time, personal contact was established with Rifad Assad, the brother of president Hafez Assad and the head of Syrian intelligence. Rifad Assad felt sympathy for the PKK and its cause. The intensification of training activities and the efforts to secure outside assistance were the preludes to the armed struggle that the PKK would start in Turkey in 1983.

In 1982 two important developments also had an impact on Turkey: the balance in the Iran-Iraq War shifted and Israel invaded Lebanon. Until then, the fighting between Iran and Iraq had taken place on Iranian territory. In 1982 the Iranian regime eliminated the entire internal opposition and got the people to direct their energies toward winning the war. In July the Iraqi army was expelled from Iran, and the battleground shifted to Iraq.

Turkey had declared its neutrality at the outset and had maintained its political and economic relations with both countries. Ankara had based its policy on the assumption that the war would be of short duration, that there would be no winner or loser, and that the status quo would be preserved. The new situation that appeared to be emerging was against Turkey's interests. Iran was intent on exporting Islamic revolution and now had invaded Iraq, a country with which Turkey shared economic interests in the form of the Kirkuk-Yumurtalik pipeline. Ankara could not remain indifferent to the new developments and warned Tehran through public announcements not to harm the operation of the pipeline. In August 1982 Prime Minister Ulusu traveled to Tehran and personally informed his Iranian counterpart of Ankara's concerns.

When the front shifted to Iraq's territory, this also affected regional balances. Syria took advantage of this situation to weaken Iraq further. The two oil pipelines crossing Syrian territory and carrying Iraq's oil to the export terminals at Banias and Tripoli were shut down. These pipelines were Iraq's only export outlet other than the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline crossing Turkish territory. In addition, Syria closed its border with Iraq in conformity with the agreement signed by its foreign minister during his visit to Tehran. As a result of Syria's action, Iraq became completely dependent on the Kirkuk-Yumutalık pipeline to export its oil. This dependency on Turkey lasted until 1985, when the Iraq-Saudi Arabia pipeline was brought into operation. It was this economic dependency on Turkey and the convergence of Turkish and Iraqi policies toward the Kurds that enabled Turkey to reach easy agreement with Iraq to carry out operations in the region when the PKK stepped up its activities in later years.

From Turkey's perspective, another significant regional development was the invasion of Lebanon by Israel and the effect of this invasion on the activities of the PKK. During the Israeli attack on PLO camps, twelve PKK fighters were killed and a similar number taken prisoner by the Israeli army. Despite these losses, the PKK emerged stronger from the clashes. The resistance of the PKK fighters against Israel earned them the sympathy of both Palestinian organizations and Damascus. After this, the PKK established itself in the locations vacated by the Palestinians. The camp known as the Mahzun Korkmaz Academy was set up and became engaged in more intense military training and ideological indoctrination. Relations with the rapidly developing Kurdish movements in northern Iraq and Europe were reinforced. Israel's incursion into Lebanon turned the PKK into an element in the region that had to be reckoned with. It was now ready to launch major operations in Turkey itself.

Turkey was very concerned with the Syriansupported activities of ASALA and those of the PKK in Lebanon. In March 1983 minister of foreign affairs Ilter Türkmen visited Damascus to convey Turkey's misgivings and issue a warning. Damascus responded by denying any links with terrorist activities directed against Turkey. In subsequent visits at lower levels and in official notes, Ankara hardened its tone and conveyed the message that Turkey would have to resort to force if Syria did not change its ways and if it became necessary. Turkey's tough stand made Syria take a step back. The ASALA and PKK forces in its territory had to relocate to Iran, northern Iraq, and the Bekaa Valley. There were two reasons for Syria's retreat: its relations with the U.S. were very strained at the time and it was facing political instability at home. The deterioration of the health of president Hafez Assad following a heart attack that year brought about a power struggle among various military factions, including one led by his brother, Rifad Assad. Syria was forced to direct its attention to the domestic scene until Hafez Assad managed to curb his brother and regain full control in 1984.

Turkish Operations in Northern Iraq and Their Effect on the PKK

The PKK's relocation from Syria to the Bekaa Valley and to northern Iraq was causing concern in Ankara. After talks with Iraq's government, an agreement was concluded to boost the flow of oil through the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline. İmmediately after this, in February 1983, an Agreement on Border Security and Cooperation was signed. This agreement allowed both parties to conduct "hot pursuit" operations into the neighbor's territory, after giving prior notification. Turkey had thus established the legal basis for its cross-border operations against the PKK. When PKK militants killed three Turkish soldiers at Uludere in the province of Hakkari on 10 May 1983, Ankara took action and launched an operation on 26 May with the participation of 7,000 soldiers. The force penetrated five kilometers into Iraq in the region between Zakho and Amadiyah. At the same time, the Iraqi army launched an operation from south to north. During Turkey's operations in Iraq, more damage was inflicted on KDP and PUK camps than on PKK camps. The KDP released a statement claiming that the Iraqi army was overstretched and incapable of eliminating the Kurdish resistance because of the war with Iran, so it was borrowing forces from Turkey to carry out this mission. The KDP announced that the Turkish objective was to destroy KDP bases in Iraq in the framework of a plot concocted against the Kurdish liberation movement and ended with a condemnation of the Turkish operation.

The KDP did not confine itself to condemning Ankara's action. Barzani also made a proposal to PKK leader Öcalan for closer cooperation. The protocol containing the Principles of Solidarity between the KDP and PKK was signed in July 1983. The protocol also provided for developing relations with other revolutionary organizations in the region. It called for struggling against imperialism and especially U.S. imperialism, resisting imperialist plans and plots in the region, and relying on the strength of the people of Kurdistan in this struggle (Imset, p. 101).

s.b.f. Kütüpelanesi In 1983 the PKK began to implement its "professional guerrilla war" and in 1984 completed the organization of its military wing known as Kurdistan Liberation Units (HRK: Hezen Rizgariye Kurdistan). In line with the decision to herald the establishment of the HRK with spectacular actions, operations were mounted under the code name "August Thrust." On 15 August, in the district of Eruh in Siirt province, a military outpost was attacked, resulting in the death of a soldier and the wounding of six others plus three civilians. This was followed by an attack with machine-gun fire against another outpost located in the district of Şemdinli in Hakkari province. The PKK apnounced that the armed resistance had commenced, even though no major operations other than the Eruh and Şemdinli operations were mounted until 1985.

The Turkish public had not yet grasped the seriousness of the PKK operations, but important progress had been made in strengthening border security through representations made in Baghdad and Damascus. During the visit to Baghdad of Foreign Minister Halefoğlu and the deputy chief of the General Staff, Gen. Necdet Öztorun, the Turkey-Iraq Security Protocol was signed on 15 October 1984. This protocol was based on the Treaty of Friendship and Good Neighborliness signed on 29 March 1946 and allowed both states to engage in hot pursuit up to five kilometers inside the territory of the other signatory. This protocol was terminated by Iraq at the conclusion of the Iran-Iraq War, but it did provide Turkey with the legal basis to undertake its operations in northern Iraq in 1986 and 1987.

The main opposition to the 1984 Turkey-Iraq Security Protocol came from Iran as well as from the KDP and PUK, which enjoyed the backing of Iran. The Speaker of the Iranian parliament, Hashemi Rafsanjani, declared: "Iraq is defending its oil-producing region with the help of a NATO state. Turkey has to be warned not to disregard the wishes of the Iraqi nation. We will not allow the Baath Party to remain in control of the region much longer" (Foreign Broadcast Information Service [FBIS]/WE, 22 October 1984, quoted in Gündoğan, p. 5). The PUK decided to end the negotiations with Baghdad that had been going on since 1 December 1983. The KDP declared that the protocol was a crime against the people of Iraq.

Iraq harbored suspicions that Turkey might still have historical claims on the Mosul-Kirkuk region. And yet it signed the Security Protocol with Turkey, which allowed the Turkish army to enter the region, because of the threat from the Kurdish opposition as it took advantage of the power vacuum in the region. Another important reason for signing the protocol was that, as noted earlier, Iraq could only export oil, on which it was utterly dependent to keep its economy afloat, through the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline. This situation would change somewhat when the oil pipeline to Saudi Arabia was completed in 1985. By then, negotiations with Ankara were underway for a second pipeline through Turkey, which would be completed in 1987.

Soon after the Security Protocol with Iraq was concluded, Turkey started pressing Syria for a similar agreement. In December 1984 President Evren addressed a letter to Hafez Assad, proposing joint action against terrorism in the region. At a time when his power was being challenged by a number of power centers, including his own brother, Assad agreed to the Turkish proposal. Negotiations led to the conclusion of a Border Security Protocol, signed on 5 March 1985. Syria had made a tactical move once again and taken a step back because of internal difficulties.

After signing security protocols with Iraq and Syria, Turkey set up the system of village guards and went for the military option in its efforts to solve its Kurdish problem as the PKK was busy politicizing the struggle. In 1985 it set up the Kurdistan National Liberation Front (Eniya Rizgariya Netewayi Kurdistan: ERNK), its political arm. Taking advantage of Turkey's harsh military measures in the region, the ERNK adopted policies designed to win over the local population to its cause. Starting in 1985, the PKK started becoming a mass movement. The PKK directed its attention to Turkey because Ankara's policies were alienating the local population and pushing people into the PKK camp. Another reason was that the PKK in northern Iraq got involved in armed clashes with the local Kurdish fighters (peshmergas), which led the KDP to suspend its relations with the PKK. The KDP was uneasy about the growing strength of the PKK in its region and was feeling Turkey's pressure, with the constant threat of hot pursuit into areas under its control. The KDP demanded that the PKK either return to Turkey or move farther south and out of the area under KDP's control.

Turkey's second operation into Iraq came when twelve gendarmes were killed at Uludere by PKK militants on 12 August 1986. Within three days, on 15 August, twenty Phantom fighters conducted an operation against targets in northern Iraq, focusing especially on KDP camps and killing 150 peshmergas. When it became clear that such operations would continue, the TGNA passed a law on 3 September, authorizing the government to conduct hotpursuit operations on the basis of cabinet decrees, after the permission of the neighboring country concerned had been obtained.

The Turkish operation of 1986 inflicted serious damage to the Kurdish movements in Iraq. Compelled to act in solidarity, the KDP and PUK concluded a cooperation agreement. Like the KDP, the PUK also began to receive aid from Iran. The most serious reaction to Turkey's operation came from Libya. The operation brought about a split between the KDP and the PKK. After the punishment inflicted by the Turkish air force, the KDP and the PUK were not prepared to consort with the PKK any longer.

After the northern Iraq operation, Turkey went about mending its relations with Syria. In August 1986 a bomb attack on the munitions factory at Kırıkkale near Ankara occurred. In November 1986 several persons of Syrian and Jordanian nationality were arrested on charges of spying on behalf of Syria. Some of those arrested admitted to carrying out the attack on the munitions factory. In Turkey this led to a public outcry and a call for tough measures against Syria in self-defense. But Ankara chose to follow a different course and made an effort to mend relations with Syria. Ankara refused to heed the lead of the U.S., which had severed diplomatic relations with Syria and advised its NATO allies to follow suit. Ankara also announced that it would not allow the base at Incirlik to be used by the U.S. for a possible air strike against Syria.

In 1987 it was assumed that Turkey had isolated the PKK in the region and that now its activities would begin to wane, but this was not case. Following the northern Iraq operation, the PKK's relations with the KDP came under strain. At its third congress, the PKK decided that it would return to Turkey to target the village guards system that had been set up in 1985. The year 1987 proved to be one of the bloodiest. Assuming that it had deprived the PKK of its foreign backing, Ankara reestablished the system of the village guards, thereby showing that it would not consider any solution for the problem other than the military one. The PKK took advantage of the opportunity thus offered by Ankara by stepping up violence and confronted the local population with the choice of backing either the authorities or the PKK. As a result of increased popular support, it became a force to be reckoned with.

When the PKK killed fourteen people on 22 February 1987 in a village in Hakkari province, Turkey mounted another operation in northern Iraq (with thirty combat aircraft) on 4 March 1987. At a time when relations with Iran were unusually strained because of the possibility that Iran might damage the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline, some people in Turkey started calling for an extension of the scope of the operation. The hawks in Ankara were insisting that the object of the operation (in addition to neutralizing the PKK) was to control the source of the oil—in other words, Iraq. They even suggested the occupation of a part of the region. Prime Minister Özal declared that Turkey had no designs on Mosul-Kirkuk but added that Turkey would be more actively involved in the region if Turkish security came under threat.

Turkey's 4 March 1987 operation had broken the KDP-PKK connection. Barzani's KDP then severed its relations with the PKK, and in April 1987 it unilaterally annulled the 1983 protocol. In May the PKK was declared a terrorist organization. It was announced that Turkey was a friend and that the KDP needed Ankara's friendship.

The void left by the KDP was filled by Talabani and his PUK. The PKK and PUK became allies in 1988. The PUK spokesman asserted that their area of operations was not confined to northern Iraq and that they were ready to extend their operations to Turkey if need be. The attitude of the Kurdish organizations of northern Iraq toward the PKK and toward Turkey was a function of their relations with Baghdad.

Özal's Syrian Visit

With its operations in northern Iraq, Turkey had demonstrated that it would resort to tough action in the region when necessary. The infiltrations of the PKK from Syria were troubling Ankara. Since 1979 Syria had been providing most of the PKK's foreign support in the form of a safe haven, funds, and identity papers for PKK militants fleeing Turkey. It was allowing the PKK to set up representative offices and propaganda bureaus and to organize its conferences and congresses. Damascus allowed the PKK to set up its camps in Lebanon to carry out military training. Prime Minister Özal arranged an official visit to Damascus in July 1987. This was just before an election, and Özal was seeking to impress public opinion with a successful visit. Özal's retinue included the ministers of foreign affairs and of the interior plus high-level officials like Hiram Abas from MIT (the National Intelligence Organization). In the talks that took place, the Syrian position remained unchanged regarding PKK terror. According to Syrian authorities, Öcalan and the PKK fighters were political refugees, and the government was very sensitive about terrorism; but cross-border operations were not always preventable because of the length of the frontier with Turkey, in spite of the efforts made. Syria raised the issue of the sharing of waters and asked for an agreement that would release a specific volume of water in the Euphrates River for Syria's use.

During Özal's Syrian visit, two protocols were signed. The protocol that related to security provided that the two sides would not tolerate terrorist activities on their territories directed at the other side and agreed to return those militants who had participated in armed action. The second protocol, which had to do with economic cooperation, provided for the release of 500 cubic meters of water per second to Syria on the Euphrates River.

Although Özal's visit to Damascus did not produce any long-term results, it did have the effect of inducing Syria to remove all of the PKK camps on its soil and transfer them to the Bekaa Valley. Damascus continued to turn a blind eye to PKK militants who were crossing its territory on their way to Turkey, however. Özal translated his visit to Syria into an electoral victory, but the results of the visit were far from being a success scored against the PKK, as claimed by his party campaigners.

The visible improvement in relations between Turkey and Syria was causing apprehension in Iraq. Although Turkey gave Iraq $1 billion in credits in 1987, the Iraqi government was uneasy about having been left out of the negotiations over the sharing of the waters of the Euphrates and its nonparticipation in the agreement reached on this subject. Furthermore, Iraq adopted a new get-tough policy in northern Iraq to reestablish its control in the region after the Turkish operations. This policy was affecting the region's Turcomans and causing strains between Ankara and Baghdad. This situation would get even worse after the end of the Iran-Iraq conflict.

The End of the Iran-Iraq War and Turkey's Problem of Kurdish Refugees

With the ending of the Iran-Iraq War in 1988, the Kurdish question came up as a major issue preoccupying the international community and causing much anxiety in Turkey. In March the Iranian army occupied Halabja, a town close to the Iranian border in the region of Suleymaniyah. The Iranian army had the backing of the Kurds in this operation. During the operation, Iraq used chemical weapons, causing mass fatalities among the Kurds. Soon after this event, Iraq recovered the initiative, checked the advancing Iranian army, and forced Tehran to agree to a cease-fire.

When the Iran-Iraq War ended on 17 July 1988, Baghdad was able to direct its full attention toward northern Iraq. The seasoned Iraqi troops were sent against the Kurdish opposition groups that had been engaged in an armed struggle for eight years in northern Iraq. Eight hundred villages were destroyed. Roughly 250,000 Kurds from the region were resettled in central and southern Iraq in small clusters consisting of five families. The purpose of this policy was to create an uninhabited zone along the border. In August the Iraqi forces used chemical weapons against the Kurds living in the valleys close to the Turkish-Iraqi border. Recalling the events at Halabja, the Iraqi Kurds fled toward Turkey and Iran. When Iran closed its border, the refugees began to mass at the Turkish border.

Ankara was faced with a dilemma. On the one hand, the international community was insistently urging Turkey to admit the Kurdish refugees. On the other hand, Turkish public opinion had developed negative attitudes toward Kurds after eight years of insurrection by the PKK. In addition, the refugees would impose an economic burden and increase the likelihood of PKK infiltrators coming into Turkey along with the refugees. These factors were precluding the opening of the frontier to the mass of refugees waiting to get in. Also, Jalal Talabani, the leader of the PUK, who had previously criticized Turkey for allegedly killing women and children belonging to the PKK, visited Washington in April 1988. Ankara perceived this visit as a possible sign of the U.S. desire to implement the plan of creating a Kurdish client state that would thwart the USSR's efforts to reach the Gulf. There was concern in Ankara that the instability of the region might allow the U.S. project to be carried out.

At first Turkey announced that its border with Iraq had been closed and that those who had already entered Turkey had been returned to Iraq. As masses of refugees pressed against the border and international pressure mounted, however, Turkey relented and allowed the Kurds to cross over onto the Turkish side and remain there for a limited period. Two days later, Ankara announced that the refugees would be granted temporary residence but would not be granted political refugee status.

At this point, under the terms of the 1984 protocol, Iraq sought permission to exercise the right of hot pursuit vis-à-vis the Kurds. Although Turkey had mounted operations in Iraq on three occasions in the exercise of the right of hot pursuit, Ankara, which already was under pressure from international public opinion, turned down Baghdad's request. Baghdad was informed that those fleeing Iraq were being disarmed as they were admitted to Turkey and that they would not be allowed to carry out any activities hostile to Iraq while in the country. Iraq then denounced the hot-pursuit protocol, while Turkey announced that the Kurds showed no signs of having been subjected to chemical-weapon attacks.

By September 1988 Turkey had admitted 63,000 Iraqi Kurds, who were housed in twelve separate camps. Turkey was confronted with a serious refugee crisis. It was being constantly criticized by Western quarters for neglecting the living conditions of the refugees. The matter had also become a hot domestic issue. It was noted in opposition circles that Iran, which had supported the Kurds throughout the war, had closed its borders to the refugees. The opposition was against straining relations with Baghdad. Indeed, it called for making common cause with Iraq in fighting the Kurds. Özal ignored all of these voices when opening the border gates to the refugees. He had applied for membership in the ECs in 1987 and wanted to improve Turkey's image as a country that was concerned about human rights. Özal also wanted the votes of the people of the southeastern region in the upcoming local elections.

The question of Kurdish refugees had long-term effects on Turkey. The close relations with Iraq, going back to 1980, came to an end. In reaction to Turkish policies, Iraq hardened its approach to the Turcomans living in northern Iraq. Twenty-five of them were executed, and the Turcomans of Kirkuk were forcibly relocated in southern regions of Iraq. Furthermore, when the Iraqi army left the region, the PKK took over the empty camps. Finally, as a result of this episode, Turkey obtained the chance to establish a dialogue with the community leaders in northern Iraq.

In 1989 both the PKK and Turkey hardened their positions. On 17 August the chief of the General Staff, Necip Torumtay, declared that the armed struggle would be suppressed by military force. On the same day, Prime Minister Özal stated that no political measures were being contemplated for the region and that military operations would be stepped up. This meant that henceforth the military would take the lead in policy-making. These tough measures did not cow the PKK, which stepped up its attacks on civilians, especially teachers, doctors, and civil servants. The local inhabitants were forced to choose between the security forces and the PKK; this allowed the PKK, which was more effective, to gain new recruits and get additional support.

The struggle against the PKK automatically placed Turkey and Syria in confrontation. On 1 October 1989 Özal openly criticized Syria for its hostile attitude toward Turkey and expressed serious doubts about whether Syria was complying with the 1987 protocol. He also played his trump card: if Syria continued to violate the 1987 protocol and kept on supporting the PKK, Turkey would then ignore the second protocol signed in 1987 and not release the 500 cubic meters per second of Euphrates water as promised.

Syria did not want to give up its most effective weapon, the PKK, before it had settled the question of water sharing with Turkey once and for all. Turkey's tough talk elicited a tough Syrian response. On 21 October 1989 two Syrian MIG-21 combat aircraft violated Turkish airspace in the district of Samandağ in Hatay province and shot down a civilian Turkish plane conducting a topographic survey. Although Damascus announced that the incident was the result of an error, that Turkey would be paid compensation, and that those responsible would be punished, this did not appease the Turkish public. Syria's policy was enunciated by Jamil Assad (the other brother of Hafez Assad). Although he had no official position, he exercised considerable influence in the Syrian administration. Jamil Assad declared in November that it was necessary to set up a Kurdish state in the region and admitted that Syria was giving political and logistic support to the PKK. In response to this, the scheduled visit of the Turkish minister of the interior, Abdülkadir Aksu, to Syria was canceled. At a time when relations between the two countries were under growing strain, the Syrian information minister, Muhammad Salman, told a Greek-Cypriot journalist in an interview that Hatay was not a part of Turkey. This showed that Syria was about to inflame an old issue.

2. The Question of Water The Background

The question of the sharing of the waters of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers had been on the agenda of all negotiations involving Turkey, Iraq, and Syria since the 1960s, but it became a contentious issue in the 1980s. From being a technical question, it now became a political issue. The best example of the use of a natural resource as a potent weapon in political relations was provided by the Arabs during the oil crisis of the 1970s. For a long time Turkey did not consider using water as a tool of its foreign policy; nor did it have a developed water policy. As the PKK terror became the most pressing question on its agenda in the 1980s, however, and the extent of the links between Syria and the PKK became more apparent, Ankara was led to link the issues of water and terror and to use water as an element of its Middle East policy to such a degree that in 1995 the foreign minister, Deniz Baykal, was led to declare: "as a neighbor, Syria must stop playing host to the headquarters of a terrorist organization. Syria might think that the hand that is soiled with blood can be washed with greater amounts of water. But Turkey will never agree to bargain with water against the use of terror" (Tür, pp. 105-6). Even as he made this assertion, Baykal was revealing how closely the two issues were interlinked.

The question of water in the Middle East can be described as the sharing of the waters of the Euphrates, Tigris, and, from Turkey's vantage point, the Orontes rivers (Box 6-14). These rivers have been essential for farming since time immemorial. The question of the sharing of

s.b.r Kütü! Hanesi

Box 6-14. Physical Features of the Euphrates, Tigris, and Orontes Rivers and the Consumption Targets Set by the Parties

The Murat and Karasu rivers in eastern Turkey join to form the Euphrates River, with a total length of 2,935 kilometers. The segment of the river flowing through Turkey is 1,170 kilometers. In the course of the year the water flow fluctuates from a minimum of 200 cubic meters per second (cusecs) to a maximum of 4,000 cusecs. The total annual flow is 35,58 billion cubic meters.

The Batman River in southeastern Turkey and other tributaries come together to form the Tigris River, which is 1,900 kilometers in length. The Turkish segment of the river is 523 kilometers. Its flow fluctuates from a minimum of 240 cusecs to a maximum of 6,000 cusecs, with a total annual flow of 48,67 billion cubic meters.

The Orontes has its source in Lebanon: Its trajectory in Lebanon is 40 kilometers, in Syria 120 kilometers, and in Turkey 88 kilometers, until it reaches the Mediterranean Sea at Hatay. The Orontes is 248 kilometers in length, with an annual flow of 1.2 billion cubic meters. Although Turkey has been seeking to include the Orontes River in the negotiations over water rights, Syria has not agreed to this. It will be recalled that Syria does not accept that Hatay is under Turkish sovereignty and hence does not consider the Orontes a shared river.

(M. FIRAT)

The Water Potential of the Euphrates and Tigris Basins and the Consumption Targets of Riparian States (in billions of cubic meters per year)

| TURKEY SYRIA IRAQ  | TOTAL   |
|--|---|
| Euphrates  | 1000  |
| Water Potential 31.58 (88.8%) 4.00 (11.2%) 0.00 (—)  | 35.58 (100%)  |
| Consumption Targets18.42 (35%)11.50 (22%)23.00 (43%)   | 52.92 (100%)  |
| Tigris   |   |
| ·Water Potential 25.24 (51.9%) 0.00 (—) 23.43 (48.1%   | 6) ,48.67 (100%)  |
| Consumption Targets 6.87 (13%) 2.60 (4.8%) 45.00 (83%)   | 54.47 (100%)  |
| Control Contro | · 在1000年中的中国中国的中国中国的中国中国的中国中国的中国的中国中国的中国的中国的 |

Source: Department of Regional and Cross-Border Rivers of the MFA,

the waters was placed on the agenda as of the 1960s, as the waters started being used also for nonagricultural purposes. In addition, Iraq and Syria started claiming that Turkey, which had made little use of these rivers until then, was building dams that would reduce the flow, especially of the Euphrates, with very negative effects on agricultural production in the downstream countries.

Previously the Euphrates and Tigris had been the subject of bilateral agreements (Box 6-15). When Turkey undertook the construction of the Keban Dam in 1964, Syria declared in September that the use of cross-border rivers should be the subject of a multilateral agreement. In 1965 Iraq raised the subject and proposed holding a meeting of the three countries to reach an agreement. Turkey responded by saying that an arrangement over rivers should cover not just the Tigris and Euphrates but also the Orontes, which flows through Syria before entering Turkey. Syria objected to this, and the tripartite meeting failed to materialize. During the construction of Keban, the largest dam in the region, Turkey signed an agreement on 31 August 1966 with the U.S. Agency for International Development (AID) for a loan of $40 million. Turkey undertook to continue its efforts to reach an agreement with the governments of Syria and Iraq. Should these efforts fail, Turkey would release adequate quantities of water to meet the needs of downstream countries in the course of filling the dam's reservoir. In the protocol concluded with AID, this quantity was fixed at 350 cusecs. After consultations with the governments of Iraq and Syria, however, this quantity was raised, first to 400 then to 450 cusecs.

With the completion of the Keban Dam, the filling of the dam's reservoir began in March 1974. Both Iraq and Syria started complaining that they were receiving less Euphrates water than had been agreed to. When Turkey announced that it would not be able to release more than 100 cusecs of water for some months, the arguments grew more acrimonious. Syria's request for a tripartite meeting was turned down by Turkey; but when the amount of water released was raised to 300 cusecs, relations resumed their normal course. Immediately after the construction of the Keban Dam, Syria undertook the construction of Tabqa Dam on the Euphrates River in 1975, which was to bring about differences between Syria and Iraq.

Water was now the most important element affecting relations among the three countries. This was demonstrated during the construction of the Karakaya Dam in Turkey on the Euphrates in 1976, when relations became very strained. On 20 November 1977 Iraq halted the flow of oil in the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline. Although Baghdad declared that this was done to secure payment of $330 million that it claimed Turkey owed Iraq, the real reason was that the flow of water in the Euphrates would be reduced during the construction of the Karakaya Dam. The interruption of the flow of oil was greatly harming the Turkish economy. Iraq stated that the negotiations over the payment of Turkey's oil debt could only start after the Euphrates flow returned to its normal level. When Ankara gave assurances that this would happen, Iraq signed an agreement with Turkey in August 1978. The agreement provided for the payment of Turkey's outstanding debt

Box 6-15. Bilateral Treaties on Rivers between Turkey and Syria and Iraq

1. Agreements on Rivers between Turkey and Syria
Two agreements concluded by Turkey and France, acting on behalf of its mandate Syria, contain provisions relating to rivers. Article 12 of the Ankara Agreement of 1921 provides that the Kuveik Stream will be shared equitably by Aleppo and the region that remains Turkish in the north in a manner that will satisfy both sides. To meet the needs of the region, the city of Aleppo will also be able to draw water from the Euphrates on Turkish territory with its own financial resources. This provision was designed to ensure equitable sharing. The Convention on Friendship and Good Neighborly Relations of 30 May 1926 provided in article 13 that the two countries would cooperate in Improving efficiency in the use of water.

2. Treaty of Friendship and Good Neighborliness of 29 March 1946 between Turkey and Iraq Annex 1 of the treaty is the Protocol on Regulation of the Waters of the Tigris, Euphrates, and Their Tributaries. This deals with joint efforts to exploit these rivers by bringing them under control.

Article 4 of the protocol is especially noteworthy. This article provides that Turkey must reach agreement with Iraq in connection with all structures on these rivers, including dams. The whole sense and purpose of the protocol is to ensure Iraq a regular and dependable supply of water, and it even imposes financial burdens on Iraq to ensure this. In practice this protocol should limit Turkey in many of its activities, but both sides have refrained from invoking it and chosen to ignore it.

(M. FIRAT)

with the delivery of wheat and did not refer to the question of water use. The minister of energy, Deniz Baykal, however, announced after the signing of the agreement that a joint committee would be set up to determine Iraq's water needs and that it would not be faced with a scarcity of water. This was an indication that the deal made with Iraq also covered the water issue.

The Launching of the Southeast Anatolia Project (GAP)

The launching of GAP in 1983 caused even more concern in Iraq and Syria. Whereas the Keban and Karakaya dams were designed to produce electric power, GAP was an integrated multipurpose project. It consisted of twenty-two dams (fourteen of which would be built on the Euphrates) plus nineteen hydroelectric power stations (eleven on the Euphrates). The project also included thirty intermediate water storage facilities in addition to forty-seven other pools to store water plus eighty-six pumping stations for the planned irrigation systems. The whole scheme would cost $9 billion and take thirty years to complete. It was designed to produce 27 billion kilowatt hours of power per year and bring 1.7 million hectares under irrigation. The project included the building of two tunnels (each twenty-six kilometers long) to carry water from the reservoir of the Atatürk Dam to the plains of Harran and Ceylanpmar. These irrigation tunnels would be the world's longest. When GAP was eventually completed, the flow of water in the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers was bound to diminish. The project would also result in a degradation in water quality, because of pollution and residues caused by intensive farming. Despite the negative consequences of GAP that alarmed Syria and Iraq, there would also be benefits. The irregular flow of the two rivers because of the fluctuations in precipitation would come to an end, allowing for more economic use of water and diversification of farm production.

When GAP got underway, Turkey applied to the World Bank for loans. In order to obtain loans to dam rivers, it was necessary to have the approval of downstream states. Syria and Iraq refused to give their approval to the project, which caused the World Bank to back off from supporting the project and call for a quota agreement between riparian states. This setback did not prevent GAP from going ahead, as Turkey decided to rely on its own resources. In 1980 a Joint Economic Committee Protocol was signed with Iraq, which was also adhered to by Syria in 1983. Under the terms of this protocol, a Mixed Technical Committee was set up to discuss the issue of regional waters.

In the 1980s Iraq was fully preoccupied with the war against Iran, and relations with Turkey assumed vital importance for Baghdad. That is why the issue of water was raised only by Syria. Syria had launched a new economic policy in 1986, which would close its trade gap by increasing its agricultural production and exports. Hence it was sensitive about the water issue and pursued it with great determination. Large tracts of government land along the Euphrates had been privatized, and agricultural investments were being promoted. At a time when its need for water was increasing, it was natural for Damascus to look upon GAP with serious misgivings (Tür, pp. 111–12).

As the construction of the Karakaya Dam neared completion, Syria's prime minister Abdelrauf al-Kasm visited Ankara in March 1986. He warned that, if Turkey reduced the flow of water due to GAP, Syria would have to respond with the means at its disposal. Nevertheless, the talks proceeded in a constructive atmosphere. It was decided to set up four committees to further bilateral cooperation: the committees on international issues, border security, water and electricity, and trade and economy. At the Committee on Water and Electricity, Syria asked Turkey to release sufficient water during the filling of the reservoirs of the Karakaya and Atatürk Dams. The Turkish representative gave informal oral assurances that 500 cusecs of water would be released. When Syria declared that it would not give support to the PKK, the impression was created that the issues of water and terror had been linked. Official representatives repeatedly asserted, however, that no linkage existed between the two issues.

When the Karakaya Dam was completed in 1987, the question flared up once again. Worried that the flow of water would diminish by 27%, Syria and Iraq sent protests and stressed that the flow of water could not be regulated on the basis of unilateral promises. They wanted a formal tripartite agreement on the subject, but Turkey did not want to hear of such an agreement.

At a time when relations with Syria were under strain because of the construction of the Karakaya and Atatürk dams and growing PKK activities, Prime Minister Özal visited Damascus on 17 July 1987 (see "Özal's Syrian Visit" above, on the PKK and the Security Protocol with Syria). The Economic Cooperation Protocol was also signed at that time. Article 6 of the protocol read as follows: "During the period when the reservoir of the Atatürk Dam is being filled, and pending the definitive allocation of Euphrates waters among the three countries, the Turkish side undertakes to release an annual average of more than 50d cusecs of water at the Turkish-Syrian border. Should the monthly average fall below 500 cusecs, the difference shall be made up in the subsequent month." Iraq and Syria claimed that the Turkish undertaking only covered the period during which the Atatürk Dam was being filled and pending conclusion of a tripartite agreement on water allocation; during the 1990s they pressed for the conclusion of a three-way agreement to replace the 1987 protocol. They also demanded the release of 700 cusecs of water.

The Peace Pipeline Project

Based on his philosophy of foreign relations, Özal was convinced that developing economic and commercial relations with Syria would lead to a resolution of political problems. In line with this philosophy, he submitted a number of joint projects to his Syrian counterpart. Among these were proposals on Turkish aid to Syria in oil and gas exploration, provision of electric power to Syria, and the piping of water from the Seyhan and Ceyhan rivers to Arab countries. This last proposal was dubbed the Peace Pipeline Project and was significant for Syria, a country short of water. Ankara was proposing to draw water from two rivers that flowed entirely in Turkey and, after meeting Turkish needs, to send the surplus through two pipelines all the way to Saudi Arabia and Oman. The project was conceived in 1986, and its feasibility study was carried out by the U.S. firm Brown and Root. The first pipe would carry 3.5 million cubic meters per day through Hatay to Syria and then via Jordan to the cities of Mecca and Jeddah in Saudi Arabia. The second pipe would carry 2.5 million cubic meters per day through Syria, Jordan, and eastern Saudi Arabia to Kuwait, Qatar, Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, and Oman.

Although first unveiled in 1987, this project was formally proposed in 1988 but got a cool reception in the Arab countries and never reached the stage of implementation. Özal used the project as a trump card in his dealings with the Arab states, however. The Arab states cited high costs as the reason for rejecting the project. But it was obvious that their negative reception was due to political concerns that went unmentioned. They harbored suspicions that the plan was also designed to supply water to Israel. The project would allow Ankara to gain inordinate influence in the region, which was something they did not want. Nor did they want to become dependent on a powerful Turkey for a vital commodity like water. Ankara shelved the project when it became clear that what Arab public opinion really wanted was for Turkey to show its good intentions by agreeing to a fair sharing of the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris.

It soon became clear that the 1987 protocol concluded between Turkey and Syria after excluding Iraq would not be long-lasting. On 23. November 1989 Turkey informed Syria and Iraq that between 13 January and 13 February 1990 it would be diverting the Euphrates River in order to fill the Atatürk Dam reservoir. Syria was guaranteed 120 cusecs from the Euphrates downstream before the diversion; in order to compensate for the shortfall during the diversion, Syria would receive 750 cusecs from 23 November to 13 January. This would correspond to an average of 509 cusecs of water, thus complying with the terms of the 1987 protocol. Turkey also indicated that the filling of the reservoir would take place in the winter, when the water requirements of the two countries were at a minimum. Syria interpreted Turkey's move as the first in a series of similar cuts, protested Ankara's action, and called for a reversal of the decision.

To calm down Iraq and Syria, the Turkish minister of foreign affairs visited the neighboring countries in January 1990 and assured them that Turkey had no intention of applying pressure on them, that Turkish farmers would also be affected by the cuts in the water flow, and that efforts were being made to minimize the effects of the cuts by releasing additional water in the period preceding the cuts. These efforts failed to convince the neighbors. Iraq and Syria renewed their call to conclude a tripartite watersharing agreement and signed a bilateral agreement on water-sharing to set a good example. Under this agreement, the waters of the Euphrates entering Syria from Turkey would be split in the proportion of 42% for Syria's use and 58% for Iraq's use.

By 1990 the theses of Iraq, Turkey, and Syria regarding the sharing of water and their proposed solutions had become apparent. The main difference between the Turkish thesis and those of Syria and Iraq with respect to the sharing of the Euphrates and Tigris and other Middle Eastern rivers can be summarized as follows (T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı Bölgesel ve Sınıraşan Sular Dairesi, pp. 37–43).

- 1. Turkey described the Euphrates and Tigris as cross-border rivers, while Iraq and Syria described them as international rivers.
- 2. Turkey held the view that the waters should be allocated on the basis of equity, while Iraq and Syria defended the principle of sharing.
- 3. Turkey claimed that the portions of the rivers on its territory were under its sovereignty; consequently, a tripartite agreement on water sharing would not be a legal but rather a political agreement and hence unacceptable. Iraq and Syria strongly favored concluding a tripartite agreement.

Iraq's took the following positions.

- 1. Iraq had utilized the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris since time immemorial and had built many structures to make this possible. Iraq had acquired rights on the two rivers going back to ancient times.
- 2. At the initial stage of the filling of the Ataturk Dam, Turkey had violated international law by not informing Iraq in good time and inflicted hardship on the Iraqi people by reducing the flow of water below the level previously guaranteed. Furthermore, Turkey appeared to be intent on building more dams and structures, thus inflicting additional hardship on the downstream states.
- 3. The waters of the Euphrates and Tigris rivers should be shared according to arithmetical formulas. Under such a system, the amount of water required by each project should be determined, indicating whether the project was in operation, under construction, or in the planning stage. Furthermore, the hydrological data relating to the two rivers should be compiled and exchanged. There should be a joint technical committee to review all the submitted data and determine the water requirements of all operating projects as well as the requirements of projects in the construction and planning stages.
- 4. Under the 1987 protocol, Turkey had committed itself to releasing 500 cusecs from the Euphrates where it flowed into Syria by the time of the completion of the Atatürk Dam. With the completion of the Atatürk Dam, this protocol had lost its validity. The new amount of water to be released should be higher and in no case less than 700 cusecs. Since the average yearly flow of the Euphrates was 1,000 cusecs, this would imply an equitable sharing of its waters, with Turkey getting one-third and the remaining two-thirds to be apportioned in equal amounts to Syria and Iraq.

Syria's views were as follows.

- 1. The Euphrates and Tigris were international rivers and hence in the category of "shared resources." These resources should be shared in specific amounts by the countries of the basin. This sharing should be on the basis of arithmetical formulas. For this, each country should indicate its requirements of water from each of the two rivers and determine the capacity of each river. Should the amount of water required by the three riparian countries exceed the flow of one of the rivers, this excess should be deducted proportionately from the water to be apportioned to each country.
- 2. In the course of the initial filling of the Atatürk Dam reservoir, Turkey did not act according to the principles of good neighborliness when it drastically decreased the flow of the Euphrates River. This inflicted untold damage on Syria's agriculture, its energy production, and its drinking water supplies. Turkey was seeking to apply political pressure on Syria by this means. The Peace Pipeline Project and other plans envisaging the sale of water were all designed to serve Turkey's ambition of assuming a leadership role in the Middle East. The proposals to sell water while restricting the flow of the Euphrates demonstrated the muddle in Turkey's policies.
- 3. Employing up-to-date and economical methods in the use of the waters of an international river did not bestow on a country the right to use additional water from that river.
- 4. The work of the International Law Commission should be accelerated so as to secure the early codification of the rules on the subject. This would allow disputes among riparian states regarding the sharing of water to be resolved through international adjudication in the International Court of Justice or other such tribunals.
- 5. International observers should participate in the negotiations among riparian states and the country or countries that obstructed the sharing of waters should face UN sanctions in the light of the findings of the observers.
- 6. An agreement had to be concluded among the interested states on the sharing of the waters of the Euphrates River.

Turkey held the following views:

1. The Euphrates and Tigris were not international but cross-border rivers, and Turkey exercised sovereign rights over the segments of the rivers flowing on Turkish territory. The claims of Iraq and Syria were designed to bring Turkey under international pressure and were devoid of legal foundation. In international law, the concept of rights acquired through prescription could not be invoked in isolation. The sharing of joint resources on the basis of arithmetical formulas was rejected by the International Law Commission and was in conflict with the principle of equitable use. The sharing of joint resources did not apply to cross-border rivers, because such rivers were not considered to be natural resources that could be shared.

- 2. The claims of Iraq and Syria regarding Turkey's actions in the course of the initial filling of the Atatürk Dam reservoir were incorrect, as were the figures relating to the extent of the irrigable agricultural land in their respective countries.
- 3. The Orontes River should be considered along with the Euphrates and Tigris, and in this context what should be discussed was not the sharing of waters but their allocation. There were rules of international law that applied to the allocation of waters: (a) scientific and objective common criteria should be developed in connection with the "equitable and rational use of the waters"; (b) the principle of "not causing significant harm" required riparian countries of cross-border rivers to refrain from actions that would harm one another when using water. Turkey had never used the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris basins as a weapon to be used to harm the downstream countries. Acting in the spirit of fairness, Turkey had made every effort to release the volume of water that it was committed to deliver.
- 4. The question of water in the Middle East was not one of quantity and sharing. To reach a long-term and lasting solution to the question, each country must review its water policy. It should take action to avoid wasting water, implement a rational pricing policy, develop national and regional projects designed to secure the use of recycled waste water, resort to advanced technology in irrigation, and select appropriate crops in farming.

The question of water also left its imprint on the relation of the parties in the 1990s, not just as a technical and legal question but also as a political question.

E. Economic Relations with the Middle East Turkey's developing political relations with the Middle Eastern states during the 1980s also had an important economic dimension. During the period of the 12 September administration, Turkey's trade and tourism exchanges with Saudi Arabia, the Gulf States, and Libya underwent a substantial increase. Workers went to these

Table 6-7. Turkish Exports and Imports, 1979-1984

|                             | E           | exports (%) |      |  |
|-----------------------------|-------------|-------------|------|--|
|                             | 1979        | 1983        | 1984 |  |
| Muslim States               | 18.1        | 45.1        | 40.6 |  |
| European Economic Community | 48.5        | 34.1        | 38.3 |  |
| COMECON                     | 13.3        | 4.0         | 4.0  |  |
| U.S.                        | 4.6         | 4.0         | 5.2  |  |
| Japan                       | 1.0         | 0,6         | 0.5  |  |
|                             | imports (%) |             |      |  |
|                             | 1979        | 1983        | 1984 |  |
| Muslim States               | 22.2        | 40.0        | 35.0 |  |
| European Economic Community | 36.1        | 27.9        | 27.6 |  |
| COMECON                     | 12.2        | 8.4         | 8.8  |  |
| U.S.                        | 7.5         | 7.5         | 10.0 |  |
| Japan                       | 4.5         | 3.8         | 3.8  |  |

(Table by Melek Firat)

countries in growing numbers and Turkish businesses started investing there, particularly in the construction sector. There was a large increase in trade with the Middle Hast, helped by the growing opportunities created by the Iran-Iraq War. It is interesting to note that just as political relations developed with the Middle East while relations with Europe cooled off, a similar trend occurred in the field of trade. Europe's share in Turkey's exports and imports dwindled, while that of the Middle East grew. Table 6-7 (covering the period from 1979 to 1984) shows the development of Turkey's trade with different regions (Yalçıntaş, p. 321).

Although the Özal governments considered the economy to be the main element of foreign policy, the trade and economic relations with the Middle East, which had been steadily growing until 1984, began to dwindle. This was in large measure due to the economic difficulties confronting Iran and Iraq because of the war. Furthermore, in 1983 the military regime came to an end, and relations with Europe began to normalize. The application for membership in the ECs in 1987 helped make Europe Turkey's main trade and economic partner once again.

Melek Firat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Arab States)

Akmandor, Neşet, Hüseyin Pazarcı, and Hasan Köni. Ortadoğu Ülkelerinde Su Sorunu. N.p.: TESAV Yayınları, 1994. Bağış, Ali İhsan (ed.). Water as an Element of Cooperation and Development in the Middle East. İstanbul: Ayna, 1994.

Bölükbaşı, Süha. Türkiye ve Yakınındaki Ortadoğu. Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, n.d.

Denk, B. Erdem. Ortadoğu'da Su Sorunu Bağlamında Dicle ve Fırat. Ankara: Stratejik Araştırma ve Kültür Yayınları, 1997.

Güldemir, Ufuk. Çevik Kuvvetin Gölgesinde Türkiye (1980–1984). 2nd ed. İstanbul: Tekin, 1987.

Gündoğan, Ünal. "Islamist Iran and Turkey, 1979–1989: State Pragmatism and Ideological Influences." Middle East Review of International Affairs 7, no. 1 (Mar. 2003): 1–12.

İmset, İsmet G. PKK Ayrılıkçı Şiddetin 20 Yılı (1973–1992). 5th ed. Ankara: Turkish Daily News Yayınları, 1993.

Keskin, Funda. "Suriye ve Irak ile Su Sorunu." In Çağdaş Türk Diplomasisi: 200 Yıllık Süreç. Ankara: TTK, 1999.

Manisa Celal Bayar Üniversitesi. Sınır Aşan Sularımız. Manisa: Manisa Celal Bayar Üniversitesi Yüksek Öğrenim Vakfı Yayınları, 1997.

Mumcu, Uğur, Rabıta. 23rd ed. Ankara: Uğur Mumcu Araştırmacı Gazetecilik Vakfı, 1998.

Pirim, Oktay, and Süha Örtülü. PKK'nın 20 Yıllık Öyküsü. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Boyut, 1999.

Şen, Sabahattin (ed.). Su Sorunu, Türkiye ve Ortadoğu. İstanbul: Bağlam, 1993.

Soysal, İsmail. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları, Cilt II (1945–1990), Kesim A (Çok Taraflı Bağıtlar). Ankara: TTK, 1991.

T.C. Dışişleri Bakanlığı Bölgesel ve Sınıraşan Sular Dairesi. Orta Doğu'da Su Sorunu. Ankara: n.p., 1994.

Tür, Özlem. "Türkiye-Suriye İlişkileri: Su Sorunu." In Türkiye ve Ortadoğu: Tarih, Kimlik, Güvenlik, ed. Meliha Benli Altunışık, pp. 105–28. İstanbul: Boyut, 1999.

Yalçıntaş, Nevzat. "Economic Relations between Turkey and Islamic Countries." Studies on Turkish-Arab Relations (Annual, 1986): 317–26.

II. RELATIONS WITH NON-ARAB STATES

A. Relations with Israel

1. Israel's Regional Actions and Turkey

The frostiness in Turkey's relations with Israel during the 1970s persisted during the major part of the 1980s. This was due to the displeasure caused in Ankara by Israel's high-handed actions in the region. Another reason was the Palestinian Intifada that broke out in 1987 and enjoyed widespread sympathy among the Turkish public.

Following the Camp David agreement, there was a generally held belief that the disputes in the Middle East were finally entering the stage of resolution. In these circumstances, Israel's actions that destabilized the region caused universal disappointment. Starting in 1978, Israel started establishing Jewish settlements in the West Bank. This was followed by the annexation of East Jerusalem in 1980 and of the Golan Heights in December 1981. Finally, Israel shifted it capital from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

The annexation of East Jerusalem and the transfer of the capital to Jerusalem led to the adoption of UN Security Council resolutions 476 and 478, declaring Israel's actions null and void. Turkey went further and, in addition to condemning Israel's moves, took two steps that made relations even frostier. Turkey shut down its consulate general in Jerusalem on 28 August 1980 and downgraded the level of Turkish representation in Tel Aviv from chargé d'affaires to second secretary on 2 December 1980.

Turkey's reaction went beyond what was called for in the UN's resolutions. In taking drastic steps like closing the consulate general in Jerusalem, which was not a diplomatic mission, and in further loosening its already diminished diplomatic relations, Ankara was motivated not by international considerations but by domestic political imperatives. These decisions were made at a time when Turkey was trying to surmount the difficulties in its balance of payments caused by the second oil shock and was seeking Arab friendship in order to relieve the isolation that had been imposed on it after the 12 September coup. It is interesting that the coup-makers took these steps at a time when they were most in need of the support of the U.S., the protector and friend of Israel.

Turkey maintained its hard line during the crisis that emerged as a result of the Israeli attack and destruction of the Osirak nuclear reactor in Iraq on 8 June 1981. In the voting at the UN General Assembly, Turkey was among those that condemned Israel's attack.

Turkey softened its stand following the annexation of the Golan Heights. Although the UN Security Council resolution 497 of 17 December 1981 declared this action illegal under international law, Turkey abstained in the voting on the General Assembly resolution of February 1982 condemning Israel's action. Ankara did not regard Israel as a direct threat. It only joined the toughly worded warnings to alleviate its isolation. Now Turkey was trying to gain Israel's backing against its troublesome southern neighbor, Syria.

But it soon became clear that Turkey had not changed the main thrust of its policy. Ankara reacted sharply against the Israeli invasion of Lebanon in June 1982 and the expulsion of the PLO guerrillas from Beirut. Turkish public opinion was particularly incensed when, in September 1982, the Lebanese Phalangists, supported by the Israeli army, massacred almost a thousand Palestinians at the Sabra and Chatilla camps. The Turkish TV (TRT) broadcast the scenes from these camps after the massacre for several days, feeding the public outrage against Israel. Yet the official Turkish reaction to the invasion of Lebanon was milder than the reaction to the annexation of Arab Jerusalem.

The Israeli incursion into Lebanon led to an unexpected improvement in Turkish-Israel relations. The headquarters and the basic training centers of the Armée Secrète Arménien pour la Libération de l'Arménie (ASALA) and the Justice Commandos for the Genocide of the Armenians (JCGA), two organizations involved in action directed at Turkey, were located in Lebanon. During the invasion of Lebanon, Tel Aviv was in contact with Ankara and proposed joint action to "clean up" the camps. Ankara agreed to the proposal. In operations carried out with the participation of Turkish agents, the ASALA and JCGA camps were wiped out and a good number of militants were killed, including the leader of the JCGA, Agop Ahjian (Tavlaş, p. 12).

This incident could have accelerated the intensified cooperation between Israel and Turkey of the 1990s, but the PLO's action in organizing its resistance to Israel in a more systematic way prevented this from happening.

2. The Effects of the Intifada

After his expulsion from Lebanon, Arafat continued to lead the Palestinian movement from Tunisia. In December 1987 a rebellion broke out in the Israeli-occupied West Bank and Gaza in response to his call. This mass uprising was known as the Intifada. The Intifada placed the question of Palestine once again on the international agenda. Arafat put the opportunity created by the Intifada to good use: the Palestinian National Council, meeting in Algiers under his chairmanship, announced the establishment of the state of Palestine on 15 November 1988 (Box 6-16).

Turkey recognized the new state on the very same day, leaving even Egypt, Syria, and Jordan trailing behind. This move was in conformity with the pattern of pursuing pro-Arab policies that Turkey had been following since the mid-1960s. Ankara's decision to recognize Palestine was facilitated by Arafat's declaration that the new state recognized the UN Security Council's resolutions 181, 242, and 338, that it was ready to exist side-by-side with Israel, and that the PLO was against terrorism.

During Özal's term as prime minister, an effort was made to normalize relations with Israel while at the same time taking radical steps like the recognition of the Palestinian state. The decision to recognize Palestine led to certain logical consequences. Turkey was often critical of the harsh conduct of Israeli soldiers in response to the Intifada. At the inauguration of the 1989 session of the UN

Box 6-16. The Intifada

The Intifada was triggered by an accident caused by an Israeli truck on 8 June 1987, which resulted in the deaths of four Palestinians. Rumors started circulating that the incident was not an accident but a deliberate act, causing tensions within the community. Isolated demonstrations led to a mass protest demonstration on 9 December 1987 that initiated a movement that went on for two years. During this period Palestinian youths attacked Israeli soldiers with sticks and stones and were met by gunfire that caused hundreds of fatalities. This situation had extensive repercussions in the Middle East and throughout the world. The Intifada, which means "eruption" in Arabic, had three effects. (1) The Palestinians in the occupied territories set aside their differences and displayed a solidarity never seen before. A giant step was taken in the direction of confirming the PLO as the sole legitimate representative of the Palestinian people. (2) The sight of the violence inflicted by Israeli soldiers on civilians helped gather sympathy for the Palestinians throughout the world and led to Israel's increasing isolation. In March 1988 the European Communities adopted a decision condemning Israel. Even in the U.S. there were those who started questioning the unconditional support given to Israel. (3) The Israeli public began to get weary of continuing demonstrations and the atmosphere of violence and started searching for peace.

In the process of peace-making following the first Gulf War, the Intifada had a positive effect and constituted a turning point in Israeli-Palestinian relations. The second Intifada (the al-Aqsa Intifada), however, which erupted in September 2000, and the disproportionate violence of the Israeli reaction dealt a serious blow to the peace process

(Ç ERHAN)

General Assembly, a vote was called to decide whether Israel should be admitted to the meeting. Departing from its usual practice, Turkey did not abstain this time and voted no.

Near the end of the 1980s Turkey began to take steps toward returning to a more balanced approach to the question of Palestine. For this it was necessary for Ankara to develop its relations with Israel. Starting in 1990, the foundations were laid by both sides for an early and comprehensive revival of bilateral relations.

Çağrı Erhan and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Israel)

Armaoğlu, Fahir. Filistin Meselesi ve Arap-İsrail Savaşları (1948–1988). 2nd ed. Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası Kültür Yayınları, 1991.

Bölükbaşı, Süha. "Türkiye ve İsrail: Mesafeli Yakınlıktan Stratejik Ortaklığa." Liberal Düşünce (Winter 1999): 138–52.

Demirer, Temel. "Pax-Americana Orta Doğu'da Ne Yapıyor?" Özgür Üniversite Forumu 1, no. 4 (1998): 5–36. Dursun, Davut. Orta Doğu Neresi. İstanbul: İnsan, 1995. Erhan, Çağrı. "Hilal ve Sion Yıldızı Türk-İsrail İlişkilerinin Dünü ve Bugününe Kısa Bir Bakış." Mülkiyeliler Birliği Dergisi 21, no. 202 (Aug.—Sept. 1997): 32–38.

Gruen, George E. "Turkey's Relations with Israel and Its Arab Neighbors." Middle East Review 17 (Spring 1985): 33-43.

———. "Turkey's Relations with Israel: From Ambivalence to Open Cooperation." In Studies on Turkish-Jewish History, ed. David F. Altabe, Erhan Atay, and Israel J. Katz, pp. 112– 29. New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1996.

Kut, Şule. "Filistin Sorunu ve Türkiye." In Orta Doğu Sorunları ve Türkiye, pp. 5–34. İstanbul: Türkiye Sosyal Ekonomik Siyasal Araştırmalar Vakfı, 1991.

Nachmani, Amikam. "Israeli-Turkish Relations: The Laying of Foundations." In Actual Situation and Prospects of Turkey's Relations with Israel, pp. 7–36. Ankara: Friedrich-Naumann Foundation in Turkey, 1992.

Robbins, Philip. Turkey and the Middle East. London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1991.

Tavlaş, Nezib. "Türk-İsrail Güvenlik ve İstihbarat İlişkileri." Avrasya Dosyası 1, no. 3 (Fall 1994): 4–15.

B. Relations with Iran

The Period of the Iran-Iraq War Questions Arising from Ideological Differences

For Turkey sovereignty rested on the nation, whereas for Iran it rested on religion. This ideological divergence was at the source of all the differences that affected relations between the two countries in this period. In the era of the shah, there were also differences between the two countries on issues like the source of power and its legitimacy, but they shared the same attachment to nationalism.

Although the divergent ideology issue emerged in 1979, it need not have been the dominant question between the two countries. The army carried out a coup in Turkey on 12 September 1980, however, and the military regime sought to resuscitate Kemalism, even if only on a rhetorical plane, while the 1979 Iranian Islamic Revolution was bent on establishing Sharia law. These conflicting views led to ideological clashes and occasionally crises. Each regime perceived the other as antithetical to its own orientations and suspected the other of wanting to export its brand of regime.

The ideological clash manifested itself in different ways. The Iranian media carried articles disparaging Atatürk and the Turkish media, Khomeini Iran was critical of Turkey's proscription of the headscarf, and Iranian leaders visiting Ankara refused to lay wreaths at Atatürk's tomb. The Turkish press called the Iranian regime a "hotbed of reaction," while the Iranians described Turkey as the "lackey of Satan." These examples could easily be multiplied.

After the revolution, the Iranians seeking refuge in Turkey became a major problem. A similar problem had existed during the monarchy when Iranian students in Turkish universities demonstrated against the shah. But after the revolution the number of Iranians in Turkey reached 1.5 million, most of them opponents of the regime. The most powerful Marxist organization in Iran, the Mujahedin-e Khalq (Popular Warriors), saw most of its organized militants move to Turkey. Iran claimed that Turkey was providing sanctuary to opponents of the regime and complained that Ankara refused to cooperate in dealing with "Iranian criminal fugitives." Against this, Turkey claimed that Iran was supporting Turkish fundamentalist groups and was engaged in propaganda in support of an Islamic revolution in Turkey through Iranians who resided there. Furthermore, Ankara saw the struggle on Turkish territory between agents of the National Intelligence and Security Organization of Iran (Sazman-e Ettela'at va Amniat-e Melli-e Iran, known as SAVAMA) and Iranian dissidents as a serious threat to peace and security.

The ideological differences were pushed into the background after the death of Khomeini in June 1989. They recurred in the 1990s with more intensity, however, and continued to plague bilateral relations.

Questions Arising from the Iran-Iraq War

The war with Iraq caused Iran to revert to the old policy of the monarchy, which was to support the Iraqi Kurds in every way in their struggle against Baghdad (Box 6-17). Iran regarded the Iraqi Kurds as its ally and provided them with arms, thereby forcing Iraq to divert substantial forces to deal with these separatist elements. As in the days of the shah, northern Iraq came under the control of Kurdish clans, with the government in control of cities and main roads.

In the face of these developments, Turkey sought Tehran's support in the following two areas.

1. Iraq's trade with Turkey must not be harmed. This implied that Iraq's exports of oil via Turkey must not be disrupted by sabotage and that Turkish goods en route to Iraq must cross northern Iraq unhindered. Turkey made a similar request to Iraq: the Turkey-Iran railway, which carried the bulk of the goods traded between the two countries, must not be attacked. Although Iran and Iraq gave no verbal or written undertaking not to block these two main conduits of trade, they complied with Turkey's request, with very few exceptions. Iran must have instructed the

Box 6-17. The Iran-Iraq War

Although the Algiers Agreement of 1975 appeared to have settled the major problems between the two countries, relations began to deteriorate once again in 1979.

a da kaja la gosaj iga stjanski jagarika kaja etiloja izviski kija kija k

Iraq suspected that in the name of exporting its Islamic revolution Iran was inciting the separatist Kurds in the North and the Shiftes in the South, while Iran suspected that Iraq was supporting the separatist Arabs, both Shifte and Sunni, in its province of Khuzistan. These suspicions soon led to border clashes. The clashes continued in the second half of 1979 and throughout 1980, when even heavy weapons were employed. With this state of affairs, the border dispute in the Shatt al-Arab, which had been resolved with the Algiers Agreement became a contentious issue once again. On 17 September 1980 iraq announced its denunciation of the Algiers Agreement.

War broke out on 22 September 1980 with a general of fensive launched by Iraq. Iraq held the initiative in the first year because the Iranian army had been weakened by the U.S. arms embargo. But as the war gradually turned into a war of attrition, the balance tilted in favor of Iran, a country with greater resources than Iraq. The West (including the U.S.) see Box 6-7 above) supplied both belligerents with weapons, claiming that this was to preserve the balance between the two countries. Meanwhile there were many mediation efforts, including one by Turkey, all of which falled to bring the war to an end.

Contrary to the predictions of some observers, the Iraqi Shiftes remained loyal to Baghdad and the Iranian Arabs maintained their loyalty to Tehran.

The war of attrition led the two sides to attack each other's oil export installations in the Persian Gulf, their main source of income. In 1984 these attacks created fear that the war night spread. Tensions rose when the U.S. started taking direct measures against Iran, but the escalation was contained.

The war came to an end on 18 July 1988 when both sides accepted the UN Security Council's resolution 598. The cease-fire came into effect on 20 August, and the questions between the two countries were frozen. After this, the questions of the exchange of prisoners of war and the lands under occupation were taken up sporadically. Although most of the outstanding questions were settled as a result of the conditions created by the occupation of Kuwalt by Iraq in August 1990, there was still no final peace treaty in 2008.

(A. Akdevelioğlu)

Kurds of northern Iraq, who also complied with Turkey's request. But Turkey did suffer in the Persian Gulf, where its tankers loading oil came under aerial attack.

When the tide of war turned in Iran's favor, there was a real possibility that Iranian forces would advance in northern Iraq and seize part of the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline. Although Iran had refrained from damaging the pipeline by bombing it or using the Kurds as its proxy, it would be unrealistic to assume that Iran would allow the marketing of Iraqi oil through territory under its direct control. As Turkey was beginning to get alarmed by developments, the Iranian advance was halted, and the center of gravity of the battlefield again shifted to the south. Although it was not known to what extent Iran was acting out of consideration for Turkey's wishes, the impression that Iran was heeding Turkish interests brought relief to Ankara.

2. The PKK must not be supported. When the PKK started its armed struggle in Turkey in August 1984, Ankara concluded an agreement with Iraq in October, enabling Turkish forces to engage in hot pursuit against the separatist organization in northern Iraq, where it had its bases. When Turkey expressed its desire to conclude a similar agreement with Tehran, it was rebuffed. Tehran went further and asserted that the agreement that Ankara had concluded with Iraq violated Turkey's neutrality. Iran claimed that Turkish operations in Iraq would strengthen Baghdad's hold on the region and weaken the Kurds that Tehran saw as its allies.

Despite the deep differences between the two neighbors, Iran set Ankara at ease by concluding an agreement with Turkey in November 1984, by which it undertook not to allow its territory to be used by the PKK to conduct any action directed against Turkey (Bölükbaşı, pp. 27–29). Iran made an effort to abide by this agreement until the end of the war. But the question was not fully set aside, and the issue of Iran's logistical support to the PKK continued to plague Turkey's relations with Iran.

Turkish Neutrality in the Iran-Iraq War and Economic Cooperation within the Context of the ECO

Turkey declared its neutrality in October 1980 and maintained this status so successfully that the two warring countries entrusted the Turkish missions in Baghdad and Tehran with undertaking the task of looking after their respective interests when they finally severed their diplomatic ties in July 1987.

The ideological clash between Turkey and Iran was symbolized in the persons of Kenan Evren, the soldier, and Ruhollah Khomeini, the cleric. But the conditions created by the war prevented the relations of the two countries from completely breaking down. Turkey badly needed dependable sources of oil and a market that could absorb its exports in exchange for oil. Iran needed a country that could guarantee steady and dependable transit for its imports during the war. This mutual dependence helped overcome the mistrust and the problems caused by this state of affairs. Outstanding questions were frozen and crises were overcome.

北京等日本日本華教養養者等以來 丁

Notwithstanding the disparate leadership, the lower echelons of the administration in charge of managing the economy chose to ignore ideological differences and prevented disagreements from getting out of hand. Turgut Özal in Turkey and Hashemi Rafsanjani in Iran epitomized this mentality. The visit of Deputy Prime Minister Özal to Iran in March 1982 produced concrete evidence that the two countries could work together. Two years later, in April 1984, Özal returned to Iran, this time as prime minister.

After the signing of the trade agreement by which Iran would supply oil to Turkey in return for Turkish basic commodities, Turkish-Iranian trade reached the highest levels ever recorded. The high point was reached in 1985, when the volume of trade reached $2 billion. After this peak, a decline set in, because Iran complained that Turkey purchased only oil and was not interested in Iranian industrial goods and farm products. Another complaint was the high price and poor quality of Turkish products sold in Iran.

During this period Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan felt the need to manage the growing economic relations more effectively within an institutional framework. In view of the rapidly developing economic relations of Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan in the early 1980s, it was decided to expand these relations by adding the dimensions of technical cooperation, cultural exchanges, and trade. To this end, the organization known as the Regional Cooperation for Development (RCD) (see "Relations with Iran" in "Relations with the Middle East" in Section 5) was modified and relaunched in Tehran on 29 January 1985 as the Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO). Article 3 of the ECO agreement indicated that the ECO would pursue broader objectives than the RCD: "The member states shall take the necessary measures to establish an ECO Free Trade Area by eliminating, over a period of 10 years, customs duties and nontariff barriers in the region."

Actually, the RCD (which consisted of Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan) and the ECO pursued similar objectives. Article 3 of the ECO agreement could well have been included in the RCD charter. But Iran was reluctant to allow the RCD to operate as an effective organization, because the new Iranian rulers saw it as a reminder of Western connection of the shah's era. When Iran left CENTO, it remained in the RCD because it felt the need for an organization that was engaged in economic cooperation. At Tehran's request, Turkey and Pakistan agreed to establish an economic cooperation organization that would be free of any political dimension. This was a realistic approach given that it would have been impossible to bring the three countries together within a political organization.

The ECO was engaged in getting organized during the second half of the 1980s and did not start becoming effective in bilateral relations or regional affairs until the 1990s, when independent states emerged in Central Asia and the Caucasus.

As the war drained both Iran and Iraq of their ability to import, Turkey intensified its mediation efforts within the framework of its policy of active neutrality. Özal took a personal interest in these efforts, but they remained fruitless. The war came to an end in 1988 independently of Turkey's mediation efforts.

2. The Aftermath of the Iran-Iraq War

With the ending of the war, the questions between Turkey and Iran that had been frozen during the war reemerged, and relations began to get worse. The contentious issues had been put on hold because the two countries economically depended on one another in the early 1980s. By the end of the 1980s, however, both were free from their former dependence. Henceforth they would no longer overlook conflicting positions in the fields of ideology or security.

Iran did not depend exclusively on Turkey for a secure transit route anymore and was no longer in need of importing lower-quality goods from Turkey. Ideological considerations weighed heavily in the contracts being let out for the reconstruction of the country, and Turkish firms stood no chance against firms from Europe or the Far East. Turkey, in turn, had overcome its foreign exchange shortages and no longer needed to resort to barter to procure its oil. Furthermore, having gained a firm foothold in Arab markets, Turkey no longer needed the Iranian market. As a consequence of these factors, the volume of Turkish-Iranian trade had plummeted to one-tenth of its 1985 level when the war came to an end.

The first crisis in bilateral relations erupted on 10 November 1988 when the Iranian Embassy in Ankara refused to lower its flag to half mast to mark the day on which Atatürk died. A series of crises followed until May 1989, when Iranian ambassador Manouchehr Mottaki was recalled. The state of crisis also persisted because of president Kenan Evren's speeches. Among these were his rhetorical question addressed to Khomeini—"Who are you to utter such things about Atatürk?" (Çetinsaya, p. 154)—and his assertion that Khomeini had ruined his country and that history would remember him as the leader who dragged his nation down. For such remarks, Evren was likened to Salman Rushdie. In another incident, SAVAMA agents were caught trying to smuggle Iranian dissidents out of Turkey in the trunk of their car.

Although the Turkish media, and even politicians, often used insulting language with reference to the Iranian regime, it was usually the Iranian side that caused the rows between the neighbors and then led to their escalation. Tehran's rhetoric was based on anti-imperialism and the export of the Islamic revolution. The slogan was "Ashura is every day and Karbala is everywhere." A foreign policy based on this fiery rhetoric was essential for the Iranian administration to strengthen its legitimacy among the Iranian public. The war with Iraq was also presented to the Iranians as a jihad. Without a jihad, the new regime in Iran would lose its raison d'être. Each of Tehran's moves against the secular Turkish government that "oppressed the Muslim people" (Tülümen, pp. 136, 198) would strengthen the Iranian people's support for the Islamic regime.

This period of recurring crises lasted no more than seven months. It came to an end with the death of Khomeini in June 1989. Although Khomeini was not officially a head of state, flags were lowered to half mast in Turkey when he died. After this, Rafsanjani, the former speaker of the Majlis, became president and pursued the regime's policies with greater restraint. On 10 November 1990 the Iranian flag at the Ankara Embassy was hoisted at half mast, and the new ambassador, Mohammad Reza Baqeri, paid his respects at Atatürk's mausoleum. In the early 1990s Turkish-Iranian relations were cool but crisis-free.

Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Iran)

Akgün, Mensur. "İran-Irak Savaşı, Bölge Dengeleri ve Türkiye." In Orta Doğu Sorunları ve Türkiye, ed. Haluk Ülman,

- pp. 35–62. İstanbul: Türkiye Sosyal Ekonomik Siyasal Araştırmalar Vakfı, 1991.
- Arı, Tayyar. Basra Körfezi ve Orta Doğu'da Güç Dengesi, 1978–96. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Alfa, 1996.
- Armaoğlu, Fahir. 20. Yüzyıl Siyasî Tarihi, 1914–90 (Cilt II: 1980–90). 3rd ed. Ankara: Türkiye İş Bankası, 1991.
- Bölükbaşı, Süha. Türkiye ve Yakınındaki Orta Doğu. Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, n.d.
- Çetinsaya, Gökhan. "Türk-İran İlişkileri." In *Türk Dış Politika*sının Analizi, ed. Faruk Sönmezoğlu, pp. 135–58. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Der, 1998.
- Dağı, İhsan. Orta Doğu'da İslam ve Siyaset. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.
- Fırat, Melek. "İran İslâm Devrimi ve Türk-İran İlişkileri (1979–87)." Thesis, Ankara Üniversitesi Sosyal Bilimler Enstitüsü, 1989.
- Kayabalı, İsmail, and Cemender Arslanoğlu. İran'ın Anadolu'ya Uzanan Gölgesi, 1453–1989. Ankara: n.p., 1990.
- Menashri, David. Revolution at a Crossroads: Iran's Domestic Politics and Regional Ambitions. Washington, D.C.: Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1997.
- Özdağ, Ümit. Değişen Dünya Dengeleri ve Basra Körfezi Krizi. İstanbul: Hikmet, 1991.
- Saikal, Amin. "Iranian Foreign Policy." In The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 7, ed. Peter Avery, pp. 426–56. Cambridge: Cambridge University, 1991.
- Simşir, Bilal N. Bizim Diplomatlar. Ankara: Bilgi, 1996.
- Soysal, İsmail. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları. Vol. 2. Ankara: Türk Tarih Kurumu, 1991.
- Tavaş, Nezih. "Türk-İran İlişkileri Kronolojisi." Strateji 1, no. 1 (1995): 189–218.
- Tekin, Ali. İran'ın Dış Politikasında Terörizmin Yeri. Ankara: Uluslararası İlişkiler ve Stratejik Araştırmalar Merkezi, n.d.
- Tülümen, Turgut. İran Devrimi Hatıraları. İstanbul: Boğaziçi, 1998.

Relations with the USSR

The 1980s were of crucial importance to both Turkey and the USSR. Both countries went through a period of change. Without going into whether it was for better or worse, Turkey found itself transformed. The USSR expired as it was being transformed. The process was propitious for the development of bilateral relations.

I. THE USSR'S TRANSFORMATION

The most important domestic event in the USSR during the 1980s was the ending of the eighteen-year-long Brezhnev era, which began in 1964 and came to an end on 10 November 1982. Brezhnev was succeeded by Yury Andropov. Neither Andropov (12 November 1982—10 February 1984) nor his successor, Konstantin Chernenko (13 February 1984—10 March 1985), was as effective and decisive as previous general secretaries of the party had been. Their terms in office were too short for them to be effective, and the need for reform confronting them was too pressing and comprehensive. Hence the post-Brezhnev era really commenced when Mikhail Gorbachev became general secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union on 11 March 1985.

When Gorbachev took charge of the USSR, the country urgently needed economic restructuring and political transformation. To carry out these two requirements, the country needed to prepare itself for a long-term effort that was known as peredyshka. The last days of the USSR were spent in a search for ways to tackle these needs (Box 6-18).

In foreign policy, the 1980s started with the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan, which occurred on 26–27 December 1979. When Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski declared martial law in Poland on 13 December 1981, the USSR gave the impression that it was pursuing a very hard-line policy. Perestroika also brought about changes in foreign policy, however. One significant sign of change was that Foreign Minister Gromyko was replaced by Shevardnadze on 2 July 1985. Shevardnadze would remain in charge of

Box 6-18. The Collapse of the USSR

As the decade of the 1980s commenced, the Soviet economy was in recession. It was unable to compete with capitalism. Having to coexist with that system while rejecting it placed the .USSR in an impossible institutional/Ideological dilemma, which became apparent during the latter part of Brezhnev's rule. Ways were sought to get out of the difficulty. The Novosibirsk Memorandum (by Abil Aganbegyan and Tatiana Zasiavskaya), which appeared in the press after Brezhnev's death, identified the bottlenecks in the economy and proposed ways to overcome them. This memorandum was never implemented because of the quick succession of general secretaries of the CPSU. In 1986 the memorandum was expanded and relaunched by Gorbachev under the label of restructuring (perestroika) (see Box 6-19 below). This was followed by glasnost (see Box 6-20 below), which stood for transparency in politics. Perestroika and glasnost led to a questioning of socialist values and created an ideological void. Perestroika also resulted in disaffection among the peoples of the USSR, because it failed to yield tangible benefits. This in turn strengthened separatist currents within the state (see Box 6-21 below).

The last phase of the USSR can be summarized as follows. Economic crisis led to efforts to overcome the crisis, perestroika and glasnost. This resulted in a social crisis and an ideological yold, which fomented nationalist stirrings. The end result was total collapse.

(E. TELLAL)

foreign policy until 20 December 1990. The internal economic and social upheaval the country was going through also found its reflection in the field of foreign policy. Gorbachev added the elements of "interdependence" and "international cooperation" to Khrushchev's concept of "peaceful coexistence." Stalin's theory of two opposing camps was repudiated for good. The approach to foreign policy based on class was also rejected. Lenin had pursued an approach in which there would always be a winner and a loser in each relationship. This zero-sum game was abandoned in favor of a policy that sought to identify convergent interests. The Soviet leadership attempted to explain this policy as the preparation for a long-term

Box 6-19. Perestroika

At the meeting of the Central Committee of the CPSU held in April 1985, attention was drawn to the need for restructuring (perestroika), democratization, and transparency (glasnost). At the Twenty-seventh Congress of the CPSU, held on 1 March 1986, these needs were formally placed on the agenda. At the first stage of perestroika, the goal was to achieve psychological success. The people would be won over to restructuring and a balance would be struck between extremists and conservatives. The restructuring of the economy would commence on 1 January 1988.

Gorbachev asserted that the system of production in the USSR was based on the conditions prevailing in the 1930s and no longer corresponded to contemporary requirements. The factors making restructuring imperative were listed as economic crisis, the hability to apply socialism in one country, the integration of the USSR with the capitalist system in a major way during the 1970s, the impasse in bureaucratic planning, the need to regulate market forces, and the influence of other socialist states. Furthermore, it was no longer possible to keep the USSR closed off after the revolution in communications technology.

Economic reforms would be carried out by the following means; increasing the effectiveness of central management of the economy, expanding the autonomy of groups and enterprises, creating integrated economic organizations, and encouraging different ownership models.

The objective was to allow the market to replace planning, private ownership to replace state ownership, and integration with the capitalist economy to replace the national growth model.

The biggest resistance to these efforts came from the main beneficiaries of the system that was being reformed: the bureaucracy

One of the findings was that the system of equalizing wages (uravnilovka), which was applied prior to 1931 and during the Brezhnev period, was leading to laziness. So the leadership sought to benefit from the "laboriousness-generating" side of inequality. Nonmonetary benefits were introduced in the labor market, and workers began to be dismissed. This led to strikes by disgruntled workers and damaged the reform program.

In order to attract foreign investments, the requirement that the Soviet share in an enterprise must not be less than 51% was lifted in December 1988. Henceforth high level executives in enterprises could be foreign nationals. Customs facilities were introduced, designed to enable enterprises to procure their own requirements.

As a result of the decision made in 1988 to privatize public enterprises, the bureaucracy took over these firms. The higher echelons of the bureaucracy used resources that they had accumulated earlier to become capitalists and entrepreneurs.

Eventually a conflict emerged between uskorenie, which was supposed to accelerate the socioeconomic development of Soviet society, and perestroika. One aimed to achieve restructuring, while the other aimed to maximize production. One needed time to achieve its objective, while the other had to achieve instant results.

(E. TELLAL) (Source: Sosyalizm ve Toplumsal Mücadeleler Ansiklopedisi, vol. 5, pp. 395, 1682–83)

Box 6-20. Glasnost

It was absolutely essential to break down bureaucratic hegemony and introduce openness and democratization to allow economic restructuring to go forward. Openness was the means and restructuring was the end.

The following measures were contemplated to achieve transparency, democracy in the workplace; more power to the soviets and more democratic elections; more democracy within the party; more freedom for the press, for the arts, and for science and more tolerance of criticism; enforcement of the rule of law, and reinforcement of organizations within civil society.

Transparency, was followed by idemocratization, starting in the latter part of 1988. The policy of transparency had caused a fraying in Soviet Ideology, however, which was not replaced with a more robust ideology. Different interest groups were now interpreting Ideology in their own ways. One way of interpreting Ideology was nationalism, which came to the fore in the Baltic and Caucasus republics. Transparency had been introduced along with restructuring, but starting in 1989 it was no longer under the control of those who had initiated it and spread throughout society.

(E. TELLAL) (Source: Sosyalizm ve Toplumsal Mücadeleler Ansiklopedisi vol: 5, pp. 1682-83) haul or peredyshka. The new policy was pursued starting in 1986 and was known as novoe myshlenie (the new way of thinking). Novoe myshlenie was the international dimension of perestroika and glasnost. This implied withdrawal from Afghanistan and Africa, emphasis on disarmament, removal of ideology from international relations, and an end to the theory of two economies and two world markets (Box 6-22).

The transformation process that got underway in 1985 resulted in the disintegration of the USSR in 1991. The Russian Federation, the successor of the USSR, found itself deprived of its allies in Eastern Europe. Furthermore, Russia was now obliged to conduct its relations with the fourteen new states that left the union after the demise of the USSR within the context of its foreign policy.

II. BILATERAL RELATIONS

There is a general impression that Turkish-USSR relations during the coup period of 1980 to 1983 were stagnant. This is attributed to the Soviet intervention in Afghanistan and the military coup in Turkey. True, the intervention in Afghanistan got a very bad reception in Turkey, which gave asylum to thousands of Afghan refugees. But this did not

Box 6-21. The Question of Nationalities in the Collapse of the USSR

The USSR was a collection of hundreds of peoples. Anti-Soviet writers frequently referred to the USSR as the "prison of nations." Consequently, the question of nationalities played a key role in the process of the USSR's disintegration. During its seventy-year-long existence the USSR tried hard to instill the notion of "Soviet citizen" among all these peoples. By the 1990s it had become apparent that the USSR had falled in this effort.

The concepts of perestroika and glasnost, which began to be implemented in the second half of the 1980s, led to a questioning of the blind alleglance to the Communist ideology represented by the CPSU. The freedoms introduced by glasnost resulted in a reawakening of nationalist tendencies. There is no doubt that the Helsinki process that started in 1975 and the benefits it brought greatly facilitated the self-expression of the different nationalities.

By the end of the 1980s the view was prevalent in the USSR that the Russian nation was the oppressor of the other nations, and this view fortified the separatist nationalist movements. The Pamiat (Memory) group, known for its anti-Semilic tendencies, appeared at this time among the Russians.

In the process of disintegration, only the fifteen federated republics gained their independence. At present a similar process is underway in the Russian Federation (Chechnya, Tatarstan) and Georgia (Ajaria, Abkhazia, South Ossetia).

(E. TELLAL)

reflect negatively on bilateral relations. Its main effect was to bring Turkey closer to the U.S. The USSR, however, remained very circumspect toward the new administration in Ankara, which accused Moscow of being behind the anarchy in Turkey. Moscow showed no reaction to the mass arrests taking place in Turkey.

At a time when political relations were stagnant, economic relations went on without interruption. The program of the Ulusu government that took office on 20 September 1980 contained the following phrase: "special importance shall be attached to relations with the Soviet Union" (http://www.tbmm.gov.tr/hukumetler/hp44.htm). In 1981 Turkey's exports to the USSR attained their highest level since 1924. Similarly, in 1983 its imports from the USSR also attained record levels. More importantly, the foundations of Turkey's developing economic relations with first the USSR and then Russia were laid during this period.

As indicated earlier, Turkey's relations with the USSR started developing in the mid-1960s, first in the economic field and later spreading to the political sphere. The USSR began to overcome its obsession with ideology in the 1980s, and both the USSR and Turkey went through a period of economic restructuring. Cooperation in the

Box 6-22. Novoe Myshlenie (The New Way of Thinking)

The "new way of thinking" in political life led to debates on three fundamental issues: the leadership role of the Communist party, the need for a division of power in the political system, and the strengthening of pluralism. In the 1980s novoe myshlenie also affected foreign policy in the areas of disarmament initiatives, efforts to connect with the international capitalist system, and the "Common European House" project.

T. Economic difficulties forced Gorbachev to engage in disarmament negotiations with the U.S. and the West. He did not want to face external difficulties at a time when he was engaged in the process of economic restructuring and democratization at home. In 1985 Gorbachev and Reagan got together at the Geneva disarmament conference and agreed not to place nuclear weapons in space (this meant giving up the Star Wars project) and to reduce the number of medium-range missiles. The breakthrough in the disarmament talks came when the USSR accepted the principle of intrusive verification/on-site inspection.

2. The main goal of the foreign policy of that time was to connect the USSR to the international capitalist system. But this process of connecting with the capitalist system brought into the open a number of realities. First, it became apparent how weak the USSR was in regions of international tension. Second, as the USSR carried out reforms at home, it needed stability in its international relations. Finally, conditions dictated a reduction in the USSR's defense and foreign affairs budget.

3: Gorbachev launched his "Common European House" project on 10 April 1987. In doing this he was motivated by the need to connect not just the USSR but also the count less of Eastern Europe to the international capitalist system. Corbachev declared that he would support the reform efforts of these countries.

(E. TELLAL)

economic field quickly spread to the political field. We shall therefore first look at economic relations and see how they influenced political relations.

A. Economic Relations

Turkey's economic relations with the pre-perestroika USSR were already quite developed and ready for the boom that would come in the 1990s after perestroika. On 10 March 1981, shortly after the 12 September administration assumed power, an agreement was signed for the extension of the Soviet-built Seydişehir Aluminum Plant. This was followed by a protocol signed in January 1982 that raised the level of trade by 30%. It was significant that this protocol was signed at a time when the U.S. was seeking to impose a trade boycott against the USSR for the imposition of martial law in Poland. Turkey also provided Moscow with the propaganda prize, as a NATO member ruled by a military regime.

Subsequently, on 20 May 1982, a payments agreement was concluded, providing for payments to be made with convertible foreign exchange. The replacement of the clearing system, which had hampered trade for many years, with the convertible exchange system was an important step forward. An implementation program was also adopted within the framework of the 1977 Turkish-Soviet Agreement on Scientific and Technical Cooperation.

The Natural Gas Agreement signed on 18 September 1984 constituted a turning point in bilateral relations. The agreement, signed after two years of negotiations, opened up new opportunities in the fields of contracting services and trade exchanges. Turkey undertook to buy, for a period of twenty-five years starting in 1987, 120 billion cubic meters of natural gas from the USSR, with payment to be made with convertible currencies. The USSR agreed to spend 70% of the foreign exchange earned from these sales to buy Turkish goods and services. Of the funds to be spent in Turkey, 35% would be set aside to pay for Turkish contracting services; and 30% of the sale proceeds would be used to repay commercial loans extended to the USSR. For Turkey to agree as early as 1984 to procure one of its energy requirements from the other bloc was an important political development. The agreement would enable Turkey to diversify its energy sources. The decision to rely on Soviet gas was taken because Turkish decision-makers were favorably disposed toward the project. Furthermore, the Federal Republic of Germany had a similar agreement with the USSR, which constituted a useful precedent.

The agreement had far-reaching effects. It opened the way for Turkish contractors to enter the Soviet market in a big way. Starting in 1988, Turkish contractors undertook a large number of projects in the USSR; this made them more competitive in that market in the 1990s. Many Turks working for these contractors began to earn their living in the USSR. The agreement also helped diversify Turkey's export markets. Previously, the USSR had appeared to be a donor and an investor in its relations with Turkey, making it a one-sided relationship. The agreement changed this picture and restored a balance in economic relations. From 1986 to 1991 the number of products exported by Turkey to the Soviet Union rose from twentyfive to seventy. In addition to the increased diversification in Turkey's exports, there was an expansion in volume. The agreement encouraged firms from third countries that wanted to enter the Soviet market to invest in Turkey. It also encouraged the formation of Turkish-Soviet joint ventures, which then made substantial investments in both countries. The agreement not only diversified Turkey's sources and types of energy but also opened new perspectives for its energy policy. Natural gas would help meet the growing needs of industry for energy and would make an energy crisis like the one experienced in 1970s more unlikely. Thanks to the agreement, natural gas as a commodity provided continuity in bilateral trade. Finally, the agreement led to the establishment of Botas, the firm that owned and operated the natural gas pipeline network.

Another development that helped the growth of bilateral relations was the Agreement on Border and Coastal Trade signed on 6 July 1989. This agreement helped develop the economic potential of border regions. The border crossing at Sarp on the Black Sea coast saw its traffic increase from 30 crossings per day in 1989 to 390 crossings in 1990 and then to 1,000 crossings in 1991. The so-called luggage trade (Russian tourists who came to Turkey to buy goods, carried them back to Russia in oversized luggage, and sold them for a considerable profit), which would attain substantial levels in the 1990s, started in the late 1980s, especially after the opening of the Sarp border crossing.

The volume of trade expanded rapidly, particularly in the late 1980s, helped by developments in the USSR and Eastern Europe. The expansion was also aided by the complementarity of the economies and political will of the parties. The gas agreement; the promotion of exports with credits; the opening of the border crossing at Sarp and the growing border/coastal trade; the growth in contracting services; the development of the industry of building, repairing, and overhauling ships; transport; and tourism all bore witness to the increased scope for cooperation. From 1980 to 1991 exports grew by 261.4%, while imports increased by 506.4%. When Soviet enterprises obtained the right to operate independently of the state in 1989, this gave a further boost to bilateral trade. Of Turkey's trade in 1989, 20% was conducted with nonstate enterprises. In 1990 the share of the USSR and the countries of Eastern Europe in Turkey's exports was the fourth highest among the OECD's twenty-four members. With respect to the rate of increase in this share from 1986 to 1990, Turkey ranked second among OECD members.

Another factor contributing to the trend was Turkey's Eximbank credits. From 1989 to 1991 Turkey extended the USSR $1.150 billion in Eximbank credits, of which $555.3 million had been used by the time of the disintegration of the Soviet Union in 1991. With the help of these credits, Turkey's exports to the USSR climbed steadily.

B. Political Relations

The satisfactory state of economic relations had a positive effect on political relations. As the Cold War drew to an end, the two countries' political relations became increasingly based on mutual interests in the line with the USSR's "new way of thinking" policies.

The first high-level contact between the two countries following the military coup in Turkey took place in September 1981 at the level of foreign ministers during the session of the UN General Assembly in New York. This was followed by the visit of the Turkish minister of foreign affairs, İlter Türkmen, to Moscow from 28 November to 3 December 1982. Turkey's decision to take part in the Rapid Deployment Force in 1983 was interpreted by Moscow as a negative development. During the visits of deputy foreign minister Georgy Kornienko to Turkey in 1983 and March 1984, he expressed the misgivings of his government over the installation of missiles on Turkish soil. After the visits, it was announced that there was no question of deploying Pershing missiles in Turkey and that Turkey would not accede to any proposal in this direction. This announcement indicated that Turkey had learned its lesson from the 1962 Cuba crisis.

In parallel with their Soviet counterparts, the Turkish leaders also adopted a constructive approach with respect to relations with the USSR. In the first civilian government following the coup that came to power in December 1983 under Turgut Özal, Vahit Halefoğlu, the former ambassador in Moscow until a month earlier, was appointed foreign minister. The first international agreement of this government was signed with the USSR to redemarcate the common border. The programs of both the first and the second Özal governments emphasized that relations with the USSR would be further developed, with special emphasis on economic relations. The Soviet side responded in like manner to the Turkish approach. The visit of the head of the Council of Ministers of the USSR, Nikolay Tikhanov, from 25 to 27 December 1984 was an important milestone in relations. In the course of this visit the Long-Term Program for Developing Economic, Commercial, Scientific, and Technical Cooperation (with a term of ten years), the Agreement for the Exchange of Goods for the years 1986 to 1990, and the Cultural and Scientific Exchange Program were signed. Tikhanov and Özal met in February during the funeral of Andropov and agreed to develop relations further. It was declared during these talks that, after the natural gas agreement and the subsequent agreements, the course had been set for bilateral agreements to develop as the two countries headed into the twenty-first century. This is how Tikhanov expressed his thoughts: "The agreements that we have signed today are the building blocks on which our relations will rest. I wish to emphasize that the Soviet Union wants this edifice to be not just large and tall but also capable of withstanding earthquakes" (Disisleri Bakanlığı Belleteni, 12 December 1984, p. 130).

In September 1984 and August 1986, during the thirty-ninth and forty-first sessions of the UN General Assembly, the two countries' foreign ministers met to discuss international issues. These contacts ensured that bilateral relations followed the general trends in international relations. It cannot be claimed, however, that there were no differences between the two countries. Occasional tension was felt in relations, as when Gorbachev failed to receive Özal during the latter's visit to Moscow in July 1986. This was a time when Turkey was pressing Bulgaria very hard because of Sofia's treatment of the Turkish minority in that country. The Soviet Union could not appear to be repudiating its ally Bulgaria when the Cold War was still in progress. Furthermore, relations were affected when Mustafa Süleymanoğlu, a Bulgarian Turk, sought refuge in Turkey's Moscow Embassy.

These hitches were overcome, however, and bilateral cooperation continued to develop. A protocol was signed on 24 March 1988 that overcame the twenty-year-long question of the FIR line, delineated the line over the Black Sea, and granted Süleymanoğlu permission to leave the embassy premises and proceed to Turkey. In April the USSR gave up on its demand that the Cyprus question be solved through the international conference. In September 1988 the SS-20 missiles installed in the Kapustin region and capable of hitting targets in Turkey were removed in compliance with the intermediate-range missiles agreement of 1987. Turkey was very satisfied with this action and gave its consent to the opening of the Sarp border crossing.

The talks on the Limitation of Conventional Forces in Europe held in Vienna from March 1989 to November 1990 ended with the signing of an agreement by twenty-two states, including Turkey and the USSR, on 19 November. Under the terms of the agreement, the southeastern region of Turkey (which constituted 24% of its territory) was left outside of the scope of the agreement limiting conventional forces. Engrossed in its own domestic affairs, the USSR made no objection to this arrangement.

The intervention of the Red Army in Azerbaijan in January 1990 met with a very negative reaction among the Turkish public. At the official level, however, this was seen as the internal affair of the USSR and did not cause any lasting damage to bilateral relations. This was in part because the volume of bilateral trade had grown fourfold over the previous four years, to $2 billion. Also, Turkey stayed out of the USSR's internal affairs and retained its attachment to the principle of respect for territorial integrity. Following the signing of the cultural cooperation agreement in November 1990, Foreign Minister Shevardnadze paid a visit to Ankara. Although the main item on the agenda was the Gulf crisis, the two countries managed to sign four agreements dealing with combating the drug trade, cooperation in Black Sea fishing, judicial assistance, and reciprocal promotion of investments. The parties also exchanged ideas about the Black Sea Economic Cooperation (BSEC) project. In addition, a date was fixed for Özal's visit.

In summary, at a time when Turkey was carrying out reforms to enter the market economy, the USSR was engaged in a similar endeavor with its policies of perestroika and glasnost. The USSR became progressively more detached from ideology in its foreign policy under the influence of the "new way of thinking" in politics. This removed many obstacles to the development of economic as well as political relations. Turkey contributed to this process by remaining aloof from the separatist tendencies emerging in the USSR and its scrupulous respect for the USSR's territorial integrity.

The process of disintegration of the Eastern Bloc that began in Eastern Europe in 1989 would engulf the USSR in 1991. It was in the midst of this process that president Turgut Özal visited the USSR in March 1991 and signed the Treaty of Friendship, Good Neighborliness, and Corporation. This treaty would later serve as the basis of the relations with the Russian Federation.

EREL TELLAL

Sources (Relations with the USSR)

- Aktükün, İlker. SSCB'den BDT'ye Nasıl Varıldı. İstanbul: Sorun Yayınları, 1995.
- Arın, Tülay. "Sosyalizm'de İktisadi Reform Modelleri: Merkezi Planlama'dan Özel Mülkiyete." Onbirinci Tez 10 (1990): 41–62.
- ——. "Sovyetler Birliği'nde Yeniden Yapılanma ve İktisadi Reform Programı." Onbirinci Tez 8 (1988): 21–52.
- Balcı, Ergun. "Gorbaçov'un Reformları." Mülkiyeliler Birliği Dergisi 88 (Aug. 1987): 11–19.
- Brown, Archie. New Thinking in Soviet Politics. London: Macmillan, 1992.
- Küçük, Yalçın. Sovyetler Birliği'nde Sosyalizmin Çözülüşü. İstanbul: Tekin Yayınevi, 1991.
- Mandel, Ernest. "Geçiş Dönemi Ekonomisi." Onbirinci Tez 8 (1988): 99–126.
- Nove, Alec. An Economic History of the USSR, 1917–1991. 3rd ed. London: Penguin Books, 1992.
- Savran, Sungur. "Kapitalist Restorasyon mu, Politik Devrim mi?" Onbirinci Tez 10 (1990): 9–40.

Relations with the Balkans

FACTORS AFFECTING TURKEY'S BALKAN POLICIES

Turkey is at least geographically a Balkan state, with 5% of its territory consisting of Thrace (located on the Balkan Peninsula). Although this territory is tiny, the Republic of Turkey has been facing the West since its establishment, and its identity is more Balkan and Mediterranean than Middle Eastern. The Balkans have held an important place for Turkey in its foreign policy from a strategic as well as a human and cultural point of view.

The importance of the Balkans for Turkey can be examined under the following headings.

Historical Ties

Historically, the Balkan Peninsula was the main area of expansion of the Ottoman Empire. The region remained under Ottoman domination for about 500 years, which has affected the region's religious, ethnic, economic, and cultural character up to present times. This has been referred to as the Ottoman heritage and Pax Ottomanica and has been appraised in different ways, depending on whether the observer was from Turkey or from elsewhere in the region.

Because of this historical background, Balkan peoples and Turks have developed a number of prejudices about one another. These prejudices were particularly strong among the Slavs and the Greeks. Turkey had to carry out its Balkan policies against this historical background; and as it became more active in the region during the 1990s, this was interpreted in some quarters as an attempt to return to the Ottoman past.

From the perspective of non-Muslims among the Balkan peoples, the Ottoman era was full of dark images and negative features. Those of Orthodox-Slavic extraction perceive Ottoman rule as a period of political, economic, and cultural oppression. They tend to attribute their present-day problems and their economic and political backwardness to the fact that the Ottoman administration cut them off from the Renaissance and Enlightenment that Western Europe experienced.

This frame of mind was developed mainly because these peoples conducted their struggle for national liberation in the nineteenth century against the Ottoman administration. In the process of building their nation-states by re-creating their histories, they had to rely on anti-Ottoman/Turkish themes and felt the need to rid themselves of their association with the Ottoman past.

Another negative aspect of Ottoman rule for the Orthodox peoples of the Balkans was that it introduced Islam into the region. The Albanians, Bosnians, Pomaks, and Torbesh (Box 6-23) who converted to Islam (some in part, others in full) were seen as ethnic or religious groups that were undesirable vestiges of the Ottoman heritage in the Balkans. All Muslims, especially in the former Yugoslavia, regardless of their ethnic origin or language, were regarded as Turks. During the wars of the 1990s, an effort was made not only to repress the groups perceived as alien but also to destroy buildings like mosques and bridges that recalled the Ottoman past.

For a long time, Balkan historians dwelt on Ottoman/Turkish oppression. Nonetheless, in the 1980s, especially when the obligatory name-changing campaign was going on in Bulgaria (see the discussion below) there was some attempt to be objective. It was conceded that the religious/linguistic identity of peoples was at least preserved during the Ottoman era. In the 1990s, however, after the demise of the socialist regimes, nationalism was once more on the ascendancy and the former line was dropped.

In addition to those groups that converted to Islam, the Turkish minorities are another relic of the Ottoman period in the Balkans. The Turkish minorities in Bulgaria, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Macedonia are perceived as part of the Ottoman heritage and from time to time find themselves subjected to oppression.

Turkey also has negative associations with the Balkans. During the nineteenth century, when nationalism

Box 6-23. Muslims and Turks in the Balkans

Ethnically there are three large Muslim groups in the Balkans: Turks, Albanians, and Slavs.

The Turks live mostly in Bulgaria (900,000), Greece (120,000), Macedonia (100,000), and Kosovo (12,000). These figures represent those who identify themselves as Turkish. If an objective ethnicity criterion (i.e., ethnicity by birth) is applied, these figures include those who are actually Pomak-Muslims with Slavic roots in Bulgaria and Greece and Torbesh in Macedonia (also of Slavic origin). In addition, there are a number of Muslim Gypsies in Bulgaria and Greece:

The Muslims with Slavic ethnicities are considered Bulgarians by Sofia and Greeks by Athens; while Skopje considers them to be Muslim Macedonians. Starting in the second half of the 1990s, the Greek government has been attempting to instill an artificial Pomak consciousness among the Western Thracians of Pomak ancestry, Skopje is having the Torbesh sign documents declaring themselves to be just Muslims.

As a rule, those of Pomak and Torbesh ancestry resent being told they are not Turks. Pomaks in Western Thrace and Torbesh in Macedonia have frequently organized boycotts to enable their children to attend Turkish schools. There are many reasons for this. In the Balkans, outsiders have identified Muslims as Turks. (The French term "to become Turkish" means to convert to Islam.) Only the Turks have a kindred state to rely on, and only Turkey looks after the interests of the Muslim minorities in the Balkans. The Turks are better off than the other Muslims economically, linguistically, and historically as well as in other respects. In the Balkans, where the Orthodox reign supreme, religious identity counts for more than ethnic identity. This has always been the case since Ottoman times, when the Turks held the administration (the millet system).

The Bosnians, the largest ethnic group in Bosnia-Herzegovina, are an important element of the Slavic Muslims (see Box 7-42 in Section 7).

The Albanians are another Muslim minority in the Balkans. Although they are a minority in Yugoslavia, they constitute 90% of the population of Kosovo (see Box 7-44 in Section 7). This ethnic group is the largest minority in Macedonia. According to official statistics they number 430,000, although the Albanians claim that they number 700,000

The general tendency in the Balkans is for Muslims to assimilate to the numerically superior Muslim group. That is why the Albanians in Kosovo and Macedonia strive to assimilate Turks through persuasion and occasionally through coercion, while the Pomaks in Bulgaria and especially in Western Thrace and the Torbesh in Macedonia readily consider themselves Turkish.

(B, ORAN)

was rampant, there was political and social chaos in the region. The lost battles and the retreats led to mass migrations of Balkan Turks/Muslims to Anatolia. With these migrations, the bitterness of the oppression and forced displacement experienced in the Balkans was carried over to Anatolia, to reinforce existing prejudices there. The Balkan region, which was the first area of expansion of the Ottoman Empire, was also the area where the process of disintegration and loss of territory began.

In addition, the Balkan region was where Turkish nationalism found its intellectual roots. It was here that the tradition of setting up political organizations among Turks got started. As nationalist currents in the Balkans reached their peak in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, the Turks also began to feel their effects. In particular, the Society of Union and Progress was inspired by the Balkan pattern of rebel band and secret revolutionary society, both in its establishment and in its structure. Salonica was a highly cosmopolitan city, and its cultural environment could be considered liberal in the Ottoman context. It was therefore natural that Turkish military officers and intellectuals would make their first contact with nationalism in this city.

From the establishment of the Republic until the end of the 1980s, the Balkans has been a region with mostly negative aspects for Turkey. In the interwar period the Balkan Peninsula was one of Italy's two areas of expansion, which raised security concerns for Turkey. After World War II the Balkans became a cockpit for Cold War rivalries. The Balkans were perceived as a route over which the Communist threat could reach Turkey and as a region where minority issues could turn into political crises at any time.

People of Balkan Extraction Living in Turkey

It is estimated that there are about 5 to 7 million Balkan migrants living in Turkey. During the forced migration of Bulgarian Turks in the late 1980s, it was seen that most of these people maintain their links with relatives left behind and that their plight is a direct cause for concern for the migrants. First, they are naturally distressed by the oppression itself. They also know that if conditions for their relatives worsened and a new wave of migrations occurred, they would have to bear the burden and accommodate the newcomers, even if only temporarily.

During times of tension when Turkish/Muslim minorities are feeling oppressed, governments in Turkey are compelled to bear in mind the emotions of voters that hail from the Balkans. Those that came from the region through the 1950s now make up the middle classes, entrepreneurs, and civil servants, while those that arrived in the 1980s mostly ended up in industrial centers like Bursa, İzmit, İzmir, and İstanbul as skilled industrial workers. All of these people tend to be organized and constitute a Balkan lobby. Among these can be cited the Arnavut Kardeşliği Kültür ve Dayanışma Derneği (Albanian Brotherhood Society for Culture and Solidarity), established in 1952; Batı Trakya Türkleri Dayanışma Derneği (Mutual Support Society of the Turks of Western Thrace), established in 1975; Balkan Türkleri Dayanışma ve Kültür Derneği (Society for Mutual Support and Culture of the Balkan Turks), established in 1985; and Rumeli Türkleri Kültür ve Dayanışma Derneği (Society for Culture and Mutual Support of the Rumeli Turks). This demographic composition and the corresponding political organizations are among the factors that contribute toward Turkey playing a greater role in the Balkans.

Geographic and Strategic Reasons

From a geographic and strategic point of view, the Balkan region is important for Turkey for the following reasons.

1. The route to the West crosses the Balkans. Most of Turkey's economic and political relations are with Western European countries, and the routes connecting Turkey with those countries go across the Balkans. From this perspective, Turkey must consider the following elements.

First, the Balkans must be stable, to avoid compromising the safety of these routes. Turkey felt this imperative most acutely during the disturbances in Bosnia in the 1990s and during the Kosovo war in 1999. When these routes become blocked, more than half of Turkey's trade is affected. Furthermore, the physical links of Turkish workers in Europe with their mother country become problematic.

Second, Turkey is also apprehensive about a possible alliance between its Balkan neighbors, Greece and Bulgaria. This actually occurred in 1986, when these countries signed a nonaggression pact. After 1990 Bulgaria changed course and, while maintaining good relations with Greece, made sure not to pursue policies of confrontation with Turkey.

2. The region of Eastern Thrace, the only part of Turkey that lies on the Balkan Peninsula, is vital for the security of Istanbul and the Turkish Straits. Eastern Thrace lacks the territorial depth necessary for a successful defense against an attack coming from the Balkans. Consequently, this region is seen important from the perspective of strategic defense.

The Turkish/Muslim Minorities in the Balkans

From time to time, Turkey finds itself obliged to take up an active role vis-à-vis the Turkish/Muslim minorities in the Balkans. This is partly because of the pressure of the Balkan lobby and partly because Turkey happens to be a major power in its region. Furthermore, bilateral and multilateral treaties require Turkey's action on behalf of the Turkish/Muslim minorities, especially those in Bulgaria and Greece, when they come under pressure or in the event of a breach of international covenants.

With the exception of Tito's Yugoslavia, the record of the Balkan countries in their treatment of minorities is far from being clean. Turkey has had to intercede not only on behalf of minorities in Bulgaria and Greece, where they were protected by treaties, but also on behalf of other Muslim/Turkish minorities. Whatever their ethnic origin may be, all oppressed Muslim minorities look to Turkey for protection and choose to settle in Turkey when forced to emigrate.

II. TURKEY'S BALKAN POLICY DURING THE COLD WAR

The Balkan Pact and Alliance

In all international arrangements, Turkey has consistently striven for stability in the Balkans and has always pursued undiluted pro-status quo policies.

When pursuing these policies, Turkey ran into difficulties with Bulgaria, a country that stood out as revisionist in the interwar period. During the Cold War, an ideological dimension compounded the difficulties because Bulgaria was in the Eastern Bloc. Countries like Albania, Yugoslavia, and Romania that did not have borders with Turkey, however, were able to maintain good relations with Ankara, even though they had Communist regimes, because of their distinct situations within the Eastern Bloc. Albania left the Soviet orbit in 1961, Yugoslavia and Soviet Union already had parted ways in 1948, and Belgrade gradually aligned itself with Turkey and Greece. Furthermore, Yugoslavia was a model state in its treatment of minorities. Romania under Nicolae Ceausescu distinguished itself as a maverick state within the Eastern Bloc in its opposition to the USSR during the 1970s.

Greece, Turkey's ally within the Western Bloc, supported Turkish efforts to preserve stability in the Balkans during the interwar years. After World War II, starting in the mid-1950s when the first differences over Cyprus emerged, Greece became a rival and a source of concern for Turkey in the Aegean and the Balkans.

Strife and confusion have been ever present in the Balkans, but the region has also seen frequent initiatives for closer cooperation. Among these can be cited the 1934 Balkan Pact (of which Turkey was also a member), the Balkans Union or Federation (an idea floated by leftist circles in the interwar period, which the socialist regimes established after World War II sought to revive), the Stability Pact, and the Southeast Europe Cooperation Initiative (SECI), which came about after the Cold War.

The Balkan Pact signed in 1953 was Turkey's most noteworthy effort to preserve stability in the Balkans and bore the hallmark of the Cold War. Tito's Yugoslavia was expelled from the Cominform in 1948 when it refused to accept the tutelage of the USSR. When Yugoslavia felt itself threatened by its neighbors Romania and Bulgaria, it started coming closer to Western countries. At this point Bulgaria's mass expulsion of Bulgarian Turks in 1950–51 was causing great concern in Turkey.

Eventually, at Turkey's initiative and with the support of the U.S. and Britain, the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation was signed by Turkey, Greece, and Yugoslavia in Ankara in February 1953. A year later this pact became a full alliance with a treaty signed in Bled in Yugoslavia. Article 2 of this treaty contained the following provision that was typical of all alliances: "The Contracting Parties agree that any armed aggression against one or more of them in any part of their territories shall be considered an aggression against all the Contracting Parties, who...shall jointly and severally go to the assistance of the Party or Parties attacked by taking immediately and by common accord any measures, including the use of armed force, which they deem necessary for effective defense." In the years that followed, however, the meetings foreseen in the treaty failed to take place and the alliance became a dead letter due to the deterioration of Turkish-Greek relations and the reconciliation of Yugoslavia with the USSR in 1955. The treaty was concluded for a period of twenty years and was allowed to expire at the end of this term in April 1975 (Soysal, pp. 474–77).

The Stoica Plan

This plan was conceived by Romanian prime minister Chivu Stoica on 17 September 1957 to promote cooperation among the Balkan states. The plan was submitted to Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, Yugoslavia, and Turkey. These countries and Romania would engage themselves to develop economic and cultural relations, to settle their differences, to prevent disputes that could not be resolved from hindering their cooperation, and to undertake joint economic projects. The plan was immediately accepted by Bulgaria and Albania. Yugoslavia agreed on condition that all Balkan states would participate. Turkey and Greece turned down the plan.

The rejection of the plan by Turkey and Greece was due to the Cold War. At a time when the Democratic Party was in power in Turkey and the country was very close to the U.S., this initiative was perceived as designed to detach Turkey from NATO and to spread Soviet propaganda. It was unthinkable for Turkey to consent to a plan that had the USSR behind it when the Menderes government was doing its best to secure the installation of Jupiter missiles on Turkish soil (Sander, pp. 148–60).

In 1961 there was another initiative for Balkan cooperation. Bulgaria, Yugoslavia, Romania, and Greece set up the Balkan Cooperation and Mutual Understanding Committee. The first meeting of the committee took place in Athens in April 1961, the second in Sofia in March 1962, the third in Bucharest in May 1963, and the fourth in Belgrade in June 1964. Turkey did not participate in these meetings, and Greece used the last two meetings as an anti-Turkish platform at a time when its relations with Turkey were strained.

Starting in the mid-1950s, Turkey's attention was focused primarily on the West and events in the Middle East, and Ankara remained aloof toward the Balkans. In the 1950s foreign policy was formulated in Ankara in conformity with the interest of the West in general and the U.S. in particular. The Balkan Pact and Alliance of 1953 and 1954 were concluded under Cold War conditions under U.S. guidance. Unlike other regions, Turkey took no individual initiative in the Balkans; nor did it attempt to develop its own foreign policy options in the region. This happened only when Turkish foreign policy turned in a multidimensional direction in the mid-1960s and when Ecevit set a new course in the 1970s.

Turkey and the Elimination of Nuclear Weapons in the Balkans

In addition to the Stoica initiative, proposals regarding political and economic cooperation and disarmament during the Cold War usually came from the countries of the Eastern Bloc.

The first initiative on the subject was the proposal of the USSR to the U.S., Britain, and France to eliminate nuclear weapons from the Balkan and Adriatic regions. The four powers would be the guarantors of the undertaking under the proposal.

Turkey was against the plan, but the USSR and the other Balkan states kept bringing this proposal up for discussion on subsequent occasions. Greece, however, began to support the plan after the government of Andreas Papandreou came to power in 1981. The Declaration on Good Neighborliness signed by Greece and Bulgaria in 1986 contained a reference to the elimination of nuclear and chemical weapons from the Balkans. In addition to these two counties, Yugoslavia also favored the plan. As usual, Albania stayed away from this process. This left Turkey as the sole Balkan country opposing the elimination of nuclear weapons from the region. This was important, because Greece and Turkey were the only Balkan countries where nuclear weapons were located.

The reasons for Turkey's opposition were the following:

- The aim of the USSR was to weaken the Western defense system. The elimination of nuclear weapons would leave a gap in Western defenses that would require major restructuring. This would lead to diminished deterrence.
- The main objective of the USSR and its allies in introducing this proposal was to influence public opinion in the West.
- One of the aims of the USSR was to create discord among NATO allies.
- The Warsaw Pact enjoyed superiority in conventional forces in the Balkans. The elimination of nuclear weapons in Greece and Turkey would leave Thrace exposed to the threat of the superior conventional forces of the Eastern Bloc.
- This threat would be directed at Eastern Thrace, which lacked strategic depth, and particularly the Turkish Straits. The defense of this region called for both conventional weapons and short-range nuclear weapons.
- The elimination of nuclear weapons solely from the Balkans would weaken both Balkan and regional security, because the Balkans would still remain within the range of Soviet nuclear weapons (Karaosmanoğlu).

For these reasons, Turkey stood against the elimination of nuclear weapons from the Balkans as a matter of principle from the very beginning.

Turkey's Transition to an Active Policy in the Balkans When Turkey made a major turn in its foreign policy in the 1960s and adopted a multidimensional approach, its Balkan policy was also affected. From then on, Turkey started becoming more active in the region. Turkey's decision to adopt a multidimensional foreign policy was in large measure due to Cyprus and to its relations with Greece, and this naturally reflected on its Balkan policies.

Within the framework of its multidimensional policies, Turkey became more involved in regions that had been neglected until then, such as the Middle East, Asia, and Africa. It also felt the need for new overtures to the countries of the Eastern Bloc. In this context, Turkey also started taking a closer interest in Balkan countries other than Greece.

While Turkey had neglected the Balkan states, Greece had developed its relations with them from the mid-1950s to the mid-1960s. Bulgaria and Yugoslavia were supporting Greece on the Cyprus issue. So Turkey turned its attention to the Balkans to reduce Greek influence there and to soften the positions of these countries on the question of Cyprus.

At this point Albania happened to be one of the five countries that voted in favor of the Turkish position in the vote on Cyprus that took place on 16 December 1965 at the UN General Assembly. Albania wanted to develop its relations with Turkey in order to break out of its isolation in the Balkans and because it had strained relations with Greece as a result of the dispute over the region of Epirus and the treatment of minorities.

Turkey gave priority to the Balkans for the second time after World War II when Ecevit was prime minister. The first foreign visit of the Ecevit government's foreign minister, Turan Güneş, was to Romania. This active policy continued after Ecevit. In 1975 a Declaration on Good Neighborliness was signed with Bulgaria and a joint communiqué with Romania. A year later, Tito visited Ankara. These developments were the result of Ankara's new foreign policy approach, as well the effects on the international environment of the Helsinki Final Act in 1975.

During Ecevit's second term as prime minister in 1978, disagreements with the U.S. over Cyprus, opium poppy cultivation, and the arms embargo led Ankara to formulate its foreign policy on a new basis. In this context, Ecevit adopted the policy of giving greater emphasis to good relations with neighbors rather than to armaments to ensure the country's security. Within the framework of this policy, special emphasis was given to relations with the Balkan countries. Ecevit's first foreign visit was to Yugoslavia, and this was followed by a visit to Romania.

In summary, Turkey started directing its attention to the Balkans in the mid-1960s and has maintained this interest almost without interruption ever since. This was in a certain measure due to Ankara's wish to be influential in the region. There were also other compelling reasons, however, such as the developments in Bulgaria in the mid-1980s and the conflict in Bosnia.

III. THE STATE OF THE BALKANS IN THE 1980S

In general, the Balkan region appeared calm during the 1980s. Aside from the oppressive Bulgarian policies directed at the Turkish minority and the Greco-Turkish crises in the Aegean, there were no conflicts or sources of instability until 1989.

During the Cold War, all of the political tendencies in the international political scene were represented in the Balkans. Bulgaria and Romania were in the Warsaw Pact; Turkey and Greece belonged to NATO; Yugoslavia was one of the leaders of the nonaligned movement; and Albania was closely aligned with China from 1961 to 1978.

In the 1980s Nicolae Ceausescu was pursuing an economic policy in Romania designed to eliminate the country's foreign debt and cut down consumption. Enver Hoxha, who had been leading Albania for forty years, died in 1985 and was succeeded by Ramiz Alia. Although Albania continued to pursue its policy of having no relations with major powers and not resorting to foreign loans, its hard line began to give signs of softening somewhat. In May 1980 Tito, the founder and leader of postwar Yugoslavia, died and was replaced by a collective leadership in which the presidency rotated among the representatives of the component republics and autonomous provinces. This created a vacuum in the leadership that Slobodan Milosevic sought to fill after seizing power in Serbia in 1987.

As explained in detail in the following discussion, Bulgaria launched a policy of forceful assimilation in 1984.

This general picture in the Balkans started to change in 1985 and 1986 under the policies of glasnost and perestroika developed by Gorbachev in the USSR. As a result of this, Moscow indicated in 1989 to the Warsaw Pact members in Eastern Europe and the Balkans that they could take their own national course toward socialism. This led to the collapse of the regimes of these countries and even spread to socialist countries outside the pact, like Albania and Yugoslavia.

IV. TURKISH-BULGARIAN RELATIONS AND THE QUESTION OF THE TURKISH MINORITY

Factors Affecting Turkish-Bulgarian Relations
In the 1980s Turkish-Bulgarian relations developed against the following background.

Both countries were the most subservient members of their respective blocs. After breaking loose from the Ottoman Empire following the 1877–78 war and the subsequent Treaty of San Stefano and Berlin Congress process, Bulgaria became extremely attached to Russia, its active protector in the process. That is why the friendship for Soviet Russia ran very deep among Bulgarians. It is noteworthy that, although Bulgaria was an ally of Germany in World War II and took its place in the revisionist camp, it never declared war on the USSR.

As a member of the Eastern Bloc, Bulgaria was not a country that Turkey could afford to ignore prior to 1990. With the USSR on its eastern border and Warsaw Pact member Bulgaria on its western border, Turkey was caught between two countries of the opposite bloc. This situation posed a serious security problem. Unlike its eastern regions (which were mountainous and afforded good possibilities for defense), Thrace, next to Bulgaria, was relatively flat and difficult to defend. Furthermore, the distance from the border to Istanbul and the Straits was quite short, with little strategic depth. Consequently, it was necessary to make the necessary arrangements for defense within the framework of NATO, bearing these adverse conditions in mind.

Another significant factor affecting relations was the presence of a Turkish minority in Bulgaria, numbering about 900,000. With Greece, there was a balance of sorts because of the presence of a Greek minority in Turkey, even if relatively small. No such balance existed with Bulgaria, however, which had almost no Bulgarian minority living in Turkey.

As noted earlier, it was always important for Turkey to make sure that Bulgaria did not cooperate with Greece on the minority question and that the two countries did not get together to block Turkey's access routes to the West

Bulgaria's Policy toward the Turkish Minority

The most serious problems with Bulgaria emerged in connection with the Turkish minority in Bulgaria, which had always been a source of discord between the two countries. Although there was a relaxation in Sofia's approach to the Turkish minority after World War II under the regime of Georgi Dimitrov, relations went sour when a significant part of the minority was forced to emigrate in 1950. In August 1950 Bulgaria was seeking to establish collective farms and consequently forced 250,000 people of Turkish stock to migrate to Turkey. Another reason for Bulgaria's action was to create difficulties for the pro-Western Democratic Party government after it decided to send troops to Korea. About 154,000 Bulgarian Turks had crossed into Turkey by the end of 1951. The Turkish government claimed that Sofia had also introduced 60,000 Gypsies and some Communist spies among these migrants. Turkey was eventually compelled to close its border. On 2 December 1950 the two countries signed an agreement. Article 1 stated that Bulgarian exit visas would be given to those who intended to leave Bulgaria for Turkey only after they had obtained Turkish entry visas. Article 3 provided that persons who came with the migrants without a Turkish entry visa would be turned back at the border by the Turkish authorities.

In the following years Turkey was apprehensive

Box 6-24. The Rights of the Turkish Minority in Bulgaria

The Turks of Bulgaria are unlike other Turkish minorities in the Balkans. Despite their relatively large numbers and their long-standing legal safeguards, they have been subjected to harsh oppression.

By the Treaty of Berlin of 1878, Bulgaria became an autonomous principality under the Ottoman sultan. Article 4 of the treaty guaranteed the protection of the rights and interests of the Turks that lived alongside Bulgarians. There were additional arrangements concerning the Turkish minority in articles 5 and 12 of the treaty.

In 1908, at the time of the Young Turk revolution, Bulgaria declared its independence and became a monarchy. When the agreement with the Ottoman state to confirm this independence was concluded, a protocol was signed between the two states in Istanbulion 19 April 1909, dealing with the status of the Turks who remained in Bulgaria. Under this protocol, the Turkish-Muslim minority was to enjoy full freedom of religion and the same political and civil rights as Bulgarians.

Following the Balkan Wars, a peace treaty was concluded with Bulgaria in September 1913 and, in addition, a convention was signed dealing with the status of muftis (Muslim religious jurists) and specifying the minority rights of Turks.

Another international covenant dealing with minorities in Bulgaria was the Peace Treaty of Neully, concluded at the end of World War I. Although this treaty made no mention of the Turkish minority as such, it did establish the rights of minorities in Bulgaria. With the Treaty of Friendship between Turkey and Bulgaria signed in October 1925. Sofia agreed to apply the minority rights specified in the Neuilly treaty to the Muslim minority. On the same date, a Residence Convention was also signed in Ankara. Under the provisions of this convention, nothing would be done to prevent the migration of Bulgarian Turks to Turkey. This convention remains legally binding to this day.

Article 2 of the treaty of peace signed by Bulgaria and the Allied powers in Paris in 1947 following World War II also contains provisions regarding minority rights

In March 1968, when the Bulgarian head of state Todor Zhivkov Visited Ankara, a Migration Agreement was signed between the two countries aimed at reuniting divided families.

By signing the Final Act of Helsinki in 1975, Bulgaria committed itself to respect the minority rights contained in that document.

(B. ORAN)

(Source: Ali Dayioğlu, Toplama Kampından Meclis'e Bulgaristan'da Türk ve Müslüman (Azınlığı (İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2005))

about the Turkish minority being used by Bulgaria as a tool of its foreign policy, as happened in 1950–51, while Sofia worried about the possibility of this minority being used by Ankara to undermine Bulgaria's security. After the signing of a migration agreement in 1968, nothing much happened until the middle of the 1980s, except for the banning of Turkish-language education in Bulgarian schools in 1974 (Box 6-24).

The Turks in Bulgaria were mostly rural folk who maintained their traditional way of life. They lived apart from Bulgarians and managed to keep their identities. As the rate of growth of the Slavic population went into decline, the Turkish population maintained its trend of growth. The Bulgarian administration was faced with the long-term prospect of a large minority that maintained its separate ethnic, religious, and linguistic identity. The attempt to reduce the numbers of the minority through emigration did not produce the intended results. Furthermore, according to one theory, the proclamation of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus in 1983 after the Turkish operation on the island led the Bulgarian administration to suspect that Turkey might be planning to use the Turks for a similar move in Bulgaria (Poulton, p. 201). These apprehensions led the Bulgarian administration under Todor Zhivkov's leadership to launch the campaign to force the Turks to change their names toward the end of 1984. This campaign was dubbed "The Process of Rebirth" and was accompanied by much violence.

Starting in December 1984, the developments in Bulgaria began to be reported in the Turkish and international press. Although the Bulgarian government had forbidden the travel of foreign journalists to Turkish areas, reports of what was occurring were reaching Turkey by different routes. According to these reports, the villages that were resisting the campaign to change names were surrounded by tanks and those who rejected their new Bulgarian names were being arrested, sent to the Belene camp, or killed. The first operations took place in the towns of Haskovo, Kurdzhali, and Momchilgrad. In January 1985 president Kenan Evren sent a message to Todor Zhivkov calling for an end to the campaign. The campaign was intensified, however, and extended to the northern parts of the country. According to certain sources, between 800 and 2,500 Bulgarian Turks perished during this period.

During the campaign, all Turks were compelled to adopt Slavic names and were issued identity papers with their new names. While doing this, the Bulgarian government mobilized anthropologists and historians to prove that the Turks were actually Bulgarians who had been forcibly converted to Islam during the Ottoman era. This was done to win over the Turks to their new identities.

The persecution was not confined to the changing of names. Those who spoke Turkish were punished. The newspaper Yeni Işık (New Light), published in Turkish and Bulgarian, was closed down. The sale of books in Turkish was banned, and circumcisions were proscribed.

Turkish cemeteries were destroyed to remove all traces of the past.

Although there were some attempts to resist on the part of the Turks of Bulgaria, they were eventually forced to submit to the oppression and intimidation. In 1985 they founded the nonviolent Turkish National Liberation Movement under the leadership of Ahmet Doğan. But within one year Doğan and a large number of his colleagues in the leadership of the movement were detained.

Bulgaria sought to deflect international criticism by claiming that the Turks had changed their names voluntarily. But these efforts did not prevent Bulgaria's already poor image from being damaged further. As the closest ally of the USSR, the Bulgarian government was under strong suspicion of being in league with international smuggling rings. It was also guilty of liquidating Bulgarian dissidents living in exile. The persecution caused Bulgaria's standing to suffer further damage.

Turkey's Reaction

The Özal government, in power since 1983, adopted a cautious approach when the initial reports of persecution reached Turkey. Having come to power following the 12 September military administration, the Özal government was anxious to improve Turkey's international standing. Also, it placed the development of economic relations at the top of its foreign policy agenda, so it sought to deal with the Bulgarian crisis without letting it get out of hand. In January 1985 Turkish minister of state Mesut Yılmaz made a speech in Bursa (a city with a large concentration of people with relatives in Bulgaria), calling on everyone to remain calm and giving assurances that the government would take the necessary measures to deal with the question. Prime Minister Özal was also calling for a rational rather than an emotional approach.

Under the pressure of public opinion, Turkey delivered a note to Sofia in March 1985, which called for negotiations to solve the problem and indicated that Ankara was ready to conclude a migration agreement. The Zhivkov regime responded that Ankara was interfering in Bulgaria's internal affairs.

As the crisis escalated and the full gravity of the situation emerged, Prime Minister Özal announced that Turkey would be prepared if necessary to receive and resettle all the Turks in Bulgaria in Turkey. At the same time, Turkey sought to attract the world's attention by internationalizing the issue. As a result of these efforts, the Council of Europe issued a report in 1985 calling on Sofia to end its persecution immediately. The Organization of the Islamic Conference adopted a resolution expressing its concern over the developments in Bulgaria at its meeting of foreign ministers held in Fez. The OIC also sent a contact group to Bulgaria in July 1985 to report on the situation. The U.S. raised this problem in various UN meetings and reduced its diplomatic contacts with Bulgaria. The question was also negotiated by the CSCE at its Vienna meeting in 1987. Organizations like Helsinki Watch and Amnesty International issued critical reports on Bulgaria's action.

Until 1989 Bulgaria refused to discuss Turkey's offer of concluding a migration agreement. When Zhivkov forced the Turkish minority to migrate en masse to Turkey in the summer of 1989, however, the crisis acquired a new dimension. Starting in May, thousands of Turks started arriving in Turkey after disposing of their properties in haste and carrying only their personal belongings. Özal had stated earlier that everyone would be welcome and even Zhivkov could come. When the number of refugees reached 300,000 in August 1989, however, he instituted a visa requirement and closed the border.

The migration had two negative consequences. First, many ended up with relatives who had arrived in previous migrations. This constituted a heavy social and economic burden for Bursa and its surrounding areas. Second, large numbers of migrants looking for employment brought down workers' wages, especially in the industrial sector. Resentment arose against them when employers started replacing their workers with migrants, who were ready to accept lower wages.

During the crisis the West sided openly with Turkey, because Bulgaria's action was so flagrant and its international image was so poor. The U.S. in particular was highly critical of Bulgaria, in line with Reagan's anti-Soviet and anti-Communist policies.

Among the countries of the region, the Greek press held Turkey accountable for developments in Bulgaria, even if there were no official pronouncements from Athens. The Greeks declared that Turkey had aroused the Bulgarian Turks against Bulgaria. At a time when the persecution of the Turks in Bulgaria was in full swing, Greek prime minster Andreas Papandreou visited Sofia in September 1986 and signed a Declaration of Friendship, Good Neighborliness, and Cooperation.

In its actions, Greece was motivated by the perception that Bulgaria was an ally against Turkey. Greece could not afford to be critical of Bulgaria's treatment of the Turkish minority, because support of Turkey's complaints might constitute a precedent that could strengthen Turkey's hand in its actions to address the complaints of the Turkish/Muslim minority in Western Thrace.

Yugoslavia, which had outstanding problems with Bulgaria over Macedonia, was ready to blame Bulgaria on this issue. The Yugoslav press found it ridiculous that in Bulgaria, where the population had maintained its identity during five hundred years of Ottoman rule, the Turks would suddenly renounce their national/religious identities. The Yugoslav government also supported Turkey by granting refugee status to Turkish victims of oppression fleeing to Yugoslavia. Those taking refuge in Romania, however, were being sent back to Bulgaria.

As a result of these developments, a strange alignment occurred in the Balkans on the issue of treatment of minorities. Greece and Bulgaria were in one camp because of the Turkish and Macedonian minorities in their midst, while Turkey and Yugoslavia drifted closer because they were faced with similar problems. This alignment would fall apart, however, as a result of fundamental changes in the Balkans during the 1990s.

İLHAN UZGEL

Sources (Relations with the Balkans)

- Brown, Carl (ed.). İmparatorluk Mirası, Balkanlar'da ve Orta Doğu'da Osmanlı Damgası (original title: Imperial Legacy: The Ottoman Imprint in the Balkans and the Middle East [New York: Columbia University Press, 1996]). İstanbul: İletişim, 2000.
- Karaosmanoğlu, Ali. "Balkanların Nükleer Silahlardan Arındırılması ve Türkiye." Dış Politika (Feb. 1984): 5–12.
- Oran, Baskın. "Balkan Müslümanlarında Dinsel ve Ulusal Kimlik." SBF Dergisi (Jan.-Dec. 1993): 109-20.
- Özgür, Nurcan. Etnik Sorunların Çözümünde Hak ve Özgürlükler Hareketi. İstanbul: Der Yayınları, 1999.
- Poulton, Hugh. Balkanlar, Çatışan Azınlıklar Çatışan Devletler (original title: The Balkans: Minorities and States in Conflict [London: Minority Rights Publications, 1991]). İstanbul: Sarmal Yayınevi, 1991.
- Sander, Oral. Balkan Gelişmeleri ve Türkiye. Ankara: SBF, 1966. Soysal, İsmail. Türkiye'nin Uluslararası Siyasal Bağıtları (1945–1990). Vol. 2. Ankara: TTK, 1991.
- Wolf, Robert Lee. The Balkans in Our Time. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1956.

The Issue of the Turkish Straits

I. THE STRAITS FROM 1939 TO 1980

The subject of the Straits in earlier periods is discussed in the section on World War II and in the chapter on "Relations with the USSR" from 1945 to 1960 (see Sections 3 and 4). We shall start with a brief summary of the period from 1939 to 1980.

From the time World War II broke out on 1 September 1939 to 23 February 1945, when Turkey declared war on Germany, the situation with respect to the Straits under the Montreux Convention was a state of war in which Turkey remained neutral. In this situation the warships of belligerents could not sail through the Straits.

In the course of Foreign Minister Saraçoğlu's talks with Stalin and Molotov in Moscow in 1939, the Soviet leaders asked Turkey to prevent the warships of non-Black Sea Powers from sailing through the Straits without the USSR's consent, in contravention of the Montreux Straits Convention. Moscow also sought a pact with Turkey that would allow for the Straits to be defended jointly by Turkey and the USSR. Ankara rejected these Soviet proposals and concluded the Tripartite Alliance with Britain and France.

During the war, the subject of the Straits was taken up in talks between Germany and the USSR. The USSR demanded a base on the Straits with a long-term lease as one of the conditions for joining the war on the side of the Axis powers. Following the German attack, however, the USSR delivered a note to Turkey on 10 August 1941, indicating that it had no claims with respect to the Straits.

In the course of the war, the most significant development in relation to the Straits that had long-term effects was the passage through the Straits of German and Italian warships in contravention of the Montreux Convention. After the war Moscow made certain claims regarding the Turkish Straits and tried to justify them on the basis of the passage of these ships. At the Yalta summit held in February 1945, the subject of the Straits was also taken up. In March 1945 Molotov informed Ambassador Sarper that the USSR would not extend the 1925 Turkish-Soviet Friendship and Nonaggression Treaty any further. Molotov stressed that postwar conditions had changed and that his country was ready to undertake negotiations to conclude a new treaty with Turkey in the light of the new conditions.

At the Potsdam Conference in July 1945, the U.S., USSR, and Britain concluded that the Montreux Convention no longer corresponded to current needs and needed to be renewed. They agreed to submit their views on the regime of the Straits to Turkey.

The first country that submitted its views in compliance with the Potsdam decision was the U.S. In a note dated 2 November 1945, the U.S. proposed that the Straits be kept open to all merchant vessels in time of peace and war. This would also apply to the transit of war vessels of the Black Sea Powers. In time of peace, the transit through the Straits of the war vessels of non–Black Sea Powers (except for small-tonnage vessels) would not be allowed. Furthermore, the U.S. wanted the United Nations to replace the League of Nations in the revised system and called for the exclusion of Japan from the parties to the new convention. On 21 November Britain submitted its note, which was similar to the U.S. position. Turkey accepted the U.S. proposals as a basis for the negotiations on the revision of the Montreux Convention.

On 7 August 1946 the USSR submitted its note on the Straits. Moscow pointed out that the Montreux rules had been violated during the war and called for the revision of the existing convention. The Soviet note contained two important proposals that diverged from the American position: (1) the new regime would be determined solely by the Black Sea Powers; (2) Turkey and the USSR would join in the defense of the Straits to prevent this waterway from being used against the interests of the Black Sea Powers.

The U.S. and Britain responded to the Soviet note before Turkey did and rejected the Soviet proposals. In

Box 6-25. Treaties Creating Objective Status

As a principle of international law, treatles are applicable only to the states that are parties to them. A treaty does not create either obligations or rights for a third state without the latter's consent. Unlike this general rule, certain treaties establish universally applicable legal regimes (erga omnes). These treaties are those demarcating borders, establishing rules of navigation for international waterways, or regulating national questions like the status of a state. In practice these treaties are binding on all states regardless of their consent.

Although the 1969 Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties makes no mention of these treaties, this does not signify that they do not exist. To cite an example, the 1978 Vienna Convention on Succession of States to Treaties provides in articles 11 and 12 that, in the event of the establishment of a new state on the territory of another state, the obligations and rights of the former state relating to borders and other territorial questions will continue to apply. International practice also demonstrates that certain treaties, by their very nature, bring about situations/obligations that third parties must accept.

(K. Özersay)

its response, Turkey refuted the claim that the terms of the Montreux Convention had been violated during the war and rejected the Soviet request to participate in the defense of the Straits. On 24 September 1946 the USSR submitted a further note, explaining in greater detail the reasons for its proposals. Whereas its previous note had also been submitted to the U.S. and Britain, this one was delivered only to Ankara. Turkey informed Washington and London of the Soviet note; as on the previous occasion, the U.S. and Britain responded before Turkey. In their response, these countries informed Moscow that the exchange of views with Turkey had taken place in conformity with the Potsdam agreement and would be pursued no further.

Turkey's response to the second Soviet note came on 18 October 1946. Ankara also indicated that the preliminary exchange of views to precede an international conference to revise the Montreux Convention had been completed. Moscow never replied to Turkey's note, and the contemplated conference never took place.

From 1960 to 1980 a number of difficulties arose in connection with the Straits: (1) invoking the terms "in time of peace" and "in time of war," (2) the consequences of developments in the military and technological fields, and (3) the classification of warships.

The first difficulty arose because liberation movements, decolonization, and the involvement of major powers in these developments led to fundamental changes in international relations and the concept of war after World War II. This led to a blurring of the concepts "in time of war" and "in time of peace."

Although article 19 of the Montreux Convention specifies that the war vessels of belligerents may not transit the Straits in time of war (Turkey being neutral), Turkey did not prevent the passage of the war vessels of the belligerents during the Arab-Israeli War. Specifically, it allowed the warships of the United Arab Republic to navigate through the Straits without any reaction from the contracting parties of Montreux.

During the war in Vietnam, Turkey allowed U.S. warships to sail through the Turkish Straits. The Soviet newspapers Pravda and Izvestiya accused Turkey of violating the convention by allowing the warships of a belligerent state to sail through the Straits. In response, Foreign Minister Çağlayangil declared that the U.S. was not at war in Vietnam but merely supporting one of the warring sides. Initially the U.S. declared that it was not a party to the Montreux Convention and therefore was not bound by its provisions. It subsequently adopted the Turkish government's argument based on objective status, however, and accepted the view that those not a party to the convention must also adhere to its terms (Box 6-25).

In regard to the second factor (the impact that technological changes made on the Montreux Convention), we can relate the case of the warships Dyess and Turner. These vessels of the U.S. Sixth Fleet in the Mediterranean sailed through the Dardanelles in December 1968 and remained in the Black Sea for five days before returning to the Sixth Fleet. Both vessels were under the convention limit of 15,000 tons, and from this perspective there was no impediment to their passage through the Straits. Furthermore, the cannons on board these ships in the lightsurface-vessel category were smaller than the 203 mm specified in the convention as the upper limit. The Dyess was armed with eight ASROC (antisubmarine rocket) launchers with a diameter of 305 mm, however. This led the Soviet and Bulgarian embassies to deliver verbal protests to Turkey. In responding to these protests, Turkey stated that new weapons had been developed since 1936 that were not mentioned in the Montreux Convention. Consequently, the passage through the Straits of vessels armed with such weapons was not prohibited, provided the weapons in question were of a defensive nature. This question arose because annex II of the Montreux Convention had not provided for developments in weapons technology.

The third question (classification of warships) arose because Montreux allowed the passage of certain warships according to their category. This made it important to determine the category of a warship. This situation came up on 18 July 1976 when the Soviet warship Kiev passed through the Straits in transit, with Turkey's authorization. This vessel had the capacity to accommodate on its deck twenty-five to thirty Yak-36 fixed-wing vertical takeoff and landing aircraft in addition to twenty-five to thirty antisubmarine helicopters.

The USSR described the Kiev as an antisubmarine cruiser. There was an argument, however, about whether the ship was an antisubmarine cruiser as stated or was really an aircraft carrier designed to provide air cover for the Soviet fleet against the Sixth Fleet. The category in which the Kiev was placed would determine whether it would be allowed to sail through the Straits or not.

None of the parties to the Montreux Convention made a formal objection to the Kiev's passage through the Straits in 1976, but doubts were raised about the meaning of certain provisions of the convention in international law.

II. PROBLEMS THAT AROSE FROM 1980 TO 1990

When the Montreux Convention came into effect in 1936, the amount of shipping in the region of the Turkish Straits was considerably less than at present. There have also been great changes in the shape and size of ships since then as a consequence of developments in shipbuilding technology.

The meteorological and hydrological characteristics of the Bosphorus, however, have remained constant. This has led to new questions with respect to safety of life and property along the waterway and possible threats to the environment.

A. The Reasons behind the Problems

There are three reasons for the threats to the environment and to life and property associated with navigation in the Bosphorus: (1) the particular features of the Bosphorus that make navigation dangerous; (2) the ever-growing intensity of maritime traffic; and (3) the restrictions and inadequacies of the Montreux Convention.

The Particular Features of the Bosphorus That Make Navigation Dangerous

Above all, the Bosphorus is hazardous because it is both narrow and long. Because of the difference in the salinity of the Black Sea and the Mediterranean Sea there is a surface current that flows from the Black to the Mediterranean Sea and another deeper current that flows in the opposite direction. These currents run into the twists and turns of the Bosphorus, causing dangerous whirlpools. The numerous sharp turns in the waterway also make the Bosphorus hazardous to navigation. The passage through the Bosphorus requires a vessel to change course at least twelve times. Another serious hazard is fog. During February, March, April, and May visibility frequently falls to less than a kilometer because of dense fog.

The Volume of Maritime Traffic

Statistics reveal the changes in the volume of maritime traffic since 1936 when the Montreux Convention was concluded. Shipping in the Bosphorus in 1938 amounted to 7,500,000 tons. This figure had risen to 126,896,000 tons by 1980 and had reached 156,057,000 tons by 1996. A similar trend can be observed in the number of ships. Whereas 4,500 vessels sailed through the Bosphorus in 1938, this figure hit 49,952 in 1996, representing an eleven-fold increase. To this must be added the 1,500,000 passengers that commute every day between the two shores of the waterway. This traffic has to cut across the traffic that runs in a north-south direction. Finally, there is the great hazard posed by the increase in the size of ships, especially tankers that have limited maneuverability.

The Impediments and Inadequacies of the Montreux Convention

Some of the difficulties confronted in the Straits region can be traced to article 2 of the Montreux Convention. This article contains a number of elements. "In time of peace, merchant vessels shall enjoy complete freedom of transit and navigation in the Straits, by day and by night, under any flag and with any kind of cargo, without any formalities, except as provided in Article 3 below." The only formality foreseen is contained in article 3 and relates to the sanitary control prescribed by Turkish law within the framework of international sanitary regulations. "This control...shall be carried out by day and by night with all possible speed, and the vessels in question shall not be required to make any other stop during their passage through the Straits." Article 2/3 declares that in time of peace pilotage and towage remain optional for merchant vessels. The provision "with any cargo" poses serious dangers. Under this provision, vessels carrying explosive, inflammable, or toxic materials (gaseous or liquid) are able to navigate freely through the Straits. Ships are also allowed to sail through the Straits by night. Given the nature of the narrow waterway, it is easy to discern the dangers posed by a large oil tanker making the crossing in the dark.

B. Some of the Questions That Emerged Maritime Accidents

Since the coming into force of the Montreux Convention, maritime accidents in the region of the Straits have increased. From 1988 to 1993 the number of accidents in the waterway rose by 135%. In 1982 there were three collisions involving two or more ships. In 1992 this figure increased by a factor of thirteen to thirty-nine collisions. Ten accidents occurred in the first six months of 1994. The number of ships running aground between 1982 and 1991 increased four-fold.

All accidents have harmful consequences, and the important thing is not the number of accidents but their effects. In all, 210 accidents were registered in the region of the Straits from 1 May 1982 to 18 October 1994. Among these, the accident of the tanker Independenta stands out for the damage caused. Forty-one sailors lost their lives in this disaster, and most of the cargo (consisting of 90,000 tons of oil) was spilled into the sea. Another such disaster was the collision of the Nassia with Shipbroker, when twenty-nine sailors were killed and 20,000 tons of oil spilled into the sea.

Environmental Pollution

Even without accidents, shipping in the Straits causes pollution, with all its attendant consequences. Environmental pollution can be divided into air and sea pollution. Air pollution results from the quality of the fuel used by ships, the state of maintenance of their engines, their speed, and their number. Water pollution results from vessels emptying their ballast tanks without processing, waste dumping, emptying of bilge tanks, washing of decks, and other such activities. From time to time, tankers also spill their cargo of crude oil into the sea through leakage.

Kudret Özersay

Sources (The Issue of the Turkish Straits)

Özersay, Kudret. Türk Boğazlarından Geçiş Rejimi. Ankara: Mülkiyeliler Birliği Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.

Öztürk, Bayram. "The Istanbul Strait: A Closing Biological Corridor." In Turkish Straits, New Problems, New Solutions, ed. İsmail Soysal, pp. 145–55. İstanbul: Orta Doğu ve Balkan İncelemeleri Vakfı, 1995.

T.C. Başbakanlık Denizcilik Müsteşarlığı. 21. Yüzyıla Girerken Denizciliğimiz. Ankara: Başbakanlık Denizcilik Müsteşarlığı, 1997.

The Issue of Human Rights

The issue of human rights was a major preoccupation for Turkish foreign policy in the 1980s. During this period Turkey was confronted with criticism and occasionally pressure in its bilateral and multilateral relations because of human rights abuses. Although it assumed certain international obligations toward the end of the decade in an effort to improve its international image, Turkey could not avoid being tagged as a "violator of human rights." We shall examine the causes from both the international and Turkish perspectives.

The International Environment

In the 1970s the issue of human rights became a tool of international politics. Turkey and a good number of similar countries were exposed in international platforms through this tool, and Turkey suffered more than most of the countries in this category. The U.S. developed this policy for use against the socialist bloc under the Carter administration. Known as the Carter Doctrine, this policy used human rights for purely political purposes, was insincere, and applied double standards. The socialist bloc countries were being severely criticized for violating the human rights obligations undertaken within basket III of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, a process that got underway with the signing of the Helsinki Final Act in 1975. Meanwhile the pro-Western dictatorships of the Third World were committing the most egregious human rights abuses and even receiving technical assistance from the U.S. for this purpose.

Regardless of the motives, this policy of using the issue of human rights became an important element in international relations over the long term. The policy that was used against the socialist states in the 1970s gradually started being used against other states violating human rights in the 1980s.

The Western NGOs had a big part in securing this shift. Although there had always been national and international organizations working in this field, the number of these organizations and their scope increased greatly after the mass movements and events of 1968. These organizations, led by Amnesty International, became extremely effective internationally and began to influence the foreign policies of Western countries.

This development had its origin in the 1789 French Revolution and, after making slow progress at first, started gathering pace during this period. Human rights, democracy, and the rule of law were the ideological and legal superstructure of the market economy, and it was natural that these concepts should find their place in international relations as the world became a single market.

Unlike most instances when international law trailed developments, in this instance international law kept pace with developments and even became a trailblazer. The UN Charter, adopted in 1945, mentioned respect for human rights among the purposes of the organization. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted in 1948 specified what these human rights were. This was followed by more than fifty conventions in which the signatory states committed themselves to respect human rights. Both the UN and regional organizations like the Council of Europe and the Organization of American States engaged in determined and long-term efforts, which led to the emergence of a separate branch of international law in the 1970s that came to be known as "international human rights law" (Box 6-26).

This branch of law, while still within the bounds of international law, had the potential of going beyond international law and perhaps transforming it. Countries acceding to these conventions for different reasons came under the supervision of the independent mechanisms contained in the conventions. In this instance, the enforcement of human rights, buttressed by law, no longer depended on the political will of governments and acquired its own autonomy. The best example of this is the enforcement mechanism created by the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). In the 1970s the

Box 6-26. Principal Human Rights Conventions

The principal human rights conventions concluded by 1990 could be classified in the following categories.

General conventions; the UN Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966), UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966), and its optional protocols, European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) (1950) and its protocols, European Social Charter (1961) and its protocols, American Convention on Human Rights (1969) and Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the Area of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1988), and African Charter of Human and People's Rights (1988).

Specific conventions: the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide (1948), Convention on the Non-Applicability of Statutory Limitations to War Crimes and Crimes Against Humanity (1968), Slavery, Servitude, Forced Labour and Similar Institutions and Practices Convention of 1926, Protocol Amending the Slavery Convention (1953); Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery (1956), Convention for the Suppression of the Traffic in Persons and of the Exploitation of the Pros titution of Others (1950), International Labour Organization (ILO) Convention concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour (ILO No. 29) (1930), Abolition of Forced Labour Convention (ILO No. 105) (1957), Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1984), European Convention on the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1987), ILO Convention on Minimum Standards of Social Security (1952), European Code of Social Security and Annexed Protocol (1964), and European Convention on Social Security (1972)

Conventions on the protection of specific groups, the Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees (1951) and Protocol (1967), Convention Relating to the Status of Stateless Persons (1954), Convention on the Reduction of Statelessness (1961), ILO Convention on Migrant Workers (1949), European Convention on the Legal Status of Migrant Workers (1977), ILO Convention Number 87 on the Protection of the Freedom of Association and the Right of Association (1948), Convention on the Political Rights of Women (1952), Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989), and 1949 Geneva Conventions and additional protocols (1977).

Conventions against discrimination: the international Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (1965), international Convention on the Suppression and Punishment of the Crime of Apartheid (1973), Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (1975), and UNESCO Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination in Education (1966).

To summarize the developments after 1990, there was a remarkable increase in the number and types of human rights conventions. Several additional protocols were adopted, complementing or expanding the rights and control mechanisms contained in the above mentioned conventions. Furthermore, new fields of human rights were regulated through international conventions; including the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities (1995). Convention on Human Rights and Biomedicine (1997), international Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance (2006), Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (2006), and Convention on the Protection of Children against Sexual Exploitation and Sexual Abuse (2007).

(G. ALPKAYA) (Source: Marie)

ECHR organs established a highly effective mechanism of enforcement (Box 6-27).

In addition, the decisions on human rights adopted by political bodies like the UN General Assembly, the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE), and the European Parliament of the ECs (EP), although not legally binding, carried considerable ideological and political weight. The political and legal structure of a state and its relationship with its own citizens, formerly the core area of a state's sovereign rights, ceased to be within the national competence of that state. From now on, international organizations and other states could get involved with these issues without being considered to have "interfered in the internal affairs" of a sovereign state. This new practice was formally proclaimed in the 1991 Moscow Document of the CSCE: "The participating States emphasize that issues relating to human rights, fundamental freedoms, democracy, and the rule of law are of international concern, as respect for these rights and freedoms constitutes one of the foundations of the international order. They categorically and irrevocably declare that the commitments undertaken in the field of the human dimension of the CSCE are matters of direct and legitimate concern to all participating States and do not belong exclusively to the internal affairs of the State concerned" (http://www.osce.org/documents/odihr/1991/10/13995_en.pdf).

As a result, a new political and legal climate emerged in the early 1980s. The states were no longer the sole and absolute arbiters of the fate of their citizens, and citizens were no longer helpless individuals caught within national borders. In this climate, Turkey's internal dynamics made it a prime target for attention on the issue of human rights.

The Situation in Turkey

Turkey entered the 1980s with a military coup and the 12 September regime that followed it. The direct and most obvious consequences of 12 September were in the area of human rights. The destructive effects and consequences of the military regime on Turkey's sociopolitical life can be classified as follows.

1. Democracy, the democratic experience, the legal order, and the political and social opposition that had been built up in Turkey up to that time were all forcibly suppressed or eliminated.

Box 6-27. The ECHR's Oversight System

The European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) was signed in 1950 and came into effect in 1953. Until the Eleventh Protocol came into effect in November 1998, the convention had an oversight system consisting of three organs. Under this system, allegations of human rights violations could be brought to the attention of the oversight organs by either states or individuals.

The convention provided that, in the first instance, complaints would come before the European Commission on Human Rights (EcmHR), which was a quasi-legal organ. The commission made a determination on whether to receive the complaint, if it decided that the complaint was receivable, it would look into the substance of the complaint that a state had violated one of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the European Convention on Human Rights. During this stage an attempt was made to reach a friendly settlement between the applicant and the concerned state; if a settlement was reached, the procedure came to an end, if no friendly settlement was reached, the commission prepared a report on the substance of the complaint. The report also contained the commission's opinion on whether the concerned state had violated the terms of the convention.

After this stage, the complaint was processed in two alterna tive forms. If the matter was referred to the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) by the commission or the concerned state, the court examined the complaint to make a final determination as to whether the concerned state had violated the convention. The findings of the court were binding. If the matter was not referred to the court, the complaint was brought before the Committee of Ministers (a political organ) for consideration and finalization. The most noteworthy feature of the oversight system was its voluntary character, if a state did not recognize the right of individuals to lodge complaints to the European Commission on Human Rights; the commission could not examine such complaints. Similarly, the competence of the European Court of Human Rights also depended on the consent of the state. The court could only bring a state to trial if that state had formally declared that it accepted the court's competence. Consequently, a state that had not formally declared its acceptance could only be accountable to the Committee of Ministers upon the complaint of another state (also see Box 7-50 in Section 7).

(G. ALPKAYA)

- 2. In this way it became possible to implement smoothly the neo-liberal economic policies adopted on 24 January 1980 in Turkey, whereas such policies previously had caused serious social and political turmoil in other democratic countries.
- 3. The whole legal structure was completely overhauled, in violation of the basic rules of law, in order to make it impossible to engage in any opposition in the future or to depart from these policies.

After the three years of military rule following the coup, a democracy of sorts was established in the country to the extent that the new authoritarian legal system made this possible. The regime's authoritarian structure, however, remained more or less in place. Because of this, Turkey reached the end of the twentieth century bedeviled by the internal and external problems arising from its handling of the issue of human rights.

Another issue closely connected with this internal dynamic was the Kurdish question or "PKK terror" in official parlance. The Turkish General Staff described the question in 1994 as "low-intensity warfare" (Kışlalı, pp. 187, 215). But in its foreign relations this conflict was put before Turkey as a human rights issue and led to international pressures. In an environment in which the national liberation struggles of the 1960s and 1970s were gradually giving way to minority rights as the burning issue in the international arena, Turkey found itself seriously isolated because of its nondemocratic legal system.

These domestic and external dynamics must be assessed against the backdrop of Turkey's chief foreign policy objective, which is integration with the West. Turkey is not a small country living in isolation from the rest of the world; nor is it a former colony on which a way of life not of its own choosing had been imposed. Ever since the Tanzimat reforms of 1839, its goal was Westernization, which implied resembling the West, being like the West, and doing as the West did. This goal meant that the relationship was on the whole based on reciprocity. Becoming part of the European Concert was reciprocated by the Reform Edict of 1856; and the granting of minority rights at the Lausanne Peace Conference was reciprocated by being recognized as an independent republic.

Similarly, in the 1950s membership in NATO and the Council of Europe was reciprocated by acknowledging the European human rights system (Box 6-28). Consequently, as a country that undertook international commitments willingly in order to be accepted as a member of the West, Turkey found itself in an impasse in conducting its foreign policy when it failed to carry out these commitments.

Having examined the background, we can now direct our attention to the period from 1980 to 1990.

Prior to 12 September 1980 the question of human rights was not an issue of concern for Turkish foreign policy. Before the coup, Turkey was a regular country, a member of the Council of Europe with no great pretensions. Although it was a party to the ECHR, it had not recognized the right of individual application and the

Box 6-28. The Council of Europe

The aim of the Council of Europe, set up in 1949, is "to achieve a greater unity between its members for the purpose of safe-guarding and realizing the ideals and principles that are their common heritage and facilitating their economic and social progress." According to its statute, "Every member of the Council of Europe must accept the principles of the rule of law and of the enjoyment by all persons within its jurisdiction of human rights and fundamental freedoms, and collaborate sincerely and effectively in the realization of the aim of the Council." A member state that seriously violates its commitments can have its right to be represented suspended and it necessary can be asked by the Committee of Ministers to withdraw.

The Council of Europe has two main organs. The decisionmaking organ is the Committee of Ministers, which has three main tasks. It is a platform where the national views on issues confronting European societies can be aired. It also seeks to find common ground in dealing with these issues. Finally, it upholds the values of the council. The Committee of Ministers carries out its tasks through conventions, recommendations to its members, decisions, declarations, and other such means. The Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE) is the consultative and deliberating organ of the council. It consists of the members of parliament of the component states. Its members are selected by the national parliaments from among their own members according to their individual rules. Each state is represented in the body in proportion to the size of that state's population. The bulk of the council's work consists of the assembly's deliberations and recommendations to the Committee of Ministers competence of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR). As such, it was a self-centered country that had not accepted international oversight. At that time, Turkey was a relatively democratic country with a Constitution that could be considered to be up to international human rights standards and attracted no international attention other than by its military presence in Cyprus. In fact, Turkey was added to the agenda of the Parliamentary Assembly for a while after the 12 March 1971 military intervention and was frequently having to answer complaints in the bodies of ILO because of restrictions on labor unions. The Republic of Cyprus (Southern Cyprus) had lodged three separate complaints against Turkey in the European Human Rights Commission because of alleged human rights violations in Cyprus. In those days, however, the world's attention was riveted on the socialist bloc (the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan, the struggle of the Solidarnosc labor union in Poland) and the military dictatorships in countries such as Chile and Argentina. In Europe, the regime changes in Spain and Portugal had ended the Fascist dictatorships there, and Greece had dealt with

(G. ALPKAYA)

Box 6-29. The National Security Council in Turkey

The NSC consisted of the chief of the General Staff, Gen Kenan Evren; the commander of the land forces, Gen. Nurettin Ersin; the commander of the air force, Gen. Tahsin Şahinkaya; the commander of the navy, Admiral Nejat Tumer, and the commander of the gendarmerie, Gen. Sedat Celasun. It seized power on 12 September 1980 "within the framework of the chain of command" (communiqué no. 1, 12 September 1980): It passed the Law on the Constitutional Order that gave it legislative power, and the council's president assumed the position of head of state. This body governed Turkey until 6 December 1983. It appointed a council of ministers accountable only to the NSC, proposed bills and enacted laws, appointed the members of a consultative assembly charged with preparing a draft Constitution, and adopted the Constitution in its final form after making certain revisions. All of the legislation known as the 12 September laws emanated from the NSC. When the president of the NSC, Kenan Evren, became president of the Republic following a referendum, the members of the NSC became members of the presidential council until November 1989: The provisional article 15 of the Constitution absolving the members of the NSC of all responsibility for their actions was still in force in 2008.

(G. ALPKAYA)

its problem by overthrowing the junta of colonels and punishing its former members. Europe was feeling proud after having irrevocably established human rights, democracy, and the rule of law in its midst.

It was in this environment that a military coup took place on 12 September 1980 in Turkey, a country constantly seeking to prove its European credentials, and a military administration consisting of five military commanders seized the reins of power. The administration labeled itself the National Security Council (NSC) (Box 6-29). In its communiqué number 1, issued immediately after the coup, it took over executive and legislative power after abolishing the parliament and the government, lifted the immunity of members of parliament, banned all foreign travel, declared martial law throughout the land, and confined everyone indoors. The NSC also gave a briefing to NATO ambassadors and reiterated Turkey's attachment to its NATO commitments. On the same day, the Turkish permanent representative at the Council of Europe indicated that Turkey was invoking article 15 of the ECHR (Günver, p. 111). Article 15 read as follows: "In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any High Contracting Party may take measures derogating from its obligations under this Convention to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligations under international law."

The immediate reaction of the Western states and international organizations to the coup showed concern but in general was restrained. The criticism and disapproval that would come later were not yet evident because of the reassuring official pronouncements coming from Turkey and because the flow of information was still limited. Among the international organizations, the PACE adopted a resolution on 1 October 1980 expressing its concern over the military takeover and the closing down of the parliament, the banning of political parties, and the severe limitations imposed on labor unions, which were in contravention of the statute of the Council of Europe. The council declared that, whatever the justification, the seizure of power by any group (whether civilian or military) and the overthrow of the democratic political system were a violation of the principles upon which the Council of Europe rested. In its resolution, the assembly also called on the Council of Ministers to monitor the situation in Turkey and, if the government of Turkey did not take the necessary steps, recommended that it be reminded that the Council of Ministers would be obliged to carry out the provisions of the Statute of the Council of Europe.

This recommendation was a sharp expression of disapproval. In another resolution adopted on the same day, the PACE recalled that the terms of the Turkish members of parliament would expire in May and charged the Committee on Political Affairs to monitor the situation in Turkey and make sure that the Turkish members were not prevented from participating in the TGNA's activities during their terms.

The European Parliament, to which Turkey did not belong and whose members had been elected by direct balloting for the first time only a year earlier, also adopted a relatively mild approach to Turkey at that stage. In its first resolution adopted on 18 September 1980, the parliament recalled Turkey's international obligations to respect human rights and stressed that relations with the ECs were conditional on respect for human rights. This tolerant approach was also shared by other organs of the ECs. As a matter of fact, the EEC-Turkey Council of Association met in December 1980 and made the decision to start the negotiations for the Fourth Financial Protocol.

As the world began to receive the news of developments in Turkey, the cautious approach of the international community was quickly replaced by harsh criticism of the 12 September administration. The NSC had banned all activities of political parties, suspended the activities of labor unions and associations, disbanded all elected bodies, dismissed all mayors, and carried out far-reaching purges in the civil service in rapid succession.

These measures brought all democratic activities in the country to an end. These were followed by further tough measures: the period of detention was raised first to thirty and then to ninety days. Tens of thousands of people were detained, filling overcrowded barracks, while more and more people were perishing as a result of systematic torture. To this day, it has not been possible to gather accurate data about the events of that period. The information gathered from different sources indicates that close to fifty thousand people were detained and that fiftyfive people died as a result of torture from 1980 to 1983. On 16 March 1982 the minister of state, İlhan Öztrak, admitted that fifteen people had died as a consequence of torture. Martial law courts were handing out death sentences after summary trials. Erdal Eren was among the first to be sentenced. Although he was less than eighteen years old, he was hanged when it was determined through "a bone X-ray" that he was a full adult. Between 1980 and 1984 fifty people were executed, half of them common criminals.

Starting in 1981, there was a growing wave of disapproval of Turkey in international circles because of the developments taking place there. Following up its resolution to monitor Turkey, the PACE adopted a report in January 1981 after the visit to Turkey of its observer. The report contained a catalogue of violations of human rights in Turkey, concluding that there was no progress in the transition to democracy. The opinion of the report was that this was incompatible with membership in the Council of Europe. This report was followed by the "Resolution on the Military Junta in Turkey," adopted by the European Parliament in April 1981. The resolution called for the restoration of democracy in Turkey within two months or, failing this, the suspension of the Association Agreement.

These were tough resolutions, but they failed to have any effect. This was because the NSC attributed importance mostly to relations with the U.S., a country that was not applying pressure in the area of human rights. The 1981 issue of the U.S. Human Rights Report stated that there was no evidence to prove or disprove the allegations of widespread, systematic torture or that the authorities were tolerating torture. It said that there were no claims that the right to conduct searches granted to martial law administrators was widely used or was being abused. The report also contained a passage asserting that no censorship of the press was applied. There was no mention of capital punishments, while the drop in crime rates was praised.

Counting on this kind of support from the U.S., the NSC did not feel the need to take seriously the criticism coming from the PACE or the European Parliament. In any case, Turkey had already reduced its relations with the Council of Europe to a minimum. Ankara had stated that Turkish members of parliament would not participate in the work of the Parliamentary Assembly. It also decided to forgo taking over the rotating chairmanship of the Ministerial Committee in order to escape from the inevitable criticism that would be coming its way. Ankara looked upon the European Parliament as a body with little power and assumed that it would have scant influence on its relations with the EEC.

Despite Ankara's efforts at damage control, numerous adverse decisions were made that would have lasting effects. Although Turkey's membership in the Council of Europe was not terminated, the PACE adopted resolutions in October 1981 and January 1982 that were highly critical of the military regime. The European Parliament decided in January 1982 that the mandate of the Joint Parliamentary Commission would not be renewed until general elections were held in Turkey and the parliament was reconvened. In July 1982 Sweden, Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, and France decided to bring the issue of human rights abuses in Turkey before the ECmHR.

Once the NSC had established its control in Turkey, it started making preparations for the transition to democracy in 1982. As a first step in this direction, the political parties, whose activities had been suspended on the first day of the coup, were closed down for good on 15 October 1981. A Consultative Assembly, with a membership appointed by the NSC, was charged with preparing a Constitution. The PACE adopted a resolution reminding Ankara that the new Constitution must conform to the statute of the Council of Europe and to the ECHR. The European Parliament refused to ratify the Fourth Financial Protocol before transition to democracy. The NSC found the draft Constitution prepared by the Consultative Assembly too democratic and made numerous changes to make it more authoritarian. In the run-up to the referendum on the new Constitution, all expressions that might imply voting "no to the Constitution" were banned. An overwhelming majority of 91.3% of the electorate voted yes for the Constitution and at the same time approved General Evren, president of the NSC, as president of the Republic in a referendum monitored by the PACE, among others. Provisional article 15 of the 1982 Constitution granted legal immunity to the 900-odd items of legislation passed by the military administration from 1980 to 1983 (Box 6-30). In other words, this legislation could not be challenged in the courts. This article was removed from the Constitution in October 2001.

In January 1983 the PACE adopted a resolution by which it declared the 1982 Constitution (which carried over into the civilian administration the legislation of 12 September with its concept of the "almighty state") and

Box 6-30. The Legislation of 12 September

From the day the military coup took place to 6 December 1983, when the existence of the NSC came to an end, about 900 items of legislation were adopted by the military administration. This included laws and other arrangements with the force of law. Provisional article 15 of the Constitution stated that this legislation could not be challenged on the grounds of unconstitutionality. This legislation in general was an attempt to institutionalize an antidemocratic system. Its main feature was that it glorified the state and the state's authority while pushing human rights and freedoms to the background. Most of this NSC legislation was adopted prior to the 1982 Gonstitution, so in a sense the Constitution was designed to legitimize this legislation. The bulk of this legislation consisted of new laws, but there was an important component consisting of comprehensive and radical amendments to previous laws. With these features, the 12 September legislation replaced the legal framework set up by the 1961 Constitution with an authoritarian framework. Part of this legislation is now being gradually eliminated within the process of negotiations for Turkey's integration with the EU.

> (G. ALPKAYA) (Source: Gemalmaz 1997)

the manner of the Constitution's adoption to be incompatible with the principles and norms of the Council of Europe and called on Turkey to relinquish its voting right in the Ministerial Committee. Subsequently, in September 1983, the assembly declared that the restrictions that would apply in the Turkish election of 6 November and especially the NSC's right to veto candidates meant that the parliament would not reflect the free will of the people. Consequently, the Turkish members of parliament to be elected should not be admitted to the Parliamentary Assembly. Nevertheless, this would not be a firm position, and the final decision would be made in 1984.

After the election of 6 November 1983, in which only three of the newly created sixteen parties were allowed to participate, the NSC's existence came to an end when the new Turkish Grand National Assembly elected its bureau. With the adoption of the forms of democracy, some of the criticism directed at Turkey began to be toned down. In May 1984 the PACE readmitted the Turkish members of parliament, and after an absence of three years Turkey was once again represented in the assembly. This decision was made when Turkey threatened to withdraw from the Council of Europe if the full powers of the Turkish members were not approved.

But even if the criticism leveled against the lack of Turkish democracy came to an end, the question of human rights abuses was still a burning issue, which remained on the agenda of the European Parliament.

Box 6-31. State Security Courts (SSCs)

The SSCs were first set up by law in 1973 and were met by intense opposition on political and social grounds. They were declared unconstitutional in 1975 by the Constitutional Court, and their existence came to an end. In the authoritarian system that came into being following 12 September, however, the SSCs were restored and became an integral part of the regime. The 1982 Constitution made provisions for the establishment of the SSCs, and in 1983 the Law on the Establishment of State Security Courts and Their Functioning Procedures was passed. The courts started to function in 1984. They were to try offenses against the "unity of the state, the land, and the nation, against the free democratic order, and against the Republic as described in the Constitution, which directly threaten the internal and external security of the state." The justification advanced for establishing the SSCs was that they were specialized courts. But they were seen more as extraordinary courts because of their composition and procedures, which violated the principles of independence and natural jurisdiction. The SSCs were trying political offenses and were not affected by the improvements made to the procedures of regular courts. In the Incal and Ciraklar cases in 1998, the ECtHR decided that the presence of a military judge in the SSCs violated the right to a fair trial as provided in article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). Turkey conformed to this finding and removed the military judge only after the prospect emerged that the European Court might decide that Turkey was at fault in the case of PKK leader Abdullah Öcalan. The change, however, consisted merely of replacing the military judge with a civilian judge. This change did not spare Turkey from being found at fault in the Öcalan case

> (G.-ALPKAYA) (Source: Katoğlu)

Martial law was still in force in Turkey during this period, and the mass trials and the detention of defendants were carried over from the time of the military regime. In 1984 the State Security Courts supplemented the martial law courts (Box 6-31). The last execution took place in 1984, but courts continued to pass death sentences. There was no letup in allegations of torture. In this period of repression, students were expelled from the university for the "crime" of buying theater tickets as a group. Everyone knew what was going on, but nobody could express views at a time when the press was under a form of de facto censorship. The first outcry against the repression was the Petition of the Intellectuals, containing 1,260 signatures, which triggered legal proceedings against the authors (Box 6-32).

The armed uprising of the PKK began with the raids on Eruh and Şemdinli in 1984. At first this did not make much of an impression in Turkey. But with the help of Kurdish political movements, which had been getting organized in Europe starting in the 1970s, the Kurdish

Box 6-32. The Case of the Petition of the Intellectuals

The Petition of the Intellectuals (Aydınlar Dilekçesi in Turkish) was a document dated 15 May 1984 containing 1,260 signatures. It was addressed to president Kenan Evren and to the Speaker of the TGNA by a group consisting of Professor Hüsnü Göksel, Professor Bahri Savcı, Professor Fehmi Yavuz, Aziz Nesin, Bilgesu Erenus, and Esin Afşar The petition had been drafted by Hüsnü Göksel, Bahri Savci, Aziz Nesin, Haluk Gerger, Yakup Kepenek, İlhan Tekeli, Yalçın Küçük, Erbil Tuşalp, Uğur Mumcu, Şerafettin Turan, Murat Belge, Mete Tunçay, and Mahmut Tali Öngören. Its objective was to "express our observations and views on the democratic order in Turkey in conformity with the duties imposed on and rights granted to citizens by the Constitution." The petition declared that the signatories felt humiliated because "our country has been placed in a situation where its human rights safeguards are being questioned in foreign countries." This was followed by demands, on the basis of democracy and respect for human rights, for guarantees on the right to life, the abolition of the death penalty, the elimination of torture, the conclusion of trials within a reasonable time, a general amnesty, the lifting of restrictions on freedom of association, and ensuring the freedom of the press and the autonomy of universities

The news of the petition was reported in the press four days later. Within one week, the Ankara Martial Law command called on the military prosecutor to take legal action against its signatories. After an investigation, fifty-six signatories were brought to trial on 27 June. The prosecution described the petition as a "declaration" and called for prison sentences ranging from three months to one year. With respect to the petition, Kenan Evren proclaimed that "those who declare themselves to be intellectuals offend the majority," "we have seen many intellectuals who committed treason," and "Vahideddin too was an intellectual" (Baskin Oran, Kenan Evren in Yazılmamis Anıldır [Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1989], p. 179). These were pronounced on 28 May 1984. Prime minister Turgut Özal opined that the prosecution of only fifty-six of the signatories was a step forward in the direction of democracy. The trial lasted two years and ended with the acquittal of the defendants.

(G; ALPKAYA)

question got on the agenda of the European Parliament and stayed there throughout the 1980s. In 1985 the European Parliament adopted a toughly worded resolution. There was a similar situation in the U.S. Human Rights report. The 1982 report referred to the Kurds as "a large minority" and stated that they could freely participate in political activities as long as they accepted the Turkish national identity. In the 1984 report there was a reference to the restrictions on the Kurdish language. The 1985 report cited the actions of "separatist terrorists" but stated that the security forces had forcibly evacuated the inhabitants of certain border villages and armed the local inhabitants. The report also mentioned Turkey's efforts to assimilate those who were not ethnic Turks.

At this point Turkey was still not taking the ECs and the EP very seriously. This was not the case with the Council of Europe, however, and Turkey reached an amicable settlement with the five countries that had lodged a complaint against it in 1982. In this framework, Turkey undertook to improve its practices in the area of human rights, starting with measures to be taken against torture. In carrying out this undertaking, changes were made in the penal enforcement law in March 1986 that resulted in the release of a majority of the convicts in Turkey, who numbered almost seventy thousand.

The Council of Europe considered Turkey's promises to be credible, and there was a softening in the tone of the usual resolutions on the situation in Turkey adopted by the PACE. The assembly adopted a resolution in April 1986, welcoming the lifting of martial law in most of Turkey, the amendments to the penal enforcement law, the nonimplementation of death sentences, the proposed changes in the penal code, and the preparations for accepting individual applications to the European Commission on Human Rights. The same resolution also mentioned the question of torture, the continued trials of members of DİSK and of the Peace Association carried over from the 12 September regime, and the restrictions on the freedom of association. But on the whole the tenor of the resolution was more optimistic. In 1986 Turkey's request to take over the rotating chairmanship of the Ministerial Committee of the Council of Europe was approved after the lapse of many years. The acquittal of the defendants in the Petition of the Intellectuals trial and the establishment of the Human Rights Association with broad participation were also welcomed as positive steps in the sphere of human rights.

These relative improvements in relations with the Council of Europe were followed in 1987 by the acceptance of the right of individual application to the European Commission on Human Rights (ECmHR) (Box 6-33). This was done in order to gain support for Turkey's application for accession to the ECs but was nevertheless an important step. This was not an isolated event. Turkey acceded to the European and UN conventions against torture the following year.

But these steps did not constitute genuine democratization; nor did they correspond to a radical improvement in human rights practices. The bans on party leaders imposed by the 12 September administration were only lifted in 1987 through a referendum. That year, martial law was lifted in the southeast and replaced with a state of emergency (OHAL in the Turkish acronym) when a Regional OHAL Administration was set up (Box 6-34). In 1987

Box 6-33. Individual Application

Individual application relates to the applications for redress to the organs of the European Convention on Human Rights by individuals, political parties, unions, associations, companies, and others who feel that their rights under the convention have been violated. The applicant need not be a national of the state against which the complaint is being lodged, but the state must be a party to the convention or to the annexed protocols if the right that has been violated is contained in these annexes. There are two conditions for making an individual application. First, all the procedures of domestic law must have been exhausted. Second, the application must be made within six months after the final decision has been handed down. The first condition implies that the applicant must have recourse to all the legal processes allowed by a legal system. This includes administrative and legal processes depending on the legislation of each state. But if the national legislation is not appropriate, accessible, effective, and capable of yielding results in a reasonable span of time and If the grounds for complaint have become a standard, systematic, and regular practice of the state, the application is declared "admissible" without this first condition. The six-month deadline for lodging a complaint starts when it becomes clear that domestic legislation cannot provide redress. When the deadline has expired, applications will not be processed. The exception to this second condition is when the violations are repeated ("continuing violation"). In addition to these conditions, the application must be signed, must not have been submitted to any other international organization, must not be devoid of any foundation, must be in conformity with the terms of the convention, and must not constitute an abuse of the right of application,

(G. ALPKAYA)

Nihat Sargin and Haydar Kutlu (Nabi Yağcı) returned to Turkey with the intention of setting up the United Communist Party of Turkey. Their arrest upon their arrival dashed all hopes that Turkey was making progress on the road to democracy. The growing number of human rights abuses in 1988 and 1989 led to ever-sharper criticism from the EP and a rising chorus of complaints addressed to the ECmHR. No noteworthy political developments occurred during these two years.

The human rights violations that were prevalent in the 1980s were serious problems not just for Turkey but also for the European countries and international organizations that had to deal with these violations. The European states were forced to react because of the growing wave of Turkish political refugees and because of the pressure of their public opinion. But their reactions had to be restrained, because Turkey's total exclusion would worsen the human rights situation and total exclusion of Turkey was not a practical proposition in any case. Although pressure was applied in the form of cuts in financial and technical aid from time to time, the reactions of European states

Box 6-34. OHAL and the Regional OHAL Administration

OHAL is the acronym for Olaganustü Hal (literally, extraordinary state or situation), meaning state of emergency. The 1982 Constitution describes a state of emergency as a time when there is a natural catastrophe, a dangerous epidemic, or a serious economic crisis or when there are serious indications that widespread violence is about to occur or when public order is seriously impaired because of widespread violence. The law regulating the state of emergency was adopted on 25 October 1983 as Law No. 2935. The OHAL Administration was set up on 10 July 1987 with the ministerial decree (with the force of law) No. 285. This legislation transfuses the martial law measures to the state of emergency and gives wide powers to the administration, which are not subject to legal supervision. Among these are the government's powers to issue decrees with the power of law in connection with the state of emergency. The Constitution does not allow such decrees to be challenged in the Constitutional Court. They cannot come under political control either, because the TGNA's internal regulations have not been amended to make this possible. Succeeding governments have used the power to issue such decrees freely, and the actions of the Regional OHAL Administration and OHAL officials have not come within the oversight of the administrative courts. The southeastern region has been administered under the OHAL regime uninterruptedly since 1987. The character of the OHAL regime led the ECmHR and the ECtHR to waive the requirement of exhausting all internal legal recourses before applying to these bodies. OHAL was lifted in November 2002.

(G. ALPKAYA) (Source: Gemalmaz 1994)

never reached the stage of effective sanctions. This spared Turkey from suffering unduly because of its human rights practices. But it constantly had to defend itself in international platforms. The effects of this situation were carried into the 1990s.

GÖKÇEN ALPKAYA

Sources (The Issue of Human Rights)

- Alpkaya, Gökçen. AGİK Sürecinden AGİT'e İnsan Hakları. İstanbul: Kavram Yayınları, 1996.
- Dağı, İhsan D. İnsan Hakları, Küresel Siyaset ve Türkiye. İstanbul: Boyut, 2000.
- Gemalmaz, M. Semih. Türkiye'nin Demokrasi Sorunu. İstanbul: İSMMO Yayınları [1997].
- Ulusalüstü İnsan Hakları Hukukunda ve Türk Hukukunda Olağanüstü Rejim Standartları. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Beta, 1994.

- Günver, Semih. Kızgın Dam Üzerinde Diplomasi. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1989.
- Katoğlu, Tuğrul. "Devlet Güvenlik Mahkemelerinde Uygulanan Yargılama Usulünün Genel Yargılama Usulünden Farkları." AÜSBF Dergisi, Prof. Dr. Yılmaz Günal'a Armağan 49, nos. 3–4 (June–Dec. 1999): 255–74.
- Kışlalı, Mehmet Ali. Güneydoğu—Düşük Yoğunluklu Çatışma. 2nd ed. Ankara: Ümit Yayıncılık, 1996.
- Marie, Jean-Bernard. "International Instruments Relating to Human Rights: Classification and Status of Ratifications as of 1 January 1993." Revue Universelle des Droits de l'Homme 5, nos. 1–2 (1993): 57–73.
- Tanör, Bülent. Türkiye'nin İnsan Hakları Sorunu. İstanbul: BDS Yayınları, n.d.
- Yeni Türkiye İnsan Hakları Özel Sayısı II 4, no. 22 (July–Aug. 1998).

SECTION 7

1990-2001

Turkey in the Orbit of Globalization

Table 7-1. The Administration of the Period 1990–2001

| PRESIDENTS                                    | GOVERNMENTS  | MINISTERS OFFOREIGN AFFAIRS                          | SECRETARIES-GENERALOF MFA                 |
|---|--|--|---|
|   |  | Ahmet Mesut Yılmaz(21 Dec. 1987–20 Feb. 1990)        |   |
| -   | Yıldırım Akbulut GovernmentANAP(9 Nov. 1989–23 June 1991)                  | Ali Bozer(20 Feb. 1990–12 Oct. 1990)                 | Tugay Özçeri(27 July 1989–1 July 1991)    |
| Turgut Özal                                   | •  | Ahmet Kurtcebe Alptemoçin(12 Oct. 1990–23 June 1991) | ,   |
| 9 Nov. 1989–17 Apr. 1993)                     | 1st M. Yılmaz GovernmentANAP(23 June 1991–20 Nov. 1991)                    | İsmail Sefa Giray(23 June 1991–20 Nov 1991)          |   |
|   | 7th S. Demirel GovernmentDYP-SHP(20 Nov. 1991–16 May 1993)                 | Hikmet Çetin(20 Nov. 1991–27 July 1994)              | Özdem Sanberk(1 July 1991–31 May 1995)    |
| ·   |  | Mümtaz Soysal(27 July 1994–28 Nov. 1994)             |   |
|   | 1st Tansu Çiller GovernmentDYP-SHP(25 June 1993–5 Oct. 1995)               | Murat Karayalçın(12 Dec. 1994–27 Mar. 1995)          |   |
|   |  | Erdal İnönü(27 Mar. 1995–5 Oct. 1995)                |   |
|   | 2nd T. Çiller GovernmentDYP  | Coskun Kırca(5 Oct. 1995–30 Oct. 1995)               |   |
|   | (5 Oct. 1995–30 Oct. 1995)  3rd T. Çiller Government                               | Deniz Baykal(30 Oct. 1995–6 Mar. 1996)               |   |
| Süleyman Demirel(16 May 1993–16 May 2000) | DYP-CHP(30 Oct. 1995-6 Mar. 1996)  | Emre Gönensay(6 Mar. 1996–28 June 1996)              | Onur Öymen                                    |
| (10 May 1995–10 May 2000)                     | 2nd M. Yilmaz GovernmentANAP-DYP ("Anayol")(6 Mar. 1996–28 June 1996)      |  | (1 July 1995–26 Oct. 1997)                    |
|   | Necmettin Brbakan GovernmentRP-DYP ("Refahyol")(28 June 1996–30 June 1997) | Tansu Çiller(28 June 1996–30 June 1997)              |   |
|   | 3rd M. Yılmaz GovernmentANAP-DTP-DSP ("Anasol")(30 June 1997–11 Jan. 1999) |  |   |
|   | 4th B. Ecevit GovernmentDSP(11 Jan. 1999–28 May 1999)                      | Îsmail Cem   | Korkmaz Haktanır(3 Nov. 1997–31 Mar. 2000 |
|   | •  | (30 June 1997–11 July 2002)                              | T . 1. T . K. M                               |
| Ahmet Necdet Sezer                            | 5th B. Ecevit GovernmentDSP-MHP-ANAP(28 May 1999–18 Nov. 2002)             |  | Faruk Loğoğlu(1 Apr. 2000–24 Sept. 200    |
| (16 May 2000-28 Aug. 2007)                    | (20 May 1977-10 1104, 2002)  |  | Uğur Ziyal(1 Oct. 2001–28 Nov. 2004       |

ANAP (Anavatan Partisi): Motherland Party.
CHP (Cumhuriyet Halk Partisi): Republican People's Party.
DSP (Demokratik Sol Parti): Democratic Left Party.
DTP (Demokrat Türkiye Partisi): Democratic Turkey Party.
DYP (Doğru Yol Partisi): True Path Party.

MHP (Milliyetçi Hareket Partisi): Nationalist Action Party. RP (Refah Partisi): Welfare Party. SHP (Sosyaldemokrat Halk Partisi): Social Democratic People's Party. (Table by Atay Akdevelioğlu)

Appraisal of the Period

I. THE INTERNATIONAL ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

A. International Developments: Globalization and Its Consequences

The third globalization wave had its economic basis in the multinational companies that came into being in the 1970s. The technological basis lay in the information technology revolution of the 1980s, and it was complemented in the political dimension by the disintegration of the USSR in the 1990s. The West now stood unrivaled (see Box Intro-7 in the Introduction). This globalization came about forty to fifty years after the second globalization and was, in a way, a continuation of its predecessor (Box 7-1).

1. The New Economic Order

In this environment, there was a transformation both of capital and of the economic order as a whole.

Unlike the second globalization, international capital acquired a high degree of fluidity in the third globalization. Capital could now be transferred to distant corners of the globe instantaneously with the modern means of communication. As a result, it became possible to invest in a manner that would maximize returns. Capital also acquired the tendency to go to countries for speculative gains, with important consequences for developing countries. A country could suddenly see large inflows of funds into its stock markets or financial markets. Once the profits had been made or if the outlook changed or another country emerged that appeared more promising, there would be a sudden reversal of flows. Such sudden outflows tended to cause economic upheavals and political instability.

With the globalization of production and distribution, national economies on which nation-states depended underwent great changes. Even the most powerful states began to form regional economic groupings to survive in this period of globalization. This process of regionalization resulted in the emergence of the North

Box 7-1. The Second and Third Western Expansions: A Comparison

The second expansion of the West was known as imperialism. At that period the world was characterized by three main features: the monopolization and spread of capital, unemployment and increasing poverty, and lack of an alternative ideology. The same setting was prevalent during the third expansion.

In the second expansion, the monopolization and spread of capital became evident chiefly in the fields of energy, finance, and transportation-communications. The large oil companies came into being in this era. The term "finance capital," representing the fusion of banking and industrial capital, was coined at that time. The giant railroad, telephone, and telegraph companies were the symbols of that period. The same situation came about in the 1990s. At present there are only a handful of oil and natural gas companies in the world. Large banks are absorbing smaller banks and turning themselves into giants. Currently there are barely five large automobile producers. In computer software, Microsoft is a monopoly, and 70% of the information material on the internet has its source in the U.S.

The unemployment and pauperization of the second expansion found their expression in the novels of Emile Zoja and Charles Dickens. The difference in the income levels of the top 20% and bottom 10% of the world's population went from 30 to 1 in 1960 to 60 to 1 in 1990 and reached 74 to 1 in 1997.

In the second expansion, there was no alternative ideology to monopolistic capitalism. Workers had no other recourse to register their opposition to the system than jamming their wooden sabots in their machines to foul them up; the word "sabotage" is derived from this action. An alternative course first appeared with the Communist Manifesto in 1848 and was first put into practice in 1917, to be taken seriously only after 1945. This alternative only came about as a result of a steady accumulation of reaction. The opponents of globalization to-day are bombing McDohald's restaurants and smashing shop windows because there is not yet an accumulation of reaction, hence no alternative ideology.

In fact, the targets of the horrendous terror action on 11.5 eptember 2001 symbolized globalization (the World Trade Center) and the "global sheriff" (the Pentagon) (see also Box Intro-7 in the Introduction).

(B. ORAN) (Source Oran 2001 ["Hangi Kureselleşme?"], pp. 51–54) American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), the European Union (EU), the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN), and other such groupings. Those among the smaller countries that failed to associate with such groupings (such as Iraq, Libya, and Iran) found themselves in an environment that made trading difficult.

2. The New Political Order

As the new economic order emerged, there was a parallel development with the emergence of a new political order that heralded the disintegration of the USSR.

The CSCE and the Charter of Paris

The Helsinki Final Act, which emerged from the first CSCE summit held in Helsinki in 1975, laid particular emphasis on the first basket, which dealt with security in Europe (see Box 5-1 in Section 5). The second summit held in Paris in 1990 that produced the Paris Charter was exclusively concerned with the third basket: human rights. At this time, the USSR was in its last days, the West was dominant, and the Paris Charter was proclaiming the political victory of globalization.

After this, the CSCE advanced the cause of human rights without interruption and began its process of institutionalization. Under the Paris Charter, it was not enough for member states merely to respect human and minority rights. They had to go further and create the conditions that would strengthen the separate identities of national minorities. The charter also set up the mechanisms for the institutionalization of the CSCE. Henceforth the secretary-general was to organize follow-up conferences and summit meetings every other year. At the 1992 Helsinki Summit, a High Commission for National Minorities was established. Its mandate was to determine the existence of ethnic tensions that might threaten stability or peace in the CSCE region and find solutions before these tensions resulted in conflict. At the 1994 summit in Budapest, the process of institutionalization was completed when the term "conference" was replaced with "organization," leading to the new acronym OSCE. The organization almost acquired the role of a European United Nations and added a new dimension to its existing functions in the fields of human rights and European security. This new and very important dimension was Conflict Prevention and Crisis Management, which was designed to prevent conflicts in the region through diplomacy, such as the Bosnian conflict.

Against this backdrop, important developments took place after 1990 in the fields of human and minority rights. These rights began to be implemented over a large geographic area and were qualitatively strengthened. There was a transition from prevention of discrimination (securing equality of treatment) to protection of minorities. The protection of minorities was declared to be the duty of a state. States were no longer the sole arbiters of whether there were minorities under their jurisdictions; others could decide that groups displaying differences were indeed minorities. In the fields of human and minority rights, NGOs joined the international arena as influential actors along with states. Most significant of all, after 1991 these rights ceased to be viewed as a matter pertaining to the domestic jurisdiction of a particular country and became the legitimate concern of the international community (Oran 2001 [Küreselleşme ve Azınlıklar], pp. 135–38).

As a result, the infrastructure of the West, which was international capitalism, acquired a superstructure in the form of human and minority rights. These were firmly implanted in the international agenda during the 1990s.

CFE 1990 (Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty)

Even before the USSR disintegrated, the political victory of globalization also became evident in the military field. The CSCE meeting, where the Charter of Paris was adopted, also saw the signing of the CFE. This was the most technical and most comprehensive disarmament agreement ever concluded. With the CFE, the Soviet Union made concessions that were unthinkable for a superpower. It felt obliged to reduce its superiority in conventional weapons (i.e., non-nuclear, nonchemical, nonbiological) to levels that would be compatible with "the new political architecture."

The process of negotiations got underway in March 1989 with the participation of twenty-two states from the Eastern Bloc and Western Bloc and was concluded with the signing of CFE on 19 November 1990. By 2001 the number of the participating states had reached thirty. Reductions were carried out in five categories of weapons in an area extending from the Atlantic Ocean to the Ural Mountains. Each of the two blocs was allowed to maintain 20,000 tanks, 20,000 artillery pieces, 30,000 armored vehicles, 6,800 combat aircraft, and 2,000 attack helicopters. In addition to this continent-wide ceiling, subsectoral and national ceilings were also imposed to prevent concentrations of forces in specific regions. The states that exceeded their national ceilings had to destroy their surplus weapons or sell or transfer them to states that were below their national ceilings. A system of verification was established to monitor the implementation of the agreement. In addition to CFE, which was legally binding, a nonbinding agreement called CFE 1-A was concluded, which limited the number of military personnel. Under this agreement, Turkey's ceiling was 525,000 troops.

Turkey stood to gain from CFE because it was to receive from its allies weapons that were in excess of their ceilings under the system known as cascading. But most important of all, it was granted an exemption from the ceilings over 25% of its territory because its neighbors to the east and the south were not parties to CFE (see Map 7-1). The weapons in this area were not subject to the national ceiling or to verification.

In 1994 the Russian Federation that had emerged after the disintegration of the USSR declared that it would not implement the limitations imposed by CFE in the Caucasus due to security considerations in the area. The "Flank Agreement" concluded in May 1997 raised Russia's ceilings in this region. At the 1999 Istanbul summit of the OSCE, an Adaptation Agreement was concluded; the bloc structure was ended and replaced with just the ceilings for individual states. The "national ceiling" was defined as the maximum amount of equipment that would be allowed in a particular country. To this would be added the foreign forces stationed in that country to establish the "territorial ceiling."

Turkey's national ceiling consisted of 2,795 tanks, 3,523 pieces of artillery, 3,120 armored vehicles, 750 aircraft, and 130 helicopters. The quantity of weapons available to Turkey in the area was considerably below these ceilings.

3. The Disintegration of the USSR and the Eastern Bloc and Its Consequences

The USSR and the Eastern Bloc came apart as a result of the prevailing international environment.

The principal successor of the USSR was the Russian Federation (RF). This was not just because the basic ethnic component of the USSR was Russian. The Russian Federation was twice as large as all the other Soviet territories combined. It possessed over half the population of the USSR, 90% of its oil, 80% of its natural gas, and 70% of its gold mines and produced 62% of the electric power. The RF had the most homogeneous population after Armenia and Lithuania. Most of its minorities, consisting of 17% of the total population, were not located in border regions. Furthermore, the RF could count on the existence of substantial Russian minorities living in the former Soviet territories, many of them in high administrative positions. These Russian minorities made up 41% of the population in Kazakhstan, 26% in Kirghizstan, and 12% in Turkmenistan.

Мар 7-1. Turkey's Areas Left Outside CFE Coverage

This new Russia, whatever its initial problems, was bound to put its house in order eventually and could well be a cause for concern to its neighbors. As a matter of fact, it was quick to proclaim the policy of the "Near Abroad" (see Box 7-55 below), which indicated that the RF could not be taken lightly. Russia was dangerous because Western Europe no longer saw it as a danger because of the demise of communism and the "double buffer." In the U.S., there was a clash between the policies of Madeleine Albright and her team and those of the Soviet expert Strobe Talbott and his team, who were more influential because he had Clinton's ear. According to Talbott, Russia had to be kept on friendly terms with the West. This would keep it from opposing the expansion of NATO and from standing up to the global hegemony of the U.S. Thus, as long as they did not directly threaten U.S. interests, Russian military activities and military doctrines on the Caucasus and Central Asia must not be challenged, since these regions were Russia's own backyard.

The dramatic disintegration of the Eastern Bloc at this juncture led to significant changes in international relations, leading to consequences in a number of fields (Box 7-2).

These consequences can be summarized in the following manner. As far as the international system was concerned, the concept of balance came to an end. The Western system remained unchallenged. Those countries that had maintained their autonomy of action by relying on the existing balance entered a new and more perilous period.

From the angle of world peace, the old order (which, although perceived as risky, had been able to shed all risks toward the end and brought about great stability) was gone. It was replaced by an order that, although seen as risk-free, was extremely risky due to the existence of numerous independent states with nuclear weapons. The old stability was gone, and a great number of regional conflicts erupted that had been dormant in the era of opposing blocs.

From the ideological point of view, at least, communism as practiced in the USSR and Eastern Europe was finished. But the conviction remained among many that a similar ideology would not take long in emerging if the income disparities at the national and international level and the crass exploitation persisted.

From the perspective of the region, there was a great upheaval. Eastern Europe had become Communist at a time when the proletariat hardly existed and was now in the process of becoming capitalist without the existence of a proper bourgeoisie. This resulted in the Russian mafia taking over the economy and the collapse of many social values.

From Russia's perspective, Gorbachev had never considered the possibility of the disintegration of the Soviet state. He knew that the Soviet system could not continue in the shape that it was in, but his attempt to reform the system led to its collapse. In an environment where there was no proper registration of private property and no independent judiciary, a kind of savage capitalism took over, with political power falling into the hands of opportunists like Boris Yeltsin and economic power being seized by the mafia. Liberalization became synonymous with theft. Russia was the successor of a superpower, the USSR, where the citizens felt proud and also were used to having basic needs like health and education met as a matter of course. Now their country was being humiliated as a result of the war in Chechnya, with soldiers selling their weapons because of rampant poverty, Russian women engaged in prostitution in Moscow and neighboring coun-

Box 7-2. The Concept of Post-Cold War

The West emerged victorious from the Cold War. The U.S. became the global hegemon (see Box Intro-3 in the Introduction). But the EU, and particularly Germany and Japan, also emerged as regional axes. With the coming into being of an independent Ukraine and the emergence of a string of countries like Hungary and Poland from the debris of the former Eastern Bloclying between Western Europe and Russia, Europe was freed from security concerns. But now there were new sources of concern. One was instability brought about by the breakdown of bloc discipline. Another was the future state of the world: the population of the globe would rise from 5.5 billion to 8.5. billion in the first quarter of the new century. This would reguire an annual growth rate of 1.9% in the gross global product until 2025 to keep pace with the growth of population During the last decade of the Cold War, however, the growth rate had even been negative from time to time (Oran 1996, p. 357). Furthermore, the gap between rich and poor nations was growing ever wider (see Box 7-1). It was expected that competition would grow keener and the number of conflicts would rise. It was estimated that in the new century fifteen developing states would be in possession of weapons of mass

After great victories and wars that inaugurate new epochs, it is customary to talk of new orders. The Congress of Vienna in 1815, set up the "European Concert," and the "Versailles Dispensation" followed World War I. Inspired by the new order enunciated in the Atlantic Charter proclaimed in August 1941, U.S. president George Bush came up with the "New World Order" in 1991, soon after the end of the Cold War.

In the past, each epoch had seen more emerging states and more conflicts to contend with. The same thing happened this time with the New World Order.

(B. ORAN

tries, and similar horrors. It was in these circumstances that Vladimir Putin came to power.

Putin could do little against the mafia. He started by tackling the downward slide and repairing Russia's tarnished reputation abroad. He did this by appealing to the patriotism of Russians. This tactic carried the risk of unleashing Russian nationalism that might prove difficult to control. In this respect, Putin's plight was somewhat similar to that of Gorbachev, who wanted to reform the system without tampering with the basic structure and ended up by unleashing forces that he could not control. Gorbachev attempted to save the USSR with internationalism and failed, while Putin took on the task of saving Russia with nationalism (Stratfor, 23 December 1999).

Finally, from Turkey's perspective, a powerful neighbor like the USSR was replaced by a powerful Russia; but this time there was no common border. Against this gain, Turkey lost much of its geostrategic importance for the West, which had depended largely on the argument of

Box 7-3. The End of History

In 1989 the American social scientist Francis Fukuyama published an article that had worldwide repercussions. He started by noting that a fundamental event had happened in world history. The reform movements taking place in the USSR and Eastern Europe and the consumer culture taking root throughout the world heralded the victory of the West. This was not just the end of the Cold War but also the end of history. The German philosopher G.W.F. Hegel had declared that history was the product of the clash of ideologies, which was reflected in the world as historical events. When the Cold War came to an end with the victory of the Western economic and political system (in other words; of capitalism and democracy), the ideological evolution of humanking attained perfection. This signified that history, as understood by Hegel, had come to an end. Of course, this did not mean that historical events would not keep on occurring, because the victory of Western liberalism was still in the realm of ideas and had not yet found its full reflection in the material world. Still, the basic conflict was over: from now on; Western liberalism would reign supreme in the world

Leaving aside the argument over whether ideas shape material reality or vice versa, however, Hegel's dialectic was a process with no end. A thesis begat a counterthesis, and the two resulted in a synthesis, which formed the new thesis, leading to a counterthesis. Fukuyama claimed that henceforth alternatives could only come from within the Western economic and liberal system and dismissed the possibility of an alternative to the Western system coming from the outside. But it must not be forgotten that the most powerful alternative to the Western liberal model. Marxism, was nothing other than a Western ideology.

Clearly, the notion of "the end of history" negated the historical process by pretending that no rival model could appear as an alternative to the Western system. The thesis of the end of history was nothing more than wishful thinking, as borne out by the growing number of conflicts in the world following the launching of the idea.

'Still, the "The End of History" constituted the theoretical underpinning of the concept of the New World Order as formulated by George Bush (Gerger, p. 176).

(B. ORAN)

"confronting the menace of the Communist USSR" since World War II. To compensate for this loss, Turkey began to rely on new crises, starting with the Gulf War in 1991. But this approach ran counter to the principle of upholding the status quo, preserving a relative autonomy, and ensuring the country's security.

4. The New World Order

In the aftermath of the Cold War, the West was now in an unrivaled position economically, politically, and militarily. The Gulf War of 1991 revealed that it was ready to defend this new order by resorting to force if necessary. The U.S. and its allies removed Iraq from the interna-

Box 7-4. The Multilateral Agreement on Investments (MAI)

In the words of the president of the World Trade Organization, the body that succeeded GATI in 1995, the draft of the MAI was "a common constitution for a single global economy" (http://www.unctad.org/Templates/webfiyer.asp?docid=3607 BintitemID=2298@Blang=1). The MAI was an attempt by legal means to equip the multinational corporations with a power that they did not yet possess in the economic realm. As the draft agreement was being prepared in secret. French filmmakers found out about the preparations and reacted sharply out of fear that Hollywood was getting ready to wipe them out. With the generally negative reaction that followed, the idea of concluding such an agreement was pursued no further

The draft of the IMAI, which will no doubt reemerge when international capital becomes stronger, would place nation-states at the mercy of multinational corporations. Under its terms, if changes in government policy inflicted losses on multinationals, governments would be held liable to pay compensation. There is such a clause in NAFTA; when Canada and Mexico-torbade the use of certain toxins, they had to pay compensation to the producers of these toxins. The MAI also contained a clause that would not allow a state to withdraw from the agreement for five years. Those that wanted to withdraw would have to implement the agreement for a further fifteen years.

(B. ORAN)

(Source: Oran 2001 [Küreselleşme ve Azınlıklar], pp. 35-42)

tional equation when that country attempted to change the petroleum status quo in the Middle East. President George Bush used the term "New World Order" in a speech to Congress during the Gulf War. The New World Order rested on two pillars: human rights and the market economy. The term "capitalism" was carefully avoided because of the stigma attached to it. The president's actions demonstrated that he was ready to defend the New World Order by armed force when necessary. Bush's stand also reflected the theoretical view that these two pillars were eternally valid (Box 7-3).

At the same time, with the Gulf War, the U.S. established the basis of a new "law on intervention." Consolidation of this law continued during this period, with the interventions in Somalia, Bosnia, and Kosovo. It would be institutionalized with NATO's decisions made in Washington in 1999, when the organization adopted the "New Strategic Concept," which allowed out-of-area intervention for peacekeeping and humanitarian purposes.

In this new environment, the U.S. also attempted to reinforce international capitalism with a legal superstructure through the Multilateral Agreement on Investments (MAI), which would serve as a sort of constitution for multinational capital (Box 7-4).

B. Regional Developments

With the disintegration of the USSR and the Eastern European order, fundamental changes occurred in the map of the Eurasian region, completely overturning the existing balances.

The Balkans

With the disintegration of Yugoslavia, a country presented as a paradise for minorities, civil wars broke out that continued into the twenty-first century. The first to break away were the republics of Slovenia and Croatia. Located on the western side of the divide separating the Western and Eastern churches, they differed from the other peoples of Yugoslavia because they were close to the West and were Roman Catholic. Then came the attempt of Greater Serbian nationalism to absorb the Bosnian Muslims, with the participation of the Croatians, who were ready to grab what they saw as their share. Finally, the Albanian minorities attempted to break away from Yugoslavia and Macedonia.

The former Yugoslavia soon became the scene where the different Yugoslav nations got involved in bitter conflict. At the same time, opposing forces within the EU were also engaged in a struggle among themselves. Germany saw Slovenia and Croatia as the natural regions to come under its influence and had no qualms about encouraging their independence. It was also able to impose its views on the EU. Britain and France, however, were intent on checking Germany's growing influence and did this by backing Serbia. The result was the bloodbath in Bosnia, which continued until the U.S. decided to intervene. Once again, the U.S. demonstrated its unrivaled power.

Greece perceived the events in the Balkans as carrying the potential of a siege by Turks and Muslims. Alarmed by this prospect, Greece became the sole NATO country to provide open support to Serbia, while it did its best to smother Macedonia, which was hindering direct contacts with Serbia. These exertions left Greece in a weakened condition, and Turkey was able to take advantage of this. Once Greece found itself under the rational leadership of Costas Simitis, however, it freed itself from senseless complexes, stopped picking on its neighbor Macedonia, ended its quarrels with Turkey, and restored its image as the representative of the EU in the region.

Bulgaria had lost much of its standing during the Cold War in its attempt to change the names of its Turkish minority. Bulgaria mended its ways with admirable speed after the Cold War and became a model in its treatment of minorities. This made Bulgaria Turkey's most troublefree neighbor and turned it into a serious candidate for EU membership.

The Middle East

The effects of the Pax Americana were most clearly seen in the oil-rich Middle East. The U.S. was monitoring both Iraq and Iran under its policy of "double containment." When Iraq threatened the vital interests of the hegemonic power, it found itself completely isolated. Syria had been placed on the U.S. list of terrorist states. It found itself greatly weakened after losing the support of its patron, the USSR, and abandoned its policy of resisting the American-led Middle East peace process. After 1990 it opened its economy to private enterprise and foreign investments. In 1998 the U.S. would use its clout with Syria in Turkey's favor when it secured the expulsion of Abdullah Öcalan from Syrian territory (see Box 7-16 below).

The ascendancy of Israel was accompanied by a parallel deterioration in the position of the Arab states. The disappearance of the USSR left the Palestinians greatly weakened, and the left wing of the movement lost its predominant position in the organization. From then on, Palestinian nationalism came under the influence of Islamist organizations like Hamas, with its emphasis on terrorism in the struggle with Israel. This development proved detrimental to Israeli and U.S. interests.

After the 1979 Islamic Revolution, Iran went through a phase when ideology was the main driving force. After this phase, Iran sought to extend its influence in Central Asia and the Caucasus in the 1990s. While obstructing Turkey in Central Asia, it was also seeking to redress its economy. Its oil income had peaked at $27 billion when its population was at 40 million. Now, when its oil income stood at just $17 billion, its population had reached 60 million. It was having difficulty in making the optimum use of its ample natural gas reserves due to lack of capital and know-how. In the new century Iran would go through liberalization in its domestic policies as it sought to find export outlets for its natural gas through Turkey.

The demise of the USSR also affected Kurdish nationalism in the Middle East. Both the Turkish and the Iraqi Kurds came under U.S. influence. This gave the U.S. the chance to use the Kurds as a potential threat against the countries of the region.

The Caucasus and Central Asia

At first the Russian Federation, Turkey, and Iran were vying for influence in this region. The RF tended to look at this area as its own backyard and returned to the region as soon as its means allowed. The area was important for the Russians, first because it was adjacent to the northern Caucasus. From the point of view of security, the northern Caucasus was important, with its unobstructed steppes extending to Moscow beyond the Caucasus Mountains. Moreover, any losses in the northern Caucasus could well lead to a new breakup. Second, Transcaucasia was rich in oil and was close to the Indian Ocean. Russia took advantage of the regional conflicts to establish its political and military presence in the region and demonstrated to Turkey and Iran in particular that it had to be taken into account whenever they wanted to deal with the countries of that region. Russian influence in Central Asia was also very obvious, however, and Moscow was quick to demonstrate that it had not abandoned this region.

When the USSR came apart, the U.S. calculated that it could enter the region in partnership with Turkey and gave Ankara strong encouragement to establish itself there. But the U.S. push faltered when it became clear that the RF was filling the void left by the USSR. In fact, the U.S. realized that in many cases regional instability could only be overcome with Russian help and slowed down its efforts to penetrate the area. As the size of Caspian oil reserves become more evident, however, the U.S. became concerned about the possibility that these resources might be taken over by Russia. The size of Azerbaijan's oil reserves in its zone of the Caspian stands at 10 billion barrels, with possible reserves reaching 30 billion barrels. Total reserves in the Caspian basin are estimated to reach 200 billion barrels, a level that could meet total U.S. consumption for the next thirty years and perhaps longer. It looked like the Great Game of the twenty-first century would be over the control of these reserves and transporting the oil to international markets. This is why George W. Bush, who took office as president in 2001, continued American support for the Baku-Ceyhan oil pipeline across Georgia and Turkey even though the oil companies considered the route to be uneconomical.

After Azerbaijan became independent in the Transcaucasus, its president, Ebulfez Elchibey, alienated Iran by harping on the theme of "Southern Azerbaijan," while scaring the Turkic republics and Russia with his Pan-Turkic policies. The news agency of Elchibey's party was named Turan, and its logo was a howling gray wolf. When Heydar Aliyev took power as president, Azerbaijan returned to a realistic policy. Georgia went through a similar process when its leader, Zviad Gamsakhurdia, who led an anti-Russian campaign, was replaced by Eduard Shevardnadze. This led Russia to ease up on its policies of openly encouraging separatism in Abkhazia, South Ossetia, and Ajaria.

One of the consequences of the disintegration of the USSR was the birth of an independent Armenia, which was significant especially for Turkey. Armenia was engaged in the Nagorno Karabakh conflict with Azerbaijan and kept a large swath of Azerbaijan's territory under occupation. Under the leadership of Levon Ter-Petrossian, Armenia sought but failed to come closer to Turkey. With the coming of Robert Kocharian to power in Yerevan, Armenia was gripped by a nationalist fever that was fed by economic hardship. This led Yerevan to support Armenian positions that were causing apprehension in Turkey.

II. THE DOMESTIC ENVIRONMENT AND DYNAMICS

A. The Economy

Table 7-2 reveals the following picture (see Box 2-1 in Section 2).

- 1. Aside from the year 2001, the GNP grew by 32.8% during the period, while exports grew by over 100% and imports by 160%. Especially toward the end of the period, exports were stagnating while imports were soaring. This trend could be explained in the context of Turkey's membership in the customs union with the EU as of 1 January 1996, people's tendency to stop saving at a time when real interest rates were falling, and the easing of bank credits, which led people to purchase durable consumer goods such as automobiles.
- 2. The ratio of imports to GNP grew to the staggering level of 26.98% in 2000, when the stabilization program came into effect. The ratio of total foreign trade to GNP grew to 40.7% in that year. This high ratio, taken in conjunction with unrestricted capital flows, made Turkey extremely vulnerable to global economic fluctuations.
- 3. In this period there was a 2.3-fold increase in the level of external debts. The ratio of foreign debt to GNP rose to 77.7%, exceeding by far the commonly accepted limit of 60%. This compounded the difficulties caused by the vulnerability described in the previous paragraph, placing the economy completely at the mercy of external influences. Furthermore, the debts that were incurred did not go into investments but were used to finance current expenses and to service the existing foreign and domestic debt. This was unsustainable, and the day of reckoning was to come soon.

As further elaboration on the information in the table, it has to be added that the economy was kept going with short-term speculative funds, foreign debts, and internal borrowing, with terms fluctuating around twelve months.

| 991-2001                  |   |
|---------------------------|---|
| 1-2                       |   |
| 199                       |   |
| cey,                      | Ì |
| H                         | 1 |
| s of                      |   |
| tors                      |   |
| ndica                     | ļ |
| Ä                         |   |
| mic                       |   |
| ouc                       |   |
| Ë                         |   |
| Basic Economic Indicators |   |
| 7                         |   |
| ble 7-3                   |   |
| Įqe,                      |   |
| -                         |   |

| YEAR | INFLATION (%)   | TL/$ RATE   | ($ NOLLUM). | EXPORTS (MILLION $) | EXPORTSAS % OFGNP               | IMPORTS (MILLION $) | IMPORTSAS % OFGNP | FOREIGN DEBT (MILLION $)    | FOREIGNDEBT AS% OF GNP | DIRECT FOREIGN INVESTMENTS (MILLION $) |
|------|-----------------|--|--------------|----------------------|---|----------------------|---------------------------|------------------------------|--------------------------------|---|
| 1991 | 55.3            | 4,169.85   | 152,138.10   | 13,593.5             | 8.93                                    | 21,047.0             | 13.83                     | 50,489.0                     | 33.19                          | 1,041.0                                 |
| 1992 | 52.1            | 6,868.69   | 160,671.80   | 14,714.6             | 9.16                                    | 22,871.1             | 14.23                     | 55,592.0                     | 34.60                          | 1,242.0                                 |
| 1993 | 58.4            | 10,985.96  | 181,806.90   | 15,345.1             | 8.44                                    | 29,428.4             | 16.19                     | 67,356.0                     | 37.05                          | 1,016.0                                 |
| 1994 | 120.7           | 29,704.33  | 130,886.70   | 18,105.9             | 13.83                                   | 23,270.0             | 17.78                     | 65,601.0                     | 50.12                          | 830.0                                   |
| 1995 | 88.5            | 45,705.43  | 171,858.90   | 21,637.0             | 12.59                                   | 35,709.0             | 20.78                     | 73,278.0                     | 42.64                          | 1,127.0                                 |
| 1996 | 74.6            | 81,137.15  | 184,601.80   | 23,224.5             | 12.58                                   | 43,626.6             | 23.62                     | 79,571.0                     | 43.14                          | 964.0                                   |
| 1997 | 81.0            | 151,428.52   | 194,106.50   | 26,261.1             | 13.53                                   | 48,558.7             | 25.02                     | 84,797.0                     | 43.73                          | 1,032.0                                 |
| 1998 | 70.2            | 260,039.56   | 205,808.40   | 26,974.0             | 13.11                                   | 45,921.4             | 22.31                     | 96,897.0                     | 47.09                          | 976.0                                   |
| 1999 | 62.9            | 417,580.86   | 187,467.80   | 26,587.2             | 14.18                                   | 40,686.7             | 21.70                     | 102,980.0                    | 54.29                          | 817.0                                   |
| 2000 | 32.7            | 623,685.00   | 201,977.80   | 27,774.9             | 13.75                                   | 54,502.8             | 26.98                     | 118,685.0                    | 59.25                          | 1,719.0                                 |
| 2001 | 61.6            | 1,225,412.00   | 196,736.00   | 31,334.2             | 15.93                                   | 41,399.1             | 21.04                     | 113,658.0                    | 57.77                          | 3,760.0                                 |
|      | , in the second | nner in 1 c. 1 T. N. 1. I. I. I. I. I. I. I. I. I. I. I. I. I. | T. 1         | (T)(L)               | (1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1-1- | Just (December) tobi | o Horino Mist             | according Having Schafferiel | חדו אססד בסאסי זיים!           | zo=z₁ and 16s.                          |

Sources: DPT Temel Ekonomik Göstergeler, January 2001, p. 13; Devlet İstatistik Enstitüsü (DİE), 2000 Dış Ticaret İstatistikleri (Compiled and interpreted by Hikmet Ulugbay) Turkey went through three economic crises during this period when investments and production were low, and the value of the Turkish currency was propped up by Central Bank intervention.

The first crisis came in 1994. It was caused by the populist measures that had been taken continuously since 1987, leading to fiscal imbalances, while the currency was kept at an artificially high level even as the amount of currency in circulation soared. This resulted in a surge in the demand for dollars from both local and external savers, which left the treasury in a situation in which it could borrow no more. As a consequence of all this, the government was borrowing at rates of interest reaching 400% in May when it had considered rates of interest running at 90 to 100% unreasonably high in January and February 1994. Just as the 1958 crisis became a benchmark for measuring crises that followed, so the 1994 crisis became the benchmark for measuring subsequent crises (Sönmez, pp. 61–62). Henceforth, at the first sign of trouble, people would rush to foreign exchange bureaus to convert their savings into foreign currencies.

The second crisis was caused by the Far Eastern economic upheaval of 1997, which spread to Russia and then Turkey in 1998. When foreign speculators panicked and fled from an economy that was living from hand to mouth on debts, the Turkish economy slumped once again.

The third crisis came in two waves at a time when a stabilization program was being implemented to prevent the recurrence of the 1998 crisis. In the first wave, ten banks whose assets had been misappropriated by their owners were taken over by the state. As a result of this shock, speculators transferred abroad $7 billion within a period of two weeks. Once more, the government had to resort to the IMF, which provided additional loans to deal with the crisis. At this point, on 19 February 2001, there was a row between president Ahmet Necdet Sezer and Prime Minister Ecevit at a session of the National Security Council. When news of the dispute reached the public, the market collapsed once again, and a further $6 billion left Turkey within a week. Turkey was desperate and needed to find new loans amounting to 25% of all the debts it had incurred over the previous seventy-five years. In these circumstances, a super minister was drafted from the World Bank: Kemal Dervis, who abandoned the pegged rate in effect up to then and replaced it with a floating rate. The condition for further IMF support was the privatization of basic public enterprises, among a number of other requirements. In the late 1940s and early 1950s (see Section 4), when people such as Max Weston Thornburg and James M. Barker had made similar proposals, people had assumed that they were joking. Among the enterprises due for privatization were organizations like Türk Telekom, the telecommunications operator. In October 2001 the markets still remained unsettled.

During the crises Turkey accepted the IMF's recipes as the only valid diagnosis and cure. It carried out these recipes carelessly even at the height of the crises and returned to old practices as soon as the emergency appeared to be over, making subsequent crises ever more severe.

The Structural Adjustment Program and Privatization

The economic model that was proposed to Turkey after 1945 would have turned it into a country that relied on agriculture and tourism. The economic and legal changes introduced by the Özal team led to the implementation of this structural adjustment in the 1990s. The basic tool of this adjustment was privatization.

The main argument for privatization was that public enterprises were loss makers and that the burden this imposed on the budget was detrimental to the national economy. The losses were due to a number of factors. The management of public enterprises consisted of rulingparty members who ran the enterprises as if they were the private property of the party. There was gross overstaffing in the enterprises, where anyone applying with a reference obtained from a politician was employed. Because obsolete machinery and equipment were not replaced, the enterprises were unable to compete. In other words, all of the conditions were present to ensure that the enterprises would run at a loss. The logic behind the sales of loss-making enterprises was flawed. But private businesses were only interested in buying profitable enterprises. Consequently, enterprises due for privatization went through face-lifting operations, proving that, with a will, they could be turned into profitable businesses.

When the considerable sums expended for privatization were deducted from the proceeds of privatization, however, this did not leave much in the way of income for the state. After over ten years of privatization, the government had received income amounting to $4.2 billion by the end of 1997. In the same period, the expenditures for privatization amounted to $3.9 billion (Cumhuriyet, 30 October 1997).

In reality, privatization in Turkey aimed to achieve mainly two objectives. The first was to carry out structural adjustment in order to satisfy appeals coming from the IMF and the World Bank ever since the 1950s to conform to their model of international division of labor. The IMF's green lights were always conditional on this requirement being met, and the World Bank used structural adjustment credits to this end. The second was to secure the transfer of resources (in the form of factories, real estate, etc.) to private entrepreneurs below their actual cost. After the transfer of factories, real estate, and other properties belonging to non-Muslims at rock-bottom prices under the Wealth Tax of 1942 during World War II (see Box 3-2 in Section 3), this was a second wave of transfer of assets (but on a vaster scale) that took place in the 1980s and especially the 1990s.

This transfer of resources below cost was carried out according to the following two methods. First, the state enterprises that were due to be sold were assigned very low values to ensure their speedy disposal. To cite an example, the public share of the firm Fruko-Tamek was estimated to amount to 70 billion TL in 1991. This share was sold for this price four years later in an environment of runaway inflation. The business that acquired this share sold it two years later for $65 million, which corresponded to 10 trillion TL (Boratav, p. 286). The same situation occurred in the privatization of Petrol Ofisi, a strategic state enterprise engaged in the marketing and sale of petroleum products. The major portion of the shares of this enterprise was sold for 724.5 trillion TL in 1999 even though its total sales in the first nine months of that year amounted to 902 trillion TL. This national enterprise had been sold for the equivalent of its annual turnover, and its profits in two years' time would exceed its total sale price (Cumhurivet, 3 and 4 March 2000). The prices of most enterprises were so low that their land, if sold separately, would have fetched higher prices.

The second method consisted of formulating the sales contracts in a way that allowed the purchaser to deviate from the enterprise's main line of activity and also to break the enterprise up if it chose to. An example of this was the privatization of the General Directorate of the Meat and Fish Enterprises (EBK in its Turkish acronym), located on a large tract of land next to the premises of Ankara's Police Department. The requirement to continue production was so vaguely formulated that the new owner could comply with the requirement by slaughtering just one steer. The sanction for not continuing production was set as a fine of 10% of the purchase price. The press did not report a single case of such a fine having been imposed. Of the eleven meat-packing plants owned by the EBK that were privatized, nine had ceased production within one year. Employment fell by 88%, and production plummeted by 94% (Boratav, p. 288). The tract of land belonging to the EBK General Directorate was sold off to a retailer to build a shopping mall. With the EBK no longer operating and with the warlike conditions in the southeast imposing the need to clamp a ban on grazing animals in elevated pasturelands in the summer, there was a drastic contraction in animal husbandry in Turkey. As a result, importers resorted to procuring unhealthy buffalo meat from southern Asia and got involved in the scandal that came to be known as "Operation Buffalo."

The income derived from privatization was used to defray current expenditures and meet interest payments on public debts.

This process went on until 2001, when the government started selling state-owned lands over the Internet. As long as the economy remained in this state, it was to be expected that worse crises would occur and there would be nothing left to dispose of to overcome the difficulties. At the end of 2000 the British journal International Financial Review awarded Turkey the prize for being "The Best Borrower." At the award ceremony the undersecretary of the treasury, Selçuk Demiralp, received the prize from the comedian Rory Bremner (Milliyet, 13 January 2001).

The privatizations that were carried out in this period were accompanied by much talk of scandal and corruption. People assumed that all public contracts were tainted, and the state ended up by losing all its credibility. The press carried reports that frequent power cuts were deliberately prearranged in order to provide justification for the construction of nuclear power plants. At a time when the State Planning Organization estimated Turkey's natural gas requirements as 15 billion cubic meters for 2005, the Ministry of Energy's estimate was double this amount. The press claimed that the discrepancy arose from the government's efforts to push through the construction of the Blue Stream natural gas pipeline under the Black Sea. The same situation occurred in the field of electric power requirement estimates when the Ministry of Energy and the power-distribution organization TEAŞ (Türkiye Elektrik İletim Üretim A.Ş.) estimated Turkey's power requirement to be twice as high as the estimate of the Chamber of Power Plant Engineers (Meral Tamer, in Milliyet, 25 January 2001). As more banks kept failing due to fraudulent practices and were being taken over by the state, it was considered natural by many for the IMF to refuse to extend new loans in this environment of corruption. The honorary president of the American-Turkish Council, Brent Scowcroft, declared openly that the defects of the political system and the prevalence of corruption were behind the U.S. unwillingness to extend aid to Turkey to overcome its dire difficulties (Milliyet, 27 March 2001).

After the crisis of February 2001, foreign banks started buying out Turkish banks and companies at rock-bottom prices. This trend was causing dismay in certain quarters, most notably among the military as well as the bourgeoisie. Tuncay Özilhan, the president of TÜSİAD, which was all in favor of globalization, declared that, "not-withstanding the government's nationalism, Turkey's factories, banks, and commercial enterprises are being sold, one by one and for a pittance, to foreigners because of the government's policies" (Sabah, 13 April 2001).

Against this background, the IMF and the World Bank were not satisfied with either the "build, operate, transfer (BOT)" or the "transfer of the right to operate" models. They insisted on the outright sale of power plants to companies with majority shares held by foreigners. Following the crisis of November-December 2000, the IMF refused to give a "green light" unless 33.5% of the Turkish telecom enterprise was sold, with the buyer obtaining the right to manage the firm and a change in the present management. Following the crisis of February 2001, the IMF became even stricter in its conditions for providing loans. It now wanted new privatizations and monthly IMF inspections and called for the "transfer" of enterprises in the energy sector rather than "sale." This distinction would result in the state forgoing more than half a billion dollars in value-added tax.

This is similar to the situation described when dealing with the Peace Treaty of Sèvres (see Section 1), which in its article 232 required the Ottoman budget to be checked first by the Finance Commission made up of British, French, and Italian members before being submitted to the Ottoman Chamber of Representatives for approval. As a matter of fact, when the government sought to make provisions in the 2001 budget to pay civil servants an inflation differential, the IMF's Turkish desk officer, Carlo Cottarelli, declared in June 2000 that from now on he would insist that the IMF be notified of the budget not at the drafting stage but at the budget preparation stage (Milliyet, 6 June 2000).

Against this economic background, we can now turn to the political scene.

B. Politics

In this period the political scene was as chaotic as the economic scene. Just as the new economic policies of the 1980s led to the economic difficulties described above, so the difficulties in the political sphere were the direct result of the political recipes applied in the 1980s.

Islamism, Kurdish Separatism, and the "Deep State"

The 12 September administration used Islam under the label "Turkish-Islamic Synthesis" as a social glue to ward off both the Left and Kurdish nationalism. When these policies were combined with impoverishment of the masses, the Islamist current in society was greatly strengthened. At the end of 1999 the poorest 20% of the population obtained 4.9% of the GNP, while the share of the richest 20% was over 50% (Cumhuriyet, 29 January 2001). The rise of Islam coincided with the prohibition of the head scarf in universities. This gave the Islamists a cause to rally around. In the elections in 1995, the Welfare Party (Refah) obtained 21.38% of the votes cast and emerged as the leading party. Its candidates became mayors in İstanbul and Ankara, while in İzmir a sympathizer got this post. In July 1996 Necmettin Erbakan formed a coalition government in which the senior partner was his Welfare Party.

Erbakan was so sure of his position that he had the audacity to invite the leaders of sects and various religious orders to formal dinners at his official residence. These leaders attended the functions in their traditional religious garbs and turbans. The so-called green capital, consisting of entrepreneurs from Anatolia and represented by the Independent Industrialists and Businessmen's Association (MÜSİAD in its Turkish acronym), had been fostered by Özal with cheap loans from Halk Bankası, a state bank. The impression started gaining ground among the public as well as among state institutions that the Islamic movement was being financed by the businesses belonging to MÜSİAD and by the foreign Islamic banking institutions that were allowed to set up operations in Turkey with special privileges during Özal's term as prime minister.

The 12 September coup administration had condoned torture in prisons and had prescribed Turkish-nationalist and Islamic indoctrination. The reaction to these practices helped strengthen the PKK, especially among the people in the southeast who had been alienated by the violations of human rights on the part of the 12 September regime. The spread of the PKK's influence reached such a magnitude that it became Turkey's major domestic and external problem in the years 1990 to 1994. During these years Turkey went through an acute "dismemberment (or Sèvres) syndrome." In the southeast people were afraid to leave their homes after dusk. The political arms of PKK in foreign lands worked effectively to draw attention to human rights violations in Turkey during this period. These efforts helped them gain the backing of Western European countries in particular. There was even a time when foreign tourists wanting to travel in the southeastern region had to obtain a "visa" from the PKK.

In this chaotic environment, a growing number of people were being shot dead in broad daylight as they went about their businesses. More and more people were disappearing without trace after being detained by the security forces. In places like Mardin, Batman, and Istanbul and especially in Diyarbakır, these occurrences became so commonplace that it became impossible to keep track of them. The statistics provided by different government agencies showed large discrepancies. An investigative Committee on Murders Committed by Unknown Perpetrators was set up within the TGNA to look into these cases. The number of such cases was negligible prior to 1988 but grew rapidly thereafter. According to the data provided by the TGNA's investigation committee, the numbers went from 24 in 1988 to 48 in 1989, 44 in 1990, 68 in 1991, 732 in 1992, and 540 in 1993 (Cumhuriyet, 26 April 1994). These cases remained unclarified even in the districts under martial law, which led people to suspect they were the work of the so-called "deep state" (Box 7-5).

As a result of the Islamists' activities and the stresses on society imposed by terrorism, errors were committed in Turkey that were to have dire consequences. In violation of article 40 of the Treaty of Lausanne, the Ministry of Education made a decision (later revoked) on 11 October 1993 to ban the teaching of the Armenian language in minority schools. The Islamist newspapers started campaigns to secure military intervention by Turkey in the armed conflicts in Bosnia and Nagorno Karabakh, Islamist mayors started naming squares and parks in Istanbul and İzmir after Chechen leader Dzhokhar Dudayev and named streets after notables and heroes from the Caucasus and Central Asia. The racist far-Right revealed its imperialistic ambitions by harping on the theme that the "National Pact is a wringer that is constricting us." A current calling itself "Neo-Ottomanism" defended the view that Turkish influence must be restored in the countries located on the territory of the former Ottoman state.

In this environment, the Chechen terrorists who hijacked the ferry Avrasya were tried merely for "diverting the ferryboat." As a result of all this, there was a sharp rise in Turkish nationalism in reaction to the PKK terrorism. Until then it had been a struggle between the PKK and the state. Now even minor incidents in the Aegean and in

Box 7-5. The Argument over the "Deep State"

The term "deep state" is used in two different senses in Turkey. The first is rooted in a type of secret organization affiliated with NATO, which, with time, degenerated into an organized crime group engaged in the pursuit of private gain. In the second sense, the "deep state" is a type of special organization entrenched within the state apparatus and strives to keep the state on a predetermined course.

ABOUT OF SERVICE ASSESSMENT

The generally prevailing notion that "If the perpetrators of a crime cannot be uncovered, it must involve the deep state" goes back to the time in May 1988 when a NATO organization was accidentally unmasked in Italy. The public prosecutor Felice Casson learned that stores of arms were under the control of Italy's secret service (SISMI). This led to the revelation that in November 1956 the Italian and American secret services had established a secret organization with the code name "Gladio." Gladio distributed arms to anti-Communist civilians to be used in the event of an invasion coming from the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact. Soon it became clear that similar arrangements existed in other NATO countries. These organizations were subsequently dismantled by governments or were eliminated after being exposed to the public (Ali Bayramoğlu, in Sabah, 12 July 2001).

The "Turkish Gladio" was never investigated. The suspicion quickly grew among the public that this outfit was responsible for a good number of incidents, such as those that took place in Istanbul and Izmir on 6 and 7 September 1955. In Taksimi Square on 1 May 1977, in Kahramanmaraş in December 1978, in Corum and Sivas in 1979, and elsewhere. Prime Minister Ecevit made mention of the existence of a "Special Warfare Department" in 1974. In 1977, after the events of 1 May, he wrote a letter to president Fahri Korutürk in which he revealed that this department had received covert financial aid until 1974 from American sources for training in guerrilla and antiguerrilla warfare and added that it was highly probable that some of the individuals thus trained were using their skills in the acts of violence currently being carried out in Turkey (Hürriyet, 4 February 1978, quoted in Yetkin, p. 177). S. Demirel declared on 17 November 1990 that "the State cannot stand before the public if it has an image where it is perceived as the perpetrator of crimes" (Tercuman, 24 November 1990). As a result of these debates, this unknown entity implicated in these crimes came to be known as the "counterguerrilla" in Turkey.

The "deep state" was exposed somewhat after the scandal of the Susurluk accident (see Box 7-6 below) that took place on 3 November 1996. Security officials and civilians originally had been engaged in illegal operations on the state's behalf. These people gradually turned into mafia-like groups and began working for private gain. When these individuals were apprehended and brought to justice, however, their defense was based on the argument that they were serving their country.

The term "deep state" also is used in the sense that certain agencies within the state apparatus arrogate to themselves tasks not assigned to them by the Constitution or by law in order to make themselves more powerful or influential. These agencies see themselves as the "parallel state" and assume for themselves the function of determining the main axes of political life in the defense of certain concepts like secularism, the unity of the state national security, and others, which are considered to be invibible. The "parallel state" thus regards itself as having a mission to ensure continuity and permanence within the state.

(B. ORAN)

Mersin regions were likely to be turned into a Turkish vs. Kurdish fight if one of those involved happened to be of Kurdish stock. It was in these circumstances that the two nationalist parties, the Nationalist Action Party and the Democratic Left Party (DSP), came to power following the 1999 election.

A Change in the Environment

As politicians from the Islamic current came to power, demonstrations with a religious flavor began to occur. One such meeting was the Jerusalem Evening held in Sincan near Ankara. During prime minister Erbakan's foreign trips to Libya and Iran, incidents took place that caused dismay in secular circles and particularly among the military and the staff of the Foreign Ministry. A special working group (Working Group/West) was established by the Armed Forces to monitor the Islamist currents, determine their strength, and influence public opinion.

Eventually, even while Erbakan headed the government, the military within the National Security Council (Milli Güvenlik Kurulu in Turkish) succeeded in having a crucial resolution adopted on 28 February 1997 by this body. The resolution called on the government to stem the growth of Islamist cadres within the administration and take the necessary measures for the proper and full implementation of the reform legislation dating from the earlier years of the Republic. This was followed by a series of briefings to the media conducted by the armed forces in which religious reactionaries were named as enemies. In October 1997 the National Security Council issued a paper entitled "National Security Policy Document," which contained some novel ideas and unusual goals in addition to the old mantras like "separatism and reactionary activities are the main concerns." Among the unusual views were the following: "Turkish nationalism is being turned into racism by certain quarters. The mafias formed by the right-wing militants are using these elements and threatening public order." Also: "Steps may be taken to develop local and cultural particularities provided they do not impinge on the public domain" (Hürriyet, 4 November 1997, quoted in Oran 1999, p. 152).

The coalition protocol of the government called for the office of prime minister to pass from Erbakan to his deputy Çiller at a predetermined date. In the process of this switch-over, President Demirel entrusted the task of forming the new government to Mesut Yılmaz instead of

Box 7-6. The Susurluk Accident

医加克拉姆氏系统检验 化石油管 医单位电影类

At about 7:15 in the evening on 3 November 1996; a Mercedes ploughed into the rear of a truck parked in the vicinity of Susurluk, a town near Bursa. The accident led to three deaths and one injury. From the identity papers of the victims, it was determined that those killed were the deputy chief of the Istanbul police, Huseyin Kocadağ; Mehmet Özbay; and Gonca Us. The Injured person was a member of parliament from Şanliurfa, Sedat Edip Bucak, it was subsequently revealed that Mehmet Özbay's identification papers were false and that his true identity was Abdullah Calli, the nationalist far-right (Ukūcū) mafia leader who was accused of having committed the Bahçellevier massacre in 1978. Bucak was also the head of the Kurdish Bucak clan, identified with the government sponsored village guards in the southeast:

As the investigation went forward, the plot deepened. The smuggled weapons in the car's trunk were of the sort used by assassins and were not registered in the inventory of the police. The bodyguards assigned to Bucak were former police officers of the elite special forces who had been detained in connection with the recent murder of the casino owner Omer Lutfu Topal. They had been released upon the orders of the minister of the interior, Mehmet Agar, and assigned to the task of protecting Bucak. One of the bodyguards had also worked for Tansu Giller. Cath's license fallowing him to bear arms had been signed by Agar, Necdet Men zir, and Hayri Kozakçıoğlu, all high-level officials in the Ministry of the Interior. Cath was on Interpol's red list of wanted persons. He was the bearer of a green special passport, given only to high government officials, that was also signed by Agar. It had been issued by the police and renewed three times without a written record in the official register. On 13 December the police announced that the fingerprints on the murder weapon in the Topal crime corresponded to Catli's fingerprints.

As these revelations came to light, pollticians began to defend those involved in the Susuriuk accident, while at the same time threatening one another, When it transpired that Catli had been employed against ASALA, deputy prime minister and minister of foreign affairs Tansu Ciller declared on 26 November that "those who had fought on behalf of the state would be remembered with respect and considered to be honorable" (Milliyet, 27 November 1996). Bucak declared on 24 December that, if his parliamentary immunity was lifted, it would take only fifteen days for Mesut Yilmaz, then the leader of the main opposition party, to lose his immunity. In the trials of those who were involved in the Susurluk scandal, demonstrators began to cheer and chant "Turkey is proud of you" as the accused entered and left the courthouse, On the other hand, civil society groups, however, started a campaign called "One Minute of Darkness for Full Transparency" The campaign was launched in February 1997, and lasted for a whole month: at exactly 9 PM, lights in the buildings were made to blink for one minute. Prime Minister Erbakan referred to this campaign deprecatingly as a primitive tribal dance:

The trial went on for five years at the State Security Court. The verdict of the court, delivered on 12 February 2001, confirmed a relationship involving the police, the mafia, and politicians that had turned into a criminal organization. The twelve defendants, including Haluk Kirci, one of the perpetrators of the Bahçelievier massacre, members of the police special forces, a former intelligence officer belonging to MIT, and an international narcotics smuggler were sentenced to prison terms of four to six years. Bucak and Agar were not fried due to their parliamentary immunity.

When this verdict came before the Eighth Penal Branch of the Court of Cassation, the judges unanimously upheld the verdict of the State Security Court and declared in their judgment: "The most dangerous forms of criminal organizations are those in which public officials are involved."

(B. Oran

(Sourcest Cumhuriyet, 12 and 14 February 1997 and 13 February 2001) Radikal, 16 January 2002)

Çiller. The Islamists found themselves being prosecuted, student dormitories run by religious sects began to be inspected, Islamists in key positions in the administration found themselves reassigned, governors and prefects began to be investigated for Islamist leanings, and religious foundations whose numbers had reached 800 by 1997 came under scrutiny. But the most significant step was the raising of compulsory primary education level from five to eight years by eliminating the middle-level schools. This resulted in the closing down of the middle schools for training imams and preachers, which put an effective brake on the Islamist attempt to train new religiously inclined cadres by providing a religious education to youngsters aged eleven or twelve.

To understand fully the nature of this radical turnabout, we have to bear in mind that PKK terrorism, which peaked in 1993, was stopped in 1994 and subsequently defeated militarily in the countryside. By 1997 the Kurdish uprising had been largely suppressed. In the atmosphere tainted by the Susurluk incident (Box 7-6), however, the news that the "dirty war" had led to the explosive growth of the narcotics trade in the southeast probably became a major source of concern for the military.

In reality, the change in the public mood in Turkey began much earlier than February 1997 and originated from the bourgeoisie. TÜSİAD, the spokesperson for big business, issued a report on education in September 1990 in which it advocated the extension of compulsory primary education to eight years (Cumhuriyet, 20 September 1990, quoted in Oran 1999, p. 153). In August 1995, when the effects of terror were still being felt, TOBB (the Union of Chambers and Commodity Exchanges of Turkey) commissioned an "Eastern Report" prepared by Professor Doğu Ergil of the Faculty of Political Science of Ankara University on the basis of his talks with ordinary people as well as with members of the elite in the region. The report described the Kurdish question, analyzed it thoroughly, and concluded that the inhabitants of the region wanted to be considered Turkish citizens but with a Kurdish identity.

The report caused such furious discussion that even its sponsor TOBB was taken aback. This was the first time that the bourgeoisie had been so outspoken. This was because GÜNSİAD (the Association of Industrialists and Businessmen of the Southeast) had finally been able to make itself heard and informed TOBB that commercial life in the region was at a standstill. The industrialists of İstanbul had been told that the markets for their products in the region had dried up. In January 1997, one month before the communiqué of the National Security Council, TÜSİAD issued Professor Bülent Tanör's report entitled "Perspectives of Democratization in Turkey." Among the 'professor's recommendations, the one for the subordination of the General Staff to the Ministry of Defense was radical enough to cause a big stir among the military. Professor Tanor also proposed lifting all restrictions on the Kurdish language, eliminating article 8 of the law on combating terrorism, closing down the lower three classes in religious preacher schools, ending the admission of girls to such schools (since they were disqualified from being preachers), and ending compulsory courses on religion in public schools.

In February 1973 the military leaders had declared communism to be Turkey's most serious enemy; after the 12 September 1980 coup, they had created an environment that allowed Islamism to advance rapidly. In this they had the support of the bourgeoisie. Now, twenty-four years later, there was a radical shift in the bourgeoisie's orientation. The reasons for the change were obvious. Both communism and Kurdish nationalism backed by armed violence (in Turkish: the 2 Ks, Komünizm and Kürtçülük) had ceased to be a serious threat. Furthermore, the new orientation of the military and bourgeoisie was in keeping with the new global trends.

After this, TÜSİAD's publications and statements would expose human rights abuses and demand an end to these practices. Even MÜSİAD became more globalized and liberalized as more and more Turkish firms began to trade with foreign (including Israeli) firms. Bülent Atuk, the president of the Turkish Association of Garment Manufacturers, declared in a speech that "the country must have a proper image if we are going to have people in Europe and America wearing 'Made-in-Turkey' T-shirts." He was voicing the views of Turkish businesspeople anxious to compete in the global market. Fuat Miras, the president of TOBB, spoke in a similar vein when he declared that "the main obstacle to trade is our inability to bring democratic reforms to our Constitution. Because of this, our trade is suffering, we are unable to tap the EU's aid funds, foreign capital is staying away, and we have trouble accessing foreign financial institutions for loans" (Milliyet, 25 June 1999, quoted in Oran 1999, p. 161).

Despite all this and notwithstanding the EU's pressures and the full support of the bourgeoisie, Turkey was unable to overcome its reluctance to commit itself in the National Program to do the things it had promised to do in the Accession Partnership Document submitted to the EU. In the middle of 2001 the regime was adopting, step by step, the infrastructure of the Western world in the form of global capitalism but was still suspicious of its superstructure, consisting of democracy and human rights. This was clearly evident in the continuing effort to shield the defendants in the Susurluk scandal. After the collapse of communism, it was no longer possible to cover up corrupt practices with anti-Communist rhetoric. All the financial, economic, political, cultural, and social capital invested in anti-Communism over the years had to be redirected against new internal and external enemies (Emre Kongar, in Cumhuriyet, 29 January 2001). If the true nature and the true perpetrators of the Susurluk scandal were to be revealed before this was done, it could spell the end of the network of corruption gripping Turkish society.

Although serious efforts were made to deal with Islamism, there were as yet no signs in 2001 that the Kurdish question was being addressed. The glib formula "the issue is not 'the Kurdish question' but 'the terrorism question'" was maintained. An atmosphere of complacency was created after the Kurdish uprising had been suppressed militarily. The measures to deal with the Kurdish question were confined to things like bringing Kurdish children to Ankara and İstanbul to visit amusement parks and shopping centers, having the İstanbul team of Galatasaray play football in Diyarbakır, providing financial assistance to teams like Diyarbakırspor and Vanspor, engaging pop stars to give concerts in the southeast, and arranging ballet shows with the dancers wearing Kurdish headgear.

III. THE FOREIGN POLICY OF THE PERIOD

We shall consider the foreign policy of this period by first examining two tables (Tables 7-3 and 7-4).

The following factors stand out in these tables.

1. As in the previous period, the share of the first seven trading partners in Turkey's trade hovered around 55%. Only Germany was able to account for double digit figures, while the rest stayed in single digits as a percentage of Turkey's trade. Turkey was gradually diversifying both the composition of its foreign trade and its markets and suppliers (Table 7-3).

Although Turkey conducted a major portion of its trade with the members of the EU, it will be noted that its trade with the U.S. accounted for about only 10% of its total exchanges despite its many political, financial, and military links with America.

- 2. Turkey's total foreign debts, both public and private, increased by a factor of 2.2 during this period. While the long- and medium-term debts increased by a factor of 2.3, the short-term debts increased by a factor of 1.8. This period should be evaluated in two stages: the first covering the period from 1991 to 2000 and the second covering 2001. During the first stage the share of short-term external debt in total external debt was above 20% except for two years (1991 and 1994, which were 18.06% and 17.24%, respectively). This high ratio of over 20% short-term debt increased the vulnerability of Turkey. After the February 2001 financial market crisis, the IMF injected massive loans that helped to reduce the ratio of short-term debt considerably, to the level of 14.44%. But the ratio of interest payments to tax revenues rose from 30.61% to 77.09% during this period. This ratio even climbed to 103.26% in 2001 (Table 7.4; see Table 7.2 above).
- 3. The internal debts contracted by the treasury went through a period of very fast growth. Even if the dollar equivalent is considered to eliminate the factor of inflation in the Turkish currency, the level of the internal debt rose from $11 billion in 1991 to $100 billion in 2001. The sudden rise in the level from 2000 to 2001 was due to the failure of private banks, whose depositors' claims had to be met from public funds. In 2001 the long overdue treasury debts to public banks were also securitized, which contributed to the sudden jump in domestic debts. As a result, the ratio of internal debt to GNP rose from 7.22% to 67.34% in the course of this decade.
- 4. The interest payments on the huge debt stock posed a particularly serious problem. These payments consumed 30.6% of all tax receipts in 1991. Ten years later, they had reached the unprecedented and unsustainable level of 103.26%. Turkey had reached this level for the first time in its history when its total tax receipts could not cover the interest payments on its internal and external debt.

A. Foreign Policy against the Background of Globalization Turkey Trapped in the Debt Spiral

To deal with its desperate situation, Turkey had no choice but to resort to external sources like foreign capital, foreign loans, and foreign exchange earnings derived from privatizations. An alternative course would have been to undertake reforms in fields such as banking, energy,

|  | 8        |
|--|----------|
|  | -2001    |
|  | 1991-200 |
|  | 10       |
|  | T T      |
|  | oreio    |
|  | PV'S F   |
|  | Turk     |
|  | m se     |
|  | mnfr     |
|  | وزر      |
|  | Select   |
|  | Store    |
|  | Shar     |
|  | 7.3      |
|  | Tah      |

| USA GERMANY FRANCE BRITAIN ITALY BETPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS IMPORTS IMPORTS | SA GERMANY FRANCE BRITAIN ITAIN IMPORTS EXPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS EXPORTS EXPORTS | EXPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS | EXPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS IMPORTS EXPORTS | ANCE BRITAIN ITAINITAIN IMPORTS | BRITAIN ITA | TAIN ITAINIMPORTS | ITA | ₹     | LLY | STS. | NETHEREXPORTS | NETHERLANDS. PORTS IMPORTS | RUSFEDEE | RUSSIANFEDERATIONORTS IMPORTS | TOTAL FICOUNEXPORTS | TOTAL FOR SEVEN COUNTRIES EXPORTS IMPORTS |
|---|---|---|---|---------------------------------|-------------|-------------------|-----|-------|-----|------|-------------------|----------------------------|--------------|---------------------------------------|-----------------------------|---|
| 67 10,7 25.1 15.4 5.1 5.8 5.0 5.5 7.1 8   | 25.1 15.4 5.1 5.8 5.0 5.5 7.1   | 15.4 5.1 5.8 5.0 5.5 7.1                | 5.1 5.8 5.0 5.5 7.1                     | 5.0 5.5 7.1                     | 5.0 5.5 7.1 | 5.5 7.1           | 7.1 |       | 8   | 8.8  | 3.5               | 3.0                        | 4.5          | 5.2                                   | 57.0                        | 54.4                                      |
| 5.9 11.4 24.9 16.4 5.5 5.9 5.4 5.2 6.4  | 1 24.9 16.4 5.5 5.9 5.4 5.2 6.4   | 16.4 5.5 5.9 5.4 5.2 6.4                | 5.5 5.9 5.4 5.2 6.4                     | 5.4 5.2 6.4                     | 5.4 5.2 6.4 | 5.2 6.4           | 6.4 |       |     | 8.4  | 3.4               | 3.1                        | 3.0          | 4.6                                   | 54.5                        | 55.0                                      |
| 6.4 11.4 23.8 15.4 5.0 6.6 5.4 5.3 4.9  | 23.8 15.4 5.0 6.6 5.4 5.3   | 15,4 5,0 6,6 5,4 5,3                    | 5.0 6.6 5.4 5.3                         | 5.4 5.3                         | 5.4 5.3     | 5.3               |     | 4.9   |     | 8.7  | 3.4               | 3.0                        | 3.3          | 5.2                                   | 52.2                        | 55.6                                      |
| 8.4 10.4 21.7 15.7 4.7 6.3 4.9 5.0 5.7  | 21.7 15.7 4.7 6.3 4.9 5.0   | 15.7 4.7 6.3 4.9 5.0                    | 4.7 6.3 4.9 5.0                         | 4.9 5.0                         | 4.9 5.0     | 5.0               |     | 5.7   |     | 9.8  | 3.4               | 3.2                        | 4.5          | 4.5                                   | 53.3                        | 53.7                                      |
| 7.0 10.4 23.3 15.5 4.8 5.6 5.2 5.1 6.7  | 23.3 15.5 4.8 5.6 5.2 5.1   | 15.5 4.8 5.6 5.2 5.1                    | 4.8 5.6 5.2 5.1                         | 5.6 5.2 5.1                     | 5.2 5.1     | 5.1               |     | 6.7   |     | 8.9  | 3.4               | 3.0                        | 5.7          | 5.8                                   | 56.1                        | 54.3                                      |
| 7.1 8.1 22.3 17.9 4.5 6.4 5.4 5.4 6.2   | 22.3 17.9 4.5 6.4 5.4 5.8   | 17.9 4.5 6.4 5.4 5.8                    | 4.5 6.4 5.4 5.8                         | 6.4 5.4 5.8                     | 5.4 5.8     | 5.8               |     | - 6.2 |     | 8.6  | 3.3               | 3.3                        | 6.5          | 4.4                                   | 55.3                        | 26.7                                      |
| 7.7 8.9 20.0 16.5 4.4 6.1 5.8 5.7 5.3   | 20.0 16.5 4.4 6.1 5.8 5.7   | 16.5 4.4 6.1 5.8 5.7                    | 4.4 6.1 5.8 5.7                         | 6.1 5.8 5.7                     | 5.8 5.7     | 5.7               |     | 5.3   |     | 9.2  | 3.0               | 3.1                        | 7.8          | 4.5                                   | 54.0                        | 54.0                                      |
| 8.3 8.8 20.2 15.9 4.8 6.6 6.4 5.8 5.8   | 20.2 15.9 4.8 6.6 6.4 5.8   | 15.9 4.8 6.6 6.4 5.8                    | 4.8 6.6 6.4 5.8                         | 6.6 6.4 5.8                     | 6.4 5.8     | 5.8               |     | 5.8   |     | 9.2  | 3.3               | 3.1                        | 5.0          | 4.7                                   | 53.8                        | 54.1                                      |
| 9.2 7.6 20.6 14.5 5.9 7.7 6.9 5.4 6.3   | 20.6 14.5 5.9 7.7 6.9 5.4   | 14.5 5.9 7.7 6.9 5.4                    | 5.9 7.7 6.9 5.4                         | 7.7 6.9 5.4                     | 6.9 5.4     | 5.4               |     | 6.3   |     | 7.8  | 3.5               | 3.2                        | 2.2          | 5.8                                   | 54.6                        | 52.0                                      |
| 11.2 7.2 18.8 13.2 6.0 6.5 7.4 5.0 6.4  | . 18.8 13.2 6.0 6.5 7.4 5.0   | 13.2 6.0 6.5 7.4 5.0                    | 6.0 6.5 7.4 5.0                         | 6.5 7.4 5.0                     | 7.4 5.0     | 5.0               |     | 6.4   |     | 8.0  | 3.2               | 2.9                        | 2.3          | 7.2                                   | 55.3                        | 50.0                                      |
| 10.0 8.0 17.2 13.2 6.1 5.6 7.0 4.4 7.5  | 17.2 13.2 6.1 5.6 7.0 4.4   | 13.2 6.1 5.6 7.0 4.4                    | 6.1 5.6 7.0 4.4                         | 5.6 7.0 4.4                     | 7.0 4.4     | 4.4               |     | 7.5   |     | 9.8  | 2.9               | 2.6                        | 3.0          | 8.6                                   | 53.7                        | 51.0                                      |
|   |   |   |   |                                 |             |                   |     |       |     |      |                   |                            |              |                                       |                             |   |

Table 7-4. Structure of External and Domestic Debt, 1991-2001

| YEAR | TOTAL EXTERNAL DEBT (MILLION $) | MEDIUM- ANDLONG-TERMEXERNAL DEBT(MILLION$) | SHORT-TERMEXERNAL DEBT(MILLION $) | SHORT-TERMEXTERNAL DEBTAS % OFTOTAL DEBT | TOTALDOMESTIC DEBT(BILLION TL) | TOTAL DOMESTIC DEBT (MILLION $) | DOMESTICDEBTAS % OFGNP | INTEREST PAYMENTS AS % OF TAX REVENUE |
|------|----------------------------------|---|--|--|--|----------------------------------|------------------------------------|---------------------------------------|
| 1991 | 50,489.0                         | 41,372.0  | 9,117.0                                    | 18.06  | 45,787.2                               | 10,980.5                         | 7.22                               | 30.61                                 |
| 1992 | 55,592.0                         | 42,932.0  | 12,660.0                                   | 22.72  | 149,688.8                              | 21,792.9                         | 13.56                              | 28.46                                 |
| 1993 | 67,356.0                         | 48,823.0  | 18,533.0                                   | 27.51  | 330,033.2                              | 30,041.4                         | 16.52                              | 44.07                                 |
| 1994 | 65,601.0                         | 54,291.0  | 11,310.0                                   | 17.24  | 841,400.0                              | 28,325.8                         | 21.64                              | 50.74                                 |
| 1995 | 73,278.0                         | 57,577.0  | 15,701.0                                   | 21.43  | 1,665,503.4                            | 36,439.9                         | 21.20                              | 53.13                                 |
| 1996 | 79,571.0                         | 62,226.0  | 17,345.0                                   | 21.80  | 4,625,420.5                            | 57,007.4                         | 30,88                              | 66.73                                 |
| 1997 | 84,797.0                         | 66,750.0  | 18,047.0                                   | 21.28  | 6,259,961.0                            | 41,339.4                         | 21.30                              | 48.00                                 |
| 1998 | 96,897.0                         | 75,680.0  | 21,217.0                                   | 21,90  | 14,254,323.0                           | 54,816.0                         | 26.63                              | 66.90                                 |
| 1999 | 102,980.0                        | 80,059.0  | 22,921.0                                   | 22.26  | 26,886,405.0                           | 64,386.1                         | 34.35                              | 72.40                                 |
| 2000 | 118,685.0                        | 90,384.0  | 28,301.0                                   | 23,85  | 36,420,600.0                           | 58,395.8                         | 28.91                              | 77.09                                 |
| 2001 | 113,592.0                        | 97,200.0  | 16,403.0                                   | 14.44  | 122,157,260.0                          | 99,686.0                         | 67.34                              | 103.26                                |

Sources: Hazine Müsteşarlığı, Hazine İstatistikleri 1980–1999, pp. 37, 68, and 71; http://www.hazine.gov.tr. (Compiled and interpreted by Hikmet Uluğbay)

agriculture, telecommunications, the state's system of letting out contracts, parliamentary immunity, and the judiciary to eliminate both waste and corruption. But it was impossible to undertake such a course, given the pervasive corruption in the system.

Because of the political and economic uncertainties, it was extremely difficult to attract direct foreign investments. The funds that did come to Turkey were mostly of the speculative kind and made the economic uncertainties worse. In a ten-year period, foreigners purchased $26.7 billion in shares, bills, and treasury bonds and against this repatriated $34.9 billion derived from these instruments. Of this sum, $10.7 billion left the country from November 2000 to May 2001, when Turkey suffered two financial meltdowns and the economy's fragility grew more acute (Milliyet, 1 August 2001, based on Central Bank statistics).

Despite all this, at the IMF's insistence, new measures were adopted to promote foreign investments, which seemed to be the only remedy to tackle the emergency. Privatizations were undertaken, as explained above, whereby public properties were sold in haste to anyone ready to bid. In addition, notwithstanding the arguments against the move and without regard to the opposition of the intelligentsia, the Constitution was amended on 13 August 1999 to allow the adoption in July 2001 of the law permitting the resort to international arbitration.

The salient features of international arbitration can be summarized as follows.

1. Although it has run into opposition in Turkey, arbitration has been used in other countries from time immemorial as a practical and expeditious method for settling commercial disputes by experts without betraying confidentiality. Under this system, in the event of a commercial dispute, the parties resort to the arbitrator or arbitrators of their choice rather than to the courts. The legal system that will apply and the procedure to be followed by the arbitrator are determined by the parties. The arbitrator has the task of settling the questions arising from the contract. In arbitration, everything revolves around the contract.

Arbitration was also resorted to in Turkey over many years. Under the established legal precedents of the Council of State (the highest administrative court), however, concession agreements could only be referred to the Council of State (on concessions, see Box1-4 in Section 1).

When foreign corporations objected to this, the Constitution was amended in 1999 so as to allow disputes arising from concession agreements to be referred to arbitration. This was done to facilitate privatization of public enterprises. The amendment involved the addition of a new sentence to article 125: "Provision can be made for referring disputes arising from the interpretation of contracts relating to concessions dealing with public services. Resort can be had to international arbitration if foreign parties are involved in the case."

"Foreign parties" meant that foreign credits had been obtained or some aspects of production were carried out with foreign inputs. This provision would also allow local firms to seek international arbitration on the grounds that foreign elements were involved in their operations. There was a general impression that this provision had been included at the behest of large Turkish media groups that were interested in investing in the energy and telecommunications sectors.

2. When the Constitution was amended in 1999, the following sentence was added to article 47: "The investments and services at present carried out by state economic enterprises or public legal entities that will become liable to be transferred through private legal agreements to real persons or private legal entities shall be determined by law." This provision would bring those concessions granted under the build, operate, transfer system within the private law framework, thus eliminating the concepts "public interest" and "the state shall have priority." This would block the possibility of taking such agreements to the Constitutional Court for annulment.

3. Another aspect of this question had to do with foreign dependency (from an interview with Professor Yücel Sayman). In the 1999 amendment, article 155 was also changed. Previously article 155 read: "The Council of State is charged with examining the draft statutes and contracts relating to concessions." The amended version reads: "The Council of State shall give its opinion on contracts relating to concessions dealing with public services within two months and shall examine the draft statutes."

The significance of the amendment was that the Council of State's opinion on whether there was a conflict with the concept of public interest was reduced to a purely advisory nature. The Council of State would render its opinion within two months, but it would not be binding. In these circumstances, a multinational corporation could apply pressure or resort to other methods of persuasion to influence government officials and its negotiating partners and seek an agreement that would serve its interests. After this, the arbitrator would only consider the agreement and its implementation.

By way of illustration, we can consider the following cases. Case 1: A foreign firm has built a dam and concluded a concession agreement for selling the water from the reservoir of the dam for a period of fifty years at a certain price. The firm can insert a provision in the agreement that the administration will have to pay it the amount of money equal to the total cost of water procured from any source. Case 2: A concession agreement has been concluded with a firm that will build a bridge and collect tolls from vehicles crossing it for fifty years to defray the cost of building the bridge. The firm can insert provisions in the concession agreement that will allow it to collect tolls from vehicles that use an alternative road that might have been built later by the administration.

Without a preliminary examination by the Council of State and the elimination of those elements in agreements that are not in the public interest, the situations illustrated in the two cases can easily occur. It will be recalled that the privileges and immunities granted to Americans in the 1950s led to a public reaction against the U.S. The multiplication of the illustrations cited above might well lead to another such public reaction in the future.

An Asymmetrical Relationship with the EU

In 1987 Turkey applied for full membership in the EU. The approach of both sides to this issue was equivocal, which led to a troubled relationship.

The EU had plenty of reasons to oppose the admission of Turkey. Turkey had a large population, high inflation, an economy that would collapse without foreign loans, an unstable political system, Islamist currents that were on the ascendancy, and a poor record on human rights. But above all Turkey displayed no political will to correct these shortcomings. It would hardly be rational for the EU to admit such a country, especially after 1990, when it was having difficulties in coping with previous expansions.

But the EU could not afford to ignore such a large market.

Turkey had many reasons to seek membership in the EU. The Western orientation of Ankara had always given direction to its foreign policy. Globalization was also pushing the country toward economic integration. In the 1990s Turkey felt itself somewhat isolated and did not want its foreign ties to be confined to just the U.S. After 1987 the economy took a turn for the worse, and the need to tap EU funds became more compelling. Membership would also help balance the advantages that Greece was deriving from its membership in the EU.

From 1960 to 1980 Turkish public opinion had been strongly against the EEC. Now the EU was being seen as salvation. Formerly, leftists had operated under the slogan "We shall be the Market and they shall be the Common Exploiters," meaning we will open up our markets and our partners will be the common plunderers of our resources if we join the EEC. Now they looked upon membership in the EU as the only way to be able to express their views without fear of becoming the victims of unidentified assassins or being hounded by the legal system. As for the Islamists, they abandoned the label of "Christian Club" attached to the European Union in their desire to secure a greater share for their growing "Green Capital" and business interests. The Islamists were aware that, even if they came to power, the regime would not allow certain practices like advocating the adoption of Sharia law, the wearing of the Islamic headscarf in parliament, the segregation of men and women, and so forth. At this stage, they wanted to enjoy the fresh wind of freedom and democracy that the EU would bring, while they gathered more support among the public. As for the ordinary citizens, their main concern was to improve their daily lot. Their dream was that, with Turkey in the EU, they could go to work in Germany or take a truckload of melons to sell in Brussels. Although they had scant knowledge about the EU, most people wanted EU membership for Turkey. A poll revealed that, while only 2% were informed about the EU, 68% were for membership.

But Turkey appeared to have no inclination to carry out the necessary changes for EU accession. Many customs and habits conspired to prevent change from taking hold in the country. It was unthinkable to transfer national sovereignty from the Turkish nation to a supranational body. It was difficult to abandon the rapacious economic system, even though communism had collapsed and the anti-Communist slogans could no longer be used as a cover to maintain this system, based on exploitation and instant riches for those who were well connected. Abandoning centuries-old customs in the name of civilization met with obstinate resistance. For many, introducing new freedoms carried the danger of encouraging Kurdish separatism.

To reconcile the divergent positions of the two sides, a compromise was found by which a customs union with Turkey would be established without any assurance that this would be followed by accession to the EU. This compromise would latch Turkey firmly to Europe economically. Europe was so eager to bind Turkey economically through the customs union that it chose to ignore the arrest and imprisonment of the members of the TGNA who belonged to the DEP (the mainly Kurdish Democracy Party). Turkey wanted the customs union, seeing it as a guarantee of future membership in the EU, even though the customs union made Turkey's trade deficit worse at the beginning. In 1995 the EU's share in Turkey's total trade deficit was 41%. In the first year of the customs union in 1996 this share had risen to 57% (İSO Raporu, p. 7).

In the meantime the EU sought to remind Turkey that the customs union would not lead automatically to accession. At the Luxembourg summit in 1997, it adopted a decision designed to dash Ankara's hopes of eventual accession that sent shock waves through Turkey. In the face of the strong reaction coming from Ankara, EU became concerned about alienating Turkey. Probably for this reason, it rectified its mistake at the Helsinki Summit in 1999, although no significant change had occurred in the past two years. The Helsinki decision raised Turkey's hopes of accession once again. Turkey had previously been offered a "carrot" in the form of associate membership in the Western European Union in the field of security. Now the same tactic was being employed in Helsinki. In the meantime the initial negative effect of the customs union on foreign trade had been surmounted; the deficit stood at 56% in 1998, 50% in 1999, and 45% in 2000.

Relations with the Hegemonic Power

The close relations with the U.S. that had been established in 1980 continued during this period in a more intensive form. Following the collapse of the USSR after 1990, the U.S. steered Turkey toward "filling the void." A feeling of euphoria took hold in Turkey. The Economist used the expression "the Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China" (Economist 297; see "Relations with the Caucasus and Central Asia" below). Demirel used this expression in February 1992, after which it became a cliché that was abandoned with the restoration of realism only when Russia started reasserting its presence in the region.

The U.S. continued to give the impression of supporting the Baku-Ceyhan oil pipeline that would allow Caspian oil to flow to world markets through Turkey. It also supported Turkey's efforts to accede to the WEU and the EU and backed Turkey's efforts to establish links with Europe's security and foreign policy arrangements (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" below). The U.S. never resorted to the tough methods of the Europeans in the area of human rights. The concept of "strategic partnership" that it had rejected in the 1980s was revived in 1992 under the label of "enhanced partnership." The new trend was confirmed in 1999, when Bill Clinton came to Istanbul for the OSCE summit and expressed his strong support for Turkey.

But, above all, the U.S. worked closely with Ankara in this period to suppress the PKK, Turkey's most serious domestic and external problem. In the early 1990s Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sandan Sanda

Washington reversed its previous policy of refusing to deliver Cobra helicopters, thus helping to speed up the military defeat of the PKK. This was at a time when EU countries were loudly protesting the use in southeastern Turkey of armored personnel carriers that had been delivered through the OSCE's system of arms transfers known as "cascading." In the light of the European attitude, the U.S. delivery of Cobra helicopters was all the more noteworthy. It is quite probable that the U.S. was also instrumental in persuading Syria to deny sanctuary to Ocalan in the process that resulted in his expulsion from Syria in October 1998. Had Syria refused to comply with Turkey's demand that Öcalan be expelled, it would have been difficult for Turkey to carry out its threat to resort to force. Again, it was most likely through Washington's action that the Europeans were persuaded to deny Öcalan asylum in Europe, which would have posed the serious risk of internationalizing the PKK issue, which Turkey wanted to avoid. Finally, it was probably the U.S. that traced Öcalan to Kenya and had him delivered to a Turkish aircraft that flew him back to Turkey on 15 February 1999. It would have been very difficult to carry out such a complex operation successfully without the active cooperation of the hegemonic power that had the capability to monitor worldwide telecommunications through the Echelon system.

Why was the U.S. being so helpful to Turkey?

- 1. To control Eurasia, the U.S. needed Turkey. The U.S. was anxious to prevent Russia from reasserting its control over this region and appropriating the region's vast energy resources.
- 2. After the Cold War, the U.S. needed NATO and wanted its mission to continue in order to maintain its position as the hegemonic power. Conflicts in the Eurasian region and violations of human rights in the Balkans made this possible for the U.S. Humanitarian interventions would allow NATO to extend its activities out of area (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" below). This required the cooperation of a strategic medium power like Turkey with an army stronger than itself that was located at a critical geostrategic location and ready to act as a pivotal state.
- 3. To control a major nuisance like Saddam Hussein, it was necessary for the Provide Comfort flights to operate from reliable bases in Turkey. This U.S. intervention in northern Iraq allowed an embryonic Kurdish state to emerge in that region. Any Turkish misgivings over this development were assuaged by the capture of Öcalan.
- 4. In the precarious Middle East Peace Process, Turkey was needed to support Israel. After Öcalan was apprehended, the U.S. gave Turkey the opportunity to resolve the Kurdish issue and stop worrying about the PKK. By carrying out reforms in this direction, Turkey would gain strength in the Middle East.

5. It was difficult for Ankara to oppose the U.S. unless its vital interests were threatened. Its economy was in a parlous state and completely at the mercy of the IMF, where the U.S. wielded great influence.

As for Turkey, it was grateful to the U.S. at a time when its geostrategic importance had disappeared with the dissolution of the USSR, when the EU was snubbing it, and when its economic woes had pushed it into a corner. Turkey was in no mood to stand up to NATO's extension of its mission out of area. Ankara not only supported the U.S. approach but also gave its backing to all of the international interventions in which Washington took part. In Somalia, the commander of the UN force was a Turkish general. Turkey sent soldiers and aircraft to Bosnia, supported the bombing of Yugoslavia, and contributed soldiers to the multinational force sent to Kosovo. Prior to the intervention in Afghanistan, it opened its airspace and its air bases to the U.S. and sent its forces to Afghanistan in 2002.

B. The Aftermath of the Disintegration of the USSR and Turkish Foreign Policy

Just as the disintegration of the USSR and of the Eastern Bloc resolved many problems confronting Turkish diplomacy, it also created some new ones. These events called for a thorough restructuring of Turkish foreign policy.

1. Fluctuations in Turkey's Importance

Because Turkey's foreign policy was primarily geared to the East-West conflict, its geostrategic importance was bound to undergo fundamental changes with the disintegration of the USSR. While Turkey's importance diminished in one respect, it was also enhanced by new developments.

Following the collapse of the USSR, Turkey no longer had a common border with Russia, the USSR's successor. Russia was absorbed in its domestic problems. Turkey now enjoyed the luxury of sharing the Caucasus with its newly independent neighbors, all of them weak. The same held true for its other borders. As its neighbors grew weaker, Turkey's relative strength increased indirectly.

Against this, the disintegration of the USSR directly reduced Turkey's importance. Europe now had two buffers. Europe saw that it could contain the Yugoslav crisis and deflect its effects eastward and southward. Thanks to America's control of the Middle East, Europe knew that it would face no problems with its oil supplies. It realized that Turkey was incapable of having a tangible effect on the course of events and tensions in Eurasia. This meant that Europe felt no need to admit Turkey into the WEU or the EU and that its interest in Turkey would remain confined to the customs union. The situation was not all that different from the U.S. perspective. It looked as if the U.S. would not get involved in Russia's affairs as long as Moscow did not encroach on America's global interests.

2. Human Rights and the Kurdish and Armenian Questions

With the collapse of the USSR, the West now reigned supreme in the world. The problem for Turkey was that its regime refused to get rid of the authoritarian effects of the 12 September coup and thus left it exposed to Western pressures. These pressures were in the areas of human rights, the Armenian bills in Western legislatures, and the Kurdish question.

Although the most serious human-rights violations took place during the 12 September period, the Europeans did not press Turkey too hard in the 1980s. Thereafter, the pressure was greatly stepped up for a number of reasons. Turkey was slow in carrying out reforms, the Kurdish and Armenian questions were agitating European public opinion, and the USSR and its bloc had disappeared from the political scene. There was no more need to be indulgent toward Turkey out of a sense of bloc-solidarity. Europe no longer needed Turkey for its security, and questions of human rights became the priority issue in the new era. During this period violations of human rights would become the most serious issue confronting Turkish diplomacy.

The Kurdish question was completely entwined with the issue of human rights violations and became Turkey's main domestic and external problem from the end of the 1980s until about 1994. In the course of the war raging in the southeast, human rights were ignored and villages were forcibly evacuated or burnt. These and similar practices gave rise to growing hostile reactions in Europe, which were fed by the PKK's military successes. Various national legislatures and international bodies adopted resolutions that placed Turkey in an increasingly embarrassing situation. As the number of causalities on both sides increased and reached the figure of 30,000, it became progressively more difficult to describe these events as terrorism. It was also no longer possible for Turkish authorities to satisfy questions on Ankara's methods and proposed solution with the cliché answer: "This is a question of terrorism. Once terrorism is taken care of, the problem will disappear."

Turkey was also suffering from the heavy financial burden imposed by the conflict. According to various estimates coming from well-placed individuals like cabinet ministers and professional organizations, the cost of the conflict over a period of ten years amounted to $100 billion, including the cost of military operations, weapons, and preventive measures. The professional organization representing architects and engineers declared that Turkey had spent somewhere around $60–70 billion for this purpose and produced a long list of projects that could have been carried out with this huge sum (Cumhuriyet, 15 November 1998 and 4 July 1999). The deficit of the 1992 budget in the amount of $4.2 billion had grown to $9.2 billion a year later.

The ASALA assassinations came to an end in this period, but an equally vexing campaign of Armenian-inspired parliamentary bills began. Turkey's image suffered when a number of provincial elected bodies and national parliaments adopted resolutions declaring that the events of 1915 constituted genocide. In November 2000 the European Parliament also adopted a similar resolution.

These Armenian bills were instigated by the Armenian diaspora. For the diaspora, Turkey's main challenger concerning the horrors of 1915, this was a highly profitable activity with no costs involved. It allowed the diaspora to enhance its political effectiveness in the host country and also enabled its members to preserve their ethnic identities by espousing what was considered to be a national cause. The same held true for the host country. The bills provided many benefits at no cost. By voting for the bills, politicians guaranteed the support of a segment of the electorate while at the same time acquiring a political and even an economic lever that could be used against Turkey. A company seeking a contract in Turkey could enhance its competitive position by working to block the adoption of an Armenian draft bill.

The victims of these resolutions were primarily Turkey but also Armenia. Turkey was frequently forced to engage its diplomats full-time for months in often fruitless attempts to prevent the passage of such bills. Given the number of countries in the world, no sooner was one problem dealt with than another emerged. As for Armenia, it was condemned to economic penury as a land-locked country with few resources that gave priority to hurting Turkey rather than to furthering its interests. The economic hardship helped strengthen the ruling Dashnak Party, which was fueling the anti-Turkish campaign. The prevailing situation was hurting both countries.

One person who realized this was Levon Ter-Petrossian, the politician who assumed power following Armenian independence. At first he followed a tough nationalist policy toward Turkey; but after a sober appraisal of the situation and probably with the prompting of his advisor Gerard Libaridian, he quickly changed tack. He did not allow a reference to genocide to be inserted in the Constitution, banned PKK activities, stopped the operations of the Dashnak Party and had its leadership prosecuted for trafficking in narcotic drugs, and dismissed the anti-Turkish foreign minister, Raffi Hovanissian. Above all, he undertook foreign trips to get the diaspora to end its anti-Turkish rhetoric. But Turkey failed to open its border in response to Ter-Petrossian's overtures because of the efforts of the Islamist and racist Right as well as the influence of Azerbaijan, which was motivated by the occupation of Nagorno Karabakh by Armenia. Although Ankara took rational steps such as providing electric power to Armenia and supplying food aid, it also insisted as a precondition to opening the border that Armenia evacuate Nagorno Karabakh, as if this had been Turkish territory. The Armenian public reacted when Ter-Petrossian's moderate policies eventually failed to achieve results. He was ousted, probably with the involvement of Russia. He was succeeded by Robert Kocharian of the Dashnak Party. From then on, the number of Armenian bills proliferated, causing Turkey many headaches.

The Armenian bills were a major preoccupation for certain state institutions and were hurting Turkey's international image. At a time when the economy was facing difficulties, the bills also damaged Turkey's relations with its creditors. The minister in charge of the economy, Kemal Derviş, had to go to countries with which Turkey was barely on speaking terms to seek loans and direct investments. The bills also harmed Turkey's security. When an American firm refused to deliver the avionics in F-16s that helped identify friends and foes, the contract went to a French firm in 2000 to supply this equipment. This contract was suspended in January 2001, however, because of an Armenian bill in the French parliament (Milliyet, 26 February 2001).

Turkish institutions, including universities, reacted to the bills in highly irrational and emotional ways. When the French parliament acknowledged the Armenian Genocide in January 2001, a university in Ankara eliminated the teaching of the French language from its curriculum (Sabah, 21 January 2001), doing further damage to Turkey's image. Some of the canceled contracts and boycotts initiated against EU countries recognizing genocide led them to threaten Turkey with demands for compensation. TÜSİAD warned the government not to proceed in this direction, while the EU Commission declared that the measures against France were excessive (Cumhuriyet, 3 February 2001). Even the relatively mild reaction against the irrational measures taken in Turkey was an indication that these measures were not taken seriously, a further sign of the country's eroding prestige.

The Armenian question and the boycotts and canceled contracts that ensued from it increased Turkey's dependence on the Jewish lobby and, indirectly, on Israel.

During this period the only rational approach to the question came from the MFA at the end of 2000, when it proposed a three-stage campaign to neutralize the Armenian diaspora: (1) The border trade with Armenia would be encouraged and harbor facilities on the Black Sea and other economic benefits would be provided to alleviate Armenia's economic hardship in order to neutralize the influence of the Dashnak hard-liners. (2) An international or bilateral process would be set in motion to discuss the claims of genocide within an academic framework. (3) The problems of the Armenian minority in Turkey would be addressed (see Box 1-30 in Section 1).

When this proposal was taken up in the cabinet, however, Prime Minister Ecevit inquired about Azerbaijan's possible reaction. The plan was postponed to allow for consultations with Baku (Barçın İnanç, in Milliyet, 10 December 2000). This demonstrated that Turkey's Armenian policy had become a hostage to Baku. Nevertheless, the MFA sought to conduct an indirect dialogue with Armenia through private organizations like TESEV (Economic and Social Studies Foundation of Turkey) (Cumhuriyet, 16 February 2001).

Despite these rational efforts, Turkey continued its previous practices of celebrating the anniversaries of the liberation of towns from Russian/Armenian occupation in World War I by reenacting the confrontation of national militias and Armenian irregulars in mock battles and by erecting a 43-meter monument to the "Victims of Armenian Genocide" at Iğdır in eastern Turkey, which cost 4 trillion TL at 1999 prices (Cumhuriyet, 12 December 2000). In other words, Turkey kept on losing precious time and providing cheap ammunition to the Armenian diaspora.

3. The Sevres Syndrome

The disintegration of the USSR brought about radical changes in Turkey's threat perception.

In the years when the Eastern Bloc was coming apart in the first half of the 1990s, the PKK threat reached its peak and the Armenian bills were constantly on the agendas of Western countries. At the same time, political Islam (toward which the West had adopted a relaxed attitude) continued to gather strength in Turkey until it eventually came to power in a coalition with the True Path Party (DYP).

The disappearance of the USSR during these years meant that Turkey had lost a significant part of its value to the West and was acutely aware of this loss. The apprehension was made worse by events taking place in the region. In 1993 Greece and the Republic of Cyprus (Southern Cyprus) proclaimed their Joint Defense Doctrine. In 1995 Greece concluded an agreement with Syria and Russia, while Russia concluded an agreement with Iran. In February 1995 Syria, Iraq, and Iran decided to develop their trade; and in June 1996 Greece reached an understanding with Iran. In 1994 a Kurdish House was set up in the vicinity of Moscow. In 1995 permission was granted for a meeting of the "Kurdish Parliament in Exile" to be held in Russia. Syria and Iraq kept pressing Turkey on the issue of water rights. Concern was growing over the possibility that the U.S. was seeking to set up a Kurdish state in northern Iraq by means of Operation Provide Comfort, which some claimed was assisting the PKK. Demirel referred to it as a "running sore" and a "can of worms" (Oran 1998, pp. 126 and 142).

In this atmosphere, a fear of coming apart that came to be known as the "Sèvres syndrome" took hold in Turkey. Many people in high positions started muttering that the Western allies, in collaboration with Turkey's neighbors, were intent on splitting Turkey by seeking to resuscitate the Treaty of Sèvres. This public concern was reinforced by the news that Middle Eastern countries possessed missiles capable of hitting Ankara, and these fears were duly echoed by the media and the general public. A series of articles appeared in the daily Milliyet from 2 to 4 December 1994. The author of the articles, retired ambassador Şükrü Elekdağ, claimed that Turkey was being forced to fight on two and a half fronts: with Greece, with Syria, and with the PKK, which was supposed to represent the lesser front.

At the same time, Turkey presented itself as the country that would bring stability to the region, claimed the title of regional power, resorted to slogans like "the twenty-first century will be the Turkish century," and talked of the "Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China." Turkey also purchased two aerial refueling tanker aircraft to extend the range of its air force. There was a constant stream of delegations and visitors coming from and going to the Caucasus and Central Asia. Özal remarked casually: "What if a bomb was accidentally dropped on Armenia in the course of military exercises?" (http://query.nytimes.com/gst/fullpage.html? res=9FoCE5DB163oF93BA25757CoA96595826o&sec=& spon=&pagewanted=all). It was against this background that the notion that the National Pact (see Section 1) was a constricting vise took hold and the "New Ottomanism" current became fashionable.

Was Turkey really confronted with a plot to bring about its disintegration or was it the loose talk about being a regional power that drew adverse reactions from neighbors? This is a moot question. The truth is that Turkey actually did have the perception that a master plan to bring about its disintegration existed somewhere. It felt itself to be the target of internal forces threatening its regime and external forces threatening its territorial integrity. It was this psychological state that drove Turkey to become seriously close to the U.S. and Israel. In January 1995 Ankara announced that Israel would assist Turkey in modernizing its F-4 fighter aircraft, in combating the PKK, and in shoring up its economy.

To a large extent, Turkey would free itself from this "syndrome" following the capture of Öcalan in February 1999, only to return to it at the end of 2004 with a strong reaction to the EU Harmonization Packages.

4. New Initiatives in Turkish Foreign Policy

With the disintegration of the USSR, new states emerged in the Balkans, the Caucasus, and Central Asia. Although this situation was a novel experience for Turkey, it played an active part during this process and did not commit serious blunders.

Ankara proceeded with caution in the Balkans to avoid reviving memories of the Ottoman Empire. It refrained from taking unilateral initiatives; sided with the Bosnians, who were universally perceived with sympathy; and participated in joint actions undertaken by the U.S. As a result of this policy Turkey also gained an advantage over Greece in the region.

Ankara followed a more assertive course in the Caucasus and Central Asia. First, it sent exploratory delegations to determine the tendencies of these countries, quickly granted recognition to them, and established official ties. Then came cooperation in the light of their requirements. Turkish Airlines established direct links from Turkey to their capitals. The countries were provided with gifts in the form of digital telephone exchanges, enabling them to establish links with the rest of the world through Turkey. The capacity of the exchange provided to Kazakhstan was 3,500 lines, while the other exchanges had a capacity of 2,500 lines each. In all, 11,000 scholarships were granted to the Turkic states. They were also provided with loans and other financial assistance.

Turkey's patronizing attitude as the "elder brother" and its inability to deliver on economic commitments, however, led to estrangement. Russia's recovery also had a part in this, but in the main Ankara's approach was causing trouble. Turkey extolled independence (which irritated Russia), secularism (which irritated Iran), democracy (which irritated the leaders of the Turkic Republics, which were all relics of the USSR), and the market economy. Nevertheless, Turkey played a useful role in speeding up the integration of the newly independent states within the international community. To a certain degree, Turkey was able to alleviate its sense of isolation during this period thanks to its relations with the new states. These relations were also providing new economic opportunities.

Initially, these policies gave the impression that Turkey was abandoning its traditional pro-status quo policies. The truth was that a new status quo was coming into being, and Ankara was striving to make sure that its position in the new status quo was not less than before. Aside from Özal's Kirkuk-Mosul initiative, which was thwarted by the military-civilian bureaucracy and the media, Turkey never came close to making territorial claims.

Still, the newly independent states did carry certain risks for Turkey. As a consequence of the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis policies of the 12 September regime, the racist and religious Right was in the ascendancy. In this environment, the plight of Bosnia allowed the Islamists to exploit the issue to their advantage, just as the Turanian currents took advantage of Azerbaijan under the leadership of Elchibey to further their cause. This went so far that some quarters began to agitate for Turkish military interventions in Bosnia and Nagorno Karabakh without regard to the serious consequences that would ensue from such action. A Turanian clique in Turkey sought to engineer a military coup in Azerbaijan to topple the new president, Heydar Aliyev. This plot was foiled through a last-minute intervention. Chechen militants hijacked a ferryboat in the Black Sea carrying mostly Russian passengers. After their trial by a Turkish court, the hijackers got off with light prison terms and later were allowed to flee from prison. Parks and squares in Ankara and Istanbul were named after Dudayev, the slain Chechen guerrilla leader. All of this annoyed and alienated Russia. This situation was made worse when Chechen terrorists raided the Swissotel in Istanbul in 2001 and held a number of tourists as hostages. These militants too were handed down token sentences, probably due to the euphoria that followed the crushing of the PKK. According to a statement made by minister of state Abdülhaluk Çay and reported in the 24 August 2001 issue of Cumhuriyet, Turkey was borrowing from Western banks at 15% interest and lending to the Turkic states at rates ranging from 2.5 to 3%. Frequently, these loans were not repaid; but the damage to Turkish interests was less than the harm that was being done by antagonizing Russia.

IV. GENERAL APPRAISAL

A. Conditions in the Early Part of This Period

1. In the early part of the period Turkey was in a very unfavorable situation due to both internal and external factors.

The Internal Dynamics of the Period

First, Turkey entered the period suffering from the economic effects of the 12 September coup. The economy started faltering in 1987, and the situation got progressively worse as the country became ever more dependent on foreign aid. Second, the 12 September coup also aggravated the question of human rights and the Kurdish and Armenian questions. A third difficulty was dealing with the risks arising from Özal's opportunism, when he thought Turkey could reap fantastic economic benefits from the new situation in the Middle East. A fourth difficulty resulted from Özal's philosophy. In a speech he declared: "With the current policies we can never achieve major-power status. We will be condemned to remain a small country... Changing the status quo is the most difficult thing to do" (Cumhuriyet, 16 February 1991). With this, he was challenging one of the two pillars of Turkish foreign policy: to preserve the status quo by balancing opposing forces. Özal seemed to be unaware that Turkey was just a medium power and that it had to strive constantly to preserve even this status.

The External Dynamics of the Period

First, with the collapse of the USSR, Turkey lost its trump card in foreign policy: its geostrategic position. Second, now it had to face up to the fact that its policy of balance, followed since Ottoman times, could no longer be pursued. Western globalization had triumphed, both politically and economically, and a unipolar world had emerged. Ankara's traditional policy of balance was of no use in a unipolar world.

Box 7-7. The "Interpretative Declaration" regarding Human Rights

Turkey's internal dynamics are slow in creating momentum for democracy and human rights. This is why it has to resort to external dynamics to speed up the process. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs accedes to international conventions, which paves the way for the mandatory provisions of these conventions to be implemented in Turkey. Naturally, this process is far from being smooth, with several difficulties to overcome. Many quarters object to compliance on the grounds of "interference in Turkey's internal affairs."

This is why Turkey usually comes up with a very conservative interpretative declaration at the time when such conventions are signed. Technically such declarations cannot be in the nature of a reservation, which is why they are characterized as interpretative. The declarations are qualified as conservative because they are far from conforming to contemporary standards of human and minority rights.

In general, these interpretative declarations are formulated in the following terms: "Turkey reserves the right to interpret article X of the Y convention according to the Turkish Constitution and the provisions of the Treaty of Lausanne dated 24 July 1923."

This sentence means: If the rights contained in the convention we have signed and agreed to concern the rights restricted by the 1982 Constitution or concern our citizens other than non-Muslims, they will not be recognized. The Constitution of 1982 was amended six times up to 2002 and also once in 2004, however, and the only person left who still defends this document is the leader of the 12 September coup and former president, Kenan Evren. Furthermore, the fact that the Treaty of Lausanne considers only non-Muslims to be minorities is irrelevant, because the conventions in question relate to human rights rather than minority rights. Articles 38 to 43 of the Treaty of Lausanne also grant rights to those who are not minorities (see Box 1-31 in Section 1). Finally, Turkey constantly refers to 1923, but in EU parlance any people who consider themselves different from the majority and consider this difference to be an inseparable part of their identity belong to a minority.

It is no longer possible for Turkey to get away with the argument that the only minorities in the country are the non-Muslims. In fact, the interpretative declarations are considered to be null and void in international tribunals. The only thing to do is to emulate France, a country that is very sensitive about the issue of minorities. In recent years, France has extended individual liberties (i.e., democracy) to a maximum extent in order to make it unnecessary for minorities to demand rights as a group:

(B. ORAN) (Oran 2005, p. 49)

2. In the post–Cold War world, a number of conflicts erupted that allowed Turkey to reclaim its geostrategic importance in the eyes of the hegemonic power, the U.S.

B. The Salient Features of Foreign Policy during the Period

1. The chaos reigning in Turkey was fully reflected in its foreign policy. In the 838 months from April 1920 to February 1990, there had been 28 foreign ministers, with each minister serving for an average of 29.9 months. In the 88 months from February 1990 to June 1997, there were 11 changes of foreign minister, with each minister serving for an average of 8 months. Foreign policy requires specialization and experience, so this is disturbing.

Furthermore, some ministers during this period had no concept of foreign policy. Yet this was the period when—in addition to bilateral questions—the question of a customs union with the EU and the sensitive issue of NATO expansion (problems related to disintegration of the USSR and German reunification) arose. When Tansu Çiller was minister, she was so involved in domestic politics and the arguments over the sources of her personal wealth that she was hardly ever at her desk in the MFA, according to reports of diplomats serving under her.

In this period Turkey accepted international capitalism (the infrastructure imposed upon it by the West)

but put up great resistance to accepting the superstructure that was also being imposed: namely, democracy and human rights. That is why Turkey became economically dependent, while it was being forced into isolation politically, mostly by Europe. It should be considered a success story that foreign policy could be conducted without major damage to the country at a time of utter economic dependency and extreme political isolation. At the very least, it looked like Turkey would have to revise its approach to human rights and conform its practices to contemporary norms (Box 7-7).

3. On the surface, it looked like there had been no serious setbacks in foreign policy. The country had not been placed under serious risk, sovereignty had not been jeopardized, and irreversible concessions had not been made on the principles upon which foreign policy was based. But this impression is misleading for two reasons.

First, these things had not happened because Turkey's course was closely aligned to that of the hegemonic power, the U.S. Turkey's successful initiatives in the quadrangle of the Balkans, the Caucasus, Central Asia, and the Middle East took place at a time when the U.S. was also closely involved in these regions. The successful policies pursued in Bosnia, the relationship with the former Soviet Republics, cooperation with Israel, closer engagement with the Palestinians, and other such initiatives can be cited as examples. After the U.S. involvement in these regions waned, Turkey's interest remained confined to the EU and Greece, with which relations had become smoother. When conflict broke out again in the Balkans and in the Middle East in the early years of the new century, there were no initiatives from Turkey. A country that claims to be a medium-sized power should have well-developed policies, even if some of them are on broad lines, in connection with all issues affecting its interests and with respect to all regions. In particular, Turkey should have had a well-defined position on the human rights and Armenian issues, two of the major preoccupations of Turkish foreign policy.

This was a time when the government was so involved with domestic politics that foreign policy planning, even with respect to Cyprus, was being neglected. Furthermore, the planning that the MFA proposed to undertake on other important issues was being blocked. In December 2000, as already stated, the implementation of the ministry's Armenian plan was prevented on the grounds that Azerbaijan had to be consulted. The ministry was also rebuffed when it reminded the judiciary authorities that the verdicts of courts that were not in conformity with the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights were forcing Turkey to pay heavy fines. The judiciary considered this to be an interference in the legal process. The reminder from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs had in fact come when it transmitted the Turkish-translated texts of the decisions of the European Court to the judiciary organs.

Second, there are good reasons why no apparent fiascos occurred in connection with critical issues like Cyprus and the Aegean. The first reason was that the questions of major concern for Turkish foreign policy like Cyprus and the Aegean were no longer being taken up by Greece with its former zeal. With great skill, Simitis had passed this responsibility on to the EU.

The second reason was that the European Summit of Helsinki in 1999 had set up a calendar for dealing with these questions (see "Relations with the EU" and "Relations with Greece" below). Although the calendar did not contain specific dates, the resolution of the questions was postponed to a date that was not too distant.

The third reason was that the West appeared to allow the issues to come under the influence of creeping fatigue and the effects of the economic failures of Turkey. Fatigue was the consequence of the economic bankruptcy of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus, the increasing number of Cypriot Turks who were applying to the Republic of Cyprus for passports, their growing desire to become integrated with Europe, and other such developments. The connection between the resolution of these questions and Turkey's economic woes was more direct. The West knew that there would be a serious backlash if it pressed Turkey too hard on these issues. If Turkey was left alone, however, its economic woes would drive the country into a corner, and the questions would then be ripe for a solution.

4. As pointed out earlier, Turkey's loss of importance after 1990 was reversed as a consequence of the conflicts that erupted in its vicinity. In these circumstances, as long as Turkey steered a course that was closely aligned to U.S. positions, Ankara's policies would appear to be successful.

But this course posed three grave risks.

First, the U.S. was a hegemonic power and was determined to establish a "law of intervention." This was the essence of the policy of the New World Order. Turkey, however, was a strategic medium power that wisely based its foreign policy on a pro–status quo position that relied on balancing opposing forces. It challenged the status quo on two grounds, as long as they had nothing to do with territorial gain: (1) for defensive reasons, as in the case of the Cyprus intervention of July 1974; and (2) in situations that are in conformity with international law, such as the annexation of Hatay and the interventions that took place in northern Iraq from 1984 to 1988.

NATO's 1999 intervention in Kosovo was not defensive in purpose, however, and was illegal, lacking the UN Security Council's sanction.

The second risk was that the concept of humanitarian intervention, institutionalized at NATO's Washington Summit of 1999, might become a model for future interventions. In that event, Turkey could not disengage itself from such operations even if it wanted to and its foreign policy would be indexed to U.S. policies. This would carry the risk of turning a strategic medium power into a satellite (see the introductory chapter). This would be extremely harmful for Turkey. As a matter of fact, Turkey has not been able to overcome U.S. objections and open a second customs entry point to Iraq.

The third risk was in the economic field. For an economy that is at the mercy of foreign influences, this risk could not be underestimated. Turkey was more vulnerable to outside events than it was even in the period from 1950 to 1960. Turkey could easily find itself in an awkward situation where it is forced to do things against its will.

Sources (Appraisal of the Period)

- Boratav, Korkut. "Özelleştirme, Kaynak Transferleri ve Yozlaşma." In 75 Yılda Çarklardan Chip'lere, pp. 279–92. İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yayını, 1999.
- Gerger, Haluk. Türk Dış Politikasının Ekonomi Politiği, Soğuk Savaştan Yeni Dünya Düzenine. İstanbul: Belge Yayınları, 1998.
- İSO Raporu. Gümrük Birliğinin Ekonomik ve Sosyal Maliyeti: 1990'lı Yılların İkinci Yarısında Türkiye. İstanbul: İSO, 2001.
- Oran, Baskın. "Hangi Küreselleşme?" In Küreselleşme ve Ulus-Devlet (ed. Meryem Koray), pp. 49–59. İstanbul: Yıldız Teknik Üniversitesi Stratejik Araştırmalar Merkezi, 2001.
- ———. Kalkık Horoz, Çekiç Güç ve Kürt Devleti. Enlarged 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1998.
- ——. "Kemalizm, İslamcılık, Küreselleşme." SBF Dergisi 54, no. 2 (Apr.–June 1999): 133–62. (For the English version of this article, see "Kemalism, Islamism, and Globalization:

- A Study on the Focus of Supreme Loyalty in Globalizing Turkey." Journal of Southeastern European and Black Sea Studies [London] 1, no. 3 [Sept. 2001]: 20–50.)
- ———. Küreselleşme ve Azınlıklar. 4th ed. Ankara: İmaj Yayıncılık, 2001.
- ———. Türkiye'de Azınlıklar-Kavramlar, Teori, Lozan, İç Mevzuat, İçtihat, Uygulama. 2nd ed. İstanbul: İletişim Yayınları, 2005.
- Sönmez, Attila. "Türkiye'de 1950 Sonrası Sanayileşme Politikası Üzerine Gözlemler." In Bilanço 1923–1998, pp. 59–71. İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.
- Yetkin, Çetin. Türkiye'de Askerî Darbeler ve Amerika. Ankara: Ümit Yayıncılık, 1995.

Relations with the USA and NATO

After the Cold War, relations between Turkey and the U.S. continued to cover a broad range of issues even though the nature of the relations changed somewhat. The major factor that influenced their nature in the 1990s was the developments that took place in the structure of international relations. The foreign policies of both the U.S. and Turkey underwent important changes in the new conditions that followed the ending of the Cold War.

The global changes taking place added new dimensions to the relations of the two countries and transformed these relations in ways that we shall examine later. The essence of these relations was unchanged, however, and their foundations and general direction remained as before for two basic reasons.

- 1. The bonds of alliance between the two countries were based on strategic and political cooperation. In this period Turkey continued to be a close ally of the U.S.
- 2. Another factor that kept relations on a steady course was that the issues of the past remained unchanged in this period. Among these issues were the question of Cyprus, economic and military aid, the U.S. approach to the Kurdish question, developments in northern Iraq, and the Armenian bills.

During this period some new international developments also brought the two countries closer together.

- 1. In the 1990s new fields of cooperation between Turkey and the U.S. emerged in Europe and specifically in the Balkans, in the Caucasus and Central Asia, and in the Middle East. Developments in these regions had a major effect on bilateral relations. As a result, it even became possible for the two countries to cooperate occasionally on contentious issues like Cyprus or the Kurds.
- 2. Another change that occurred in the 1990s was the emergence of the U.S. as the sole superpower. This change had a double effect on Turkey's foreign policy. On the one hand, Turkey sought to attain its foreign policy objectives by engaging in closer cooperation with the power that had emerged as the victor of the Cold War and wanted to preserve its global hegemony. On the other hand, the U.S. had increased its influence over Turkey's neighbors, including Russia, until Putin came to power. This prevented Turkey from seeking more freedom of maneuver in its foreign policy in the way it had done in the 1960s and 1970s. The initiatives that Turkey took in the Balkans and Central Asia were not alternatives to a foreign policy geared to the U.S. On the contrary, these initiatives were taken with Washington's support and cooperation. In this period Turkey's relations with the EU were extremely strained because of Ankara's unyielding position in the fields of democratization and human rights. This meant that Turkey had forfeited its room for maneuver vis-à-vis the U.S., which had a decisive effect on bilateral relations.

3. Globally the U.S. stand on the issues of human rights and democratization had shifted since the 1980s. Now the U.S. began to place a higher priority on these issues, and this was affecting Turkish-U.S. relations.

As a result, despite the frequent changes of government during this period and even when the Welfare Party made feeble attempts to make changes, relations with the U.S. followed a steady course. It can be said that the course of bilateral relations was set by international and regional developments rather than by the political leadership in Ankara.

Before examining bilateral relations, we shall look at the main features of U.S. foreign policy in the aftermath of the Cold War.

- I. MAIN FEATURES OF U.S. DOMESTIC POLITICS AND FOREIGN POLICY IN THE POST—COLD WAR ERA
- A. International Developments and Economic Revival

After the Republican tenure in power in the 1980s, the Democrats took over the U.S. administration in the 1990s. At the end of Reagan's second term in 1988, he was succeeded by his vice-president, George Bush. Bush's term coincided with the transition caused by the dissolution of the Eastern Bloc and the Gulf War. As a consequence, the Bush administration was forced to concentrate on foreign policy issues.

Bill Clinton took office in January 1993 and was reelected for a second term in 1996. During his administration the priority issue was the economy. To maintain its global hegemony, the U.S. had to reinvigorate its economy (see Box Intro-3 in the Introduction). The first thing to do was to tackle the budget deficit that appeared during the Reagan administration and got worse during the Bush administration. A new economic program was launched in 1993 to deal with this problem. The budget deficit amounting to 4.9% of GNP fell to 2.4% in 1995. While the growth of the GNP averaged 2.7% from 1991 to 1995, it averaged 4.3% from 1996 to 1999. By the end of the 1990s the U.S. budget had a healthy surplus, and ways were being sought to cool the economy.

The monetary policy being pursued attempted to raise productivity and curb inflation. The economic program also contained a "strategic trade policy" designed to devise a new strategy to boost exports. In this context, a set of principles was developed in cooperation with business interests in order to increase export possibilities. The new policies were implemented up to the mid-1990s and were based on the premise that, in the absence of the Eastern Bloc, gaining market share was more important than gaining territories. The aim was to use this strategic trade policy to keep former allies and other countries under U.S. control. In this framework, the U.S. concluded over 200 trade agreements. The target was to raise U.S. exports to $1.2 trillion by the year 2000. This would create 16 million extra jobs in the U.S. As a matter of fact, U.S. exports reached the trillion-dollar level at the end of the period, which meant that the share of foreign trade in the U.S. economy rose from 24% in the 1980s to 30% in the 1990s.

During the Cold War, the U.S. had taken the leadership of the West in the struggle against the Eastern Bloc. It had assumed a heavy burden of defense spending and established bases in many strategic regions of the globe. In a way, the U.S. was now seeking to make up for the economic losses it had incurred in the process of winning the Cold War.

After the mid-1990s the economic objectives had been largely attained, but regional instability continued to reign in places like the Balkans. This led the U.S. to revert to a geostrategic approach and reassertion of its political and military leadership even while it continued its policies that stressed the economic dimension (Box 7-8). As we shall see later, this new approach would affect Turkey's place and importance for the U.S.

B. The Search for a New Strategy

A major debate was going on among American scholars, strategists, and politicians over the sort of foreign policy that the U.S. should follow in the new international environment of the 1990s. In the aftermath of the Cold War, the U.S. saw itself as the sole superpower and wanted to make sure that all others agreed.

America's self-confidence soared when the Eastern Bloc disintegrated in the 1990s and the West emerged victorious under U.S. leadership. In the 1970s and early 1980s books were being written like the one by Paul Kennedy entitled The Rise and Fall of the Great Powers (1987), which argued that the U.S. had entered a period of decline. Now the emphasis was on U.S. supremacy as the sole global power. In 1989 Francis Fukuyama declared in The End of History that liberalism had established its undisputed superiority over other ideologies. In his article entitled "The Clash of Civilizations," which appeared in the journal Foreign Affairs in 1993, Samuel Huntington gave expression to the need to find a common enemy to preserve the cohesion of the West. Huntington maintained that henceforth conflicts would be between civilizations, based on religion and culture. In The Grand Chessboard (1997) Zbigniew Brzezinski described the strategic foundation upon which U.S. supremacy would rest. In his book Diplomacy (published in 1994) Henry Kissinger analyzed the search for a global balance of power in the post-Cold War era.

These works shared three things in common. All of the authors either came from the U.S. administrations or were in close contact with them. They all claimed that the U.S. was the sole superpower and henceforth global developments would be given direction by Washington. Finally, they all implied (and Huntington said so explicitly) that without U.S. leadership the world would be plunged into chaos.

At the end of the Cold War, the possible courses for U.S. foreign policy were classified under the following headings: (1) neo-isolationism, (2) primacy, (3) cooperative security, and (4) selective engagement.

In this period the approach that drew the most heated debate was whether the U.S. should abandon its international engagements and concentrate on its domestic problems. This approach was known as neo-isolationism or America First. It was based on the argument that the struggle against communism had been won and so, having completed its mission, the U.S. could now turn to domes-

Box 7-8. The Changing U.S. Foreign Policy Strategies: Geopolitics and Geoeconomics

The geopolitical and geoeconomic approaches have always been present in the foreign policy strategies of the U.S.

The U.S. went into action even before the end of World War II to ensure peace under its hegemony. In 1944 it set up the IMF, the World Bank, and the Exim Bank. In 1947 it was instrumental in the establishment of GATT, which sought to liberalize international trade. In 1948 the U.S. helped restore the capitalist system in Europe through the Marshall Plan, while it cultivated capitalism and democracy in Japan and Germany, turning these former totalitarian countries into peaceable societies.

The tug-of-war between the USSR and the USA after 1945 led directly to the Cold War. The Cold War in turn led to the establishment of blocs, pushing geoeconomics into the background. As a result, geopolitical policies became dominant. In accordance with the logic of geopolitics, the U.S. encircled the USSR with air fields, bases, and listening posts. Both sides established military alliances, developed weapons of mass destruction, and pressed their respective allies to build up their armed forces. The conflicts that they supported in Asia, the Middle East, and Africa resulted in thousands of deaths.

When it became apparent in the mid-1980s that the USSR would collapse, there was a letup in the pursuit of geopolitical policies. In 1991 geoeconomic policies were reinstated; and new strategies developed. In the knowledge that it would be unchallenged militarily until 2020, the U.S. started dismantling many of the bases surrounding the Russian Federation. The new strategy was to establish a network of democratic countries bound together by the market economy. Democratic countries with interdependent economies trading with one another would not go to war. The, "New World Order" would be built upon the "commercial state" (see Box Intro-13 in the Introduction).

The establishment of economic organizations like the EU, the development of the Pacific market under Japan's leadership, and the creation of NAFTA all facilitated the attainment of U.S. objectives. Regional disputes and conflicts would henceforth be resolved by regional powers supported by the U.S. The era of ideological conflicts was over. The new system was described by scholars like Francis Fukuyama and Samuel Huntington.

The new U.S. strategy based on geoeconomics and operating within the New World Order was not able to achieve peace, however. The liberalization movement led to the emergence of ethnic conflicts. Developing countries came into possession of weapons of mass destruction. Islamist movements in Muslim countries became involved in terrorism. As free trade expanded, transnational organized crime developed in step. Regional economic groupings acquired a tendency to turn inward and protect themselves with high-tariff walls. China took its place in the international scene as a future great military and economic power. In the face of these developments, the U.S. is reverting to geopolitical strategies:

(H. Köni)

tic issues. This approach became meaningless, however, when the U.S. found itself involved in the Gulf War.

The approach known as primacy argued that to preserve international security the U.S. must maintain its primacy in the global system. The U.S. must be the sole superpower; but, at the same time, the world must be able to perceive the U.S. as a benign power. Joseph Nye and Samuel Huntington described this as soft power. In other words, the position of superpower had to be preserved not by overriding the opposition of other countries, but with their active support. In this way, they could be prevented from ganging up against the U.S.

Cooperative security called for the U.S. to share international responsibility with its allies and make use of organizations like the UN, NATO, and OSCE and others that might have to be created.

Selective engagement called for the U.S. to be concerned only with those countries and regions that might threaten the U.S. or with countries and regions in which a conflict breaking out might directly affect the U.S. In the first category were Russia, Europe, Japan, and China. The advocates of this policy would include the Balkans and the Middle East among the regions to be selected because of the possibility of the conflicts in these regions spreading and because of their strategic importance.

A study of the statements of high-level U.S. officials and the publications of the State Department and the White House and the observation of U.S. policies over the decade reveals that the U.S. resorted to all of the abovementioned approaches except for isolationism.

In 1993 an approach began to be developed that took concrete form in 1995 when it was published as a security document under the title "Engagement and Expansion: National Security Strategy." This showed that the debates over different approaches had been formalized into foreign policy principles.

The principle of expansion was a substitute for the former concept of containment and included economic factors like free trade and investment possibilities and political factors like the spread of democracy and human rights. These policies were pursued especially in the former socialist countries. This approach was also known as the New Wilsonism. As democratization spread and human rights became entrenched, stability would be reinforced and the countries benefiting from this trend would become peace loving. According to this approach, the U.S. should strive for open markets and open societies everywhere.

As for engagement, it had a connotation of selectivity. The U.S. did not want to be the world's sheriff. According to the Presidential Decision Directive issued in May 1994 (known as PDD-25), the U.S. would intervene in two specific instances: (1) in a situation that directly threatened its interests, the U.S. would intervene unilaterally; (2) if the interests of allies were also affected, intervention would be carried out with their participation. In the latter case, the operation would be under U.S. command, the operation's chances of succeeding had to be rated high, and there had to be an exit strategy. The third guideline assumed that the problem that caused the intervention would have been solved prior to the exit. In May 1997 the Pentagon confirmed the strategy elaborated earlier and added new elements such as early response to crises, establishing a favorable strategic environment for the U.S., and increased preparedness to deal with future threats.

In all its interventions during the period—the Gulf War, Somalia, Bosnia, northern Iraq, and Kosovo—the U.S. acted within the concept of collective security and cooperated with its allies. But in the final analysis the U.S. led the forces that were involved and determined the timing, the strategy, and the weapons to be employed.

The U.S. operated on the basis of two concepts in the context of its regional policies: major regional contingency and minor regional contingency. The aim of the strategy was to have the capacity to deal simultaneously with two contingencies. This was designed to thwart those who might want to profit from U.S. involvement in a contingency by engaging in an anti-U.S. military operation. Examples of minor regional contingencies were northern Iraq and Bosnia. At the end of the 1990s Kosovo was added to this list.

In this decade the U.S. policy was to establish its primacy in international affairs and create an environment that would serve its interests. U.S. strategic documents stated that Washington wanted to see no rivals, either global or regional. This was demonstrated in the way in which the U.S. dealt with the EU, Japan, China, and India.

The U.S. and the EU

For the U.S., Europe held a special place. The U.S. shared the same religion and culture with Europe, upheld the same political and social values, and, in the course of the twentieth century, fought twice on European soil. In the Cold War, it was vitally important for the U.S. that Western Europe remain strong in the face of the Eastern Bloc.

After the Cold War, Europe had a central place in the U.S. policy of expansion and engagement. For the U.S., Europe was a bridgehead to Eurasia. The U.S. was eager to keep Russia in the Western system and thereby prevent it from forming an alliance with China or India. Consequently, the U.S. encouraged Russia to set up close links with Europe.

In the post-Cold War period, the U.S. went about reinforcing its ties to Europe within an institutional and conceptual framework. Starting in January 1994, U.S. and EC officials began to work on a new concept of Atlantic cooperation. As a result of this effort, Clinton and the president of the European Commission signed an agreement in Madrid in December 1995 by which they set up a New Transatlantic Agenda. This new construction, also called the New Atlantic Community, had the dual aim of developing trade relations and engaging in political cooperation.

A noteworthy aspect of U.S.-EU relations was the U.S. support for the process of deepening and enlarging the EU. The U.S. saw an economically developed and stable Europe as essential for its security and prosperity. The U.S. was uncomfortable, however, over the European efforts to act as a distinct economic and political entity. Washington certainly did not relish seeing Europe as its rival. Consequently, it used the institutional, political, and economic means at its disposal to check Europe. The most important tool the U.S. had for this purpose was the NATO alliance and the U.S. force of around 100,000 troops stationed in Europe within the framework of the alliance. These developments are examined in greater detail under the heading "The Emergence of the New Defense Identity in Europe: The WEU, the CDSP, and Turkey" below.

The U.S., Japan, and the Far East

In the 1990s the U.S. displayed growing interest in the Asia-Pacific region and Japan, the world's most dynamic economic region. As in the case of Europe, the U.S. developed the concept of the New Pacific Community in 1993, designed to promote cooperation in the fields of economic relations, democracy, and the defense of human rights with the countries of the region. Another goal was to expand exports to the area and boost investments. The vehicle for carrying out these objectives was the strengthening of Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) in November 1993. Unlike the European integration, the U.S. was a founding member of this new economic structure along with Canada and Mexico. This allowed the U.S. to steer the institution along a path of its choosing.

Whereas the U.S. saw Europe as a potential political rival, it viewed Japan as an economic rival and forced it to open up its market by removing barriers to trade. This allowed U.S. products, including automotive products and communication equipment, to gain easier access to the Japanese market.

Another difference from the U.S. approach to Europe was that there was no alliance similar to NATO in the Far East. As in the case of Europe, however, 100,000 U.S.

troops were stationed in the region, concentrated mostly in South Korea and the Philippines.

Defense Spending and Disarmament

A sign that the U.S. was intent in preserving its global primacy was the high level of its defense spending during the 1990s. True, there was a reduction from the level of spending attained during the Cold War, when spending fluctuated between $270 and $300 billion in this period. Nevertheless, U.S. military spending in 1994 corresponded to the defense spending of Russia, China, Japan, France, and Germany combined. Some even claimed that the strategy of having the capability to conduct war simultaneously on two fronts was designed to justify high levels of military spending.

In short, the U.S. did not want to see others (especially Germany and Japan) enjoying strategic independence and took the necessary economic, political, and military steps to ensure its unrivaled supremacy. The U.S. wanted no competition and maintained its hegemony by engaging in cooperation with its potential rivals. Looking at the overall picture, the U.S. held control over Europe, Russia, the Caucasus, and Central Asia through economic and military ties, while it retained its influence in the Far East through its membership in APEC. By securing China's accession to the World Trade Organization, the U.S. was able to gain considerable influence over an important actor on the international scene. When the longstanding influence wielded by the U.S. over Latin America (now reinforced by NAFTA) is added to all of this, the extent of the U.S. global hegemony becomes more apparent. The U.S. wanted to prove its leadership to the EU and to Japan and China by intervening first in Bosnia and then in Kosovo, by taking part in the negotiations in Northern Ireland, by getting involved in Cyprus and Turkish-Greek problems, by seeking to overcome differences between the two Koreas and China and Taiwan, and by conducting the peace process in the Middle East.

Located in the Europe/Balkans, Middle East, and Caucasus/Central Asia triangle, Turkey was well placed and ready to engage in close cooperation with the U.S. in all three regions. As such, it became one of the principal U.S. allies in the 1990s.

II. THE OVERALL FRAMEWORK OF RELATIONS A. Turkey's Place in the Global Strategy of the U.S.

At the end of the 1980s Turkey was considered by the U.S. and other Western states to be a country that had lost much of its strategic value. But, with Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990 and the coup in the USSR in August 1991 leading to its disintegration in December, Turkey's strategic importance was restored. As we shall see later, the brief interlude between the loss of strategic value and its restoration would cause considerable anguish among Turkey's leadership.

From 1991 on, Turkey's place in the global strategy of the U.S. would improve steadily, because Washington needed Turkey to establish a firm grip on Eurasia.

An array of experts (including Graham Fuller, Ian Lesser, and Paul Henze, who were all close to the U.S. administration) kept affirming that Turkey must assume new roles in the broad swath of territory stretching from Yugoslavia to western China. In a report authored by these pundits and issued by the Rand Corporation in 1993 entitled Turkey's New Geo-Politics, Turkey was asked to assume an active role in the Balkans under its Muslim identity and in the Caucasus and Central Asia under its Turkish identity. Turkey could act as a political, economic, and strategic bridge in these regions. But this would not come about automatically. Ankara had to display the necessary will and actively pursue this objective. Henze went even further: he suggested that Turkey should redefine the concept of Ottomanism to enhance its effectiveness and coined the term "Neo-Ottomanism." This approach would find ready adherents in Turkey among right-of-center circles and even among some former leftist journalists. These adherents were particularly interested in an increased role for Turkey in the Balkans and northern Iraq.

The American strategist Zbigniew Brzezinski saw Eurasia as the prize for the victory in the Cold War and saw Turkey as a key player in this region. He described Turkey as a geopolitical pivot: a country that ensured stability in the Black Sea region, controlled the access to the Mediterranean, checked Russia in the Caucasus, acted as an antidote to Islamic fundamentalism, and served as the southern anchor of NATO. Turkey's new role in the region from Europe to China was reaffirmed throughout the 1990s, not just by pundits and experts but also by the U.S. administration.

In this period the U.S. attributed greater importance to Turkey's democratization and its record on human rights. This was a change from the relaxed U.S. approach of the early 1980s. This was mainly because, after the collapse of socialism, democratization became one of the main pillars of ever-growing globalization. Another reason was that the U.S. wanted Turkey to be a model for the former socialist lands in the Balkans, Caucasus, and Central Asia. For this reason, Washington supported the preservation of secularism in Turkey. At the same time, when the possibility of a coup against the Refahyol coalition emerged in 1996–97, the U.S. opposed this development as contrary to democratic practice.

Turkey's role as a model was not confined to the political realm. It also served as a role model in the economic sphere. Having completed its liberal economic reforms in the 1980s, Turkey approached the former socialist countries in the 1990s as a country experienced in the field that enjoyed U.S. backing.

B. From Alliance to Enhanced (Strategic) Partnership

Turkey had built up its relations with the U.S. and the West in general during the years of the Cold War by relying primarily on its strategic importance. When changes occurred in the global scene after 1989, Turkey briefly lost this strategic importance, causing anxiety among its decision-makers.

Certain developments occurring during this period compounded the fears of the Turkish leadership. One reason for concern was the EU's rejection in December 1989 of the Turkish application for membership made in April 1987. In the course of his visit to Washington in January 1990, President Özal proposed that the U.S. and Turkey conclude a free trade agreement. The U.S. failed to respond to Özal's proposal and also announced that it intended to close some of its bases in Turkey and started reducing the number of its military personnel. Even though the U.S. was also closing bases elsewhere (such as in the Philippines and Greece), citing budgetary reasons, the U.S. action worsened Turkish anxieties. In the preamble of the DECA signed with Greece in July 1990, the U.S. had agreed to insert a phrase that guaranteed Greece's territorial integrity. The U.S. also turned down Ozal's proposal, made during his visit to Washington in March 1991 right after the Gulf War, to engage in "strategic cooperation" (http://www.hurriyetusa.com/haber/haber detay.asp? id=5757). His request for aid in the amount of $1 billion to compensate Turkey for the losses it had suffered during the Gulf War was also turned down by Washington.

After the disintegration of the USSR at the end of 1991 and the emergence of the new republics in the Caucasus and Central Asia, however, the U.S. itself proposed a new version of the cooperation it had rejected a year earlier. In the course of Prime Minister Demirel's visit to Washington in February 1992, the U.S. came up with the concept of "enhanced partnership." The U.S. announced that it regarded Turkey as a "partner" and also a "model" for the newly independent republics of the Caucasus and Central Asia.

During this period U.S. policy toward Turkey was framed by secretary of state James Baker during President Bush's term and assistant secretary of state for European affairs Richard Holbrooke during President Clinton's term. Holbrooke held the view that Turkey was now a frontline state, somewhat like the position held by Germany during the Cold War. This meant that Turkey was an actor in all issues relating to NATO, the Balkans, Cyprus, the Aegean, Iraq, the Caucasus, Central Asia, and energy corridors. Holbrooke would be succeeded in Washington by Marc Grossman, former U.S. ambassador in Ankara, who would pursue the same policy with the full backing of the administration and the Pentagon.

Turkish-American bilateral relations continued to develop well during the 1990s and had reached a pinnacle by the end of the decade. Over time, the "enhanced partnership" of 1992 acquired new content. When prime minister Mesut Yılmaz visited Washington in 1997, bilateral relations were taken up under five headings: regional cooperation, economy and trade, energy issues, Cyprus, and defense and security cooperation. In 1999 a number of high-level visits took place that further reinforced relations. In April 1999 President Demirel went to Washington for the NATO Summit. This was followed by Prime Minister Ecevit's visit to Washington at Clinton's invitation. This time, the relationship was described as "strategic partnership." This relationship was confirmed during Clinton's visit to Turkey in November 1999 on the occasion of the OSCE summit.

The control of the co

In the course of the 1990s this "enhanced (strategic) partnership" was a constant feature of relations despite the frequently changing governments in Ankara. If anything, the relationship got stronger because it was proving mutually beneficial. For the U.S., Turkey was a country whose cooperation could be counted on in sensitive regions. For Turkey, the U.S. was a superpower whose support could be relied on in those regions. Close cooperation on regional matters was of utmost importance for both countries.

III. AREAS OF REGIONAL COOPERATION BETWEEN TURKEY AND THE U.S. AT THE END OF THE COLD WAR

Cooperation between Turkey and the U.S. included the issues where the two countries shared the same views, provided one another with political support, and, in certain cases, acted in unison. It must not be assumed that the two countries were always in identical positions. On many regional questions Turkey acted in partnership with

Box 7-9. The Gulf War

Although the invasion of Kuwait in 1990 is associated with Saddam Hussein's policies, the history of the problem goes back to July 1961, when Iraq announced its annexation of Kuwait but was soon forced to retract it:

After the conclusion of the Iran-Iraq War in 1988, Saddam claimed that Kuwait had stolen Iraq's oil by drilling into Iraqi territory. Baghdad also claimed that Kuwait had deliberately boosted oil output to depress the price of oil and inflict economic damage on Iraq. Baghdad asked its neighbor to write off Iraq's debts, ranging from $50 billion to $80 billion. When the negotiations on debt forgiveness got stalled, Iraq invaded and occupied Kuwait on 2 August 1990 and declared Kuwait to be Iraq's nineteenth province on 28 August.

Iraq failed to comply with the UN Security Council resolution calling on it to withdraw from Kuwait by 15 January 1991. This noncompliance unleashed the U.S. led allied bombing campaign on 17 January 1991. After an aerial bombing campaign lasting a month, the land offensive Operation Desert Storm was launched on 24 February. Within 100 hours, the Iraql forces were put out of action by the allied forces, consisting of the U.S., Britain, France, Italy, and others.

It was subsequently claimed that the U.S. had deliberately given Saddam the green light to invade Kuwait. The American ambassador told Saddam on 28 July 1990 that the U.S. would not get involved in inter-Arab disputes. Her departure from Baghdad two days later and the fact that no protest was made despite the massing of Iraqi forces on the Kuwaiti border were considered to be proof of complicity.

The gains that U.S. derived from this war can be cited as follows: by moving half a million soldiers to the Middle East and inflicting a crushing defeat on Iraq, the U.S. proved that it was the undisputed leader of the world and thereby overcame its Vietnam syndrome. The cost of the war was borne mostly by Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Germany, and Japan. The U.S. was able to get rid of a large part of its arms and ammunition that had either become obsolete or been made redundant by disarmament agreements. It was also able to try out and perfect many new weapons systems under real combat conditions. By not removing Saddam from power, the U.S. forced the conservative Gulf States to procure large amounts of American weapons. Finally, the U.S. caused the partitioning of Iraq into three distinct regions and imposed an embargo that seriously weakened Baghdad, allowing Washington to determine the flow of oil from Iraq and therefore its world price. It was during this war that U.S. president George Bush proclaimed the "New World Order Israel was relieved as a result of Irag's defeat, while the Palestine Liberation Organization faced great difficulties. After this, the U.S. would accelerate the Middle East Peace Process.

(İ. Uzgel)

the U.S., offered the means at its disposal, and engaged in active cooperation because it had no other alternative. Northern Iraq and Operation Provide Comfort were examples of Turkish cooperation that was only half-hearted. There were also issues like the Baku-Ceyhan oil pipeline and Bosnia-Herzegovina after Dayton, however, where the two sides' positions were identical and cooperation came naturally.

A. Turkey, the U.S., and the Middle East

In the post—Cold War era, U.S. policy in the Middle East pursued the following goals: maintaining control over oil resources and ensuring the uninterrupted supply of oil products to global markets; ensuring the survival of Israel; curbing the influence of radical Islam; containing Iran and Iraq; and preventing regional countries from acquiring weapons of mass destruction.

After the Gulf War of 1991, the U.S. became the undisputed power in the region. With Russia preoccupied with domestic problems, the only power that challenged U.S. hegemony in the region was the EU, led by France and Germany. But this challenge was hardly adequate. The Gulf States were grateful to the U.S. for removing the threat that Iraq posed. The Palestinians were in difficulties for having supported Iraq during the war and chose the route of reconciliation with Israel. Iraq was not only defeated but also lost control over an important part of its territory. The U.S. was pursuing the policy of "dual containment" in regard to Iran and Iraq. After having entered the Middle Eastern scene in the late 1940s, the U.S. was at the zenith of its power in the region and relied extensively on Turkish cooperation to attain this position.

1. The First Steps in Cooperation after the Cold War: The Gulf War

The invasion of Kuwait by Iraq under Saddam Hussein on 2 August 1990 came as a shock to the world (Box 7-9). Turgut Özal was president in Turkey at that time, and his prime minister was Yıldırım Akbulut. During that period Özal took direct control of foreign policy and often bypassed the MFA, the parliament, the armed forces, and even the government. With his so-called telephone diplomacy he tried to convey the impression that he exercised influence over President Bush's policy decisions. Özal sought to prove that Turkey was a strategically important country by conducting an active foreign policy. With such a policy, Turkey expected to extract trade and economic benefits from the U.S., accelerate its accession to the EU, gain economic advantages in the Gulf States, and become a major player in the restructuring of the Middle East following the war. Özal likened this policy to the gambler who obtained high winnings from a small bid.

Özal was to come under harsh criticism for exceeding his constitutional powers. There were also claims that he had certain high-risk plans regarding Mosul and Kirkuk (examined below).

After President Bush's telephone call to Özal, the Turkish government complied with the Security Council's embargo resolution of 6 August and shut off the flow of Iraqi oil through the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline on 8 August. It also stopped all trade with Iraq. These were significant moves for Washington at a time when the U.S. was eagerly seeking allies and Saudi Arabia was vacillating, not wanting to be the first to shut off an Iraqi pipeline.

During this crisis the U.S. sought Turkey's help in three areas. One was to allow the bases on Turkish soil to be used to conduct operations against Iraq. Turkey was also asked to deploy forces to its border with Iraq to force that country to redeploy some of its troops in the southern front to the north. Turkey was also asked to contribute troops to the allied force massing in Saudi Arabia (Abramowitz, p. 5). Turkey agreed to the first two requests. Although Özal was ready to comply with the third request, he deferred to the armed forces, which were against contributing troops.

Turkey deployed 180,000 men from the Second Army to the Iraqi border, forcing Saddam to maintain eight divisions in the north and thereby relieving the allied forces engaged in operation Desert Storm.

Turkey's main contribution to the American war effort was to allow the U.S. to use air bases located on its soil. On 17 January 1991 the TGNA adopted resolution 126, and the next day U.S. combat aircraft arrived at İncirlik to start operations against Iraq. During the campaign, allied aircraft were either taking off from İncirlik to bomb Iraq or landing at İncirlik after taking off from bases or aircraft carriers located in the Indian Ocean and completing their missions over Iraq. This information was withheld from the Turkish public, which was told that the aircraft were engaged in training missions.

The Significance of the Gulf War for Turkish Foreign Policy

The Gulf War had certain features that made it particularly significant for Turkish foreign policy.

- 1. Turkish foreign policy had always rested on the assumption that a pro-status quo course would be maintained so long as Turkey's vital interests were not threatened. Özal's desire to open a second front in northern Iraq was the most serious departure from the traditional foreign policy line (Box 7-10).
- 2. During this war there was a serious crisis in the decision-making process. At a time when developments affecting Turkey's security and foreign policy were occurring next door, minister of foreign affairs Ali Bozer resigned on 11 October 1990, minister of defense Safa Giray resigned on 18 October 1990, and chief of the General Staff Necip Torumtay resigned on 3 December 1990. These resignations were a protest against Özal's policies.

3. Torumtay's resignation was significant from the perspective of relations between the army and the civilians. It became obvious that the bureaucracy that was in charge of implementing policy was in a position to obstruct decisions made behind its back. By his resignation, General Torumtay not only blocked the policies he disapproved of but also acted in conformity with the best democratic practices. Because the army's comportment had the support of democratic circles in the country, the legitimacy of the part that the military played in the conduct of domestic and external policy was reinforced. Torumtay's resignation created a paradoxical situation: a civilian opted for war while the soldier took a stand against this course.

- 4. Özal's stand was also criticized by the opposition and the public. The press criticized both his style of conducting foreign policy and the foreign policy itself. Analogies were made between the way in which the Ottoman Empire was dragged into World War I and the use of İncirlik by the U.S. Air Force, which might cause Turkey to get involved in the conflict.
- 5. It was presumed by many that Özal was being manipulated by the U.S.

b. The Gulf War and Its Consequences for Turkey Turkey suffered from the Gulf War both politically and economically.

Özal had expectations of high levels of economic aid both from the U.S. and from the Gulf States. When he went to Washington in September 1990, he called for the lifting of quotas on Turkish textiles, the modernization of the armed forces, and the alleviation of Turkey's debt burden. Bush responded to these pleas by securing $82 million in emergency aid in January 1991. In addition, the U.S. provided supplementary assistance in the amount of $282 million in 1991. There were increases in military aid amounting to $150 million in 1991 and $200 million in 1992. Aside from this, a Turkish Defense Fund in the amount of $4.2 billion was set up, with the participation of Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, and the U.S. All of these contributors honored their commitments except the United Arab Emirates, which paid only $150 million out of the $500 million pledged by its leader, Sheikh Zayed. Just before the Second Gulf War the UAE agreed to honor its commitment and pay the remaining

Box 7-10. Özal's Mosul-Kirkuk Project during the Gulf War

During the Gulf War, President Özal not only engaged in active diplomacy but also gave the impression that he had certain plans with respect to Mosul and Kirkuk, the off-producing regions in northern Irag. Özal defended his active approach and openly advocated military intervention. People close to him kept speaking about plans with respect to Mosul and Kirkuk. All of this led many to believe that he harbored plans to invade this region. The suspicions were reinforced by Özal's actions. He wanted to be the sole policy-maker in Ankara with respect to the Gulf conflict. He had a private conversation with the U.S. secretary of state when he visited Ankara in early August. During Özal's visit to Washington in November, he did not allow his foreign minister to be present at his meeting with President Bush, even though the American secretary of state attended the meeting. He was eager to get a parliamentary resolution allowing troops to be sent out of the country. The sudden resignation of the chief of the General Staff, Gen. Necip Torumtay, only reinforced these suspicions. Ozal had asked Torumtay to prepare the army for cross-border operations, stressing that Mosul and Kirkuk came within the limits drawn in the National Pact in 1920. He wanted to find a practical and dynamic solution to this question.

In his memoirs (published subsequently), Torumtay expressed the opinion that an operation in Iraq was technically feasible, but he had certain misgivings. (1) He wanted written, explicit orders from the government (Ozal had sent the order verbally through the undersecretary of the prime minister's office without an official document signed by cabinet members). (2) The purposes and objectives of an operation such as the one Ozal was proposing were not clearly spelled out. It would be easy to capture northern Iraq, but it would be very difficult to hold onto this region. (3) Even if the invasion was confined to northern Iraq, the Kurdish question would emerge in the region at a time when Turkey was faced with serious difficulties in the struggle against the PKK within its own borders. (4) To mount such an operation, troops would have to be deployed from Thrace and eastern Turkey, giving rise to defense weaknesses in these regions and perhaps even in Cyprus (Torumtay, pp. 108–18). In the end, Torumtay did not comply with Özal's personal request to prepare the army for the operation and tendered his resignation in December 1990. It was significant that a soldier had opposed the policy of using force proposed by a civilian and resigned:

Ozal held the belief that Saddam would be toppled and that the map of the Middle East would be redrawn: If Turkey acted energetically, it would be able to get a larger share of the spoils. This pointed directly at Mosul and Kirkuk. At that time, Ozal declared that the question of a federation should be debated in Turkey to solve the Kurdish problem and that the Turkish army would enter train in the event of an Iraqi attack on Turkey or a joint Iranian-Syrian invasion of Iraq. He added that he had discussed these issues with President Bush and obtained his backing. This was a time when people in Ozal's entourage talked of Turkey facing the alternatives of either contracting or expanding. If such a plan was seriously considered, it was not carried out mainly because of opposition from the General Staff and the combined resistance of the opposition parties and public opinion.

Others argued, however, that Özal never contemplated making a bid to grab Mosul and Kirkuk and that all he wanted was to take an active part in the allied military operation. Those who held this view claimed that he deliberately gave this impression to boost his public popularity. In other words, "Özal was playing to his domestic audience. It was also pointed out that the U.51 and other Western countries would not want to see an oil rich region like Mosul-Kirkuk under the control of a powerful state like Turkey. The Western powers might even have given the appearance of endorsing Özal's putative Mosul-Kirkuk plans in order to keep Turkey firmly aligned with the West (Erkaya and Baytok, p. 92).

(İ. UZGEL)

$350 million. But the U.S. was unhappy with the decision of the TGNA on 1 March 1 2003 and probably advised the UAE not to make the payment, and the UAE complied.

Finally, an Egyptian order for Turkish-built F-16 aircraft was secured. Part of the Turkish Defense Fund was used to finance the second phase of F-16 purchases for Turkey, thus bringing more orders for U.S. suppliers.

The embargo that was imposed on Iraq after the war caused Turkey economic losses amounting to $100 billion over ten years, according to an article appearing in Milliyet on 14 March 2000. The author of the article based his calculations on data supplied by the Turkish Treasury. Compared to these huge losses, the aid provided was insignificant. Although Turkey often referred to its losses because of Iraq in its dealings with the U.S., nothing was done to compensate these losses. Turkey's losses consisted of loss of income from the Iraq-Turkey oil pipeline, large-scale disruption of bilateral trade as well as the border trade and the unemployment that this caused in the southeastern region, Iraq's nonpayment of its debts to Turkey, and the construction projects that were never carried out in Iraq, representing huge potential losses for Turkish contractors.

Turkey sought to invoke article 50 of the UN Charter, which makes provisions for compensating the losses incurred by members due to sanctions, but could not persuade the U.S. to support its stand. And yet Amman was able to use article 50 to compensate its losses caused by the embargo even though it had stood close to Iraq during the crisis in a bid to appease the Palestinian component of Jordan's population.

Turkey was also affected politically, because the economic difficulties in the southeastern region aggravated the Kurdish question. The PKK profited greatly from the widespread unemployment in the region. It also took advantage of the power vacuum in northern Iraq to carry out operations against Turkey from there. It was able to obtain large amounts of arms and ammunition from the defeated Iraqi military for rock-bottom prices. Finally, the Kurds of northern Iraq who fled from Saddam after 1991 increased the level of awareness of the Kurds in Turkey, making the Kurdish problem more intractable.

Turkey's contributions to the waging of the Gulf War also failed to yield tangible benefits in relations with the EU.

Contrary to Özal's expectations, Turkey was not invited to the meeting in Madrid that initiated the Middle East Peace Process after the Gulf War. It was represented at a low level in some of the working groups established subsequently. Nor was Turkey offered the opportunities expected in connection with the postwar reconstruction of Kuwait. Kuwait and Saudi Arabia even forgot to include Turkey among the countries that helped them in their official statements of appreciation after the end of hostilities.

Turkey's most important gain was that Iraq's military might was broken without the need for Turkey to resort to arms. Ankara had been upset when Iraq got the support of fellow Arab countries on the issues of water rights, which strained Arab relations with Turkey. When Prime Minister Akbulut visited Baghdad in May 1990, he was told in a menacing tone that NATO would no longer be in a position to protect Turkey. This is why many in Turkey saw cooperation with the U.S. in the crisis as a natural consequence of the convergence of Turkey's interests with America's. But this had to be weighed against Turkey's losses and Turkey's cooperation with Iraq on the Kurdish question over many years.

The most important development after the war was the situation of the Kurds in northern Iraq, which directly affected Turkey. Turkey's cooperation with the U.S. during the Gulf War would acquire a new dimension with the developments in northern Iraq.

2. The U.S., Operation Provide Comfort, and Turkey's Half-hearted Cooperation in Northern Iraq

The Origin of Provide Comfort

Before launching the land campaign against Iraq, the U.S. called on the Kurds in the north and the Shiite Arabs in the south to revolt in order to distract the Iraqi army. When the Iraqi army was removed from Kuwait and a cease-fire was in place at the end of February 1991, the Shia revolted in the south in early March, followed by the

Map 7-2. Safe Haven and No-Fly Zone in Iraq (Source: Oran, p. 320)

Kurds in the north (the information on Provide Comfort is derived from Oran).

Saddam easily suppressed the Shiite uprising and turned his attention to the north. The Kurds were quickly routed by the Iraqi army. But the U.S. disappointed the Kurds once again and failed to come to their aid. The calculation in Washington was that Iran would stand to gain from Iraq's disintegration, so the U.S. allowed Saddam to remain in power (Box 7-11). The U.S. took no military action to assist the Kurds. It did nothing even when Iraq used helicopter gunships against armed Kurdish groups, on the grounds that the cease-fire agreement covered only the use of Iraqi fixed-wing aircraft. As a consequence, 1.5 million Iragi Kurds fled to the Turkish and Iranian borders in early April 1991. Turkey had decided that it would not admit the 500,000 refugees pressing at its border after its experience of 1988. On that occasion, Turkey had incurred heavy expenditures to accommodate the refugees but had received no help from the West and plenty of criticism. The government was also drawing criticism from the Turkish public, because the increase in PKK activity was attributed to the presence of the Iraqi-Kurdish refugee camps on Turkish soil. There was also a fear that refugee camps in Turkey would become a permanent fixture and turn into something analogous to the Gaza Strip. The pressure on the border kept on mounting, however, and keeping the border closed was drawing international criticism, so the Kurds were eventually admitted. For the second time since 1988, Turkey was faced with the Kurdish problem in Iraq spilling over into its territory.

Box 7-11. The USA's Kurdish-State Scenarios

There have been claims that the U.S. would like to set up a Kurdish state in the Middle East that would include parts of Turkey. Although the question became topical during the Gulf War, it has a long pedigree going back to earlier times and is based on the premise that the U.S. was dissatisfied with the Middle Eastern borders drawn in the 1920s. The U.S. would like to have a weak and docile client state in the Middle East to help it strengthen its grip on the region and alleviate the pressure on Israel.

Some of the scenarios go back to the 1960s. The U.S. advanced the Idea of a federal Turkey that would also encompass a federated Kurdish state including the Kurds of Iran, Iraq, and Turkey on two occasions, once after the 27 May 1960 coup in Turkey and then again in 1965. A permanent feature of these projects was that Turkey would be given a share of the Kirkuk oil reserves.

A similar scenario was advanced at the end of 1986, when Iranian forces started pushing toward Kirkuk during the Irani-Iraq War. On that occasion, the U.S. called on Turkey to preempt Iran and Invade the region. This proposal met with the disapproval of the Turkish General Staff and was never carried out.

The most recent U.S. Initiative came during the 1991 Gulf War and the period following the war. This latest initiative had certain features that distinguished it from previous plans. (1) Previous U.S. initiatives were just soundings and tentative in nature and came during times of crisis, whereas the 1991 initiative was insistent and comprehensive and extended over a longer term. (2) Previous U.S. Initiatives had come when there was no armed Kurdish uprising in Turkey, whereas this time the PKK insurgency was at its most interise. (3) The U.S. had paved the way for such a development in northern fraq with Operation Provide Comfort, (4) In the 1990s the U.S. project-counted on the support of none other than the Turkish head of state, President Özal.

All of these scenarios faced one big and effective obstacle blocking their realization, the Turkish military establishment.

(İ. Uzgel)

When the crisis was at its height, Özal proposed to Bush that the Kurds be transferred from the mountainous region, with all of its supply problems, to the plain on the Iraqi side of the border, which was to be turned into a safe haven. After this, the UN Security Council adopted resolution 688 on 5 April 1991. The resolution called on members and aid agencies to join in providing humanitarian aid.

At that time, the plight of the Kurds pressing into Turkey and Iran was on daily display on television screens. The U.S. government felt the need to do something under the pressure of American public opinion. Turkey was also pressing the Americans to act. But, above all, the U.S. government was aware of the possibility that Britain and France might intervene if it remained passive. As a result, Washington decided to bring aid to northern Iraq by air. On 10 April the U.S. established a no-fly zone north of the 36th parallel and forbade all military activity in this region.

The U.S., Britain, and France established a safe haven in the region of Zaho in northern Iraq, and Operation Provide Comfort got underway. The military personnel of the three powers operated out of Silopi in Turkey and conducted the air operations from the base at Incirlik. The operation involved 1,862 military personnel and 77 aircraft and helicopters, of which 44 were American and 4 Turkish. The Kurds returned to Iraq within a short time, relieving Turkey of the burden of supporting them at a cost of $1.6 million per day. At the end of the first phase of the operation, the second phase, known as Operation Provide Comfort II, began on 16 July 1991.

On 12 July 1991 the Turkish cabinet agreed that a multinational force would be stationed in Turkey, which included a complement from the Turkish armed forces. The legal basis for this decision was resolution 126 of the TGNA, though this basis was contested by some. Its justification in international law was even more controversial (Box 7-12). With the decision Turkey agreed to the use of installations at İncirlik and Batman air bases. Turkey also agreed to participate in the force, with the Turkish commander holding the same rank and enjoying the same status as the force commander. The Turkish General Staff had to approve the activities undertaken within the framework of the operation, and the weapons brought into Turkey would be under its supervision. The duration of the operation would be extended every six months.

Upon Turkey's request, the ground forces were removed from Turkey in September 1991 and the force was reduced to the seventy-seven aircraft and helicopters operating out of İncirlik. A military coordination center was established at Zaho.

After this, Operation Provide Comfort became a source of considerable controversy in Turkey's domestic politics as well as its foreign policy. The opposition parties and the public in general saw Operation Provide Comfort as a vehicle for establishing a Kurdish state in northern Iraq, with Turkey's participation and consent. All of the political parties were opposed to the operation; but when they found themselves in office during the 1990s, they gave their grudging consent to its continuation without heeding public opinion.

A question that was strictly in the realm of bilateral relations between Turkey and Iraq eventually became an issue affecting Turkey's relations with the U.S. as a result of international developments during the 1990s and U.S. Middle East policies. The reason why the problem became more acute was the intensification of the Kurdish

Box 7-12. The Legal Basis in Domestic and International Law for Operation Provide Comfort

There was no precedent for Provide Comfort, and the Turkish government had some difficulty in finding a legal basis for it that would be in compliance with existing legislation. According to article 92 of the Constitution, only the TGNA could grant permission to admit foreign troops into Turkey, and this body had made no such decision. The government was basing itself on resolution 126 of the TGNA, dated 17 January 1991. This resolution was adopted during the Gulf crisis, when the TGNA authorized the government to make decisions in this regard. This resolution contained the following passages: "for the purpose of effectively protecting Turkey's vital interests in accordance with developments during and after the crisis" and "the Government may take appropriate action when it deems necessary in support of resolution 678 of the UN Security Council." This resolution transferred the legislature's prerogative to the executive and the powers of the president to take emergency action to the government. Instead of relying on a law, the decision was based on a resolution, a mechanism that was designed to regulate the TGNA's internal functioning. The timing and the need for this were left to the discretion of the milltary. All of these aspects were shortcomings that drew widespread criticism and drove the opposition to challenge its constitutionality in court. The constitutional tribunal ruled that it was not competent to consider the issue because no law was involved in this case, only a parliamentary resolution.

With respect to international law, Security Council resolution 688 was taken by the government as a basis for Provide Comfort. This resolution called on all members and ald agencies to provide humanitarian assistance, and Turkey was complying with this appeal. In this case, allowing Provide Comfort to operate from Turkey was in conformity with international law.

But another controversial aspect was the issue of intervention in Iraq from Turkish territory. There was no justification for this intervention, such as an Iraqi attack on Turkey. Furthermore, the Security Council's resolution 688 made reference only to humanitarian aid.

Establishing a safe haven on Iraqi territory was even more problematic from the legal point of view, because it violated Iraq's sovereignty. The U.S. was resorting to the principle of "humanitarian intervention," which had not found acceptance in international law and was causing uneasiness in some countries. Chapter VII of the UN Charter discussed the possibility of resorting to force in situations where peace was threatened or breached or aggression had taken place. There was a general agreement that this provision also applied to internal situations in which a minority found itself under oppression. But the use of force could only be under the direction of the Security Council. Under these circumstances, military intervention by the U.S. and its allies based on resolution 688 was a violation of international law. At this time, a "law on intervention" was being elaborated, however, and the international community did not show much opposition.

(İ. Uzgel) (Source: Oran, pp. 81–98) insurgency in Turkey, especially after 1991, and the suspicion that the U.S. was seeking to set up a Kurdish state in northern Iraq. Developments in the region were feeding this suspicion.

Provide Comfort from Turkey's Perspective

Throughout the 1990s Provide Comfort was a source of great controversy in Turkey's foreign policy, with much discussion pro and con.

The arguments in favor of Provide Comfort can be summarized as follows.

From the perspective of the Kurdish question, Provide Comfort was preventing Saddam from crushing the Kurds and driving them into Turkey. Thanks to Provide Comfort, Turkey was able to claim that it was the defender of the Iraqi Kurds and had no quarrel with the Kurdish people as such. Provide Comfort was also preventing the PKK from gaining a foothold in northern Iraq. While Turkey allowed Provide Comfort to function, the U.S. made no objection to Turkey's cross-border operations into northern Iraq. By allowing Provide Comfort, Turkey was also able to build ties of friendship with the Iraqi Kurds.

If Ankara had denied Operation Provide Comfort permission to operate out of Turkey, it would probably have been relocated in some other country. Turkey would have lost the ability to monitor the activities of the troops now based on its soil.

From the perspective of Turkey's regional policy, Provide Comfort was keeping Iraq from posing a threat to Turkey. Without Provide Comfort, Saddam would be stronger, Baghdad's policy toward Turkey would harden, and the embargo against Iraq would be tightened further in the event of further oppression of the Kurds. Turkey also expected benefits from the Gulf States, whose security was enhanced by Provide Comfort.

Most important of all, Provide Comfort was a trump card that Turkey could use in its relations with the U.S. in areas such as American aid, regional cooperation, and unhindered security operations in northern Iraq.

Those opposed to Provide Comfort stressed that it benefited the PKK, that it led to a power vacuum in northern Iraq, and that it paved the way for the establishment of a Kurdish state in that region. Turkish public opinion was disturbed by the intensification of PKK activities after Provide Comfort came into action. The Turkish press reported that helicopters engaged in that operation were also ferrying supplies to the PKK and rescuing their wounded fighters.

The Issue of a Kurdish State in Northern Iraq

One of Turkey's worst fears was a Kurdish political entity in northern Iraq. It was precisely Provide Comfort (and the safety it brought to the region) that allowed the development of the embryo of such an entity. A clear sign of this development was the election that took place in northern Iraq in May 1992, followed by the convening of a parliament. Although the Iraqi Kurds informed Ankara of the coming vote, they described it not as a parliamentary election but as a municipal election.

After the launching of Operation Provide Comfort, Turkey started taking a closer interest and getting more involved in northern Iraq, with President Özal leading the way. This was designed to forestall developments that might be detrimental to Turkey's interests. At Özal's request, the leader of the Kurdistan Democratic Party, Masud Barzani, and the leader of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, Jalal Talabani, were invited to Ankara. The two leaders came in July 1992, when they held talks and were given diplomatic passports by the Turkish state to enable them to travel abroad. They subsequently went to the U.S., where they met with secretary of state James Baker. Ankara allowed the Kurdish leaders to establish offices in Ankara to represent them. Ankara also helped in building infrastructure projects in northern Iraq.

Turkey decided to take more effective steps after the Imqi Kurds set up a government in July 1992, established an intelligence service and a police force in September, accelerated the preparations for forming an army in October, and announced the establishment of a Federated Kurdish State in Erbil that same month. Ankara declared that this decision was detrimental to peace and stability in the region and indicated that it would not recognize the new entity. It launched a major operation in northern Iraq in October 1992 in the region where the PKK was entrenched. The Barzani group cooperated in this operation in order to attenuate Turkey's reaction to establishment of a federated state. Ankara proposed to the Iraqi Kurds that they enter into a dialogue with the Baghdad regime and expressed the view that Baghdad should reassert its control of the region. Ankara also arranged a meeting in November 1992 bringing together Syria, Iran, and Turkey. A tripartite declaration was issued, calling for the preservation of Iraq's territorial integrity. In this way, Turkey was able to form a common front with two countries with which it did not have very warm relations. Ankara was firmly conveying the message to the U.S. and to the international community that it would not allow the establishment of a Kurdish state. Finally, starting in 1993, Turkey decided to develop its relations with the Iraqi administration and (also taking into consideration its economic interests) began a campaign to secure the lifting of the embargo on Iraq.

By the mid-1990s Turkish public opinion as well as the government and the opposition had become more averse to Provide Comfort. The main reason for this was the gradual emergence of a Kurdish state in northern Iraq. Another reason was the intensification of PKK activity starting in the early 1990s. The news that Provide Comfort helicopters were rescuing wounded PKK fighters only made things worse. Notwithstanding these developments, the government felt obliged to extend the duration of Provide Comfort when the time came.

Turkey tried to mitigate the effects of unfavorable developments in the region and the continued presence of Provide Comfort by taking a series of measures that included controlling the access to the region of a great number of NGOs via Turkey, mounting operations into northern Iraq, engaging in cooperation with Barzani, and occasionally pressing him to cooperate with Saddam. One of the measures taken by Ankara was to join the dialogue being conducted by the U.S. with the Iraqi Kurds.

The Dublin Process

Turkey also cooperated with the U.S. in the Dublin Process, designed to secure the cooperation of the Iraqi Kurdish groups that were hostile to one another. The ostensible reason for the differences between the groups was the sharing of the income derived from trucks using the Habur border crossing into Turkey. But the real reason was a struggle for power between the two main clans that were seeking to dominate the region. This rivalry resulted in clashes between the two groups in May 1994, endangering the U.S. policy of checking Saddam by relying on the cooperation of the Iraqi Kurdish factions. In the face of these developments, the U.S. intervened and brought the two Kurdish sides together in Dublin in August 1995. Turkey participated in these talks as an observer. The U.S. secured the reconciliation of the two groups. At the Turkish observer's insistence, a paragraph was inserted in the document issued after the meeting, stating that Turkey's security concerns would be fully taken into account.

This American initiative did not prove successful, however, and Iran continued to increase its influence in northern Iraq. It sent a brigade of 10,000 troops into the region to enforce the cease-fire between the two Kurdish groups. This forced the U.S. into action once more: a delegation that included Turkish officials was sent to the region to bring the two sides together again. This finally resulted in a new cease-fire.

Cooperation between Saddam and Barzani in Northern Iraq: Upsetting Regional Balances

When the PUK under Talabani's leadership, having secured Iran's backing, took control of the city of Erbil in August 1996, the regional balance was upset once again. But this time something unexpected occurred. Finding himself in difficulty, Barzani appealed to the Baghdad regime for help. In response, Iraqi units entered the region for the first time since the establishment of Provide Comfort and expelled Talabani from Erbil. During this operation 6,700 Iraqi Kurds, consisting of those working for the U.S. (very probably for the CIA) and members of their families, left Iraq for Turkey and were shipped to Guam by the U.S. This development rekindled Turkish apprehension over U.S. intentions in the region. It also brought about important changes in the regional policies of the U.S., the existing balances in the region, and the policies of Turkey.

At a time when criticism of Provide Comfort in Turkey was on the rise and suspicion of U.S. intentions was growing more intense, the emergence of the Saddam-Barzani alliance proved useful for Ankara.

- 1. This development dealt a serious blow to U.S. aims in northern Iraq. If Provide Comfort was meant to afford protection from the Saddam administration to the Iraqi Kurds, it became meaningless in a situation where the Kurds in the KDP-Barzani camp were collaborating with Baghdad. The U.S. policy of uniting the Iraqi Kurds and getting them to resist Saddam had obviously failed.
- 2. The developments in the region resulted in the formation of two alliances: an alliance of Turkey, Iraq, and the KPD (Barzani) and an alliance of Iran, the PKK, and the PUK (Talabani). The U.S. policy of securing a united front under the two Kurdish leaders had been seriously undermined.
- 3. The Military Coordination Center moved from Zaho in northern Iraq to Silopi in Turkey. The activities of about 150 NGOs that were causing concern for Turkey came to an end.
- 4. Until then, Turkey had been restrained about raising the issue of the Turcomans. Now it began to give more emphasis to the presence of this group. The reappearance of the Turcomans in the northern Iraqi balance upset Iraq but was well received by the U.S.

The Ankara Process and the Transformation of Provide Comfort into Operation Northern Watch When clashes reemerged between a weakened Talabani and Barzani, the U.S. and Turkey interceded once again and invited the parties to come to Ankara. In October 1996 Turkish, American, and British officials met with the representatives of the KDP, the PUK, and the Turcomans. Whereas Turkey was merely an observer in the previous Dublin Process, this time it was one of the parties as well as the host and the Turcomans were participating in the political process in northern Iraq for the first time. As the Dublin Process turned into the Ankara Process, Turkey's influence over events in northern Iraq was growing. But this new process lost its steam when the PUK came closer to the PKK and the KDP took offense over the Turcoman presence in the political process and refused to cooperate.

Meanwhile talks were in progress with the U.S. over the structure and functions of Operation Provide Comfort. The coalition government consisting of the Welfare Party and True Path Party announced that Provide Comfort's mission had come to an end and that it would be replaced by a force consisting exclusively of air power. In December 1996 the government called on the TGNA to extend the duration of this new arrangement, which was renamed Operation Northern Watch (ONW). In flights over Iraq, weapons would be used only in self-defense and the types of weapon would be subject to Turkey's approval. The duration and extent of operations would also require specific Turkish approval. ONW would involve forty-one U.S., seven British, and four Turkish aircraft and helicopters and 1,324 dombined personnel. Turkey had secured the transfer of the Military Coordination Center (a major source of apprehension) to Silopi within its own borders and had attached new rules to the former Operation Provide Comfort, which had caused much nervousness in Turkey. After this, the extension of the term of ONW would no longer cause the heated debates among the Turkish public or political circles that Provide Comfort had unleashed. The extensions now took place smoothly, without debates and almost automatically.

The Ankara Process continued until May 1997, during which four meetings were held. After the 1996 operation conducted by Baghdad into the region, U.S. influence in northern Iraq suffered a setback. Washington took new initiatives to make up for this situation. It invited the Kurdish groups to Washington in September 1998 and restored its control over the negotiating process. Although the communiqué issued after the meeting made reference to respect for Iraq's territorial integrity and the Ankara Process of 1996, the document was signed by the U.S. secretary of state and Turkey had been left out of the proceedings. Turkey was unhappy because the document referred to a federal structure for Iraq and did not specifically mention the PKK in the passage declaring that the borders would be protected against the infiltration of terrorists.

Meanwhile Turkey's relations with Washington were under the shadow of U.S. operations against Iraq and the possibility of a breakaway Kurdish state there. In early 1999 Turkish diplomats and U.S. officials pursued their talks with Barzani and Talabani in northern Iraq. When U.S. secretary of defense William Cohen visited Ankara in July 1999, he declared that ONW would continue as long as Saddam remained in power (Box 7-13).

Beginning in 2000, the U.S. reached the decision to topple Saddam and stepped up its activities in northern Iraq. In April 2000 a conference was arranged in Washington with the title "The Search for a Kurdish Identity." Along with Barzani and the representatives of the PUK, it included participants who looked upon the PKK with sympathy. At the conference the KDP received the sort of treatment that would be normally accorded to a regular state. All of this caused much concern in Turkey. Although the U.S. claimed that the conference was a private affair, the participation of the U.S. diplomat in charge of the region, Frank Ricciardone, did nothing to appease Turkey's uneasiness.

The U.S. in Turkey's Northern Iraq Policy

The main aims of Turkey's northern Iraq policy were to fill the power vacuum in the region, prevent the PKK from using the region as a base or sanctuary, and prevent the emergence of a Kurdish entity. Turkey considered all arrangements in northern Iraq to be temporary, pending the reestablishment of Baghdad's authority in the region (Box 7-14).

Within the framework of its northern Iraq policy, Turkey took steps such as cooperating with Baghdad, as it had done in 1996, and declaring its opposition to the establishment of a Kurdish state in the region, together with Syria and Iran. It also sought some control over developments in the region by engaging in cooperation with the Kurds of northern Iraq.

Turkey defied international opinion by engaging in a number of military operations in the region, starting in 1983. These operations were designed to dislodge the PKK from the area. From time to time, Turkey also bombed targets belonging to Iraqi Kurds to convey the message to the U.S. and to Barzani and Talabani that it would not countenance a Kurdish entity. As a consequence, military operations in the region became the most important element of Turkey's northern Iraq policy.

These Turkish incursions met with a very poor reception both in the EU and in the Middle East. The Arab League condemned Turkey's action, while Germany

Box 7-13. Provide Comfort, the Kurdish State, and U.S. Policy

The significance of Provide Comfort for Turkey derived from the uncertainty about U.S. Intentions with respect to the creation of a Kurdish state in northern Iraq. True, U.S. officials made statements affirming their respect for Iraq's territorial integrity. But, at the same time, a structure resembling a state was being built that had its own parliament, government, police force, and army Provide Comfort was perceived as the tool to implement this plan.

It was obvious that the U.S. was in no hurry to set up a Kurdish state in the region at that stage. Such a move would result in the disintegration of Iraq and would have negative consequences on the region from the U.S. perspective. (1) Most of the Kurds were Sunni Muslims; If they had their own state, a Shiite-dominated Arab state in the center of Iraq and a Shiite state in the south would emerge, bearing in mind that the proportion of Shia in Iraq was already 54%; Such a development would only benefit Iran. (2) A breakup of Iraq might bring the Sunni element closer to Saddam (3) The establishment of a Kurdish state might bring Iraq and Iran closer together, which would be detrimental to U.S. policy goals in the region. (4) Such a development would alienate Turkey from the U.S. With the establishment of a Kurdish state, the U.S. would no longer be able to use the threat of a possible Kurdish state as a tool to keep the countries of the region in line

For these reasons, the effect of Provide Comfort was not to create a Kurdish state but to serve the policy of "double containment." With Provide Comfort, the U.S. was ensuring the security of the Kurds and keeping them from cooperating with Saddam. It was able to give direction to developments in Iraq and the Gulf. By the same token, the U.S. was also playing the Kurdish card in its relations with Turkey. Nevertheless, in the environment of the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003, Provide Comfort will end up creating a defacto Kurdish state.

(İ. UZGEL) (Source: Oran, pp. 264–67)

halted the delivery of weapons. France and Belgium claimed that Iraq's territorial integrity was being violated.

The U.S. showed understanding by declaring that the PKK was a terrorist organization and that Turkey was exercising its right of self-defense to such a degree that the activities of Provide Comfort were suspended during Turkish operations in northern Iraq. In debates in the U.S. Congress, however, some members recalled that the U.S. had sent its forces to the region to protect the Kurds from Saddam and criticized the administration for supporting Turkey's operations in this region. They also claimed that Turkey was using U.S.-supplied weapons unlawfully in its operations.

The U.S. had a number of reasons to overlook Turkey's operations in northern Iraq during this period.

1. Turkey was giving advance notice to the U.S. (as well as to Britain and France) before launching its operations.

Box 7-14. Turkey's Northern Iraq Policy

Turkey's northern Iraq policy in the 1990s is inextricably linked with domestic politics and hence full of contradictions. According to an MFA press release, Turkey pursues three goals in northern Iraq. (1) the preservation of Iraq's territorial integrity (in other words, preventing the emergence of a Kurdish state in that country); (2) meeting Turkey's "legitimate security concerns" (or, stated in different terms, preventing PKK attacks on Turkey from Iraq); (3) defending the rights of the Turcomans living in that region.

A closer examination reveals that this policy has two fundamental objectives: one tactical, the other strategic.

The tactical objective has two aspects: first, to hit the PKK and expel it from the region; second, to prevent a power vacuum in the region that would serve the PKK's interests...

The first objective was pursued by conducting military operations into the region. These operations were based on four grounds, although their legal validity became debatable over time. (1) Iraq's consent (this applied to the operations of May 1983, 1986, and 1987); (2) the Security Protocol signed with Iraq that allowed hot pursuit into Iraq up to a depth of five kilometers (this applied to the operations from October 1984 to October 1988); (3) legitimate self-defense, a justification that was used for the first time in August 1991; (4) self-preservation (this was used after March-April 1995).

Each operation was followed by communiques daiming that the PKK's backbone had been broken. Although the number of these operations was close to thirty by the end of 2000, the pursued objective was never attained (the PKK lost its position in northern Iraq as a result of other factors). This was because Turkey was unable to establish a permanent presence in northern Iraq; it was also difficult for a regular army to eliminate fighters conducting guerrilla-type warfare. There was a further element in the equation. If Turkey had gotten rid of the PKK, the Kurds of northern Iraq would have lost their trump card for securing Turkish aid. Turkey's methods were drawing fire from Western Europe, from the Iraqi Kurds who suffered from the operations, and from Iran

Turkey was forced to seek the indulgence of the U.S., which in turn compelled Ankara to give the green light to Provide Comfort and suffer its consequences.

The method used to attain the second objective was to strengthen the northern Iraqi Kurds and to help them in their effort to unite. Turkey provided diplomatic passports to top Kurdish leaders, electric power, arms, and economic aid to the Kurds and called on them to avoid internecine strife. The quid pro quo was for the Iraqi Kurds to deny sanctuary to the PKK. But there was a fundamental contradiction in this policy. As Barzani and Talabani came closer and grew in strength with Turkish help, Ankara began to fear that they would form a separate state.

Turkey's strategic objective in northern Iraq was to prevent the establishment of a Kurdish state, which would constitute a bad precedent for Turkey's Kurds and might pursue irredentist policies toward Kurdish-populated regions of the three neighboring countries. Turkey's strategic objective was also full of contradictions. By approving Provide Comfort, helping the northern Iraq! Kurds, and allowing access to Western NGOs, Turkey was bolstering the embryonic Kurdish state in the region.

After long years of neglect, Turkey had begun to take an Interest in the fate of the Turcomans. But some quarters in Turkey saw them as an element to be manipulated and used and even called for arming them. Such policies turned the Turcomans, who had no disposition to engage in armed conflict, into potential targets of Arab and Kurdish nationalism.

Despite the active and occasionally successful policies of the MFA, the issue of Provide Comfort and the contradictions it entailed continued to be a major preoccupation for Turkey: in order to solve that foreign policy question, Turkey had to find a lasting and democratic solution for the Kurdish question within its own borders.

(B. ORAN

Ankara also gave assurances that the operations would be of limited duration and honored its promises.

- 2. The U.S. depended on Turkey's cooperation to pursue Operation Provide Comfort and carry out its other policy objectives in northern Iraq as well as in the rest of Iraq. Consequently, it was careful not to cross Turkey.
- 3. The suspicion that the U.S. was in the process of creating a Kurdish state in northern Iraq was taking root among the Turkish public. To oppose the operations would have confirmed Turkey's suspicions and adversely affected Turkish-U.S. relations.
- 4. Finally, Turkey's operations in the region were targeting the PKK, and U.S. policy in the Middle East did not rely on the PKK. In fact, the PKK was a rival to the KDP and PUK, which were in close cooperation with the U.S. Furthermore, the PKK was creating a destabilizing effect in the region through Partiya Azadiya Kurdistan (PAK), its affiliate in northern Iraq. This is why PKK's policies were aimed at securing European rather than American support, and Washington was ready to allow the PKK to be wiped out in the region.

While Turkey sought to reconcile the contradictions in its policies, it also used its support for Provide Comfort to extract concessions from the U.S. A number of subjects were raised by Turkey whenever the extension of the duration of Provide Comfort was taken up, including changes to the structure and function of the force, the lifting of the economic embargo on Iraq, the DECA, the frigates that were due to be delivered to Turkey, and compensation for losses suffered during the Gulf War. In the overall context of Turkish-U.S. relations, many of these issues had not been addressed to Turkey's full satisfaction. Despite this, during the 1990s Provide Comfort continued to be one of the principal elements of Turkish-U.S. cooperation and constituted a useful tool for the U.S. administration to use in justifying its policies toward Turkey in Congress.

4. The U.S. Policy of Dual Containment and Turkey

The U.S. policy of dual containment was the result of the attempt to isolate those regimes that Washington characterized as rogue states. Libya, Cuba, and North Korea (as well as Iran and Iraq) were in the category of rogue states. The U.S. claimed the right to isolate and exclude these states and keep them under constant pressure in order to prevail over them and, if possible, turn them into constructive elements of the community of nations. Just as the U.S. had contained the USSR in the past, it now felt that it had a duty to contain these states in order to force them to conform to international standards of conduct.

The U.S. was seeking to maintain control of the Middle East by pressuring Iraq and Iran and keeping them in international isolation. This policy was supported and kept going with the help of the Jewish lobby but began to lose its effectiveness toward the end of the 1990s, especially after the European countries adopted the approach of "critical dialogue" with the two regimes.

This policy was initiated in May 1993, pursued by the U.S. and Turkey in cooperation. Turkey played an important part in this policy, especially in relation to Iraq.

Turkey's Role in the Containment of Iraq and Iran Washington attributed much importance to keeping Iraq isolated from the international system through its policy of containment, and Turkey was its chief collaborator in this undertaking. The main vehicle used to carry out this policy was the no-fly zones created north of the 36th parallel and south of the 32nd parallel. This area was subsequently extended by shifting the southern zone up to the 33rd parallel in 1996. Operation Provide Comfort constituted the main pillar of this policy. In addition, the U.S. employed other measures against Iraq, including economic sanctions, inspection of its armaments, hitting specific targets in the country, and (as announced in 1997)

Although the containment of Iraq also hurt Turkey in different ways, Ankara felt the need to go along with this policy and cooperate in its implementation. From time to time, however, Ankara departed from the overall policy of cooperation. The most noteworthy initiative was the decision in 1994 to open the Habur border crossing. This accelerated the border trade between Turkey and Iraq and brought northern Iraq closer to Turkey economically. Although the border trade violated the embargo, it was tolerated and allowed to continue.

supporting the Iraqi opposition.

Turkey was constantly pressing the U.S. because of the harm it was suffering due to the embargo. The people of Iraq, and especially the children, were also suffering grievously from the embargo. As a consequence, the UN Security Council adopted resolution 986 in April 1996, authorizing the oil for food program. At Turkey's insistence, the U.S. got this resolution to provide for the export of Iraqi oil through the Kirkuk-Ceyhan pipeline. Iraq was extracting 1.5 million barrels of oil each day, and 60% of this was being exported through the Yumurtalık oil terminal at Ceyhan. The flow of oil provided Iraq with an income amounting to $9 million per day, while Turkey also benefited to the tune of $500,000 a day. This sum, however, was far from making up for Turkey's losses.

When Baghdad barred UNSCOM (the UN Special Commission in Iraq) from inspecting Iraq's armaments in 1998, the resulting tension raised the possibility of the U.S. using force against Iraq. When the U.S. secretary of defense visited Ankara in November 1998, the conclusion drawn was that the U.S. was seeking permission to use the İncirlik air base to strike Iraq. But Operation Desert Fox against Iraq, which took place on 18 December 1998, was conducted with aircraft and missiles launched from U.S. ships in the Persian Gulf. Starting in January 1999, however, the U.S. and British aircraft flying out of İncirlik began to hit targets, after claiming that Iraqi radars had locked onto these aircraft. In 1999 the U.S. aircraft hit targets in Iraq on 600 occasions. In the course of these attacks the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline was also accidentally hit, cutting off the flow of oil for a while. The U.S. subsequently apologized to Turkey for the error.

Meanwhile the Clinton administration modified its Iraq policy by introducing the new element of regime change. In September 1998 Congress passed the Iraq Liberation Law, which brought sixteen opposition groups under the roof of the Iraqi National Council. The new law also set aside $97 million to fund the activities of the council. In January 1999 an official of the U.S. Embassy in Ankara, Frank Ricciardone, set about organizing the Iraqi opposition and using the embassy as a center for conducting the activities aimed at toppling the Iraqi regime. Turkey was displeased with this development and—distancing itself from the U.S. position—declared that toppling Saddam's regime through outside intervention would lead to chaos in Iraq.

Turkey's Iraq policy was in large measure a reflection of U.S. policy in the Middle East. When the U.S. was supporting Iraq militarily against Iran in the 1980s, Turkey was collaborating with Saddam on the Kurdish question. In the 1990s the U.S. was in collaboration with the Kurds of northern Iraq to overthrow Saddam. At this time, Turkey's policy toward Iraq also relied in large measure on the Iraqi Kurds. The basic difference in the two approaches was that the U.S. perceived Iraq as the principal regional threat, while Turkey saw the possible emergence of a Kurdish state as the real threat.

At the end of 2000 Turkey started taking some small steps toward Iraq. Among these were the provision of humanitarian aid, the visit of a trade delegation, and raising the Turkish diplomatic representation in Baghdad to ambassadorial level. These steps were taken because nothing was being done to compensate Turkey's losses caused by U.S. policies. As France and Russia increased their contacts with Iraq, the sanctions regime was being ignored and the policy of containment was becoming less effective. When the Bush administration became aware of this, it proposed the system of smart sanctions and tried to prevent the sale of Iraqi diesel fuel for cash and the expansion of trade relations.

In regard to the U.S. policy of containing Iran, the justification for this policy corresponded to Turkey's concerns to a very large extent. Among the basic Turkish concerns vis-à-vis Iran were Tehran's support for PKK and certain terrorists, its efforts to develop nuclear weapons, and its manipulation of Islamic radicalism as a tool of its foreign policy.

The role of Turkey, as a secular state with a Muslim population, was important in checking radical Islam based in Iran. In this sense, Turkey was the antithesis of the Iranian model. Turkey also had an important place in the containment of Iran because of its location as a bordering country.

Containing Iran was not very successful from the U.S. point of view, and putting pressure on Iran was not as easy as pressing Iraq. The relaxation of the policy of containing Iran also had its effect on Turkey's policy. The most significant departure from the policy of containment came during the Refahyol coalition between the Welfare Party and True Path Party. Prime Minister Erbakan visited Tehran and (shortly after the passage of the D'Amato Law in the U.S.) concluded a $23 billion natural gas deal with Iran. Then came the visit of the Iranian president and foreign minister to Turkey. Although it was announced that the gas deal did not violate U.S. legislation because each country would build its own section of the pipeline and hence Turkey would make no investments in Iran, the U.S. was disturbed by the development. The U.S. warned Turkey that the extra income from the sale of gas would be used to destabilize the region and that Turkey would become more dependent on Iran for its energy. The U.S. also delayed the delivery of equipment to be used in the construction of the pipeline.

The Consequences of Dual Containment for Turkey

Turkey's ambivalence toward Provide Comfort was also evident in the case of dual containment. The U.S. policy had elements that Turkey welcomed but also elements that were disquieting. The cause for the ambivalence did not lie only in U.S. policy but in the complex structure of Turkey's relations with its two neighbors. True, Turkey's relations with the two countries under U.S. pressure were not all that good. Once Turkey adopted the U.S. line, however, it found its own freedom of movement restricted. Nevertheless, Turkey did support many aspects of this U.S. policy (as shown below).

- 1. After the ending of the Iran-Iraq War, Turkey's relations with Baghdad began to sour. As explained earlier, Iraq obtained the backing of other Arab states and caused displeasure in Turkey by raising the water issue. That is why Turkey welcomed the policy aimed at keeping Iraq weak and limiting its military capabilities.
- 2. After 1990 the regime in Baghdad was not a free agent in conducting its foreign policy. This introduced an element of uncertainty in Turkey's relations with Iraq. Certain Turkish actions were regarded as hostile by Baghdad. Among these were shutting off the pipeline, close relations with Barzani and Talabani, getting the Turcomans involved in the political process in northern Iraq, and above all allowing Turkish bases to be used to bomb Iraq. Consequently, the removal of U.S. pressure on Iraq before the overthrow of the Saddam regime could easily lead to hostile acts against Turkey. Such acts might come in the form of support for the PKK, persecution of the Turcomans in northern Iraq, or joint action with other Arab countries on the water issue.
- 3. In regard to the containment of Iran, it should be recalled that Iran was Turkey's main rival in the Middle East as well as in the Caucasus and Central Asia in the 1990s. In this rivalry, Turkey stood to gain from the containment of Iran. Furthermore, it was to Turkey's advantage that the U.S. listed Iran among the countries that supported terrorism. This meant that Iran was subject to economic sanctions, hindering its rearmament efforts. The U.S. also prevented third countries from selling Iran materials that might be used to produce nuclear or chemical weapons.
- 4. The shortest and cheapest route for oil and natural gas produced in the Caspian Basin to reach international markets was through Iran to the Persian Gulf. The U.S. was opposed to this route, however, on political grounds. Tense relations between Washington and Tehran allowed the Baku-Ceyhan oil pipeline project to go forward with U.S. support.

5. Turkey's role in the containment of Iran and especially Iraq was the principal area of cooperation in the Middle East between Ankara and Washington during the 1990s. In his visit to Turkey in 1999, President Clinton qualified Turkey as a "valued ally" because of this role (Hürriyet, 16 November 1999).

But containment also had drawbacks for Turkey.

- 1. As indicated earlier, containment of Iraq led to significant economic losses for Turkey.
- 2. The frequent bombing of Iraq by aircraft based at İncirlik was causing problems for Turkey in conducting its Middle Eastern policy. In the Middle East, Turkey was perceived as a country serving U.S. interests.
- 3. The use of the base at İncirlik was hurting Turkey's relations with Iraq. When Iraq threatened to take action against Turkey after Operation Desert Fox, Ankara requested and obtained Patriot missiles from the U.S.
- 4. As long as Turkey worked hand in hand with the U.S., it got harder for Ankara to improve relations with its two neighbors. During the 1990s it became progressively more difficult for Ankara to shift its policy and revert to the policy of the 1980s, when it cooperated with Baghdad rather than with the Kurds of Iraq.

5. The Turkish-Israeli Rapprochement and the U.S.

Starting in the mid-1990s, Turkey's relations with Israel began to improve. This was most evident in the field of military cooperation. Here we shall focus on the U.S. role and its effect on Turkish-U.S. relations rather than on the regional dynamics that led to this rapprochement. This aspect of Turkish-Israeli relations is examined later.

Israel's right to exist in the Middle East within secure borders has been one of the main pillars of U.S. regional policy, going back to the time when the state of Israel was established. Within this framework, Washington sought to bring Turkey and Israel closer together. These were two non-Arab countries that were democratic and closely linked with the U.S. This policy helped Washington to buttress its effectiveness in the region, while it also strengthened Israel's security.

When the Middle East Peace Process got underway in the 1990s, the U.S. stepped up its efforts in this direction and sought to soften Arab reactions by also involving Jordan in the rapprochement.

The Cooperation in Military Training Agreement between Turkey and Israel was signed in February 1996. This was followed by the Agreement on Cooperation between Defense Industries in August 1996. The U.S. participated in joint military exercises held in January 1998 and approved the modernization of Turkish F-4 aircraft and M-60 tanks in Israel.

When Israel sought to establish close relations with the newly independent states of Central Asia by developing joint projects with Turkey in 1992, the U.S. agreed to contribute to the financing of these projects.

Relations with Israel were important for Turkish-U.S. relations in two respects. First, Turkish-Israeli cooperation was seen as a sure way to influence U.S. foreign policy in Turkey's favor. By developing its relations with Israel, Turkey sought to secure the support of the influential Jewish lobby in the U.S. This would be particularly useful in dealing with the U.S. Congress, which was not all that well disposed toward Turkey. The support of the Jewish lobby was especially sought in connection with the purchase of U.S. attack helicopters and frigates. The Jewish lobby was helpful not just in overcoming the reluctance to sanction military sales to Turkey but also in blocking the Armenian bills. In fact, the Greek and Armenian lobbies took a joint stand against Jewish members of Congress for their support of Turkey.

The second benefit of good relations with Israel for Turkey was that it could allow Turkish exporters to use Israel to bypass U.S. import quotas. In this framework, Turkey and Israel concluded a free trade agreement in March 1996. The export of Turkish textiles to the U.S. via Israel soon ran into difficulties, however, when the requirement that the Israeli content of such products must not be less than one-third was introduced. In November 1999 preparations got underway for the U.S., Turkey, and Israel to establish a free trade area in Gaziantep or Yumurtalık.

Through Turkey's good relations with Israel, the U.S. became more effective in the Middle East and the eastern Mediterranean. Thus the U.S. was better able to ensure Israel's security, while it reinforced its ability to apply pressure on Syria in the course of the implementation of the Middle East Peace Process. The corresponding advantage for Turkey was that it could count on the support of Israel and the Jewish lobby in its dealings with the U.S. In the Middle East, Turkey was already in cooperation with the U.S. in the framework of Provide Comfort and the policy of dual containment. The third pillar of this cooperation would be the rapprochement with Israel.

B. The Balkans and the Convergence of Turkish-U.S. Interests

In the 1990s Turkey's and America's interests in the Balkans were almost totally convergent. The two countries had similar interests and objectives in the Balkans and were supporting the same countries and groups.

In the 1990s the U.S. was the nonregional actor with the greatest ability to influence developments in the Balkans. The Balkan region was not well endowed with natural resources but was still important to the U.S. for a number of reasons.

First, the region had strategic value because it was located in close proximity to the eastern Mediterranean, the Turkish Straits, and the waterways of the Middle East. Second, this was a region where the U.S. had been able to assert its international primacy. By delaying its intervention in Bosnia, the U.S. had demonstrated the ineffectiveness of the EU. Two of its armed interventions in the post-Cold War era had taken place in the Balkans: in Bosnia in 1995 and Yugoslavia in 1999, with the third intervention being in Iraq from 1991 to 1999. Third, the U.S. was instrumental in putting in place a number of measures designed to control regional conflicts in the Balkans: peacekeeping, as in IFOR (Implementation Force) and SFOR (Stabilization Force) in Bosnia; peace enforcement, as in KFOR (Kosovo Force) in Kosovo; and preventive deployment, as in UNPREDEP (United Nations Preventive Deployment Force) in Macedonia.

In this period the U.S. had the closest cooperation with Turkey in the region; thanks to this cooperation, Turkey was able to wield greater influence in the area. Turkish and American positions and interests coincided almost totally in all instances, the sole exception being the differences over the timing of the Bosnian intervention. This was not only true with respect to military operations in the Balkans. It also applied in the case of diplomacy and the regional cooperation structures that were being developed in that part of the globe.

When Yugoslavia began to show signs of coming apart in the early 1990s, the U.S., like Turkey, took a strong stand to help maintain the country's integrity due to fear of the instability that might result from disintegration. But when the country finally broke apart, both the U.S. and Turkey were quick to recognize the newly emerged states. The sole exception was the Republic of Macedonia, which posed some difficulties for the U.S.

When ethnic strife broke out in Bosnia-Herzegovina after its declaration of independence, Turkey and the U.S. adopted similar policies, even if they did not engage in explicit cooperation.

Turkey strongly advocated the lifting of the arms embargo on the Bosnians and called for armed intervention against the Bosnian Serbs. In the U.S., too, the State Department and some congressional circles defended the policy known as "lift and strike." Although the U.S. did not strike until 1994, it later became evident that the U.S. had allowed the arms ban to be breached and had looked the other way even when Iran was the supplier of weapons. It was also revealed that Turkey had also supplied arms to the Bosnians in the course of the war. This meant that both countries had been providing covert assistance to the same side.

Turkey and the U.S. also collaborated in the formation of the Bosnian-Croat Federation in Washington in March 1994. This development strongly affected the course of the war.

The Dayton Agreement that ended the war was largely the result of U.S. efforts. Turkish-U.S. cooperation also continued after the agreement. The largest contribution to IFOR and SFOR came from the U.S., but Turkey was also a contributor of troops.

In order to restore the balance of power in the region by strengthening Bosnia's military capability, the U.S. carried out the "train and equip" program with the participation of Turkey. Turkey took over the training part of the program, while the U.S. ran the equipping part.

While Ankara was busy building up its relations with Albania, this country was among the first of the former socialist countries of the Balkans to develop strong relations with U.S. The U.S. established a good political rapport with Tirana and even enjoyed the use of certain bases in Albania. The U.S. also supported the sale of weapons by Turkey to Albania and the training of its military personnel (including officers) by Turkish instructors.

Turkish-U.S. cooperation was even more notable in the case of the Republic of Macedonia. Both countries felt strongly that the maintenance of regional stability depended on the existence of a stable Macedonia and were concerned about the possibility of interethnic strife spreading from Bosnia to Macedonia. That is why Turkey appealed to the U.S. to deploy troops to the Macedonian-Yugoslav frontier. At that time, the U.S. was reluctant to commit land forces to the Balkan Peninsula. Instead the U.S. agreed to send a force of 500 within the framework of UNPREDEP (the UN's deterrent force) to a country that it had not recognized yet.

The Kosovo Question and the Bombing of Yugoslavia

Kosovo was important for the U.S. in several ways. First, it had the potential to destabilize the Balkans. Second, controlling Kosovo would allow the U.S. to influence the course of events in both Yugoslavia and Macedonia. The U.S. had been able to prevent the tension in Kosovo from degenerating into violence for ten years by exercising influence over Tirana and over the passive resistance movement under Ibrahim Rugova in Kosovo.

But, starting in February 1998, the passive resistance movement was displaced by armed resistance under the leadership of Ushtria Clirimtare Kosoves (known by its acronym: UCK). The U.S. then launched an intense diplomatic effort and convened the Contact Group, consisting of the U.S., Russia, Britain, France, and Italy. A meeting was held in Rambouillet, France, where a proposal was made to send an international force to Kosovo. It proved impossible to reach an agreement, however, and NATO aircraft under U.S. leadership started bombing Yugoslavia on 24 March 1999.

Given its own problems with Kurdish separatism, Turkey was not as active in this instance as it had been in the Bosnian conflict. Nevertheless, Ankara continued to cooperate with the U.S. and dispatched a number of F-16 aircraft to conduct surveillance and protection operations. Later Turkey also took part in attack operations. As Yugoslavia kept up its resistance, the U.S. increased the intensity of the bombing campaign. Washington was not prepared to accept the political consequences of abandoning the effort before it had imposed its will. When the U.S. approached Turkey about making use of Turkish bases, Ankara placed the bases at Bandıma and Çorlu at the disposal of the U.S. Air Force. U.S. ground personnel began arriving soon afterward; but before air operations could be launched from Turkish bases, Yugoslavia accepted the conditions set at Rambouillet and the NATO bombing came to an end.

KFOR was deployed in Kosovo after the air campaign, and Turkey contributed a contingent to this force. The U.S. was now militarily installed in Kosovo with KFOR as well as in Bosnia.

In addition, Turkey participated in the Southeastern Europe Cooperation Initiative (SECI), which was conceived in Washington. Also contributing to regional stability was the Southeastern Europe Multinational Force, in which Turkey participated as a member and the U.S. as an observer.

The Reasons for Turkish-U.S. Cooperation in the Balkans

- 1. Turkey and the U.S. had a long tradition of political and institutional cooperation. Turkey was an ideal ally in view of its geographic location and its political, human, and cultural links with the region.
  - 2. The Balkan nations that the U.S. supported—the Bosnians, Albanians, and Macedonians—were the very nations that Turkey supported and entertained good relations with. This made Turkey a perfect regional partner for the U.S.

3. The U.S. and Turkey were in general agreement regarding the instruments to be employed to overcome the region's problems. The use of force against the Bosnian Serbs, supplying Bosnia-Herzegovina with arms, preserving the territorial integrity of the Republic of Macedonia, and developing regional cooperation were among these instruments.

Cooperation with the U.S. in the Balkans brought Turkey tangible benefits.

- 1. Turkey's standing in Washington improved, and its weight in U.S. policy-making was enhanced. When President Clinton came to Turkey in November 1999, he recalled that "from Korea to Kosovo" Turkey stood shoulder to shoulder with the U.S. (Hürriyet, 17 November 1999).
- 2. Thanks to its cooperation with the U.S., Turkey was able to widen its field of maneuver in the Balkans. This led to an improvement of its relations with Albania, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Macedonia.
- 3. By being able to count on U.S. backing, Turkey encountered hardly any opposition from either the West or the regional countries when its importance in the Balkans increased.
- 4. Turkey was also able to gain an advantage over Greece, which was aligned with the EU and Russia in the Balkans.

To sum up, the U.S. had been able to use the Turkish bases at locations like İncirlik, Balikesir, and Çorlu when resorting to force against Iraq in 1991 and 1998–2000, against the Bosnian Serbs in 1995, and against Yugoslavia in 1999. Turkey was also contributing troops to SFOR in Bosnia and KFOR in Kosovo. No other country was in a position to play a similar role.

C. The U.S. and Turkey's Relations with the EU

Turkey's relations with the Western European countries and the EU did not run as smoothly as did its relations with the U.S., especially during the 1990s. This led Turkey politically to drift away from this region despite its many links. During this period the U.S. supported Turkey's efforts to accede to the EU. Successive secretaries of state as well as President Clinton raised this issue in their contacts with European leaders.

The U.S. maintained its support at the time of the confirmation of Turkey's membership in the customs union with the EU in 1995 as well as in the periods preceding the European summits of Luxembourg in December 1997 and Helsinki in December 1999, when Turkey was accepted as a candidate for accession. U.S. officials lobbied for Turkey with leading members of the European Parliament, and U.S. ambassadors made representations in Turkey's behalf. When the U.S. efforts proved unsuccessful at the Luxemburg summit, it became clear that the EU was prepared to ignore the U.S. when a conflict with the EU's interests was perceived.

The U.S. had a number of motives for supporting Turkey's membership in the EU.

- 1. Full membership would reinforce Turkey's links with the West. The U.S. did not want to see Turkey under a radical Islamic regime; nor did it want to see Turkey drifting further apart from Europe. Such developments would completely overturn the existing balance in the Middle East and cut off the link between Central Asia and the Caucasus with the West, jeopardizing energy corridors and the U.S. position in the region.
- 2. As indicated earlier, Turkey's long-standing links with the U.S. became even stronger during the 1990s. Since this situation was unlikely to change in the short term, it was in the U.S. interest to have such a close ally in the EU. Turkey's membership would ensure a second member of the EU with strong U.S. ties (after Britain) and reinforce U.S. influence within the European integration movement.
- 3. The U.S. was seeking to draw Eurasia into the broad European-Atlantic community during the 1990s, and Turkey was at a pivotal location within this geographical area.
- 4. With Turkey's membership, the EU would lose its homogeneity and lose its monolithic block structure and character by spreading out into new regions.
- 5. At this time, the EU was constructing its security apparatus; as a full member, Turkey would become part of the European Security and Defense Identity. The U.S. was particularly eager to see Turkey, a close U.S. collaborator in the field of defense issues, integrated with the WEU.

The EU clearly was not ready to admit Turkey merely because the U.S. desired this outcome, and this was obvious to both Washington and Ankara. The U.S. diplomatic effort, however, did ensure that Turkey was not totally excluded by Europe during the 1990s.

D. The Caucasus, Central Asia, and Energy Corridors in Turkish-U.S. Relations

In the 1990s some aspects of the policy objectives of Turkey and the U.S. in the Caucasus and Central Asia were concordant. Turkey and the U.S. now found a new area of cooperation in a region that was important to both countries. Dealing with these regions was a novel experience for both of them. Turkey had the ability to develop its ties with both regions thanks to its linguistic, religious, and cultural affinity with their peoples. In this endeavor Turkey had the backing of the U.S.

Throughout the 1990s American interest in Central Asia was on the increase due to a number of factors. Among these were the Russian effort to increase its influence in the region through the policy of the Near Abroad (see Box 7-55 below), the EU's launching of the Transportation Corridor Europe-Central Asia (known as TRACECA) and the Interstate Oil and Gas Transport Europe (known as INOGATE) projects, and China's efforts to develop its relations with the region and especially with Kyrgyzstan. In 1994 the U.S. got the countries of the Caucasus and Central Asia into the Partnership for Peace program of NATO (see Box 7-17 below) and began to provide economic and military aid to Kazakhstan and Uzbekistan, the most important countries in the region. This allowed the U.S. to develop its political relations with these two states. The U.S. State Department described this region in 1998 as being important from the point of view of the "strategic" and "vital" interests of the U.S.

The region was important for the U.S. from the following perspectives.

- 1. From the strategic perspective, a number of strategists (including Brzezinski) advanced the view that this region was at the center of the global struggle for power and that the country that established its primacy there would be preponderant on the world stage. This geopolitical theory had a long lineage (see Box 4-8 in Section 4). The region was also important because of its proximity to the Middle East.
- 2. Azerbaijan was always a major producer of oil, but recent surveys had revealed that the Caspian basin contained huge amounts of hydrocarbons. U.S. secretary of energy Bill Richardson speculated that the Caspian basin would free the U.S. from depending on the Middle East for oil.
- The U.S. did not want the Caucasus and Central Asia to revert to Russian control; nor did it want Iran, Afghanistan, or China to exert influence in the region.
- 4. The U.S. priorities in the region were the development of democracy and the market economy, the prevention of ethnic strife, and effective controls over nuclear weapons and fissile materials.

After reinforcing its control of the Middle East in the post–Cold War era, the U.S. moved rapidly to fill the vacuum in this newly emerging region. U.S.-based companies like Chevron, Exxon and AMOCO were present in all of the oil agreements signed and consortiums set up to develop the energy resources of the region. The U.S. also expanded its political activities in the Caucasus and Central Asia through Turkey. After the oil and gas resources of the Middle East, the resources of the Caspian Basin also came under U.S. control.

The areas in which Turkey and the U.S. cooperated in the Caucasus and Central Asia can be listed as follows:

- Although Russia was allowed a certain freedom of political maneuvering in this region, it was prevented from exercising exclusive control over pipelines.
- Iran's religious and political influences would be checked, and Islamic radicalism would not be allowed to gain strength in the region.
- The oil and natural gas of the region would be marketed via Turkey and the Mediterranean and not via Iran and the Persian Gulf.
- Turkey would wield political, economic, military, and cultural influence in the region and would be held up as a role model.
- Both countries were opposed to the Russian legal position, which considered the Caspian Sea to be a lake.

Turkey and the U.S. had divergent interests, however, in some areas:

- In the Armenia-Azerbaijan conflict, the U.S. sided with Armenia and suspended aid to Azerbaijan.
- Although the U.S. supported the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan (BTC) pipeline, it was quite cautious at that time and had also supported alternative pipelines not crossing Iran. This reduced the importance of the BTC pipeline and affected its feasibility. Furthermore, Washington again had failed to persuade U.S. oil companies that considered the project too costly and therefore uneconomic. Nonetheless, the BTC project was finally realized.
- The U.S. would allow Russia a free hand in the region from time to time. One example was when the U.S. allowed Russia to ignore its commitment under the Reduction of Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty to reduce its forces in the region.

The Opening Up of Turkey to the Caucasus and Central Asia and the Stand of the U.S.

At this time, Turkey was seeking to enhance its influence in the Caucasus and Central Asia, relying on its linguistic, religious, cultural, and historical ties with the Turkic inhabitants of the region. The U.S. supported Turkey's efforts to gain greater access to the region, and Turkish and U.S. interests became convergent in a number of areas.

Politically, the U.S. wanted to see these countries steering away from Russian and Iranian influence. That is why Washington supported Turkey's efforts to strengthen its political and military ties with these countries and entered into military cooperation with Ankara, similar to the cooperation already taking place in the Balkans and the Middle East. In 1994 all of the countries of the region, with the exception of Tajikistan, were admitted into NATO's Partnership for Peace program. Their army officers were sent to Turkey for training, and in 1997 the U.S. and Turkey conducted military exercises with the participation of Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Russia.

The U.S. also supported growing Turkish penetration into the region in the cultural and religious fields. Washington was backing Turkey's efforts to get these countries to switch from the Cyrillic to the Latin alphabet. The U.S. also supported the sending of Turkish preachers and Qurans written in the Latin script to these countries. The choice was between Iran's radical interpretation of Islam (backed in the 1990s with radio broadcasts beamed into the region) and Turkey's secular system, with religion firmly under state control. The U.S. was giving strong backing to the Turkish model. This gave rise to persistent claims that the U.S. was supporting the proliferation of Fethullah Gülen's schools in the region. It was claimed that (after meeting with the U.S. ambassador in Ankara, Morton Abramowitz) Gülen sent seventy teachers to Uzbekistan under the banner "U.S. Friendship Bridge" (Yeni Şafak, 25 June 1999) Economically, the U.S. wanted to see these countries switch over to the market economy and felt that Turkey's practices of the early 1980s could be transferred to these countries. Turkey and the U.S. encouraged them to leave the ruble zone. When entering this region, U.S. businesses frequently went into partnership with Turkish companies.

After 1997 the U.S. took a firmer stand against Russia's policies in this area and in so doing helped the regional countries in their efforts to break loose from Russia's grip. A report to the U.S. Congress stated that—uneasy over Turkey's growing influence in the region—Russia engaged in closer cooperation with Iran, resulting in two rival alliances vying for influence in the region: the U.S.-Turkey alliance and the Russia-Iran alliance. With the backing of the U.S., Turkey proposed a Stability Pact for the Caucasus in 1999 that would strengthen Ankara's presence in the region. (This pact was not realized because the U.S. finally disapproved it.)

The U.S. Position on Pipelines

One of the most important areas of Turkish-U.S. cooperation in the 1990s was the transport of Caspian oil to Turkey via a pipeline running from Baku to Ceyhan.

The main features of U.S. policy on this issue were the following:

- U.S. policy in relation to the pipeline was part of the strategic dimension of Washington's Eurasia policy and went beyond the transport of oil to market by the shortest route. The policy was based on long-term strategic considerations rather than short-term profit calculations by oil companies.
- The political objective was to bring these countries closer together and align their policies with those of the U.S.
- The U.S. wanted the oil be transported through more than one pipeline. The purpose of this objective, also backed by the major oil companies, was to ensure the dependable and uninterrupted delivery of oil to world markets.
- The U.S. wanted to release the region's oil producers from the stranglehold of the Russian pipeline monopoly, thereby reinforcing their independence.
- Another goal was to keep Iran out of the regional competitions for pipeline routes.

The U.S. interest in Turkey in the field of energy was concentrated in two areas. One of these was investments in Turkey in energy (examined in the framework of economic relations below). The other area was the East-West Energy Transportation Corridor, which had to do with the transport of oil and gas to global markets through pipelines.

In the second half of the 1990s U.S. activities in connection with pipelines in the region intensified and cooperation with Turkey accelerated. After 1995 the U.S. began to support the Baku-Ceyhan project. In May 1998 the Caspian Sea Initiative was launched; and in June 1998 President Clinton signaled the importance that he attributed to this issue by appointing a special representative.

U.S. support for the Baku-Ceyhan line was highly welcome to Turkey. As indicated earlier, however, U.S. support was within the framework of a multiplicity of links, which meant the U.S. also supported alternative pipelines. The political support of the U.S. for the Baku-Ceyhan line was important because the oil companies and financial institutions did not consider this link, expected to cost $2.4 billion, to be economically viable.

In 1998 and 1999 the U.S. efforts to secure the construction of the Baku-Ceyhan pipeline began to gain pace. As a result of these efforts, the Ankara Declaration was signed in October 1998 at a ceremony attended by the U.S. secretary of energy. As signatories, Turkey, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan affirmed that the Baku-Ceyhan line would be the main route for transporting Caspian oil to global markets.

The breakthrough came in November 1999, when Clinton came to Ankara and witnessed the signing of the agreement for the construction of the Baku-Ceyhan line. The U.S. secretary of energy qualified this agreement as a "political victory" and added that it was an agreement that would serve America's strategic interests.

In 2000 vast new oil reserves were discovered in the Kazakh sector of the Caspian Sea in the region of Kashagan. This discovery raised the hopes of Turkish and U.S. officials that the production of this field would be channeled to Azerbaijan and incorporated within the Baku-Ceyhan project. This would raise the amount of oil carried in the pipeline, improving the line's economic prospects. In April 2000 the U.S. Eximbank indicated that it would contribute to the construction of the pipeline. This was a further sign of continuing U.S. support for the pipeline.

While Turkey and the U.S. were cooperating on the Baku-Ceylan pipeline, they were in disagreement on the subject of other energy outlets.

The U.S. was uneasy about the natural gas agreement concluded by Turkey with Iran in 1996 and the Blue Stream Project being developed with Russia. The U.S. was against any project that would strengthen Iran's economy and increase its influence in the region. In his speech at the Second Energy Conference held in Ankara in March 1999, American ambassador Mark Parris declared that the Caspian pipeline should have priority and that Turkey had to concentrate on projects that were realistic and feasible. Nevertheless, a week after the Baku-Ceyhan agreement had been signed on 18 November 1999, Turkey reached an understanding with an Italian firm for carrying out the Blue Stream Project (see Box 7-56 below).

Turkey was pleased with the backing given by the U.S. to the Baku-Ceyhan line but also apprehensive about certain other developments. In the first place, despite the U.S. support for the project and the agreements signed, little was being done in the way of implementation. Many experts held the view that the project would not be completed because of low oil prices and the lack of an adequate supply of Azerbaijani petroleum.

In addition, the U.S. was giving support to trans-Balkan pipelines in the framework of its policy of supporting multiple outlets for Caspian oil. One of these projects caused particular unease to Turkey. This was the project that would take Caspian oil to the Russian Black Sea port of Novorossiysk. It would then be transported by tanker to the Bulgarian port of Burgaz, which would be connected by pipeline to the Greek port of Alexandroupolis on the Aegean. This project would compete with Baku-Ceylan and remove one of Turkey's trump cards in its negotiations over the transport of oil by bypassing the Straits. Another U.S.-sponsored project causing doubts in Turkey was the proposal by the U.S. Department of Commerce to construct a pipeline that would carry natural gas from Qatar and Egypt to Turkey via Israel and Jordan.

Furthermore, the U.S. had not supported Turkey's proposal to hook up the pipeline from Baku to Supsa to the Baku-Ceyhan pipeline. The U.S. kept up its support for Baku-Ceyhan in all its official statements on the subject, however, and renewed its efforts in this direction, allowing this route to remain a viable option. The project maintained its importance as an example of U.S. support for Turkey. Things continued to drag throughout the 1990s, but construction finally got underway on 20 September 2002. The project was expected to cost $2.4 billion and was due for completion in February 2005. (It was finally completed in July 2006, with a cost close to $3 billion.)

The Armenia-Azerbaijan Conflict and the U.S.

The policies of Turkey and the U.S. in the Caucasus and Central Asia were in large measure concordant. But this was not the case in the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan. Although Azerbaijan was a more important country from the point of view of its geographic location, its natural resources, and the size of its population, it nearly found itself among the states ostracized by the U.S. because of the activities of the Armenian diaspora.

After the dispute erupted over Karabakh and Azerbaijan reacted by imposing a blockade on Armenia, the Armenian lobby in the U.S. went into action and forced the passage of a law to deny Azerbaijan economic aid. Under the terms of this law, known as Freedom Support Act 907, all humanitarian aid to Azerbaijan was suspended in 1992 because it had imposed an economic blockade on Armenia. The U.S. administration was aware that Armenia had occupied a fifth of Azerbaijan's territory and that the victim of the conflict was being treated unfairly. This is why aid continued to be provided to Azerbaijan by the U.S. Administration through NGOs. Congress subsequently offered even more flexibility by deciding that the administration itself could provide aid if it determined that the aid provided by NGOs to Azerbaijan was insufficient.

The U.S. also objected to the blockade that Turkey imposed on Armenia and sought to have this measure repealed. Turkey did not comply, however, because of the complications that this would create in its relations with Azerbaijan and also because of the problems that it would raise in Turkish domestic politics.

The conflict between Azerbaijan and Armenia remained a source of disagreement between Turkey and the U.S. throughout the period.

IV. THE DEVELOPMENT OF TURKISH-U.S. RELATIONS

A. The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) and U.S. Military and Economic Aid

The Defense and Economic

Cooperation Agreement

It will be recalled that DECA was signed by Turkey and the U.S. in 1980 and was extended for five more years in 1985 by a side letter that was dated 1987. When the agreement came to an end on 17 December 1990, it was automatically extended for a year when neither side indicated a desire to terminate it. Turkey gave notice of its wish to make changes in the agreement at each extension date throughout the 1990s but was unsuccessful in securing any changes.

Turkey's main reason for wanting changes was the altered circumstances following the end of the Cold War. When DECA was due to expire on 18 December 1992, Turkey called for a renegotiation of the agreement, without, however, demanding that it be terminated. Turkey recalled that in the past the U.S. had promised to make an effort to repeal the 7:10 ratio and raise the level of military aid and submitted the following requests:

- DECA also contained provisions regarding the status of Turkish bases used by the U.S. As the number of bases was progressively reduced, the capacity of Incirlik was expanded, and it was used by Allied forces during the Gulf War. A new arrangement was needed on this issue.
- Operation Provide Comfort should be incorporated into DECA.
- Transfer of technology should take place in defense industries, U.S. training facilities should be made accessible to Turkish personnel, and Turkey should be given priority in the delivery of surplus U.S. materials and equipment to allies.

Turkey's main objective was to prevent the U.S. from cutting aid by citing budget constraints and to secure more favorable terms for loans provided at prevailing market rates. It failed to attain these objectives, however, and the level of aid continued to diminish.

S.R.E

KÜTÜPELDEĞİ

When the Clinton administration took office in January 1993, Turkey made one more attempt and called for the commitments contained in the side letter of 1987 to be incorporated in DECA. But it was disappointed once again. Whereas in the past Congress had insisted on the 7:10 ratio in the apportionment of aid to Greece and Turkey while the administration resisted, this time the administration itself proposed the 7:10 ratio. Later, when Mümtaz Soysal was foreign minister, the U.S. raised the rate of interest on the aid funds being furnished to Turkey. Turkey warned that DECA would be reviewed but was still unable to bring about changes.

The Refahyol coalition (consisting of the Welfare Party and True Path Party) approved DECA without proposing any changes to it.

In the prevailing circumstances, the U.S. was able to obtain all that it wanted from Turkey. Under these conditions there was no need for the U.S. to consider a renegotiated DECA that might create new problems and give rise to new demands.

U.S. Military and Economic Aid

Having started with the Truman Doctrine, U.S. aid was designed to bolster Turkey and Greece militarily and economically to enable them to stand up to the Eastern Bloc. When the Cold War came to an end, the purpose and function of military and economic aid to these countries became the subject of debate in the U.S. One of the salient features of this period was the tendency of Congress to make substantial cuts in the funds set aside for the State Department and especially for foreign aid. At this time, the Clinton administration submitted a bill to Congress to replace the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 that was designed to deal with the circumstances of the Cold War (that is, contain communism and check the influence of the USSR). The Peace, Prosperity, and Democracy bill, submitted in 1994, pursued five basic objectives: to support sustainable development, develop democracy, furnish humanitarian aid, strengthen peace, and promote growth through trade and investments. U.S. officials declared in Congress that the new bill would help the developing countries to grow and increase their trade. This would create new export markets for U.S. companies. The U.S. also intended to use economic aid as a means to resolve regional problems and prevent conflicts. Another important goal was to use aid to assist the countries of Eastern Europe and Russia to carry out the transition to democracy and the market economy. While no cuts were contemplated in the aid being provided to Israel and Egypt, Turkey and Greece were placed among the countries that would not require further external aid after the mid-1990s.

The new developments on the global scene affected the form, amount, and terms of the aid being provided to Turkey. This happened at a time when Turkey was expecting U.S. aid to increase in the aftermath of the Gulf War. Turkey's expectations were only partially met, because U.S. external aid policy was undergoing a transformation and a number of developments were taking place in Turkey itself.

In 1989 the U.S. terminated the Military Assistance Program that had been operating since 1961. This was replaced by the Foreign Military Financing Program under the Pentagon's control. At the same time, the aid being furnished to Turkey from the Economic Support Fund (ESF) was turned into a source for arms procurement. Even as the level of aid provided to Turkey from the ESF dwindled, there was a large increase in Turkey's arms purchases from the U.S.

The first significant development of the 1990s was the emergency aid of $82 million provided to Turkey during the Gulf War. Even if this did not come in the category of direct aid, Turkey's textile export quotas were raised. When the 1993 aid budget was being debated in Congress in 1992, no provision had been made for economic aid to countries like Turkey that were playing host to joint bases. At U.S. senator Robert Byrd's initiative, Turkey was allocated $125 million in aid. This was the result of the goodwill generated by Turkey's actions during the Gulf War. Furthermore, the administration and the legislators made no mention of the 7:10 ratio in the course of the debates on the aid budget. The ratio came up again in 1993, however. This time it was the administration that proposed observing the ratio in the apportionment of aid to Greece and Turkey, whereas it had been imposed by Congress in the past. In 1993 a number of senators proposed the suspension of aid until Turkey took concrete steps toward settling the Cyprus question; but this proposal was turned down, thanks to the State Department, which opposed the move.

Another important change in the nature of the aid to Turkey came in 1993, when Congress eliminated the grant portion of the Foreign Military Sales (FMS) credits to Greece and Turkey on the grounds that the threat to NATO had been removed. Henceforth this assistance would consist exclusively of loans, and the rate of interest would be the prevailing market rate of 10 to 14% rather than the previous 5%. As the grant component of FMS was eliminated, there was a large increase in the amount of military equipment provided to Turkey under the Southern Regional Amendment and Excess Defense Articles.

In addition, when Turkey ran into an economic crisis in April 1994 under the Çiller government, the Clinton administration agreed to provide $1.2 billion from the Gulf Fund that had been set aside in 1991 for the procurement of F-16 aircraft under the second phase.

U.S. aid to Turkey ran into difficulties, especially after 1994. The arrest of the DEP deputies and the closure of the party intensified U.S. congressional criticism directed at Turkey. By now Turkey's position in the Gulf War had become a thing of the past. Although the administration kept stressing that Turkey was allowing Operation Provide Comfort to go on and that Turkey was an ally of strategic significance, the Greek and Armenian lobbies were active and influential.

When Congress was reviewing aid to Turkey in June 1994, a provision was added that read "aid must not be used in violation of international law." It made 10% of the aid contingent on the State Department's report on Turkey's progress in human rights and the question of Cyprus. The State Department's report noted that human rights abuses did occur in the course of the struggle against the PKK but added that Turkey had a right to ensure internal security to defend itself. Nevertheless, Turkey refused to accept the 10% of the aid that had been made conditional. When the U.S. introduced a similar provision in the aid package to Greece, in which Greece's compliance with the sanctions against Yugoslavia would be monitored, Greece too rejected 10% of the aid.

Turkey's annoyance grew when, in addition to the Cyprus and human rights conditions, the U.S. Congress cut $5 million from the aid package because Turkey had closed its airspace to Armenia.

For fiscal year 1996 the administration proposed $450 million in military aid to Turkey in addition to $100 million from the Economic Support Fund. Congress trimmed the administration's proposals to $320 million for military aid and $33 million for economic support. Aid to Greece was also trimmed to comply with the 7:10 ratio. In May 1996 President Clinton cited America's national interest and rejected the Humanitarian Air Corridor clause that had been introduced into the aid bill through the strenuous efforts of the Greek and Armenian lobbies.

In 1997 a subcommittee of the House of Representatives decided that the $60 million in economic aid to Turkey proposed by the administration should be limited to $22 million until Turkey acknowledged the Armenian Genocide of 1915. The Senate subcommittee cited Turkey as a "faithful NATO ally" and an "important actor in the implementation of Operation Provide Comfort" and set the level of aid to Turkey at $175 million for the military component and $22 million for the economic component. Because economic aid had been made conditional, Turkey refused to accept it and only did so after the conditions were lifted.

In 1998 the U.S. converted into a grant $20 million of the $150 million earmarked for Turkey as Foreign Military Sales loans. That year, Turkey refused to accept economic assistance because it came with the condition that it be spent on projects in southeastern Turkey.

An important development was the U.S. decision to end FMS loans after 1999. Congress declared that Greece and Turkey were now capable of meeting their defense needs from their own resources and decided to reallocate this type of assistance to the new members of NATO. In this process, Turkey first saw the grant component of military aid eliminated; then loans began to be extended at market conditions bearing an interest of 10.5%; and eventually the aid program itself was brought to a complete end. This happened in stages during a period when Turkey's relations with the U.S. were being developed within the framework of "enhanced partnership."

The ending of FMS loans also had beneficial effects, however. First, Turkey was no longer subject to intense critical scrutiny in Congress each time aid appropriations came up for debate. Then there was the requirement that FMS loans be spent in the U.S. The purchases were made by U.S. agencies on behalf of Turkey, which sometimes resulted in wasteful spending. Occasionally funds were spent on obsolete systems. A third benefit was that FMS loans had started becoming a substantial economic burden. In the 1990s Turkey was spending over $400 million annually to service these loans. In 1992 repayments consisted of $166 million for principal and $269 million for interest. Payments during the first decade of the new century would amount to $200 million annually, with repayments ending in 2016. A fourth benefit was that the ending of FMS gave Turkey the possibility of submitting requests for surplus military equipment. Furthermore, no political conditions were attached to the delivery of surplus weapons and military equipment.

In summary, during the 1990s new conditions were attached to U.S. military and economic aid to Turkey: that the Turkish embargo on Armenia be lifted and that the weapons be used in compliance with international law. These conditions were in addition to the former conditions regarding Cyprus and the observance of the 7:10 ratio. The most important development in the field of aid was that it began to diminish and finally came to a complete end. This removed aid as a factor influencing Turkish-U.S. relations.

U.S. Weapons Sales and the "Hidden Embargo"
During this period Turkey procured weapons from the U.S. under four separate programs: (1) Foreign Military Sales (FMS); (2) Direct Commercial Sales (DCS);
(3) delivery of Excess Defense Articles (EDA) by the Pentagon; and (4) delivery of weapons slated for disposal within the Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty, under the system known as cascading.

Starting in 1990, Turkey obtained large amounts of weapons through these programs, much in excess of what it had been getting in the past. The value of the equipment thus procured fluctuated from a low of $536 million in 1995 to a maximum of $1.2 billion in 1997. There were a number of reasons for these high levels of arms purchases, notably the intensifying struggle against the PKK, the instability reigning among Turkey's neighbors, the acquisition of missile systems capable of hitting Turkey by Syria and Iran, and the arms race with Greece. The U.S. supported Turkey's efforts to renew its defense systems.

During this period Turkey faced two obstacles in its arms procurements from the U.S. One obstacle was paying for these weapons. In the case of weapons that were not delivered as an outright grant, joint ventures were established with the manufacturers of the weapons or payments were made with Eximbank loans guaranteed by the U.S. Treasury. The second obstacle was the criticism directed at the U.S. administration particularly by the Greek and Armenian lobbies and human rights organizations in connection with the weapons delivered to or jointly manufactured with Turkey.

Until 1995 the sale of Cobra attack helicopters to Turkey was prevented by Congress and the opposition of human rights groups. Of the fifty helicopters being sought by Turkey, it was possible to procure only ten. But when Turkey sought bids for the joint manufacture of 145 helicopters within a program amounting to $4 billion, U.S. companies interested in the program appealed directly to the White House and sought permission to submit their tenders. The administration gave its conditional approval to this request in order to avoid alienating Turkey and especially in order not to leave the field to European and Israeli-Russian firms. Under the administration's conditions, the U.S. State Department would make a determination in December 1997 regarding Turkey's compliance with democracy and human rights according to seven criteria: lifting the state of emergency, ensuring freedom of expression, releasing journalists and deputies imprisoned for their opinions, ending torture and punishing those guilty of torture, repealing the decrees closing certain NGOs, extending democracy and political participation, and returning those displaced in the southeast to their homes. If Turkey complied with these criteria, the sale of helicopters would be allowed to proceed.

Another difficulty arose over the delivery of three frigates of the Perry class. Two of these vessels were to be delivered as grants, and the third was to be leased. When delivery was delayed, the Turkish media described this as a "hidden embargo." Turkey had dispatched the crews of these vessels (consisting of 480 men) to the U.S. and had incurred additional expenses amounting to $50 million because delivery of the frigates was delayed. The Clinton administration had held up the delivery because of the U.S. election in 1996 and the Kardak-Imia crisis with Greece in January 1996.

There were also difficulties in connection with the delivery of aerial refueling tanker aircraft that would extend the range of Turkish combat aircraft. The delivery of the two tanker aircraft that Turkey had leased at the initial stage was delayed by the Greek lobby, but these were eventually delivered in November 1995.

All in all, the figures for the 1990s show that the U.S. sold, gave, or leased large quantities of arms to Turkey; although occasional delays occurred, there was no comprehensive embargo that applied to these deliveries. These large-scale deliveries reflected the U.S. approach to Turkey. The U.S. administration was cooperating with Turkey in the Balkans, in the Caucasus, in Central Asia, and in the Middle East and wanted Turkey to be strong militarily. The U.S. used this argument to rebut the domestic criticism directed at it for its arms deliveries. Furthermore, U.S. defense industries wanted a larger share of Turkey's arms procurements and obtained the backing of some members of Congress, the administration, and especially the Pentagon (Box 7-15). This proved that, when necessary, the administration was capable of surmounting the opposition of Congress. Turkey used its cooperation with the U.S. to secure Washington's backing for the modernization of its armed forces.

B. Economic and Trade Relations

The main issues affecting Turkish-U.S. economic relations during this period were the restrictions placed on Turkey's textile exports, the possibility of substantial U.S. investments in Turkey in the energy and communica-

Box 7-15. The Military-Industrial Complex in the U.S.

The term "military-industrial complex" is used to describe the shared interests of certain groups in the triangle consisting of defense industries, the Pentagon, and Congress and the effects of these shared interests on foreign policy. Occasionally this is referred to as the "Steel Triangle." The phrase "military-industrial complex" was first coined by Dwight Eisenhower at the end of his term as president in 1961 when he announced its existence and warned the administration to be on guard against its influence.

The military industrial complex is made up of the Pentagon, glant defense industries (like Boeing, Raytheon, Northrop Grumman, McDonnell Douglas, Lockheed-Martin, General Dynamics, and Bechtel), and the members of Congress coming from those states where these industries are located. To these must be added tesearch and development companies, labor unions with members employed in these industries, and universities that work on defense projects. The relationship between the Pentagon and defense industries has a noteworthy feature. Many retired Pentagon officials work in defense industries and constitute the organic links between the two entities. It has often been alleged that these organic links influence the arms procurement procedures of the U.S. armed forces as well as U.S. foreign policy.

The military-industrial complex is held responsible for the tough anti-USSR policies of the Cold War, the high defense spending brought about by the fear of communism whipped up in the U.S. the overkill capacity created in the field of nuclear weapons, and the Vietnam War and the inability to bring it to an early end.

(I. UZGEL)

tions sectors and in the GAP project, intellectual property rights, and the imbalance in favor of the U.S. in bilateral trade.

Trade Relations

Toward the end of the 1980s Turkey sought to develop its trade and economic relations with the U.S. and adopted the mantra of "less aid, more trade." But it cannot be said that Turkey was able to achieve its objectives. Although there was an increase in the volume of trade, the balance of trade had become more unfavorable for Turkey. As economic relations developed, the Joint Economic Committee was established in 1993 and the Business Development Council in 1996.

The most noteworthy development in this area occurred in 1995, when the U.S. Department of Commerce included Turkey among the ten big emerging markets. By describing Turkey as such, it was significant that the U.S. perceived the Turkish economy as having reached a high enough level of purchasing power to be worthy of U.S. attention. Starting in 1997, there were five important issues in the agenda of Turkish-U.S. relations: regional cooperation, energy issues, Cyprus, and defense and security cooperation. In May 1998 a meeting was organized at U.S. initiative in Istanbul under the banner "Turkey, the Crossroad of Continents." This meeting was attended by 600 businesspeople and investors from the U.S. The U.S. Embassy also got Turkish businesspeople to travel to America to establish business contacts. The U.S. supported Turkey's bid for membership in the G-20 in 1999. This group included the countries with the twenty largest developing economies.

The total volume of trade between Turkey and the U.S. grew from $3 billion in 1992 to $6 billion in 1997. The share of the U.S. in Turkey's trade grew steadily to reach 10% of imports and 9% of exports. Turkey's share in America's total trade volume, however, was barely 0.5%.

Despite this growth, there were also problems in bilateral trade. First, Turkey's trade gap with the U.S. was constantly growing. Of the total trade amounting to $6 billion, Turkey's exports amounted to only $2 billion. Although the U.S. had a total trade deficit running into hundreds of billions, Turkey was one of the few countries with which the U.S. balance of trade was in surplus.

Second, both countries had complaints about trade restrictions. Turkey had been complaining about restrictive quotas imposed by the U.S. on Turkish textiles and garments since the 1980s, and these complaints persisted in the 1990s. These quotas were important because textiles and garments made up half of Turkey's exports to the U.S. The U.S. gave assurances that quotas would be gradually eliminated by 2005. But this lifting of quotas would apply to U.S. imports from all sources. When Prime Minister Ecevit visited Washington in September 1999, he declared that the level of trade relations was unsatisfactory and called for the reduction of restrictions on textiles. There were also difficulties in Turkey's exports of iron and steel products, figs, and pasta.

As for the U.S., it had complaints over restrictions placed by Turkey on the importation of American agricultural products and livestock.

U.S. Investments

Although trade relations with Turkey did not develop as expected, the U.S. appeared to be greatly interested in direct investments in Turkey. A Bilateral Investments Agreement had been signed in 1985 but only came into effect in May 1990. The agreement allowed investors to repatriate their profits and established procedures for settling disputes.

The interest of the U.S. was basically due to the large energy projects being undertaken in Turkey. American firms were particularly interested in the GAP project. In November 1999 a group of American businesspeople visited the GAP region, accompanied by American ambassador Mark Parris. The delegation consisted of the representatives of firms like General Electric and DuPont and David Rockefeller, the honorary president of the influential Council on Foreign Relations. At the end of the 1990s the U.S. got ready to invest $2 billion in Turkish energy projects (including the construction of dams and upgrading power plants) plus a further $800 million to be invested in the GAP project. The first step in this direction was taken by Turkish and U.S. companies when they signed an energy agreement in the amount of $675 million in November 1999.

The U.S. had complaints about the investment climate in Turkey. The first complaint was the 15% tax imposed on U.S. investors, but the taxation agreement signed in 1996 and ratified in 1998 eliminated this tax.

Another complaint was Turkey's lax enforcement of copyright laws. U.S. companies claimed that Turkish legislation protecting copyrights and patents was inadequate and that they were losing millions of dollars because of this. As a result, the U.S. placed Turkey in 1992 and 1993 on the list of countries that would be kept under close scrutiny. When Turkey enacted the law on copyrights and patents in June 1995, U.S. officials expressed satisfaction, even though complaints persisted over the law's implementation.

The U.S. administration maintained its position that Turkish legislation on investments did not entice American investors to put their money in Turkey. At a meeting in Istanbul in December 1998, U.S. ambassador Mark Parris even warned that Turkey might have to face electrical power cuts very soon because of its investment laws.

In the 1990s the U.S. share of foreign direct investments in Turkey was 14%, placing it in second or third place depending on the year, after Germany and France.

During the 1990s Turkey's importance for the U.S. was growing, not just as a strategic partner but also as a market and a place to invest. The U.S. was pursuing a policy based on finding new markets as well as developing traditional markets. Turkey offered many possibilities, especially in the energy sector. At the end of 1999 the representatives of the Trade Development Agency, the Overseas Private Investment Corporation, and Eximbank formed the Caspian Financial Center in Ankara, with a view to seeking investment and trade opportunities in Turkey and the Caspian Basin. Another sign of the importance attributed to Turkey's economic potential was the establishment by Senator Byrd of the Appalachia-Turkey Trade Project in 2000. The project's aim was to direct traders and investors in thirteen states in the Appalachian region to Turkey. It will be recalled that in 1990 Senator Byrd had prevented the Armenian Genocide bill from coming to a vote in the Senate by his filibustering.

Traditionally, Turkey had sought to extract economic advantage from its strategic importance to the U.S. In the 1990s the U.S. was using its close cooperation with Turkey to gain economic advantage.

C. Turkish-Greek Relations, the Cyprus Question, and the U.S.

In the post–Cold War era, the U.S. continued to play an important role in Turkish-Greek relations and the question of Cyprus. Although the U.S. was unable to achieve tangible results in resolving the chronic problems between the two neighbors, it was able to exert its influence to prevent the status quo from being upset during the acute Kardak-Imia crisis and the installation of S-300 missiles in southern Cyprus.

Turkish-Greek Relations and the U.S.

Unlike the situation in the 1980s during Papandreou's premiership, in the 1990s Greek foreign policy was not based on a strident anti-American rhetoric. Both Konstantinos Mitsotakis (who was the prime minister from 1990 to 1993) and Andreas Papandreou (who came to power once again in October 1993) adopted a policy based on good relations with America. Greece did not want to confront the U.S. now that it was wielding greater influence in the international arena after emerging from the Cold War as the sole superpower. The Simitis government that followed also maintained good relations with the U.S., even though Greek policy was now focused on the EU.

In the context of Turkish-Greek relations and the question of Cyprus, Turkey enjoyed two advantages during this period in its relations with the U.S. One was its close cooperation with the U.S. in the triangle covering the Balkans, the Caucasus/Central Asia, and the Middle East. Another was that in the 1990s, when the U.S. was closely involved in the Balkans, Greece took the Serbian side first in Bosnia and then during the Kosovo crisis. Greece violated the sanctions regime against Yugoslavia, took an unreasonable stand in its dispute with the Republic of Macedonia, strained its relations with Albania, and became the odd man out in March 1999 by opposing NATO's operation against Yugoslavia. It is worth noting that the U.S. House of Representatives punished Greece by reducing the amount of aid by 10% for not complying with UN sanctions against Serbia.

During the Cold War, the U.S. was uneasy over Turkish-Greek tension because this weakened NATO's southeastern flank in the confrontation with the Eastern Bloc. In the 1990s different factors came into play. The U.S. was unhappy with the Turkish-Greek confrontation because it threatened stability in the eastern Mediterranean, created problems within NATO, and could have a negative effect on the finely balanced U.S. relationship with the EU.

What really alarmed the U.S. was the crisis that erupted in 1996 over the rocks of Kardak-Imia (see "Relations with Greece" below). The official U.S. position was that these islets were under the sovereignty of neither Greece nor Turkey. At that stage, the U.S. was seeking to keep the crisis under control rather than to find a final solution. In the course of the crisis, the assistant secretary of state in charge of European affairs, Richard Holbrooke, appealed to Greek officials to haul down the flag that had been hoisted at Kardak and withdraw the soldiers that had taken up position there. The Greeks agreed to withdraw their soldiers but refused to haul down their flag on the grounds that Kardak belonged to Greece. Both sides eventually agreed to put the question on ice. Convinced that the rocks were Greek, Athens was upset by the manner in which the crisis had been handled. The subsequent course followed by the U.S. was also unsatisfactory from Turkey's point of view.

After the Kardak crisis, the U.S. State Department took action, seeking to prevent a recurrence of such incidents between Greece and Turkey. The Madrid Understanding emerged from this action. At the time, the U.S. was instrumental in the NATO's development of confidence-building measures in the Aegean Sea. Among these were a limitation of NATO-sponsored naval exercises, the presence of observers from the other side in military exercises, and exchange of information between military personnel. The U.S. even stationed an aircraft carrier off the island of Rhodes to monitor the implementation of these measures.

But other U.S. actions in relation to the Aegean led to unhappiness in Turkey. Greece had not been participating in NATO exercises in the Aegean for seventeen years. To persuade the Greeks to reverse this policy, the U.S. agreed that a portion of the NATO exercise due to take place in September 1997 would be carried out under the command of a Greek officer. The U.S. also proposed that the Madrid Understanding be extended to cover Kardak and that the issue of sovereignty be referred to the International Court of Justice. In response to this, Turkey refused to take part in the NATO exercise. It was the first time that Turkey took such a step.

The Question of Cyprus and the U.S.

Toward the end of the 1990s America's interest in Cyprus was growing, and Washington renewed its efforts to find a solution. One reason for this was the criticism that Washington was facing for being active in quelling ethnic strife in the Balkans while doing nothing in Cyprus. The U.S. considered it to be part of its leadership role to intervene in regional conflicts with a view to facilitating a settlement.

Washington's Cyprus policy was based on the following principles. (1) The dispute must not degenerate into open conflict and must not lead to tension in Turkish-Greek relations. (2) The status quo (the division of the island) was unacceptable. (3) The negotiations under the aegis of the UN must continue; in case of a deadlock, the U.S. should intervene to overcome existing obstacles. (4) The objective was a bizonal, bicommunal federation. (5) The issue of EU membership must not further complicate the question and support should be given to the membership of Cyprus as a federation. (6) Russia must not be allowed to gain access to the region through the Cyprus question.

At a time when the U.S. was intensifying its efforts to find a solution, the Greek Cypriots launched campaigns in August and October 1996 to organize marches across the Green Line. These campaigns led to incidents in which the Turkish side was blamed by the U.S. for using excessive force. When Turkey and Greece came to the brink of war during the Kardak crisis, the U.S. increased its pressure to reach a settlement in Cyprus. The Clinton administration even declared 1997 to be the year when the question of Cyprus would be solved. By appointing Richard Holbrooke, the man who had ended the war in Bosnia and was the architect of the Dayton Agreement, as special representative for Cyprus, the Clinton administration demonstrated its resolve to settle a question to which it attached great importance.

Throughout 1998 Holbrooke sought to bring the two sides closer through diplomacy and also by involving NGOs and businesspeople, using second track diplomacy. Despite his efforts, the only success registered was the establishment of a direct telephone link between the two parts of the island.

The U.S. announced that it would support the accession of Cyprus to the EU if it reflected the wishes of both parties. This meant that the U.S. was against the unilateral accession of just the Greek Cypriots, which would make it even harder to reach a settlement.

In the meantime the U.S. Congress maintained its anti-Turkish bias. It faulted the Clinton administration for not being effective enough in finding a solution to the Cyprus question. Although some members of Congress sought to cut U.S. aid to Turkey until it withdrew its forces from Cyprus, the U.S. State Department's efforts prevented these proposals from being adopted. Starting in 1994, Congress began invoking Cyprus, along with human rights and the Kurdish question, when slashing aid allocations to Turkey.

When the Greek Cypriots signed an agreement in January 1997 to take delivery of Russian-made S-300 missiles, the Turkish position on this issue converged with the U.S., whose Cyprus policy had been quite different from Turkey's.

The main U.S. concern was the rising influence of Russia in the eastern Mediterranean. Most importantly, the missiles were scheduled to be delivered to the island along with radar systems and Russian experts, who would then be in a position to monitor the region close-up. It was interesting to note that, in its effort to dissuade the Greek Cypriots from emplacing the missiles on Cyprus, the U.S. found itself reminding them that the island had been at peace for twenty-four years and that it would be wrong to upset a stable situation. These were exactly the same arguments that Turkey had been using in connection with Cyprus. Although the U.S. held different views from Ankara's on the question of Cyprus, it did not shirk from using Ankara's arguments when its interests required such a shift.

The question was finally resolved in February 1999 with the decision to install the missiles in Crete. The U.S. press reported that the Greek Cypriots had been persuaded by Washington and the missiles would be stored instead of being installed. By keeping the missiles out of Cyprus, Turkey had been appeased, the delivery of the missiles had not been prevented, and the Russians had been kept away from the eastern Mediterranean.

The reason for this intense U.S. involvement in Cyprus was grounded in the general U.S. foreign policy orientation during this period. The U.S. had been exerting its influence not just in Cyprus but in all Balkan questions, in the Middle East peace process, in Northern Ireland, and in the confrontation between China and Taiwan. Cyprus remained one of the instances where the U.S. was unsuccessful in finding a way to overcome the dispute.

Although the U.S. and Turkish positions on Turkish-Greek relations and Cyprus did not coincide, Washington refrained from adopting policies that would force Turkey to conform to U.S. positions. The U.S. confined itself to gentle persuasion on the issues of Cyprus and Turkish-Greek relations because at that time it was engaged in very close cooperation with Turkey in a number of other fields.

D. The Kurdish Question and Human Rights

During the 1990s the Kurdish question gave rise to differences between Turkey and the U.S. Unlike the European countries, the U.S. approach to this question appeared to be based on human rights rather than political considerations. The official U.S. position was not concerned with Turkey's struggle against the PKK but with the manner in which this was being conducted. Washington continued to criticize Turkey for violating human rights in the course of its struggle against the PKK.

The U.S. Position on the Kurdish Question

There was a distinct difference of approach to the Kurdish question between the U.S. administration and Congress.

As mentioned previously, the U.S. administration declared in its official statements that it supported Turkey's territorial integrity. In fact, the U.S. was the first country to declare the PKK a terrorist organization, and it described Turkey's struggle and the military measures it took as legitimate self-defense. But the U.S. maintained that the solution to the problem lay in the economic development and more human rights reforms in southeastern Turkey and recognition that the Kurds should have the right to express themselves in their own language and develop their own culture and the right to form their own political party. The U.S. view was that such policies would only strengthen Turkey.

Meanwhile it was being alleged in Congress that human rights were being violated in the struggle against the PKK with U.S.-supplied weapons, and there were calls for ending aid and military sales to Turkey. Although the administration joined the critics of Turkey from time to time, it did defend its Turkish policies in Congress and thereby indirectly supported Turkey.

Notwithstanding the administration's positive approach to the Kurdish question, some U.S. practices were causing anger in Turkey. One of these was the annual human rights report issued by the State Department (examined in detail in the discussion of human rights below). A second issue was the establishment of the Kurdish Institute in Washington in 1996. The institute described its mission as publicizing the Kurdish question and seeking improvements in the human rights enjoyed by the Kurds. The third issue involved the restrictions placed on the sale of Cobra attack helicopters (already examined above in the discussion of U.S. arms sales). These helicopters were a potent weapon in the struggle against the PKK. The fourth issue was the increasing U.S. interest in the southeastern region, especially after Öcalan's capture. The U.S. ambassador in Ankara, accompanied by a group of businesspeople, visited the southeast to explore investment opportunities in the region. In June 2000 the U.S. sought to establish something akin to a trade office in Diyarbakır, but Ankara withheld permission.

Notwithstanding these concerns, Ankara was highly satisfied with the U.S. role in the capture of Öcalan.

The Apprehension of Öcalan and the U.S.

The U.S. role in the apprehension of the PKK leader Abdullah Öcalan was a good indicator of the U.S. approach to the Kurdish question. Press reports and the investigations of some journalists after Öcalan was captured in Kenya reveal that the U.S. was involved from the very beginning in the string of events that led up to his capture (Box 7-16).

According to the press, CIA officials met with their counterparts in the MIT (the Turkish intelligence agency) and informed them on 4 February 1999 that they would assist in the capture of Öcalan if an undertaking was given that he would receive a fair trial. With the approval of the Turkish government, a memorandum of understanding was signed to this effect. When the operation had been carried out, the U.S. issued an official statement expressing its satisfaction at the capture of the terrorist Öcalan. In response to media reports about its involvement, Israel declared that it was not involved in the operation.

The U.S. was involved in Öcalan's capture diplomatically, politically, and technically. This was more than the capture of the leader of an organization. It also revealed the U.S. stance with respect to its Middle Eastern and Turkish policies and its approach to the Kurdish question.

The U.S. role explained why Turkey had waited until September 1998 to threaten Syria. The Turkish decision-makers never explained why they had not acted earlier against Syria, even though they knew Öcalan's address and telephone number in Damascus. Throughout the 1990s the U.S. secretary of state met with Hafez Assad twenty-three times and Clinton met with him three times. Yet Turkey had been unable to exert any pressure on the Syrian leader. Turkey was able to do this only when the U.S. decided to accelerate the Middle East peace process.

The U.S. helped in the capture of Öcalan for the following reasons.

1. The U.S. began to distance itself from the PKK

Box 7-16. The Capture of Abdullah Ocalan

On 16 September 1998 the commander of the Turkish Land Forces, Gen. Atilla Ates, delivered a speech in Hatayan which he accused Syria of harboring Abdullah Ocalan and gave it a stern warning. This was a turning point in the process that led to Ocalan's apprehension. It was followed by statements from Turkey's leaders (including President Demirel) that force might have to be used against Syria. The Turkish army begen to deploy units to the Syrian border, hearful of finding itself in armed conflict with Turkey, Syria signed the document known as the Adana Understanding in October 1998, Gralan was forced to leave Syria under the terms of this document on 9 October 1998, U.S. authorities were able to determine from cell phone calls that Ocalan had gone to Moscow and passed this information on to their furkish counterparts. As a result of pressure coming from Turkey and the (1.5., Ocalan left Moscow after spending thiny three days there and that eled to Rome on 12 November 1998. Now the U.S. began to apply pressure on Italy. In January 1999 Ocalan left Rome and returned to Moscow but soon had to leave for Athens, Greek officials, uneasy about harboring Ocalan, told him that he was being sent to South Africa but sent him to Kenya instead the intelligence was quick to determine that Ocalan was soving at the Greek Embassy in Nairobi Nairobi was swarming with U.S. intelligence personnel because there had been a bombattark on the U.S. Embassy there. Ocalan later accused Green and deliberately sending him to Kenya, which was full of CIA agents, and claimed that he was the victim of a plot

On 14 February Ocalan was told to leave Kenya. When he departed from the Greek Embassy heading for the airport, his car left the convoy for unknown reasons and drave up to the aircraft of the special team that had come from Turkey. Once apprehended, Ocalan was flown back to Turkey. The U.S. Involvement in the operation was limited to providing intelligence, exerting diplomatic pressure, and training. The U.S. did not get directly involved in the capture.

i. Uzce

after the mid-1990s, when the movement went into decline. U.S. criticism of Turkey's Kurdish policies was at its peak when the PKK's influence was greatest and its actions were most effective. It was noteworthy that the U.S. helped apprehend Öcalan when it became clear that the PKK was going to face defeat in its armed struggle. That is why Öcalan and the Kurdish exiles in Burope were criticizing Washington for abandoning them in mid-course. This was not the first time that the Kurds of the Middle East had been betrayed by Western countries, especially the U.S.

2. With Öcalan's capture, the U.S. had gained an advantage over Germany, France, and other European countries that were using the PKK in their jockeying for influence in the region.

3. The PKK was disturbing the equilibrium that the U.S. had been seeking to establish in northern lead since 1997. Furthermore, the PKK was getting Saddam's support, which the U.S. was not ready to tolerate.

After a speedy trial that Western observers considered satisfactory from the human rights perspective, Öcalan received a death sentence. The U.S. did not share the negative reaction of the Europeans to this verdict. Since capital punishment was still allowed in a number of U.S. states, Washington was in no position to be critical over this issue.

This development brought about two results in Turkish-American relations. First, Öcalan's capture brought Turkey closer to the U.S. The U.S. had given concrete evidence of its support for Turkey in the struggle against the PKK. Second, the U.S. became more serious about finding a political solution to the Kurdish question after the capture of Öcalan. Washington was now pressing Ankara to grant the Kurds more cultural and political rights. The U.S. also wanted to see the state of emergency in the southeast lifted. After 1999 the U.S. started taking a closer interest in this region.

The U.S. and Human Rights in Turkey

Turkey's human rights record during the 1990s was under constant U.S. critical appraisal. The U.S. administration, Congress, and those interested in foreign policy perceived the issue of human rights and the Kurdish question in the same context. The human rights reports of the U.S. State Department described abuses in Turkey (mostly those occurring in the southeast) in detail, and the closing down of newspapers and journals close to the DEP and to Kurdish nationalism came in for criticism. Among other human rights abuses mentioned in the State Department's reports were the issues involving religious groups such as the dwindling Assyrian community, the closing down of the Welfare Party, the imprisonment of Istanbul's mayor, Tayyip Erdoğan, torture, political murders, and prison conditions. The reports also contained references to the human rights violations perpetrated by the PKK.

In summary, at a time when the U.S. and Turkey were in close cooperation in a great number of fields and when their regional policies were in large measure convergent, the Kurdish question and the issue of human rights remained points of disagreement. But they did not affect the fundamentally good bilateral relations between the two countries.

E. The Armenian Question

The Armenian question came up in different guises during this period. One was the passing of resolutions by state legislatures in the U.S., acknowledging the Armenian Genocide as fact. Armenian groups also attempted to set up a "genocide museum" in Washington and to have the House of Representatives adopt a genocide resolution. These activities were being conducted by well-established organizations in the U.S., such as the Armenian National Institute and the American National Committee of Armenians.

At the State Level

Inspired by the Holocaust Museum in Washington, the Armenian lobby went into action in the second half of the 1990s to establish a museum and to erect a monument to the victims of the Armenian Genocide. The foundation was laid at a site near the Holocaust Museum, with a ceremony attended by a delegation from Armenia.

The Armenian Americans were pursuing their activities at a number of levels and were able to obtain genocide resolutions from several state legislatures in the U.S. With the addition of nine states in 1999, the number of legislatures that had passed resolutions reached twenty-four. Among these were important states like California, New York, New Jersey, and Georgia. The Armenians were even able to get the subject introduced into school textbooks. The Armenians were convinced that, as more states adopted such resolutions, it would become easier to get the U.S. Congress to do likewise and that the administration would not oppose this. Turkey could do very little to block these efforts. Ankara confined itself to symbolic protests, and the question did not arouse much public interest.

The Genocide Bill

Unlike the 1980s, the genocide bill did not figure in the U.S. congressional agenda in the 1990s. In 2000 (which was an election year), however, the matter came to a subcommittee of the House of Representatives, causing complications in Turkish-U.S. relations. California had a significant number of inhabitants of Armenian extraction, and the members of Congress representing that state were especially active.

The bill was sponsored by a Republican and a Democratic member and was signed by 134 representatives. Entitled "Teaching and Remembering the Armenian Genocide," the bill claimed that 2 million Armenians were driven out of Anatolia from 1915 to 1923 and 1.5 million of them were killed and mandated teaching this to State Department personnel and other concerned public officials. In addition, the bill would have the U.S. presidents use the term "genocide" instead of "massacre" in their annual statements issued on 24 April commemorating the events of 1915.

There were three reasons why the bills came to the congressional agenda in 2000. First, the Armenian lobby felt that, after its successes at the state level, the subject was now ripe to be taken up at the federal level. Second, Robert Kocharian, who came to power in Armenia in 1998, was pursuing a more nationalistic policy than his predecessor. His principal foreign policy aim was to seek international recognition of the Armenian "Genocide." Third, unlike the U.S. election of 1996, the two parties were running neck and neck in 2000. Every vote counted in this election.

Bill 389 came up for discussion on 14 September 2000 at the fourteen-member Subcommittee on International Operations and Human Rights of the Foreign Relations Committee of the House of Representatives. In the course of the debate Marc Grossman, formerly ambassador in Ankara and now responsible for the training of State Department personnel, declared that the events of 1915 to 1923 were already being taught and added that the passage of this bill would harm relations with Turkey. The debate was also being monitored by Thomas Pickering, the State Department's number-three man. The American historian Justin McCarthy made a statement defending the Turkish viewpoint, Ankara sent retired ambassador Gündüz Aktan to submit the Turkish thesis. He sought to show the weakness of the Armenian case by pointing out that the Armenians were refusing to allow the question to go to the International Court of Justice. Despite these efforts, the subcommittee approved the bill by a show of hands on 21 September.

When the bill came before the fifty-member Foreign Relation Committee on 28 September, a number of amendments were proposed. The bill underwent some changes and became bill 596. Among the amendments were a proviso that Turkey should not have to face demands for compensation, deletion of the requirement to teach the events, and the specification that the genocide would be attributed to the Ottoman Empire and not to Turkey in the annual presidential statements. In the course of the debate, the consideration of the bill was deferred for a week. During this interval both Turkey and the administration redoubled their efforts. The American ambassador in Ankara went to Washington to explain the damage the bill would do to relations. For the first time, Turkey sent a parliamentary delegation, consisting of five deputies, to Washington to demonstrate its sensitivity on the issue.

In the meantime the Foreign Ministry, Defense Ministry, and General Staff in Ankara prepared a "joint action plan" containing the measures to be taken in the event the bill was approved. In its official pronouncements, Ankara declared that the measures being considered would not harm Turkey's national interests, serve the purpose of the Armenian lobby, or damage the fabric of Turkish-U.S. relations. It appeared that care was being taken not to affect relations with the U.S. and most of the measures were directed against Armenia. Among these measures were restrictions on trade with Armenia being carried out via Georgia and Iran as well as the closure of the air corridor to Armenia. Although no linkage was made by official quarters, other measures included the consideration of the appointment of an ambassador to Baghdad, the intimation that restrictions might be imposed on Operation Provide Comfort, the minister of energy's warning to the U.S. ambassador that U.S. companies might be adversely affected in the bidding for new projects (including defense contracts), and the elimination of a U.S. manufacturer of computers for helicopters from the short list of potential suppliers. The chief of the General Staff canceled a scheduled visit to the U.S.

The reaction was not confined to the government. The business association TÜSİAD sent a letter to the chair of the subcommittee, stating that the passage of the bill would have harmful effects on America's economic and trade interests in Turkey.

U.S. companies in the defense sector that were doing business in Turkey were seeking to persuade the members of the committee. Highly placed individuals (including a former secretary of defense, a deputy secretary of defense, and a chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff) were also involved in the lobbying. Seven of them, including William Perry, Alexander Haig, and Richard Perle, sent a joint letter to the chair of the committee, reminding him of Turkey's strategic importance and informing him that the passage of the bill would have adverse effects on U.S. interests.

But all of these efforts were to no avail. On 3 October the Foreign Relations Committee approved bill 596, with twenty-four votes in favor, eleven against, and two abstentions. This meant that the bill would now go to the floor of the House of Representatives for consideration. At this point the U.S. secretaries of state and defense sent a joint letter calling for the rejection of the bill. The chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff warned that the bill would harm regional stability. In an unusual move, the director of the CIA sent the Speaker of the House a letter warning of the negative impact that the passage of the bill would have.

The item was placed on the agenda of the House of Representatives on 20 October, and observers expected a majority of its 435 members to approve the bill. At this point an unexpected development took place when President Clinton sent a letter to the House Speaker, asking him to withdraw the bill. Clinton indicated that the bill's timing was bad and that the U.S. had significant interests in this troubled region that would be harmed by passing such a bill. Clinton also warned that the bill would be counterproductive and would only worsen Turkey's relations with Armenia. In response, the Speaker announced that he favored the bill but would withdraw it in the face of the president's arguments.

Turkey received the news of the bill's withdrawal with satisfaction and relief, even though Clinton had expressed his regret at the "massacres" that occurred from 1915 to 1923. Clinton had asked for the withdrawal of the bill in the face of dangerous developments in the region, including in particular the Palestinian uprising in the occupied territories. In other words, the president objected not to the bill but to its timing. By extending the date of the massacres to 1923, Clinton was including the period that covered Turkey's War of Liberation.

Clinton made his last-minute intervention because he did not want a confrontation with an ally with which the U.S. had an "enhanced partnership." In his intervention, the president reaffirmed Turkey's importance for U.S. interests in the sensitive region stretching from the Balkans to Central Asia. He also considered the defense and energy contracts that Turkey was about to place. The uprising and instability facing Israel also helped remind the U.S. administration that it needed Turkey on its side. This explosive situation provided Clinton with a useful justification for his intervention.

Toward the end of 2000 the Turkish MFA considered the possibility of neutralizing the Armenian diaspora by developing relations with Armenia, especially in the economic field. These plans could not be put into effect, however, due to fears of alienating Azerbaijan.

The French and Italian parliaments as well as the European Parliament placed the Armenian genocide issue on their agendas at about this time. This created problems for Turkey with European countries and led to claims that a concerted international campaign was being waged against Turkey. Public apprehension was compounded by the fact that the Kurdish question began to figure prominently in relations with the EU. The organization of a Conference on the Treaty of Sèvres in Yerevan in August 2000 only made things worse.

F. The U.S., Political Islam, and Relations with the Refahyol Government

In the 1980s the U.S. sought to create a "Green Belt" in its struggle with the USSR and gave its support to Islamic countries like Turkey, Pakistan, and Afghanistan. In the post–Cold War period, the international situation had changed, and with it the U.S. approach to Islam.

The U.S. after the Cold War and Political Islam

In 1993 the American political scholar Samuel Huntington expounded his theory that after the Cold War the world would be polarized according to civilizations and that religion constituted the basis of civilizations. This theory led to speculation that the U.S. was seeking a common threat to hold the West together after the collapse of communism and that this threat was political Islam. This view was criticized in many U.S. circles as not credible, however, and Washington shied away from taking this course.

In the 1990s the USSR had disappeared and the question of using Islam to fight communism had ceased to be relevant. But political Islam was seen as a political factor by the U.S., and Washington sought to maintain its ties with it during this period. In this context, Washington maintained its links with the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, which practiced an extreme form of Islam, as well as with the fairly radical Islamic groups in Daghestan and Chechnya in the northern Caucasus. In addition, the U.S. focused its attention mainly on Islamic movements that could be considered moderate. Washington held that movements and parties of this tendency in places such as Malaysia, Tunisia, Egypt, Algeria, and Turkey should be drawn into the political process. This approach was led by Graham Fuller, an American expert on the Middle East and Turkey. He argued that drawing such parties into the political process would transform them into mainstream parties that could be accommodated in the political life of Muslim lands. The responsibility of governing would help moderate Islamic parties and turn them into the likes of the Christian Democratic parties of Europe. Turkey experienced this process when the Welfare Party (Refah) came to power.

and the second second second second second second second second second second second second second second second

The Islamic Movement in Turkey, the Refahyol Government, and the U.S.

In 1989 the Rand Corporation prepared a report on Islamic currents in Turkey at a time when the global scene was undergoing fundamental changes. The report concluded that Islamic currents in Turkey posed no threat to U.S. interests and recommended that channels of communication with these movements should be established.

In this framework, the U.S. concentrated its attention on Fethullah Gülen's group, which operated as a community organization within the Islamic movement in Turkey and the Welfare Party, which operated as a political party.

The U.S. links with the Gülen community included the support given to its educational activities not just in Turkey but also in Central Asia (see "The Opening Up of Turkey to the Caucasus and Central Asia and the Stand of the U.S." above).

A number of events shed light on the U.S. backing for Gülen and Washington's approach to Turkey's secularism. Fethullah Gülen had been living in the U.S., ostensibly for medical treatment. During these stays he met with U.S. religious personalities, including a cardinal. With U.S. backing, Gülen had an audience with the pope in the Vatican, during which he was depicted as a statesman representing Islam. Turkey's ambassador to the Vatican was at the airport to receive Gülen, presumably under instructions from Ankara.

News began to circulate that the U.S. favored a pro-American Islamic administration that would be pliable toward Washington. Experts with close links to the U.S. administration began to assert that Turkish concepts and practices like Kemalism and secularism were outdated. All of this raised the suspicion that Washington was not satisfied with the orientation of the Turkish regime. These suspicions were reinforced by the new currents that began to appear in Turkey in the late 1980s, including "Neo-Ottomanism" and "Second Republicanism."

Aside from these claims, the U.S. approach to political Islam in Turkey and Washington's links with the movement were presented as human rights issues.

This U.S. approach was nothing new. The new development was that the process of moderate Islam taking power in Turkey was well underway. The process developed when the Welfare Party came to power in a coalition government in 1996. It would reach its zenith when the Adalet ve Kalkınma Partisi (AKP: Justice and Development Party) of Tayyip Erdoğan took the reigns of power in 2002 and again in 2007.

Unlike the other parties that came to power in the 1990s, the Welfare Party's foreign policy platform rested on anti-West, anti-U.S., and anti-Israel principles. That is why the foreign policy stand of the Refahyol coalition (of the Welfare Party and True Path Party) was awaited with great interest.

There were many initial difficulties. In August 1996 Erbakan went to Tehran, his first foreign visit. There he signed a natural gas agreement, which was not well received in Washington. During the prime minister's visit to Libya, Khaddafi's remarks about Turkey's political structure and the Kurdish question caused outrage in Turkey.

The U.S. was facing a dilemma. Open opposition to the Welfare Party would lead to accusations of interference in Turkey's domestic affairs. At the same time, entering into cooperation with this government and lending it support would aggravate the Turkish military establishment and secular circles.

With the passage of time, the Welfare wing of the coalition sought an accommodation with the U.S. and sent two ministers, Fehmi Adak and Abdullah Gül, to Washington. After this, the leaders of Welfare began to declare that they were in favor of secularism in Turkey along the lines of the U.S. model, even though they never described exactly what they meant (see Box Intro-1 in the Introduction). Although the Welfare Party sought to convey a message to its constituency that would be consistent with its past rhetoric, its actions did not differ in any way from the actions of previous governments. In foreign policy, it developed relations with Israel, extended the term of Operation Provide Comfort, and allowed the Kurds who operated on behalf of U.S. intelligence to be evacuated from northern Iraq via Turkey in September 1996. Welfare Party objectives such as an Islamic NATO, an Islamic Common Market, and the D-8 initiative were utopian projects far removed from daily reality and were recognized as empty rhetoric bearing no relation to Turkey's overall foreign policy orientation.

At a time when there was much talk of a possible coup in Turkey, the U.S. made it known through different channels that it would not favor the overthrow of the Turkish government through a coup. After the Cold War, military coups were definitely out of favor. Although the U.S. continued to support some undemocratic regimes, it had proclaimed democracy and human rights to be the foundation stones of globalization and the New World Order. Furthermore, Washington wanted to use Turkey as a model in the process of the democratization of the countries of the Caucasus and Central Asia.

Another consideration that held the U.S. back was that support for a coup would be a deviation from the policy of coming to terms with political Islam. Washington feared that this might lead to the radicalization of the Islamist movement in Turkey and result in the Turkish government's closer cooperation with the fundamentalist movements of the Middle East. That is why Washington's message this time was that problems had to be resolved within the framework of democracy and human rights. By proclaiming itself to be in favor of "secular democracy," the U.S. sought to curry favor with both the secular circles of Turkey and Islamists.

The U.S. approach to Islamism in Turkey and to its political manifestation in the form of the Welfare Party acquired a new dimension in the course of the legal proceedings that led to the closing down of this party. The U.S. openly declared that it was against banning the party.

Washington also made its policy known when the American consul in İstanbul visited the city's former mayor, Tayyip Erdoğan, who had been tried for his antisecular remarks and sentenced to serve a term in prison.

The Welfare Party made a number of overtures to the East and to Islamic countries during its tenure in government, but it also managed to establish close relations with the U.S. Although radical Islamist groups were active in Europe and especially in Germany, the Welfare Party preferred to maintain close contact with the U.S. because of its awareness of U.S. influence in Turkey, being perfectly conscious of the many ties that bound Turkey and its institutions like the armed forces to the U.S. Moreover, Washington was all in favor of drawing the Welfare Party into the political system.

V. THE NEW SECURITY ENVIRONMENT AFTER THE COLD WAR AND TURKEY

A. The Transformation of NATO and the New Strategy

In November and December of 1989 the socialist regimes of Eastern Europe collapsed in quick succession. This was followed by the disintegration of the USSR at the end of 1991 and the disbanding of the Warsaw Pact. These developments led to an intense debate about the place and function of NATO in the new international setting. Some held the view that NATO should come to an end in a situation where there was no opponent to confront. This view was opposed by others who claimed that NATO should undergo a restructuring, in order to face the security threats of the new era. There were also differing views on whether NATO should seek to expand or not.

Having emerged as the winner of the Cold War in the 1990s, NATO did not cease to exist. On the contrary, it expanded and assumed new functions. During this period NATO's agenda consisted of issues such as the role of the organization in the new international environment, relations between the U.S. and Europe, the buildup of the EU's security structure, and the enlargement of the organization. The decisions on the restructuring and transformation of NATO were made at two NATO summit meetings held in the early 1990s.

The London and Rome Summits and the New Strategy

The reduction in international tension had a direct effect on NATO's internal development. At the NATO summit held in Brussels in 1989, the U.S. unexpectedly announced that it was reducing its forces in Western Europe and called for the acceleration of the conventional arms reduction process. After the collapse of the regimes of Eastern Europe at the end of that year, the meeting of NATO defense ministers decided to abandon the target of raising defense spending by 3% and to downgrade the "threat" from Eastern Europe to the level of "risk."

The changes in NATO's structure became more apparent at the London Summit held in July 1990. At this meeting, it was announced that Warsaw Pact members would no longer be defined as the enemy. Gorbachev, the leader of the USSR, was invited to the NATO meeting, and a nonaggression pact was proposed. On the strategic plane, NATO would support the limitation of armaments, abandon the strategy of forward defense, and review the strategy of flexible response (see Box 6-10 in Section 6).

The foundation of NATO's strategy for the post—Cold War era was laid at the Rome Summit, held in November 1991. At the same time, NATO's relations with the Eastern European countries and the USSR were set on a new footing, while the status of transatlantic relations was changed:

- NATO members were no longer under the threat of an all-out attack. This threat was now replaced by risks coming from different directions, however, which were difficult to define. Among these risks were the spread of weapons of mass destruction, interruptions in the supply of vital resources like oil, terrorism, and sabotage.
- NATO was shifting from the concept of threat to the concept of risk.
- NATO would cooperate with the EU, with the WEU, and with the OSCE and join UN missions. All of these activities were seen as complementary.

This was the first summit after the disintegration of the Eastern Bloc, and the new structure and functions of the organization were designed to reflect the new situation.

The New Military Strategy and NATO's New Role

NATO's strategic planning developed along the lines of the decisions of the Rome Summit. From 1967 to the end of the 1980s NATO's strategy was based on the doctrines of forward defense and flexible response. The new strategy abandoned flexible response and replaced it with a strategy based on reduced reliance on nuclear forces, which would be considered a last resort. In other words, nuclear weapons would be maintained, but their function would be to deter aggression, even if the possibility of aggression was very low. After 1991 a reduced number of NATO's nuclear weapons were no longer locked onto specific targets, and this also applied to Russian weapons.

The strategy of forward defense was replaced by the strategy of reduced forward presence. The strategy of forward defense had been designed to transfer the frontline of a conventional war onto enemy territory, relying on the increased effectiveness of conventional weapons. This strategy was important for Germany, which had a high concentration of population, and to Turkey, a flank country. But forward defense became meaningless when there was no specific enemy and significant reductions had been made in conventional weapons. At the London Summit of July 1990, it was decided to abandon this strategy wherever it applied, and this decision was confirmed in 1991 at the Rome Summit. Because there was no significant threat to NATO's Central Region, it was decided to create more flexible units with greater mobility in this region.

NATO's new-era strategy had been designed in the conditions of 1991, which also took care of maintaining a balanced approach toward Russia. But with the changes taking place (especially in Europe) after that date, it became necessary to rethink NATO's strategy once again. When NATO's 50th Anniversary Summit was held in Washington in April 1999, the new strategic concept included the maintenance of transatlantic ties, greater responsibilities for the European allies, and the accession of new members to the alliance.

In reality, the Washington Summit made formal decisions on the basis of NATO actions taken in the 1990s, such as the peacekeeping forces fielded in Bosnia and Kosovo and the European Security and Defense Identity (examined below).

The process of redefining NATO's functions and restructuring the organization that began in the early 1990s was given its final form at the 1999 Washington Summit with the formulation of the strategic concept. At the meeting, it was noted that the international environment presented many uncertainties and that NATO had to operate under these conditions. These conditions included the instability in the European-Atlantic region and its periphery; ethnic and sectarian strife; territorial disputes; serious economic, social, and political difficulties; human rights abuses; and the disintegration of states.

It was underlined that the basic function of the alliance was the protection of the territorial integrity, political independence, and security of its members. At the same time, however, the alliance assumed the responsibility of contributing to the maintenance of peace and stability as one of the basic pillars of its new strategy. That is why the Washington Summit reaffirmed the concepts of security, consultation, deterrence and defense, and crisis management.

In this framework, NATO adopted the concept of non-article 5 operations. This implied that NATO was ready to intervene in situations where a member of NATO had not been a victim of direct aggression. To carry out this function the Defense Capabilities Initiative was undertaken. This involved the creation of highly mobile units, well-trained and ready to intervene at short notice in crisis operations outside NATO territories. These operations would be conducted by NATO members in cooperation with partners. It was also reaffirmed that NATO would contribute to peacekeeping operations at the request of other organizations such as the UN Security Council or the OSCE.

As NATO agreed to get involved in operations outside the territory of its members and without the triggering mechanism of article 5 of the treaty, the question of out-of-area operations that had been much discussed before the 1990s lost its relevance.

Turkey had been involved in the debates over the out-of-area question in the past, and the new situation affected its position. To cite an example, Turkey approved the NATO decision to bomb Yugoslavia in 1999 without the authorization of the UN Security Council and even participated in the operation. Turkey also placed some of the bases located on its soil at the disposal of the alliance. NATO decisions were taken by consensus, however, which meant that Turkey would be able to decide its position on further operations on a case-by-case basis. In cases where NATO would need to use Turkish military installations in future non-article 5 operations, Ankara would negotiate the issue within NATO.

Another development in this period that affected NATO's strategy was the significant progress made in the field of arms limitation. The process started in 1987 with the INF treaty (which eliminated intermediate-range missiles), followed by the Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) Treaty of 1990 (which drastically reduced conventional forces) and the decision to reduce short-range nuclear weapons in 1991. The process accelerated with the elimination of 1,400 short-range nuclear weapons from Europe in July 1992 and the START II treaty of 1993, providing for the reduction in nuclear weapons. As a result of these reductions, NATO's armies were cut by 35%, its naval forces by 30%, and its air forces by 40%. The nuclear weapons in the territories of NATO's European members were reduced by 80%.

One of the most salient aspects of NATO's changing strategy was that, although the alliance maintained the concept of collective defense, it assumed new roles in keeping with the changed international environment. This was seen in Europe in the cases of Bosnia and Kosovo, where ethnic strife brought about mass migrations. NATO was being transformed to deal with such questions as well.

The first step in this direction was taken at the Oslo meeting of NATO foreign ministers held in June 1992, when the ministers agreed that NATO would undertake the function of preserving peace in crises occurring in Europe and that the OSCE could appeal to NATO for help in preserving peace. The help that NATO members would furnish in such cases was left to the discretion of each individual member. In December 1992 NATO notified the UN Security Council that it was ready to join in peace-keeping operations.

NATO also underwent institutional restructuring to facilitate its participation in peacekeeping activities. In January 1994 it decided to set up the Joint Combined Task Force. This decision, reconfirmed at the Berlin meeting of foreign ministers held in June 1996, had two aims.

1. An effort was being made to lay the groundwork for NATO to engage in peacekeeping operations with nonmember countries. Nonmembers would be able to use their national armies and NATO headquarters in these operations, while the forces of NATO members would continue to carry out their responsibilities within NATO and take part in operations. This was first tried in Bosnia.

2. Germany and France led the group that wanted to develop a European security system, while the U.S. and Britain represented the group that emphasized NATO in common defense. These two approaches were being reconciled. The new task force would allow forces not belonging to NATO to participate in operations of this nature. An example would be Eurocorps, which was being set up by some EU members. This compromise would subsequently break down.

NATO's Changing Strategy and Turkey

In the early 1990s Turkey was becoming increasingly concerned about a possible disbanding or downgrading of NATO. It was also concerned about a weakening of the transatlantic link and the strengthening of the European part of the alliance. Turkey was also unenthusiastic about the enlargement of NATO by admitting new members. Ankara shared the U.S. view that NATO must be preserved as a strong alliance under America's leadership in the post—Cold War period.

At the 1991 Rome Summit, Turkey defended the view that European security was indivisible. Ankara held that the OSCE, NATO, the EU, and the Council of Europe must act in unison in dealing with regional instability. This approach corresponded to the American view.

Furthermore, Turkey adopted the Anglo-American line in NATO by emphasizing the preservation of the transatlantic link. Ankara did not want to see the U.S. abandon Europe; nor was it very eager to see the development of the EU's security component. In defending its position, Turkey based its argument mainly on the failure of European institutions to deal effectively with interethnic strife in Yugoslavia.

In the area of arms reduction, Ankara welcomed the decision on the elimination of nuclear artillery, which was of direct concern to Turkey. These weapons, which were located in places like İstanbul, Çorlu, and Erzurum, were removed as a consequence of this decision.

At this time, when the threat from the East had disappeared, NATO began to perceive Turkey as the barrier that protected the alliance from the instability reigning in the region stretching from the Maghreb to the Persian Gulf. This perception was articulated by NATO secretary-general Manfred Wörner, who said that Turkey was directly threatened by illegal immigration, radical religion, terrorism, and instability and had an important role to play in combating these threats. Turkish spokespersons stressed that Turkey was no longer a flank country as in the Cold War but was now a "central front" country.

NATO's Expansion and Turkey

In general terms, Turkey was unhappy about NATO's expansion (Box 7-17). But it was also aware that it could not prevent this. Although not articulated in official statements, Ankara's concerns were the following:

- NATO would cease to be an exclusive club of a select number of Western states, and Turkey's privileged position would become diluted.
- The new members would be in no position to make a positive contribution to Turkey's security. On the contrary, the new members would impose additional security responsibilities on the alliance and on Turkey.
- The attention of the U.S. and other NATO members would shift to the new members, and priority would be given to meeting their needs. This could lead to less aid for Turkey. Indeed, this later proved to be the case.
- In order to appease Russia's opposition to NATO expansion, the U.S. displayed a tendency to give Russia a free hand in other regions, especially in the Cauca-

Box 7-17. NATO'S Expansion

After the regime changes of 1989 and the disbanding of the Warsaw Pact, the interest of the Western states was directed toward Central and Eastern Europe. Their main concern was to prevent the countries of this region from returning to Russia's orbit by reintegrating them in the European political and economic system. At the time: Russia still maintained troops in these countries and did not fully withdraw them until 1994. It was believed that one of the most effective ways of integrating these countries within the Western system would be by developing their relations with NATO.

NATO acted with speed: in December 1991 it established the North Atlantic Cooperation Council (NACC) and appealed to the former socialist countries to engage in dialogue, partnership, and cooperation. Most of the countries of Eastern Europe and Central Asia became members of the NACC. With the accession of Georgia and Albania in June 1992, the membership of the body rose to thirty-eight, including the sixteen NATO members. In this way, the former socialist states became involved in exchange visits, training, consultations, and other forms of cooperation that created new links with NATO.

The members of the NACC from Eastern Europe (and especially Poland, Hungary, and the Czech Republic) appeared to be eager for NATO membership. In order to avoid arousing Russian hostility and at the same time avoid disappointing these countries, a compromise solution was found in the form of the Partnership for Peace (PfP) project in January 1994. Russia and the Eastern European, Central Asian, and Caucasian states, with the exception of Tajikistan, all became members of the PfP. They were also joined by Slovenia, Finland, and Sweden.

This was a step further on the road to integration. The menibers of the PFP were allowed to set up a liaison office in Brussals and participated in joint exercises along with NATO members. This brought the countries with the appropriate political and geographic conditions closer to full NATO membership, while the remainder strengthened their relationship. The Visegrad Group (Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, and Slovakia) still had security concerns and did not consider NATO's yerbal assurances to be adequate.

The principle of expansion was accepted at the Brussels Summit of 1994, and it was decided to develop the PfP further. Expansion posed three problems, however: Russia's continuing opposition, selecting the countries for membership, and meeting the costs that expansion would entail. NATO diplomats made a major effort to persuade Russia, which was given assurances that nuclear weapons would not be deployed in the new member countries, that no changes would be made in NATO's nuclear strategy, and that no additional combat units would be deployed on the territories of the new members. Furthermore, the new members would have to abide by the Conventional Forces in Europe Agreement.

Because the NACC no longer responded to changed requirements, it was replaced in mid-1997 with the Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council. At the same time, the PIP was being strengthened.

At the NATO summit held in Madrid in June 1997, Poland, the Czech Republic, and Hungary were issued invitations to join NATO. Their membership was formalized in early 1999, raising the membership of the alliance to nineteen.

In 2004 the membership rose to twenty six with the admission of seven other states (Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Slovakia, and Slovenia). At the Bucharest summit of 2008, Albania and Croatia were invited to begin accession talks.

(İ. UZGEL)

sus. Russia was allowed to maintain forces in Armenia and to ignore the terms of the CFE agreement in the region. This approach was causing apprehension in Turkey.

During the process of expansion, Turkey collaborated with the southern members of the alliance like France and Italy and supported the membership of Romania and Slovenia to balance NATO's eastward expansion. Turkey favored maintaining a geographical balance in NATO's expansion and advocated the admission of at least one Balkan state in the first wave of expansion. The preferred Balkan candidate was Romania, because as a Black Sea state it would help balance Russian predominance in the Black Sea once it joined NATO.

In the process of NATO's expansion, Turkey sought to take advantage of its right of veto. It attempted to link NATO expansion with its candidacy for the EU prior to the EU's Luxembourg Summit of 1997. This tactic failed to produce the desired result, however, because Turkey's EU candidacy depended on many other criteria other than security. In fact, Turkey had already been forced to abandon this position in July 1997, when it approved NATO's expansion plan at the Madrid Summit. Turkey then introduced some flexibility to its position by adopting the view that the expansion of NATO should follow a course parallel to the expansion of the EU and WEU. As new members were being admitted to NATO, new members (meaning Turkey) should be admitted to the EU and the WEU in order to ensure a balanced expansion in Europe's security structure. The EU eventually expanded by admitting Austria, Sweden, and Finland; and NATO expanded by admitting Poland, the Czech Republic, and Hungary. Turkey was unable to gain admission to the EU or to block the expansion of NATO. Turkey threatened to use its veto power once again when the question of the European Security and Defense Identity and its use of NATO facilities came up.

Turkey's veto threat did not work, because it had already approved the principle of NATO's expansion at previous summits. Furthermore, Ankara could not afford to enter into a confrontation with the U.S. on this issue.

In addition, it was not very convincing to link the expansion of NATO, an organization designed to ensure security, with the expansion of the EU, which was a supranational economic and political integration project. In a sense, Turkey was continuing its practice dating from the Cold War, when it received economic aid in return for its security and strategic cooperation.

Another reason was that NATO's expansion was not related only to NATO and its structure. The question was intimately linked with global issues such as U.S.-European, U.S.-Russian, and European-Russian relations. It was not credible for Turkey to raise the veto issue under the circumstances.

Finally, there was a lot of confusion and backtracking on the issue of NATO expansion in Ankara because this coincided with the coalition government, when the Welfare Party was in power and Tansu Çiller was foreign minister, and the country was deeply preoccupied with domestic politics.

The outcome of all this was that Turkey's credibility would be greatly reduced if it should threaten to use its veto power in the future even on good grounds. Turkey's position had also jolted the U.S., which until then had always found Turkey on its side on matters dealing with NATO.

The National Missile Defense System (Missile Shield) and Turkey

The Strategic Defense Initiative was conceived by President Reagan but was never implemented. This issue resurfaced in the late 1990s in the Clinton administration under a different label and based on a different concept. Whereas the SDI was conceived to defend against an attack from the USSR, the new system was to provide defense against missiles coming from rogue states such as North Korea, Iran, and Iraq.

In a 1998 report prepared by Donald Rumsfeld (who would become secretary of defense in the George W. Bush administration), it was claimed that the rogue states had a greater missile capability than commonly thought and that they constituted a very serious threat. The National Intelligence Assessment Report of 1999 confirmed the findings of the Rumsfeld report and declared that within fifteen years the U.S. would be confronted with the threat of intercontinental missiles located in Iran, Iraq, and North Korea. The U.S. declared that it was also eager to shield allies like Turkey, South Korea, and Japan from the threat posed by rogue states.

Actually, the U.S. knew that the missiles possessed by these states did not have the range to reach targets in the U.S. Washington was intent on circumventing the 1972 Anti–Ballistic Missile Agreement, which forbade the setting up of anti–ballistic missile systems. With this project, the U.S. would protect itself against Russia and China, become invulnerable to missiles and reinforce its position as the sole superpower, expand its room for maneuver, and maintain its superiority in civilian and military technologies.

The project consisted of interceptor systems to be deployed on land and at sea, designed to destroy missiles in the air. The system would be controlled by means of satellites and cost around $100 billion. The first tests of the system during the Clinton administration were unsuccessful, and the project was left for implementation by the next administration.

Russia and China were opposed to the project, while NATO members were reluctant to cooperate in the venture. Turkey appeared to favor the project, however, and Turkish military personnel were present at the initial simulation exercises. Washington wanted Turkey to be included in this initiative and announced that 75% of Turkey's territory was within the range of missiles belonging to neighbors like Iran, Iraq, and Syria. Four of the five rogue states on the U.S. list (Iraq, Iran, Syria, and Libya) were in the neighborhood of Turkey.

Turkey had a positive approach toward the missile shield project, given the development of missiles among its neighbors, but there were also good reasons for Ankara to proceed with caution. First, the all-important question of how the project would be financed was not settled. Furthermore, Turkey wanted to see other NATO members, including Greece, taking part in the project. Ankara also wished to develop its relations with neighbors and felt that the project would have a negative impact on these relations. Finally, Russia was opposed to the project.

B. The Emergence of the New Defense Identity in Europe: The WEU, the CDSP, and Turkey The Development of the WEU and the CDSP

As Europe began to emerge as a bloc in the international arena during the 1990s, it set about establishing a common currency. In this process, attention was also directed at the important question of collective security and the establishment of a security organization.

The Western European Union (WEU) was established under the Brussels Treaty of 1948 but acquired this title only in 1954 when Italy and Germany joined. After remaining on paper for decades, it was revived in 1984 at the initiative of France and Germany. The Council of Ministers of the WEU decided in October 1987 to develop relations with NATO and to consult on a regular basis on questions of European defense and security in order to enhance the effectiveness of the organization.

But the most significant development occurred in December 1991 at the Maastricht Summit, when it was decided to revive the dormant organization in order to establish a security structure for the EU. This would be done by linking the EU and WEU. The decision entailed the development of the European Common Defense and Security Policy (CDSP), the automatic membership of all EU countries in the WEU, and the shifting of the WEU Council and Secretariat from London to Brussels.

In May 1992 the first steps were taken toward establishing a European army with the creation of the Eurocorps, made up of French and German units. At Petersberg in 1992, the WEU decided to take part in peacekeeping, peacemaking, crisis prevention, and humanitarian missions. The WEU also came to the conclusion that the European pillar of NATO had to be strengthened. Questions relating to Europe's security and defense, including the WEU, began to be considered under the title European Security and Defense Identity (ESDI). At the NATO summit held in Brussels in 1994, the development of ESDI was supported.

The WEU did not have the wherewithal to carry out the tasks assigned to it at Petersberg, however. For this reason, NATO established the Joint Combined Task Force (JCTF) in 1994, and it was agreed that the WEU would make use of the means at the disposal of the JCTF. Thus the WEU was provided with the possibility to use NATO's command and control and communications facilities and rely on NATO's personnel during this transition phase. At the same time, NATO had made sure that the ESDI would develop under its wing. As the EU developed its security identity, it felt the need to rely on NATO, especially after its singular lack of success in Bosnia. The aim was to develop military capabilities that were separable but not separate, NATO also wanted the EU to consult with it before undertaking an operation to determine whether NATO was prepared to undertake the mission or not. In other words, NATO wanted to have the first right of refusal.

At the EU Amsterdam Summit of 1997, the WEU was recognized as the security organization of the European Union. At the NATO Madrid Summit in 1997, it was decided that the WEU would participate in NATO's planning process. It was subsequently agreed to provide the WEU with the capability to intervene in regional crises and to give it a structure that would preclude the possibility of a veto by NATO members that belonged to the EU.

At the Washington Summit of NATO that took place in April 1999, the EU obtained the right to intervene in a situation in which NATO did not intervene by using the means at NATO's disposal. But the EU could avail itself of NATO's means in such situations (known as NATO's first right of refusal) only with the approval of the North Atlantic Council, the decision-making organ of NATO.

Toward the end of the 1990s the EU accelerated its efforts to create its army, despite the objections of the U.S. Former NATO secretary-general Javier Solana was appointed as the EU's joint defense and foreign policy senior representative and secretary-general of the WEU. At the EU's Cologne Summit in June 1999, the WEU was absorbed within the EU. The WEU had concluded its mission as an organization dealing with the EU's security issues and came to an end in May 2000.

The Helsinki Summit of the EU held in December 1999 established a headline goal whereby a European rapid reaction force of 60,000 troops would be established by 2003. It would have the capability of being deployed to a crisis zone within two months and would be able to operate there for a full year. The force would be under the exclusive control of EU member states. It was agreed that the force would undertake missions in which NATO did not participate. This conveyed the message that cooperation with NATO would continue.

At the EU Summit in June 2000 held at Feira, Portugal, new principles were adopted with respect to the contributions of Turkey and Norway (NATO members that were not members of EU) and Slovenia and Bulgaria (candidates for accession to the EU). The nature of the decisions made and Turkey's reaction to them are examined below. Steps were taken to facilitate the EU's use of NATO's means, and mechanisms were developed to ensure the exchange of information between the two organizations. Cooperation between these two bodies was being intensified, notably in the region of the Balkans.

The EU was seeking the ability to intervene on its own in trouble spots like Bosnia and Kosovo. The EU was in a dilemma. It wanted to be a power in its own right and have the capability of intervening in crises like Bosnia and Kosovo independently of the U.S. and NATO. At the same time, it was having difficulty in getting organized to carry out these missions and provide the financial means that were required.

By 1999 the EU was determined to establish its own security identity but was confronted by a number of obstacles:

- The forces of WEU members were all assigned to NATO, and it was difficult to create the extra forces required by the new restructuring. To create a force of 60,000 with the capability of operating for one year, it would be necessary to employ 200,000 personnel.
- The proposed restructuring required substantial additional financial resources. Public opinion was against raising defense spending, however, at a time when defense budgets were being trimmed. Germany's defense spending in relation to its GNP had been cut to 1.5%, and Britain's was down to 2.5%. Merely providing for transport (and especially air transport capability) called for expenditures in the order of $62 billion.

- The WEU was far from having the resources in command and control, intelligence, satellite surveillance, communications, and planning that were at NATO's disposal and was utterly dependent on NATO in these areas. Nor did it have the bases and headquarters that were required. In Bosnia in 1995 and Kosovo in 1999, it was the U.S. Air Force that largely carried out the bombings. The European allies were incapable of providing even adequate air transport to ferry troops.
- Should a crisis in which WEU members were involved escalate and begin to threaten WEU members themselves, it was not clear that NATO's article 5 calling for other allies to intervene to repel an attack would apply.

Turkey, the WEU, and the ESDI/ESDP

Turkey's institutional association with the European security structures went through several developments.

When Turkey applied for accession to the EC in April 1987, it also applied to join the WEU, which was being revived at the time. The members of the EC attributed great importance to the WEU as the embodiment of the European defense identity and would not relish including a nonmember like Turkey. The Europeans could not envision Turkey's membership even in the medium term, so instead they granted Turkey associate membership in the WEU in 1992. The other associate members were Norway and Iceland, joined by the Czech Republic, Hungary, and Poland in 1999.

In 1994 membership in the WEU was made conditional on membership in the EU, which closed the door on Turkish membership in the WEU. This meant that Turkey's links with the EU consisted of associate membership and, since 1996, membership in the customs union, while its link with the WEU was also confined to associate membership. Associate members were allowed to take part in meetings of the WEU Council but not to vote. Ankara was in a situation where it was not able to influence decisions that had binding effects on Turkey. Turkey welcomed the WEU decision of 1997 under which associate members were allowed to take part, along with full members, in the planning and decision-making process in operations in which they participated directly, although it considered this step insufficient. Turkey also of fered to participate in the force that would be set up along the lines adopted in the headline goal. This participation would consist of a unit of 3,000 men. The Turkish offer was made because Ankara feared that its position would suffer further erosion with the ending of the WEU. But the EU failed to take up Ankara's offer.

The founding charter of the WEU (the 1948 Brussels Treaty) actually made no provision for associate membership. This meant that Turkey's legal status within the WEU was imprecise. That is why Turkey was seeking some legal arrangement to overcome this situation.

Turkey's approach to Europe's efforts toward building up its security organization can be summarized as follows:

- This new organization should not be an alternative to NATO. NATO has been tested over a span of fifty years and has proven to be effective.
- In its approach to the question of security, Europe should not be guided solely by considerations of integration. It should also take into account the region's strategic environment and security requirements.
- All the European members of NATO should automatically become full members of the WEU and participate in ESDI.
- If the EU insists on setting up its own security structure, this should be done in a manner that would make it the European pillar of NATO.
- The transatlantic link (that is, the organic link with the U.S.) should be preserved.
- Turkey is unlike other NATO members that are not WEU members. As the country with the second largest army in Europe, Turkey has made a solid contribution to Europe's security for fifty years.
- In the post-Cold War era, sixteen potential sources of trouble have been identified. Of these, thirteen are in the neighborhood of Turkey. Under these circumstances, it is not rational to leave Turkey outside ESDI.

The Turkish and U.S. approaches to ESDI were generally convergent. Although the U.S. did not take a position of outright opposition to ESDI, it was uncomfortable with the idea of Europe setting up a security structure that was completely separate from NATO. Washington went so far as to declare that NATO would be nothing more than a historic relic if Europe went ahead and established its own army without first seeking an agreement.

In its efforts to prevent its total exclusion from ESDI, Turkey's strongest card was its membership in NATO. At the NATO summit in April 1999, Turkey secured the inclusion of paragraph 17 in the Strategic Concept paper.

This paragraph noted that the EU was taking steps to strengthen its security and defense dimension and was in the process of accelerating its efforts in that direction. This process was bound to have important effects on the alliance. Based on the arrangements made by NATO and the WEU, paragraph 17 stated that the European allies should be included in this process.

Although Turkey was accepted as a candidate for accession at the EU's Helsinki Summit in December 1999, its place in matters dealing with European security continued to erode. As Europe accelerated the process of building up the ESDP, there was no room for Turkey in the decision-making process. In fact, in June 1999 it was decided to allow the ESDP to make use of NATO facilities without consulting countries like Turkey, even though the decision had been made at the Washington NATO summit in April 1999 that NATO members who were not members of the EU would participate in European security and defense activities. This angered Ankara and compelled the government to use its NATO card when it threatened that it might veto the WEU's use of NATO facilities if Turkey continued to be obstructed on this issue.

As mentioned previously, the subject of how non-EU members would contribute to European security was taken up at the EU summit held at Feira in June 2000. It was decided on that occasion that, if the European Council decided to carry out an operation and use NATO facilities for this purpose, countries like Turkey that were members of NATO but not of the EU could participate in the operation.

The EU also proposed institutional arrangements to cater to the needs of countries like Turkey and came up with the 15 + 6 formula. Under the formula, the fifteen members of the EU and therefore of the WEU would get together with the six members of NATO that were not members of the WEU (Turkey, Iceland, Norway, Hungary, Poland, and the Czech Republic) under a consultative arrangement that provided for meetings twice a year. In addition, NATO and the WEU would form four working groups to consider matters of common interest.

The decisions of the Feira summit did not satisfy Turkey. They did not involve participation and cooperation on a political and strategic plane but a consultative mechanism at a lower level. No distinction was made between autonomous EU operations and operations carried out with NATO backup and support. Instead of setting up a single permanent structure, an arrangement involving dialogue, consultation, and cooperation was foreseen. No place was provided in the EU's military structure for NATO members that were not members of the EU.

Turkey's dissatisfaction with the ESDI arrangements led it to insist that the EU seek the approval and obtain the authorization of the alliance for all EU operations that would make use of NATO facilities. At the NATO meeting held in Brussels in July 2000, Turkey was able to secure a formal decision to this effect. Although the Turkish press described this as a success for Turkey, the decision resulted not just from the firm Turkish stand but from U.S. support for Turkey at the meeting. Ankara did not want to find itself in a situation where its troops assigned to NATO would go into action as a result of the EU's use of NATO's means when Turkey had not been involved in the decision or given its consent. That is why it was insisting on explicit prior authorization by NATO of each operation in which the EU wanted to have recourse to NATO facilities.

The EU held to its decision not to admit Turkey into the decision-making mechanism and preferred to confine Turkey within the consultative arrangements.

At the EU summit at Nice in early December 2000, the decision was made to provide the European Security and Defense Policy (ESDP) with an autonomous rather than an independent structure. This was done at Britain's insistence and also conformed to the wishes of the U.S. The U.S. was worried that the EU might develop its own independent structure if it was denied access to NATO's facilities. That is why the U.S. was prepared to allow for the EU's use of NATO facilities through consultations. Turkey took a firm stand, however, because the EU was not ready to give assurances that countries in Turkey's position would be involved in the decision-making. Although President Clinton was generally supportive of Turkey, he appealed to Ankara to show more flexibility. But Ankara held to its position, and the meeting ended without a decision on the issue. Turkey had demonstrated that it could block progress on Europe's security restructuring and use the NATO card for this purpose. Turkey also wanted to use this card in connection with its membership in the EU. The media and public opinion in Turkey were backing Ankara's determined stand and contrasting it with Kenan Evren's consent to the Rogers Plan in 1980.

Turkey was unhappy with the determination of the EU to set up its own security structure for the following reasons:

- Turkey was not part of this process, and the likelihood that it would be admitted later was remote.
   Ankara was naturally against being excluded from a European security organization in the making while it claimed that Turkey was part of Europe.
- · Turkey had been a member of NATO for fifty years and had made important military and other contributions to the alliance. Yet, when the EU started using NATO facilities within the framework of the ESDI, countries like Austria and Finland would be using NATO's facilities without ever having contributed anything to the organization while Turkey was being excluded from the decision-making arrangements of the ESDI. The difficulty arose because the EU wanted to make use of what was already in place without having to bother with creating a new structure.

- When Greece became a full member of the WEU, Turkey found itself confronted with a potential Greek veto in another European organization (the first being in the EU itself). This put Turkey at a clear disadvantage vis-à-vis Greece, especially with respect to the questions of Cyprus and the Aegean, where the EU now confronted Turkey with a security organization. The difficulty did not disappear with the end of the WEU, because it was succeeded by the ESDP.
- While the EU was able to use NATO's facilities within the ESDP framework, Turkey was excluded from the decision-making bodies of the EU even though it was an associate member. This is why Turkey insisted on participating in decisions involving operations in which NATO facilities would be used. In operations where NATO facilities would not be used, Turkey wanted to participate at least in the process leading up to the decision-making stage.
- Turkey faced a number of political and economic problems in its bid to join the EU, in the areas of human rights, democratic procedures, hyperinflation, and its level of economic development. In the military field, however, Turkey found itself in a stronger position than most EU members. Its exclusion from the EU's security arrangements could only be explained by the EU's reluctance to see Turkey within the EU.
- Turkey was deeply disturbed by the possibility of the envisaged Rapid Intervention Force being used in Cyprus or the Aegean. When the European media included Cyprus among the disputes posing a threat to Europe in 2000, Turkey's apprehension increased.

The EU kept Turkey away from the ESDP because of the Greek veto and because it did not want the transatlantic link emphasized at a time when it was seeking to stand on its own feet and to distance itself from NATO. Because Turkey maintained close links with the U.S. at the time, the EU tended to perceive Turkey as a possible American Trojan horse within the ESDI.

Turkey maintained its stand throughout the late 1990s and early 2000s and blocked all decisions that might allow the EU to use NATO facilities. In doing so, Turkey based itself on the argument that NATO's Washington Summit in April 1999 had decided that the ESDI would be built upon the WEU and would constitute the European pillar of NATO. Ankara held that the issue was not between Turkey and the EU but between NATO and the EU.

Turkey's firm stand led London and Washington to send high-level delegations to Ankara in order to persuade Turkey to soften its stance. Turkey attributed great importance to the issue, however, and maintained its position. Even the economic crises confronting Turkey at the end of 2000 and early 2001 did not lead Turkey to change its stand.

The diplomatic contacts allowed Turkey to clarify its position and its concerns with respect to the ESDP. Ankara was apprehensive over the possibility of an EU intervention in regions close to Turkey where it felt it had vital interests. Cyprus and the Aegean headed the list of these regions. The Greek opposition to Turkey's demands only confirmed Turkey's fears. Ankara's demands consisted of the following:

 In peacetime Ankara demanded full participation in the consultation arrangements and exercises. Turkey wanted to be in the decision-making process during a crisis and when operations were being undertaken.

- At times when the EU decided to intervene in a crisis and mount operations by using NATO's means and facilities, Turkey wanted to be present at all phases of decision-making and implementation.
- When the EU intervened in a regional crisis without resorting to NATO, Turkey wanted guarantees that it would be allowed to participate in the operation and be given some say in the decision-making arrangements if Ankara deemed that the crisis was geographically close to Turkey and that its vital security interests were at stake.
- Crisis-management activities and operations would not be undertaken by the ESDP in situations where a NATO member (meaning Greece) happened to be a party.

Thus, even if the EU did not make use of NATO facilities, Ankara wanted to be in the decision-making process when the intervention was in a region of great interest to Turkey or concerned its security. Pressure was brought to bear on Ankara to modify this position. The U.S. and Britain were trying to reconcile the Turkish and EU approaches and proposed that Turkey participate in the implementation of operations in its vicinity but not in the decision. Turkey was seeking to constrain the EU from engaging in operations even in cases where the EU would not use NATO facilities, despite not being a member of the EU. In a sense, this revealed Ankara's mistrust of the EU, even as it sought membership.

During this period the U.S. and Turkish positions on European security were identical or very similar, even though their considerations and objectives might have been different. The U.S. made no specific statement on the subject of Turkey's membership in the WEU. But it did provide general support for the membership of all European NATO members in the WEU. The U.S. supported Turkey's position by calling for all European members of NATO to be integrated in the WEU decision-making mechanism. At the debates in NATO on the subject, Washington stood by Ankara, The U.S. was motivated by the desire to keep an eye on the ESDI through Turkey and Britain as the ESDI/ESDP drifted away from NATO.

C. Turkey's Defense Industries and Arms Procurement/Production Projects

The arms procurement and military modernization programs undertaken by Turkey in the 1980s were accelerated in the 1990s. In doing this, Ankara was motivated by the struggle against the PKK and the long-standing arms race with Greece as well as the ongoing instability and conflicts in its vicinity.

During the Cold War, the U.S. held first place as an arms supplier to Turkey, followed by Germany. In the 1990s American-made weapons and equipment made up 80% of Turkey's inventory. With the ending of the Cold War, however, it became noticeable that Turkey was seeking to diversify its sources of weapons through international bidding when it began to carry out the modernization of its armed forces. This was due to a number of factors: (1) the obstacles and restrictions placed by Congress and human rights groups on the sale of weapons by the U.S.; (2) the high rate of interest that applied to FMS credits and the subsequent end of FMS credits altogether; (3) the decision of some European countries (notably Germany) not to sell arms to Turkey on the grounds that they would be used against the PKK; and (4) the discovery in the 1980s that large arms-procurement projects could serve as a useful tool to extract political or economic concessions.

In the 1990s Israel, Italy, France, and Russia joined the countries from which Turkey procured arms or with which it undertook joint production projects.

From 1988 to 1999 Turkey spent over $28 billion to modernize its armed forces. After 1999 a new philosophy was developed for defense procurement. Starting in the mid-1980s, Turkey became one of the major arms importers, and its defense spending was proportionately among the highest in the world.

As the Cold War came to an end, Turkey changed its defense strategy, which led to changes in its defense production and arms procurement projects. Turkey's defense doctrine was formulated in the light of the following developments:

- Turkey had become a "front country" in the 1990s.
   It was located at one of the most strategic points of the region referred to as Eurasia, and conflicts were raging on three sides. In these conditions, Turkey needed adequate military capabilities to serve as a deterrent.
- During the Gulf War of 1990-91, it became clear that the Turkish army was not adequately equipped to fight in a situation where it might find itself dragged into a conflict with Iraq.
- During this period Turkey experienced low-intensity conflict in the southeast, tension with Syria, and sporadic crises with Greece. This called for the ability to carry out "two and a half" wars (Syria, Greece, and the PKK) and the weaponry that such a strategy would require.
- Turkey was seeking the status of a regional power and the military capability that this status required.
- The forward defense strategy called for engaging potential aggressors beyond Turkey's borders.
- Ankara had adopted the policy of making military contributions to international crisis-management operations.

Although some of these factors underwent alterations with changing circumstances, the basic factors continued to apply. When the ten-year procurement program launched in 1985 expired, a new defense and procurement plan was prepared in 1995. In 1998 the policy paper on "The Turkish Defense Industry" was adopted in the light of the threats contained in the 1997 document on national security and defense.

In this framework, the resources that would be required to modernize the armed forces over the next twenty-five years were estimated at $150 billion: $55 billion for the army, $35 billion for the navy, and $60 billion for the air force. Of these huge sums, 35% would come from the budget of the Ministry of Defense, 18% from the Fund for Supporting the Defense Industry, 10% from the Turkish Defense Fund, and the rest from foreign credits. The most important project was the joint production of F-16 aircraft, which was completed in 1999. Toward the end of the 1990s forty-one projects were in the implementation stage, including tanks and helicopters, upgrading of the communications network, early-warning aircraft, and the adoption of lighter assault weapons. As in the case of the F-16s, the contracts in most of these projects contained a clause requiring local production, in order to acquire new technology.

The Initiative to Create a National Defense Industry When such a big project was launched, Turkey set a number of conditions. Among these were that local firms must be involved in the project, some of the components must be locally produced, the possibility of exporting the finished product to third countries must be kept open, and no political restrictions such as the situation in Cyprus or human rights would be imposed. The overall objective was to establish a national defense industry. This would help reduce dependence on foreign sources and allow for the import of technology. To cite an example, the tank project initiated in 1996 by the Undersecretariat of Defense Industries called for the production of tanks in Turkey through technological cooperation with the producing firm, which was required to submit its bid through its local partner firms to produce the tanks.

Talks were held with the Istanbul Chamber of Industry in May 1997 to involve the Turkish business community with defense industries. A target was set to allow the local content of defense products (then at 21%) to reach 40% by the year 2000. An important milestone in this process was the document entitled "The Policy and Strategy of the Turkish Defense Industry," which came into force in June 1998. This document was prepared in consultation with local industrialists, who were called upon to invest in defense production and to seek foreign partners for this purpose. The document divided defense systems into three categories: "national," "critical," and "other systems." Firms that produced in these categories were required to obtain security clearances. In bidding procedures, local firms were allowed a price advantage (up to 15%).

Tusaş Aerospace Industries (TAI) undertook a project for the manufacture of 160 aircraft, which was completed in 1995 with the delivery of 152 aircraft to the Turkish Air Force. At this time, Turkey, the U.S., and Egypt reached an agreement for TAI to produce forty-six F-16 aircraft for the Egyptian Air Force, which were delivered from 1993 to 1995. This was the first time the F-16 was being produced outside the U.S. for delivery to a third country. The project demonstrated the close relations between Turkey and the U.S.

The second phase of the F-16 project was carried out with the support of the Turkish Defense Fund. In this framework, a further eighty F-16s were produced starting in 1995, with the final delivery taking place in November 1999. This was Turkey's largest defense project ever, with a total cost of $8 billion.

As this project drew to a close, TAI undertook new projects. Among these was the production of fifty CASA CN-235 transport aircraft produced under Spanish license. Delivery of these aircraft was completed in 1998. An agreement was reached with Eurocopter for the production of thirty Cougar helicopters. There was also a project to produce parts for Sikorsky helicopters.

Another important project (announced in October 1996) involved the manufacture of 1,000 new tanks. The magnitude of this project was $7 billion. A $3 billion project called for the modernization of 1,000 tanks in the army's inventory. The Modern Main Battle Tank Project entailed the production of 1,000 tanks from 2004 to 2013. The call for tenders went out in August 1997 and initially involved the production of 250 tanks. Those tendering included General Dynamics—BMC Nurol for the M-1 Abrams tank (U.S.), Krauss Maffei—Otokar for the Leopard 2 (Germany), GIAT-Roketsan for the Leclerc (France), and Ukreksport-ASMAŞ for the T-84 (Ukraine). (All these projects were later postponed or canceled because of economic crises.)

Turkey called for co-production with Turkish firms rather than direct imports in carrying out this project. This procurement method would ensure that the final product would fully conform to Turkey's particular requirements.

Another project initiated in 1987 concerned the acquisition of 720 helicopters. This procurement was necessary because helicopters were essential in combating the PKK, both for ferrying troops and for striking at targets. The decision was made in September 1992 to acquire 200 helicopters in the first batch. The original intent was to import 45 Black Hawk helicopters and start the manufacture of a further 50 in Turkey. In view of the urgent needs of the armed forces, however, the decision was made to import the whole lot and have TAI produce certain parts under an offset agreement. With this purchase, Turkey rose to second place among the countries with the largest fleet of Black Hawks. As mentioned earlier, TAI was already manufacturing Cougars. In addition, 10 Cobra helicopters were acquired from the U.S. firm Bell-Textron. Finally, 19 Mi-17 helicopters were bought from Russia in April 1995 in repayment for Russia's debts to Turkey's Eximbank.

An important stage of this process was Turkey's call for tenders in May 1997 to co-produce 145 attack helicopters. Those firms submitting bids included the Italian firm Augusta with its A-129, the U.S. firms Bell-Textron with its King Cobra and Boeing with its Apache, the French-German firm Eurocopter with its Tiger, and an Israeli-Russian partnership with its KA-50, which was given the Turkish name Erdoğan. When the bids were considered, the contract was awarded to Bell for the King Cobra.

With the completion of this project, Turkey will become one of the major helicopter operators, with a fleet of approximately 650 helicopters.

Defense Projects and Turkish Foreign Policy

The huge rearmament project undertaken by Turkey added a new dimension to its foreign policy. It should be noted that, at a time when the arms market was contracting following the Cold War, the project for purchasing and/or co-producing arms in the amount of $150 billion riveted the attention of arms producers on Turkey. This project was to bring benefits to Turkey.

- 1. Because of the substantial profits for defense industries, they were ready to undertake lobbying on behalf of Turkey in their own countries. Among those who came to Ankara during the negotiations of the arms deals were the executives of the supplier firms as well as the ministers of defense and foreign affairs of the countries involved. When the Öcalan crisis erupted between Turkey and Italy, the executives of the Italian helicopter firm traveled to Ankara to ease the tension between Turkey and Italy while also applying pressure on their own government. In France the "Armenian Genocide" bills came before the parliament in 1998 and 2000 but failed to pass, in part thanks to defense projects involving Turkey. When the EU's Luxembourg Summit made the decision to exclude Turkey in December 1997, the General Staff made a list of the countries that had taken a stand against Turkey and refused to accept bids for defense contracts coming from the countries on its list. The contract for the upgrading of F-4 aircraft was awarded to Israel in order to speed up the implementation of the military cooperation with that country that had been initiated in 1996. Prime Minister Ecevit himself confirmed that the helicopter contract had been awarded to the American firm Bell because of the letter in support of Turkey that President Clinton had written to the leaders of the Armenian community in the U.S. Arms deals had become a card that Turkey employed in the implementation of foreign policy.
- 2. The projects being undertaken were contributing to Turkey's technological development. As time went by, Turkey was manufacturing not only bodies and engines but also the electronics and weapons systems of its military hardware. This allowed firms like Aselsan and Roketsan (producers of electronic and other technical components) to upgrade their technological skills.

- 3. Unlike direct purchases, joint production allowed Turkey to acquire equipment that was best suited to its particular requirements.
- 4. The indirect offset clauses inserted in contracts resulted in tourism facilities in Turkey built by supplier firms and other such benefits.
- 5. The projects were being implemented in stages and often extended for periods up to twenty-five years. This gave Turkey added political leverage. It has been claimed that the awarding of contracts was often postponed in order to gain more leverage.
- 6. Large defense contracts were inhibiting the Western countries from raising human-rights issues while strengthening Turkey's hand in negotiations. Germany had created difficulties for Turkey in the sale of armored vehicles in the past, citing the likelihood that the vehicles might be used in the southeast. When Germany also attempted to raise this issue with respect to the tank contract, the Turkish authorities reacted sharply, pointing out that the contract had not yet been finalized and that the German manufacturer would end up the loser if the issue was pressed.

7. Ankara saw its rearmament program as a vehicle for turning Turkey into a regional power and strengthening its voice in world councils. This was also strengthening Turkey vis-à-vis neighbors with which it had contentious issues. The ambitious nature of its program was revealed by Turkey's acquisition of aerial refueling tankers and the inclusion of an aircraft carrier in the strategic procurement program for the years 1999–2008. In this manner, Turkey gained more credibility when it warned Greece that extending its territorial waters to twelve miles would lead to war or when it threatened war against Syria in September 1998 unless Damascus expelled the PKK leader from Syrian territory.

8. As a result of its efforts to build up a defense industry, Turkey became a small-scale exporter of arms in the 1990s. Turkey secured a $75 million order for the delivery of 133 armored combat vehicles to the United Arab Emirates and reached agreement with Malaysia in 2000 for the sale of 211 armored vehicles costing $300 million.

Despite these benefits, the ambitious projects also had a down side for Turkish foreign policy.

1. The awarding of contracts was not purely a technical question but also had political implications. To deny

U.S. companies orders would have repercussions on relations with Washington, while it would be equally inconvenient to exclude European companies from contracts.

- 2. While the powerful arms lobbies of the U.S. and Europe were quite prepared to support Turkey during the competition period, the likelihood existed that the companies that lost out in the race might reverse their positions toward Turkey.
- 3. As Turkey accelerated its arms procurements, this was compelling its rivals in the region to do likewise. Indeed, Greece announced a $24 billion arms procurement program in the 1990s and reached agreement for the purchase of 50 F-16s from the U.S. While General Dynamics was bidding for joint production in Turkey, it was also proposing the sale of M-1 tanks to Greece.
- 4. In building up its defense industries, Turkey was seeking to become more self-sufficient. Joint production, however, meant depending on outside sources for key components. Although takeovers and consolidation were the common features of most sectors in the world, foreign takeovers of defense industries were regulated and restricted by law in many countries.
- 5. Procurement of weapons, whether from local sources or through imports, was always a costly affair. With arms purchases amounting to $9.5 billion in 1999, Turkey was in thirteenth place among the countries of the world. The procurement of an aircraft carrier or AWACS earlywarning aircraft would increase these expenditures substantially. Although it was pointed out that the purchase of helicopters and tanks was carried out with resources derived from the Defense Industries Fund rather than the state budget, important national resources were still being absorbed by purchases of military hardware. The total rearmament program involving expenditures of the order of $150 billion was considered excessive for a country faced with serious economic problems and came in for sharp criticism. The criticism reached a peak in March and April 2000. A very tight economic policy was being implemented at this time, and the public reacted unfavorably to Ecevit, who attended the World Economic Forum at Davos with a long list of defense contracts. As the public criticism mounted, the Undersecretariat of Defense Industries arranged a press conference for the first time to announce that defense expenditures would be kept at a level that would not damage the economy. It was also pointed out that countries like Greece, Armenia, and Syria in Turkey's neighborhood were spending proportionately more than Turkey for their defense. Still, Turkey's defense expenditures, representing 5% of its GNP, were twice as high as Russia's defense spending of $4.5 billion. After the financial crisis of November 2000, the IMF also began to question the level of military expenditures.

Conclusion

In summary, in the 1990s the U.S. was the most important country for Turkey's policy-makers. Although Ankara cooperated very closely with Washington, problems cropped up frequently. There was no question affecting Turkish foreign policy that did not somehow involve the U.S. The U.S. diplomat Richard Holbrooke declared that Turkey was critical in every issue that Washington considered important in Eurasia. Secretary of state Madeleine Albright described Turkey as a close and reliable ally with which the U.S. cooperated in the region stretching from Kosovo to Kyrgyzstan as well as in organizations like the EU, NATO, the WEU, and the OSCE. She called Turkey an "irreplaceable ally" (Hürriyet, 29 September 2000). Turkey took advantage of this close relationship to further its influence in the Balkans and in Central Asia and to promote the Baku-Ceyhan oil pipeline. The U.S. was either directly involved with all developments in Turkish foreign policy or influencing events from the background.

As a result of this involvement with the U.S. and the course of international developments, Turkey occasionally pursued policies against its will, as in the case of Operation Provide Comfort. In a way, the enhanced strategic partnership between Turkey and the U.S. had turned into an "imperative partnership." Turkey became overly dependent on the U.S. as a consequence of the emergence of the U.S. as the sole superpower, the growing strategic dimension of bilateral relations, Turkey's difficulties with its neighbors, its political rift with Europe, its economic problems, and its foreign debts, in excess of $110 billion. Ankara had given its approval to Operation Provide Comfort in order to obtain the possibility of conducting military operations in northern Iraq; it agreed to the Baku-Supsa pipeline to secure U.S. support for the Baku-Ceyhan pipeline; and it entered into military cooperation with Israel to gain leverage against Syria. For Turkey, relations with the U.S. became crucial. By the end of the 1990s it had become increasingly difficult for Ankara to bring about changes in this relationship even it wanted to.

The close relationship with the U.S. lasted from 1992 to 2000, when there was a Democratic administration in Washington. This disproved the popular notion that Republicans were closer to Turkey than Democrats. It was international developments that determined the nature of bilateral relations rather than the party in power.

In general terms, in the 1990s Turkey was seeking room for maneuver within the confines of its overdependence on the U.S.

The $150 billion arms procurement project was scaled down to $80 billion as a result of negative public reaction and the dire economic situation. The only projects that were carried out were the purchase of four AWACS early warning and communication aircraft and the upgrading of F-4 aircraft and M-48 tanks.

İLHAN UZGEL

Sources (Relations with the USA and NATO)

- Abramowitz, Morton. "The Complexities of American Policy-making on Turkey." Insight Turkey (Oct.—Nov. 2000): 3–35.
- Akyüz, Abdullah. "U.S.-Turkish Economic Relations at the Outset of the 21st Century." Insight Turkey (Oct.–Nov. 2000): 71–81
- Alantar, Özden. "Türk-Amerikan İlişkilerinin Ulusal Güvenlik Boyutunda Dönüşümü." In En Uzun Onyıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 225–46. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.
- Amerikan Gizli Belgelerinde Türkiye'de İslamcı Akımlar. İstanbul: Beyan Yayınları, 1990.
- Aybet, Gülnur. NATO's Developing Role in Collective Security.

  Ankara: Sam, 1999.
- Aykan, Mahmut Bali. "Turkish Perspectives on Turkish-U.S. Relations concerning Persian Gulf Security in the Post—Cold War Era." Middle East Journal (Summer 1996): 344–58.
- Baç-Meltem Müftüler. "Turkey's Role in the EU's Security and Foreign Policies." Security Dialogue (Dec. 2000): 489–502.
- Barkey, Henri. "Under the Gun: Turkish Foreign Policy and the Kurdish Question." In The Kurdish Nationalist Movement in the 1990s: Its Impact on Turkey and the Middle East, ed. Robert Olson, pp. 65–83. Lexington: Kentucky University Press, 1996.
- Barkey, Henri, and Graham Fuller. Turkey's Kurdish Question. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield, 1998.
- Brzezinski, Zbigniew. Büyük Satranç Tahtası (original title: The Grand Chessboard: American Primacy and Its Geostrategic Imperatives [New York: Basic Books, 1997]). İstanbul: Sabah, 1998.
- Çayhan Esra, and Nurşin Ateşoğlu-Güney. Avrupa'da Yeni Güvenlik Arayışları, NATO-AB-Türkiye. İstanbul: AFA, 1996.
- Cevizoğlu, Hulki. Körfez Savaşı ve Özal Diplomasisi. Ankara: Form Yayınları, 1991.
- Çongar, Yasemin. "A Strong Alliance Yet to Outgrow Mere Geopolitics." Insight Turkey (Oct.—Nov. 2000): 83—89.
- Couturier, Kelly. U.S.-Turkish Relations in the Cold War Era. İstanbul: Friedrich Ebert, 1997;

- Değer, Emin. Bir Cumhuriyet Düşmanının Portresi Ya da Fethullah Gülen Hocaefendinin Derin Misyonu. İstanbul: Cumhuriyet Kitaplar, 2000.
- Erkaya, Güven, and Taner Baytok. Bir Asker, Bir Diplomat. İstanbul: Doğan Kitapçılık, 2001.
- Evriviades, Marios. "Turkey's Role in United States Strategy during and after the Cold War." Mediterranean Quarterly (Autumn 1998): 30-52.
- Fuller, Graham, and Ian Lesser. Kuşatılanlar: İslam ve Batının Jeopolitiği (original title: A Sense of Siege: The Geopolitics of Islam and the West [Boulder: Westview, 1995]). İstanbul: Sabah, 1995.
- . Turkey's New Geopolitics. Boulder: Westview, 1993.
- Gabelnick, Tamar. "In Focus: Turkey, Arms, and Human Rights." FAS Report 4, no. 16 (May 1999): 1-3.
- Gabelnick, Tamar, William Hartung, and Jennifer Ciarrocca.

  "Arming Repression: U.S. Arms Sales to Turkey during the Clinton Administration." A Joint Report of the World Policy Institute and the Federation of American Scientists (Oct. 1999). http://fas.org/asmp/library/reports/turkeyrep.
- Huntington, Samuel. "The Clash of Civilizations." Foreign Affairs (Summer 1993): 22-49.
- Kandemir, Nüzhet. "Turkish-U.S. Bilateral Relations on the Eve of the U.S. Elections." Insight Turkey (Oct.-Nov. 2000): 65-69.
- Kesiç, Obrad. "American-Turkish Relations at a Crossroads."

  Mediterranean Quarterly (Winter 1995): 97–108.
- Kirişçi, Kemal. "Türkiye ve Kuzey İrak'taki Kürt Güvenlik Bölgesi." Avrasya Dosyası (1995): 7–22.
- ———. "U.S.-Turkish Relations: From Uncertainty to Closer Ties." Insight Turkey (Oct.–Nov. 2000): 37–63.
- Köni, Hasan. "Yeni Uluslararası Düzende Türk-Amerikan İlişkileri." Yeni Türkiye 3 (Mar.-Apr. 1995): 427–35.
- Kuniholm, Bruce. "Turkey and the West." Foreign Affairs (Spring 1991): 34-48.
- Lake, Anthony. "Confronting Backlash States." Foreign Affairs (Spring 1993): 45-55.
- Migdolowitz, Carol. Current Aid Issues. Washington, D.C.: CRS, 1996.
- . Turkey's Kurdish Imbroglio and U.S. Policy. Washington, D.C.: CRS Report for Congress, 1994.
- Turkey's Military Offensive in Northern Iraq. Washington, D.C.: CRS Report for Congress, 1995.
- A National Security Strategy of Engagement and Enlargement. Washington, D.C.: White House, 1995.
- Oran, Baskın. *Kalkık Horoz-Çekiç Güç ve Kürt Devlet*i. Enlarged 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi Yayınevi, 1998.

Özkan, Tuncay. Operasyon. İstanbul: Doğan Kitap, 2000.

Pamir, Necdet. Bakü-Ceyhan Boru Hattı. Ankara: ASAM, 1999.

Papacosma, Victor, and Mary Ann Heiss. NATO in the Post-Cold War Era. New York: St. Martin, 1995.

Prados, Alfred. Kurdish Separatism in Iraq: Developments and Implications for the U.S. Washington, D.C.: CRS Report for Congress, 1991.

Savunma ve Tedarik. Ankara: TUBİTAK, 1998.

Sayarı, Sabri. "Turkey's Islamist Challenge." Middle East Quarterly (Sept. 1996): 35–43.

Sever, Ayşegül. "ABD'nin İkili Çevreleme Politikası ve Türkiye." In En Uzun Onyıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 355–80. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.

Torumtay, Necip. Orgeneral Necip Torumtay'ın Anıları. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1994.

Türkeş, Mustafa. "1990'larda NATO'nun Öncelikleri ve Türkiye." In En Uzun Onyıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 199–224. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.

Uzgel, İlhan. "Refah, Batı ve Dış Politikada Çok Başlılık." Mülkiyeliler Birliği Dergisi (June 1997): 45–56.

Yavuz, Kemal. "NATO Stratejisi, Avrupa Güvenliğinin Dünü, Bugünü, Yarını." New Perspectives Quarterly (Summer 1999): 46-51.

Yavuz, Turan. ABD'nin Kürt Kartı. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1993.

Relations with the EU

I. TURKISH-EU RELATIONS IN THE 1990S

The two determining factors in Turkey's relations with the EU during the 1990s were the ending of the Cold War and the accelerating pace of European integration. The removal of the Berlin Wall and the disintegration of the Soviet Union brought about fundamental changes in perceptions and policies in the political, economic, and security fields in Europe and throughout the world. The removal of the threat coming from the East led to ambivalence over the strategic value of Turkey to the West.

Six developments left an imprint on Turkish-EU relations during this period.

1. The former socialist countries of Central and Eastern Europe all adopted parliamentary democratic systems on the Western model and took steps toward establishing a market economy. This transformation offered the possibility of creating a united Europe by including these countries in the integration process. All of the EU member countries agreed that, in addition to the political, economic, and security dimensions, the transition countries were important culturally and historically and that their identities called for them to be part of the process of European integration. EU members were convinced that it was in their individual and collective interest to contribute to the democratic and economic development of these countries and launched large-scale technical and financial assistance programs. These programs were provided with legal foundations in the form of Europe Agreements concluded with the former socialist countries. The ultimate objective of these efforts was to admit these countries to the EU, bring to an end Europe's ideological division, and establish an integrated market on a continental scale.

2. These developments took place at a time when the ideas about a political union to supplement the monetary and economic union were beginning to take shape. In this framework, the Maastricht Treaty was signed in 1992 and came into effect in 1993. This was the most important breakthrough since the 1950s and resulted in the creation of the European Union. The EU was now on its way to becoming a political union.

3. With the acceleration of political integration, the questions of identity, culture, and vocation came to the fore, leading to the question of where the political borders of Europe were to be drawn. In the 1960s the EC stressed economic relations and downplayed ideological and historical questions. With the coming into being of the European Union, a heated debate got underway regarding Turkey's place in the European ideal and identity and whether Europe's borders encompassed Turkey or not. At a time when democracy and economic liberalism were gathering strength as European values, there was a corresponding rise in factors like ratism and religious fanaticism. As the EU embraced the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, the number of those who questioned Turkey's European identity significantly increased.

4. In the 1990s the issue of human rights was being upheld by more and more people in Europe and throughout the world. Respect for human rights was a key factor in determining the nature of the foreign relations of Western states. The violations of human rights that became a burning issue in Turkey's relations with the EC following the coup of 12 September 1980 continued to plague relations with the EU during the 1990s.

5. The issues that were in the foreground in Turkish-EU relations such as Turkey's chronic political and economic troubles, the struggle against the PKK, the disputes with Greece, and the Cyprus question began to affect relations more than ever during this period.

6. The differences over the future, nature, and goals of Turkey's relations with the EU became clear in the 1990s. Turkey was pursuing the goal of full membership with great determination and regarded each step in further developing relations as progress in this direction. Until the late 1990s the EU pursued its relations with Turkey in the framework of association and the customs union, however, and was careful about not raising false hopes of eventual full membership. These differences in approach resulted in a very strained relationship during the period from 1990 to 2000.

II. THE CUSTOMS UNION INSTEAD OF FULL MEMBERSHIP

A. The Turkey-EC Council of Association and Growing Cooperation

The Matutes Package

The European Commission issued its opinion on Turkey's application for full membership in 1989. According to the commission, Turkey's application would not be acted upon. But this adverse opinion also contained a "Cooperation Program" that was submitted to the EC's Council of Ministers on 6 June 1990. The program was authored by commissioner Abel Matutes and became known as the Matutes Package. Under this package, the Customs Union would come into effect at the end of 1995, cooperation would be stepped up in certain areas to achieve closer economic integration, financial cooperation would be resumed, and political cooperation would be developed. The Matutes Package stressed the Customs Union and the relationship of association but made no mention of full membership (Tekeli and Ilkin, pp. 208–14).

The Matutes Package was received with guarded optimism by Turkish political and business circles and by the bureaucracy. The Akbulut government showed enthusiasm for the cooperation program in order to soften the adverse public reaction to the suspension of Turkey's membership application. The Motherland Party claimed that the package demonstrated the readiness of the EC to develop further relations. Since the Customs Union was the most important stage on the road to full membership and a natural outcome of the Ankara Agreement, the views contained in the package did not contradict Turkey's approach. The opposition (part of the bureaucracy and notably the State Planning Organization as well as the business community) held the view that the Matutes Plan could be considered significant only if the Council of Ministers endorsed it. This would require the overcoming of a possible Greek veto.

The Council of Ministers took no action in 1990 or later with reference to the Cooperation Program, confirming the cautious approach of those who expressed reservations. Both the EC's bureaucracy and its Turkish counterpart, however, were ready to take practical steps to implement the program, which had not yet been formally endorsed. Under the terms of the Ankara Agreement, it was possible to proceed with the creation of the Customs Union without the council's specific authorization. On this basis, the foundation of the Customs Union was laid as soon as the Matutes Package was made public.

An important step in the direction of implementing the Customs Union had already been taken in 1988. On 7 and 20–21 November 1988 a delegation led by the undersecretary of the State Planning Organization, Ali Tigrel, held talks in Brussels with the commission within the framework of the Ad Hoc Committee. In the committee, the Turkish side committed itself to resume progressive tariff cuts with a view to achieving the Customs Union. For the first time, Turkey had formally declared that it was ready for the Customs Union by the end of 1995.

A TO THE THE WAY STORES A WAY A CONTROL OF THE

The Council of Association Meeting after a Long Break

A new Motherland Party government took office in July 1991. This government demonstrated its resolve to develop relations with the EC further by intensifying its efforts to hold a meeting of the Council of Association, which had not met for the past five years. As a result, a meeting of the council was held on 30 September 1991. This was important because it indicated that the institutional relationship and political dialogue between the parties had been resumed. It was decided at the meeting to set up committees to discuss existing problems and come up with solutions. The meeting of the Association Committee held on 6 December 1991 (with the participation of the permanent representatives of the EC, officials of the European Commission, and Turkey's ambassador to the EC) took up a number of technical questions. Among these were the calendars for the Customs Union, the quotas on textile products, allegations of dumping, and questions affecting Turkish workers in the EC countries.

In 1992 the European Commission's vice-president, Martin Bangemann, submitted a Working Program to the commission and to Turkey. This program indicated that the European side was eager to develop relations with Turkey within the framework of the Customs Union. The Working Program was signed on 21 January 1992. It contained the measures and policies leading up to the Customs Union, policies on industry and technology, communications policies, and cooperation in the social field. Bearing in mind the possibility of a Greek veto, these fields were selected because they did not require political decisions (Tekeli and İlkin, "Working Program between the European Commission and the Government of Turkey in the Framework of the Ankara Agreement and Its Additional Protocol," Ankara, 21 January 1992, pp. 246-47, cited in Tekeli and İlkin).

At this time, elections had taken place in Turkey on 20 October 1991 and a True Path Party–Social Democratic People's Party coalition government had taken office. The new government displayed an inclination to abandon Özal's policy of "full membership whatever the cost." Instead of insisting on full membership without regard to the EC's coolness to this prospect, the new Demirel government favored implementing the Ankara Agreement and, in this context, putting the Customs Union into effect at an early date. The EC was also glad to base its relations with Turkey on the Customs Union without making any further commitments for the future and speeded up its preparations.

The coalition government was giving priority to the Customs Union without losing sight of the ultimate objective of full membership. That is why it followed closely the developments in the process of European integration. We shall now examine the increasing European integration as it affected Turkey's policies.

The Widening and Deepening of the European Union and Their Consequences for Turkey

The Consequences of the Maastricht Treaty

On 9–10 December 1991 the heads of state and government of the member states of the European Union met at Maastricht in the Netherlands and decided to form a monetary union among the member states. They also took the first steps toward a political union, in which the members would pursue common policies in the fields of foreign policy and security as well as cooperation in justice and home affairs (Box 7-18). Signed in 1992, the Maastricht Treaty extended the areas of competence of the European Community, thereby making it more difficult to achieve full membership. The treaty affected Turkish-EU relations in two important ways.

- 1. The Maastricht Treaty amended article 237 of the Rome Treaty, regarding the accession of new members. Paragraph O of the new treaty declared that "all European states may apply for membership in the Union." The procedure for new members was changed with the Single Act, making it necessary to obtain the approval of the European Parliament to admit new members. Ankara was concerned because there was no clear definition of what a European state was. The prior approval of the European Parliament also caused concern, in view of the many anti-Turkish resolutions adopted by this body after 1980.
- 2. The Maastricht Treaty turned the WBU into the institution that would implement the EU's common foreign and security policy, although the WBU was not legally part of the EU and had been set up before the other European communities. NATO members that were not WEU members were called upon to become associate mem-

Box 7-18. The Maastricht Treaty

The Maastricht Treaty was signed in 1992 and came into effect in 1993. With this treaty, European integration made its most significant leap forward since the early 1950s. The EU had now become a reality. This treaty established an economic and monetary union based on a single internal market, a single currency, and coordinated economic policies. In addition, the treaty established the basis for common foreign and security policies and cooperation in the fields of justice and home affairs. Through the treaty, economic integration had been supplemented and reinforced with the goal of political union.

The treaty also made changes in the existing Institutional structure and brought new dimensions to Integration, including economic and social cohesion, regional policies, and strengthening existing political links. A deeper stage of European Integration was being achieved.

One of the most important changes was the introduction of the co-decision procedure; whereby the European Parliament was granted the right to participate in certain areas of decision-making on a par with the Council of Ministers.

The Maastricht Treaty also introduced the principle of subsidiarity, whereby decisions were to be made at the lowest possible level of government. This meant that decisions would be made by the EU, national governments, or local governments on the basis of the criterion of maximum effectiveness and efficiency. Action would be taken at the EU level when individual member states were unable to obtain results or when it would be more effective to act as a group. If results could be obtained at the national or local level, however, then the action would be taken there. The idea was to take action at the closest possible level to the ordinary citizen. This principle was introduced to assuage the concerns of national governments that did not want to see too much power concentrated in Brussels.

(S. BAYKAL)

bers. Thus Turkey would become an associate member of the WEU. But this sort of membership did not allow for participation as a full member in the decision-making process on the vital subject of Europe's security and defense. For the first time, Turkey felt that it was being excluded from the European security and defense structure. This trend continued throughout the 1990s.

The Enlargement of the EU

The events of the late 1980s that brought the Cold War to an end, as noted earlier, and the institutional and structural changes taking place within the EC brought fundamental changes to relations with Turkey. At the Dublin Summit of 28 April 1990, the decision gradually to integrate East Germany and to initiate a comprehensive enlargement move set the stage for a major transformation of the process of European integration.

The successive signing of Europe Agreements with the countries of Central and Eastern Europe was intended to prepare these countries for the EC and subsequently for EU membership. This meant that Turkey began to lose its privileged status of associate member that it had held since 1963. Similarly, as the EU shifted toward providing increasing amounts of financial and technical assistance to this group of countries, Turkey was being left behind.

In the first half of the 1990s, when the questions of which countries would be admitted to the EU and the timetable for enlargement were being discussed, Turkey was either completely left out or placed behind the countries of Central and Eastern Europe, Southern Cyprus, and Malta. Ankara was particularly upset when Southern Cyprus applied for membership on 4 July 1990 and the application was found admissible despite Turkey's objections. Before this, Turkey had been feeling European pressure on the question of Cyprus but refused to take this subject up within its dialogue with Europe. After the Cypriot application, however, European pressure increased steadily, and Turkey was forced into making concessions.

At the Lisbon Summit of 25–27 June 1992, the decision was made to start accession talks with EFTA members Austria, Finland, Sweden, Switzerland, and Norway immediately after the coming into force of the Maastricht Treaty. The decision with regard to Turkey stated that "relations will develop in accordance with the objectives established in the Ankara Agreement and will include a political dialogue" (Lisbon European Council, Presidency Conclusions, June 1992). On this occasion, it became apparent once again that the phrase contained in the commission's 1989 opinion that "no further accession talks will be undertaken before the EC has completed its deepening process and the establishment of the Single Market" would apply only to Turkey.

At the Edinburgh Summit of 11–12 December 1992, it was decided that accession talks with Austria, Sweden, and Finland would begin in 1993. In the meantime Switzerland and Norway had withdrawn their applications, following national referendums in which EU membership was voted down.

The Copenhagen Summit

One of the important milestones on the road to enlargement was the 1993 Copenhagen Summit, where the conditions and criteria for EU membership were spelled out (Box 7-19).

The Presidency Conclusions adopted at the summit included the following paragraph: "On the subject of cooperation with Turkey, the EU Summit calls on the Council to implement effectively the Conclusions of the

Box 7-19. The Copenhagen Criteria

The Copenhagen Criteria were established at the 1993 Copenhagen Summit and were further developed at the 1995 Madrid Summit and 1997 Luxembourg Summit. These criteria described the standards that a European country had to attain before it could be admitted to EU membership. The criteria came under two main headings; political and economic, According to the political criteria, the countries that were-candidates for EU membership had to achieve stability of institutions guaranteeing democracy, the rule of law, and protection and respect for human rights and minorities. Among the economic criteria, the existence of a functioning market economy and the capacity to cope with the competitive pressure and market forces within the EU were considered to be preconditions for membership. It was also established in Copenhagen that candidates must have the ability to take on the obligations of membership, including adherence to the aims of political, economic, and monetary union. This meant that candidates must conform to the acquis communautaire of the EU. This confirmed that the EU was a project of political as well as economic integration

At the Madrid Summit of 1995, a new criterion was added: "Candidate states must be ready to adjust their administrative structures following accession in order to ensure uniformity in the implementation of Union policies." Moreover, it was stated that "[w]hile it is important to transpose the EU's acquis into the national legislation, it is even more important that the legislation is implemented effectively through appropriate administrative and judicial structures" (Madrid European Council, Presidency Conclusions, December 1995).

At the Copenhagen, Madrid, and Luxembourg summits, the question of the EU's ability to absorb new members was also considered. EU institutions and members would bear in mind the burden that new members would impose on the EU in considering a country's eligibility in the light of the Copenhagen Criteria.

These criteria did not receive much attention in Turkey at the time of their adoption because attention was totally riveted on the Customs Union. The criteria became a subject of debate in Turkey after the Luxembourg Summit of 1997, and Turkey committed itself to complying with the criteria at the Helsinki Summit in 1999. The Accession Partnership Document issued by the commission on 8 November 2000 would be based on the Copenhagen Criteria.

(S. BAYKAL)

EU Lisbon Summit with a view to establishing a customs union in line with the 1963 Association Agreement and the 1970 Additional Protocol."

This phraseology clearly demonstrated that relations with Turkey would be conducted on the basis of a customs union. The same document declared that cooperation with the countries of Central and Eastern Europe would be directed toward achieving full membership. This signified that Turkey, whose association agreement and membership application predated the application of the Central and Eastern European states, was being left behind in the process of enlargement. Feeling that insisting on full membership would be futile, Ankara decided to concentrate its efforts on achieving a Customs Union in the belief that this would provide access to the EU through the back door.

We shall now examine briefly the reasons that led Turkey to shift its efforts from full membership to a Customs Union.

c. The Customs Union

Reasons for Turkey Wanting to Establish a Customs Union

Political Reasons

In addition to the fact that Turkey had been left behind by the countries of Central and Eastern Europe as they tightened their links with the EU, seven political reasons induced Ankara to seek membership in the Customs Union. (1) Greece was becoming the main obstacle to developing Turkish-EU relations as it took advantage of the Cypriot impasse and the application by Southern Cyprus to join the EU. (2) The process of deepening the EU gave rise to fears in Turkey that no enlargement would occur in the short term. (3) There was apprehension in Ankara that a number of EU countries (notably Germany) were being prevented from taking up positions in favor of Turkey by the prospect of free movement of Turkish workers after Ankara's accession to the European Union. (4) The Customs Union was being used by the Turkish government to secure benefits in domestic politics. (5) The Customs Union was expected to help restore the broken political dialogue between Turkey and the EU. (6) After the establishment of the single market following the Single Act and Maastricht Treaty and the extension of the competence of Brussels to new political areas, Turkey's accession responsibilities had become more onerous in a great number of fields. In carrying out the responsibilities arising from the Customs Union, Turkey would also be preparing for full membership in the EU and begin to cover some of the ground in this direction. Turkey felt that, through economic integration, it would accomplish the integration of its infrastructure and facilitate its political integration with the EU (7) The establishment of the Customs Union was among the legal commitments undertaken by the parties to the Ankara Agreement and the Additional Protocol. Furthermore, Turkey was committed to realizing the Customs Union under the World Trade Organization agreements and the GATT system (Tekeli and İlkin,

Economic Reasons

In addition to the political reasons, Turkey also had four economic reasons to look upon the Customs Union with favor. (1) There was a conviction that the harmonization of legislation and of economic policies that the Customs Union would require would impose a certain discipline on the economy, lead to restructuring, eliminate macroeconomic instability, and attain higher standards of governance. (2) By producing for a larger market, Turkish firms were expected to increase their productivity and efficiency, leading to economic development, improved quality of life, and greater prosperity. (3) It was also hoped that the Customs Union would have a favorable impact on the inward flow of foreign direct investments. (4) The elimination of trade barriers in sectors like textiles was expected to allow easier access to EU markets for these products and lead to rising exports (Tekeli and İlkin, pp. 298-309).

Beyond these political and economic reasons, Turkey chose to pursue the policy of joining the Customs Union before full accession to the EU because this was seen as a means to give vigor to the stagnant relations with the EU and was considered to be an important step on the road to EU membership. Just as the main objective of the application for full membership in 1987 was to resuscitate Turkey's moribund relations with the EU by means of shock treatment, so the Customs Union was regarded as a means to attain a more advantageous position for Turkey after the prospect of accession was pushed into the background following the emergence of the countries of Central and Eastern Europe.

2. Concrete Steps toward the Customs Union The Decision to Establish the Customs Union

The Council of Association that met on 9 November 1992 led to a number of important developments. The decisions of the Association Committee adopted on 16 October 1992 were endorsed and adopted by the council, including the decision to start preparations for initiating the technical negotiations leading to a Customs Union. In addition to this, it was also decided to convene the Customs Cooperation Committee and undertake technical work in the areas of free circulation of individuals and services, harmonization of legislation on competition and taxation, relations with the Economic and Social Committee, joining the trans-European networks, and the implementation of the renewed Mediterranean Program.

This was the first time that a framework for cooperation had been drawn up that would be filled in by joint action at the technical level. Turkey's commitments under the Customs Union were also being specifically spelled out for the first time. The Council of Association declared that its decisions would "form a framework for further developing relations" and allow for the "Ankara Agreement to be implemented within a new and dynamic framework" (EC-Turkey Council of Association Decision, 9 November 1992). Turkey attributed great importance to the Customs Union as a means to intensify cooperation between the parties, without giving up the objective of full membership. In fact the Customs Union would be a step in the direction of the ultimate objective. The European proposals for resuming the political dialogue were also welcomed by Turkey.

The Customs Cooperation Committee held its first meeting on 3 December 1992. This body was responsible for taking up the technical questions that arose in connection with trade relations between Turkey and the EC and issues relating to customs. Negotiations at the technical level were also pursued within the Association Committee. The Turkish side submitted a series of proposals at these meetings: for the Customs Union to be introduced in 1995 within the framework of the Ankara Agreement and the Additional Protocol as a step in the direction of full membership, for the Customs Union to include both industrial and agricultural products, for progress to be made on social questions, for harmonization of Turkey's competition and trade policies with the EC's policies, for engaging in financial cooperation and technical assistance, for the elimination of textile quotas, and for the establishment of a permanent organ to deal with the implementation of the Customs Union.

The Steering Committee of the Customs Union was established on 18 March 1993. This committee would consider the proposals coming from the parties and carry on the negotiations for the next two years.

Negotiating the Customs Union

The bulk of the negotiations between Turkey and the EC for the Customs Union took place within the Steering Committee of the Customs Union. Some questions dealing with implementation were taken up within the Customs Cooperation Committee. Among the issues taken up by the Steering Committee were the date on which the Customs Union would come into effect, the arrangements for the free movement of goods, the regime that would apply to processed agricultural products, the regime that would apply to the products within the framework of the European Coal and Steel Community, agricultural products, adjustment to the common customs tariff and to the common commercial policy, harmonization of legislation to allow for the smooth functioning of the Customs Union, the free movement of Turkish workers, the free movement of services, freedom of establishment, and financial and institutional cooperation. There was very little common ground or no agreement at all on the subjects of agricultural products, the free movement of Turkish workers, the free movement of services, the right of establishment, and financial cooperation. The subjects on which agreement had been reached were approved by the Council of Association on 8 November 1993.

Throughout 1994 Turkey continued its efforts toward harmonizing its legislation and reducing tariffs. Meanwhile there were indications from Europe that the EU considered the Customs Union not as a stage toward full membership but as an objective in itself. In February 1994 the vice-president of the European Commission, Sir Leon Brittan, came to Turkey and warned that the protection sought by Ankara for sensitive sectors like the automotive industry would lead the EC to seek similar protection for textiles, thus diluting the effects of the Customs Union. He also declared that it would be a mistake to establish a linkage between the subjects of financial support and the Customs Union.

Maintension minimized and the contraction of the co

The representatives of the Turkish automotive, textile, iron and steel, and electronics industries participated in the negotiations of the Steering Committee in 1994. At the negotiations, Turkey took the position that it would become a part of the EC's Customs Union, while the EC's position was that it was entering into a separate Customs Union with Turkey.

After reaching an agreement that the Customs Union between Turkey and the EC would constitute a new customs union space, the question of how Turkey would carry out its unfulfilled commitments under the Additional Protocol prior to the end of 1995 and subsequently was taken up. A Consultative Machinery was established to discuss harmonization of policy and legislation after 1995. These negotiations resulted in the Council of Association's "Decision on the Customs Union and Its Annexes" (no. 1/95, dated 6 March 1995).

This decision specified the manufactured products that would be covered by the Customs Union and took as a basis, to the extent possible, the provisions of the Ankara Agreement and the Additional Protocol on other subjects. On agricultural products, Turkey was given additional time to move closer to the EC's agricultural policy.

The conviction of nine deputies (members of the TGNA) belonging to the Democracy Party (DEP) in December 1994 raised fears that the Customs Union, already opposed by Greece, would run into difficulties in the European Parliament. The trial of the nine DEP deputies had stirred bitter anti-Turkish sentiments in the European Parliament, and there was a strong movement to block a Customs Union that would bring benefits to Turkey. At the Essen Summit of 9–10 December 1994, it was announced that Southern Cyprus would be among the countries in the next round of enlargement, but Turkey went unmentioned. The displeasure caused by the conviction of the DEP deputies was reflected in the EU's carefully worded statement (Tekeli and İlkin, p. 386).

On 15–18 December 1994 some political groups in the European Parliament adopted a resolution in which it was stressed that Turkey continued to display shortcomings in the areas of human rights and democracy and that under these circumstances the Joint Parliamentary Committee would not meet until the necessary conditions had been fulfilled. The resolution also called for the immediate suspension of the contemplated Customs Union with Turkey and wanted the decision relating to the Customs Union submitted to the parliament for approval (Tekeli and İlkin, pp. 368–70).

In the shadow of these developments, the Council of Association, meeting on 19 December 1994, decided to postpone a decision on the Customs Union until its meeting scheduled for 6 March 1995. As a matter of fact, the text of the decision had not yet been drafted, and a postponement had become inevitable.

Policies to Overcome the Obstacles

The EU wanted to see solid progress in the areas of human rights, democratization, and Cyprus before agreeing to the Customs Union. The Turkish government of the time appeared to be committed to take the necessary steps.

In this framework, Turkey took certain measures in the period proceeding March 1995 to overcome the European objections to the Customs Union. Among these, the provisions of the Law for Combating Terrorism relating to freedom of thought and expression were changed, civil servants were given the right to form unions, and a package of constitutional amendments designed to secure more democracy was introduced. Only some of these measures would be put into practice, however.

Greece was systematically opposing Turkey's efforts to establish a Customs Union. To soften its stand, Athens demanded that Cyprus (the southern part administered by the Greek Cypriots) be admitted to the EU in the first round of enlargement. This, Greek demand was met in principle at the Essen Summit of 9–10 December 1994, but no clarification was made as to how this could be achieved without first resolving the political question that had led to the de facto division of the island into two separate political entities.

On 3 February 1995 Turkish foreign minister Murat Karayalçın sent a letter to Alain Juppé, the foreign minister of France, which was holding the presidency of the EU at the time. In this letter Karayalçın informed his French counterpart that Turkey would be pleased if the decision to set up a Customs Union would be adopted at the next Council of Association on 6 March 1995, but added that, "if the EU establishes a date and a timetable for accession negotiations with Southern Cyprus and makes an announcement to this effect, it will be inevitable for my government to take steps toward integration between Turkey and Northern Cyprus" (Tekeli and İlkin, p. 403). In addition, Minister Karayalçın reiterated Turkey's position on the issue when he delivered a similar message to his EU colleagues on 6 March 1995 at the meeting of the Turkey-EC Council of Association, when decision 1/95 setting up the Customs Union was adopted.

The Adoption of the Decision on the Customs Union

At the meeting of the Turkey-EC Council of Association held on 6 March 1995, Council Decision 1/95 was adopted. It laid down procedural and substantive provisions for the establishment of a Customs Union between the EC and Turkey as of the end of 1995 and for the Customs Union's smooth functioning in the future. We shall now examine the content of the decision and its annex as well as the declaration regarding the furnishing of financial aid to Turkey.

The Council of Association also decided that the decision on the Customs Union would be reviewed at the next Council of Association meeting, scheduled for on 30 October 1995. The review would consider whether the harmonization work in connection with the Customs Union had been carried out and whether the Customs Union should come into effect on 1 January 1996 as agreed or be postponed for six months.

A joint statement in the decision also declared that the parties would continue to be bound by their commitments under the Additional Protocol if decision 1/95 of the Council of Association was postponed. This was done in order to preclude the possibility of Turkey acting unilaterally in the event of a postponement (after carrying out the necessary preparations) by announcing the coming into effect of the Customs Union in line with the Additional Protocol and thereby claiming all the rights derived from it, including the free movement of workers.

In the period following the adoption of decision 1/95 of the Council of Association, Turkey intensified its harmonization efforts and secured the passage of the necessary legislation to a certain degree. At the Council of Association meeting of 30 October 1995, it was agreed that Turkey had met the required technical conditions to ensure the smooth functioning of the Customs Union.

The Consideration of the Decision by the European Parliament

The Customs Union had been prepared and completed in compliance with the rules and procedures of the Association Agreement of 1963 and the Additional Protocol of 1973. Both of these documents had come into effect after the completion of all legal formalities, including ratification by the parliaments of member countries. Consequently, it could be argued that any contrary action by the European Parliament would be without legal effect.

When the EU submitted the decision to it, however, the European Parliament put the decision to a vote to give its assent. The decision was submitted to the Parliament's External Relations Committee. The committee prepared a report dated 22 November 1995, which reflected a positive view on establishing a Customs Union with Turkey. The plenary took up the issue on 13 December 1995, when the decision was adopted by 344 votes, with 149 against and 36 abstentions (European Parliament Session Documents A 4-0322/95 C 1-17 Legislative Resolution on the Proposal for a Council Decision, Official Journal of the European Communities, 22 January 1995, pp. 45-46).

At the same meeting, the European Parliament adopted a resolution on human rights in Turkey by a large majority. Paragraph 3 of the resolution stated that the European Parliament "appeals to the Turkish Government, the PKK, and other Kurdish organizations to do all in their power to find a nonviolent and political solution to the Kurdish issue, calls upon the PKK to refrain from violence, and calls upon the Turkish Government and Grand National Assembly to lift the curfew operating in the southeastern region and to consider ways and means of allowing citizens of Kurdish origin to express their cultural identity while ensuring that the territorial unity of Turkey is guaranteed and respected" (European Parliament Resolution on the Human Rights Situation in Turkey, 13 December 1995). The resolution also stipulated what Turkey must do in the areas of human rights, torture, and ill-treatment of prisoners and called upon Turkey to comply with UN Security Council resolutions to end the division of Cyprus. Finally, the committee was asked to submit a report to the plenary at least once a year on developments in Turkey in the areas of democratization and human rights.

Ankara was so elated with the approval of the Customs Union decision that it pushed into the background the massive and comprehensive rebuke in the European Parliament's resolution. It became obvious, however, that the parliament was as formidable an obstacle as Greece on Turkey's path toward full membership in the EU.

In summary, the EU regarded the Customs Union as an important stage in the association relationship with Turkey and not as a step leading automatically to full membership. In contrast, Turkey regarded the Customs Union covering manufactured products as a vehicle for achieving full membership.

3. The Customs Union: Its Substance and an Analysis The Substance of the Customs Union

As had been prescribed in the Ankara Agreement, the Customs Union provided for the elimination of all customs duties, quantitative restrictions, and other measures having similar effects on manufactured goods. Turkey would gradually adjust its tariffs to the European Community's Common Customs Tariff and harmonize its legislation and its policies relating to customs and foreign trade with those of the EC to ensure the smooth functioning of the Customs Union. Turkey was also committed, under article 43 of the Additional Protocol, to adjust itself to the legal practices of the EC in the area of competition. This was interpreted in a comprehensive manner to include all the rules of competition and all situations that limited competition. It was clear that harmonization of legislation covered a very extensive area.

Article 48 of the Additional Protocol contained this provision: "The Council of Association may make recommendations to the contracting parties to harmonize their laws, regulations, and rules if they directly affect the functioning of the association even if they do not come within the compass of the protocol or if the Ankara Agreement has not established a procedure for dealing with cases encompassed by the Protocol." Thus provision had been made for harmonization on the basis of decisions by the Council of Association. Decision 1/95 of the Council of Association gave Turkey five years, starting in 1996, to make the necessary adjustments.

The Turkey-EC Council of Association adopted decisions on three issues at its meeting of 6 March 1995. The document relating to the first issue consisted of sixty-four paragraphs and ten annexes and dealt with free movement of goods and the technical aspects of the implementation of the Customs Union. These included the elimination of customs duties and duties having similar effects, quantitative restrictions and restrictions having similar effects, Turkey's adjustment to the EC's Common Customs Tariff, adjustment to the EC's technical norms and standards, adjustments made to state aids in order to conform to EC rules, elimination of state monopolies, elimination of discrimination in taxation and harmonization, elimination of discrimination in public procurement and making the bids accessible to both parties, adjustment to the EC's preferential trade agreements, and adjustments to Turkey's legislation on competition, intellectual property, patents, and so forth.

The second document dealt with the decision in principle to extend relations to fields beyond the Customs Union for industrial products foreseen in the Ankara Agreement. These fields of cooperation included culture, industry, technology, scientific research, the environment, statistics, information, telecommunications, transport, justice, and administration. Furthermore, the ongoing negotiations on preferential trade in iron and steel products and agricultural products would be completed, the harmonization efforts in the area of agricultural policies and legislation would be supported, the social condition of Turkish workers would be improved, cooperation would be enhanced in the area of macroeconomic policies, and the political dialogue would be restructured.

The third document was the Community Declaration dealing with the framework of the financial assistance that would be furnished to Turkey to meet the requirements of the Turkish economy as it adjusted to the changes brought about by the Customs Union and to reduce the gap in the level of development of the two sides. This was in the nature of a unilateral declaration of intent to compensate for Turkey's losses arising from the Customs Union and provided for giving Turkey loans totaling 2.525 billion ECUs from the EC budget.

Analysis of the Decision on the Customs Union

The Customs Union was based on the Ankara Agreement. The decision made reference to the Ankara Agreement, and especially to article 28, which provides Turkey with the prospect of full membership. The decision was made in order to elaborate once again the time-table, the principles, and the procedures for Turkey to carry out those commitments under the Additional Protocol to attain the objective of establishing a Customs Union, which Turkey had not yet been able to carry out.

Actually, Turkey had postponed from 1976 to 1988 the measures that it had committed itself to carry out in order to implement the Customs Union. Although Turkey had successfully carried out the reductions in tariffs and non-tariff barriers following the meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee held after the application for EC membership, it had done practically nothing to adjust its policies and its legislation. It had therefore become necessary for Ankara to get together with the EC to determine the calendar, the substance, and the procedure for carrying out the measures that were still awaiting implementation (Arat 1995 ["Türkiye ile Avrupa Topluluğu Arasında Gümrük Birliği ve Hukuki Uyum"], p. 238).

The first part of decision 1/95 of the Council of Association was devoted to how Turkey was going to carry out its overdue commitments with regard to harmonizing its legislation. This part of the decision contained the specific changes that had to be carried out in Turkish legislation to harmonize it with the current EC legislation and a timetable for effecting these changes.

The second part of the decision was devoted to how legislation changes would be carried out after 1995 in the European Community and in Turkey. In this context, it stated that the harmonization of legislation would be carried out "to the extent possible." It also specified that this was to be carried out by adopting parallel legislation (Arat 1996, pp. 104–5).

The coming into effect of the Customs Union signaled the beginning of the final phase of the relationship of association between the parties (articles 4 and 5 of the Ankara Agreement). In this phase the free movement of people, services, and capital was to be achieved, in addition to the free movement of goods. Harmonization with the Common Agricultural Policy was to be attained, and relations would also be tightened in other areas in preparation for full membership, which was the ultimate objective of the association.

The decision on the Customs Union did not include the subject of financial cooperation, which was taken up separately as a unilateral commitment of the EC. At the meeting of the Council of Association held on 6 March 1995, the EC side issued a declaration dealing specifically with financial cooperation. This denoted that the EC was committing itself to providing a certain amount of support for Turkey's efforts to adjust to the Customs Union and in particular to help its industries adapt to the new environment of competition that would result from the free movement of industrial products. This commitment was founded on the principle of solidarity that was at the basis of the association. The EC would decide how the commitment would be carried out within its established procedures. The declaration stated that financial cooperation with Turkey would begin before the Customs Union went into effect and that detailed arrangements about its implementation would be made in the first half of 1995. It was thought that this procedure might help overcome the opposition of certain members (notably Greece) to providing financial assistance to Turkey (Arat 1996, p. 101).

III. RELATIONS WITH THE EU IN THE AFTERMATH OF THE CUSTOMS UNION

Turkey's relations with the EU during the second half of the 1990s, and especially after 1997, were seriously affected by the EU's enlargement toward the East. Turkey made strenuous efforts not to be left out of this process. In the first half of the 1990s Turkey acted on the assumption that the Customs Union was the best course toward preparing itself for full membership. In view of the developments in the second half of the decade, however, Ankara had to focus on the objective of full membership. We shall now examine the reasons for this change of strategy in the light of developments in the second half of the 1990s.

A. Difficulties in Turkish-EU Relations Despite the Customs Union

With the coming into effect of the Customs Union on 1 January 1996, Turkey's relations with the EU entered a new phase. Turkey had proceeded on the assumption that this important step toward fuller economic integration would make relations rapidly evolve in the direction of full membership. The EU saw the Customs Union as a tool for expanding and diversifying trade with Turkey. It supported the Customs Union because it provided the opportunity for EU firms to establish partnerships with Turkish firms in order to undertake joint projects in places like the Commonwealth of Independent States. The EU was also glad to give the impression that it was contributing to the preservation of Turkey's European orientation.

Turkey felt that it could shoulder without much difficulty the burdens that full membership would bring, because it had been fairly successful in meeting the financial burden imposed by the Customs Union and achieving the harmonization of legislation. Turkey felt that it enjoyed a distinct advantage through being the sole country to achieve a Customs Union without being a full member and expected to reap solid benefits once the process of enlargement began.

Although the unilateral declaration made by the EU on 6 March 1995 at the Council of Association to provide financial assistance to Turkey had not been implemented because of Greece's obstruction, this was not considered to be a serious difficulty. There was no question of linking the Customs Union to the EU's financial assistance. The purpose of financial assistance was for the more developed party within a system of economic integration to provide support to the other party in a spirit of solidarity and mutual assistance. Even if the undertaking was based on a unilateral declaration, the failure of the EU to carry it out was an important sign indicating that the spirit of solidarity and the political will were missing among EU members. Furthermore, the resolution adopted at the meeting of 6 March to develop institutional cooperation and integration remained unimplemented by the EU during this period. The EU took none of the measures designed to facilitate and develop integration after the Customs Union began to apply to manufactured products.

Turkey's expectations were not realized for four basic reasons, three of them external and one internal.

The first external reason was the opposition and obstruction by Greece, which consistently pursued policies designed to thwart Turkey in its efforts to develop its links with the EC from the day it became a full member of the EC in 1981. The Kardak crisis (which broke out early in 1996) led to a serious deterioration of Turkish-Greek relations, which, in turn, intensified Greece's anti-Turkish activities within the EU. On the initiative of Greece, the EU's Council of Ministers adopted a decision on 24 July 1996, placing the responsibility for the Kardak crisis on Turkey and calling for the submission of the question to the International Court of Justice in the Hague. Based on this decision, Greece started resorting to the veto to stop all relations between the EU and Turkey.

The second external reason was the position adopted by the European Parliament. Using the violations of human rights in Turkey and the country's shortcomings in the democratization process as pretexts, the EP considered that it had a duty to keep Turkey under constant scrutiny. Because Turkey displayed great eagerness to join the EU, no matter what the conditions, the EP carried out its scrutiny in the most offensive and provocative manner. The EP found Turkey to be at fault in all instances. It even attempted to negate the Customs Union in some of its actions and used the EU's financial aid as a tool to bend Turkey's political will. It frequently went further and blocked the aid altogether.

Third, the EU's agenda during this period was focused on deepening itself and on institutional reform, which would lead to its enlargement. The EU directed its attention toward carrying out the changes that had become necessary in the founding treaties. The increased membership also required revisions in the institutional machinery, in the decision-making procedures, and in the structures dealing with financial cooperation. There were also the countries that had been engaged in accession talks and had to be groomed for membership. In these circumstances, the EU had little time to spare for Turkey, which had been included in the enlargement process at Ankara's insistence and with which accession talks had not yet begun. Whenever the question of Europe's frontiers or Turkey's identity came up, its marginal situation always received exaggerated attention. The Mediterranean island of Cyprus, however, which had nothing to do with Europe geographically, was readily given a European label.

The internal reason was quite simple. Turkish public opinion, academia, the media, and the political parties always looked upon European integration as a secondary issue. There appeared to be no firm political will to integrate Turkey with Europe among these circles.

For these reasons, Turkish interest in both the Customs Union and the European Union began to wane. Nothing other than the initiation of accession talks would change this picture.

B. Turkish-EU Relations on the Eve of the Luxembourg Summit: Agenda 2000

In 1997 Turkish-EU relations reached an important threshold. It was expected that the Luxembourg Summit at the end of 1997 would draw up the EU's enlargement strategy, decide which countries were to be designated as candidates for accession, and establish a time-table and a procedure for their accession. Turkey noted that its efforts prior to the summit to secure eventual membership were having little effect in the capitals of the EU. There were increasing signs that Turkey was not included in the EU's plans for enlargement toward the East.

Objections to Turkey's Candidacy

Turkey found itself confronted with a situation it had not anticipated at a time when it cherished the hope of being included in the EU's enlargement strategy. Ankara not only was disappointed by the unanimous opposition of EU members to Turkey's full membership but also discovered for the first time in its relations with the EU that cultural differences were being openly underlined.

At the meeting of the prime ministers of Turkey, Germany, Italy, France, Britain, and Spain held in Rome on 29 January 1997, Prime Minister Çiller stressed that the time had come for Turkey's full membership, now that the Customs Union had come into effect. She called for an early confirmation of Turkey's status as a candidate and a date for its full membership. The EU side, led by Germany, turned down this request. The prime ministers pointed to the difficulties facing the EU during the enlargement process and insisted on pursuing relations with Turkey on the basis of the enhanced Customs Union. They also stressed the need for Turkey to take concrete steps in complying with the Copenhagen Criteria in its quest for full membership and declared that under these circumstances Turkish pressure for membership would be premature and have a negative impact on relations with the EU (Birand, pp. 496–97).

The first concrete objection to Turkey's candidacy based on "cultural difference, identity, and sense of belonging" came on 4 March 1997 at the summit of the Christian Democratic parties of Germany, Belgium, Luxembourg, Spain, Italy, and France. At the end of this meeting held in Brussels, prime minister Wilfried Martens of Belgium made a statement to the effect that Turkey had no place in the European Civilization Project that was underway. This statement drew sharp reactions from Turkey and also from liberal and secular quarters in Europe. It allowed Turkey to note once again how it was perceived in certain segments of European society, while it brought Turkey the support of those segments that did not share this perception. But even the Europeans that sided with Turkey on the issue of cultural differences had a number of preconditions for Turkey's candidacy, starting with compliance with the Copenhagen Criteria. It became clear to Ankara that Turkey would not be able to count on firm European support for some time to come. It was necessary for Turkey to carry out a transformation and reforms that would allow it to acquire the identity of a European society of the twenty-first century. This would be a difficult task to achieve in the short term, especially with respect to the change of mentality that the reforms would require. Moreover, the political and social will to carry out the changes was simply not there.

The Signing of the Amsterdam Treaty

The Amsterdam Summit was held on 16–17 June 1997. The changes in the founding treaty proposed by the Intergovernmental Conference were approved at the summit (Box 7-20). In this framework, the fields of responsibility pertaining to the EU were deepened and certain changes were introduced in the institutional structure. There was also a consolidation of the amendments made in the founding treaties at different times.

Agenda 2000 and Turkey

The European Commission issued its report Agenda 2000 on 16 July 1997. The report contained the commission's proposals in connection with the preaccession strategy. This eagerly awaited report was to create great disappointment in Ankara. The report foresaw the accession of the

Box 7-20. The Amsterdam Treaty

The changes to the founding treaties proposed by the Intergovernmental Conference were approved by the Amsterdam Summit held on 16–17 June 1997. Although these changes were originally supposed to prepare the European Union for the new century and the process of enlargement, the results obtained were quite modest. In this framework, some increases were made in the EU's areas of competence, while some minor changes were made in its institutional structure. In addition, the changes made over the years in the founding treatles were reordered and consolidated.

Compared to the Maastricht Treaty, however, the reforms carried out were guite meager. Given the new wave of enlargement that was approaching, the necessary changes in the institutional structure were not completely carried out, nor were the required reforms in the decision-making procedures completed.

The main accomplishments of the Amsterdam Treaty were the reaffirmation of the common values of the member states—liberty, democracy, human rights, respect for fundamental freedoms, and the rule of law-as the founding principles of the EU and their incorporation in the treaty. Enhanced cooperation and the principle of flexibility were added to the founding treaties. Cooperation in some aspects of justice and home affairs was incorporated in the European Community Treaty. The Amsterdam Treaty's other accomplishments included the Schengen Protocol (aimed at incorporating the Schengen Agreements on border controls and visa regimes signed between some of the EU member states outside the EU framework into the European Union legal structure); some measures in the field of employment, and the efforts to en hance the effectiveness of the Common Foreign and Security Policy.

(S. BAYKAL)

countries of Central and Eastern Europe and Southern Cyprus (referred to as the Republic of Cyprus in the report) in two waves during the early years of the new century. Six of these countries were considered to have a higher capacity for meeting the Copenhagen Criteria and were slated for accession in the first wave: Poland, Hungary, the Czech Republic, Slovenia, Estonia, and Southern Cyprus. Those that were found to be lagging would join in the second wave: Slovakia, Latvia, Lithuania, Bulgaria, and Romania. Turkey was not included even in the second group.

Turkey was dealt with under a separate heading. It was noted that the Customs Union was functioning well and constituted a solid basis for the development of relations between the parties. But the current political situation did not allow the financial cooperation and political dialogue to proceed as foreseen in the 6 March 1995 documents. The implementation of the Customs Union had demonstrated that Turkey was up to conforming to the EU's acquis in this field. But the country still faced serious macroeconomic instability. In addition, Turkey had unresolved problems in the fields of human rights, democratization, and the questions affecting the southeastern region. After setting this general framework, the report confirmed once again that Turkey was eligible for full membership in the EU but made no mention of a specific time frame. Turkey had been effectively excluded from Agenda 2000, the EU's most important document on enlargement.

While some quarters in Turkey had hoped that the Customs Union would confer an advantage on Turkey and place it ahead of the other candidates for accession, the EU's appraisal was quite different. As far as the EU was concerned, there had been no substantial change in the situation since the commission submitted its opinion after Turkey made its application for membership in 1987. Turkey was suitable for membership but had serious shortcomings in the fields of democracy and human rights and had not been able to overcome its macroeconomic imbalances. Relations with Turkey should be developed in the political, economic, social, and cultural fields; new areas of cooperation should be sought; and priority should be given to issues like the Customs Union. Turkey was not ready for full membership in the EU, however, at least not in the short and medium terms.

The report constituted a great letdown for Ankara. Turkey made urgent contacts with EU members and the European Commission to secure the inclusion of some of its expectations in the report prior to the Luxembourg Summit, where the report was due for finalization and approval. Among these expectations was a declaration that Turkey was included in the EU's enlargement process. Ankara wanted its candidacy to be supported with an appropriate preaccession strategy and also sought to participate in the European Conference foreseen in Agenda 2000 on a footing of equality with the other candidates (Birand, pp. 502–4).

C. The Luxembourg Summit

The most important issues taken up at the Luxemburg Summit of 12–13 December 1997 were Agenda 2000 and strategic decisions regarding the enlargement process.

The paragraphs of the Presidency Conclusions (i.e., the Final Declaration of the Summit) directly concerning Turkey read as follows:

The Council confirms Turkey's eligibility for accession to the European Union. Turkey will be judged according to the same criteria as the other applicant States. While the political and economic conditions allowing accession negotiations to be envisaged are not yet satisfied, the European Council considers that it is nevertheless important for a strategy to be drawn up to prepare Turkey for accession by bringing it closer to the European Union in every field. This strategy should consist in development of the possibilities afforded by the Ankara Agreement, intensification of the Customs Union, implementation of financial cooperation, approximation of laws and adoption of the Union acquis, and participation, to be decided case by case, in certain programs and in certain agencies... In addition, participation in the European Conference will enable the Member States and Turkey to step up their dialogue and cooperation in areas of common interest.

In paragraph 35 of the Summit's Presidency Conclusions, Turkey's EU membership was made conditional on progress in four areas in the political field:

(1) the pursuit of political and economic reforms on which [Turkey] has embarked, including the alignment of its human rights standards and practices with those applying in Europe; (2) respect for and protection of minorities; (3) establishment of satisfactory and stable relations between Greece and Turkey, the settlement of disputes, in particular by legal process, including the International Court of Justice; and (4) support for the negotiations under the aegis of the United Nations on a political settlement in Cyprus on the basis of the relevant UN Security Council Resolutions.

The declaration also contained a passage on a European Conference to which all European states that aspired to join the EU and share the values and internal and external goals of the EU would be invited if they met certain conditions. Some of these conditions were of a nature that caused concern in Ankara:

The members of the Conference must share a common commitment to peace, security and good neighborliness, respect for other countries' sovereignty, the principles upon which the European Union is founded, the integrity and inviolability of external borders and the principles of international law, and a commitment to the settlement of territorial disputes by peaceful means, in particular through the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice in the Hague.

Finally, the document declared that the invitation was addressed in the first instance to Cyprus, the candidate states of Central and Eastern Europe, and Turkey. Turkey had been specifically included among the invitees.

The Presidency Conclusions of the Summit were in conflict with the policies that Turkey had been pursuing over a long period of time and singled out domestic and external issues of vital importance to Turkey. In response, Ankara announced that it was suspending its political dialogue with the EU. Although the government's statement issued on 14 December deplored the EU's biased and discriminatory approach to Turkey, it also stressed that Turkey would persevere in its goal of full membership and that existing relations with the EU would be maintained. The statement emphasized that development of relations would depend on the EU carrying out its commitments and that political matters not within the frame of relations with Brussels would not be discussed until the EU changed its present mentality and approach.

Subsequent official statements also announced that the political dialogue with the EU would not include matters that prevented the smooth development of relations, such as the question of Cyprus, Turkish-Greek relations, and human rights. In this framework, it was announced that Turkey would not take part in the European Conference, which was scheduled to hold its first meeting in London on 12 March 1998. Turkey would implement the Customs Union on the basis of the existing association agreements. Furthermore, Turkey would await the proposals referred to in the Luxembourg Summit's Presidency Conclusions regarding the intensification of the Customs Union and the full utilization of the possibilities afforded by the Ankara Agreement. This meant that the ball was in the EU's court: it was up to the EU to take the necessary steps to break the stalemate in relations.

To understand the profound disappointment felt in Turkey over the Luxembourg Summit decisions and the difficulty of the European side in grasping the reasons for Ankara's strong reaction, we must recall the misunderstandings that took place between the two sides throughout the 1990s and their differing purposes and expectations. Whereas Turkey's sole objective was full membership, the EU tended to see Turkey as an important regional actor with which it was necessary to conduct relations based on economic and political cooperation but nothing more binding at this stage.

Turkey had been in partnership with the EC for over thirty-five years and had been relentlessly pursuing the aim of being integrated within the Western European system. It was tired of being the butt of criticism over a number of economic and political questions. Now it had been left behind by the countries of Central and Eastern Europe that had been in the Eastern Bloc until recently and that had limited experience with Western European liberal democracy and with the market economy.

Notwithstanding Ankara's efforts and protests, the Luxembourg Summit in December 1997 formally announced the candidates for accession and excluded Turkey, demonstrating once again that enlargement was primarily a politically oriented affair. Europe's priority was to integrate within the EU the countries of Central and Eastern Europe with which it shared the same cultural identity and values. Europe felt that these countries had been artificially kept out of the European mainstream during the Cold War and that it had a responsibility to correct this injustice. In contrast, it saw Turkey as a huge country with huge problems that would constitute a threat to the economic and political union if admitted into the EU. The EU had no stomach to mitigate this threat through joint efforts and mutual sacrifice. Turkey was expected to make all the effort to be accepted as a candidate, with the EU doing very little by way of support or assistance.

D. Developments after the Luxembourg Summit

Relations became strained following the Luxembourg Summit. While Turkey refused to discuss political matters in EU platforms, it was also careful not to allow the strains to escalate to a level that would lead to a complete rupture or to a review of the Customs Union. During this period the EU began to pay heed to Turkey's sensitivities and made an effort to overcome the existing difficulties.

In line with the instructions of the Luxembourg Summit, the European Commission issued the report "A European Strategy for Turkey" on 4 March 1998. The document made it clear that Turkey would join the enlargement process of the EU with the implementation of the strategy. It stressed that this implementation depended on the EU to carry out its commitments to furnish financial assistance to Turkey and recommended that the EU's Council of Ministers make the necessary arrangements.

The EU's financial assistance had been blocked by various means for years, and it was important for Ankara to secure the implementation of this aspect of cooperation. Being aware of this, the commission was seeking to soothe Turkey. At the Cardiff and Vienna Summits of 1998, further steps were taken to appease Turkey.

The Cardiff and Vienna Summits

At the Cardiff Summit held on 15 and 16 June 1998, the Conclusions of the Luxembourg Summit were recalled and the need to comply with the Copenhagen Criteria to qualify for membership was reaffirmed. The Cardiff Summit's approach to Turkey within the context of enlargement was relatively more positive. Instead of noting Turkey's eligibility, it described Turkey as a candidate, even if this was done indirectly. Turkey was being included in the mechanism designed to examine the stage at which candidates were on the road to membership. The summit instructed the commission to include a section on Turkey in its annual report on the progress achieved by candidates. The report on Turkey would be based on article 28 of the Ankara Agreement (which alluded to Turkey's eventual full membership) as well as on the Conclusions of the Luxembourg Summit. The summit also approved the European Strategy submitted to Turkey to prepare it for full membership and suggested that this strategy should be developed with proposals coming from Turkey. Finally, the European Council was called upon to find a solution to the problem of providing financial support to Turkey. All of this was meant to lessen Turkey's grievances.

But the Cardiff Summit Presidency Conclusions failed to appease Turkey. Ankara announced that the discriminatory attitude of the EU was still there and that, despite the improvements, Turkey was still being treated differently from the other candidates in the process of enlargement. Ankara declared that as long as the four political conditions for Turkey's candidacy put forward at the Luxembourg Summit continued to apply, the official statement of the Turkish government dated 14 December 1997 was still applicable.

The enlargement process was also on the agenda of the Vienna Summit on 11–12 December 1998. The Presidency Conclusions stressed that the European Strategy for preparing Turkey for full membership must be further developed and relations tightened. This was a reaffirmation of the status quo

The European Commission's Progress Report for 1998

The European Commission issued its first report on the progress achieved by the eleven candidates on the road to EU membership on 4 November 1998. It showed that Turkey was being treated differently from the eleven countries whose candidacy had been confirmed.

The report appraised Turkey's situation in the light of the Copenhagen Criteria. Under the heading "Political Criteria" the appraisal included democracy and the rule of law, human rights and the protection of minorities, and the question of Cyprus. It alleged that the functioning of public authority presented certain anomalies, that human rights continued to be infringed upon, that there were important shortcomings in the treatment of minorities, that the lack of civilian control over the military was disturbing, that this was reflected in the way in which the National Security Council dominated Turkish political life, and that it was essential to find a political and nonmilitary solution, because most of the current violations of civil and political rights could be traced to this situation. Turkey was also called upon to make a constructive contribution to the peaceful settlement of all its differences with various neighboring countries in accordance with international law.

With respect to the economic criteria, the report noted that Turkey possessed most of the basic features of a market economy, a well-developed institutional and legal framework, a dynamic private sector, and liberal trade rules. Turkey also had been successful in adapting itself to the Customs Union. The report added, however, that Turkey was in urgent need of a rigorous macroeconomic stability program and a plan to eliminate regional disparities in economic development.

The report noted that Turkey had not encountered much difficulty in conforming to the EU's acquis with respect to the Customs Union, which was operating in a satisfactory way. But it also noted that legislation had to be changed in many areas and that the revised legislation had to be properly implemented.

The Cologne Summit

The Social Democrat—Green coalition that came to power in Germany in 1998 was more favorably disposed toward Turkish-EU relations than the outgoing Christian Democratic government had been. In view of Germany's former opposition to Turkey's candidacy, this was an important development.

A draft text was prepared by Germany for the Cologne Summit on 3–4 June 1999 that responded to Turkey's expectations. Although supported by Britain and France, it was rejected as a result of the negative stance adopted by Greece and some other members. Although Greece's opposition continued, the tense relations between Turkey and the EU appeared to be easing.

The European Commission's Progress Report for 1999

The European Commission's second progress report on candidate states prepared in compliance with the directive of the Cardiff Summit was released on 13 October 1999. This report declared that Turkey was ready to become a candidate for membership. It proposed an Accession Partnership Strategy for Turkey similar to the proposal made for other candidates at the Luxembourg Summit.

In the section dealing with political criteria, the report noted that, although the basic features of a democratic system existed in Turkey, the Copenhagen Criteria were still not being fully met. There were shortcomings in the fields of human rights and minorities; torture was still a widespread although not systematic practice; the authorities were persistently restricting freedom of expression; the role of the National Security Council in political life went on as before; and the system of extraordinary tribunals continued, despite some improvements in the area of the independence of the judiciary and some positive developments in the sphere of democratization. The report expressed the hope that the positive trend would not be marred by the possible execution of Abdullah Öcalan.

With respect to the economic criteria, the report declared that, even though it would not be easy, Turkey would be able to cope with the pressures of competition and the market forces within the EU, provided sustainable macroeconomic stability was achieved and progress was made in implementing programs of legal and structural reforms.

With respect to the ability to fulfill the requirements of membership, the report stated that Turkey had registered the greatest progress in the domain of the Customs Union, but greater emphasis needed to be placed on administrative restructuring and training of personnel.

In the light of its report, the commission recommended a preaccession partnership for Turkey to prepare it for membership, similar to the ones that had been recommended for the other candidates at the Luxembourg Summit of 1997. The preaccession partnership would involve the following elements: an intensification of the political dialogue and the possibility of association with the joint positions and activities within the context of the Common Foreign and Security Policy; the combination of all preaccession financial resources under one program to ensure coordination; the possibility of gaining access to all of the programs and agencies of the EU; the establishment of an accession partnership that would be combined with the National Program designed to secure harmonization with the EU's acquis; the establishment of machinery within the framework of the Ankara Agreement to monitor the implementation of the accession partnership; and the launching of the analytical examination of the EU's acquis with a view to harmonizing Turkey's legislation and its implementation with that of the EU.

These developments raised expectations that Turkey would be declared a candidate at the EU Summit due to be held in Helsinki in December 1999. These developments remained at a technical level, however, and needed to be confirmed at a political level. Turkey's political circles and its diplomats redoubled their efforts and awaited the results of the Helsinki Summit.

The Helsinki Summit and the Confirmation of Turkey's Candidacy

At the Helsinki Summit held on 10–11 December 1999, Turkey was unanimously declared a candidate for accession to the EU by the attending heads of state and government. By this decision, Turkey acquired the status of the other candidate states. This meant that Turkey would be included in the preaccession strategy like the other candidates, in accordance with a specific program. Henceforth Turkey would have access to EU programs and institutions and participate in the meetings foreseen for candidates in the preaccession process.

Above all, for the first time, Turkey would be able to take advantage of a financial aid package to support its efforts to achieve membership. In practice, however, the financial aid would depend on factors such as the attitude of Greece and the tendencies of the European Parliament.

The Summit Conclusions provided for the preparation of an Accession Partnership Document. This document would be prepared in the light of the National Program for the assumption of the acquis communautaire and would contain the steps to be followed in preparing for accession, bearing in mind the political and economic criteria for membership. The commission was charged with the task of carrying out the preparations for harmonizing Turkish legislation with the EU's acquis.

The Factors behind the EU's Changing Attitude

After the Luxembourg Summit, the political dialogue between Turkey and the EU was broken. Contacts were gradually resumed in the two years that followed, and Turkey's candidacy was finally confirmed at the Helsinki Summit in the context of the EU's enlargement process. There were six main causes for this development.

- 1. After the international intervention in Kosovo in 1999 and in the light of the security of the energy sources in the Caucasus, the EU began to have a better appreciation of Turkey's strategic importance.
- 2. Turkey's important place in the framework of the European Security and Defense Identity, which the EU was seeking to develop in cooperation with NATO, became more apparent. In particular, Turkey had the power to veto decisions in the NATO Council. Ankara had repeatedly stated that the ESDI could be realized only if Turkey was allowed to participate in the decision-making mechanism of the expanded WEU.

- 3. The U.S. was pressing the EU to include Turkey in the enlargement process. At a time when the EU was getting ready to introduce a new mechanism that would deal with defense and security issues along with NATO, Washington was ready to support the inclusion of Turkey, which had close ties to the U.S.
- 4. There had been changes in the governments of some EU members, notably Germany. In these countries, conservative or right-wing governments that were opposed to Turkish membership on cultural or identity grounds were replaced by Social Democratic governments. The Social Democratic parties felt that it would be against their pluralistic and inclusive ideologies to appear opposed to Turkey on cultural grounds. This frame of mind helped in dispelling some of the prevailing prejudices.
- 5. The Simitis government in Greece was pursuing a conciliatory line toward Turkey. Simitis wanted Greece to join the European Monetary Union and had to meet the necessary criteria. This meant that Athens had to cut down its public spending, especially its very large spending on defense. Simitis was also conscious of the need to pursue a softer line toward Ankara in order to enhance Greece's credibility within the EU as well as with non-EU countries. This led Greece to revise its former policy of automatically vetoing every EU overture toward Turkey. Furthermore, when Ankara had suspended its political dialogue with the EU following the Luxembourg Summit, Athens had lost the means to apply pressure on Turkey through the EU on the issues of the Aegean and Cyprus. Athens was aware that it had to give Ankara the green light on EU candidacy in order to regain this possibility.
- 6. Turkey was doing well economically and politically. The capture of Abdullah Öcalan and his subsequent trial contributed to a significant reduction of the threat posed by separatist terrorism. This in turn paved the way for new initiatives on the path to greater democracy. The economic programs drawn up with the IMF and other international organizations appeared to be leading to more stability and growth. All of this helped in changing the EU's perception of Turkey for the better.

In considering these various factors, the EU came to the conclusion that the cost of excluding Turkey at this stage would be far greater than any possible negative effects that might ensue from granting the status of candidate to Ankara. It would be much easier to influence and transform Turkey to suit the interests of the EU within the process of accession. In these circumstances, the initiative would rest with the EU: as in the case of other candidates, Brussels would be able to determine the conditions and the calendar that would apply when the negotiations for membership were underway. The EU would determine whether any particular condition had been met, and it would be up to the EU organs and the member states to decide whether to grant membership or not. In short, the EU had much room for maneuver and enjoyed a broad freedom of choice. It was the correct choice for Brussels to include Turkey in the enlargement process and to engage it in a dialogue that would promote EU interests. This in no way meant a binding commitment for the EU to follow any particular course.

Lipponen's Letter and Turkey's Inclusion in the Enlargement Process

After a brief period of hesitation, Turkey accepted the Helsinki Summit Presidency Conclusions. Ankara considered this to be a great success and a guarantee that it would lead to full membership in the short or at most medium term. The phraseology on Cyprus and the Aegean in the Helsinki Presidency Conclusions was at first perceived to be setting conditions. This led to doubts among government circles and others, but these doubts were quickly overcome (see "Relations with Greece" below).

The fourth paragraph of the Helsinki Presidency Conclusions also dealt with the question of the Aegean Sea. It declared that candidate states must share the values and objectives of the European Union as set out in the Treaties. In this respect, the European Council stresses the principle of peaceful settlement of disputes in accordance with the United Nations Charter and urges candidate States to make every effort to resolve any outstanding border disputes and other related issues. Failing this they should within a reasonable time bring the dispute to the International Court of Justice. The European Council will review the situation relating to any outstanding disputes, in particular concerning the repercussions on the accession process and in order to promote their settlement through the International Court of Justice, at the latest by the end of 2004. Moreover, the European Council recalls that compliance with the political criteria laid down at the Copenhagen European Council is a prerequisite for the opening of accession negotiations and that compliance with all the Copenhagen criteria is the basis for accession to the Union.

Cyprus was taken up in paragraph 9 (subparagraphs a and b):

(a) The European Council welcomes the launch of the talks aiming at a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus problem on 3 December in New York and expresses its strong support for the UN Secretary-General's efforts to bring the process to a successful conclusion. (b) The European Council underlines that a political settlement will facilitate the accession of Cyprus to the European Union. If no settlement has been reached by the completion of accession negotiations, the Council's decision on accession will be made without the above being a precondition. In this the Council will take account of all relevant factors.

In other words, if Turkey failed to take steps toward reaching a solution, the council would be in a position to decide on accession of Cyprus without waiting for a settlement acceptable to Turkey. This formulation naturally did not mean that Southern Cyprus had to be admitted without regard to the existence of a political settlement.

When this text reached the Turkish government on 10 December 1999, the cabinet had a heated debate about whether these paragraphs were preconditions or concessions. It will be noted that the Helsinki Summit Presidency Conclusions included no references to two of the four political conditions contained in the Luxembourg text: human rights and a nonmilitary solution in the Southeast. But the other two conditions—the Aegean and Cyprus—were still there. Turkey was highly sensitive about these issues, which is why it did not hesitate to convey its misgivings to the EU.

Upon receiving Turkey's lukewarm reaction, Finnish prime minister Paavo Lipponen (Finland was holding the presidency at the time) addressed a letter to Prime Minister Ecevit, explaining how the EU's leadership interpreted these paragraphs. This important letter contained the following passages:

Today the EU has given its relations with Turkey a new direction. I am extremely pleased to formally communicate to you the unanimous decision to grant Turkey the status of candidate state on an equal footing with the other candidate states. When the draft of my letter was considered in the European Council, I said that there were no other criteria in paragraph 12 outside the criteria already established in Copenhagen and there were no objections. I also said that references in paragraph 12 to paragraph 4 and 9 were unrelated to criteria attached to membership and that they only implied political dialogue, and again there were no objections. Accession to the EU will take place on the basis of the existing rules. The date 2004 in paragraph 4 indicates the deadline for settling disputes at the International Court of Justice. As regards Cyprus, the EU seeks a political settlement. As for the accession of Cyprus, the Council will take account of all relevant factors when reaching a decision. In the light of these clarifications, I am inviting you to the working dinner to be held in Helsinki tomorrow together with all candidate countries. (Birand, pp. 535–36)

Furthermore, Xavier Solana (the EU's high representative for common foreign and security policy) and Günther Verheugen (the commissioner responsible for enlargement) came to Ankara on 10 December on French president Jacques Chirac's plane and sought to persuade the government to accept the status of candidate. Following the Lipponen letter and contacts with the representatives of the EU, the cabinet held a meeting and, after long discussions, agreed to accept the status of candidature for accession. The next day, Prime Minister Ecevit flew to Helsinki to attend the working dinner and appear in the "family photo."

In this framework, the phrase "end of 2004" with reference to the Aegean Sea would be understood to mean that the progress made toward a settlement would be reviewed by the European Council by that date, which would not be read as a deadline for submitting the issues to the International Court of Justice. Similarly, the phrase referring to Cyprus would be interpreted to mean that the island's membership would be facilitated by a political settlement but would be decided by the European Council if no settlement was reached. A settlement would not be a precondition for membership, and all relevant factors would be taken into account.

The announcement that Turkey was a candidate on the same basis and according to the same principles as the other twelve candidates meant that the preconditions laid down at the Luxembourg Summit had been dropped.

The debate over whether these paragraphs were explicit enough or whether they set down preconditions or not continued even after the government accepted the status of candidate offered at Helsinki. How these vague paragraphs would be interpreted in the future would depend on the conditions of the day and the political dispositions of the decision-makers.

F. Turkish-EU Relations after Helsinki and the Accession Partnership Document (APD)

The Meeting of the Council of Association on 11 April 2000

After a hiatus lasting three years, the Turkey-EU Council of Association met in Luxembourg on 29 April 2000 and reached important decisions. Eight subcommittees under the Association Committee would start the screening process in connection with the acquis (which was divided into thirty-one separate chapters) and negotiations would begin on the free movement of services, which had been pending since the introduction of the Customs Union.

The Release of the Accession Partnership Document by the Commission

When Turkey acquired the status of a candidate state in December 1999, it became part of the EU's preaccession strategy. In this framework, the European Commission was due to prepare an Accession Partnership Document (APD) for approval by the EU's Council of Ministers and Turkey would prepare a National Program in line with the APD. The APD would constitute the commission's "homework," just as the National Program would be Turkey's. These documents would be prepared in the light of the Copenhagen Criteria. Paragraph 12 of the Helsinki Summit Presidency Conclusions stated that the APD would contain the conditions for Turkey to comply with the EU's acquis in the light of the political and economic criteria and the obligations stemming from membership.

The APD was released on 8 November 2000 but had to be revised somewhat to meet certain objections raised by Turkey and Greece. The revised version was approved by the EU Council of Ministers on 4 December 2000.

The object of the APD was to establish the conditions under which Turkey's membership process would operate, set a time-table, and draw up a framework for monitoring the process and for supporting it with financial and technical assistance. The APD would constitute the first step in the process and, along with the National Program to be prepared by Turkey, would form the legal and technical basis of the preaccession strategy.

The Content and Nature of the APD

From a legal standpoint, the APD was a unilateral declaration made by the EU and was binding on only the EU. Given the nature of the declaration and its content, however, it also had a binding effect on Turkey in a practical if not a legal sense. For the accession process to progress smoothly, the conditions and the time-table set out in the document had to be observed. It would up to the EU institutions to decide whether there was compliance with the conditions and the time-table.

Separate APDs were prepared for each of the countries in the EU's enlargement process. These documents contained the steps that candidate countries had to take if the accession process was to make headway. These steps were based on the Copenhagen Criteria and the acquis.

One of the key elements of the expanded preaccession strategy was the APD that provided that all of the assistance to be furnished to candidates would come under a single program, as decided by the European Council at the Luxembourg Summit of 1997. Although the APD was prepared single-handedly by the EU, the basic principles, priorities, midterm targets, and conditions in the document were established through consultations with Turkey. It was subsequently approved in its final form by the EU's Council of Ministers.

The purpose of the APD was to consolidate in one document the priority areas in the commission's progress report on Turkey for the year 2000, the assistance that would be furnished to Turkey to implement the priority areas, and the conditions that would govern the assistance. The APD also indicated that in 2000 Turkey would submit to the commission its National Program (based on the APD), detailing how Turkey would harmonize its legislation with the EU's legislation.

The APD contained the following chapters: Introduction, Objectives, Principles, Priorities and Medium-Term Objectives, Programming, Conditions, and Monitoring.

The chapter on objectives stated that, although the National Program would not be an integral part of the APD, the priorities of the program would have to conform to those of the APD. Thus, even if the National Program did not have to reflect the APD exactly, its basic substance and time-table would have to correspond in large measure. Otherwise there would be difficulties and delays in the progress of the accession process, in the monitoring, and in the flow of financial and technical assistance.

The chapter on principles indicated that the basic priorities established for each state were related to that state's ability to comply with political, economic, and legal criteria for membership. After the Madrid Summit of 1995, a further condition was set in order to harmonize the implementation of the EU's policies. After accession, candidates would have to harmonize their administrative structures. It was not enough just to include the acquis in the legislation; this legislation would also have to be effectively implemented.

Another point stressed in the chapter on principles was that all thirteen candidates would form part of a single accession strategy and the same criteria would apply to them all. According to the document, the candidates had to share all of the values and goals contained in EU treaties. In this framework, the document referred to territorial disputes and the question of Cyprus, which were the subject of paragraphs 4 and 9(a) of the Helsinki Summit Conclusions. The APD declared that the European Council confirmed that Turkey would benefit from the preaccession strategy in order to encourage and support Turkey's reforms and progress in the direction of meeting the political criteria related to accession, including the expanded political dialogue on the issue of human rights and emphasizing paragraphs 4 and 9(a) of the Helsinki Summit Conclusions. This signified that the EU would provide financial assistance to Turkey to enable it to achieve objectives cited in the APD.

The chapter on Priorities and Medium-Term Objectives elaborated the fields in which the candidates had to undertake preparations. Some were in the short-term category and had to be completed in one year (that is, by the end of 2001). If these were not completed, substantial progress in attaining the objective had to be registered. The chapter also included a list of other objectives that were classified as medium-term. No date was indicated for these objectives, which would take more than a year to complete. It was expected, however, that the preparations would commence (to the extent possible) in 2001.

The APD also described intermediate-stage goals, which would lead to specific objectives determined in cooperation with candidates. Success in this context would determine the level of assistance and the opening of negotiations. In this framework, it was clear that it was necessary to comply with the Copenhagen Criteria before accession negotiations would begin.

The priority areas for Turkey to prepare for membership were specified in the APD. Turkey had to deal with all the points contained in the Progress Report. For negotiations to start, all of the issues raised in the APD had to be addressed. Furthermore, even if they were not included in the APD, the issues raised in Progress Reports also had to be addressed for accession to take place. It was not enough to incorporate the acquis in the national legislation. It was also necessary to implement the legislation effectively in conformity with EU standards.

The short-term priorities fell under the following subheadings in the document: Enhanced Political Dialogue and Political Criteria, Economic Criteria, Internal Market, Taxation, Agriculture, Fishing, Transportation, Statistics, Employment and Social Affairs, Energy, Telecommunications, Regional Policy and Coordination of Structural Instruments, Culture and Audiovisual Policies, Environment, Justice and Home Affairs, Customs, and Reinforcement of Administrative and Judicial Capacity. The medium-term priorities were listed under similar subheadings.

The short-term and medium-term priority political objectives included a number of sweeping reforms that would be difficult to implement: freedom of expression and worship, elimination of all obstacles to the establishment of civil society (including freedom of association), legislative reform, elimination of violations of human rights and torture through legal measures and education, cultural rights, legal reform (including the status of state security courts), training of members of the legal profession in the field of EU legislation, an end to the state of emergency, elimination of regional disparities, the right to publish and broadcast in native languages and to learn them, and the abolition of the death penalty.

In addition, the APD called for the completion of economic reforms among the short-term and mediumterm priorities. These included reining in public spending, implementation of the stability and structural reform programs agreed to with the IMF and the World Bank, financial sector reform and financial oversight, agricultural reforms, privatization, an independent Central Bank, the creation of a sustainable pension and social security system, and improved education and health services.

Furthermore, a comprehensive program of new legislation was foreseen in the APD in line with the reforms that would be carried out over the short and medium terms.

The APD chapter on Programming described the financial assistance that the EU was due to provide for Turkey to carry out the structural adjustments called for in the document.

The assistance was to come from two sources. Starting in 2000, Turkey was to receive an average share of 15% from the bilateral MEDA II funds. It was also due to receive allocations from the funds under the heading European Strategy/Preaccession Strategy, consisting of two regulations. The first regulation, introduced in April 2000, foresaw annual payments of 5 million euros for a period of three years to help in the implementation of measures to reinforce the EU-Turkey Customs Union. The second regulation related to the provision of 45 million euros for a period of three years to support measures that would contribute to Turkey's economic and social development.

The conditions under which EU assistance would be furnished were contained in the chapter on Conditions. "EU assistance to Turkey to finance projects is dependent on Turkey living up to its commitments. Progress must be registered in adopting measures to comply better with the Copenhagen criteria and especially in carrying out in 2001 the specific reforms foreseen in the Accession Partnerships. Noncompliance with these general conditions may lead to the Council deciding to suspend financial assistance." In other words, Turkey's performance and determination to carry out the reforms foreseen for 2001 would constitute a precondition for the assistance.

The chapter on Monitoring contained the procedures for monitoring Turkey's performance in carrying out the reforms and meeting the conditions set in the document. The implementation of the Preaccession Partnership would be monitored within the framework of the Association Agreement. This meant that the Council of Association and its subcommittees would be charged with carrying out the monitoring, which would lead to the evaluation that would constitute the basis for the Commission's Progress Report for 2001 and determine the way in which relations would develop.

The Adoption of the Accession Partnership Document

The text of the APD drafted by the commission was released on 8 November and submitted to the Council of Ministers for adoption. The following phrase was included among the political criteria: "strong support will be given, within the framework of the political dialogue, to the efforts of the Secretary-General of the UN to conclude successfully the search for a comprehensive solution of the question of Cyprus." This meant that Turkey was expected to meet this political criterion by the end of 2001.

Having defended the view throughout the 1990s that no linkage could be established between EU membership and the settlement of the question of Cyprus, Ankara found this approach unacceptable. Furthermore, Greece was pressing hard to include the settlement of the Aegean disputes among the medium-term priorities. The priorities were formulated in general terms as territorial disputes. As a result of these developments, Prime Minister Ecevit announced that this might lead to a review of relations with the EU.

Although unanimity was not required for the approval of the APD by the Council of Ministers, it became necessary to seek a common position among the member states on issues that were of such importance. Furthermore, the Framework Regulation that would regulate the financial and technical assistance that would be provided to implement the APD would have financial implications, which would also require a broad agreement. Therefore, it was necessary to find a compromise that would have Greece's approval while being acceptable to Turkey. The solution was finally found on 4 December 2000 at the Council of Ministers through a formula proposed by France as president of the EU. According to the formula, an addition in the form of Enhanced Political Dialogue and Political Criteria was placed under the heading Priorities and Medium-Term Targets. This would allow the question of Cyprus and territorial disputes to be taken up within the political dialogue, but according to differing priorities.

In line with the French formula, the paragraph relating to Cyprus was revised to read as follows: "In conformity with the Helsinki Summit Presidency Conclusions and as referred to in paragraph 9(a) of the Conclusions within the context of the political dialogue, the UN Secretary General's efforts to find a comprehensive solution to the question of Cyprus will be strongly supported." There was also a paragraph dealing with Aegean questions among the medium-term objectives. "In conformity with the Helsinki Summit Presidency Conclusions, and as referred to in paragraph 4 of the Conclusions and in compliance with the principle of settling disputes peacefully contained in the UN Charter, all efforts will be deployed to resolve outstanding territorial disputes and other questions."

The desire of the parties to see progress in relations and the accession process had made it possible to overcome the difficulties encountered. It was not easy to discern the extent to which the devised phraseology was setting conditions for Turkey.

The best answer to this question was probably contained in the Commission's Progress Report of 2001 on Turkey's accession process. As long as the EU maintained its political will to see Turkey's accession process on track (and harmonization of legislation progressed and the economic and political criteria were in large measure complied with), the continued existence of these questions that were not completely the responsibility of Turkey would not, by itself, prevent the process of accession from going forward.

In this context, the report of Jacques Poos on the state of the accession negotiations with Southern Cyprus adopted by the European Parliament on 5 September 2001 gave an indication of the thinking in EU circles. The report declared that the Greek Administration of Southern Cyprus was the sole representative of the island with international recognition, that it was in full compliance with the Copenhagen and Maastricht Criteria, that Turkey was occupying a part of the island, that the process of accession was a catalyst toward finding a political solution in the island but that a political solution was not a precondition for Southern Cyprus's accession, and that the entire island and all its people would legally become a part of the EU when the negotiations were finalized. The report went on to state that there was no question of negotiating separately with the two communities in Cyprus or admitting two distinct Cypriot states or admitting the northern part of the island after Turkey's accession to the EU. If Turkey went ahead and integrated the northern portion of the island following the accession of the southern portion, this would make it impossible for Turkey to gain membership in the EU.

The Commission's Progress Report for 2000

On 8 November the EU released the APD as well as the Progress Report for the year 2000 ("Regular Report of the Commission on Turkey's Progress towards Accession for 2000"). The report contained the commission's appraisal of Turkey's progress during the year 2000.

In the portion dealing with political criteria, the commission drew attention to the benefits of the debate in Turkey on the need for political reform that had been triggered by its inclusion in the preaccession strategy at the Helsinki Summit. In this context, the signing of some international covenants on human rights and approval by the government of the work of the Human Rights Coordination Council were noted as positive developments. But the report added that progress had slowed compared to the previous year and that Turkey was still not in full compliance with the Copenhagen Criteria. The slow pace of institutional reform, the influence of the army on political life, the problems besetting the judiciary, persistent corruption, the state of human rights, the conditions in prisons, and even the situation of non-Sunni Muslims were singled out as problem areas.

In the area of economic criteria, the report noted that Turkey had made progress in tackling the most serious

Box 7-21. The Nice Treaty

The heads of state and government of the member states of the European Union met in Nice on 8-10 December 2000 and agreed on the draft text of the Nice Treaty that made significant changes in the founding treaties. After going through the ratification procedures of the member states, the treaty went into effect in February 2003. The treaty was designed to meet the requirements of enlargement and provided for changes in EU institutions to allow the EU to function effectively.

The membership of the main structural Institutions (such as the European Parliament, the Council of Ministers, the European Commission, the European Court of Justice, and the Court of Auditors), and of functional institutions like the Economic and Social Committee and the Committee of Regions was rearranged, taking enlargement into account. The "Declaration on the Enlargement of the European Union" that was annexed to the treaty contained the dates on which the revisions of the institutional structure would take effect. It also projected the shape of the institutional structure of the EU up to the year 2010. In this projection, the number of members that the European Parliament, the Council of Ministers, the European Commission, and other bodies would have after the EU membership reached twenty-seven was specified, without making any provisions for Turkish accession. The qualified major ity voting system was altered to give greater weight to the larger member states.

Burkhari ya ya kusa ka kali kata inaliya ya 1966 ya alimba kali

The mechanism of "enhanced cooperation" introduced by the Amsterdam Treaty was also modified. Other changes related to the EU citizens' residence and travel arrangements, elimination of discrimination, fundamental rights, visas, the right to seek refuge and to migrate, the status of the European Central Bank, the common trade policy, social regulations, environmental policy, economic financial and technical cooperation with third countries, the Common Security and Defense Policy, and cooperation among police and judicial authorities in criminal matters

Furthermore, the European institutions signed the European Charter of Fundamental Rights at the Nice Summit and submitted this document for the consideration of EU members. The legal status and binding force of this document are still undefined at present. In a sense, the document is a declaration of intention. It is designed to address the need to have a catalogue of fundamental rights in the European acquis. This is a step in the direction of transforming the founding treaties into a Constitution, which in turn should lead to a political union.

(S. BAYKAL)

imbalances and achieving macroeconomic stability but had not yet completed the process of achieving a functioning market economy. Progress had been made in the privatization of public enterprises and in the fields of agriculture, social security, and the financial sector, but more progress was needed in the fields of public finance, the role of the state in the economy, overcoming social and regional disparities, and increasing the competitiveness of the Turkish workforce and industry.

On the subject of adjustment to the EU's acquis, the report stated that Turkey had demonstrated a high capacity to adjust to the acquis in the area of the Customs Union, but here too there was much work to be done in specific areas. It stressed that new mechanisms were needed in the fields of implementation and execution.

G. The Nice Summit and Turkish-EU Relations

The meeting of the heads of state and government that took place on 7–8 December 2000 was one of the important milestones in the EU's history. The Intergovernmental Conference held after the conclusion of the Amsterdam Treaty in 1997 resulted in the signing of the Nice Treaty at this summit (Box 7-21). The treaty revised the institutional structure of the EU to allow it to function effectively and efficiently, especially following enlargement. The EU was already facing difficulties in its institutional structure and its decision-making process, and there was a danger of total deadlock when the membership went from fifteen to twenty-seven or twenty-eight (if Turkey was included). This induced the member states to make these changes prior to enlargement.

Some of the arrangements within the Nice Treaty forced Turkey to appraise its relations with the EU once again after the Accession Partnership Document.

The annex to the treaty entitled Declaration on the Enlargement of the European Union included a projection for the shape of the institutional structure of the EU up to the year 2010. This projection caused widespread disappointment in Turkey. It contained the number of members that the European Parliament, the Council of Ministers, and the European Commission would have when European membership had been enlarged to twenty-seven, without any provision for Turkish membership. The EU declared that Turkey had not been included because accession negotiations with Turkey had not yet begun, whereas negotiations were going on with the other candidates.

Although the EU stated that it would be incorrect to interpret this to mean that Turkish membership before 2010 was being excluded, the approach did reveal that the EU considered it unlikely that Turkey would become a member before that date. This was not surprising and once again revealed the wide gap between Turkey's expectations and those of the EU.

н. The National Program

On 4 December 2000 the EU's Council of Ministers adopted the APD and the legal basis of this document (the Framework Regulation that contained the aid that would be provided to Turkey under the preaccession strategy and that set up an Accession Partnership between Turkey and the European Union). It was now Turkey's turn to take the necessary steps and submit its National Program to the EU.

"The National Program of Turkey for Adopting the European Union's Acquis" was adopted by the Turkish cabinet on 19 March 2001 and published in the Official Gazette on 24 March 2001. This document reflected the state of Turkish-EU relations on that date.

Legally, this was a unilateral declaration by Turkey. Together with the APD (which foresaw Turkey's adherence to the membership criteria) and the Framework Regulation (which provided the basis for financial aid to Turkey in the process of accession), the National Program was an element of the Preaccession Strategy for Turkey foreseen in the Helsinki Summit.

The National Program committed Turkey to harmonize its legislation to comply with the requirements of EU membership. It revealed how and when Turkey would carry out its structural adjustments. Although the National Program did not have to correspond exactly to the APD, the extent of its correspondence would ensure swift and untroubled progress in the process of accession.

The National Program contained six chapters: Introduction, Political Criteria, Economic Criteria, Ability to Assume the Responsibilities of Membership, Ability to Implement the Acquis, and Financial Appraisal of the Reforms.

The Introduction stressed that membership in the European Union would conform to the guiding philosophy of the Republic and confirm Atatürk's vision. Consequently, membership would be in conformity with the relevant criteria and the basic principles of the Turkish Republic as reflected in its Constitution.

The APD had included the questions of the Aegean and Cyprus under the heading Political Criteria. By placing these items in the Introduction, the National Program indicated that these were not criteria for membership. The program employed the following language in this respect:

Turkey is a country that contributes to the enhancement and reinforcement of peace, security, stability, and prosperity in international relations and will continue to develop its relations with neighboring countries on the basis of a peace-seeking foreign policy; in this context, Turkey will continue to undertake initiatives and efforts toward the settlement of bilateral problems through dialogue with Greece. Turkey will continue to support the efforts of the UN Secretary-General, in the context of his good-offices mission aiming at a mutually acceptable settlement with a view to establishing a new partnership in Cyprus based on the sovereign equality of the two parties and the realities on the Island.

Under the heading Political Criteria, the government undertook to accelerate its efforts in 2001 in the direction of carrying out political, administrative, and judiciary reforms and to submit its bills to this effect to the TGNA as early as possible. In this framework, revisions of the Constitution were foreseen as part of the reforms in the areas of democracy and human rights, accompanied by the required changes in legislation. Among the measures to be taken were the development of rights and freedoms: above all, freedom of opinion and expression, freedom of association and peaceful assembly, strengthening civil society, enhancing the functioning and effectiveness of the judiciary, improvement of the condition of convicts and detainees prior to their trials, speeding up the adoption of measures against torture, effective deterrence of violations of human rights, reductions in regional discrepancies within the country, training of civil servants and other public officials in the field of human rights, and other such legislative and administrative measures to be adopted in both the short and medium terms. The National Program, however, revealed certain differences of approach compared to the APD in the areas of education in one's mother tongue (teaching of native languages), broadcasting/publishing in one's mother tongue, and the abolition of capital punishment (Box 7-22).

Under the heading Economic Criteria, the measures foreseen were in general compliance with the APD. The steps taken and the progress expected in the areas of social security, spreading the tax burden, bringing discipline to the informal economy, the financial sector, the agricultural sector, and privatization were described. The document also noted that the economic program for 1999 had to be revised because of the crisis of February 2001 and that the implementation of the structural reforms was absolutely essential for the success of the new program.

Under the heading Ability to Assume the Responsibilities of Membership were included the objectives that would be attained in the short and medium terms to adjust to the acquis. In this context, the legislative and administrative arrangements that would be carried out in the twenty-eight fields contained in the APD were enumerated. These included legislative harmonization; free movement of goods, people, services, and capital; competition and state aid; common agricultural, fisheries, and

| hort Term APD   | National Program  |
|---|---|
| 1. Freedom of expression  | Full conformity   |
| 2. Freedom of association and of assembly and civil society.                                  | Full conformity   |
| 3. Prevention of torture  | Full conformity (short/medium term)   |
| 4. Improving conditions of detention  | Full conformity (medium term)   |
| 5. Deterrence of violations of human rights and compensation                                  | Full conformity (medium term)   |
| 6. Human rights training for civil servants   | Full conformity   |
| 7. Human rights training for judges and prosecutors   | Full conformity   |
| 8. Continuation of the moratorium on the death penalty  | Full conformity within the competence of the TGNA   |
| 9. Right to broadcast/publish in one's mother tongue  | No conformity   |
| 10. Regional discrepancies and development of the southeast                                   | Full conformity (medium term)   |
| 11. Support for a Cyprus settlement   | Partial conformity (taken up under "Introduction" and not as "PoliticalCriteria." no time scale given and only conditional support)   |
| Viedium Term APD  | National Program  |
| No discrimination based on language, religion, creed, or gender and constitutional safeguards | Full conformity (short/medium term)   |
| 2 Constitutional revisions based on European Convention on Human Rights                       | Full conformity (short/medium term)   |
| 3. Abolition of death penalty.  | Partial conformity (will be considered by the TGNA)   |
| 4. Accession to international conventions   | Full conformity (no term indicated)   |
| 5 Improvement of prison conditions  | Full conformity (short term)  |
| 6. Advisory organ status for National Security Council  | Full conformity (medium term)   |
| .7. Lifting of State of Emergency.  | Full conformity (medium (erm)   |
| 8. Education in one's mother tongue (i.e., teaching of native languages)                      | No conformity   |
| 9. Maintenance of good relations with neighbors   | Partial conformity, settlement of disputes with neighbors again mentioned in the "Introduction" of the National Program, therefore not treated as a political criterion for membership. |
|   | (S. BAYK(Source: Günuğür 2001, p.   |

transport policies; economic and monetary union; social policies and employment; the environment; justice and home affairs; and the common foreign and security policy.

A general appraisal of the administrative capacity required to carry out the adjustments to conform to the acquis was contained in the chapter Ability to Implement the Acquis.

Finally, the resources necessary to carry out the reforms to implement the National Program were described in the chapter Financial Appraisal of the Reforms, which also included the financial assistance expected from the EU.

According to the National Program, Turkey was to amend six articles of its Constitution and revise twenty-three laws. It also had to pass twenty new laws. All of this would be carried out by approximately the end of 2001.

Over the medium term, there would be ten more constitutional amendments, ninety-five laws would be amended, and twenty new laws would be enacted.

Clearly, the National Program responded in large measure to the requirements of the APD. At this stage, issues such as teaching and broadcasting/publishing in native languages, the abolition of capital punishment, the Aegean and Cyprus questions, the manner in which structural adjustments would be carried out to prepare for membership, the meaning of membership, the changes that the EU would undergo, and the place of Turkey in the EU would be the subject of intense debates in the beginning of the twenty-first century and give direction to Turkey's relations with the EU.

SANEM BAYKAL AND TUĞRUL ARAT

Sources (Relations with the EU)

- Arat, Tuğrul, "Avrupa Birliği ile Türkiye Arasındaki İlişkiler." AÜ Hukuk Fakültesi Dergisi 100, no. 44 (1995): 587–606.
- ——. "Gümrük Birliği Çerçevesinde Mevzuat Uyumu Çalışmaları." In Gümrük Birliği Sürecinde Politikalar ve Uygulamalar, pp. 73–92. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1998.
- ——... "Türkiye'de AT Mevzuatına Uyum Çalışmaları." In Avrupa Birliği El Kitabı, pp. 219–46. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1995.
- "Türkiye ile Avrupa Topluluğu Arasında Gümrük Birliği ve Hukuki Uyum." Gümrük Birliği Sürecinde Türkiye 17–18 (May–Aug. 1995): 233–48.
- Avrupa Birliği ve Türkiye. Ankara: T.C. Başbakanlık Dış Ticaret Müsteşarlığı, 1999.
- Avrupa Siyasi Birliği ve Türkiye. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1999.
- Baykal, Sanem. "Katılım Ortaklığı Belgesi: Türkiye-AB İlişkilerinde Yeni Bir Dönemeç." Mülkiyeliler Birliği Dergisi 100/25, no. 226 (2001): 201–24.
- Birand, Mehmet Ali. Türkiye'nin Avrupa Macerası 1959–1999. İstanbul: Doğan Yayıncılık, 2000.
- Eralp, Atila. "Turkey in the Enlargement Process: From Luxembourg to Helsinki." Perceptions 5, no. 2 (2000): 17–32.

- ———. (ed.). Türkiye ve Avrupa. Ankara: İmge, 1997.
- Gümrük Birliği Sürecinde Politikalar ve Uygulamalar. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1998.
- Gümrük Birliğinin Türkiye Ekonomisine Muhtemel Etkileri. No. 1. Ankara: Vakıfbank Araştırma Dizisi, n.d.
- Günuğur, Haluk. "Katılım Ortaklığı Belgesi ile Ulusal Programın Karşılaştırılması." Paper presented at the symposium AB Dönem Başkanlarının Tanıtımı Çerçevesinde Düzenlenen "İsveç Günü" Paneli, ATAUM, 17 May 2001.
- ——. "Ortaklık Antlaşmaları ve 6 Mart 1995 Tarihli Ortaklık Konseyi Kararları İşığında Gümrük Birliği." İn Avrupa Birliği El Kitabı, pp. 281–98. Ankara: TC Merkez Bankası, 1995.
- İkinci Yılında Gümrük Birliği. No. 4. İstanbul: Türkiye Avrupa Birliği Derneği İstanbul Şubesi Yayınları, 1998.
- Kabaalioğlu, Haluk. "The Customs Union: A Final Step before Turkey's Accession to the European Union?" MÜ Avrupa Araştırmaları Dergisi 100/6, no. 1 (1998): 113–40.
- ——. "Turkey and the European Union: Converging or Drifting Apart?" MÜ Avrupa Araştırmaları Dergisi 100/7, nos. 1–2 (1999): 109–66.
- Tekeli, İlhan, and Selim İlkin. Türkiye ve Avrupa Birliği. Ankara: Ümit, 2000.
- Türkiye-Avrupa Topluluğu Gümrük Birliği. İstanbul: Türkiye Avrupa Topluluğu Derneği İstanbul Şubesi, 1996.
- Türkiye-Avrupa Topluluğu Gümrük Birliği 1996 Yılı Uygulama Semineri. İstanbul: Türkiye Avrupa Topluluğu Derneği İstanbul Şubesi, 1997.
- Türkiye ve Avrupa Entegrasyonu. Ankara: DPT, 1995.

Relations with the Caucasus and Central Asia

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Turkey's View of the Caucasus and Central Asia during the Soviet Era

After the conclusion of the Treaty of Friendship and Fraternity between the Soviet government and the TGNA in March 1921 and following the death of Enver Paşa in 1922 in Central Asia while leading the Basmacı Movement against the Russians (see Box 1-14 in Section 1), Turkey relegated the issue of "external Turks" to the background. The 1921 treaty contained the following provision in article 8: "the parties undertake never to allow the formation or the establishment on their territories of organizations or groups that would claim to be the government of the other party or one of the territories of that party." In this way, Turkey agreed not to support the pro-Turanian movements in the Soviet Union, while the Soviets guaranteed that they would not support the efforts to spread communism in Turkey.

This policy continued after the death of Atatürk. Being fully aware of the dangers caused by the Turanian adventure in the latter years of the Ottoman Empire, the leadership of the Turkish Republic steered clear of expressing any public interest on the subject of "external Turks," especially those living in the USSR. The aim was to give the USSR no cause for complaint on the issue. Notwithstanding the existence of a limited number of groups that advocated a jihad against the USSR in order to establish a Turkic Union with the Turks of Central Asia, no Turkish government displayed the slightest interest in the issue. The prevailing anti-Communist stance in Turkey prevented even research on the Turkic peoples living under Communist rule. The USSR, in turn, was well aware of the dangers posed by the Turkic-Muslim communities in its population having contacts with Turkey; thus it did not allow even the Turkish Communist Party to have any contacts with these communities. Similarly, the people of the Caucasus and Central Asia were under the strict control of Moscow and never had a chance to establish any relations with Turkey or the rest of the world. As a consequence, until the last part of the Gorbachev administration, when the Soviet grip on the component republics was loosened, Turkey had hardly any relations with the peoples of the Caucasus and Central Asia.

Turkey's View of the Caucasus and Central Asia after the Cold War

Important developments and reappraisals took place in global politics following the destruction of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and the subsequent dissolution of the USSR in December 1991. Turkey had been undergoing substantial sociopolitical and economic changes throughout the 1980s and was inevitably affected by changes in the global scene. Turkey's policy toward the Caucasus and Central Asia after the end of the Cold War was shaped by the following world context.

- 1. Both the possibilities for cooperation and the risks increased. After the disintegration of the USSR, the emergence of Russia and fifteen new states that abandoned the Communist system and embarked on a course of liberalization meant that the divisions of the Cold War had been overcome and, for the first time in the twentieth century, created opportunities for bringing all the major powers together in cooperation on a global scale. The system for avoiding regional conflicts that had developed during the Cold War was also swept aside, however, along with the old order. There was constant instability as the internal restructuring was being carried out in the newly independent states. This was compounded by tensions between these states. The risks of internal and international wars grew alarmingly in Eurasia.
- 2. Instability began to spread. As the Soviet system collapsed, the international alliances designed to combat it began to be seriously undermined. This led to serious sociopolitical instabilities beyond the territories of the former USSR.
  - 3. Systems were changing, models were being debated, and regional rivalries were growing. The former regions and republics of the USSR that had only a marginal influence on international affairs began to acquire critical importance in the new system. The model that these states would adopt and the debates over this issue would lead to tensions not only internally but also with neighbors and among the interested major powers. The competition among regional and other states that scrambled to fill the void left by the Soviet withdrawal from the Caucasus and Central Asia would lead to new rivalries and new tension on the international scene.

4. The rivalry between the East and West gave way to the North-South divide. As a natural consequence of the ending of the Cold War, the East-West divide began losing its intensity and was gradually replaced by the North-South divide. In an environment where the bipolar system of the Cold War was coming to an end, it was inevitable that regional interests would play a larger part in international affairs than global concerns. It was obvious that the short- and medium-term struggles for regional leadership in the various subsystems of the international system (such as the Balkans, the Middle East, and the Caucasus and Central Asia) would become the determining factor.

With the disintegration of the USSR, eight states gained their independence in the Caucasus and Central Asia: Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan. International interest in these countries has been growing ever since then, mainly for economic and strategic reasons. The region has been attracting the interest not just of the major powers but also of regional powers such as Iran, Pakistan, Israel, and Turkey, due to the wealth of natural resources, the region's closeness to the Middle East, and its strategic location between Europe and Asia.

Outside the Soviet Bloc, the emerging new order and the changes it brought about affected Turkey most of all. Turkey had based its security and foreign policy during the Cold War on its relations with the Western allies and the strategic importance attributed to it by the allies. With the ending of the Cold War, the Europeans found themselves in a much more secure environment, while Turkey found itself in an environment breeding regional conflicts on all sides. In this new era when NATO's role and necessity became a subject of intense debate, Turkey found itself in a security limbo. With the ending of the threat from the North, Turkey's security links with the West and the economic, political, and military benefits it derived from these links had come to an end. It was no longer possible to pursue the usual policies based on the relative "security" and "stability" of the Cold War. Furthermore, the appearance of Eastern European states pursuing liberal democratic goals created a buffer zone between the Western European states and Russia. This allowed Western Europe to relax while Turkey remained tense as a result of the instability in its vicinity, which it perceived as a threat. This threat perception was compounded by the danger that it might be abandoned by its Western allies. This shook Turkey's security policies to the core and led to an urgent reappraisal of possible threats to its security in the post–Cold War era.

As the chain of events that broke up the USSR was unfolding, Turkey was reappraising its foreign policy orientations and its fundamental ideological assumptions. There was increasing concern in Turkey over foreign and security policies at this time, and its place and importance in the world were the subjects of intense debate. The appearance at this juncture of six independent Muslim states (five of them Turkic), with a total population of 60 million living in an area totaling 6 million square kilometers, created a great stir and caused much joy in Turkey. This presented Ankara with a historic opportunity to derive political, economic, and psychological benefits from this transformation. In his speech at the opening of the new session of parliament on 1 September 1991, president Turgut Özal declared that the ending of the Cold War and the disintegration of the USSR had given the Turks a historic opportunity to assume regional leadership for the first time in 400 years and that this opportunity must not be missed.

Turkey had not expected the USSR to disintegrate so rapidly and did not have a policy of taking a close interest in the fate of external Turks. As noted earlier, during the Cold War period it had followed a policy of staying clear of the questions of external Turks. The exceptions were the Turks of Cyprus, Western Thrace, and Bulgaria, and these concerns had been forced upon Turkey by outside events. The new developments led to unrealistic expectations and high hopes. The feeling of isolation going back for many years was suddenly at an end, and the shared cultural, linguistic, and religious ties with the majority of the newly independent states of the Caucasus/Central Asia were frequently cited both at home and abroad as factors that would enhance Turkey's importance in the region.

In this framework, Turkey was presented to the new states as an example of a successful development model, while Pan-Turkic and Turanian ideas began to take hold in Turkey. The West and particularly the U.S. openly supported Turkey in the region for fear of seeing pro-Iranian Islamic regimes gain power there. For the first time in history, the Russian Federation tolerated Turkey's influence in the region for the same reason. Initially, the Turkic-Muslim states of Caucasus/Central Asia looked upon Turkey to reinforce their independence, to gain respectability and status in the world, and to carry out their transformation.

All of this was bound to affect Turkey in its efforts to redefine its identity at the end of the Cold War. But it did not take long for reality to reassert itself after the initial excitement. The financial and technological resources of Turkey were no match for the enormous socioeconomic requirements of the former Soviet republics.

As the initial hopes and expectations gave way to disappointment, a more serious and sober assessment began, considering Turkey's future role in the region and how this would affect Turkey's domestic and external policy, its identity, and so forth. After the Cold War, Turkey was in fact confronted with great opportunities as well as potential risks in the Caucasus and Central Asia, which had to be analyzed with the greatest care. A complicating factor was that much emphasis had been placed on the original Turkish homeland in Central Asia when a new Turkish identity was being forged in the 1920s. Since then, people in Turkey had lived by the myth that theirs was the last Turkish state that had resisted the onslaughts of surrounding enemies all these years. This myth of "isolation" and "uniqueness" was suddenly brought to an end by the emergence in the international arena of fraternal Turkic states. All of this compelled Turkey to make complex analyses of its identity (Box 7-23).

II. RELATIONS WITH THE REGION AND CHANGING FOREIGN POLICY

In the post–Cold War era, Turkey's Caucasus/Central Asia policy went through a number of different phases. From 1989 to 1991 Turkey steered clear of nationalist currents taking shape in the Soviet Republics and clung to its traditional Moscow-centered foreign policy. After the disbanding of the USSR and the emergence of independent states in the region from 1991 to 1993, Turkey was the first country to recognize these states. In this period Turkey strove to play a leadership role and presented itself as a model, actively seeking to eliminate Russian influence in the region. Turkic, Turanian, and Islamic motifs came to the fore amidst all the excitement in the scramble to complete with Russia and Iran. Turkey engaged in a struggle for influence without any particular plan or program.

From 1993 to 1995 it became increasingly clear that the vacuum left in the region by the disintegration of the USSR would be filled by the Russian Federation. This was

Box 7-23. Turkish-Turkic

In none of the Turkish dialects is there the distinction between "Turkish" and "Turkic" that exists in English. Turkic in English describes a family of languages, while Turkish is the language spoken by the Turks in Anatolia and in former Ottoman territories (Cyprus, Western Thrace, Bulgaria, etc.). "Turkic" also denotes the whole people, while "Turkish" describes those who live in Anatolia and speak the Turkish language. To make the English distinction, the word "Turkis" was concocted in Turkey after 1990 to correspond to the word "Turkic."

In this confusion, politicians and academics in Turkey used the expression "Turkish Republics" to describe the new states set up by Turkic people in the Caucasus and Central Asia following the collapse of the USSR and called the languages spoken by these people Turkish. In doing this they were under the influence of the notion that these people were no different from the Anatolian Turks and that they all made up a single people. This usage was interpreted abroad as a sign that the Turks of Turkey were considering an expansionist policy based on the concept of ethnicity. As similar views also began to be expressed in Turkey, the new states gradually came to be called "Turki" (that is, "Turkic Republics") in public parlance. Only people living in Cyprus, Western Thrace, and Bulgaria were referred to as Turks, with the remainder of people of Turkish stock living outside Turkey being described as Turkic peoples the period when Turkey was discovering its inadequacies and its limitations and was feeling disappointment over not being able to establish relations with the regional countries at the desired level. Since then Turkey has been pursuing policies more in line with its means and corresponding to the realities of the region. This policy does not seek to exclude Russia but is more realistic and balanced and based on mutual cooperation.

(M. AYDIN)

The Gorbachev Period and Moscow-Centered Foreign Policy (1989–1991)

Before Gorbachev came to power in 1985, Turkish-Soviet relations were developing rapidly, especially in the economic area. In line with the 1984 agreement for the sale of natural gas, the USSR started delivering natural gas to Turkey in 1987. This led to increasing Turkish exports to the USSR and a leap in the volume of bilateral trade (see "Relations with the USSR" in Section 6 and "Relations with Russia" below). Developing economic relations added a new incentive for Turkey's traditional policy of not getting involved in the internal affairs of the USSR. Turkey maintained this traditional policy even after the closed Soviet system began to open up to the world as a result of Gorbachev's policies of glasnost and perestroika. Ankara made no attempt to establish direct links with the

Box 7-24. The Distinction between Sovereignty and Independence in Soviet Terminology

At the time of the disintegration of the USSR, the concept of sovereignty came to the fore. Under this concept, the laws of the component republics had precedence over the laws of the Union, the republics had control over their resources and made their own domestic and external policies. Against this, the republics undertook to maintain their confederal ties with the Union. The declaration of sovereignty by the republics was an important step in the path that led to independence but did not imply independence. In the region of the Caucasus and Central Asia, Azerbaijan declared its sovereignty on 23 September 1989, Uzbekistan on 20 June 1990, Georgia on 9 August 1990, Türkmenistan on 24 August 1990, Armenia on 23 August 1990, Tajikistan on 24 August 1990, Kyrgyzstan on 12 October 1990, and Kazakhstan on 25 October 1990. Full independence came about a year later.

(M. AYDIN)

Soviet Republics; nor did it engage in any activity that might be construed as threatening the existence of the USSR.

Even Turgut Özal, who was not averse to challenging the traditional course of Turkish foreign policy, exercised extreme caution in this respect. When asked about his view regarding the events that took place in Soviet Azerbaijan in January 1990, he replied that this was an internal affair of the USSR, that Turkey did not pursue a policy of uniting the Turkic people of that country within an empire, and that Ankara was attached to Atatürk's precept of "Peace at home and peace abroad." He even went so far as to suggest that the Shiite Azerbaijanis were more the concern of Iran than of Turkey (Cumhuriyet, 19 January 1990). In line with these views, Turkey remained silent when Soviet troops violently suppressed the supporters of the Azerbaijan Popular Front in Baku, despite a strong current in Turkey that favored giving active support to the Azerbaijanis.

Starting in 1988, Gorbachev began to grant limited autonomy to the republics in the USSR. The people of the Caucasus and Central Asia established their own structures, began to set their own courses, chose their national emblems, and declared their sovereignties in the second half of 1990. Turkey then began to shift its attention from the center to the republics (Box 7-24). In practice Gorbachev's reforms did not grant the republics the right to pursue policies without regard to the center. Nevertheless, low-level delegations began to visit Turkey from these republics to establish cooperation in fields such as culture, science, communications, health, and the economy.

The high-level visits began with President Özal going to the USSR in March 1991. Accompanied by a large group of businesspeople, Özal went to Moscow and then proceeded to Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, and Ukraine. Ukraine was important for the establishment of the Black Sea Economic Cooperation organization. In Kazakhstan, the largest country in Central Asia, Özal signed an agreement on scientific and technical cooperation and cultural exchanges and discussed Turkey's possible contribution to the economic restructuring of Kazakhstan. He also indicated that direct flights between Alma Ata and Istanbul would be established. It will be noted that none of these subjects were sensitive issues that might perturb Moscow. At this stage, Turkey was extremely careful not to offend Moscow when it was dealing with the republics.

Özal's visit allowed Turkey to gauge the extent to which Turkey might establish links with the regional countries without provoking the USSR. High-level visits to Turkey ensued from this visit. Among these were the visits of the prime minister of Kyrgyzstan to Ankara in May 1991 and the visit of the president of Tajikistan to Istanbul in June, when he attended a meeting of the World Economic Forum.

The failed coup attempt of 19 August 1991 that hastened the disintegration of the USSR was also a turning point in Turkey's relations with the Central Asian and Caucasus republics. Although this coup against Gorbachev failed, it demonstrated to the leadership of these countries that the end of the USSR was approaching and encouraged them to act more independently of Moscow.

At first the leaders in Central Asia avoided declaring their independence in order not to upset their sizable Russian minorities. The Turkish visit of Kazakh leader Nursultan Nazarbayev in September 1991 acquired considerable significance as a result of the failed coup against Gorbachev. Although originally conceived as merely a courtesy visit, it resulted in the signing of a Joint Declaration on Purposes and Objectives. Furthermore, it was decided to set up a joint consultation mechanism and establish interparliamentary relations between the two countries. In the economic field, Turkey would extend Kazakhstan a $10 million loan through the Turkish Eximbank and import coal in repayment for consumer goods to be exported to Kazakhstan.

At that point Turkey was still maintaining friendly relations with Moscow while developing its relations with the republics. It was careful, however, to make sure that relations with the republics did not cast a shadow on relations with the center. When Azerbaijan declared its independence on 30 August 1991, the undersecretary of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Özdem Sanberk, made a statement the next day (Milliyet, 1 September 1991, p. 5) that revealed Turkey's intention to maintain its balancing act:

[A]t this stage Turkey is observing development from Moscow's perspective. For Ankara, relations with Moscow take precedence over relations with the republics. That is why Turkey is preceding with caution... Turkey will not rush into any race to recognize the republics that declare their independence. Turkey will proceed in line with its own strategy. When Muslim Turkic republics like Azerbaijan or Kazakhstan declare their independence, Turkey will respond and recognize these republics. We are in the process of explaining our motives to the Soviets.

On 31 August 1991 Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan followed Azerbaijan and declared their independence. This attracted the public's interest in Turkey, and the press began to call for a speedy recognition of these states. The breathtaking events in the aftermath of the failed coup in the USSR and the sudden independence of the Caucasian and Central Asian republics threw Turkish-Soviet relations into uncertainty. While the government was seeking to strike a fine balance between Turkey's interests and its responsibilities, the press was clamoring for more support for the Turkic republics and calling on Ankara not to evade its responsibilities. Others were calling for caution in responding to the political changes taking place in the USSR.

When the MFA issued a statement on 3 September to clarify its position with respect to relations with the Baltic countries, which had declared themselves independent, the debate over the recognition of the Turkic states intensified. The MFA's statement declared that Turkey received the news of the regaining of independence by the three Baltic States with satisfaction and announced that Turkey would restore its relations with these states. As a matter of fact, Turkey had established diplomatic relations with these states in the 1930s and had never recognized their annexation by the USSR in 1940. Consequently, it did not feel the need to recognize their independence and confined its statement to declaring that it was restoring diplomatic relations.

The government was following the process of the conversion of the USSR into the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) very closely with a view to formulating an appropriate policy and did not want to rush into any course before the status of the new CIS republics became clear. At this point the Soviet republics in Central Asia had not yet made up their minds about the course they would follow, and Turkey had received no call for recognition from any of them.

The Sending of Delegations

In view of the confused situation, Turkey readied two delegations in September 1991 with the mandate to go to the region to look into the situation and provide accurate firsthand information. One of the delegations was to go to Azerbaijan and the Central Asian republics, the other to Ukraine, Moldova, Georgia, and Armenia. These delegations would convey Turkey's interest and determine what these countries expected from Turkey.

The first delegation consisted of ambassador Bilal Şimşir, minister plenipotentiary Kurtuluş Taşkent, and the first counselor of the Turkish Embassy in Moscow, Halil Akıncı. The delegation visited Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, Tajikistan, and Turkmenistan from 12 to 17 September 1991, conveyed Turkey's good wishes, and inquired about the host countries' expectations. This was the first foreign delegation to visit Azerbaijan, Uzbekistan, Kyrgyzstan, and Tajikistan following their declaration of independence on 9 September 1991. Thanks to their good timing, these visits allowed Turkey to gain an advantage over its rivals in the countries of the region.

The delegations reported that the region's countries wanted to increase trade with Turkey, engage in joint ventures, and send students and personnel to Turkey for training. All of the Central Asian states, including Tajikistan, declared that they looked upon Turkey as a model. Their first wish was to be granted recognition: apart from Kazakhstan, which had not yet declared its independence, all of the regional countries were anxious to obtain early recognition. The Turkic republics were also eager to establish relations with Turkey without delay. Their presidents wanted to make their first foreign visit to Turkey and were awaiting an invitation from Ankara.

The delegations reported that the newly independent republics should be recognized but noted that the timing of the recognition had to be judicious. At this point Turkey was getting ready for parliamentary elections and was focused on the domestic scene. The election took place on 20 October 1991; after the developments in Azerbaijan, the question of recognizing that country became topical once again.

Recognition, Starting with Azerbaijan

On 29 October 1991 the parliament of Azerbaijan appealed to all countries to recognize the independence of the new state. On 1 November foreign minister Hüseyin Sadikov told Altan Karamanoğlu (the Turkish consul general in Baku) that they wanted Turkey to be the first country to recognize independent Azerbaijan. The prime minister of Azerbaijan, Hasan Hasanov, visited Ankara on 3 and 4 November on his way back from Italy and had an audience with president Turgut Özal. Hasanov informed that Italy was ready to recognize Azerbaijan but added that Turkey should be the first in granting recognition.

Finally, the Turkish government recognized the independence of Azerbaijan. This was the result of public pressure and the desire not to be left behind by a possible earlier Iranian recognition. The government's awareness that Turkey's lukewarm response to the brutal suppression of the Baku demonstrations by Soviet forces in January 1990 had damaged Turkey's image also played a part in this recognition. But Turkey continued its cautious policy of paying attention to Moscow's wishes and was careful not to offend Soviet sensibilities. This became clear when Turkmenistan declared its independence on 2 December. President Saparmurad Niyazov (subsequently Turkmenbashi) paid his first foreign visit to Turkey to call for recognition but failed to obtain satisfaction. Instead Ankara decided to set up a consulate in Turkmenistan and signed an Agreement on Friendship and Cooperation along with various economic agreements.

When the Russian Federation, Ukraine, and Belarus agreed in Minsk on 8 December to establish the CIS and when the Central Asian republics agreed to join it three days later at Ashkhabad, it became clear that the USSR had indeed come to an end. After these developments, Turkey recognized all fifteen of the newly independent states, including Armenia, on 16 December without even waiting for the formal dissolution of the USSR. At the same time Turkey declared its readiness to establish diplomatic relations with them. Thus Turkey had become the first state to recognize all of the republics of the Caucasus and Central Asia.

On the same day, Uzbekistan's president Islam Karimov came to Turkey on an official visit to sign a number of agreements. The Turkish government went beyond these agreements and, in addition to setting up consulates in the two countries, informed Karimov that it was ready to establish full diplomatic relations with Uzbekistan. When he arrived in Ankara in the morning, Turkey had not yet recognized Uzbekistan and did not receive him at the airport as a head of state. The Soviet flag was present alongside the Turkish and Uzbek flags, and Soviet ambassador Albert Chernishev was present to greet him. The situation changed that same afternoon, however, when Turkey recognized Uzbekistan. The Soviet flag, anthem, and ambassador were excluded from the contacts. In a sense, it was Turkey that confirmed Islam Karimov as the head of state of an independent state.

On 18 December Turkey decided to establish consulates that would be upgraded later to embassies in all of the Central Asian and Caucasus republics. The only exception was Armenia, which was excluded for its role in the dispute with Azerbaijan on the question of Nagorno Karabakh and for having occupied part of the territory of Azerbaijan. Pending the establishment of these missions, Turkey's relations with the former Soviet republics would be conducted under the coordination of the Turkish Embassy in Moscow. On 21 December eleven former Soviet republics met in Almati and declared that the USSR was no more. A day later, the president of Kyrgyzstan, Askar Akayev, and afterward (in January 1992) the president of Azerbaijan, Ayaz Muttalibov, came to Ankara and signed Friendship and Cooperation Agreements. During Akayev's visit it was decided to deliver emergency aid from Turkey to Kyrgyzstan, which was suffering from an unusually cold spell that winter. The aircraft that took Akayev back to Kyrgyzstan was carrying 10.5 tons of Turkish emergency relief aid.

The Implementation of a New Policy

From 28 February to 6 March 1992 minister of foreign affairs Hikmet Çetin visited all of the Turkic republics and Ukraine. Turkey's diplomatic initiatives were gathering momentum and reached a peak two months later with Prime Minister Demirel's Central Asia tour.

These visits demonstrated that Turkey was rapidly abandoning its Moscow-centered policy and replacing it with policies more in keeping with the changed circumstances. As the awareness began to take hold that there were other "Turks" in the world, a new feeling of excitement and expectation gripped the Turkish public as well as the administration.

The excitement was reflected in the records of the TGNA on 12 and 17 December 1991, when it took up the issue of "policies to be pursued in relations with the Turkish republics." At both sittings, the deputies noted that Turkey could gain advantages over countries such as Iran, Saudi Arabia, Germany, and the U.S. by being the first to get actively involved in the region. Some deputies demanded the establishment of a cabinet post that would be responsible for the "external Turks." During a foreign policy debate that took place at the TGNA on 25 December, the news that a neighboring country (probably Iran) was getting ready to open an embassy in Baku led Hikmet Çetin to announce from the podium that Turkey would open embassies in all of the new republics except Armenia. The minister had been advised by the personnel of the MFA that Turkey had always been first to act in this region and that Turkish ambassadors should be the deans of the diplomatic corps in all of these capitals. The government formally decided to open embassies on 30 December 1991.

Relations Based on Emotion and Enthusiasm (1991–1993)

By the end of 1991 Turkey had completely abandoned its Moscow-centered policy and was fully engaged in developing active relations with the post-Soviet successor states. Promises of support and aid were given to the leaders of the Turkic republics, who visited Ankara one by one; and by 1993 more than 140 bilateral agreements had been signed with these states.

In this context, Turkey's activities in the region at least in the cultural sphere began to display Turkic motifs. Turkish public opinion started to take a renewed interest in Turks living abroad. Until a few years ago, dwelling on Turkish peoples abroad was regarded as a sign of harboring racist tendencies. From 1991 to 1993 there was a rising awareness of "external Turks," however, and society began to shake off its former diffidence and deal with the subject within the framework of a new perception of ethnicity. In September 1991 the Economist (no. 297) referred to the people that spoke Turkish all the way "from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China" in the post-Soviet world. This theme was picked up in Turkey and used to such an extent that it became a banality. The distinction between the Turks of Anatolia and the "ethnic Turks" of Central Asia grew fuzzy as a concept and led people to imagine that the twenty-first century would be a "Turkish century," as asserted by Nazarbayev during his visit in September 1991 ("İstikbal Türklerin," Türkiye, 25 September 1991).

True, these developments were all based in large measure on the emergence of independent states with which Turkey shared a common culture, language, and religion. But Turkey's approach to the Turkic republics in Caucasus and Central Asia was not based exclusively on purely nationalistic and domestic policy considerations. Other important and more fundamental economic and foreign policy considerations guided Turkey's actions in the early 1990s. The international environment had changed, and the bloc system was at an end. According to Kamran İnan, a former minister, Turkey was compelled to admit that it was now a regional power. The changes in Turkish foreign policy were, to a large extent, a function of the regional and global transformation that was shaking the foundation on which the country's international position was based. In other words, Turkey was passing through an adaptation process imposed on it by regional and global transformation. Prime Minister Demirel declared that Turkey had a unique cultural, geographical, and historical position and was located in the very center of the emerging political and economic structure known as Eurasia. As such, Turkey's regional and international responsibilities had grown and could no longer be avoided (Demirel, p. 89).

In referring to "responsibilities," Demirel meant that Turkey had to take an active role to ensure that the newly independent regional states were linked to the outside world. Turkey also had the responsibility to be helpful to the new states in their reach for their true identity. These activities included the establishment of the Black Sea Economic Cooperation (BSEC) initiative and the Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO), which helped maintain the stability of the region and thereby contributed to world peace and helped the new states to establish closer relations with the outside world. The Turkish government felt that its responsibilities also included helping the new states to become respected members of the international community.

That is why Turkey was the first to recognize the newly independent states and compiled a list of principles that would guide its relations with these states. Accordingly, Turkey appealed to these countries to comply with the principles of "noninterference in internal affairs, the inviolability of frontiers, and respect for territorial integrity" and declared that it would conduct its relations with the republics on the basis of "respect for independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity, noninterference in internal affairs, and ensuring equal rights and common interests" (Newspot, 19 December 1991, pp. 1, 7). Turkey also conveyed the message that both Ankara and the rest of the world expected the republics to abide by the principles of the UN Charter and the OSCE, to respect human rights, to comply with the obligations arising from the treaties signed by the USSR, and to have regard for the rule of law and the principles of democracy.

Turkey expected that the opportunity for cooperation with the new entities would provide significant benefits for its developing industries. After the European Commission turned down Turkey's application for full membership, Ankara saw the region as an area with a very high potential for lucrative cooperation. In fact, Turkish entrepreneurs detected the region's attraction and opportunities for profit long before the state. By mid-1992 the number of Turkish firms with investments in the region had already surpassed the 200 mark (Haktanır, p. 10).

Turkey also expected that it would acquire a new stature in the politics of the region as well as the whole world as it developed its cultural and ethnic links with the Turkish peoples of the region undergoing a great transformation. This expectation was grounded on the belief that as a secular, democratic country, Turkey would be accepted as a "model" by the republics of Central Asia.

During this period, however, some people held contrary views and opposed the proposed policies, especially when these were embellished with Turkic images or accompanied by excessive promises of aid. The public made a sharp distinction between showing an interest in the external Turks and incurring vast expenses as a consequence of the new policies. Also, the public did not generally support a purely nationalistic foreign policy. The objections to such a policy were by no means groundless, even in the special conditions of that period. There was the question of whether Turkish foreign policy should have a Western or an Eastern orientation. Some also questioned the wisdom of Turkey's extravagant promises, made without regard to its huge budget deficits and high inflation. Even in this period of exhilaration and excitement, voices were frequently heard cautioning that the promises being made to the regional republics might not be met and that Turkey's capacity to deliver might have been overestimated.

The decision-makers, however, were under the spell of public excitement and were intent on realizing the potential benefits for Turkey that the region appeared to offer. Within the first year of their independence, more than 1,200 Turkish delegations had visited the new states. Furthermore, a new structure was established (based on a Japanese model) that would coordinate aid activities and ensure the flow of aid to the region: the Turkish Cooperation and Development Agency (TİKA) with headquarters in Ankara (Box 7-25).

It has to be emphasized that these activities were encouraged by the West and particularly by the U.S. At this point the Western states feared that the vacuum left by the USSR in the Caucasus and Central Asia might be filled by political Islam backed up by Iran; consequently, they supported Muslim-populated, pro-Western, and secular Turkey. As President Demirel asserted, Turkey proved that Islam, democracy, human rights, and the market economy could coexist harmoniously.

Russia also appeared at this point to be closing its

Box 7-25. TIKA's Structure and Responsibilities

The Turkish Cooperation and Development Agency (TIKA) was established by a decision of the Council of Ministers dated 27 January 1992. Originally attached to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, It was attached to the office of the prime minister on 28 May 1999. It finally became an autonomous agency attached to one of the ministers of state on 12 May 2001. TIKA's responsibility would be to help the progress of developing countries, in particular those speaking Turkic languages and neighboring countries. This would be done through projects and programs of cooperation in the economic, trade, technological, social, cultural, and educational fields.

TIKA's goals were (1) to undertake cooperation projects with developing countries that would contribute to their development, (2) to prepare or to commission the preparation of projects and programs and to designate the fields of cooperation and assistance, bearing in mind the development goals and requirements of developing countries; (3) to assist these countries in developing their state structures, preparing their legislation, training civil servants, and carrying out the transition to a market economy; (4) to send experts and coordinate the allocation of fellowships to these countries, (5) to make arrangements to carry out cooperation programs in the fields of education and culture through Turkish Gultural Centers to be established in these countries, and (6) to engage in cooperation and coordination with other public agencies in the fields falling within its responsibilities.

TIKA's project principles include giving priority to projects proposed by the reciplent states and to their national, social, and cultural values; sharing responsibility for the projects with the reciplent country on a footing of equality, and allowing reciplent countries to take over once the project is completed.

(M. AYDIN)

eyes to Turkish activities in the region. In February 1992 NATO secretary-general Manfred Wörner declared in Moscow that the alliance relied on Turkey to protect its interests and resist religious fundamentalism in Central Asia. It was significant that the Russians displayed no reaction to this assertion. Similarly, Moscow did not react to U.S. secretary of state James Baker when he declared in February 1992 that Washington expected the Central Asian republics to look to Europe and to secular Turkey and not to neighbors like Iran when charting their strategic orientation (Winrow, p. 13).

During this period the regional countries also looked to Turkey to play a more active role. In the course of their visits to Ankara in December 1991, Islam Karimov (the president of Uzbekistan) and Askar Akayev (the president of Kyrgyzstan) openly aired their expectations of support from Turkey. Karimov also stated that he believed Uzbekistan and the other newly independent states of Central Asia had much to learn from Ankara and that he regarded Turkey as an elder brother. He also appealed for urgent economic, political, and cultural assistance (Cumhuriyet, 20 December 1991). Karimov's visit was followed immediately by the visit of Kyrgyzstan's president Askar Akayev who compared Turkey to a "morning star" indicating the way for the Turkic republics (Turkish Daily News, 24 December 1991).

Looking back at these events several years later, it can be said that the Central Asian and Caucasus republics had no stomach for a new elder brother after seventy years of Soviet experience and that Turkey may have offended them by attempting to assume such a role. But it must not be forgotten that they were in dire need of support for their independence in 1991 and required Turkey's help to gain wider recognition in the world. In that initial heady period, the leaders of the new republics did come under the spell of their long-forgotten feeling of being Turkish and did not he sitate to express this feeling to Turkey. At the time, Turkey was eager to assume the role of elder brother, encouraged by the Western countries, the countries of the region, and even Russia. The Turkish leadership was quite unprepared to play this role, however, being almost completely uninformed about the region and greatly overestimating Turkey's capacity to give direction to the region's sociopolitical and economic transformation.

At the end of 1991 Turkey felt itself to be ready, with the political support of the West, to seize the economic and political opportunities offered by the birth of the new states of the Caucasus and Central Asia. Following the succession of visits of the Central Asian leaders to Ankara, Prime Minister Demirel visited the region from 27 April to 3 May 1992 in order to appraise the potential of the new states and offer import credits and aid amounting to $1.1 billion, a sum that would strain Turkey's capacity to the limit. In the course of his visit, a number of cultural and economic cooperation protocols were signed. Demirel also told his hosts that it would be in their interest to leave the ruble zone. This was Turkey's first direct challenge to Russia's interests in the region. Turkey took up issues such as the provision of military training to the Central Asian states and the construction of pipelines to market Central Asian gas and oil through Turkey. The Central Asians were also urged to switch to the Latin alphabet.

Given the importance of developing links with the Central Asian republics without going through intermediaries, the Turkish postal and telecommunications administrations (PTT) provided a grant for equipment with a capacity of 2,500 lines that would allow the region to link up with the outside world without having to go through the Russian network. This equipment included ground

Box 7-26. Private Turkish Educational Institutions in the Caucasus and Central Asia

Permission from both the Turkish Ministry of Education and the host government is needed before the private sector can open a school in these countries. Usually the premises are provided by the host country, while most of the teachers come from Turkey. By the end of 2000 there were 120 private educational institutions established by foundations, companies, associations, or individuals, Education is carried out in English, Turkish, and the official language of the host country. In addition to the Ministry of Education, the following entities have established educational institutions in the region: (1) the Religious Foundation of Turkey; (2) the Turkish World Research Foundation; (3) members of Fethullah Gulen Congregation through the following entities: Çağ Öğretim İşletmeleri A.Ş. (Azerbaijan), Feza A.Ş. (Nakhechevan), Feza Gazetecilik A.Ş (Kazakhstan), Şelale A.Ş. (Kazakhstan), Eflak A.Ş. (Kazakhstan), Kazak-Türk Liseleri Genel Müdürlüğü (Kazakhstan), Sebat A.Ş (Kyrgyzstan); Silm A.Ş. (Uzbekistan), Başkent Eğitim A.Ş. (Turkmenistan), and Çağlar Eğitim Mal Ltd. Şti (Georgia).

> (M. AYDIN) - (Source: MEB 1997, pp. 229–47, Sabah, 28 January 1997)

stations for satellite links with Turkey and the rest of the world. Starting in May 1992, direct flights were established from İstanbul and Ankara to the capitals of the new states.

In addition, Turkish Cultural Centers and Turkish schools were opened in several localities to strengthen cultural ties. The schools were staffed and equipped by Turkey, which also provided scholarships. The schools were designed to meet the need for trained workers and personnel with foreign language skills. By 2000 the region had scores of schools and language courses established and operated by the Turkish state or Turkish nationals as well as ten universities and two faculties established with Turkish funds (Box 7-26).

Given the need for well-educated cadres for economic development, Turkey launched a large program in 1991 to provide scholarships to students from the region. Each country was assigned a quota of 2,000 scholarships, of which 1,400 would be university scholarships. After overcoming many difficulties, it became possible to carry out the program, which allowed thousands of students from the Caucasus and Central Asia to receive an education in Turkey. By January 1999 Turkey offered 26,368 scholarships, allowing 16,692 students to take advantage of the offer. Of these, 2,133 received degrees, while 5,889 dropped out or were recalled home. In 2003 Turkey had approximately seven thousand students from the region. From 1992 to 1997 Turkey spent around $55 million for this program (MEB 1998, pp. 93–94).

The major difficulty in carrying out the program was the tendency of a large number of scholarship holders to drop out and return home because of various problems. The most frequently cited problem was the inadequacy of the stipend provided to the scholars. In a poll taken in 1998 among the scholarship holders, 36.1% claimed that their stipends were inadequate, and 34.9% declared that they had a full-time job. Early in the program, there was the problem of unqualified students who had been given a scholarship through their connections. Others had difficulties adapting to the educational system or had trouble with the Turkish language. It soon became clear that Turkey should have opted for a system in which it would select those who would qualify for scholarships. Scholarships should have been given to those who would assume leadership roles in the future. Furthermore, more generous stipends should have been given to fewer scholars. Those who dropped out without obtaining a degree did. not become goodwill ambassadors for Turkey when they went home. On the contrary, they spread negative impressions of Turkey. A poll conducted in 1998 revealed that only 58.2% of the respondents had a positive opinion about Turkey.

A positive development that occurred subsequently was the reduction in the quotas set aside for each country. A new difficulty cropped up, however, when scholarship holders chose not to return to their country of origin at the end of their education. Those that did return found it difficult to get government jobs because they were considered "too Turkified" after spending long years in Turkey. Furthermore, Uzbekistan started reducing the number of its students in Turkey after 1994, because it feared that the opponents of the regime living in Turkey might influence these students. By 1998 Uzbekistan had recalled most of its students studying in Turkey, and Ankara reallocated the Uzbek quota to other countries. In 1998 Uzbekistan also stopped issuing visas to Turkish students wanting to study in Uzbekistan.

In July 1993 the Turkish Ministry of Culture, in cooperation with its counterparts in the other Turkic countries, developed a project for joint management of Turkic cultural and artistic events (the Turkish acronym for the project is TÜRKSOY). In November 1992 the Ministry of Education started preparations for common history and common literature books that would be used throughout the Turkic countries. First, committees were set up to write the books; in March 1995 steps were taken to translate the books that had been written into the dialects of the individual countries. It has not proven possible to bring the books into use, however. In April 1992 the publicly owned television and radio network TRT (Türkiye Radyo Televizyon Kurumu) started transmitting to the region via satellite under the label "TRT Eurasia," subsequently changed to "TRT-Turk." Although a secular country, Turkey also took steps to engage in cooperation in the field of religion. It shipped religious materials to the region and offered to provide religious education. With money raised through fundraising campaigns, the Religious Affairs Directorate of Turkey commissioned the building of a mosque and a cultural center along Turkish architectural lines in each of the Turkic republics. The Turkish Religious Affairs Foundation also contributed to the construction or repair of scores of mosques in these countries and established Faculties of Theology in Azerbaijan, Kyrgyzstan, and Turkmenistan. A number of ministries and state institutions in Turkey participated in various activities in these countries without the involvement of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and sometimes without regard to established policies.

In summary, Turkey took serious steps in 1992 to be effective and play a leadership role in the region in the political, economic, cultural, military, and financial fields (Box 7-27). In addition to the opportunities, however, the region also posed serious threats and risks in the medium and long terms. Turkey chose to ignore this.

The First Summit of Heads of State of Turkish-Speaking Countries and the First Disappointment (1992)

As a rule, Demirel tended to be a cautious leader in matters of foreign policy. But, as already mentioned above, under the influence of an article in the Economist, he declared in February 1992 that a giant Turkish world was emerging "from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China" (Time, 31 August 1992). This brought cries of alarm from a broad spectrum ranging from the ultranationalist Serbian leader Radovan Karadzic all the way to Russian officials that Turkey was pursuing the aim of empire-building once again. Demirel sprang another surprise during his visit to the Turkic republic from 27 April to 3 May 1992 by including in his delegation Alparslan Türkeş. This was the man who had based his political program on the concept of "Pan-Turkism" over the years and now advocated the establishment of a "Turkish Union" with the Turkic republics under the leadership of Turkey. During the visit Demirel kept reassuring his hosts that Turkey harbored no Turanian ambitions, while at the same time advocating the establishment of an association of independent Turkic states. Türkeş in turn proposed the establishment of a Supreme Council of Turkic States with a rotating presidency in the aftermath of the Cold War, a good number of diplomats, police officers, and security personnel from the Caucasus and Central Asia were trained in Turkey. Military Cooperation Agreements were concluded with all the countries of the region other than Armenia and provisions were made for these countries to send students to Turkey.

Box 7-27. Military Cooperation in the Caucasus and Central Asia

Under the procedure that was established, Eriendship and Cooperation Agreements were concluded with Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan, followed by Agreements for Military Cooperation in Training and the Technical and Scientific Fields concluded with Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Kazakhstan. After these framework agreements, the Turkish General Staff signed training agreements with Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan, while the Ministry of Defense signed a Cooperation in Defense Industries Agreement with Kazakhstan.

The Agreements for Military Cooperation in Training included visits by military personnel to units, headquarters, and institutions; exchange of personnel, sending observers to military exercises) and sending trainees to military schools. By the end of 2000 some two thousand officers and noncommissioned officers had been trained in Turkey within the framework of these agreements: 520 men from Azerbaijan, 265 from Turkmenistan, 95 from Kazakhstan, and 45 from Kyrgyzstan were studying in Turkey at the expense of the Turkish government.

In addition, from 1993 to 2000 Turkish military training personnel sent to Azerbaijan and Nakhechevan had trained 853 officers. In 1996 a five-man Consultative and Coordination Council was established in Azerbaijan. This council helped in the establishment of the army and air force academies of Azerbaijan. Turkey undertook the task of raising military units of these countries up to the level of brigade to NATO standards by 2001.

A Caucasus Working Group was set up to work jointly with the U.S. Similarly, a Consultative and Coordination Council was set up in Georgia and a Caucasus Working Group was established on 13 October 1999 to work jointly with the U.S. and Georgia. The Marnauli airbase was restored by Turkey and made available to Turkish aircraft after the work was completed in January 2001. Turkey started restoration work at the Vaziyani military base in the vicinity of Tbilisi that same year.

As a rule, the officers of the armies of the Central Asian countries tended to be mostly Russian, and many were being trained in Moscow, An Image of Turkey replacing Russia in military matters was naturally a sensitive issue. When the Turkish minister of defense visited Kazakhstan to conclude an agreement, his Kazakh counterpart stressed that the agreement was merely a preliminary arrangement for joint production of Weapons and would in no way affect the cooperation agreements that Kazakhstan had concluded with other countries, meaning Russia.

Turkey has not participated in military cooperation with Ta-Jikistan because of internal turmoil or with Armenia for political reasons. There are difficulties in cooperating with the other countries that have signed agreements, owing to the lack of tradition, infrastructure, and trained personnel as well as differences in outlook and doctrine.

(M. AYDIN)

A CONTRACTOR OF THE PROPERTY O

that would bring together the presidents, prime ministers, and foreign ministers of these states on an annual basis. It was also decided to arrange joint consultative meetings at the level of heads of state and government among the Turkic states to discuss common issues and regional and international affairs. All of this talk came to an abrupt end after the first summit in October 1992, which ended in failure.

The last high-level visit prior to the summit was carried out by foreign minister Hikmet Çetin from 16 to 18 July 1992 to Ukraine, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan. Çetin was accompanied by the secretary-general of the Council of Europe, Catherine Lalumière. Turkey was the rotating president of the council at that time, and the purpose of the visit was to assess the eligibility of these states for membership in the council. By going in the company of the council's secretary-general, Çetin was underlining Turkey's relationship with Europe and conveying the message that the Central Asian states could establish their links with Europe through the intermediacy of Turkey. But this effort could not prevent the collapse of the October summit.

The summit took place in Ankara from 30 to 31 October 1992, with the participation of the heads of state of Turkey, Kyrgyzstan, Turkmenistan, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Azerbaijan. Although the Tajiks were of another ethnic stock, the president of Tajikistan had also been invited to the summit but failed to show up because of the civil war in his country. When the meeting got underway, it became clear that the Turkish officials had not carried out prior consultations with each other or with the other leaders who were attending the summit. The Turkish delegation was aiming for the signing of a Political Declaration, an Economic Declaration, and a Press Communiqué at the conclusion of the summit. But all the leaders, with the exception of Azerbaijan's President Elchibey, took fright when President Özal declared in his opening speech that the twenty-first century would be the Turkish century and called for the establishment of a Turkish Common Market and a Turkish Development and Investment Bank. Özal also exerted pressure on Kazakhstan, Uzbekistan, and Turkmenistan to obtain guarantees for the construction of oil and gas pipelines to Turkey. It was inevitable that Russia would be antagonized by this move, because it wanted all such pipelines to go through its territory in order to preserve its economic and political influence in the region.

The first summit of Turkish-speaking states ended with the signing of a single document. The Ankara Declaration made reference, in vague and general terms, to the need to establish cooperation among the republics in the fields of culture, education, language, security, the economy, and judiciary affairs.

A protocol was signed at the summit, providing for the construction of a natural gas pipeline from Turkmenistan to Turkey (without specifying the route to be followed) and for the construction of the terminal building at Ashkhabad airport by Turkey. There was no reference in the Ankara Declaration to either the Turkish Common Market or the Turkish Development and Investment Bank. Neither did it prove possible to secure the firm support of the Central Asian states for the construction of petroleum pipelines.

Worse still, Islam Karimov announced that he was against the formation of any supranational organization to coordinate activities in the Turkic world. Conscious of the large ethnic Russian population in his country, Kazakh president Nursultan Nazarbayev indicated that he would veto any document that provided for the formation of any structure based on religious or ethnic foundations. Furthermore, he refused to sign a communiqué that seemed to suggest that the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus had been recognized as an independent state. This prevented the issuing of a press release after the summit. It appeared that Nazarbayev was worried about the possibility of an analogy being drawn between the Russians in his country and the Turks in Cyprus.

Not wanting to upset Russia, the Central Asian leaders ignored the pleas of Turkey and Azerbaijan and refused to include any reference to the Nagorno Karabakh conflict in the Ankara Declaration. This was another indication of the cleavage within the group. Even before the summit, all of the Central Asians represented in Ankara, with the exception of Turkmenistan, had signed the Joint Security Treaty in Tashkent with Russia and Armenia (see Box 7-28). Four days after the Ankara Declaration, the leaders of Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, and Uzbekistan met with Russian prime minister Andrey Kozirev and asked Russia to intervene in Tajikistan. It was apparent that all roads in Central Asia led to Moscow.

The disappointing results of the summit were due mainly to the miscalculation of Turkey's leaders. They had failed to note the changes that had taken place in the Cen-

Box 7-28. The Treaty of Tashkent

After the disintegration of the USSR and the formation of the CIS, Russia saw that it would not be possible to form a comprehensive security partnership that would bring the members of the CIS together. When the former Soviet republics headed by Ukraine set up their own defense ministries on their territories, Russia developed the doctrine of the "Near Abroad" It also began to press the CIS members to sign bilateral agreements granting Russia the right to maintain bases and allowing Russia to keep on training their armies. Meanwhile Russia established its own Ministry of Defense and its own armed forces on 7 May 1992. Not wanting to conclude bilateral agreements with Russia, the representatives of Armenia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajlkistan, and Uzbekistan held talks with Russia in Tashkent on 15 May 1992 and signed the Joint Security Treaty: The treaty provided for a collective response to an attack on one of the signatories, although it was more in the nature of a political statement rather than a legally binding alliance. Only six of the eleven CIS countries signed this document, which demonstrated the level of apposition to Russia within the group.

(M. AYDIN)

tral Asian states after independence. First, after the middle of 1992, Russia had started taking a closer interest in the fate of the Russian diaspora that now found itself in the newly independent former Soviet republics. Russians accounted for 41% of the total population in Kazakhstan and 26% in Kyrgyzstan. Russia's interest in these minorities was a source of concern for both countries. In addition, the fear of radical Islam, caused by the strife in Tajikistan, was compelling these countries to seek the security of Russia's protective umbrella. Demirel had been urging his hosts to abandon the ruble zone during his Central Asia trip. They disregarded his advice, however, and sought to benefit from Russia's indirect economic support by remaining attached to the Russian currency.

Finally, the Central Asian republics had acquired new self-assurance by the time of the summit in October 1992. Turkey had initially been of great help in getting them admitted to international organizations and especially into the OIC and the ECO. But at this point they no longer needed Turkey's assistance. At the same time, the new states, having noted that Turkey's economic means were fairly limited, were getting ready to seek economic and political support elsewhere. For instance, after the Ankara Summit, Nazarbayev went to Iran to develop bilateral economic relations.

The great expectations that had been raised over relations with the Central Asian republics had to be scaled down after the disappointing Ankara Summit. Only after this summit did the Turkish leadership realize that Central Asian leaders were glad to develop their ties with Turkey but not at the expense of good relations with Russia; nor would they forgo the possibility of developing relations with other countries that were in a position to provide them with support.

C. Disappointments and Facing Reality (1993–1995)

After the fiasco of the hastily convened Summit of the Turkic States' Leaders, Turkey did not lose its interest in the region. On the contrary, dozens of visits at all levels were exchanged with the new states after the summit. The high point was the trip that President Özal made to the whole region in 1993, shortly before his death. In October 1994 President Demirel went to Turkmenistan to participate in the celebration marking the third anniversary of Turkmen independence. This visit laid the foundation for the pipeline designed to carry Turkmen natural gas to Turkey via Iran.

From 21 to 23 March 1993 a semiofficial meeting called the First Congress of Friendship, Fraternity, and Cooperation among Turkic States and Communities was held in Antalya. This congress was expected to strengthen solidarity among Turkic peoples. It was attended also by the representatives of a great number of Turkic groups from the Russian Federation. Much importance was attached to this gathering by Turkey, which was represented by both President Özal and Prime Minister Demirel. It was noted, however, that the proceedings of the congress were being directed by Alparslan Türkeş, the leader of the Nationalist Action Party.

The final communiqué of the congress contained an appeal to hold annual meetings to develop cooperation in the fields of science, technology, language, education, and culture and urged the establishment of a parliamentary working group of the Turkic republics and communities as well as a Supreme Council of the Turkic Republics. The congress also approved a 34-letter framework alphabet based on the Roman script as the common alphabet of the Turkic peoples. This alphabet had been elaborated by the Alphabet Spelling Conference convened in Ankara by TİKA from 8 to 10 March 1993. Each Turkic republic or community would be able to select its own alphabet based on this framework alphabet. The semiofficial congress adopted as its motto the phrase coined by the Turkic ideologue İsmail Gaspıralı (Gasprinski): "Unity in Language, in Thought, and in Action."

It looked like some quarters in Turkey were working toward establishing a Turkic Union or Commonwealth without rousing the government's opposition. Although the Turkic republics sent delegates to such congresses, they did not agree to have them take place on their soil. The concerns over Russia's reaction to such congresses and activities led the Turkic republics to remain cautious about getting too involved. As a result, notwithstanding the decision to hold these congresses in a different country every year, they continued being held in Turkey every time

Although high-level visits from the Caucasus/Central Asia to Turkey continued to take place, it was only possible to hold the second summit of all the leaders of the Turkic states in October 1994 in Istanbul and not in Baku in 1993, as originally planned. Because of the internal turmoil there, Tajikistan was left out of the official programs. Nevertheless, Tajikistan's vice-president paid a visit to Ankara in July 1993, when he signed a bilateral Agreement on Friendship and Cooperation.

Looking back at this period, we can discern errors in Turkey's post-USSR Central Asian policy arising from miscalculation, poor planning, and hasty action. For instance, in his first visit to the region, foreign minister Hikmet Çetin informed his hosts that Turkey stood ready to represent the Central Asian republics in the international sphere. This offer was accepted only by Uzbekistan. The other republics, being sensitive about asserting their independence and sovereignty, were offended. Similarly, Çetin's offer to send books written in the Latin script was turned down on the grounds that no formal decision had been made yet to discard the Cyrillic alphabet.

In the meantime it became clear that Turkey was not the only country seeking to fill the void left by the collapse of the USSR. On the contrary, a number of states were vying for influence in the rapidly changing political landscape in the Caucasus/Central Asia region. The resulting competition was reminiscent of the rivalries of the imperialist powers that struggled for superiority in the region during the early part of the twentieth century (Box 7-29). Among those seeking to be the key actors were Russia, Turkey, Iran, Saudi Arabia, the U.S., Pakistan, China, Japan, South Korea, Israel, and the EU. Four of these (Turkey, Iran, China, and South Korea) stand out as the role models for the region. Each country had its own reasons for engaging in the contest, and their rivalry had economic, political-ideological, and religious dimensions. This created many possibilities for conflict. Turkey had to avoid the risk of armed conflict with Iran and/or Russia.

Box 7-29. The Distinctive Features of the "Great Game" and the Second Great Game

During the nineteenth century the British and Russian Empires fought one another for the control of the Caucasus and Central Asia. The flight was conducted with money, spies, weapons, and soldiers. It was not just over wealth, territory, and resources. Differences of view, demonstrations of power, rivalries, and assertions of influence also played a part. Rudyard Kipling called this struggle the "Great Game" in his novel Kim. With the ending of the Cold War and the disintegration of the USSR, there was talk of a similar "Great Game" to achieve lofty ideals and objectives. Russia's great rival in the Caspian region during the nineteenth century was Britain. A hundred years later, the critical question was who would fill the void left by a weakened Russia.

In the original Great Game, the protagonists were seeking to exclude their rival from the region. Although it went unsaid, the same objective was being pursued in the Second Great Game. This new rivalry first emerged in the field of trade but quickly spread to political interests: as well. The new Great Game also had an ideological dimension: Western liberal democracy versus Islamic fundamentalism and Soviet-style authoritarian regimes. In the nineteenth century the rivals were striving to assume the "white man's burden" and "bring civilization" to the region. In the Second Great Game, the U.S. and others saw this as "a historic opportunity to spread freedom and democracy." Both Great Games had three attractive dimensions: profit, power, and "lofty ideals."

The Second Great Game had certain distinctive features, however. Whereas the first had two actors, this one had more actors, making it difficult to predict the outcome. At first, Turkey, Iran, and the Russian Federation were the principal actors, with the U.S., Pakistan, India, China, Japan, Israel, the EU, and Saudi Arabia lurking as potential actors. This situation changed in 1995, when the Russian Federation and the U.S. became the principal actors, while Turkey, China, and the EU assumed the role of supporting actors. After the attack of 11 September 2001, the U.S. assumed the leading part.

This time not just governments but also corporations, both national and multinational, took part in the game. In the case of the U.S., the corporations had preceded the government into the game. Now the Great Game was being played not only for political influence and strategic advantage but also for economic gain, more business, pipeline rights, and new markets. Unlike the first game, national leaders in the region did not oppose the foreign intrusion. On the contrary, they welcomed foreign investors and advisors, because this time foreign intrusion signified more investments, new employment opportunities, more economic development backed by foreign ald, and more political stability

(M. AYDIN)

The Issue of the "Turkish Model"

The peoples of the Caucasus/Central Asia region were still in the process of establishing their identities and setting up their nation-states. The success of Turkey's strivings in the area depended on how the regional countries perceived themselves and how they perceived Turkey over the long term. By and large, these states were still being run by their former Communist bosses, who were now following a nationalist line to preserve their posts. For the leaders who now controlled the destiny of these states in the chaotic circumstances prevailing after the dissolution of the Soviet Empire, the first priority was the consolidation of their power. For them, a rapid transition to democracy carried the risk of national disintegration. That is why they tended to prefer the Chinese or South Korean model of economic development (which did not have a democratic component).

Turkey had consistently been striving to have the Turkic republics adopt the "Turkish model" for their development. Whether Turkey could play a central role in the region depended in large measure on whether the newly independent states saw Turkey as a suitable and acceptable model. At first Turkey appeared to be the main alternative, with its modern and secular model backed by the West. Turkey assumed this role with such zeal that Demirel went as far as submitting draft Constitutions to the leaders of Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, and Kyrgyzstan when he visited the region in 1992. It was unlikely that the leaders would accept Constitutions based on a democratic administration from a country that had failed, after trying for seventy years, to achieve a civilian Constitution or establish a well-functioning democracy. In any case, in practice, none of the Central Asian states (with the possible exception of Azerbaijan and Kyrgyzstan) went for the Turkish model. Even if they referred to the Turkish model now and then, for them it was not the model of the 1990s, based on liberal democracy as understood in Turkey, but the model of the 1930s, which was statist and authoritarian:

The acceptability of the model did not depend on Turkey's international connections or the model's ideology. It depended much more on its compatibility with the sociopolitical and economic realities of the region. This was an important point that Turkey seemed to overlook. The models that claimed to be suitable for all of the region's states and pretended to be the solution to all of its problems were bound to fail there. Notwithstanding some common features and problems, each state in the region had its own special character and problems that were not shared with its neighbors. That is why the "one model fits all" approach could not work and each state required a tailor-made model.

Turkey was attractive because of its Western ties and its claim to be a prospective EU member. At a time when Turkey had difficulty in making itself acceptable to Europe, its offers of helping the Central Asian states in developing their ties with Europe were bound to ring hollow. Furthermore, it was clear that Turkey by itself could not be of much economic assistance and that any contribution it could make would have to be in conjunction with the West. In particular, when the Western oil companies started entering the region, newly independent states established their own direct links with the West and no longer needed Turkey's intercession. In addition, Turkey was still far from having resolved its own problems of identity, ethnicity, unity, and so forth and was in no position to serve as a model for nations grappling with similar problems.

Furthermore, the Turkish model was in general terms a secular, democratic, and free-market model, but its implementation was not all that clear-cut. The attitude of Turkish leaders and businesspeople that "we shall enlighten our Turkish brethren" in the spirit of missionaries spreading the Turkish model did not make much headway in Central Asia. These leaders and businesspeople failed to understand that, after many years of Russian domination, the newly liberated nations were not eager to seek a new "older brother" to boss them around. Ankara was slow in grasping the reality that the new nations were seeking not subservience but cooperation in their relations. This caused much disappointment in the region and lessened the chances for acceptance of the model proposed by Turkey. The reminiscences of Nursultan Nazarbayev, president of Kazakhstan, in 1997 about the first Turkic Summit of 1992 more or less represented the views of all Central Asian Republics:

[A]t first, many people believed that all of Kazakhstan's problems would be solved by Turkey. However, this meant forgoing our independence, severing our traditional ties with neighbors, and replacing one elder brother with another. This was quite clear in the draft document prepared by our Turkish colleagues, where reference was made to historical common roots, language, and cultures and traditions. Based on these it was asserted that we would engage in cooperation with Turkey. I was compelled at the time to hurt Turgut Özal's feelings and declared that I would not sign the document. I told him that I was only in favor of economic, political relations and relations between peoples. It is true that our roots are common; it is also obvious that we have been separated for a long time. I proposed that we repair the broken links of our civilization while respecting our newly won independence and the sovereignty of every state. I added that we would not sever our links with other peoples and states and would never again enter into an unequal relationship with any state. (Nazarbayev, pp. 200–201)

Turkey's intense efforts to establish close links with the Turkic republics led its adversaries to interpret these efforts as an attempt to establish regional hegemony or the pursuit of the dream to establish a Turanian Union. Although the Turkish leaders frequently declared that they pursued no Pan-Turkic ambitions and that the expressions of concern in this regard were unfounded, its neighbors' suspicions were not totally dispelled, and relations with them suffered. Greece, Iran, Russia, and the Arab states continually claimed that Turkey was pursuing Pan-Turkism and that its growing activities in Central Asia were motivated by racist considerations. Such claims were reinforced by the Turkish practice of referring to all nations speaking a Turkic language as Turks and by the tendency to talk about the Turkish-speaking peoples spread across the region "from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China." Nevertheless, Turkey continued to promote the Turkish model both in the West and in Turkey itself by using the motif of the ethnic, linguistic, and cultural unity of Turkey and the Turkic peoples. It did this without regard to the sensitivity of Russians and Persians to Pan-Turkism and the anti-Turkish tendencies that Ankara's policies might engender.

and and a second a

Aside from angering its regional rivals, Turkey's rhetoric also began to irritate the Central Asian countries themselves. The rhetoric ran counter to their search for a national identity and to their wish to establish their unique and distinctive national character. The reaction against Turkey's Turkist policies in the region was expressed by Kazakhstan's President Nazarbayev during his visit to Turkey in December 1991: "In this part of the world Turkism has become a political current only as a reaction to Soviet hegemony... I am against fitting people into specific molds on the basis of Turkism or Islamism, and such attempts will have no chance to succeed. What we are witnessing at present is a rapprochement among Turks based on the common values shared by the Turkish-speaking peoples. But this should not turn into a dangerous chauvinism" (Cumhuriyet, 16 December 1991). Although they had common ethnic roots, the majority of Central Asian peoples appeared to have developed a distinctive identity during their more than seventy years of Russian/Soviet domination. At least at this initial stage of their independent existence, they appeared to prefer stressing their individual identities rather than coming under a broad cultural-political umbrella that would blur their distinctive features.

Turkey itself was wary of appearing to be meddling in other countries' internal affairs; nor did it want to be accused of harboring Turanian or expansionist ambitions. Finding the right balance between getting more involved with these countries and not giving rise to such accusations or offending them was not an easy task. For instance, when Muhammad Salih, the leader of the Uzbek opposition movement Erk, was forced out of his country, he sought refuge in Turkey. Whether to give him refugee status or not suddenly became a delicate issue. Feeling sympathy for Salih, who was being forced out of his country by Karimov merely for being in opposition, Ankara wanted to allow him to settle in Turkey. At the same time, it did not want to confront Uzbekistan's protests or allow bilateral relations to sour over this issue. As a consequence, Salih was allowed to remain in Turkey but was forced to leave the country whenever a high-level visit from Uzbekistan took place. Obviously, this compromise satisfied neither Salih nor Karimov.

There was also the question of democracy, which the Central Asian leaders considered to be "excessive" in Turkey. For example, when the ambassador of Uzbekistan in Ankara was recalled in the summer of 1994, Turkey tried to explain this by Uzbekistan's economic difficulties. Muhammad Salih, however, who was living in Turkey at the time, claimed that the ambassador had been recalled for being too sympathetic to Turkey. Salih also claimed that the Uzbek students in Turkey would also be recalled soon because Karimov feared that if they stayed too long in Turkey and were thus exposed to democracy they would join the opposition when they returned home. In fact, all Uzbek students as well as Uzbek nationals in Turkey were recalled home in July 1994. This was followed by the closure of Turkish schools in Uzbekistan. All of these actions were motivated by the fear of Turkish democracy. When Karimov came to Turkey in June 1994, the visit was under the shadow of the ambassador's recall. Karimov's declaration that the two countries should not allow third parties to spoil bilateral relations was interpreted as a reference to the asylum that had been granted to Salih by Turkey. Unlike his visit to Turkey in December 1991, this time Karimov made no mention of the Turkish model. This clearly indicated how relations between the two countries had taken on a different character in recent years...

The strain in Turkey's relations with Uzbekistan was not due solely to Salih's presence in Turkey, however; nor was it due to the "indoctrination of Uzbek students against the regime with Turkey's connivance," as Tashkent claimed (personal interview with an Uzbek source). It became clear that the strain had deeper causes when Salih left Turkey for good and settled in Germany, but relations still did not improve. The real problem was that Karimov had the grand design of establishing a "Greater Turkistan" with Uzbekistan at the center and saw Turkey and the Turkish model as undermining his leadership.

Relations began to improve somewhat in October 2000 when Uzbekistan had to turn to Turkey for advice and assistance in connection with a number of law and order issues. Among these were the Islamic fundamentalists based in the Fergana Valley (who were perceived as threatening the unity of Uzbekistan) and the violent protests in the summer of 2000, which were becoming difficult to contain. After a long period of opposition from Tashkent, high-level Turkish visits were resumed. The Uzbeks discovered that they were unable to deal with their domestic problems single-handedly and knew that Russia would not be of any use in this sphere. In the autumn of 2000 minister of foreign affairs İsmail Cem and minister of the interior Saadettin Tantan visited Tashkent in quick succession and held talks with the Uzbek leaders.

To sum up, given the problems confronting the newly independent countries of the Caucasus and Central Asia, the Turkish model that was being offered to deal with the daunting economic and political restructuring problems was inadequate.

The Second Summit of the Turkish-Speaking Countries (1994)

After several postponements, the second Summit of Baku in Turkic States was scheduled to meet in January 1994. Özal's sudden death in 1993 and the recurring political crises had prevented the Turkish leaders from properly engaging in the effort to convene the Turkic leaders at another summit. Meanwhile the Russian opposition to the holding of such meetings was becoming stronger. At the Summit of the CIS held in Ashkhabad in December 1993, Yeltsin persuaded Karimov to block the holding of the Baku Summit. Two days prior to the holding of the Turkic Summit, Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan requested a postponement. The weakness of Turkic solidarity in the face of Russian opposition had been demonstrated once again, especially when Turkey did not display the will to pursue the objective with determination. In addition to the Russian pressure, another factor was influencing the Central Asian republics. They did not want to congregate in Baku and give the impression that they were supporting Azerbaijan against Armenia. In fact, no Central Asian leader had ever visited Baku at that point, and Turkmenistan continued to supply natural gas to Armenia. At this time, all of the Turkic leaders were striving to consolidate their hold on power and were suspicious of the nationalist rhetoric of Azerbaijan's president Elchibey, who advocated a Turanian union. This was another factor that explained the lack of enthusiasm for the Baku Summit.

Under these circumstances, it required a major diplomatic effort on the part of Turkey to convene the summit in Istanbul on 18 and 19 October 1994. That summer President Demirel had persuaded Kazakhstan's President Nazarbayev and Uzbekistan's President Karimov when they visited Ankara to hold all future summits in Turkey until these meetings became a regular event.

Russia declared that it did not welcome such meetings, which were being held on the basis of ethnicity. Moscow contended that such meetings irked neighbors and gave rise to regional tensions within the CIS by stoking nationalism. Russia also looked upon the Assembly of Turkic Peoples held in Antalya in March 1993 as an expression of militant nationalism.

Demirel responded to this criticism by stating that the summit was not pursuing Turanian aims and was directed against no other state. He also pointed out that CIS leaders did not need the approval of nonparticipants to take part in any regional meeting of their choosing. Despite Demirel's statement, the Central Asian leaders were trying hard to allay Moscow's concerns. Niyazov declared that cooperation among Turkic states did not imply that they were forgetting their responsibilities as members of the CIS. The statements made by Turkic leaders at the end of the summit showed that this time they were satisfied with the outcome of the meeting. Unlike the first summit, the expectations at this meeting were much less ambitious, and an effort had been made to avoid disappointments by distributing the draft final document to the leaders and seeking their views prior to its consideration and approval.

The communiqué adopted at the end of the meeting included a request for the implementation of the UN Security Council resolution on the Armenia-Azerbaijan conflict, calling for respect for Azerbaijan's territorial integrity. It also contained more specific references to oil and gas pipelines, declaring that the parties called for the early exploitation of the oil and gas resources of the region and their transportation to world markets by the most economic routes and, in this framework, welcomed the work being carried out regarding pipelines through Turkey to reach markets in the Mediterranean and Europe. The summit praised the regular meetings of the ministers of culture and education and expressed the wish to promote interparliamentary cooperation. It was decided that the foreign ministers would also hold regular meetings and that the next summit would be held in Bishkek in August 1995.

The second summit demonstrated once more that the inter-Turkic solidarity was less than would be desirable. Turkey and Azerbaijan apparently pressed for a tough line that would condemn Armenia as an invader and occupier, but the others blocked such a move. Together with Russia, Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan were concerned over a contract signed by Azerbaijan with an international consortium just prior to the summit for the exploitation of the hydrocarbon resources of the Caspian Sea. The leaders of both countries contended that an agreement over the use of resources had to be reached among the littoral states before such concession contracts could be signed (see Box 7-36 below).

Soon after the summit, the Second Assembly of the Turkic States and Communities for Friendship, Fraternity, and Cooperation was held in İzmir on 13-21 October. It looked as if the organizers of the İzmir meeting were trying to convey the impression that the assembly was closely linked to the summit of Turkic leaders. The Turkish administration's participation in the assembly at the highest level made it clear that Ankara was not against conveying this impression. In her speech at the assembly, Prime Minister Ciller referred to the EU and to NAFTA and declared that a similar link-up was possible among the Turkic states. President Demirel declared that a Turkic world had emerged over the last five years and pointed out that the members of this new grouping were not seeking to find an identity because they had never lost consciousness of their true identity.

The Ministry of Foreign Affairs had nothing to do with this meeting, at which there was much Pan-Turkic rhetoric. With high-level participation from Turkey at such a meeting, it was inevitable that this would create problems abroad. At this stage, Turkey's Central Asia policy was still under the influence of emotional considerations.

With the disintegration of the USSR, innumerable ethnic conflicts erupted in the Caucasus. Turkey's response to this ethnic strife would determine the degree of its effectiveness in the region.

The ethnic makeup of the Caucasus region was extremely complex. Although each Caucasus republic was made up of dominant national groups, each also had numerous minority groups. Furthermore, the dominant national groups of the newly independent states belonged to different religions, which were closely identified with

Box 7-30. The Question of Nagorno Karabakh

The origin of the question of Nagorno Karabakh goes back to 1988. In 1989 the region had a population of around 192,000, of which 70% was Armenian, The Armenians refer to the region as Artsakh, which means "dense forest." In the Soviet era this territory of 4,400 square kilometers had been an autonomous region within the Soviet Socialist Republic of Azerbaijan since 1923.

As the USSR entered its phase of disintegration in the late 1980s, the Soviet of the Autonomous Region of Nagorno Karabakh applied to the Soviets of Azerbaijan, Armenia, and the USSR on 20 February 1988 and Indicated its wish to separate from Azerbaijan and become linked to Armenia. The Supreme Soviet of Azerbaijan rejected the petition on the grounds that it violated the provision of the USSR's Constitution declaring that the borders of a constituent republic could not be revised without the consent of that republic. In July 1988 the Supreme Soviet of the USSR overrode and nullified the decision of the Supreme Soviet of Armenia to absorb Nagorno Karabakh into the Armenian Soviet Socialist Republic and in January 1989 took over the administration of Nagorno Karabakh.

After Azerbaijan and Armenia gained their independence in 1991, Azerbaijan inullified the autonomous status of Karabakh on 26 November 1991 and brought the district under the central administration of Azerbaijan. In tesponse, the Armenians held a referendum on 10 December and declared their independence, But their petition to Join the Commonwealth of Independent States as the Autonomous Republic of Nagorno Karabakh was turned down. In the early part of 1992 Russian troops evacuated Karabakh, and the dispute rapidly degenerated into an armed conflict.

By mid-1992 Karabakh had been ethnically cleansed of non-Armenians. Backed by Russia, Armenians took possession of Karabakh and a large belt of territory around the district, in fighting that took place in 1993 and 1994. With the occupation of the Lachin corridor, darabakh and Armenia were directly linked to one another. In 2003 roughly 20% of Azerbaijan's territory was still under Armenian occupation and 1 million people in Azerbaijan had been displaced from their homes. Meanwhile Armenia had lost about a quarter of its population through emigration brought on by the economic dislocation caused by the war.

Armenia failed to comply with the UN resolution calling for the immediate withdrawal of all troops from Azerbaljan's territory. To maintain its influence in the region, Russia helped in keeping the dispute alive.

When it appeared that the conflict might spread in the region, the Ministerial Council of the OSCE set up the Minsk Group on 24 March 1992 in order to help settle the dispute. The group was made up of eleven countries, including Turkey. With Russian intercession, a cease-fire agreement was signed in Moscow on 24 May 1994. Despite a number of violations, the cease-fire is still in force.

The OSCE Summit of heads of state was held in Lisbon on 2 December 1996. At this meeting, a plan was adopted by fifty three states, including Russia, with only Armenia dissenting. This plan called for the evacuation of occupied Azerbaijani territories, ensuring the security of the inhabitants of Karabakh, and granting the highest level of autonomy to Karabakh within Azerbaijan. The plan was immediately accepted by Azerbaijan, but Armenia accepted the plan only under international pressure on 26 September 1997. Russia delayed the implementation of the plan, however, because it feared josing its influence in the region if an OSCE peacekeeping force was deployed there. President Ter-Petrossian of Armenia, who had accepted the plan, was forced to resign as a result of the pressure of ultranationalists on 5 February 1998.

Ter-Petrossian was replaced as president by Robert Kocharian, the leader of Armenians of Karabakh. He had been appointed prime minister by Ter-Petrossian under the pressure of public opinion. "Kocharian's intransigence as president has blocked a diplomatic solution to the dispute. Meanwhile Azerbaijan is pursuing a policy that calls for the liberation of its lost territories by diplomatic efforts and, if this proves impossible, by the use of force.

(M. AYDIN)

their respective national groups. This rendered the situation even more complicated.

The situation in the northern Caucasus within the borders of the Russian Federation was even more complex. The last Soviet census of 1989 revealed that there were nineteen officially recognized autochthonous national groups alongside Russian diasporas as well as Kazakhs, Nogays, and other minorities. With this population pattern mode, the northern Caucasus was one of the most ethnically diverse regions in the world.

It was inevitable that disputes would erupt between different ethnic groups as the central authority weakened. Turkey's effectiveness and position in the region would be closely tied to its response to these disputes. The conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan over Nagorno Karabakh in particular revealed how easily Turkey could be drawn into such dangerous disputes in its immediate vicinity (Box 7-30).

D. Relations with Azerbaijan in the Context of Nagorno Karabakh

The ethnic strife that erupted in the Caucasus in the aftermath of the Cold War presented Turkey with a no-win situation. In the Karabakh conflict, Turkish public opinion was fully behind Azerbaijan; and as long as hostilities continued in the region, the Turkish government was under pressure not to remain neutral. Direct intervention, however, was bound to have fateful consequences for Turkey in the Caucasus region and would seriously affect Turkish relations not just with Russia but also with NATO, the U.S., and Europe. In this situation, the government was torn between the pressure of public opinion sympathizing with the Azerbaijanis and the desire to remain neutral in order to be able to act as mediator. The dispute constituted an obstacle to Turkey's efforts to resolve the questions with Armenians that were rooted in history, while it also created difficulties in tracing the route to be followed by petroleum pipelines. The clashes sharpened Azerbaijan's nationalistic rhetoric. This, in turn, drove Iran (fearful that its own Azerbaijani minority would be stirred by this rhetoric) to support Armenia in the conflict, which was an additional complication for Turkey.

The question of Karabakh started with tension between the two communities and street clashes in 1988 and escalated into full-scale warfare in 1991. The only country that gave full support to Azerbaijan from the beginning was Turkey. Ankara's policy with respect to Karabakh colored Turkey's relations with Armenia and cramped its Caucasus policies in general.

In the international arena, Turkey stood side-by-side with Azerbaijan and took part in the embargo imposed by Azerbaijan on Armenia, although it was not consistently strict in its implementation. Turkey also avoided diplomatic relations with Yerevan. Although Turkey's actions were partly the result of historical events that still rankled, Ankara kept repeating that relations could not be normalized so long as Armenia continued to occupy Azerbaijani territories. Ankara considered the occupation to be a very serious transgression. Turkey's support of Azerbaijan did not lead to the provision of significant military aid; nor was there any question of direct involvement in armed conflict.

Turkey recognized Azerbaijan's independence on 9 November 1991, one month before recognizing the other Soviet republics. Despite this, Azerbaijan's internal turmoil prevented relations from developing rapidly. At this stage, Turkey was seeking to avoid basing its relations on a single individual, Ebulfez Echibey. In fact, Turkey was uncomfortable with his rhetoric based on Turkish unity. Rumors were circulating in the press that Elchibey wanted to see a federation between Turkey and Azerbaijan. This led to concern over the possibility of conflict with Russia and Iran. It should be noted that Azerbaijan never made a formal appeal to Turkey to intervene in the Karabakh conflict.

In this period Turkey concluded a number of economic agreements with Azerbaijan, started TV broadcasts beamed to Azerbaijan, and supported Baku's efforts to change to the Latin alphabet by sending books and typewriters. Turkey's standing in Azerbaijan, however, was in large measure determined by Ankara's approach to the Karabakh issue.

In the early phase of the conflict, Turkey sought to remain neutral so that it could act as a mediator. Armenia was not averse to this role at first, and Turkish diplomats and especially foreign minister Hikmet Çetin undertook numerous diplomatic missions to the region and to European capitals and made a major effort to get the issue included in the OSCE's agenda. Çetin sought to bring the issue to the attention of Western governments and especially the American government. Prime Minister Demirel was in favor of a more cautious approach, however, declaring that Turkey had no legal grounds for intervening in the matter and that, in any case, Azerbaijan had not made a formal request for Turkey to get involved. Acting at the request of Armenia, Demirel sent a message in November 1991 to Hasan Hasanov, the prime minister of Azerbaijan, calling for restraint in order to avoid exacerbating regional tensions. Baku interpreted this as a mediation effort on the part of Turkey. In his reply two weeks later, Hasanov indicated his satisfaction over Turkey's mediation initiative. This compelled the Turkish MFA to issue a statement denying that Turkey intended to act as mediator. When Azerbaijan's president Ayaz Muttalibov visited Ankara on 23 and 24 January 1992, he was informed that Turkey could serve as mediator if both parties agreed to this.

But Turkey's even-handed efforts would not last for long. In particular, certain remarks made by president Turgut Özal cast doubts in the minds of Armenians that Turkey could be a neutral broker. When Azerbaijani civilians were massacred by Armenians in Hojali in February 1992, there was a public outcry in Turkey for intervention. Right-wing groups organized public rallies, and even some influential people (including the president at the time, Turgut Özal) argued that Turkey "had the right to intervene" (Financial Times Report on Turkey, 7 May 1993, p. 5). Despite Demirel's statements to the contrary, these demands and public outrage brought Turkey's efforts to act as honest broker to an abrupt end.

When Armenia started occupying Azerbaijan's territory beyond Karabakh and the plight of Azerbaijani refugees was displayed on TV screens, a powerful current erupted in the country and the government was publicly blamed for being ineffective. This led to an overtly pro-Azerbaijani stance in Ankara. Media criticism that Turkey's wish to play a leadership role in the region following the Cold War was in direct conflict with its ineffective position on Karabakh overlapped with the clamor from all the opposition parties that the government was passive while "our Azerbaijani brethren are being slaughtered." Among the parties, the Nationalist Action Party stood out in its opposition to the government's policies. The MHP had been calling for intervention since February 1991 and now expressed the view that Turkey could not remain silent as more of Azerbaijan's territory came under Armenian occupation. For the MHP, the time for military intervention had come. Ecevit (the leader of

Box 7-31. Turkey's Historical Links with Azerbaijan and Nakhechevan

After the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917, the Turks of Azerbaijan began to distance themselves from the Russians and declared the independence of the Democratic Republic of Azerbaijan in May 1918. The new state sought the protection of the Ottoman Empire, and the Ottoman army entered Baku in September 1918. When the Ottomans lost World War I and signed the Armistice of Mudros the next month, the Turkish forces were obliged to evacuate Baku.

While Turkey was engaged in the War of Liberation, the Red Army occupied Baku in April 1920 and brought the Caucasus under Soviet control. On 16 March 1921 Turkey signed the Treaty of Friendship and Fraternity in Moscow with the Soviet administration. Article 3 of the treaty declared that Nakhechevan would be an autonomous region under Azerbaijan's protection and that this status of protector could not be transferred to a third party. This arrangement may be seen as a concession made by the Soviets, who regarded Turkey as an ally at the time. Article 5 of the Treaty of Friendship signed by Turkey, Armenia, Azerbaijan, and Georgia at Kars on 13 October 1921 declared that the parties had agreed that Nakhechevan would be an autonomous region under the protection of Azerbaijan.

When the clashes in Karabakh between Azerbaijan and Armenia threatened to spill over into Nakhechevan in the early 1990s, certain groups in Turkey declared that Turkey was a guarantor of the region's status, which could not be changed without its consent. The treatles of 1921 do not allow for such an interpretation, however, But since the Treaty of Moscow states explicitly that "the right to protect cannot be transferred to a third state," Turkey would have the right to object if Nakhechevan became attached to a third state such as Armenia.

(M. Aydın)

the Democratic Left Party) claimed that Turkey's passive stance would damage its prestige in the Caucasus and Central Asia while Mesut Yılmaz (the leader of the Motherland Party) declared on 4 March 1992 that Turkey should deploy forces to the Armenian border and claimed that Turkey had guaranteed the status of Nakhechevan and Karabakh (Box 7-31).

It was inevitable that the Turkish government would succumb to the pressure of public opinion. On 2 March it announced that all aircraft on their way to Armenia through Turkish airspace would have to land in Turkey to ensure that they were not ferrying arms to that country. Subsequently the transit of aid material from the West to Armenia was stopped. In the meantime Demirel had shifted his position. In an interview with the Washington Post on 19 March, he declared that he felt himself under pressure to pursue a tougher policy and added that it was wrong to assume that military intervention was out of the question. When the president of the Assembly of the Autonomous Region of Nakhechevan, Heydar Aliyev, called on Turkey to send troops after Lachin was captured by the Armenians on 17 May and attacks against Nakhechevan began to increase, however, Turkey confined itself to bringing the issue to the attention of the UN, the OSCE, and NATO.

Notwithstanding these developments, Turkey kept its channels of communication with Armenia open and strove to keep its bilateral relations from being adversely affected by current events. The border was sometimes opened to allow humanitarian assistance to get through to Armenia. In September 1992 Turkey consented to the sale of 100,000 tons of wheat to that country. An agreement was signed in November 1992 to supply Armenia with 300 million kilowatt hours of electric power to alleviate the shortage there. The Turkish opposition described this agreement as a betrayal of Azerbaijan, however, and the government felt compelled to annul the agreement in January 1993 before it could be implemented.

At this time, peace talks were taking place between Azerbaijan and Armenia within the framework of the OSCE Minsk Group, designed to resolve the question of Nagorno Karabakh. Turkey had sent a delegation to Yerevan to persuade the Armenian government that settling this question would contribute to the improvement of bilateral relations with Turkey But these efforts were frustrated when the Armenians daptured the Kelbedjer region linking Karabakh to Armeria on 3 April. President Özal then declared that this question would never be settled if "Turkey did not display its teeth" (http://query .nytimes.com/gst/fullpage.html?res=9FoCE5DB163oF 93BA25757CoA965958260&sec=&spon=&pagewanted =all). In contrast to Özal's more interventionist approach, Demirel turned down Azerbaijan's request for helicopters to evacuate the wounded and civilians on the grounds that this might lead to a direct confrontation with Russia (Bölükbaşı, p. 85). When Özal visited Baku on 14 April, he revealed his differences with Demirel once again when he declared that "Turkey would always stand shoulder to shoulder with Azerbaijan" and added that "Turkey's patience should not be tested" (Ayın Tarihi, 14 April 1993).

The process triggered by the fall of Kelbedjer led to a coup in Azerbaijan on 4 June 1993, resulting in the overthrow of Elchibey's government and his replacement by Heydar Aliyev. This was seen by many quarters in Turkey and abroad as Turkey's failure to maintain a friendly administration in power in Azerbaijan. Some commentators in Turkey saw the overthrow of Elchibey as the end of the so-called Turkish model. Russia had already intervened in Georgia and Lithuania to help bring leaders of the former Soviet administration to power. By openly supporting Col. Suret Huseyinov, the architect of the coup, Russia had demonstrated its ability to intervene directly also in Azerbaijan's internal affairs. Meanwhile Turkey had prepared a diplomatic plan of action on 7 June, when the rebellion was still confined to Gence. It was only able to send a delegation to Baku on 15 June, however, when it had became too late to change the course of events. When foreign minister Hikmet Çekin was questioned by the press on this issue, he declared that Turkey was not to blame for Elchibey's downfall and asked the journalists: "Should we have created a second Cyprus question?" This revealed the thinking of his government (Sabah, 22 June 1993).

Elchibey's Turkist rhetoric was creating antagonism in Iran and Russia and causing uneasiness in the Turkic republics. Some claimed that it was also making Turkey uncomfortable. As a result, they concluded that Ankara had been looking around for a more moderate leader in Azerbaijan and did nothing to prevent Aliyev's assumption of power even if it was not directly involved in Elchibey's overthrow. Turkey's uneasiness about the coup, however, was quite clear from a letter from Foreign Minister Çetin on 24 June (at a time when it was too late to change anything) to the UN secretary-general, describing the coup that brought Aliyev to power as "a military rebellion aimed at overthrowing the legitimate government" (Ayın Tarihi, 26 June 2003). The letter went on to add that Turkey would "continue to support Azerbaijan's legitimate representatives." According to certain Turkish and Azerbaijan newspapers, Elchibey was still in contact with Turks in his hiding place. But in due course Turkey's attitude changed, when it became obvious that Aliyev's hold on power was firm and that Elchibey was unlikely to recover power in the short term. At that point Çetin saw nothing wrong in remarking to the press that Aliyev was in power on the basis of an election that was carried out under democratic procedures.

Ankara's inability to keep in power a friendly administration in Azerbaijan caused Turkey to lose standing in the region. Similarly, Turkey was unable to muster the courage to intervene on behalf of Armenian president Ter-Petrossian when he was facing difficulties in later years, and there were accusations that Turkey had not provided adequate support to the pro-Turkish ethnic Uzbek general Rashid Dostum in Afghanistan in his struggle with the Taliban. Inevitably, the realization took hold in the region that having close relations with Turkey did not constitute a guarantee that one could remain in power. But it should also be noted that Turkey's powerful support of Georgia helped keep Shevardnadze in power in Tbilisi for several years.

Aliyev's assumption of power was originally perceived as a Russian success, but it soon become apparent that this was not quite so. Although Aliyev made conciliatory gestures to Russia like joining the CIS, he was absolutely against the redeployment of Russian troops on Azerbaijan's territory. Aliyev's policies were far from satisfying Russia, which became clear when Moscow was implicated in the coup attempt against him carried out in October 1994. It also became apparent that Aliyev would depart from Elchibey's policy of giving priority to Turkey in his foreign relations. Aliyev would use the Turkish card when it suited him; and when it did not, he was capable of turning away from Turkey. In September 1993, two months after assuming power, Aliyev suspended the agreements that the Elchibey administration had concluded with Turkey. This resulted in the dismissal of 1,600 Turkish military experts serving in Azerbaijan and the reintroduction of a visa requirement for Turkish nationals traveling to Azerbaijan. Although there was reversal of this policy one year later when Aliyev embarked on improving Turkish-Azerbaijani relations once again, it was obvious that bilateral relations would no longer be as smooth as in the past.

The first indication of improved relations came on 19 September 1993, when minister of foreign affairs Hikmet Cetin visited Baku. Aliyev announced that he had selected the Turkish route for the pipeline that would carry Azerbaijani oil to world markets. He also announced that Turkey would resume the training of Azerbaijani military personnel. Subsequently, Aliyev visited Turkey in February 1994 and established a good rapport with President Demirel. His speech at the Turkish parliament on 9 February, which emphasized the importance that he attached to the relations between the two "brotherly countries" (http://aliyevheritage.org/cgi-bin/ecms/vis.pl?=001&p =1175&n=000013&g=), dispelled most of the mistrust among Turkish decision-makers. But there were still some elements in Turkey that did not trust Aliyev and preferred the Turkish nationalism preached by Elchibey. This became manifest in March 1995, when it was revealed that Turkish nationals were also implicated in an unsuccessful plot to unseat Aliyev. But Turkey was by now convinced that chaos in Azerbaijan would be detrimental to Turkey's overall Caucasus policy, and Elchibey was forgotten in this context. Aliyev was so fully accepted as Azerbaijan's legitimate leader that Demirel himself warned Aliyev as soon as the government became aware of the coup attempt in Baku. With this early warning Aliyev succeeded in foiling the plot. Nevertheless, he was very upset that Turkish nationals were involved in the plot against him and expressed his disappointment on numerous occasions, including in a speech to the TGNA.

The Karabakh conflict revealed how Turkey would react to potential ethnic disputes in the Caucasus. Ankara would strive to find an early solution to the conflict without becoming involved directly. It would do this not through bilateral contracts but by drawing the attention of international public opinion and international organizations to the region.

This conflict also showed how difficult it was for Turkey to be evenhanded in ethnic conflicts within the former Soviet Union when one of the parties happened to be Turkic or Muslim. Turkey chose to remain aloof when the Gagauz in Moldova and the Abkhaz in Georgia began agitating for independence. The strained relations between Chechen separatists and the Russian Federation, however, would lead to serious questions for Turkey.

From the Great Game to Regional Rivalry (1995–2000)

In the five years following the disintegration of the USSR in 1991 when it attempted to establish its influence in the Caucasus and Central Asia, Turkey ran into all kinds of problems and had numerous disappointments. These developments revealed that Turkey's economic means and political experience were not sufficient to assume the role it was seeking for itself in the region. It was clear that the time had come to formulate regional policy on a more realistic basis. Turkey was not alone in attempting to assert its influence. The struggle with the other contenders had economic, political, ideological, and religious dimensions and could easily lead to conflict with Iran and Russia in particular. This was an important factor for Turkey when it came to reformulating its regional policy.

1. Relations with Armenia

When Armenia became independent after the dissolution of the Soviet Union, Turkey recognized its independence on 16 December 1991 without any reservation and also furnished humanitarian assistance to relieve Armenia's economic hardship. In fact, even before the USSR collapsed, Turkey's ambassador in Moscow, Volkan Vural, went to Yerevan in April 1991 to discuss ways for developing bilateral relations with Armenia. This was the first high-level visit to Yerevan (Newspot, 11 April 1991). During this visit, it was agreed to establish direct border trade between the two countries, open the highway to traffic, and start direct flights. The draft of an Agreement on Good Neighborliness was also prepared (Hürriyet, 12 April 1991). Both sides believed that the events that took place in the last years of the Ottoman Empire should be allowed to fade into the past.

Subsequently, when Turkey sent exploratory delegations to Central Asia and the Caucasus in September 1991, Yerevan was not left out. At this time, public opinion in Turkey was turning negative toward Armenia because of the Karabakh question, which had begun to fester in 1988. Despite this, the Turkish MFA held the view that Armenia's independence should be recognized and supported. In this context, Turkey sent Armenia an invitation to become a founding member of the Black Sea Economic Cooperation process signed on 25 June 1992 even though Armenia was not a littoral state of the Black Sea.

The leader of the Armenian National Movement that led the country to independence was Levon Ter-Petrossian, who became its first head of state. In the height of the conditions prevailing in the Caucasus in the aftermath of the Cold War and the problems confronting independent Armenia, Ter-Petrossian concluded that Armenia should review the basic assumptions upon which relations with Turkey were based. The response of the Turkish MFA to this approach was receptive and positive. Although the rhetoric of genocide had become an existential ideology for the Armenian diaspora, cut off from the realities of the Caucasus and following events in Armenia from a distance, the Yerevan administration had to grapple with the daily realities of the region. For this administration it was more rational to secure a rapprochement with Turkey, the link to Europe, than to dwell on events that took place in the early years of the twentieth century (Box 7-32). Ter-Petrossian held that, to achieve full independence from Russia, Armenia should discard historic antagonisms and seek the normalization of relations with Turkey. This was dictated by Realpolitik (International Herald Tribune, 25 May 1991). Similarly, by developing relations with Yerevan, Turkey could secure direct links to Central Asia and free itself of the difficulties created by the Armenian diaspora, especially in the U.S. At this stage, public opinion in Turkey and Armenia and in the diaspora had not established effective control over national policies and the decision-makers in both Ankara and Yerevan were formulating their policies on the basis of pragmatism and the dictates of geography.

As a consequence, the Ter-Petrossian administration did not comply with the terms of article 11 of the Declaration of Independence adopted by the Armenian

Box 7-32. The Mentality of the Armenian Diaspora

The Armenians are a people of the diaspora. At present they number about 6.5 million people all over the world. Of these, 3.4 million live in Armenia, 1.1 million in Russia, 1 million in the U.S., 250,000 in France, 45,000 in Canada, 200,000 in Iran, 200,000 in Lebanon, 70,000 in Syria, and 65,000 in Argentina. About 65,000 Armenians live in Turkey today.

Three elements determine the national interest and the state policies of Armenia. (1) the Armenians living abroad (the diaspora), (2) the Armenians of Armenia, (3) the Armenians of Nagomo Karabakh. These three groups have differing interests and mindsets. But they are all reconciled on the Armenian national ideology based on Haydat (Armenian Cause) developed by the nationalist Dashnaksutyun (Revolutionary Armenian Federation) in the latter years of the nineteenth century.

Furthermore, another element strengthens the bonds of solldarity within the diaspora. This is the strong and ever-present sense of victimization nurtured by the Haydat ideology, which is unique to the Armenian communities. The Haydat doctrine originated from the events that took place in the Ottoman Empire from the end of the nineteenth century to World War Litt drew its strength from developments outside Armenia in the early years.

of the twentieth century and the terrorist acts against Turkish nationals by various secret Armenian organizations and in particular ASALA. The doctrine has three basic goals: (1) to recover historic Armenian lands and establish the nation-state of "United Armenia"; (2) to regroup the Armenian communities spread throughout the globe in these lands; (3) to set up a social welfare state on these lands.

After the establishment of an independent Armenia in 1991, the Dashnak Party continued to draw its strength from the diaspora, which was cut off from the realities of Armenia. After the overthrow of Ter-Petrossian, the Dashnak movement gained strength in Armenia and the Haydat doctrine came to the fore once again with even more fervor. After the overthrow of Ter-Petrossian, the Dashnak movement gained strength in Armenia and the Haydat doctrine came to the fore once again. With the election of Serzh Sarkissian to the Presidency and his conciliatory attitude towards rapproachment with Turkey, protests among the Diaspora took place against him and his policies.

(M. AYDIN)

Parliament on 23 August 1991 and refrained from raising the issue of genocide in the international arena. Article 11 read as follows: "The Republic of Armenia shall support the efforts to secure the international recognition of the genocide perpetrated in 1915 in Ottoman Turkey and Western Armenia." The administration also resisted the pressure exerted by the nationalists and subsequently prevented this text from being included in the Armenian Constitution adopted in 1995. Furthermore, when acceding to the CSCE in 1992, it accepted the condition for membership that there should be no claims for revision of frontiers. It was even said that the Ter-Petrossian administration had asked the leadership of the Armenian diaspora in the U.S. in December 1991 to tone down its anti-Turkish activities in the U.S. Congress.

The reference to Turkish territories as Western Armenia contained in the Declaration of Independence found its way into the Armenian Constitution, which in its preamble mentioned "[r]ecognizing the national aspirations contained in the Declaration of Independence." This was interpreted in Turkey as opening the door to eventual territorial claims and demands for compensation (Şükrü Elekdağ, in Milliyet, 15 June 1998). When the Armenian Parliament announced in February 1991 that it did not recognize the Turkish-Armenian border as traced in the Treaty of Kars (Turkish Times, 12 February 1991), Turkey declared in the spring of 1992 that it would not establish diplomatic relations with Armenia until it received a written notice from Armenia that it recognized the existing Turkish-Armenian border. Furthermore, no Armenian leader, including Ter-Petroassion, ever indicated that Yerevan was giving up its claims against Turkey with reference to the dream of a "Greater Armenia" or abandoning the claims for compensation arising from the allegations of genocide in 1915. On the contrary, in the early months of 2001 the Armenian diaspora took initiatives in a number of countries to secure international recognition of the allegations of genocide. On 12 March 2001 the chairman of the Human Rights Committee of the Armenian Presidency, Paruyr Hayrikian, called on Russia to denounce the 1921 Treaties of Moscow and Kars and demanded the return of Kars and Ardahan to Armenia, because "their award to Turkey under the terms of these Treaties was unjustified" (Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, "Armenia Report: Presidential Commission Head Demands Return of Nakhechevan, Kars, Ardahan," 9 March 2001) (Box 7-33).

At the time, Turkey gave signals that it was receptive to any move toward rapprochement that might come from Yerevan by allowing humanitarian aid materials destined for Armenia to cross its territory. Another signal was the expansion of the port of Trabzon to allow its use by Armenia, whose economy was in serious trouble because of the embargo imposed by Azerbaijan. In the early part of 1992 Armenia invited a number of Turkish businesspeople to Yerevan and sought their intercession to secure the use of the port by Armenia. After this, a group of Armenian entrepreneurs, including some Americans of Armenian extraction, came to Turkey to discuss this issue with Foreign

Box 7-33. From the Loyal Nation to ASALA and the Armenian Bills

Within the system of nationalities living in the Ottoman Empire, the Armenians formed an ethnic/religious group that existed peacefully. Some were so Ottomanized that they spoke Turkish in their homes. This group, thus called the "loyal nation/community," began to get restless toward the end of the nineteenth century, however, as a result of both internal and external dynamics. As a consequence of the breakdown in the system of land tenure and the disruption caused by the Russian war of 1877–78, the pressure of Kurds and Circassians on the eastern Anatolian Armenian peasants began to intensify. Heavy taxes imposed on them both by the central government and by the local Kurdish chieftains worsened their already exploited condition. The Armenians Who grew wealthy through handicrafts and commerce were drawing the envy of the masses, who had not yet achieved the level of mercantilism. Not only religious differences were creating friction; but the Muslim-mentality that regarded the non-Muslims as inferior. proved to be quite detrimental for the Armenians in this setting. There was also the discontent caused by Abdulhamid's failure to implement the promised egalitarian reforms.

In addition to these internal dynamics, external factors were at play: the ideology of nationalism generated by the French Revolution that began to reach the eastern region of the empire; the shocks created by the successes of nationalist movements in the Balkans, the influence of the Russian popular terrorist movement known as Narodnik, the Western policy of interference using the minorities as a pretext for interventionism, the activities of missionaries; and Russian exploitation of the Armenian cause after the 1878 treaties of San Stefano and Berlin.

In this environment, the leftist Hinchak movement came into being in Geneva in 1887 and the bourgeois Dashnak movement emerged in Tbilisi in 1890. Both movements were involved in terror activities partly as set defense and partly to attract the West's attention to further their nationalist goals. To suppress the rebellions in eastern Anatolia. Abdulhamid created the infamous Hamidiye Regiments made up of Sunni Kurds. When World War I broke out and some of the Armenians began to support the Russian army, the tension between the Turkish nationalist government of the Union and Progress Party and Armenian nationalists reached a breaking point. This led to the forcible deportation of all the Armenians, with the exception of those living in Izmir and Istanbul, under the Deportation Law of 1915 (see Box 1.2 in Section 1).

The painful memories of this deportation during which hun dreds of thousands died or were killed were constantly kept alive by the Armenian diaspora. Having failed to register any progress in their political struggle since the 1930s, the world's Armenians launched a process of assassinations and terror, starting with the murder of two Turkish diplomats in Los Angeles on 27 January 1973. In the course of this campaign, forty Turkish diplomats and nationals were killed and fifteen injured in thirty-eight cities located in twenty-one countries. In addition, four non-Turks were killed and sixty-six injured. The majority of these acts were perpetrated by the Armée Secrète Arménienne pour la Libération de l'Arménie (ASALA). When ASALA attacked the Turkish Airlines at the Orly airport in Paris in 1983, causing the deaths of French people as well, the organization lost strength. ASALA's activities ceased, also in part because it had in fact attained the objective of attracting attention to its cause through terrorism

The diaspora then changed its strategy of wearing Turkey down by concentrating its efforts on securing the passage of bills in local assembles and national parliaments on the subject of the Armenian Genocide. This new strategy was able to make considerable headway due to a number of factors. The American and European legislators who had been under the influence of long years of Armenian discourse were ready to please their Armenian constituents to secure their votes. The Dashnak Party had come to power in Armenia as a result of the dire economic situation there and now wielded more influence. Because of human rights violations, Turkey's international standing was very low in the 1990s, and its policy based only on the rhetoric that "the allegations of genocide are lies" was very ineffective and even frustrating in the West

(B. ORAN)

Minister Çetin (International Herald Tribune, 31 March 1992). Although these discussions (which were conducted with Yerevan's approval) did not lead to concrete results, Turkey agreed to let 100,000 tons of wheat from the EU be delivered to Armenia through Turkish territory. Turkey also allowed Armenia to draw electric power from the Turkish grid when that country was facing a power shortage. These agreements demonstrated that relations between the two countries could develop along a logical course. But Turkey was torn between two different viewpoints on the issue of relations with Armenia.

One group, led by president Turgut Özal, held the view that the collapse of the USSR presented Turkey with great opportunities in the Caucasus and Central Asia. This group felt that to seize these opportunities Turkey must pursue an active policy and should openly support Azerbaijan in the Caucasus. The other group maintained that developing relations with Armenia (starting with economic cooperation) would help pry Armenia loose from Russia's grip and bring it closer to Turkey. Such a policy would also render Turkey more effective on the question of Nagorno Karabakh (Bölükbaşı, p. 85). Demirel defended his policy of allowing Armenia to receive wheat through Turkey by declaring that, aside from humanitarian considerations, this action was in Turkey's national interest.

When the balance in the region shifted in Armenia's favor in the middle of 1992 and the clashes in Karabakh intensified, however, this led Turkey to suspend all bilateral contacts with Yerevan. Simultaneously, Turkish public opinion was becoming aroused. Demonstrations began to be organized, at which there were cries for Turkey to intervene in Armenia. Demirel resisted these demands by declaring that the state could not be governed from the streets and pointed out that allowing the Karabakh dispute to be turned into a Muslim-Christian issue would create an international bloc that would hurt Azerbaijan and Turkey most of all. Nevertheless, the pressure of public opinion made itself felt in the sphere of bilateral relations, especially after Armenia went beyond the borders of Karabakh and began to occupy large swaths of Azerbaijani territory. Public pressure prevented Turkey from following precedent and establishing an embassy in Yerevan even though it had done so in all of the former Soviet republics.

In the meantime Armenia concluded an agreement with Russia on 30 September 1992, which granted Russia the right to establish military bases in Armenia and to deploy troops to guard its frontiers. This was a sign that the Karabakh question had the potential to drag Turkey into a confrontation with Russia. This was followed in 1993 by a warning from General Yevgeny Shaposhnikov, commander-in-chief of the CIS Armed Forces, when he declared that a direct involvement by Turkey in the conflict between Armenian and Azerbaijan "might lead to the Third World War" (Ehteshami and Murphy, pp. 522–23).

When Turkey began to be accused of breaking the embargo imposed by Azerbaijan at the end of 1992, Ankara slowed down the pace of the delivery of EU wheat to Armenia. In January 1993 the agreement to furnish electric power to Armenia was canceled even before it had been implemented. When Armenia occupied Kelbedjer in Azerbaijan in April 1993, this dealt the final blow to the attempts to bring Turkey closer to Armenia. Although it was frequently repeated that Turkish-Armenian relations must not be linked to the question of Nagorno Karabakh or to the state of relations between Azerbaijan and Armenia, it was inevitable that the evacuation of one-fifth of Azerbaijan's territory under Armenian occupation would become a precondition for the dialogue between Ankara and Yerevan to resume.

Following the occupation of Kelbedjer, Turkey announced that in April 1993 all deliveries of merchandise, including humanitarian aid to Armenia through Turkish territory or airspace, would be stopped. The justification for this action was that these deliveries to Armenia had the effect of bolstering its war effort.

When it appeared that Armenia might extend its operations to Nakhechevan, the news that Turkey was deploying forces to the frontier and getting ready to intervene spread alarm in Armenia. President Özal's statements such as "the Armenians should be given a fright" and "what if some bombs fell on the Armenian side of the border in the course of military exercises in the region" also put a strain on Turkey's relations with the U.S. and Russia (Financial Times Report on Turkey, 7 May 1993, p. 5).

As Armenia became directly involved in the Karabakh dispute and Turkey blocked its border with Armenia and began to side openly with Azerbaijan, bilateral relations between the two countries came to an end. Henceforth the contacts with Armenia would continue solely within the framework of international organizations like OSCE and BSEC.

When President Özal died in May 1993, the Armenian president was among the foreign dignitaries attending the funeral. In the course of this visit, President Demirel brought together the president of Armenia and Azerbaijan: Ter-Petrossian and Elchibey shook hands for the first time. Although this tripartite meeting produced no results, the more radical and more pro-Azerbaijan Caucasus policy of Özal was no longer pursued and Turkey appeared ready to play the role of mediator to secure the resolution of the Karabakh question. Within a short time, Turkey submitted a tripartite plan for the settlement of the dispute that was prepared in collaboration with the U.S. and Russia. Although all the parties to the conflict were in agreement with the proposed formula, it could not be implemented after the administration of Elchibey was overthrown in Baku. When Armenia took advantage of the chaos in Azerbaijan to extend its military gains on the ground, the Turkish initiative came to an end.

Thus bilateral relations with Armenia were interrupted once again. As Azerbaijan's losses on the battlefield increased, Turkey's statements got tougher. When Armenia appeared to be poised to invade Nakhechevan, Prime Minister Çiller declared that she would seek the authorization of the TGNA to declare war if Armenian violated the Kars Treaty and invaded Nakhechevan (see Box 7-31 above).

Relations became even more strained when the Turkish press printed stories about Armenian support for the PKK and said that training camps were being set up on Armenian and occupied Azerbaijani soil. After this, Turkey's support for Azerbaijan, especially in international forums, became more uninhibited. Starting in the summer of 1994, Turkey began to stress that in order to guarantee Azerbaijan's territorial integrity Turkish forces should take part in any future peacekeeping operation in the region.

ilikaninking managan managan para para pangan pangan pangan pangan pangan pangan pangan pangan pangan pangan p

The international atmosphere improved, however, when a cease-fire was signed by Azerbaijan and Armenia on 12 May 1994. There was also international pressure on Turkey to slacken the isolation of Armenia. Some members of the U.S. Congress wanted to extend to Turkey the terms of the American legislation adopted in October 1992 that would bar U.S. aid to any country that prevented the delivery of humanitarian assistance to a country in need. In view of these developments, Ankara, in consultation with Azerbaijan, decided to reopen air corridor H-50 to allow aircraft to fly to Armenia through Turkish airspace after obtaining Azerbaijan's consent.

In the meantime Armenia was feeling pressured in the region, and its economy was suffering. This led it to call on Turkey to uncouple bilateral relations from Armenian-Azerbaijani relations and from the question of Karabakh. Armenia also sought to ease Turkey's concerns in relation to the diaspora's allegations of genocide. Ter-Petrossian never took an overt stand against such allegations. But he did put an end to the activities of the Dashnaktsutyun Party in December 1994. This was the party that wanted to keep the genocide issue permanently on the agenda. Ter-Petrossian also forced the resignation of his foreign minister, Raffi Hovannisian, a member of the diaspora and a U.S. citizen, for bringing up the issue of genocide when Ter-Petrossian was in Turkey. This was a demonstration of how far he was willing to go to normalize Armenia's relations with Turkey. But at this point the government in Turkey was under the influence of public opinion, which was incensed over Karabakh. Furthermore, it felt that Turkey's effectiveness in the Caucasus could be enhanced by wholeheartedly supporting Azerbaijan and decided to ignore Armenia's overtures over the issue of genocide.

Subsequently, when the government changed in Ankara, Turkey's policy toward Armenia softened. In the spring of 1996 prime minister Mesut Yılmaz announced that Turkey could reopen its border with Armenia if Azerbaijan and Armenia could reach an agreement on the principles under which the question of Karabakh would be resolved. In September 1994, after the signing of the "agreement of the century" by Azerbaijan and the multinational oil companies, Turkey unexpectedly declared that the path of the proposed pipeline to deliver Azerbaijani oil to world markets might be through Armenia. This proposal was made conditional on a resolution of the Karabakh dispute. It was Turkey's hope that this approach might induce Armenia to be more conciliatory on the issue. But Yılmaz was soon forced to reconsider this policy under pressure from both Azerbaijan and domestic public opinion. Shortly thereafter, the Motherland Party and True Path Party coalition collapsed and a new government was formed by the Welfare Party and True Path Party under the leadership of Erbakan. This signified that Turkey would no longer be able to come up with any new initiatives toward Yerevan. After the signing of the "agreement of the century," the pro-Armenian policy of the U.S.

began to shift and Armenia became progressively more isolated. In these circumstances, Armenia moved closer to Russia in the area of security and an Iran-Armenia-Russia axis began to emerge in the Caucasus. Given that Turkey was in competition with Iran and Russia on the question of pipeline routes, this situation made the deadlock between Ankara and Yerevan worse.

In 1997 Armenia formalized its alliance with Russia by signing the Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation, and Mutual Help. It subsequently signed an agreement that would allow 5,000 Russian troops to be stationed on Armenian territory. In this way Yerevan chose its place in the growing competition in the Caucasus. Russia deployed a squadron of MIG-29s to Armenia in December 1998 and deployed the Zenith S-300 air-defense system at the Gumri military base in February 1999, substantially altering the military balance in the region. This created a new source of tension in Turkish-Armenian relations.

The Effect of the Diaspora in Armenia's Foreign Policy and the Allegations of Genocide

The question of Karabakh had already spoiled Turkish-Armenian relations. To this was added the burden of the diasporas, especially in the U.S. and Western Europe, which kept the issue of the allegations of genocide alive. In these conditions it became impossible to place bilateral relations on a rational basis.

When Armenia gained its independence, the Armenian diaspora took charge of developments in the home country and its political orientation. There was an active Armenian diaspora in the U.S., Russia, Iran, France, Lebanon, and even South America. After the Yerevan earthquake of 1988, the diaspora organized a worldwide humanitarian effort to come to Armenia's assistance. After independence, the diaspora Armenians were reluctant to invest in their homeland because of the political uncertainty and the state of war. Instead they concentrated their efforts on acting as a lobby to secure political backing for Armenia in the West and in particular in the U.S. (see Box 7-32 above). After the Cold War, Washington concentrated its effort in the region mainly on Georgia and Armenia. The 1 million members of the Armenian community in the U.S. were highly influential in the formulation of U.S. policy toward Armenia. As a result, Armenia received the highest amount of U.S. aid on a per-capita basis among all the former Soviet republics. In absolute terms, it ranked fourth among the recipients of U.S. aid, coming after Russia, Ukraine, and Kazakhstan.

Shortly after Armenia's independence, the diaspora had become a complementary element of Armenia's foreign policy and played a key role in reinforcing its political and economic ties with the U.S. and Europe. To cite an example, the Armenian National Council of America (ANCA) responded to Azerbaijan's blockade of Armenia by securing the passage through the U.S. Congress of section 907 of the Freedom Support Act in October 1992. It contained the following provision: "Until Azerbaijan takes steps to demonstrate that it has ceased all attacks and embargoes on Armenia and Nagorno Karabakh," the U.S. would ban all aid to Azerbaijan. Although America's regional interests later shifted and a number of attempts were made to repeal this legislation, it was still in effect in 2003.

The diaspora was especially effective in the U.S., Russia, France, Georgia, Iran, Syria, and Lebanon and succeeded in securing the passage of resolutions through the Russian Duma and French National Assembly, acknowledging the allegations of genocide against Turkey. From 1999 to 2000 the diaspora concentrated its efforts on the issue of genocide in Sweden, Holland, the U.S., and Australia. It secured the passage of a law in France on the subject of recognizing the genocide and registered substantial gains in Sweden. In addition, the Israeli minister of education Yossi Sarid called for the inclusion of "the Armenian Genocide" in the high school curriculum, causing diplomatic tension between Turkey and Israel.

While Armenia pursued a policy line that corresponded closely with the diaspora on the international scene, domestically there were differences and clashes with the diaspora parties. The strongest party among the diaspora was the Dashnaktsutyun (Dashnak) Party, which took a hard line on the issues of Turkish-Armenian relations and Nagorno Karabakh. This party constantly ran into problems with the government during the sevenyear presidency of Ter-Petrossian. In June 1992 Dashnak declared unilateral independence in Karabakh and confronted the government with a virtual ultimatum to recognize this independence. When this ultimatum went unheeded and relations between the government and Dashnak became tense, Ter-Petrossian accused the Dashnak of secretly collaborating with the KGB (Russian Committee for State Security) and began to deport its leaders.

The effects of the Nagorno Karabakh factor in Armenia's domestic politics began to fade after the cease-fire of 1994, and the country's dire social and economic questions came to the fore. The diaspora took advantage of this situation to apply pressure on the Ter-Petrossian government. In response, Ter-Petrossian gave the order in December 1994 to suspend the activities of the Dashnak Party. He justified his action by alleging that the party had supported a terror group and contravened the law that banned parties whose members and leaders were residents of foreign countries. This was followed by imprisonment of the party's leaders. The Dashnak army, which had fought in the Karabakh conflict, was disbanded. The measures taken against the Dashnak Party caused relations with the Armenian lobby, always pursuing a hard line on the Karabakh issue, to grow ever more tense.

During the presidential election held on 21 September 1996, the Dashnak Party and other opposition group used the economic and social hardship of the Armenians as an issue to push Ter-Petrossian into a corner. These tactics drove him to resort to antidemocratic methods to win the election. This radicalized the opposition even further and led to a serious political crisis. Robert Kocharian, leader of the Armenians of Nagorno Karabakh, assumed a key role in resolving the crisis. Feeling that it would not be in Armenia's national interest, Kocharian opposed a change of government. In return, Ter-Petrossian found himself forced to share power with the Dashnak Party and Kocharian, who was very influential among the diaspora. On 20 March 1997 Kocharian took over as prime minister in Yerevan. This strange situation for Armenia, with the prime minister wielding more power than the president, led to Ter-Petrossian's resignation in November 1998.

In the election that took place after the resignation, Kocharian was elected president. His first action was to lift all the restrictions that had been imposed on the Dashnak, the party that constituted the main link between Armenia and the diaspora. With this he reinforced the weakened links between Armenia, Nagorno Karabakh, and the overseas Armenians. He also strengthened the consensus on the Armenian national interest. With the full restoration of its legal status in 1999, Dashnak became the most loyal supporter of Kocharian.

After this the Armenian lobby in the U.S. changed its tactics and, intensifying its propaganda, began to secure the passage of genocide bills in state legislatures. The lobby went on the assumption that securing its objective in some thirty states would make it easier to secure the recognition of 24 April by the federal government. By March 2001 the number of states stood at twenty-five. As a result of activities by the Armenian lobby, a bill was introduced in the legislature of New Jersey in April 2000 that called for designating the week from 15 to 21 May "Genocide Recognition Week." This bill differed in an important way from the Armenian Genocide bills of the past. It included not only the Armenians but other ethnic groups, including Kurds, that had allegedly been victims of genocide in the past century. The bill declared that genocide did not involve just the millions of Jewish victims but also Armenians, Cambodians, Tibetans, Bosnians, Kurds, Ukrainians, and the Tutsis of Rwanda. This allowed the Armenian lobby to attain its objectives with greater ease by securing the support of these other ethnic groups. As a result, the New Jersey legislature adopted the bill in March 2001.

In summary, Kocharian responded with the genocide issue to Turkey's action in advancing the resolution of the Karabakh problems as a precondition for establishing relations with Armenia. The Armenian lobby prepared the ground for pressing Turkey into a corner by establishing an alliance with the Kurdish, Assyrian, and Jewish lobbies.

Deadlock and Resolution

Aside from the question of what really transpired in the period from 1914 to 1918, the belief that the Armenians were subjected to genocide constitutes an important element in the collective identity of the modern Armenians. This belief affected the foreign policy of Armenia after it gained its independence in the following ways. First, it constituted an important obstacle to the normalization of Turkish-Armenian relations. It caused Armenia to look upon Turkey's efforts to extend its influence in the Caucasus region in the post-Cold War era with suspicion. It also made Armenia seek close cooperation with Russia to counterbalance Turkish influence in the region. In addition, it tightened its relations with Iran and Greece, which were uneasy about increasing Turkish influence at the end of the Cold War. Finally, Yeravan made its problems with Azerbaijan more intractable by identifying Azerbaijan with Turkey and thereby implicating Azerbaijan too in the genocide episode.

The Armenian National Movement under the leadership of Ter-Petrossian that emerged in the late 1980s and ran Armenia's affairs from 1990 to 1997 tried to break away from the traditional patterns of Armenian politics. Ter-Petrossian's government wanted to break free from dependence on Russia by developing Turkish-Armenian relations. According to this approach, Turkey was a large and powerful neighbor with which Armenia was bound to come to terms at some point. Modern Turkey differed from the old Ottoman Empire and pursued different objectives. Above all, Turkey had nothing to do with the Pan-Turkist and Pan-Islamist objectives that were on the agenda of the Ottoman Empire in its final years. On the contrary, Turkey was seeking integration with Europe, a goal that would facilitate a rapprochement between Armenia and Turkey. These were the views of Ter-Petrossian and his close associates.

But a number of developments intervened to prevent a quick and fundamental rapprochement between the two countries. Among these were Turkey's insistence on the need for Armenia to give up the allegations of genocide and explicitly renounce all claims on Turkish territory, which Armenia refused to do. Also, Turkey began to support Azerbaijan unconditionally on the Karabakh issue in its quest for greater influence in the regions of Central Asia and the Caucasus. The corollary of this policy was the adoption of anti-Armenian policies. The developments in the Karabakh conflict were driving Turkish public opinion against Armenia. This led to a strengthening of Turanian tendencies in Turkey, which helped inflame historical Armenian fears.

To conclude, two things must happen for Armenia to free itself from the tight spot it finds itself in and for peace and stability to take hold in the Caucasus. First, the Karabakh problems need to be resolved; and, subsequently, Turkish-Armenian relations need to be normalized. For this, Turkey should approach Armenia and help it sort out its economic difficulties. Armenia has to abandon its allegations of genocide and give up all of its territorial claims. It must apply pressure on Karabakh's Armenians to force them to end the state of war. Yerevan must respect Azerbaijan's territorial integrity and recognize its sovereignty over an autonomous Karabakh. Finally, it must stop supporting the anti-Turkish activities of the diaspora.

2. Relations with Georgia

When the USSR collapsed, Caucasus and Central Asia acquired a special place in Turkey's foreign policy; the access to and security of these regions became dependent on Georgia, which quickly turned into a strategic spring-board for Ankara. Furthermore, Georgia became Turkey's preferred route for the transport of the natural resources of these regions to global markets.

In December 1991 Turkey became the first country to recognize Georgia's independence. The historical Turkish-Georgian rivalries were quickly forgotten when foreign minister Hikmet Çetin paid a visit to Georgia on 21 May 1992 and signed the protocol that established diplomatic relations between the two countries. On 30 July 1992 Prime Minister Demirel flew to Georgia with a planeload of medicines and food to sign the Agreement on Friendship, Cooperation, and Good Neighborliness with president Eduard Shevardnadze. The agreement, consisting of fifteen articles, declared in its preamble that the parties expressed their desire to strengthen their relations based on respect for one another's sovereignty, independence, and territorial integrity and the principles of the inviolability of frontiers and noninterference in internal affairs. In the preamble, the parties referred to the Treaty of Kars (dated 13 October 1921) and confirmed their adherence to its provisions and all the other treaties and agreements concluded since then. The parties also confirmed that the Kars Treaty had irrevocably traced the borders between the two countries and that they would abide by its terms.

Turkey had fixed its eastern borders with Azerbaijan, Armenia, and Georgia at a time when these countries were under Bolshevik control. They had signed this treaty after making numerous concessions, and it was important for Turkey to know that they continued to be bound by its provisions after the collapse of the USSR. Azerbaijan and Georgia confirmed their borders with Turkey under their Agreements of Friendship, Cooperation, and Good Neighborliness, while Armenia refrained from doing so, which became another contentious issue between Armenia and Turkey.

After the declaration of its independence, Georgia ran into serious difficulties in preserving its territorial integrity. In grappling with its difficulties, Georgia was always able to count on Ankara's backing, which contributed to the rapid development of relations between the two countries. Under article 13 of the Treaty of 30 July 1992, both parties had undertaken to "prevent the activities of organizations, groups, or individuals on their territory seeking to undermine the territorial integrity or the legal order of the other party through the use of force." With this provision, Turkey was seeking to prevent the PKK from operating in Georgia and, in return, prevented the Abkhaz separatists from getting organized in Turkey. Turkey ignored the demands of people of ethnic Abkhaz extraction in Turkey and upheld the territorial integrity of Georgia in all international platforms. It also aided in seeking peaceful solutions to Georgia's difficulties in coping with its separatists. Turkey sought to be helpful in resolving the question of Abkhazia in conformity with the principle of preserving the territorial integrity of Georgia within its internationally recognized borders. The issue of Abkhazia had been instigated by Russia and flared up from time to time with Russia's connivance. Turkey approached the question by seeking to gain the trust of both contenders by providing humanitarian assistance to both the Georgians and the Abkhaz at the time of the fighting. It contributed five military personnel to the United Nations Observer Mission (UNOMIG) that went to Georgia on 21 October 1994. In addition, Ankara supported the dialogue that took place within the framework of the Geneva process of the OSCE. On 7–9 June 1999 Turkey contributed to the peace process by arranging a meeting of the two sides in İstanbul.

Within a short time after Georgia's independence, Turkey had become its principal trade partner. The volume of trade, which stood at $17.9 million in 1992, rose to $239 million in 1997 and $251.8 million in 1998. At the end of 1999 the level of Turkish investments in Georgia had reached $45 million, while the level of credits provided by the Turkish Eximbank stood at $41.5 million. In 2000 Turkey's share of Georgia's foreign trade amounted to 17.7%. The Russian share was 15.4%, the German share 8.4%, the Azerbaijani share 7.6%, and the U.S. share 7.5%. Turkey became an important alternative to Russia, which was using its trade ties with Georgia as a vehicle for exerting political pressure. In 2001 Russia imposed a visa requirement for Georgian travelers, causing hardship for many Georgians who were employed in Russia. To lift this requirement, Moscow was demanding that Georgia join the union between Russia and Belarus or, failing that, the Russian-sponsored Eurasian Union. Georgia sought alternative markets and employment outlets in Turkey. During his visit to Turkey in February 2001, Georgian minister of agriculture David Kirvalidze came up with proposals for joint fishing in Georgia territorial waters as well as joint production of tea and hazelnuts on Georgian soil and called on Turkey to create employment opportunities by setting up tea-processing and fish-processing plants (Georgian Times, 7 February 2001).

The border crossing at Sarp had been opened in August 1988, long before Georgia had gained its independence. In 2001 preparations were undertaken for setting up a second border crossing point at Çıldır-Aktaş. Agreement was reached during President Demirel's visit to Georgia on 14–15 January 2000 to construct and develop the Kars-Tbilisi-Baku rail link. After Russia's second Chechnya operation, it became clear that Georgia could not single-handedly confront the threats to its security. To provide security for Georgia, Turkey proposed the conclusion of a Stability Pact for the Caucasus during Demirel's visit to Georgia (see Box 7-34).

In addition to political and economic support, Turkey also provided military support to Georgia by helping in the establishment of the national army of Georgia within NATO's program of Partnership for Peace. Under the terms of the Security Cooperation Agreement signed on 18 February 1994, Turkey provided $5.5 million in 1998, $3.8 million in 1999, and $4 million in 2000 to Georgia to improve the capability of its army. The importance of this assistance becomes clearer when measured against Georgia's total defense budget, amounting to about $20

Andreas and the contraction of t

Box 7-34. Seeking Stability in the Caucasus

The search for cooperation in the Caucasus began within the framework of the OSCE when Georgia, Ukraine, Azerbaijan, and Moldova signed the declaration known as GUAM (based on their initials) in Strasbourg in October 1997. Two factors drove these countries to come together. One was the Russian support for local conflicts in Abkhazia, South Ossetia, and Nagorno Karabakh. The other was the location of Georgia, Ukraine, and Moldova on the route of the oil pipelines leading out of Azerbalian. In April 1999, during the NATO meeting in Washington on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of NATO, Uzbekistan joined the quartet, turning GUAM into GUUAM.

Although its members claimed that the grouping was mostly concerned with the security of energy transports, GUUAM's activities included developing relations with the Partnership for Peace (see Box 7-17 above), conflict resolution and cooperation in the face of ethnic tensions, separatism, religious radicalism, and terrorism. GUUAM's members supported disarmament in unstable regions and the Europe-Caucasus-Asia transport corridor within the Silk Road Project. To ensure the security of the Baku-Supsa oil pipeline, it was proposed to establish a joint Azerbaljan-Georgia peacekeeping force with the support of Ukraine. GUUAM could count on the support of NATO; despite its heterogeneous makeup and its uncertain future, it sought to develop the ties of its mempers with the West without upsetting the Russians. Although Russia did not openly oppose GUUAM, it remained distant, perhaps bearing in mind that the grouping might hurt its interests. Much of-GUUAM's credibility was lost when Uzbekistan suspended its membership and when the U.S. sent military experts to Georgia.

Aside from GUUAM, another proposal directly related to the Caucasus was made by Armenian foreign minister Vartan Oskanian on 15 March 1999. Known as "3 + 3," this proposal was never taken seriously. It aimed at the creation of a Regional Security and Cooperation Pact among Russia, Turkey, Iran, and the three countries of the southern Caucasus. At the Istanbul summit of the OSCE held in December 1999; Aliyev proposed the creation of a Caucasus Security Pact. It differed from the Armenian proposal in that it did not include Iran but provided for U.S. participation President Demirel later proposed the establishment of a Stability Pact for the Caucasus under the aegis of the OSCE. This initiative obtained the support of the U.S., France, Germany, Britain, Ukraine, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Russia, Armenia, and the EU.

But by then the interest of the Caucasus states had begun to wane. Ten days after Demirel's initiative, the CIS meeting was held in Moscow on 24-25 January 2000. The members of the CIS decided to support the tougher line pursued by Russia in the Caucasus after Moscow's launching of the second Chechen operation. The CIS members were reluctant to take any stand that would arouse the displeasure of Russia. The message of the meeting was clear: It would be difficult to get a Stability Pact for the Caucasus without Russia's full support and participation

After the Stability Pact for the Caucasus came Moscow's counterproposal, known as the Caucasus Quartet or '1 +3," bringing together the Russian Federation plus Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaljan. This demonstrated that Russia was determined to keep the search for cooperation in the Caucasus under its close supervision and control. Azerbaijan and Georgia did not show much sympathy for this proposal, which would leave them at Russia's mercy: Armenia supported the Russian proposal but also indicated that it would approve the formula known as the Caucasus G8 or the "3 + 3 + 2", formula, which included the three Caucasus republics, Russia, Turkey, and Irah, and the EU and the U.S. The West insisted that the "1 + 3" model could not provide stability to the region without.Western participation.

The search for cooperation in the Caucasus eventually resulted in a struggle among the different approaches to the question. The Western states, international organizations, Turkey, and Georgia wanted to see a model similar to the Southeastern Europe Stability Pact under the aegis of the OSCE and hence closed to Iran.: Armenia wanted to loosen the embargo imposed by Turkey and Azerbaijan with a Stability Pact for the Caucasus, in which only the regional countries (Russia, Turkey, and Iran) would take part: Iran supported to 3 + 3 formula that would exclude the U.S., while Russia was adamant in being a party to whatever arrangement was mode. Azerbaijan wanted friendly relations with Russia, Iran, Turkey, and the Western states and was more sympathetic to an arrangement similar to the EU-backed Southeastern European Stability Pact model for the Caucasus million annually. Turkey also helped in training Georgian officers and in developing the gendarmerie within the framework of the military cooperation agreement signed in June 1997. Under this agreement, ten officers from Georgia's internal security forces received training in Turkey. President Shevardnadze described Turkish-Georgian military cooperation as a "strategic partnership" during his visit to Turkey in February 1999 (Hürriyet, 27 February 1999). It was announced that in March 2000 Turkish combat aircraft would start using the Marneuli military air base, which had been repaired and brought into service by Turkey within the framework of this military cooperation. To forestall possible Russian pressure on his country, Shevardnadze made clear in March 1999 that the strategic partnership of the two countries was directed at no other third party and that Georgia would not grant military base facilities on its territory to Turkey.

(M. AYDIN)

Turkey and Georgia also cooperated on the issue of transporting the region's oil to global markets (see Box 7-35). Turkey supported Georgia on the question of early oil by backing the Baku-Supsa line, while Georgia supported Turkey on the issue of building the main pipeline along the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceylan route. But this support cost Shevardnadze dearly. On 29 August 1995 he survived an assassination attempt, with light wounds. After he stated that he supported the Baku-Ceyhan line, there was a second attempt on his life on 9 February 1998, followed by a short-lived military uprising. Shevardnadze declared

Box 7-35. Early Oil

After the dissolution of the USSR, the attention of the major oil producers was directed at the Caspian Sea. The questions on their minds were the quantity of the oil reserves, how much could be extracted and in what time frame, and how this oil was to be shipped to global markets. There were also serious dilemmas. Kazakhstan and Azerbaijan needed to get this oil extracted and sold as soon as possible. The major oil companies, however, reckoned that marketing this oil before 2020 would depress the price of oil and affect their profits.

In this context, the companies advanced a number of arguments to support their case. They claimed that the size of the reserves in the region did not justify the large investments that were required; that the quality of the oil in the region's largest reserve in Tengiz, Kazakhstan, was low because of high sulphur content; that the legal status of the Caspian Sea was uncertain; that the oil companies would have to await their turns to use the one drilling platform in the Caspian, that the introduction of new platforms through the Don-Volga waterway would require Russia's consent, which would not be granted; that access to global markets from the region would require building expensive pipelines; that instability in the Caucasus would prevent the construction of pipelines, which would be difficult to operate on a permanent basis even if built, and that the region's oil would not be able to compete with cheap Middle Eastern oil. These arguments advanced by the oil companies were echoed by the Russians and the

The regional countries were eager to market their oil as soon as possible in order to reinforce their independence. Seeing that the arguments pro and con were going to continue for some time, the producers insisted on a formula known as "early oil," which was designed to test whether the oil could be shipped to markets on a regular basis and whether there would be buyers for this oil. This formula involved building pipelines that did not require large investments in order to transport the oil already discovered in order to assess the situation. If this proved feasible, the main pipeline calling for large investments would be undertaken.

The two lines selected for early oil (Baku-Supsa and Baku-Novorossiysk) eventually were seen to be operating without a hitch, which led to an increase of investments into the region and to the opening of negotiations for the main pipeline.

(M. Aydın)

openly that these events were instigated by outside forces opposed to pipelines across Georgia. He was referring to Russia (New York Times, 22 October 1998).

3. Rivalry with Iran

Turkey feared (especially in the period prior to 1995) that Iran would convert the Muslim countries of the region into theocracies. Meanwhile Iran interpreted Turkey's activities in the area as an attempt to impose Turkish hegemony. In this tug of war between the two regional powers, Turkey had the active support of the West, ever fearful of Islamic fundamentalism. This was a further cause for alarm to Iran's rulers. After the death of Khomeini, Iran eased up on using religion as a tool in the conduct of its foreign policy. Nevertheless, there was always the likelihood of the Turkish-Iranian rivalry in the Caucasus and Central Asia turning into an ideological struggle in the event of a worsening of relations between the two countries. In such an event, Iran's most effective tool to employ against Turkey and the West in this region was political Islam. For its part, Turkey saw its role in the region as promoting moderate Islam and the secular state model, the reverse of the approach adopted by Iran.

The cultural rivalry between Turkey and Iran made itself particularly apparent over the issue of the alphabet to be adopted by the Central Asian states. When the question of giving up the Cyrillic alphabet came up in Central Asia and Azerbaijan after independence, Turkey proposed the adoption of the Latin script, which had been briefly used prior to the Bolshevik revolution. This was opposed by Iran and the Arab world. Only Tajikistan, which was under Iranian influence, eventually opted for the Arabic script. Uzbekistan (on 1 September 1995) and Turkmenistan (on 1 January 1996) decided to follow Azerbaijan's 1991 example and adopted the Latin alphabet. But implementation was slow and gradual in both countries. Although Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan decided to adopt the Latin alphabet, they did nothing to implement that decision.

Turkey and Iran were also drawn into a struggle to assert their influence in the region. Both countries were expecting to benefit from trade, transit trade income, and the benefits that would accrue from pipelines and transport routes crossing through their respective territories. Iran had the advantage of being contiguous to the region and having expertise in petroleum production and transportation. But the U.S. embargo was a serious handicap for Iran. Turkey had the advantage of location when it came to access to Western markets through Mediterranean ports, in contrast to Iran's ports located on the Persian Gulf. Furthermore, the regional countries were put off by Iran's theocratic system, its Shiite population, and its policies of confrontation with the West.

Turkey also had problems in using Iran as a transit country in its trade with Central Asia. Whenever there was tension with Iran, Turkey's overland trade with Central Asia was affected. At this juncture, Iran made a move to reinforce its Caspian links in a way that would exclude Turkey. In 1992 it began to implement the Caspian Sea Cooperation Plan with Russia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, and Turkmenistan. This was an alternative to Turkey's initiative to set up the Black Sea Economic Cooperation arrangement, but it did not prove effective because of Russia's moves to make Iran's plan work to its advantage and reinforce its dominance in the Caspian Sea.

In the meantime Iran was supporting Armenia in its confrontation with Azerbaijan in order to check Azerbaijani nationalism, which Tehran feared might foment trouble among the Azerbaijanis living in Iran. This caused deterioration in Iran's relations with Turkey.

Despite these rivalries, it must not be forgotten that there were areas of convergence in the economic interests of Turkey and Iran in Central Asia, including the possibility of constructing a pipeline to carry Azerbaijani oil through Iran and Turkey. Iran's deputy foreign minister Abbas Maleki proposed such a plan during his visit to Turkey in November 1994 as the guest of TİKA. Similarly, the two countries were cooperating to carry Iranian and Turkmen natural gas to Turkey. Furthermore, when it became clear that neither of the two countries could individually establish economic dominance over the region and that the real rival was Russia, the competition between Iran and Turkey lost its intensity.

4. Competition with the Russian Federation

In addition to the miscalculations in Turkey's policies in the region from 1991 to 1993 (described above), Ankara also failed to take adequate account of Russia's influence Given Russia's status as the sole major power in the region, with ties going back over many years between Russia and the region and extensive interdependence, no country had a chance to make much headway there in open confrontation with Russia. Turkey failed to grasp Russia's aversion to Turkist and Islamist currents in the region up to 1995 and roused Russia's hostility with its assertive policies in the region. At first, in the period from 1989 to 1991, Russia feared the extension of Iranian-backed Islamist administrations in the region and saw Turkey's influence as a benign countervailing force. When Russia perceived that Turkey was seeking to fill the vacuum in Central Asia more assertively than Iran in the period from 1991 to 1993, however, its attitude shifted. Members of the Russian administration began to complain that Turkey was the tool of Western interests that were out to eliminate Russian influence in the region. Russia was particularly incensed when Turkey gave the impression that it was going beyond the former Soviet republics and fomenting separation in Russia's Turkic regions like Tatarstan and Bashkiria or Muslim regions like Chechnya. Russia was gripped by fear that the region along the Volga might break away, which led Moscow to play the "Kurdish card" against Turkey. This revealed, once again, how inappropriate it was for Turkey to take sides in the internal affairs of neighbors without first resolving its own internal ethnic problems.

It can be said that the Yeltsin administration deliberately exaggerated the danger of Pan-Turkism in order to counteract the activities of extreme right-wing politicians like Vladimir Zhirinovsky. The fear of Pan-Turkism first appeared in the Stalin era and has remained present in Russia ever since. The president of the Institute of Global Economics and International Relations of the Russian Academy of Science, Alexei Arbatov, advanced the thesis that Turkey had to be prevented from establishing ties with the Turkic peoples of Central Asia through Azerbaijan and the Caspian. According to Arbatov, this would encourage the Islamic fundamentalist and separatist movements in the Russian Federation, triggering the process of its disintegration. This thesis had a large following in Moscow after 1992.

When Demirel visited Central Asia in April 1992, he declared that the Turkic states could not be considered fully independent so long as they remained within the ruble zone. The Russians were upset that Demirel was encouraging these countries to break free from Russia's zone of economic influence. Until then Russia had taken a benevolent attitude toward Turkey's activities in Central Asia because, with its secular principles and moderate nationalism, Turkey would be a barrier to the harmful effects of Islamic radicalism and extreme nationalism in the region. But Russia now saw a direct challenge to its influence in the region. The Russians were also getting jittery over the expression "the Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic Sea to the Great Wall of China."

As Russia grew more uncomfortable with Turkey's activities in the Caucasus and Central Asia, it began to get more sensitive about its interests in its neighborhood and eventually enunciated the doctrine of the "Near Abroad" (see Box 7-55 below) in 1993. The doctrine amounted to declaring that Turkey and Iran could not fill the void left by the disappearance of the USSR and that this void could only be filled by Russia. Russia's main worry was that this region might turn into a center of racist Turkism or Islamic fundamentalism that might threaten the Russian diaspora in the region or spill over into Russia to cause trouble among its ethnic and religious minorities in the northern Caucasus. After a short period of turning inward, Russia began to reassert its former dominant position in the region. These efforts were seen as legitimate and backed by the West, which feared that the pro-Western elements in the Russian administration might be eliminated by the ultranationalists or the Communists. In implementing this policy all sorts of political and economic pressure and strong-arm tactics were employed that would allow Russia to return to the region as a dominant force.

At the same time, Turkey began to have a better appreciation of Russia's concerns over ethnic separation in the northern Caucasus even as it worried about Russia's repressive action in the region. Turkey sought to calm Russia by supporting the integrity and the stability of the CIS and by taking a stand against the effort of Muslim groups to dismember Russia. But these actions failed to reassure Russia about Turkey's intentions. The Turkish MFA had been pursuing a policy that was always aware of Russia's sensitivities, but the same could not be said about Turkish politicians. Special care was taken to conduct relations with Turkish-Muslim peoples within Russia through Moscow to demonstrate clearly that Turkey had nothing to do with those who were seeking to dismember Russia. In the case of Tatarstan, which wanted closer relations with Turkey, Ankara restrained itself. Turkey gave advance notice to Moscow of the visit by Tatarstan's president Mintimer Shaimiyev to Ankara in October 1992. Turkey also sought the help of Russia's foreign minister during his visit to Ankara in July 1994 to secure the opening of a consulate in Kazan. Despite these efforts, Turkey was not able to alleviate Russia's misgiving about Ankara's intentions or prevent a confrontation with Russia over Chechnya because of Turkish public sentiment.

The Chechen Question

When the Chechens, who were Muslims but not ethnically Turkish, rebelled to obtain their independence from the Russian Federation, they naturally looked to Turkey because of its interest in the region and its Ottoman past. Furthermore, many Chechens in Turkey had become Turkish citizens. As the fighting in Chechnya progressed, these people began to get involved in anti-Russian demonstrations. In addition, some went to Chechnya to fight as volunteers. All of this led Russia to accuse Turkey of not only overlooking but also actively supporting the Chechen separatists.

The Chechen leader Jehar Dudayev visited Turkey repeatedly to seek aid from Turkish leaders. Although Turkey sought to avoid getting involved in this question, the pressure of public opinion forced it to take sides. Russia was extremely sensitive about this issue. Even before the intervention of 1994, Russia had summoned the Turkish ambassador in Moscow to the foreign ministry when Dudayev was received by President Demirel in October 1993 and sought guarantees that this would never happen again. Meanwhile the municipalities of Istanbul and Ankara had begun to name parks and squares after Dudayev.

Turkey avoided condemning Russia's intervention in Chechnya, which began in December 1994 but did indicate its wish to see this question settled peacefully. Very soon Chechnya became a very sensitive issue for Turkey, already deeply involved with the Kurdish question on its own territory. Although Turkey kept stressing that the issue was Russia's internal affair, it did bow to public opinion and—especially after Russia started bombarding Grozny—indiscriminately raised the tone of its criticism of Russia's tactics in order to rouse the West to focus on this issue. The Russians accused Turkey of supporting the Chechens and responded by providing a farm to the PKK in the vicinity of Moscow. This was an indication of the way in which Russia was going to react to Turkish support for the Chechens.

The CFE and Other Military Questions

Another subject that came up as a consequence of Russia's intervention in Chechnya was Russia's demand for review of the force ceilings in the Caucasus established by the Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE) Treaty. The treaty came into force on 17 July 1992 after the dissolution of the USSR. The Russians never implemented the provisions of the CFE in the northern Caucasus flank area. Furthermore, on 17 September 1993 Moscow sent notes to the signatories informing them that Russia would not be bound by the limitations imposed in the flank regions. Notwithstanding Turkey's strenuous opposition, the Western powers were prepared to compromise. It was decided to exclude the northern Caucasus region from the provisions of the treaty at the review conference held on 15–16 May 1996.

For Turkey, the real issue was the struggle for influence in the Caucasus. Turkey's concern was that Russia would use its forces concentrated in the northern Caucasus to exert pressure on the regional countries. As a matter of fact, Russia had removed its troops from Armenia and Georgia within the framework of the military cooperation agreements concluded with these countries, but now it redeployed these forces to Armenia's and Georgia's borders with Turkey. Furthermore, Russia was meddling in Georgia's and Azerbaijan's internal affairs, openly supporting coup attempts in these countries, siding with Armenia on the Karabakh issue, and preventing the deployment of multinational peacekeeping force in the region. These activities were strongly criticized by Turkey.

By 1995 Turkey was highly alarmed about Russia's intentions in the region. To prevent an open conflict of interests and perhaps even an armed conflict with Russia, Ankara was aware that it had to show greater deference to Russia's interests in the region. It was essential for Turkish policy-makers to determine when Russia's concerns in the region had to be taken into account in pursuing Turkey's own interests. As a result of this, Turkey began to reverse its policy of the early 1990s, which neglected Russia and concentrated on the newly independent states of the region. The reversal came when the potential threats of confrontation became more apparent, leading to the realization that the potential fruits of cooperation with Russia were greater than the potential of all the new states combined. Turkey's policies underwent a marked tilt toward Russia in the second half of the 1990s, especially in the areas of economic and especially energy cooperation.

III. ECONOMIC RELATIONS

At first Turkey underestimated the economic problems of the Central Asian states and their requirements for foreign aid and misjudged the nature and magnitude of the economic interdependency between them and the USSR that had been forged over many years. For these reasons, the rapid developments that occurred in Turkey's political relations with Central Asian states could not be replicated in the field of commercial and economic relations.

Loans

With close commercial ties and foreign aid, Turkey aimed to gain economic and political influence in the region. It also aimed to become the main provider of foreign aid to the area from 1991 to 1993. But these goals were much beyond Turkey's capacity. During this period Turkey acted rashly and promised to provide economic aid to all visitors from the region. The same promises were made by Turkish leaders who were visiting the region. These promises soon reached the level of $3 billion, much beyond Turkey's ability to deliver. It became apparent very quickly that Turkey, by itself, was not in a position to give economic direction to the region. The situation called for a more sober analysis.

Until 1993 Turkey claimed that its economic reforms carried out in the 1980s could serve as a good model for Central Asian countries and help them in their economic restructuring efforts. It was also said that Turkish businesses and firms could serve as good business partners for Western firms seeking to invest in the Caucasus and Central Asia.

As a matter of fact, Turkish businesspeople had a greater affinity with the regional language and culture than their Western counterparts and found it easier to adjust to local conditions. When Americans and Western Europeans were running into difficulties during their negotiations with their customers in the region, small Turkish firms were prepared to take risks in markets where taxation legislation was uncertain and where the legal infrastructure was inadequate. In these conditions, partnerships between Turkish and Western firms made sense. Western firms would provide capital and technology, while Turkish firms would supply skilled labor at a reasonable cost and take advantage of their familiarity with the region. Western firms that were considering investments in the region usually started by setting up an office in Turkey, where they could hire low-cost Turkish personnel and find partners to be subcontractors.

Over time, however, Western firms began to find Moscow a more convenient location to reach the region than Istanbul or Ankara. By being in Moscow, these firms could also top the fast-developing Russian market. Another factor that worked against locating in Turkey was the economic crisis of January 1994. This crisis and the policy of belt tightening that came in April 1994 demonstrated once again that—with high inflation, large budget deficits, loss-making publicly owned enterprises, and a currency that kept losing its value—there was not much chance for Turkey to act as an economic role model.

Furthermore, the economic requirements of the regional countries were enormous. In Soviet days, the role of people of Russian extraction had been preponderant in the economics of the regional countries and the system was geared in a way to provide commodities to the metropolis. All transport infrastructure (including roads, railways, pipelines, and communication) links were directed toward Russia. This situation could not easily be altered in the post-Soviet era, and the Russian Federation remained the number-one economic partner of the regional states until 2000.

An analysis of the economic situation in the Turkic republics throughout the Soviet era reveals a striking picture. The Turkic republics disposed of vast natural resources, including oil and natural gas and extensive and productive agricultural land. They had no labor problem and were located on the east-west trade routes. As a result of the policies of economic specialization pursued by the USSR, however, these countries turned into suppliers of unprocessed farm products, including cotton. Underground resources and now materials were shipped to Russia, because the processing plants did not exist on their territories. Their inefficient production facilities operated with local labor being employed only as unskilled workers under managers and engineers of Russian extraction.

In the 1980s the Soviet economy took a turn for the worse, the quality of products fell below world standards, and central planning lost its original driving force. All of this compelled Gorbachev to resort to new economic measures after 1985 to reverse the process of deterioration. The economic malaise of the USSR coincided with the beginning of the social reawakening taking place in the component republics. When the attempt to manage the USSR in a more liberal and looser form under the policies of perestroika and glasnost failed, the whole system came apart. Political independence in the new states inevitably led to a search for greater economic independence. But to realize their potential the new states needed financial resources, technology, managerial cadres, and skilled labor. They were utterly dependent on Russia to enable their energy resources to reach global markets. Even in 2000 their economic independence was more apparent than real.

At a time when the newly independent states were in the process of restructuring their economics, they were also obliged to establish a new transport and communications infrastructure. They were in urgent need of foreign aid and technical assistance, and it was clear that Turkey was not able to meet these needs. Turkey had to cope with political problems caused by unstable governments as well as hyperinflation. This did not allow Turkey to look beyond its problems and do much to meet the financial needs of the new states. The Turkish economy was in no condition to provide the required financial and technical aid to the new states that were struggling with the problems of structural adjustment as they moved away from the Communist model to a sort of market economy. Rash promises of aid were made, and relations were conducted on an emotional rather than a pragmatic plane. As a result, the original euphoria gave way to disappointment arising from unfulfilled expectations as Turkey began to be perceived in a negative light.

These new republics had been politically and economically cut off from the world for seventy-four years. As they entered a complex and bewildering system of international relations, they saw Turkey by their side, a country close to them in many ways and ready to give guidance as well as assistance. In this framework, Turkey concluded trade and economic agreements with each of these states after their independence. In addition, agreements were concluded to regulate road transport, civil aviation, communications, technical cooperation, banking, protection and promotion of foreign investments, consular and legal assistance, the lifting of visa requirements, and cultural cooperation. Turkey was at the forefront in establishing the legal foundations of relations with countries in the Caucasus and Central Asia in a broad range of areas.

By 1994 Turkey had extended humanitarian aid to the Central Asian states amounting to $78 million. The lion's share went to Uzbekistan with $54 million, while Tajikistan trailed with a mere $404,000. During the same period these states received loans in the amount of $666 million from the Turkish Eximbank. These were longterm loans designed to increase and diversify Turkey's exports to the region. Repayments were not being made as scheduled (as of 30 March 2000 only $468.32 million in interest and principal had been repaid), however, and Turkey's means were in any case limited, so the total level of loans to the region remained low. Some of the loans had to be converted into grants because of difficulties encountered in repayments. Granting these loans made no economic sense to Turkey and obviously could not be continued indefinitely. Consequently, the loans that were originally meant to finance exports were converted to loans extended to Turkish contractors to enable them to carry out projects in these countries. But even these loans ran into difficulties in specific instances, and some loans remained unutilized. The Turkish Eximbank agreed to project loans in the amount of $1.5 billion to the regional countries by the end of 2001. Only about 50% of this amount was utilized, however, owing to difficulties in repayments of previous loans. The same situation arose in the field of industrial cooperation. Despite the large potential, and even after the feasibility studies had been made, the targets set could not be achieved because of funding difficulties. Achievements were confined to a few textile, paper, and sugar factories.

Investments

The amount of Turkish capital invested in the region by 2000 amounted to $2 billion. The regional countries were seeking to prevent shortage in their local markets by imposing taxes and other restrictions on exports. These discouraged large foreign investments in export industries, and most of the Turkish investments in the region were confined to the service sector.

Turkish construction firms used Eximbank loans to build hotels, textile and cement factories, airports, and other installations and contributed to the industrialization of the region. The amount of construction work undertaken by Turkish contractors in the five Turkic republics amounted to $7 billion by 2000.

Until recently, Turkmenistan was the Central Asian country in which Turkey had the largest investments. Turkmenistan was geographically isolated, and Turkey was seen as an outlet to the wider world. But in 1999 and 2000 there was a cooling in political relations, which also affected economic ties. One reason for the souring of relations was that Turkmenistan was mentioned in the report issued by the TGNA on the Susurluk scandal in Turkey. Another was the signing of the agreement with Russia to construct the natural gas pipeline known as Blue Stream. Turkmenistan possessed 35% of global reserves of natural gas and was eager to sell gas. It felt that Turkey was not active enough in seeking to meet its energy requirements from that source. As a result of the frosty political relations, no Turkish contractor was able to secure a contract in Turkmenistan in 2000. Until then construction jobs in Turkmenistan had been going almost exclusively to Turkish contractors.

Trade

Turkey's trade with the region was rising rapidly. Exports rose from $160.92 million in 1992 to $969.54 million in 1998. By 1998 Turkey's exports to the region accounted for 3.6% of total exports, amounting to $26.97 billion. (That year Russia's share alone was 5% of Turkey's exports.) It has to be pointed out that most of these exports to the region were made possible through the utilization of Turkish Eximbank's export credits. Turkey's imports from the region, in contrast, were realized at a much lower level: amounting to $85 million in 1992 and rising to $548.05 million by 1998. This figure represented 1.2% of Turkey's total imports: $45.93 billion in 1998.

Uzbekistan was Turkey's main trading partner in Central Asia until relations become strained in 1994. Russia accounted for 60% of Turkey's total trade with the former Soviet republics, however, while the share of all Central Asia republics barely reached 16%. This was due to the low purchasing power of these countries, Turkey's shift from exports to the construction sector, and the difficulties encountered in the area of transportation.

Turkey sought to become economically preeminent in the region, but there were two big obstacles. One was Turkey's distance from Central Asia. Another was that Turkey's location did not allow it to provide these landlocked countries with easy access to international markets. In reaching these countries by road, trucks had to cross through Georgia or Iran. Both of these countries, and especially Iran, placed a number of obstacles, which crippled Turkey's export possibilities. Turkish vehicles transiting Iran faced many delays, especially when relations were strained. Because of transport problems, delivery schedules of shipments could not be met and costs rose.

Another reason why Turkey had difficulties in boosting its exports was the poor quality of the goods shipped to the region during the initial period. In the period after independence, lower-quality goods that could not be sold in Western markets were exported to the region, with very negative effects on the image of Turkish goods. Because of the poor quality of the goods produced in the region, it was difficult for these countries to export much to Turkey other than raw materials and cotton.

Because the banking system was very inadequate, many of the commercial transactions were carried out on the basis of cash. This made it difficult to transfer foreign exchange, which also had a dampening effect on trade. Without a properly functioning system of arbitration to settle trade disputes, commercial risks were very high. The habits of the Soviet years persisted, and the need to observe rules and regulations in business life was not properly appreciated. High taxes, licensing system, corruption, breaches of contract, lack of means of enforcement of contracts, and excessive bureaucratic formalities were all obstacles to the development of trade.

But beyond all of these factors, the main impediment to the development of trade and economic relations was the difficulty in finding adequate financial resources. The rich potential of the Central Asian republics was not of much use without know-how, technology, and financial resources. That is why Turkey concentrated its efforts on transferring knowledge, training experts, and providing funds to the extent that its means allowed. But there was no way for Turkey by itself to furnish the vast sums necessary to carry out the needs of post-Soviet restructuring projects.

At present, large-scale projects in Central Asia are being carried out by the firms of countries that are providing the financing. These firms belong to European, American, or Far Eastern countries. As a rule, Turkish companies get involved in large-scale projects as partners or subcontractors to these firms, taking advantage of their familiarity with the local inhabitants.

The Energy Resources of the Caspian Basin and Turkey

Following the disintegration of the USSR, the Caspian Basin attracted much attention because of its oil and gas resources. It became clear that the littoral states of the Caspian Sea, Azerbaijan, Iran, Kazakhstan, Russia, and Turkmenistan, would be among the major producers of energy in the twenty-first century. That is why there was a scramble among the oil companies to conclude agreements to exploit the oil and natural gas resources of these countries. The neighbors were also competing with one another to secure the right to locate the pipeline that would allow the oil and gas to be sold in international markets on their territories. Actually, most of the oil and

Box 7-36. The Legal Status of the Caspian

In the Soviet era, there were only two littoral states in the Caspian: Iran and the USSR. Russia, Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, and Turkmenistan took their places as littoral states after the dissolution of the USSR, triggering the dispute over the legal status of this body of water. Under international law, the Caspian could be seen either as a condominium (where all of the littoral states would agree on joint sovereignty) or as an area to be carved up into national sovereignty segments under a formula to be negotiated by the littoral states.

When Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan undertook offshore oil explorations without waiting for an agreement on the status of the sea, the legal dispute heated up. Russia took the position that the Caspian should be used by the littoral states on a joint and equal basis. Russia had the backing of Iran and Turkmenistan when it claimed that the Law of the Sea could not be applied in the Caspian, because it did not have a natural access to the high seas. Because the Caspian was an internal sea or a lake, it should come under joint sovereignty. This implied twenty miles of national economic zones. The waters beyond these belts would be open for joint exploitation.

In opposition to the Russian view, Azerbaijan, supported by Kazakhstan, described the Caspian alternatively as a shared lake or as high sea. As a shared lake the Caspian would be divided into national sectors by extending territorial waters to the median line. The littoral states would have full sovereignty over the surface seabed, shipping, and exploitation of biological resources within their national sectors. Using the approach of the open sea, the littoral states would have twelve miles of territorial waters and two hundred miles of economic zones without, however, encroaching on the median line:

At first, Turkmenistan leaned toward the Russian position, but in February 1998 it announced that it had reached agreement with Azerbaijan to set the border between the two countries on the median line. The two countries have yet to reach agreement, however, on the course of the median line. Although Iran opposed the carving up of the Caspian into national sectors and defended the principle of "Joint ownership," It later moderated its stand, especially after it received a share of Azerbaijan's Shah Deniz Fields. In April 1998 Iran announced that it was ready to accept sectoral division on condition that the shares were equal. This would give Iran a share of 20% of the Caspian Sea, whereas under Azerbaijan's formula Iran's share would be 10%.

As time went by, there were changes in the position of littoral states, including Russia. Russia reached an agreement with Azerbaijan in April 1998 and with Kazakhstan in July 1998 to divide the seabed lying off their coastlines. Thus all of the littoral countries appear to have abandoned the "joint ownership" approach and adopted the "Individual ownership" principle. The sole exception is Iran, which has yet to conclude any agreement on sharing the seabed.

(M. AYDIN) (Source: Aydın 2000, pp. 48–56)

gas reserves of the region have not yet been developed. In fact, even the extent of the reserves is not fully known.

The Caspian Basin is not a second Middle East. But it does rival the North Sea fields, one of the most important sources of energy under Western control and now entering the phase of depletion and exhaustion. From the point of proven reserves, Kazakhstan is the leading country in oil and Turkmenistan in natural gas.

The International Energy Agency has estimated that the Caspian region's crude oil production will reach 79 million tons in 2000, 194 million tons in 2010, and 308 million tons in 2020. The oil consumption in the region will follow a similar pattern, rising from 22 million tons in 1998 to 117 million tons in 2010 and to 180 million tons in 2020.

Similarly, it is expected that production of natural gas will reach 200 billion cubic meters in 2010, of which 84 billion cubic meters will be exported. At present the Caspian Basin exports approximately 43% of its oil and a mere 9% of its gas production. By 2010 these ratios should reach 60% and 40%. These high ratios indicate that the region will have an important place in the world in 2020 as a supplier of oil and gas.

The countries of the region were anxious to market their energy resources as quickly as possible. Without direct access to the sea, this would only be possible with pipelines transiting the territories of their neighbors. This meant that there would be international competition not only at the stage of claiming (see Box 7-36) and producing the hydrocarbon resources but also at the stage of their delivery to markets.

In 1991 the pipeline network was Soviet-built, and its layout served the interests of Russia. Furthermore, the operator of the pipeline network was the Russian company Transneft, which was reluctant to increase the quotas of the former Soviet republics that would allow them to raise their exports of oil through the network. The natural gas pipeline was controlled by Gasprom, another Russian company, and Turkmenistan was being obstructed from exporting its gas through this system. Gasprom was transporting Russian gas to the rich Western European market, while it sent Turkmenistan's gas to markets like Ukraine and Georgia, which had accumulated unpaid gas bills amounting to billions of dollars.

For this reason, it was essential for the Caspian Basin countries to find ways of marketing their hydrocarbons without passing through Russian pipelines if they were going to strengthen their economic and political independence. That is why the search for alternative routes to export the region's energy resources started in the early 1990s.

The building of a new pipeline network was no easy task, given the vast sums required and the complex geopolitics of the region. The first pipeline that would be built was bound to remain the main outlet for a considerable time. Although consideration was given to about half a dozen alternatives (all of which would transit more than one country), eventually two projects emerged as the most suitable. These were the Baku-Novorossiysk and the Baku-Ceyhan lines.

In addition to the economic effects of the pipelines, there was also the question of the geopolitical strategic advantages that pipelines bestowed on the country in which they were located. That is why the struggle for influence between Turkey and Russia drew in the powers from outside the region as well as the multinational companies.

The Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan Main Export Pipeline, also known as the Caspian-Mediterranean Pipeline, is designed to allow Azerbaijan's and Kazakhstan's oil to flow to the Mediterranean. The project is open to the other regional producers of oil. The pipeline's feasibility plan and environmental impact report were carried out with World Bank financing and completed in June 1998. According to the plan, the pipeline would have a length of 1,730 kilometers and a capacity of 1 million barrels per day; 468 kilometers of the pipeline would go through Azerbaijan, 225 kilometers through Georgia, and 1,037 kilometers through Turkey. In addition there would be a marine terminal in Ceyhan. It has been estimated that the project will cost $2.4 billion, including the terminal.

Although the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan Main Export Pipeline is longer than the alternatives going to Supsa or Novorossiysk, it has a number of advantages over these rival links.

- 1. Comparison with alternative routes: with this route, it is possible to diversify the means for shipping Caspian oil to global energy markets. For Turkey, the project offers the advantage of developing and strengthening relations with Caucasus and Central Asian states. For the Caspian countries, it allows them to free themselves from dependence on a single route when exporting their resources. By allowing them to stand on their own feet, the project contributes to the development of democracy, the market economy, and the integration of the region with the global economy.
- 2. The possibility of tapping an existing market: Turkey is an important market for the region's oil and gas, and the pipeline can be used to meet part of its requirements.
  - 3. Advantages in installation and climate: by world standards, the Ceyhan terminal is a well-managed export facility. It also has a deep-sea port that can handle tankers of up to 300,000 tons. Because of unfavorable weather conditions in the Black Sea, loading and unloading operations are interrupted for up to seventy-five days per year, whereas in Ceyhan on the Mediterranean Sea the climate and weather conditions are very favorable. The natural conditions of the Turkish Straits prevent tankers over 200 meters in length from sailing through. This means that tankers over 150,000 to 200,000 tons cannot sail into the Black Sea. Furthermore, the tanker route from Ceyhan to global markets is shorter than the routes from Black Sea parts.

4. Environmental considerations and the state of the Turkish Straits: transporting Caspian oil from Black Sea ports to global markets would greatly raise the volume of traffic in the Turkish Straits. Moreover, the foreign trade of the former COMECON countries is not yet fully developed. As their international trade increases in the twenty-first century, they will have to utilize the Straits to a much greater extent. This will mean that the hinterland of the Black Sea will extend from Central and Eastern Europe all the way into Central Asia. Adding petroleum and petroleum products to this increasing traffic would seriously increase the risks and danger to which the waterway would be exposed. Consequently, the Black Sea alternatives not only are disadvantaged from the economic point of view but also pose the grave risk of irreversible damage to the environment.

For all of these reasons, the Baku-Ceyhan project is the main element of the East-West Energy Corridor that would link the southern Caucasus and Central Asia to Turkey and the Mediterranean. This project clearly has the additional advantage of minimizing the risks in the Straits arising from ever-increasing traffic.

Important developments have taken place since 1998 toward realizing the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline. On 29 October 1998 the Ankara Declaration was signed by the presidents of Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, and Uzbekistan, who were visiting Ankara in connection with the commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Turkish Republic. The declaration was also signed by President Demirel on behalf of Turkey. U.S. secretary of energy Bill Richardson attended the signing ceremony as an observer. The declaration reiterated that it was necessary to market the oil and gas resources of the region through multiple pipelines in order to strengthen the independence, security, economic development, and prosperity of the countries of the Caspian Basin. The signatories also reaffirmed their determination to construct the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline. Construction began on 20 September 2002, and the expected date for completion was set for February 2005.

On the same day as the Ankara Declaration, an agreement was signed providing for Turkish purchase of natural gas from Turkmenistan and the construction of a pipeline for carrying natural gas from Turkmenistan to Turkey and beyond into Europe. On 9 December 1998 Mobil, Shell, and Chevron signed an agreement with the Kazakh government to undertake the feasibility study of the pipeline to carry Kazakh oil and gas to Turkey. These agreements made the realization of the Baku-Ceyhan project more probable, because it was unlikely that this line would be economically viable unless it also carried Kazakh oil. Furthermore, a natural gas pipeline to transport Turkmen gas to Turkey through a pipeline parallel to the Baku-Ceyhan line would also help in spreading the pipeline's construction costs.

The package of agreements designed to set in motion the construction of the project was signed in Istanbul on 18 November 1999, during the holding of the İstanbul Summit of the OSCE. The package included the Intergovernmental Agreement signed by Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Turkey, the Host Country Agreement, and the Turkey Contracting Agreement, including Turkey's oil purchase guarantee and the construction of the Turkish portion. These agreements were ratified by the Azerbaijan and Georgia parliaments in May 2000 and by the TGNA on 22 June 2000. Also signed on the occasion of the summit was the İstanbul Declaration, by which Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, and Turkey undertook to complete the project in 2004. President Clinton also signed the document as an observer. The legal underpinning of the project was completed on 3 October 2000 with the parties' signing of the agreement for constituting the group of sponsors that would take over the financing of the pipeline. Once the support of BP had been obtained, the arguments over the feasibility of the pipeline came to an end.

Turkey was also interested in a natural gas pipeline that would carry Turkmenistan's gas under the Caspian Sea to Turkey and then on to Europe. In Soviet times, Turkmenistan was one of the main suppliers of gas to Europe. Disruptions in transportation and payments after independence forced Turkmenistan to cut down its production. Whereas the volume of production had reached 85 billion cubic meters in 1991, in 1998 it had fallen to 13 billion cubic meters. Turkey saw the Turkmenistan-Turkey-Europe natural gas pipeline both as a vehicle for allowing Turkmenistan to tap new markets and as a means for diversifying Turkey's and Europe's energy suppliers in the twenty-first century.

An important step in carrying out this project was the agreement for the construction of the Trans-Caspian Pipeline (TCP) and the sale of Turkmenistan's gas to Turkey. The agreement was initialed by the energy ministers of the two countries on 20 October 1998 and signed by the two presidents in Ankara on 29 October 1998. The agreement was for a term of thirty years and involved the transport of 30 billion cubic meters of gas per year, of which 16 billion would be for Turkey's consumption, with the remainder going to Europe. The pipeline would run through the Caspian Sea, Azerbaijan, and Georgia into Turkey, cross the Dardanelles Strait and Thrace, and go on to Europe.

The Intergovernmental Declaration on the Trans-Caspian Pipeline was signed on 18 November 1999 by Turkey, Turkmenistan, Georgia, and Azerbaijan on the occasion of the OSCE Summit in Istanbul. U.S. president Bill Clinton also signed the declaration as an observer. With this document, the signatories pledged themselves to inform the project sponsors of their particular wishes to complete the formalities related to the intergovernmental agreement and transit country agreements by March 2000 and to provide the necessary support to the sponsors to ensure the completion of the project by the last quarter of 2002. But due to later developments and Turkey's decision to give priority to the procurement of Russian gas through a pipeline under the Black Sea (see Box 7-56 below) the TCP project was almost put on hold at the end of 2000. This was because all of the studies showed that the TCP and the Blue Stream could not both be economically viable due to insufficient Turkish demand for gas. This development put a strain on Turkey's relations with Turkmenistan and compelled Turkmenistan to sign a new natural gas agreement with Russia, thus increasing its dependence on its large neighbor.

Mustafa Aydın

Sources (Relations with the Caucasus and Central Asia)

Ahrari, E. "Dynamics of New Great Game in Muslim Central Asia." Central Asian Survey 13, no. 4 (1994): 525–39.

Akiner, Shireen. Central Asia: Conflict or Stability and Development? London: Minority Rights Group International Report, 1997.

Anderson, John. The International Politics of Central Asia. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1997.

- Aydın, Mustafa. New Geopolitics of Central Asia and the Caucasus: Causes of Instability and Predicament. Ankara: SAM, 2000.
- ——. "Oil, Pipelines and Security: Geopolitics of the Caspian Region." In The Caspian Basin: A Re-emerging Basin, Vol. I, ed. Moshe Gammer, pp. 3–31. New York/London: Routledge, 2004.
- -----. "Turkey and Central Asia: Challenges of Change." Central Asian Survey 15, no. 2 (1996): 157-77.
- Blandy, Charles W. The Caucasus Region and Caspian Basin: Change, Complication and Challenge. Camberly, Surrey: Royal Military Academy Sandhurst, 1998.
- Bölükbaşı, Süha. "Ankara's Baku-Centered Trans-Caucasus Policy: Has It Failed?" Middle East Journal 51, no. 1 (Summer 1997): 80–94.
- BP Amoco Statistical Review of World Energy, 2000. London: BP Amoco, 2001.
- Bremer, Ian, and Ray Taras (eds.). Nations and Politics in the Soviet Successor States. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1993.
- Brzezinski, Zbigniew, and Paige Sullivan (eds.). Russia and the Commonwealth of Independent States: Documents, Data and Analysis. New York: M. E. Sharpe, 1997.
- Cornell, Svante E. "Turkey and the Conflict in Nagorno Karabakh: A Delicate Balance." Middle Eastern Studies 34, no. 1 (Jan. 1998): 51–72.
- Değişen Dünyada Türkiye ve Türk Dünyası Sempozyumu Bildirileri. Ankara: Hacettepe Üniversitesi, AİİT Enstitüsü, 1992.
- Demirel, Süleyman. "Text of Prime Minister Süleyman Demirel's Speech at Johns Hopkins University, Bologna, Italy, 14 May 1992." Turkish Review Quarterly Digest 6, no. 28 (1992).
- DPT Özel İhtisas Komisyonu Raporu. Türkiye ile Türk Cumhuriyetleri ve Bölge Ülkeleri İlişkileri, 8. Beş Yıllık Kalkınma Plan, Yayın No. 2511. Ankara: DPT, 2000.
- Ehteshami, Anoush, and Emma C. Murphy. "The Non-Arab Middle Eastern States and the Caucasian/Central Asian Republics: Turkey." International Relations 11, no. 6 (1993): 513-31.
- Fuller, Graham E. "Turkey's New Eastern Orientation." In Turkey's New Geopolitics: From the Balkans to Western China, ed. Graham Fuller and Ian O. Lesser, pp. 37–98. Boulder: Westyiew, 1993.
- Haktanır, Korkmaz. "Developments in Central Asia and Turkish-Iranian Relations." Middle East Business and Banking (June 1992).

- Hunter, Shireen T. The Transcaucasus in Transition: Nation-Building and Conflict. Washington, D.C.: Center for Strategic and International Studies, 1994.
- Jafarov, Nazim. "Azerbaycan Halk Cephesi (AHC) İktidarı Döneminde Azerbaycan Dış Politikası (Haziran 1992–Haziran 1993)." Thesis, A.Ü. Sosyal Bilimler Enstitüsü, 2000.
- Jones, Scott A. "Turkish Strategic Interests in the Transcaucasus." In Crossroads and Conflict: Security and Foreign Policy in the Caucasus and Central Asia, ed. Gary K. Bertsch et al., pp. 55–65. New York: Routledge, 2000.
- Köni, Hasan. Genel Sistem Kuramı ve Uluslararası Siyasetteki Yeri. Ankara: ASAM, 2001.
- Lipovsky, I. P. "Central Asia: In Search of a New Political Identity." Middle East Journal 50, no. 2 (1995): 217–28.
- Mango, Andrew. "The Turkish Model." Middle Eastern Studies 29, no. 4 (Oct. 1993): 706–57.
- Masih, Joseph R., and Robert O. Krikorian. Armenia at the Crossroads. Amsterdam: Harwood Academic Publishers, 1999.
- Milli Eğitim Bakanlığı (MEB). Cumhuriyetin 75'inci Yıl Dönümünde Türk Cumhuriyetleri, Türk ve Akraba Topluluklarıyla Eğitim İlişkilerimiz. Ankara: MEB Yurtdışı Eğitim Öğretim Gen. Md., 1998.
- Yurtdışında Açılan Özel Öğretim Kurumları Temsilcileri İkinci Toplantısı. Ankara: MEB Yurtdışı Eğitim Öğretim Gen. Md., 1997.
- Nazarbayev, Nursultan, Yüzyılların Kavşağında. Ankara: Bilig Yayınları, 1997.
- Öke, Mim Kemal (ed.). Geçiş Sürecinde Orta Asya Türk Cumhuriyetleri. İstanbul: Alfa, 1999.
- Roy, Olivier. Yeni Orta Asya ya da Ulusların İmal Edilişi (original title: La Nouvelle Asie Centrale ou la Fabrication des Nations [Paris: Le Seuil, 1997]). Trans. Mehmet Morali. İstanbul: Metis, 1997.
- Sander, Oral. "Turkey and Turkic World." Central Asian Survey 13, no. 1 (1994): 37–44.
- Şimşir, Bilal. "Turkey's Relations with Central Asian Turkic Republics." Turkish Review Quarterly Digest 6, no. 28 (Summer 1992): 11–15.
- Talbott, Strobe. "America Abroad." Time, 31 Aug. 1992, http://www.time.com/time/magazine/article/0,9171,976347-2,00.html.
- Winrow, Gareth M. Turkey in Post-Soviet Central Asia. London: Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1995.

Relations with Greece

The collapse of the socialist regimes of Eastern Europe in quick succession, the disintegration of the Soviet Union, and the ending of the Cold War brought about changes on the international scene that also affected Turkish-Greek relations and the Cyprus question. In the new unipolar system in which the U.S. exercised leadership, there was renewed emphasis on ending regional conflicts. The emergence of new nation-states and nationalism, however, created new sources of conflict. These two trends were most visible in the Balkans, the Middle East, and the Caucasus, regions where Greece and Turkey were located and that both countries regarded as their area of special interest. Consequently, both countries were forced to review their foreign policies in the light of the new developments.

At first Turkish policy-makers were concerned that their country's strategic importance would be diminished as a result of the ending of the Cold War and the disappearance of the "Soviet threat." To compensate, they began to stress the role as intermediary that Turkey aspired to play between the West and the newly established nation-states. The phrase "the Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China" epitomized this new approach. Turkey's active foreign policy during the Gulf Crisis and during the conflict in Bosnia and its commercial and economic dealings with the Caucasus states centered on oil should be seen in this framework.

But it soon became apparent that Turkey did not have the political and economic capacity to play a leadership role in the region or to act as an intermediary for the West. The goals set in the early 1990s remained as pious hopes. In the second half of the 1990s in particular, relations with the EU became strained and Turkey found itself coming closer to the U.S. Ankara had to content itself with playing the role of a loyal ally, helping in carrying out American plans in the region.

Be that as it may, Turkey established close ties with Albania, Bosnia, and Macedonia, improved its relations with Bulgaria, engaged in close trade and economic cooperation with Russia, demonstrated its economic and cultural affinity with the countries of the Caucasus and Central Asia (and most notably Azerbaijan), strengthened its alliance with Israel, and did all this in close bonds of alliance with the U.S. Hence Greece began to get the feeling that it was being outmaneuvered and sought ways to check Turkey by stepping up its own efforts.

The ending of the Cold War was greeted positively by Greece in the first instance. Athens expected that, with the "Soviet threat" gone, Washington would no longer see Turkey as strategically important. This would restore a balance between Turkey and Greece in America's perception. Furthermore, the Gulf War would reveal the strategic importance of Greece and Cyprus. But developments did not bear out Greek expectations. The U.S. did not tilt toward Greece, a member of the EU and therefore constrained by the foreign policies of European states. Furthermore, Greece was beset by internal political and economic questions. Instead the U.S. tilted toward Turkey, which was located in the Balkans, the Middle East, and the Caucasus. Despite all of Turkey's internal troubles, Realpolitik had brought its strategic importance to the fore.

In the 1990s the changes in Eastern Europe and the disintegration of Yugoslavia had a greater affect on Greece than the demise of the USSR. During the process of restructuring that took place in the Balkans, Greece's relations with its neighbors ran into much turbulence. There were disputes over minorities with Albania and differences with Macedonia over its name, which turned into a question of sovereignty because of the dispute's historic roots (see Box 7-43 below). Against the background of traditional friendship with Serbia, relations with Bosnia took a turn for the worse. Greece's policies in connection with these issues led not only to deteriorating relations with Balkan neighbors but also to serious loss of prestige in the U.S. and the European states. Greece was losing ground in a region where Turkey was getting more effective.

This situation started changing after 1996. Andreas Papandreou resigned for health reasons and was succeeded by Kostas Simitis. After Andreas Papandreou's death, Simitis also took over the helm of PASOK and gave a new direction to his country's foreign policy. Simitis was a follower of the modernization process launched by Venizelos and Karamanlis. This signified strict adherence to a Europe-centered foreign policy. Even during Papandreou's term, Simitis was critical of the populist policies then in vogue. When he took power, he chose as his main goal the objective of turning Greece into a respected member of the EU. For this he followed a consistent course aimed at strengthening Greece economically and politically. This implied accelerating the economic reforms initiated by the Konstantinos Mitsotakis government, abandoning the populist nationalist rhetoric that created artificial questions and forced additional defense expenditures, and establishing good relations with neighbors in the region and above all in the Balkans.

As a result, minority problems with Albania were overcome after Simitis assumed office. Economic relations with Romania and Bulgaria were developed, the Macedonian crisis was resolved, and, while ties of friendship of Serbia were reinforced, effective policies were followed in Bosnia and Kosovo.

Simitis also intended to establish a serious dialogue with Turkey, but it was not so easy to change entrenched ill feelings. In this area he was confronted with two obstacles. In his country and even within his own party, nationalist elements made up the inner circle around Papandreou. In Turkey there were the unstable governments that got increasingly hawkish in foreign policy as economic and political conditions worsened.

The Kardak crisis that occurred soon after Simitis took office revealed just how difficult it would be to improve relations with Turkey. Greece used its increasing prestige within the EU and took advantage of Turkey's political difficulties, notably in connection with the PKK and political Islam, to apply pressure on Ankara in the framework of human rights. To overcome the tension with Ankara and the lack of a proper dialogue, it was necessary to wait for a serious crisis. In the past, dialogue had often come after the eruption of a crisis. This time the crisis over Abdullah Öcalan led to a dialogue that allowed an atmosphere of friendship to emerge after the Marmara earthquake.

When examining Turkish-Greek relations in the 1990s, it is necessary to bear in mind a new element that was added to the existing bilateral issues. This was the struggle by the two countries to become regional powers in the context of the New World Order. Turkey carried out this struggle by developing its relations with the U.S. and using its historical ties with regional countries to the detriment of Greece. Greece used its membership in the EU and took advantage of Turkey's political and economic shortcomings. Turkey appeared to be ahead in the first half of the decade, while Greece gained the advantage in the second half. But by the end of the decade both countries realized that confrontation was not getting them anywhere and was only aggravating what was already an unsatisfactory situation. As a result, they decided to enter into the new century engaged in a dialogue.

THE FIRST STEPS TOWARD RAPPROCHEMENT (1990–1993)

As the post–Cold War transformation in the world scene began to take shape in 1990, Greece was confronted with serious political problems. The end of the ten-year Papandreou and PASOK era coincided with the Koskotas banking scandal, widespread rumors of other cases of corruption, and an economy in serious difficulty. Although PASOK had lost the election in 1989, it took a whole year to form a stable government with a parliamentary majority. After three elections in quick succession, the New Democracy Party government was formed in April 1990 under the leadership of Mitsotakis.

Mitsotakis promised political transparency under the slogan katharsis (clean-up) and introduced an austerity program to rehabilitate the economy. This was a time to turn inward, but the transformation of the global scene and the upsetting of the status quo in the Balkans compelled Athens to focus its attention on foreign policy. As new states emerged in the Balkans and the Caucasus, Athens was confronted with new problems, particularly with Macedonia. Meanwhile Ankara was conducting an active policy toward these countries. These developments drove Athens to seek a dialogue with Turkey. Nothing much emerged from this dialogue, however, because of the problems confronted in Western Thrace and Cyprus.

A. The Search for a Dialogue with Turkey

During PASOK's tenure of power, Greek-Turkish relations had steadily deteriorated, except for the brief interlude during the so-called Davos process. When Mitsotakis took office, he indicated that he wanted to visit Ankara and start a serious dialogue between the two neighbors.

The Greek and Turkish prime ministers met at the London NATO Summit held on 6 July 1990 and decided that their dialogue should be pursued. But they preferred not to address the basic issues of the Aegean, Cyprus, and the worsening question of Western Thrace.

Notwithstanding the decision to pursue the highlevel dialogue, developments in relations with the U.S. and EU rather than bilateral issues conspired to prevent the dialogue. Greek foreign minister Antonis Samaras declared that the Defense Cooperation Agreement signed by Greece and the U.S. on 8 July 1990 was a shield against the Turkish threat. This declaration met with a rebuke from Turkey. The U.S. gave verbal assurance to Turkey that they would sign no document that discriminated against one of their allies, but this did not suffice to dispel the suspicions on both sides of the Aegean. Furthermore, soon after the agreement signed with the U.S., Greece vetoed the EU initiative to release the loan to Turkey in the amount of $700 million that had been blocked since 1980. The Greek veto on an EU initiative that was designed to normalize Turkey's relations with the EU led to renewed tension between the neighbors.

A new page was turned when Mesut Yılmaz became prime minister in Turkey. In a letter to his Greek counterpart Mitsotakis, Yılmaz called for a renewal of the dialogue. In 1991 there was talk of a nonaggression pact between the two countries. But when Greece alleged on 17 May that its airspace had been violated by Turkish aircraft, the new prime minister's initiative came to nothing.

In spite of the unresolved questions inherited from the past, the two governments persisted in restoring the Greek-Turkish dialogue. As a result, the two prime ministers met in Paris on 11 September 1991 on the occasion of another meeting that both were attending. In the joint communiqué issued after the meeting, the prime ministers reiterated their desire to develop bilateral relations in all fields. They also announced their intention to establish a working group to prepare a draft Treaty of Good Neighborliness, Friendship, and Cooperation to be signed on the occasion of a visit by Mitsotakis to Ankara at the first opportunity. They also announced that they had examined the work of the UN secretary-general in connection with his mission of good offices on Cyprus and had noted a divergence of views on this issue.

It will be seen from the foregoing that the two sides were unable to implement their desire to improve bilateral relations when it came to specific questions. When the question of holding a summit of four (Turkey, Greece, and the two Cypriot communities) came up, Yılmaz, with an approaching election in mind, asked for a postponement until after the election. The Greek public took this as another instance of Turkish intransigence.

In 1990 and 1991 developments in the Balkans and the Caucasus and Turkey's active policy toward the newly independent states were causing Athens concern. This was especially true with respect to Turkey's relations with Macedonia, which had become a major foreign policy issue for Athens. That is why Athens was pursuing a double game. It was conducting bilateral talks with Turkey while at the same time it followed an anti-Turkish course within the EU. As a member of the EU's defense organization, the WEU, it saw to it that Turkey was only admitted as an observer. Greece took advantage of Turkey's internal weaknesses and did not shrink from contacts with the PKK.

Following the election of October 1991, a new coalition government was formed in Turkey consisting of the True Path Party (DYP) and the Social Democratic People's Party (SHP). The Özal era had come to an end. The pragmatic approach to relations with Greece as practiced by Özal was abandoned and the traditional policies and theses were resurrected. The bureaucracy was again allowed to take charge of bilateral relations. Nevertheless, prime ministers Demirel and Mitsotakis did meet on three different occasions during 1992.

The first of these meetings took place at Davos on 1 February 1992. Compared to previous meetings and especially the 1988 Davos meeting, this meeting was carefully planned. No room was left for unrealistic expectations to take hold. Turkey attended the Davos meeting with a delegation of sixty-five officials. This was an attempt to demonstrate Turkey's strategic importance in the New World Order and also an attempt to downgrade Greece's place in its new foreign policy. There were three items in the joint communiqué issued after the meeting: (1) the two foreign ministers would meet soon in connection with the Treaty of Good Neighborliness, Friendship, and Cooperation that Mitsotakis would sign during his visit to Ankara; (2) Turkey supported Greek participation in the Black Sea Economic Cooperation project; (3) the two sides agreed to seek a just, lasting, and early solution to the question of Cyprus through negotiations and to support the good offices mission of the UN secretary-general.

After Davos, the two prime ministers met again when Mitsotakis came to İstanbul on 21 June 1992 to attend a baptism ceremony at the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate. By then, however, attentions were riveted on the Cyprus negotiations taking place in New York, and the atmosphere of dialogue began to sour because of the lack of progress in these negotiations. As a result, when Mitsotakis came to Istanbul again the following week to attend the Black Sea Economic Cooperation Summit, he confined himself to signing the Summit Declaration and avoided bilateral talks with Demirel. At a time when bilateral relations were once more entering a difficult phase, Greece succeeded in participating in a project, at Turkey's invitation, that Athens feared would allow Ankara to pursue an active policy in the Black Sea region.

B. Minority Questions

From 1990 to 1993, when Greece and Turkey were seeking to establish a dialogue, the Muslim-Turkish minority of Western Thrace and the patriarchate in Istanbul began to make their voices heard for the first time after a long silence.

1. Developments in Western Thrace

When a court order was obtained by the PASOK government banning the use of the adjective "Turkish" in their titles by minority associations in Western Thrace, public opinion in the region was stirred into action. Yet this pressure of public opinion was not enough to get the questions affecting the minority included in the agenda of the Turkish-Greek talks that got underway after Davos. The minority took advantage of the changed international environment to press their cause directly in Athens without seeking Turkey's support. During the 1990s the Turks of Western Thrace made themselves heard as they had never done before (the following account of the disturbances in Western Thrace is based on Oran).

Although Mitsotakis came to office with the determination to start a real dialogue with Turkey, he quickly discovered that he was confronted with a question in Western Thrace that would frustrate his intention. The issues of the election of muftis, the trial of Sadık Ahmet, and the amendment to the electoral legislation that made it impossible for the Turks to elect an independent deputy (all dating from PASOK times) were agitating the Turkish minority. Furthermore, the question of minority rights acquired a new importance in the New World Order of the 1990s, and the Turkish minority was able to express its reaction more strongly. But the Greek government was unable to isolate itself from the wave of intensified nationalism sweeping through the Balkans. The rhetoric of nationalism was also being stirred by the dispute with Macedonia. All of this prevented Athens from responding with tolerance to insistent demands for respect for minority rights coming from Western Thrace. During the 1990s the question of Western Thrace ceased to be a Turkish-Greek issue and became a European issue. Athens began to be criticized at different international platforms, starting with the EU, because of its policies toward the minority in Western Thrace.

The Question of the Muftis

According to Greek Law No. 2345/1920 regulating the status of muftis, they were to be elected by the Muslims of their districts. The authority of the minister of national education and religious affairs in this area was confined to striking out the candidacy of those who met with his disapproval. This law was never implemented, however. Since 1920, when the law came into effect, the muftis had always been appointed by the government; because the minority was largely passive, no one had objected to this practice.

The question came up when the mufti of Komotini, Hüseyin Mustafa Efendi, died in 1984. The Greek government appointed Imam Rüştü Ethem as acting mufti, a man who was educated in Egypt and was considered close to the government. When the community reacted negatively to this appointment and Rüştü Ethem resigned, the new appointee was Hafız Cemali Meço, educated in Saudi Arabia and also considered close to the government. Meço, who had been appointed acting mufti, declared that he would disregard the pressure and criticism coming his way and maintain his post until a full-time mufti was appointed.

As public pressure mounted on the government to abide by the provisions of Law No. 2345/1920 and allow the mufti to be elected by his flock, the government submitted a bill to parliament entitled "Method of Appointing Muftis, Their Attributes, Conditions of Service, and Manner of Replacement." Under this bill, the muftis would be appointed by the minister of national education and religious affairs upon the advice of the governor. In this way, muftis would be reduced to the status of civil servants. Parliament did not consider this bill in 1989 and 1990.

When Mustafa Hilmi, the mufti of Xanthi, died on 5 February 1990, the Greek government appointed his son, Mehmet Emin Aga, who enjoyed the support of the minority, as acting mufti. On 30 March 1990 Meço, the acting mufti of Komotini, was appointed full mufti by a cabinet decision. This left the minority in a quandary, because Mehmet Emin Aga had been a strong opponent of the selection of muftis by appointment. This difficulty was overcome with an election held in the mosques of Komotini on 17 August 1990 after Friday prayers. As a result, the appointed mufti Mehmet Emin Aga was elected mufti by his flock.

On 24 December 1990 the Greek government issued Decree No. 182 with the force of law regulating the status of muftis in Western Thrace, while rescinding Law No. 2345/1920. The people of Komotini refused to recognize this decree and on 28 December elected İbrahim Şerif as mufti. This meant that Komotini had two muftis, one "official" and the other "elected." The government did not back down in the face of the popular opposition. Decree No. 182 was approved in parliament on 22 January 1991, and the government appointed Mehmet Emin Şinikoğlu as mufti of Xanthi.

The issue of muftis began to strain Turkish-Greek relations once again in February 1993. The Religious Affairs Directorate of Turkey sent muftis to Western Thrace on the occasion of the holy month of Ramadan. When the muftis arrived in Western Thrace on 20 February, the Greek authorities told them to deal with the appointed muftis Meço and Şinikoğlu. The Turkish clerics replied that they would not deal with muftis who did not enjoy popular support. The Greek Ministry of Public Order warned the clerics that they would be arrested unless they left the country, upon which the muftis returned to Turkey.

The Sadık Ahmet Incident

The world became aware of the troubled situation in Western Thrace through an incident involving Dr. Sadık Ahmet that occurred at the time of the difficulties over muftis. In the election that swept PASOK out of power in 1989, Sadık Ahmet, İbrahim Şerif, and İsmail Rodoplu were candidates and were under investigation for their campaign manifestos. Rodoplu was elected and thereby gained parliamentary immunity. Sadık Ahmet and İbrahim Şerif were not allowed to participate in the election on the grounds that their applications for candidacy were incomplete. As a result of the investigation, three charges were brought against these two. They were accused of creating an atmosphere of terror and anarchy, spreading slanders and false information, and using the adjective "Turkish." Use of this word meant stoking violence among citizens, spreading discord, and thus disturbing the peace. The defendants were unable to find Greek lawyers willing to defend them in their trials. Sadık Ahmet was being tried for spreading falsehoods by claiming that the Greek authorities were denying the Turkish minority the right to buy real estate and also for falsifying documents by getting husbands to sign for their wives when collecting signatures for petitions. The trial took place on 25 and 26 January 1990. The defendants were absolved of spreading slanders and false information. They were found guilty of disturbing the peace, however, and each was sentenced to eighteen months in prison and banned from the exercise of his political rights for three years. According to the report of Helsinki Watch, the trial that had been observed by the foreign media and NGOs had not been conducted fairly by an independent court.

At the end of the trial, the accused were sent to the prison in Thessaloniki. As they left the courthouse on 26 January, a crowd of about five thousand people of the minority Turkish community that had waited outside was attacked by mobs. Before the tension died down, the minority decided to hold a prayer gathering to mark the second anniversary of the march that took place to protest Davos on 29 January 1988. As the formalities were being carried out with the police to secure permission for the gathering, the local radio announced that a certain Solidakis had been killed in a hospital by a Muslim fellow patient and demanded that permission for the prayer gathering be denied. Although this news was later found to be false and Solidakis had died on 21 January, angry mobs of Greeks started gathering on the streets. One of these groups attacked a Turkish coffeeshop. The fleeing customers took refuge in the building of the Turkish Youth Association of Komotini (the adjective "Turkish" referring to the Turkish identity of the minority). When the attackers failed to break into the building, they began to ransack the shops of the Turkish minority without the police intervening. Not a single Greek-owned shop was damaged. This was a minor-scale Greek version of the attacks and ransacking of Greek shops etc. in Istanbul on 6-7 September 1955.

The events of Western Thrace quickly affected Turkish-Greek relations. On 1 February Turkey's consul general in Komotini, Kemal Gür, sent a letter to the governor of Rodopi Province, informing him that he intended to visit the ransacked shops and asking for the necessary arrangements to be made to ensure his personal safety. Because the consul had referred to the victims as "kinsmen" in his letter, the Turkish ambassador in Athens was summoned to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and requested to have the consul recalled. When Turkey turned down this request, Greece, for the first time, declared a Turkish diplomat persona non grata in a note on 3 February 1990. Turkey then took the same action against Greece's consul general in Istanbul.

Two other trials against Sadık Ahmet were due to take place from 8 to 15 February 1990. These trials did not take place as scheduled as a result of international protests. When Sadık Ahmet was elected to parliament on 8 April 1990, he acquired parliamentary immunity, and the trials never took place.

Changes in the Electoral Law

It is not an accident that the Sadık Ahmet incident occurred at the time of the 1989 election. The political parties had made it a practice to include Turkish names among their candidates in order to get the support of the minority. As a consequence, there had always been one or two deputies of Turkish extraction in the parliament. The concept of independent deputies was introduced in the 1985 elections to defend the identity of the minority without pressure from Greek political parties and enjoyed support, although it was not successful. The Turkish border was closed in the election held in 1989, ostensibly because of a strike, in order to prevent Greek citizens of Turkish extraction from returning to Western Thrace to vote. The broadcasts of channel 2 of Turkish TV were jamined, and traffic fines as well as taxation-related fines were raised as part of the campaign to intimidate the minority. Despite this obstructive action, Sadık Ahmet succeeded in getting elected as an independent deputy.

When it proved impossible for any single party to form a government on 18 June, an early election was held on 5 November. In this election more measures were taken to prevent any candidate of Turkish origin from being elected. Military units were deployed to Rodopi Province in order to change the balance of voters. Measures were taken for Greek civil servants from the province serving elsewhere to return to their province to vote. As mentioned earlier, these measures were supplemented by the cancellation of the candidacies of Sadık Ahmet and Ibrahim Şerif on the grounds that their applications were uncompleted. Despite these tactics, İsmail Rodoplu succeeded in getting elected as an independent deputy. This election also failed to produce a result that would allow a party to form a government, and the ensuing coalition government decided to hold an early election for a third time in one year.

The election held on 8 April 1990 was conducted under the supervision of neutral international observers and the foreign press, most notably the Turkish press. In these circumstances, the election proceeded in a normal and legal manner, the only irregularity being the casting of votes by military personnel. After the counting of votes, Sadık Ahmet was elected from Rodopi Province and Ahmet Faikoğlu was elected from Xanthi. The election of two candidates from the minority as independent deputies represented a first in Greek history and made Athens uncomfortable, leading it to take measures to prevent a repetition of this.

When the New Democracy Party succeeded in setting up a government, it introduced a bill on 24 October 1990 that would change the electoral law. Although the bill was opposed by PASOK and the two independent members of parliament, it was adopted by the 151 votes of the New Democracy Party. The new Electoral Law No. 163 provided that an independent candidate could not be elected without obtaining more than 3% of the total votes cast in the country. In practice, this meant that independent candidates would no longer be elected to parliament. The 3% of votes required represented about 200,000 votes, which was more than the total minority population. This figure even exceeded the total number of registered voters in the region where the minority lived.

The new law was a serious blow to the political life of Western Thrace. Still, Sadık Ahmet went ahead and set up a new party. Even if it had no chance of being represented in the national parliament, the new party would have the primary objective of sending a member to the European Parliament. It was obvious that the region's problems could not be solved by merely pursuing a policy of obstruction. When Mitsotakis visited the region in May 1991, he felt it necessary to admit that Western Thrace had been neglected and promised to rectify this situation.

At a time when Greece's treatment of its minorities was being criticized by various international organizations, Turkey failed to stand behind the Western Thracians. Western Thrace was not on the agenda of the talks held by Mitsotakis and Yılmaz in September 1991. Both countries had their attention riveted on Cyprus as the talks got underway in New York. When Sadık Ahmet died in a traffic accident on 24 July 1995, the struggle for political rights in the region suffered a serious setback. But the question of Western Thrace was now firmly on the international agenda, and Greece was under the scrutiny of political and legal organizations dealing with human rights. This international attention would lead to significant changes in the way Greece dealt with its minorities, particularly after 1995.

2. The Views and Policies of Patriarch Bartholomeos regarding the Patriarchate and the Orthodox Seminary

In the post-Cold War New World Order, minority rights came to the fore. This stirred the minority in Western Thrace into action. The same developments would probably have occurred in Turkey too if the balance between minorities established under the Treaty of Lausanne had not been upset, with the numbers of the Greek Orthodox in İstanbul having dwindled to next to nothing. But the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate, the symbol of the Greek Orthodox community of İstanbul, took advantage of the new international environment and spoke up after many years of silence (see Box 2-10 in Section 2).

At a time when the question of muftis in Western Thrace was in the limelight, the death of Patriarch Dimitrios in Istanbul brought up the question of electing a new patriarch. At first there was talk of electing Archbishop Yakovos of the American Orthodox community, but this idea was abandoned when the press reported that Yakovos was banned from entering Turkey because of his previous anti-Turkish activities. Bishop Dimitris Arhondonis of Chalcedon was elected patriarch on 2 November 1991 and assumed the name Bartholomeos.

After his election, the new patriarch, a native of Imbros, was faced with a great deal of rivalry from the religious hierarchy. Since the collapse of the USSR and its succession by the Russian Federation, the patriarch of Moscow was becoming even more powerful on the basis of a religious revival and was beginning to challenge the historical position of the patriarch of Istanbul, who was first among equals (primus inter pares).

The patriarch of Moscow claimed that the Patriarchate of Istanbul had lost its flock, was under the control of the Turkish state, and was merely symbolic, whereas its Russian counterpart had the largest following and should be recognized as having a higher position in the religious hierarchy. In making this claim, the Russian patriarch was not acting on the basis of strictly religious concerns. The large Orthodox communities in the former Soviet republics that had broken free and the churches in these new states were considering coming under İstanbul rather than Moscow, out of fear that the latter would exert pressure on them. The rivalry between the two patriarchates was political as much as it was religious. Both Moscow and Ankara, which wanted to be active in the region, were following developments with great interest. Ankara was faced with a dilemma. It wanted to see the Patriarchate of Phanar as a vehicle for engaging in closer cooperation with the Orthodox countries of the region. At the same time, it did not want to see the patriarchate acquiring an ecumenical status once again.

Patriarch Bartholomeos preferred to follow an active policy. In 1992 he held a meeting at Phanar with the representatives of the churches under his wing. During the same year he paid visits to the Bishoprics of Athos and Crete, the Patriarchates of Antioch and Moscow, the autonomous Churches of Greece, Romania, and Bulgaria, the Swedish Lutheran and Orthodox Churches, the German Evangelic Church, and the Romanian Catholic Church. In addition to these ecclesiastic contacts, he attended a dinner in his honor hosted by Jacques Delors, president of the European Commission in Brussels. He was also entertained by the British royal family. These visits continued in subsequent years. They would not have attracted as much attention as they did if the patriarch had not begun to use the word "ecumenical" with his title.

In February 1994 a meeting was held in Istanbul on the theme of International Peace and Tolerance. When signing the English text of this meeting's final communiqué, the patriarch added the adjective "ecumenical" to his title. This attracted public attention in Turkey and triggered a debate. Other countries recognized the patriarch as ecumenical, so the question concerned only Turkey and the Turkish state's relations with the patriarchate. The question has remained unresolved to this day.

Another question concerns the Theological Seminary at Heybeliada (on the island of Halki), to which Patriarch Bartholomeos attributed great importance (see Box 7-37). This issue is directly related to the future of the patriarchate. The future clerics who go to Greece from Turkey for their training tend not to return; as the hierarchy in Istanbul grows older, it will prove very difficult to find clerics to pursue the functions of the church. It is estimated that by the middle of the twenty-first century the patriarchate will de facto disappear, due to lack of clerical personnel. Based on this argument, Patriarch Bartholomeos has been pressing for the reopening of the seminary at Heybeliada under a special status in the course of his local and foreign contacts.

Although the activities of Patriarch Bartholomeos found some support in public opinion in Turkey, the Turkish state's stance vis-à-vis the patriarchate did not change over the years. The rise of Islamic fervor and the adoption of the rhetoric of religious tolerance in Islamic quarters did not allow the state, forever obsessed by the Treaty of Lausanne and also in constant fear of the Islamism threat, to review its approach. If Turkey could bring itself to adopt a more flexible policy toward the patriarchate, it could improve its image in the West, establish much warmer relations with the former socialist states, and strengthen its negotiating position when dealing with Greece on the issue of the minority in Western Thrace.

C. Developments in Cyprus

When the Denktaş-Vassiliou summit in February 1990 ended in failure, there was much disappointment among those in the two Cypriot communities and beyond who entertained hopes for a breakthrough.

Box 7-37. The Question of the Theological Seminary of Heybeliada

The Halki (Heybeliada) Seminary, founded in 1844, trained clerical personnel for the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate of Phanar. In 1951 the seminary absorbed the School of Higher Theology, providing four-year courses, by a decision of the Ministry of Education.

The Ministry of Education closed down the seminary by a decision dated 12 August 1971 and numbered 101787. According to Phanar sources, the decision was verbally communicated to two bishops in Ankara. The legal justification for this action was the decision of the Constitutional Court that determined that article 1 of Law No. 625 regulating private schools was unconstitutional. This finding resulted in private schools of higher learning being turned into public institutions and taken over by public universities. The seminary, however, had not been officially considered a school of higher learning until then. This was indicated in the seminary diplomas, which bore this inscription. "According to the regulation approved by the Ministry of Education on 25 September 1957, with the reference number 151, the graduates of the Theology Section are considered to have an education at the level of schools providing vocational education one year beyond high school." This being the case, graduates of the seminary did not have the right to carry out their military service as reserve officers like university graduates but served as privates. In addition, they had to submit to an examination to gain admission to a university

The section of the seminary that operated at the secondary level continued to function for a while as the Greek Private Heybellada High School for Boys. When there was a drastic drop in the number of boys attending the school, the patriarchate petitioned the government to have the school closed. This petition was turned down. The school limped on until 1984, when it ceased operations. It was never formally closed.

Eventually, it became very difficult to obtain clerics to serve in Phanar. The Turkish citizens of Greek origin numbered less than two thousand, and the few among them who wanted a religious career began to attend theological seminaries abroad.

Under these dircumstances, it is likely that Phanar will practically cease to function by the middle of the twenty-first century.

This prospect is seen in very different ways by the Turkish pub lic. One group that perceives Phanar as a mainspring of mischief within Turkey claims that the patriarchate aspires to become another "Vatican," For this group, it is in Turkey's interest to have the institution ended for want of personnel. Another group sees things differently. For this group the end of Phanar, in the present circumstances, would only serve the interest of the Patriarchate of Moscow and the Russian Federation, Phanar is a Turkish institution, and the Turkish minority of the Dodecanese Islands, which fall under Phanar's jurisdiction, fares better than the minority in Western Thrace under the jurisdiction of the Bishopric of Athos. This group also claims that keeping Phanar going even though its flock has been greatly reduced would help burnish Turkey's tarnished image in the field of human rights. As a matter of fact, Western dignitaries, including U.S. presidents, have repeatedly pressed Tura key to allow the Heybeliada Seminary to operate once again Article 40 of the Treaty of Lausanne recognized the equal rights of minorities to establish, operate, and supervise all types of schools. Since Turkey allowed private institutions of higher learning to operate once again during the 1980s as "foundation universities," could not the Halki Seminary operate under this system? There is a legal impediment in article 24 of the 1982 Constitution and in article 3 of the law on the Higher Learning Council that prevents private universities from operating military or theological institutions of higher learning. As an interim solution to this problem, the governing body of the Higher Learning Council in 1999 proposed the establishment of a Department of World Religions within the Faculty of Theology of the University of Istanbul to serve the needs of minority communities in the area of training their ecclesiastical personnel. But neither Phanar nor the Armenian and Jewish communities, which were experiencing similar difficulties, were ready to have their priests or rabbis trained in an institution attached to a faculty of theology dealing essentially with Muslim teachings.

(B. ORAN)

The summit broke up when, at the last minute, Vassiliou refused to recognize the right of the Turkish-Cypriot people to self-determination. The Security Council then met and, basing itself on the secretary-general's report, adopted resolution 649 on 12 March 1990. The resolution called on the leaders of the two communities to cooperate with the secretary-general to form a federation within the framework of the 1977 and 1979 summit agreements that would be bicommunal in regard to the Constitution and bizonal in regard to the territory. Resolution 649 sought a solution stressing the equality of the Turkish community. For this reason, the resolution met with a positive reception in the TRNC and Turkey but failed to silence the opposition within the Turkish-Cypriot community.

The political and economic troubles besetting the TRNC had greatly strengthened the opposition. When the summit of February 1990 broke down, Denktaş came under increased fire from those who accused him of opposing a settlement. Conscious of the difficulty of continuing the intercommunal talks under these conditions, he went to elections to renew his mandate. The way the election was held also came in for criticism. Shortly before the election, the settlers from Turkey were issued TRNC identity documents. TV broadcasts from Turkey were conveying the message that the Cyprus cause would be lost if Denktaş were to withdraw. Such practices raised doubts about the fairness of the election. Nevertheless, Denktas was given a new mandate with his election victory. The presidential election was followed by parliamentary elections. The National Unity Party (UBP) in power had done nothing to change the electoral law, although party members acknowledged the law's shortcomings. The opposition, which participated in the election as a bloc, decided to boycott the parliament. To fill the seats thus left vacant by the opposition a by-election was held, from which the UBP emerged as the winner. This resulted in an unhealthy situation in which the executive also entirely controlled the legislature.

A New Factor in the Question of Cyprus: The European Union

After these political events in the TRNC, an important development placed the question of Cyprus within a new context. In the new international restructuring, the EU had come to the conclusion that it had to get involved and contribute to the resolution of some major issues of the day if it was ever to become an effective counterpart to the U.S. in the international scene. This conclusion brought the EU into the Cyprus picture. The question could be resolved by removing Denktaş from the equation and starting direct negotiations with Turkey. Pursuing this course, the EU made Turkey's membership in the EU conditional on a Cyprus solution. The communiqué issued following the Dublin Summit of June 1990 declared that Turkey's relations with the EU depended on the question of Cyprus.

At a time when the search for a solution within the framework of the UN was going on and the EU's pressure on Turkey was mounting, the Greek-Cypriot government submitted its application for full membership in the EU on 3 July 1990, which would add a new dimension to the whole question.

Turkey reacted to this development in two ways. Foreign minister Ali Bozer made known Ankara's opposition by declaring that the Greek-Cypriot move was devoid of any legal foundation and lacked validity. At the same time, an agreement was reached with the TRNC, aimed at the tightening economic and social ties. In the framework of this agreement, a customs union between the two countries would be considered in the light of future developments. The two countries also declared their intention to dispense with passports and allow travelers to enter their countries with only their identity documents. Turkey was seeking to convey its reaction in the form of a warning by creating the impression that, if it became necessary, it might unite with the TRNC. This would actually be a very difficult course to take in view of the international uproar that this would probably cause.

When the Greek-Cypriot government made its application to the EU on behalf of the whole island on 3 July, Denktaş responded by issuing a memorandum in his capacity as president of the TRNC on 12 July. The memorandum was dispatched to Gianni De Michelis, president of the European Council, on 16 July. In his memorandum Denktaş explained the political and legal reasons for his opposition to the application. He pointed out that the Greek-Cypriot administration could not represent the whole island, that the application violated UN Security Council resolution 649, that the proper course for the European Council was to take no action in connection with the application, that any question that might be submitted to the commission should concern the legality of the application and not its content, and that he was not against membership in the EU but that membership of Cyprus must come after a political solution based on the intercommunal talks (see Box 7-38).

On 11 September UN Secretary-General de Cuéllar noted at a press conference that, when examining the Greek-Cypriot application, the EU must bear in mind that the resolution of the question depended on a comprehensive settlement with the consent of both parties and that resolution 649 called on all parties to refrain from any action that would make a solution more difficult.

Notwithstanding these objections, the European Council of Ministers decided on 17 September 1990 to treat this application in the regular way and sought an opinion from the commission. This came as no surprise to Ankara, but the official reaction was quite subdued. The reason was that the MFA wanted to pursue a more assertive policy, while President Özal saw the question of Cyprus as cramping Turkey's foreign policy and leaving it isolated in the world. Özal did not want to strain relations with the EU because of Cyprus and called for a muted response to Brussels.

The anti-Turkish policies pursued by Greece within the EU led Özal to take new initiatives in Cyprus in 1991. In doing this he was acting with the conviction that the Gulf War had demonstrated Turkey's strategic importance to the Americans. Özal abandoned the traditional Turkish policy, which held that the solution in Cyprus must emerge from intercommunal talks and proposed a conference (without consulting the government) that would bring together the TRNC, the Greek-Cypriot administration, Greece, and Turkey. Although Mitsotakis was not against a four-party conference, he held that the conference should include the five permanent members of the Security Council. The idea of an international conference had international backing. American special representative proposed a conference of five, which would include the representatives of the two communities, the Republic of Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey. This proposal was rejected by Turkey because it would confirm the existence of the Republic of Cyprus and allow the Greek Cypriots to be represented twice.

Convinced that it could use its special relationship with Özal, in 1991 the Bush administration sought ways to bypass Denktaş and resolve the question by supporting

Box 7-38. TRNC Objections to Cyprus's Application for Membership in the EC

In a memorandum issued on 12 July 1990, Rauf Denktas advanced the following reasons for his objections to the Greek-Cypriot gove ernment's application for membership in the EC on behalf of the whole island.

Political Reasons

1. The existence of two separate communities on the island was acknowledged even at the time of the British administration and the Republic of Cyprus was established in 1960 on the basis of the political equality of the two separate communities. Consequently, the Greek-Cypriot administration, which does not represent the Turkish-Cypriot community, cannot act on behalf of both communities and take an important political step like applying for membership in the EC. This is why the application was made on behalf of Cyprus and not the Republic of Cyprus.

2. The membership of Cyprus cannot be considered before there is a political settlement accepted by both sides, based on a federal republic that is bicommunal and bizonal. This principle must be observed, because the rules of the EC cannot be made to function in a divided island

 If the Greek Cypriots Join the EC under the label of the Republic of Cyprus, this would result in Greece having two votes Within the EC.

Legal Reasons

1. Article 185, paragraph 2, of the 1960 Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus reads as follows: "The integral or partial union of Cyprus with any other state or the separatist independence is excluded." The Turkish Community of Cyprus considers that this provision should be interpreted in the proadest sense to mean that Cyprus may not establish links with Greece even within the framework of the EC.

2. Article 50 of the Constitution contains provisions on the right of the president and the vice-president to make use of the veto. The article reads as follows: "(1) The President and the Vice-President of the Republic; separately or conjointly, shall have the right of final veto on any law or decision of the House of Representatives or any part thereof concerning (a) foreign affairs, except the participation of the Republic in international organizations and pacts of alliance in which the Kingdom of Greece and the Republic of Turkey both participate." This provision means that the president or vice-president can veto any step that would take the country into any international organization of which both Greece and Turkey are not members.

3. The 1960 Treaty of Guarantee declares that "the Republic of Cyprus undertakes not to participate, in whole or in part, in any political or economic union with any state whatsoever." Thus the restriction imposed by article 185 of the Constitution is also an international obligation.

4. Both the 1960 Constitution and the Treaty of Guarantee, one of the founding treatles of the Republic of Cyprus, are international treatles and under the guarantee of the parties. Because it, contravenes these treatles, the membership of Cyprus in the EC would also violate international law.

(M. FIRAT)

the idea of a quadripartite conference. There was a search for a way to detach the question and its resolution from its historical background. As pressure mounted to have Morphou ceded to the Greek Cypriots and to allow 27.5% of the island to remain under Turkish-Cypriot administration, the main hurdle remained the subject of political equality.

All the efforts in the direction came to nothing when early elections were called in Turkey. At a time when everyone's attention was focused on the elections that were to take place on 20 October 1991, the Yılmaz government was reluctant to take any step that might be used by the opposition in the election campaign.

The new conditions that emerged in 1992 brought to an end the process of abandoning traditional policies that had been set in motion by Özal as well as the pressures that had been mounting during 1991.

Negotiations over the Boutros-Ghali Set of Ideas

In 1992 Turkey entered the new year with a new government. The Motherland Party, in power since 1983, was now in opposition. On the subjects of Turkish-Greek relations and Cyprus, the new Justice Party-Social Democratic People's Party coalition government abandoned Özal's pragmatic approach and returned to the traditional foreign policy positions, allowing the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to play its usual role. The new government's policy was welcomed by Denktaş, who occasionally felt himself to be sidelined and unsupported during the previous government's tenure of power.

In 1992 Boutros Boutros-Ghali became UN secretary-general. A former minister of foreign affairs in Egypt, Boutros-Ghali was a Copt and was friendly toward the U.S. The Turkish Cypriots felt uneasy about his appointment, for Egypt traditionally had supported Greece and the Greek Cypriots. On 3 April 1992 he submitted an optimistic report to the Security Council, containing a Set of Ideas that would be the framework for an agreement. Denktas now assumed the role formerly played by the Greek Cypriots and appeared reluctant to engage in negotiations. In view of the fate of the Eastern European states with a federal structure that broke apart, sometimes ending in bloody conflict, Denktaş was having second thoughts about a solution based on federation. For him, preserving the status quo appeared to be the wiser course. The UN continued its search for a solution without regard to Denktaş's misgivings.

According to Boutros-Ghali's Set of Ideas contained in his report of 3 April 1992, the solution in Cyprus should be based on the political equality of the two communities and acceptable to both parties. The Cypriot state would have a single sovereignty and a single international identity even if it would be based on a federal structure consisting of two zones. The two communities would have 50-50 representation in the upper house of the legislature and 70-30 representation in the lower house. The proportion of representation in the executive branch would also be 70% and 30%. All powers not attributed to the federal administration would be exercised by the federated states. Free circulation would come into force simultaneously with the federal Constitution. The right to settle and to acquire property would be regulated by the federated states in accordance with the federal Constitution once the territorial adjustments had been made.

The first round of the intercommunity talks under the aegis of the secretary-general took place from 18 June 1992 to 14 August 1992. Under the agreed format, the secretary-general met with the two leaders individually and would bring the two together when he detected common ground. There were three basic issues: land, settlers, and the Constitution. Denktaş saw these three issues as a whole and held the view that there would be a final agreement only if the two sides could reach consensus on all three issues. International public opinion wanted to see the question of Cyprus resolved, so both Denktaş and Turkey were under pressure to act accordingly. Boutros-Ghali's actions reflected international opinion, and in the course of the negotiations he was leaning heavily on Denktaş.

The first issue taken up was territory. Boutros-Ghali produced a map that granted the Turkish side 28.2% of the island's territory, with Morphou left to the Greek side. Denktas made a counterproposal that left the Turkish side with slightly more than 29% of the territory (known as the 29+ formula), including the town of Morphou. He refused to accept Boutros-Ghali's map as a basis for negotiation. Although the two proposals were fairly close in regard to the division of territory, the main reason for the rejection of the map was that it called for giving up Morphou, a well-irrigated region containing the only aquifer in Cyprus. Furthermore, this map was prepared without regard to economic viability, ownership, or security. The acceptance of the map would result in substantial loss of land currently held by the Turkish side and cause 50,000 to 60,000 Turks to become displaced once more. Moreover, by accepting territorial concessions up front, the Turkish side would be deprived of a valuable negotiating chip when it came to discussing the Constitution of the new state.

When it became clear in the first week of August that the Turkish side could not be persuaded on the territorial issue, the questions of displaced persons and the Constitution were taken up. On the question of displaced persons, Denktaş wanted freedom of settlement to be on a restricted level, while Vassiliou claimed that this issue would be a test of the sincerity of the Turkish side.

The main sticking point in the negotiations over the Constitution was the question of Turkey's guarantees. Although Vassiliou accepted that the Treaty of Guarantee was still valid, he did not agree that it gave Turkey the right to intervene unilaterally. On 12 August the talks were adjourned.

On 21 August 1992 Boutros-Ghali submitted a report to the Security Council and attached his map to the report. By doing this, he was formalizing a map that Denktas had refused to accept as a basis for negotiation. Upon receiving this report, the Security Council adopted resolution 774 on 26 August. The resolution accepted the map as being part of the Set of Ideas and a basis for reaching a comprehensive framework agreement.

When the talks were resumed in New York on 26 October, Denktaş was in a somber mood because of the fait accompli he had been confronted with at the UN. Nevertheless, by the time the talks ended in November, he had accepted 91 of the 100 paragraphs contained in the Set of Ideas. This did not stop Boutros-Ghali from pointing his finger at the Turkish side for being the main obstacle to a solution in the report he submitted on 19 November 1992. The Security Council resolution 789 of 25 November was based on the secretary-general's report. This resolution angered the Turkish side: while the validity of the Security Council's previous resolutions was reiterated and some resolutions were singled out, no mention was made of resolution 649, acknowledging the political equality of the two sides. Boutros-Ghali's map was formally accepted as a basis for the negotiations. The resolution called on the Turkish side to adopt a position in conformity with the Set of Ideas. It also called for the following confidencebuilding measures.

- 1. Meaningful reduction in the foreign forces stationed in the island would be a step in the direction of removing all non-Cypriot military forces in the Republic of Cyprus as well as a reduction in defense spending by the Republic of Cyprus.
- 2. The district of Varosha would be brought under the control of UNFICYP (UN Force in Cyprus).
  - 3. Feasibility studies for resettling the persons who would be displaced as a result of territorial adjustments, notably in the region of Morphou, would be prepared, with both sides facilitating the accomplishment of this task.

Both sides would allow free passage of Cypriots and foreign nationals through the dividing line.

Vassiliou regarded resolution 789 as a personal success and wanted to capitalize on this success in the election due early in 1993, when he would be seeking a second term. The other candidates, however, starting with Clerides, maintained that the Set of Ideas could not be accepted as a basis for negotiation and contested all of its proposals. The Greek-Cypriot election had been turned into a referendum on Boutros-Ghali's Set of Ideas. In this environment, Vassiliou also began to express the view (in February 1993 in the second round of the election) that the Set of Ideas was not a basis for negotiation. Eventually, despite the support of AKEL, Vassiliou lost the election and was succeeded by the candidate of the right, Clerides.

On 30–31 March the two leaders met with Boutros-Ghali in New York and held talks together. At this point they agreed to resume their talks on 24 May, preceded by preparatory work in Cyprus. There was no longer any need to conduct the talks on the basis of the Boutros-Ghali Set of Ideas. The joint communiqué stated that the parties should negotiate fully while also using the Set of Ideas to strive to reach a mutually acceptable solution.

When the two sides got together in New York on 24 May, the Turkish side found itself confronted with a fait accompli. Without prior modification to the Turkish side, the five permanent members of the Security Council were present at the first meeting. Denktas's advisor Professor Mümtaz Soysal claimed that this move was an attempt to turn the Cyprus negotiations from a process conducted within the mission of the secretary-general's good offices by two equal communities into an international conference. He also alleged that this move was the price that had to be paid for Özal's attempt to ingratiate himself with the U.S.

In addition to the change being made in the procedure, the secretary-general introduced a "minipackage" of confidence-building measures that the parties were asked to sign or reject immediately. The minipackage contained the following elements.

- 1. The district of Varosha enclosed by barbed wire would come under UN control and be opened for resettlement. Both the Greek and the Turkish Cypriots would be able to benefit from this measure.
- 2. The international airport of Nicosia would be opened to international air traffic under the management and control of the UN. The airport would be opened to foreign airlines that possessed traffic rights to Cyprus, and Turkish-registered airlines would be able to acquire these rights.

3. Those foreign nationals entering Cyprus through Nicosia Airport would enjoy the right to go to either zone of the island unhindered.

Denktas left New York after declaring that he could not sign this agreement without first consulting the TRNC Assembly. Ankara was favorably disposed toward the minipackage. Denktaş paid an official visit to brief Ankara during a political crisis in the TRNC. The friction with the leader of the National Unity Party (UBP), Derviş Eroğlu, had increased. When he emerged victorious at the UBP congress, Hakkı Altun and Serdar Denktaş, both prominent members, left the party and formed the Democratic Party. When the UBP's opposition to Denktaş hardened, the president reappraised his position and declared that he would no longer take part in the intercommunal talks as the representative of his people. The minister of foreign affairs, Kenan Atakol, would go in his place to take up the technical aspects of the reopening of Nicosia Airport. When the secretary-general declared that he would not accept Atakol as representative at the talks scheduled for 14 June, the negotiating process came to an end.

What Denktas was seeking was a review of the Turkish negotiating strategy. At a time when federations in other countries were coming apart one by one, how could federation be the solution for Cyprus? Wouldn't a confederation based on the status quo be a more realistic and sensible solution than a federation? At that time, such a solution was not openly articulated; but after 1997 a solution based on confederation became the official thesis of both the TRNC and Turkey. The first signs of this change in strategy appeared to come from Denktas in 1993.

There were two developments in 1993 that facilitated Denktas's change of course: the EU's decision with respect to full membership for Cyprus and PASOK's electoral victory in Greece, which resulted in Papandreou becoming prime minister once again.

II. A RETURN TO STRAINED RELATIONS (1993–1995)

Two aspects of the Greek election in October 1993 drew the attention of the Turkish public. One was the new minimum 3% of votes required to be represented in parliament. As a result of this restriction, no minority candidate from Western Thrace was able to get elected. This had never happened before. Second, following the coming to power of Papandreou, there was an expectation in Turkey that the recently initiated Turkish-Greek dialogue would come to an end and a period of strained relations would set in.

Be that is it may, with his electoral success, Papandreou undeniably had been exonerated by the Greek people despite the allegations of corruption, his populist policies, and the criticism heaped on him since the late 1980s for his extravagant lifestyle. During this period Papandreou had been tried and acquitted for his part in the Koskotas banking scandal. Now he emerged strengthened not only vis-à-vis the opposition but also vis-à-vis his adversaries within PASOK, led by Simitis. With the silencing of his critics, he was the strong leader at the helm of his party. With his hand strengthened at home, he was able to resume his tough talk in the field of foreign policy. With a barrage of criticism against his predecessor Mitsotakis, Papandreou deplored the concessions made to Macedonia and Turkey and claimed that Greece had suffered a loss of prestige over the last four years. He would now take action to repair the damage.

A. Greece's Adoption of the "Common Defense Doctrine" and Worsening Bilateral Relations

When he assumed office, Papandreou's first action was to walk out of the talks being conducted with Macedonia under the aegis of the UN with a view to finding a solution to the problem arising from the Republic of Macedonia's name. Foreign minister Karolos Papoulias then gave a speech in which he outlined Greece's Balkan policy. In this context, Papoulias declared that relations with Serbia would be developed in all fields as he referred to the traditional historical, cultural, and religious ties between the two countries. The tough line was taken further when Greece decided to impose an embargo on Macedonia on 16 February 1994. These developments revealed clearly how divergent Greek and Turkish policies in the Balkan region had become.

Papandreou had been critical of the Mitsotakis government for making too many concessions to Turkey and now took steps to harden the Greek stand against Ankara. When Glafkos Clerides visited Athens in November 1993, the new Common Defense Doctrine was announced. According to this doctrine, (1) Cyprus would be included in Greece's defense area; (2) Greece would consider a Turkish attack on Southern Cyprus to be an attack on itself and a casus belli; (3) Greece and the Greek-Cypriot government would jointly formulate and implement their defense plans; (4) the two governments would coordinate their decision-making and actions in international forums.

The doctrine led to serious misgivings in Turkey. This was compounded when five PASOK deputies attended the Democracy Party (DEP: a Kurdish party in Turkey) Congress in December 1993. One of these deputies, Costas Badovas, gave a speech in which he declared: "We wish the brave Kurdish people success in their struggle. We sympathize with this rightful struggle and heartily support it." This indicated that Greece was going to exploit Turkey's weak spot, the Kurdish question. Ankara found this most disquieting and summoned the Greek ambassador to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, where he was issued a warning.

At this point the patriarchate issue came to the fore once again. In February 1994 the Appeal to the Conscience Foundation issued the Bosphorus Declaration after holding a meeting. The head of the Religious Affairs Directorate, Mehmet Nuri Yilmaz, refused to sign the English text of the declaration because the title of Patriarch Bartholomeos contained the adjective "ecumenical." On 24 February U.S. president Bill Clinton wrote a private letter to Prime Minister Çiller in which he appealed to Turkey to support the work of the patriarchate and help it to obtain recognition of its international status to relieve the tension in Ankara's relations with Greece.

Patriarch Bartolomeos stepped up his activities at a time when the question was attracting increased international attention. On 15 March 1994 a religious congregation was held in Istanbul, with the participation of the patriarchs and archbishops of Antioch, Jerusalem, Alexandria, Moscow, Belgrade, Bucharest, Sofia, Athens, Warsaw, Prague, and Helsinki. Patriarch Bartolòmeos presided over the meeting. At the time, many countries were confirming the ecumenical status of the patriarch. As expected, the meeting had the effect of irking Turkey. Meanwhile there were calls on Turkey to allow the Heybeliada (Halki) Seminary to reopen and to clarify and reorder the status and working conditions of the patriarchate. These calls were coming from the U.S. and the European countries. On 19 April Bartolomeos was invited to address the Union of European Parliaments. This was the treatment usually accorded to heads of state, and the patriarch's acceptance of the invitation triggered a new debate in Turkey. Some argued that, under the new international conditions, a reinvigorated patriarchate would enhance Turkey's prestige and increase its influence among its northern neighbors. Others maintained that the Treaty of Lausanne had confirmed the national jurisdiction of the patriarchate and that its current activities aimed at negating this denoted the existence of hidden plans.

Another source of tension with Greece was the coming into effect of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea on 16 November 1994. Greece claimed that the convention, which it had signed and ratified, granted Greece the right to extend its territorial waters to twelve miles, while Turkey kept repeating that it would regard such a move as a casus belli.

At a time when Turkish-Greek relations were particularly strained and tension was at its height in June 1994, Foreign Minister Papoulias visited Ankara, helping relieve the tension somewhat. In talks held with his Turkish counterpart Hikmet Çetin, they set aside divisive issues like the extension of territorial waters to twelve miles and decided to seek ways to restart a dialogue. The two sides agreed to refrain from statements and actions that might lead to tension and to maintain contacts at different levels. Both countries would take confidence-building measures, and they would conclude agreements in fields such as tourism, culture, double taxation, and promotion of investments. In response to Turkey's complaints, Papoulias gave assurances that his government was ready to engage in closer exchange of information on PKK activities.

The resumption of dialogue between the two countries following the visit of Papoulias came as a relief to the EU as it entered the final stage of the negotiations for the establishment of the Turkey-EU Customs Union and on the eve of the commencement of accession negotiations with Cyprus.

The Effects of Turkish-EU Relations on Turkish-Greek Relations and on the Question of Cyprus

In 1990 the Greek-Cypriot government applied for membership in the EU on behalf of the whole island. On 30 June 1993 the European Commission gave its affirmative opinion on the application.

The commission's opinion forced Turkey to consider its course if the Greek-Cypriot zone got the green light for accession to the EU. The leader of the DSP (Democratic Left Party), Bülent Ecevit, came up with an interesting proposal that also had the backing of Denktas. Ecevit declared that the question of Cyprus should not be discussed with those who refused to recognize the TRNC. He proposed the signing of an Autonomy Treaty with the TRNC whereby that state would be attached to Turkey in foreign relations and defense and fully autonomous in its internal affairs. When the decision was made at the Corfu Summit of 1994 to include Cyprus in Europe's expansion program, the TRNC began to lay the infrastructure to carry out Ecevit's proposals. On 29 August 1994 the Assembly of the TRNC adopted resolution 47, which contained the following provisions.

- 1. The Turkish-Cypriot people had a separate right to sovereignty. As long as this right was not recognized and the Turkish Cypriots were not accepted as one of the two peoples with equal political and legal status, meaningful negotiations could not be pursued to establish confidence-building measures.
- 2. The military and defense measures taken by the Greek-Cypriot zone and Greece made it imperative for the TRNC and Turkey to adopt equivalent measures in the fields of foreign relations, defense, and security.
- 3. It was essential to lift all economic restrictions between the TRNC and Turkey in order to commence the economic integration of the two countries.
- 4. With this resolution, the previous resolution of the TRNC Assembly declaring federation to be the only possible solution for Cyprus was repealed.

This resolution could be read as a measure taken by Denktaş to preempt any decision that Turkey might later make within the EU. For the first time, Greece was showing signs of not vetoing the Customs Union between Turkey and the EU. Denktaş was disquieted by the possibility that Greece might have been given a concession to obtain its consent to the Customs Union.

At the meeting of the Turkish-EU Council of Association held on 6 March 1995, the Customs Union was formally approved. Upon receiving assurances about the accession of Cyprus to the EU, Greece refrained from resorting to the veto. In signing the Customs Union Treaty, Turkey refrained from objecting to the establishment of a calendar governing the accession negotiations that the Greek-Cypriot government would undertake with the EU on behalf of the whole island. Furthermore, under the terms of article 16 of the Customs Union decision, Turkey was committed to conclude a trade agreement with the Greek-Cypriot government before 2001. This meant that Turkey had accepted the Greek-Cypriot government as an interlocutor.

The Customs Union became a subject of heated debate in Turkey. Those opposed to the treaty used the argument that Cyprus had been "sold out" in order to secure the Customs Union. This argument was used to obtain popular backing. On 13 December 1995 the European Parliament approved the treaty on the Customs Union that would come into effect on 1 January 1996. Coalition partners Çiller and Baykal wanted to use the EU success in the election due on 24 December 1995, so the treaty was quickly ratified by the TGNA. On the day of the ratification Baykal declared in Brussels that five years (until 2001, when Turkey had to sign a trade agreement with Cyprus) was a long time and that he was optimistic that the question of Cyprus would be settled by 2001.

Sensing the uneasiness in Turkey and the disquiet in Cyprus, President Demirel took action: on 28 December 1995 a Joint Declaration was issued by the TRNC and Turkey. The declaration said that the objective in Cyprus continued to be a solution based on two communities and two zones, that the Turkish guarantee would be maintained after reaching a solution, that Turkey would continue to defend the security of the TRNC pending a final solution, that the necessary measures would be adopted to block the military escalation provoked by the Greek/ Greek-Cypriot side, that Federal Cyprus would be able to accede to the EU along with Turkey after a final political solution, that economic ties between the TRNC and Turkey would be tightened, that Turkey would help ensure that the voice of the TRNC was heard in international organizations, and that for this purpose the cooperation between the foreign ministers of the TRNC and Turkey would be enhanced by establishing a permanent political consultation mechanism.

This declaration demonstrated that there were differences in Turkey on the issues of the Customs Union and Cyprus. The government was according priority to the Customs Union with the EU and was prepared to make concessions on the issue of Cyprus in Brussels. The military and civilian bureaucracy, however, was closer to the traditional policy and against the policy of seeking a Customs Union by taking a soft line on Cyprus. The president was acting on their behalf when he reassured Nicosia.

Even if the impression was given in early 1995 that relations with Greece were thawing thanks to the EU and the Customs Union, the outstanding problems remained unresolved. As a matter of fact, tension reappeared when Greece announced in the summer of 1995 that an air base would be established in Paphos within the framework of the Common Defense Doctrine and that long-range A-7 aircraft would be based there. Soon afterward Patriarch Bartholomeos attended the meeting dealing with Revelation and the Environment held in Patras on 22 to 24 September 1995. The claim of being ecumenical came up at the meeting, bringing the question of the patriarchate once again to the fore. As a consequence of Ankara's anger, the president of the Religious Affairs Directorate, Mehmet Nuri Yılmaz, canceled his trip to Patras even though he had previously announced that he would attend the meeting. The press release issued at the meeting also irked Alexios, the patriarch of Moscow. He accused Patriarch Bartholomeos of trying to detach the churches of the countries that broke away from the USSR from the Russian church.

]

The year 1995 ended with elections held in Turkey. In early 1996 Papandreou retired from politics for health reasons. These events marked the end of an era in the bilateral relations of Turkey and Greece. During his last twoyear term as prime minister, Papandreou created tension with Turkey on all the unresolved issues separating the two neighbors. He pursued tough policies toward both Macedonia and Albania. Greece began to be perceived as troublemaker by the EU as well as by the U.S. As a result of the pressure exerted by the EU, Athens refrained from using its veto against Turkey on the issue of the Customs Union and was rewarded by assurances about the membership of Cyprus in the EU. Greece had earned the image of being intransigent in its relations with Turkey and in its foreign relations as a result of Papandreou's hard line. This brought political damage to Greece and necessitated heavy military expenditures, with attendant effects on the Greek economy. The new Simitis government was fully conscious of the damage done to Greece and determined to follow a new course. But it would not prove easy for Greece to distance itself rapidly from the previous policies of recurrent crises.

III. FROM CRISIS TO FRIENDSHIP (1996-2000)

Greece came to a turning point in 1996 as a result of the changes that took place within PASOK. When Papandreou's health forced him to resign, the internal opposition within the party led by Simitis went into action. Papandreou praised Simitis as a technocrat with an orderly mind but did not want him as his successor in the post of prime minister, because he saw him as a politician without courage. The opposition, however, known as the "modernizers," would not be cowed. By 20 January 1996 Simitis would fill the seat vacated by Papandreou.

To understand the change that took place in Greek foreign policy after 1996, we must bear in mind Simitis's vision of Greece's place in the new world order. Simitis was the minister responsible for economic affairs in Papandreou's government and in that capacity handled relations with the EU. Simitis was critical of Papandreou's populist policies that were obsessed with Turkey. He knew that these policies were at the root of heavy defense spending and the economic burden that this kind of spending imposed. He was also aware of the negative impact that the image of bellicose nationalism that Greece had earned was having on his country's relations with the EU. Although the ideology of his party was not pro-Western, Simitis believed in a Western-oriented foreign policy for Greece in line with the policies of Venizelos and Karamanlis. His objective was to turn Greece into a country that enjoyed a high political, economic, and cultural standing within the EU. A strong Greece would be a stepping stone for the EU in the Balkans and the Mediterranean and serve as a model for the countries aspiring to be members of an expanding EU. This objective would call for a Balkan policy based on good neighborliness. In line with this, the problems inherited from the Papandreou era were quickly resolved. Greece developed its relations with Macedonia, Albania, Bulgaria, Romania, and the Yugoslav Federation, concentrating especially on economic ties.

Turkey was the only country with which the Simitis government was not able to make substantial changes in its relations. Papandreou had always kept alive the perennial Greek perception of the "Turkish threat" as the central issue of his foreign policy. A sudden change in the approach to this issue might have provoked a strong public reaction. Simitis was not the kind of politician that the Greek nation was used to, and he realized that a wrong move on his part on this sensitive issue could well bring his political career to a sudden end.

That is why Simitis made no attempt to change the course of Greece's Turkish policy in the short term and retained the program of arms modernization and the Common Defense Doctrine. Furthermore, he improved Greece's relations with the Balkan and Middle Eastern countries, whose relations with Turkey were also strained. The long-term policy developed by Simitis to deal with this question that was harming Greece's relations with the West and the Balkans consisted of drawing all outstanding questions, including Cyprus, into the EU, to let Turkey deal directly with the EU. This would allow Greece to terminate the arms race with a country that was militarily much stronger. It would also allow Greece to deal with Turkey on a political platform, where it had the political upper hand.

The first steps in this new policy would be to ease tensions with Turkey, start a process of dialogue, and end the belligerent image of Greece. But the Kardak (Imia) crisis that erupted soon after the government assumed power and the string of crises that followed did not allow these steps to be taken. To implement his long-term policy toward Turkey, Simitis had to await the Öcalan crisis, when tension was at its height. This interval also allowed him to get rid of the nationalist cum populist politicians inherited from Papandreou. The great Marmara earthquake in Turkey facilitated the taking of the first step.

A. The Crises

Soon after he took office on 20 January 1996, Simitis was confronted with the Kardak crisis, followed by the question of Gaudos, the tensions in Cyprus, Turkey's problems with the EU, and finally the Öcalan crisis. These crises continued until 1999. During this period both Greece and Turkey sought to isolate one another in the Balkans and the Middle East, which meant that their regional policies were also having negative effects on their bilateral relations. This was one of the worst periods in Greek-Turkish relations.

At a time when Simitis was relatively inexperienced, he overcame the crises without armed conflict and managed to position himself so that he could implement his long-term policies toward Turkey. In this way he scored points not only in his foreign policies but also in the area of domestic politics. He silenced the opposition within PASOK and asserted his leadership within the party. Simitis also abandoned the traditional rhetoric of the past and adopted a foreign policy that was up to European standards. He finally managed to get the Greek people to rally to his new-look policies. Before appraising the results of his policy toward Turkey, we shall examine the developments that led up to this situation.

1. The Crises of the Rocks and Islets in the Aegean The Kardak (Imia) Crisis

On 25 December 1995 the Figen Akad, a Turkish freighter, ran aground off the rocks of Kardak (the Greek name is Imia), also referred to as İkizce. The crisis that erupted rapidly brought Greece and Turkey to the brink of armed conflict and gave rise to the issue of sovereignty over islets and rock formations in the Aegean. This meant another contentious issue in the Aegean separating the two quarrelsome neighbors.

When the Turkish freighter sought help, it was Greece that responded, with Greek patrol vessels undertaking a salvage operation. On 29 December Ankara sent a diplomatic note to Greece and protested the intrusion of Greek patrol vessels into its territorial waters and the mounting of a salvage operation there. Athens claimed that the rocks were Greek and that it therefore had the right to carry out a salvage operation at that spot. When Ankara contested this argument, the issue became one of sovereignty. Tension began to rise. The argument conducted between the two ministries soon spilled over to the press and turned more dangerous.

Theodoros Pangalos, the minister of foreign affairs of the Simitis government, which had not yet obtained a vote of confidence, made a tough statement and alleged that Turkey was making territorial claims on Greece for the first time. Although Simitis wanted to defuse the tension with Turkey and allow things to cool off, he was compelled to follow the traditional policy after the Pangalos statement in order not to draw criticism. In the early stages of the crisis, a group of Greeks, encouraged by the mayor of Kalymnos, planted a Greek flag on one of the Kardak rocks. When a correspondent of the newspaper Hürriyet replaced this flag with the Turkish flag, the Greek navy and air force were placed on full alert. Greek naval commandos landed there on 29 January and replanted the Greek flag.

It was of some interest that the second rock had been left without a flag. Ankara ordered the navy into the Aegean Sea and placed the Kardak rocks under a blockade on 30 January. The situation was extremely tense. Turkey had just been to the polls, and difficulties were being experienced in forming a government. This was an opportunity for Tansu Çiller to deflect the public's attention from domestic policy to a foreign issue. She roused the public by manipulating the press, which was already involved, with her cry: "That flag shall go, and so shall that military presence" (Cumhuriyet, 30 January 1996). Greece was warned to remove its troops. In an operation conducted under the cover of Turkish warships at midnight on 31 December, special forces landed on the second rock and planted a Turkish flag. Turkish and Greek soldiers were now emplaced on the two rocks, just 325 meters apart. This bizarre situation was the most serious confrontation in the Aegean since 1987.

Not wanting a new source of tension in the region, Clinton intervened and, after consultations with both governments, secured the removal of the flags, the soldiers, and the ships from the two rocks. Simitis agreed with the American proposal that talks be held with Ankara but called for these talks to be put off until June, when the PASOK party congress was due to be held.

Although the Kardak crisis was overcome without an armed clash, this did not mean that the question had been settled. Both countries continued to issue statements reiterating their respective official legal positions with regard to islets and uninhabited rocks in the Aegean Sea and reasserting their claims to sovereignty.

It was obvious that the issue was not merely sovereignty over the tiny rocks of Kardak, which were unsuitable for human settlement. The two sides had come to the brink of war because sovereignty over the many islets and rock formations in the Aegean would determine the breadth of the territorial sea as well as the continental shelf (Box 7-39).

After the Kardak crisis, the Turkish armed forces undertook the task of preparing an inventory of all the islets/rocks not specifically mentioned in treaties. This would constitute the political and legal foundation of the Turkish thesis, based on the "gray areas" (areas in the Aegean that were not specifically designated as belonging to one of the countries). Because these islets/rocks did not belong to either side, they could not be claimed by Greece, according to this view.

Once the Kardak flare-up had been overcome through the American intervention, Simitis took a bold diplomatic initiative and undertook the first step toward drawing contentious issues between Turkey and Greece into the framework of the EU. For this he visited all of the EU countries to convey the Greek position. In a statement issued after the Kardak crisis, the European Commission expressed its solidarity with Greece, noted that Greece's borders were also the EU's borders, and added that the EU was aiming for a close relationship with Turkey through the Customs Union. This relationship had to be based on democratic principles, respect for international law, and the principle of nonresort to force under any circumstances.

Ankara was upset over the commission's position. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs briefed EU members on the subject and declared that Turkey did not accept the Greek contention that the sole issue in the Aegean was the continental shelf. For Turkey, there was a string of unresolved issues ranging from the territorial sea to the airspace. The ministry also declared for the first time that Turkey stood ready to refer the matter to the International Court of Justice. Turkey was not against referring the matter to the ICJ as a matter of principle but wanted the issues to be taken up first in bilateral talks, resorting to the court if no agreement was reached. In any case, the formulation of the submission to the court (the Compromis) would require preliminary talks.

Under pressure from Washington and Brussels, prime minister Mesut Yılmaz announced Turkey's position on the question at a press conference on 24 March 1996. According to Yılmaz, Turkey would pursue the following objectives.

1. All the outstanding questions between the two countries and particularly the questions and differences

Box 7-39. The Turkish and Greek Theses regarding the Kardak Rocks

In claiming sovereignty over the Kardak Rocks, Greece and Turkey relied on the same legal documents but interpreted these documents in different ways.

The Lausanne Peace Treaty

The last sentence of article 12 reads as follows: "Except where a provision to the contrary is contained in the present Treaty, the Islands situated less than three miles from the Asiatic coast remain under Turkish sovereignty." According to Greece, all pieces of land situated more than three miles from the Asiatic coast were beyond Turkish sovereignty. Since the Kardak rocks were located 3.6 and 3.9 miles off the Asian coast, respectively, they could not be under Turkish sovereignty. According to Turkey, this provision was laid down because the breadth of the territorial waters was 3 miles at the time. This was not a provision governing the sovereignty over pieces of land beyond territorial waters. If this had been the intention, it would have been stated explicitly that Turkey had relinquished sovereignty over the islands, islets, and rock formations lying beyond 3 miles instead of naming the islands one by one Article 15 of, the treaty named the Islands ceded to Italy one by one, with the phrase "and the Islets dependent thereon" added at the end; According to Greece, the rocks of Kardak were 2.3 miles away from the Turkish Island of Cavus, whereas they were located only 1.9 and 1.08 miles from the Island of Calimnos, which is among the Dodecariese Islands named in article 15. Consequently, they were ceded to Italy along with Calimnos, Turkey contended that the Kardak rocks were located at a greater distance than all the other Islands named in article 15 compared to the distance from the Asian coast and therefore could not be regarded as dependent. Furthermore, the rocks at Kardak could not be described as Islets and treated as such. Thus they did not come under Italian sovereignty under article 15.

Article 16, provided that Turkey renounced all rights and title over the territories situated outside the frontiers laid down in the treaty and the islands other than those over which its sovereignty was recognized by the treaty. Greece contended that Turkey renounced all rights and title over the Kardak rocks because they were not given to Turkey by the Treaty of Lausanne. Turkey contended that article 16 made reference to islands and not islets and rocky outcrops. Consequently, there was no question of renouncing sovereignty over islets and rocky outcrops. Furthermore, no other arrangement binding Turkey had been reached since the Treaty of Lausanne. Finally, the Tittoni-Venizelos and Bonin-Venizelos agreements concluded prior to Lausanne, funder which some of the Dodecanese Islands were transferred to Greece, never came into force.

The Ankara Convention between Turkey and Italy Dated 4 January 1932 and the Exchange of Letters and the Document Dated 28 December 1932

The convention of 4 January 1932 determined that Karaada, the island located in the Bay of Bodrum, belonged to Turkey. The convention also delineated the territorial waters between the Anatolian coast and the island of Kastellorizo (Megisti).

The Italian and Turkish delegations met on 28 December 1932 and drafted a text that established the areas of competence in the region in which the Kardak rocks were located. In this text, Kardak was left in the Italian zone. Turkey and Greece did not agree, however, on the legal validity of this text. Greece described this text as the annex to the convention of 4 January 1932. Turkey considered the text to be merely a record of the meeting, which—hever having been formally ratified or approved—had no legally binding effect. The treaty of 28 December 1932 was ratified neither by Turkey nor by Italy and never came into effect: in fact, Greece applied to Turkey on two separate occasions after 1947 and asked Ankara to ratify the treaty.

The 1947 Paris Peace Treaty

Article 14 of the treaty named the thirteen Islands under Italian sovereignty and stated that these Islands and the adjacent islets would be transferred to Greece, Greece regarded this article as a repetition of the Treaty of Lausanne and considered the terms "dependent" and "adjacent" to mean the same thing, Repeating the arguments employed in the case of Treaty of Lausanne, Greece claimed that sovereignty over the Kardak rocks had been transferred from Italy to Greece in fact, Greece enacted legislation confirming its sovereignty over Kardak at the time, and Turkey never made objections to this until 1996.

Although Italy transferred the Islands and adjacent islets under its sovereignty to Greece in 1947, Turkey argued that the transfer did not apply to the Kardak rocks because they were not under Italian sovereignty. Turkey also pointed out that the Soviet representative had expressed doubts about the legal status of the document of 28 December 1932 at the Paris Peace Conference and Insisted that Kardak continued to remain under Turkish sovereignty.

(M. FIRAT)

over the Aegean Sea should be settled in a comprehensive and lasting fashion.

- Turkey would be prepared to consider suitable settlement procedures that might come from third parties.
- 3. Agreement had to be sought rapidly on a set of comprehensive confidence-building measures with respect to the military activities of the two countries.
- 4. Ankara was ready to negotiate a political document or a friendship and cooperation treaty that would set the course of the relations between the two neighbors in the right direction.

To reach these objectives, Prime Minister Yılmaz enumerated the following procedures.

- 1. Turkey and Greece would engage in talks without preconditions.
- 2. Should the two reach agreement at the talks, they would resort to one or several of the procedures that would be most appropriate to the characteristics of the dispute: mediation, arbitration, or adjudication at the International Court of Justice.

Yılmaz made these proposals to free Turkey from the image of a country that was avoiding recourse to legal procedures and relying on military power in the conduct of its foreign policy. He also wanted to alleviate the pressure that was being exerted on Turkey to be more conciliatory. The proposals did not have the expected effect on Greece, however. The government spokesperson, Dimitris Reppas, responded by declaring that speeches were not enough and that Turkey would have to take concrete action to prove its goodwill.

Greece appeared to be cornered. Up to the time when Yılmaz made his announcement, Athens had been successful in its policies and had been able to expose Turkey as the bellicose side. It obtained a statement of support from Brussels and a warning that the frontiers of the EU and Greece coincided in the southern region. Now the Turkish prime minister's announcement would block the Greek policy of forcing Turkey and the EU into a confrontation. Minister of defense Gerasimos Arsenis, a rival of Simitis within the party, made a statement in which he proposed that Greece enter into military cooperation with Bulgaria, Russia, Syria, Armenia, Iran, and Iraq, countries that had outstanding problems with Turkey. He added that such cooperation already existed with Syria, which had made its air bases available to Greek aircraft. This statement was designed to score points for Arsenis in his political struggle with his rival, Simitis. It also revealed the second pillar of Greek regional policy, however, which consisted of cooperating with countries and organizations, including the PKK, that had contentious issues with Turkey in order to encircle and isolate Ankara.

Although tough anti-Turkish speeches were made prior to the PASOK party congress in June 1996 in order to pander to Greek public opinion, the dialogue with Turkey did get underway. The two foreign ministers, Emre Gönensay and Pangalos, met on 27 April on the occasion of the ministerial meeting of the Black Sea Economic Cooperation held in Bucharest. They agreed to meet again on the occasion of the NATO meeting to be held in Berlin in June. But this meeting failed to take place. The ostensible reason given by Greece was that the PASOK party congress would coincide with the Berlin talks and the political situation in Turkey was too unstable.

The Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs had been pursuing policies of relieving tensions and keeping the door to dialogue open ever since the Kardak crisis, but these policies had failed to yield results. In June the Turkish armed forces took a new initiative, which, although less serious than the Kardak crisis, brought about renewed tension, this time in the Mediterranean instead of the Aegean Sea.

The Island of Gaudos Crisis

At the meeting held on 31 May 1996 in Naples, NATO military planners were preparing for the NATO exercise that would be held in September. When the Greek representative asked for the inclusion of the island of Gaudos (located southwest of Crete) in the exercise, the Turkish representative objected on the grounds that the status of the island was under dispute.

This caused an uproar in Greece. Reppas, the government spokesperson, declared that this time Turkey had gone beyond the limit in its provocations and that Turkey's problems as a troublemaker were not with Greece so much as with international law and international order. Pangalos spoke in his particular style when he resorted to insults and declared that the Turkish officer who made the claim about Gaudos was probably mad and should be instantly dismissed if that was the case.

This subject did not agitate the Turkish public as much as Kardak did. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs was caught unaware; Ömer Akbel, the ministry's spokesperson, declared that the military delegation's statement in Naples had been technical rather than political in nature, that Turkey had made no specific claim, and that the matter would be examined further. He was trying to calm things down but went on to add that the status of some patches of land in the Aegean was not clear and that the question of whether Gaudos was among these would be investigated. This was a way of reminding everyone that Turkey had not abandoned its thesis about islets and rocky outcrops in the eastern Aegean.

Gaudos was closer to Libya than to Turkey and was uninhabited. Why had it become the focus of a crisis? Actually, both countries were suspecting a hidden objective behind the action of the other and trying to block it. After the coming into force of the Convention of the Law of the Sea in 1982, Greece was seeking to have a great number of uninhabited islets and rock formations formally confirmed as belonging to Greece in order to lay claim to larger tracts of the continental shelf. Athens was pursuing this aim through two methods. One was to include these formations in NATO exercises and thereby ensure that NATO recognized them as belonging to Greece. The second method was to open these islets to Greek, and therefore EU, habitation. To secure this, Greece even undertook to provide water and electricity free of charge to would-be settlers, but this was never implemented. This was a sure if roundabout way to overcome the provisions in paragraph 3 of article 121 of the 1982 convention. According to this paragraph, "Rocks that cannot sustain human habitation or economic life of their own shall have no exclusive economic zone or continental shelf."

Turkey was seeking to prevent this game from being played out and was contesting the sovereignty of these islets and rocky outcrops by advancing the thesis of the "gray areas." It should be admitted, however, that raising the issue in connection with a rock/islet to the southwest of Crete was going a bit too far.

The question of Gaudos was settled by the U.S. when it declared that there had been a misunderstanding between the two neighboring NATO countries and confirmed that Gaudos belonged to Greece.

But the dispute over islets and rock formations remained unsettled. The War Academy in Turkey prepared a confidential report entitled "The Geographic, Historical, and Legal Status of Islands, Islets, and Rock Formations in the Aegean Sea and the Policies Pertaining Thereto." This confidential report was leaked to the press in August. The report laid claim to all of the islets and rock formations located within six miles from the Turkish coast. The report caused a commotion in Greece and also led to arguments between the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the General Staff in Ankara. The MFA disagreed with the content of the report as well as the way it was leaked to the press. The report also reflected the difficulties Ankara was having in formulating its policies.

In 1996 Turkish-Greek tensions, which had been focused on the Aegean for a number of years, suddenly shifted to Cyprus.

2. Tension in Cyprus

a. Infringements of the Green Line

The strains between Turkey and Greece also began to affect the situation in Cyprus. When it was announced in August 1996 that a group of Greek-Cypriot motorcyclists would attempt to cross the Green Line, the ultranationalists in Turkey known as the Idealists began to go to the island in large numbers. When these men were received in the presidential palace by Denktas, it became clear that there would be violent incidents. On 11 August 1996 Turkish and Greek fanatics converged on the Green Line at Darinia and began to hurl insults and stones at each other. Both sides made attempts to breach the dividing line. When Thasos Isaak got snarled in the wire after crossing the line, he was beaten up by the Turks. The situation grew very tense after Isaak died in the hospital.

After the funeral of Thasos Isaak on 15 August, the Greek fanatics converged on Darinia once again. One of these fanatics, Spirou Solomon Solomou managed to cross the barbed-wire fence and began to climb the flagpole in order haul down the Turkish flag. Solomou was shot dead on the Turkish side by someone who was allegedly a former Turkish-Cypriot minister. These events took place under the scrutiny of television cameras and helped rivet the world's attention on Cyprus. Although the Turkish-Cypriot side came under severe criticism by the Greek-Cypriot government and Greece, contrary to expectations, the funeral of Solomou took place without any violent acts directed against the Turkish side.

Although the action to breach the Green Line had resulted in two deaths, it did not lead to major clashes. Violators of the Green Line from both sides, however, continued to be the targets of gunfire throughout the autumn of 1996.

b. The Loizidou Case

A decision made on 18 December 1996 by the European Court of Human Rights at Strasbourg helped draw attention to Cyprus once again. The court decided by eleven votes to six that a Greek-Cypriot national, Titina Loizidou, had been prevented by Turkey from gaining access to her property in the Turkish zone of Cyprus.

Wanting to draw attention to the plight of the Greek Cypriots who had been forced to abandon their homes and move to the south, in 1989 Loizidou entered the Turkish zone, where she was arrested by the Turkish-Cypriot police and deported. She lodged a complaint with the European Court of Human Rights that she had been prevented by Turkish-Cypriot police from going to her home located in Kyrenia.

What made the case interesting was that, because the TRNC was unrecognized, it was Turkey that was found to be at fault. Ankara issued a statement declaring that the events that led to the complaint occurred outside the borders of the Republic of Turkey, that Turkey had nothing to do with the case, and that, when Turkey recognized the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights, it specified that this would be valid only within Turkey's borders. The court rejected these arguments, stating that Northern Cyprus was under the control of the Turkish army.

On 28 July 1998 the court decided that Turkey was to pay Titina Loizidou 300,000 Cypriot pounds in material damages and 20,000 Cypriot pounds as moral compensation. Following the Loizidou case, thousands of Greek Cypriots applied to the court for compensation. The case helped reignite the idea that the time had come to settle the Cyprus issue.

c. The S-300 Missile Crisis

At a time when Cyprus was the scene of political, social, and legal tensions, the S-300 crisis added a military dimension.

An agreement was concluded on 5 January 1997 between the Greek-Cypriot government and Russia for the purchase and installation in Southern Cyprus of Russian-made ground-to-air S-300 missiles. These missiles had a range of 140 kilometers and were superior to American Patriot missiles according to some claims. The newspaper Financial Times wrote that the air superiority that Turkey had enjoyed in Cyprus since 1974 was coming to an end.

. But the issue was broader than the military balance in Cyprus that was being upset. Commentators in Turkey were declaring that henceforth Turkey itself would be open to attack. This implied that the balance of power between Greece and Turkey was shifting, and there was no way Ankara could accept such an outcome. Denktaş declared that the island was being dragged toward war. Demirel declared that Turkey would not allow the citizens of the TRNC to come under threat. The minister of defense, Turhan Tayan, went even further and declared that Turkey would do everything to prevent the installation of the missiles but would not hesitate to repeat the 1974 intervention if the missiles became a real threat.

This tough talk forced the U.S. and Britain into action. The pressure applied on Clerides began to produce results. At first he made defiant statements that it was the natural right of the Greek Cypriots to strengthen their defenses at a time when they were under the threat of the Turkish occupation forces. Later he declared that no date had been set for the emplacement of the missiles and that their objective was to draw attention to the urgent need to find a solution in Cyprus.

The S-300 crisis was particularly serious because it had the potential to change the regional balance of power. This is why the U.S. felt it necessary to get directly involved. After remaining on the agenda for about two years, the question was resolved when the missiles were transferred to Greece and deployed on Crete. Turkey was well beyond the range of the missiles at their new site. The series of crises in Cyprus until 1999 led to the acceleration of the process of admitting Cyprus into the EU and convinced international public opinion of the urgent need to find a solution to the question of Cyprus. Membership in the EU would remove Cyprus from the orbit of Turkish-Greek relations and place it firmly in the orbit of Turkish-EU relations.

Russia was the biggest winner in the crisis. It managed to sell its weapons, created headaches in NATO, asserted itself in the international scene, and disturbed Turkey, its rival in the former Soviet lands.

d. The Search for a Cyprus Settlement

The successive crises in Cyprus had the effect of accelerating the search for a settlement. The U.S. began to seek a resumption of the intercommunal talks, while the EU initiated the process of negotiations for the membership of Cyprus.

The Intercommunal Talks

After securing the termination of the war in Bosnia, the U.S., as the leader of the New World Order, began to tackle the unresolved disputes of the world that had the potential to lead to conflict. Top on this list of problems was Cyprus, which had been festering for forty years. On 4 June 1997 President Clinton appointed Richard Holbrooke, the architect of the Dayton agreement, as special representative for Cyprus. There was a conviction that this able diplomat was the most suitable person for securing a settlement in Cyprus. At first the Turkish side was apprehensive about this appointment, fearing that the system of marathon negotiations applied in Dayton might be used in this instance; but after receiving assurances that this would not be the case, it responded positively to UN secretary-general Kofi Annan's invitation of 9 June to resume the talks.

Denktaş and Clerides sat at the negotiating table in New York on 9 July for the first time since October 1994. At the talks that went on for four days, Holbrooke chose to remain in the background. The two leaders ended their session with the decision to meet again in August. In the meantime the two sides would study the UN plan. These were the main features of the plan.

- 1. There would be two federated states with political equality, and neither community would be able to make decisions detrimental to the other.
- 2. A mechanism would be established to settle disputes that might come up.
- 3. The federation would have a single sovereignty emanating from the two communities.
- 4. The Constitution that would be drawn up would come into force when approved by the two communities in separate referendums and would not be amendable without the agreement of the two federated states.
- 5. The Cyprus Republic to be established would be a secular state, and no one with a religious title would be able to assume public office in the new state.

- 6. The two federated states would be free to establish special relations with Turkey and Greece.
- 7. The Republic would have a single flag, but the federated states would be able to continue using their respective flags.
  - 8. Turkish and Greek would be the official languages.

Although the Turkish side did not approve of the UN submitting a plan once again, the process was not interrupted. The second round took place, as agreed, on 11 to 15 August at Glion, a locality in the vicinity of Montreux in Switzerland. Denktaş opposed to idea of a single and indivisible sovereignty for the new Republic. He also called for the suspension of the process to admit Cyprus to the EU as a member. The talks became stalled, and the third round of talks scheduled for October was called off.

It can be said that the Glion talks failed mainly because of the deterioration in EU-Turkish relations that occurred at that time. The EU was seeking to accelerate the process of EU membership for Cyprus at Greece's behest. At the same time, it was in the process of freezing Turkey's membership after having obtained the benefits of the recently established Customs Union. At this point Turkey was grappling with the problems of human rights and political Islam. This situation was forcing Turkey to bring the question of Cyprus to the fore.

The EU, Cyprus, and Turkey

Turkey's Customs Union had created disappointment in 1996. The economic indicators proved that Turkey had not benefited from this union and the political situation was not encouraging. At the Intergovernmental Conference, the preparations for the accession of Cyprus were initiated, while there was no mention of Turkey's candidacy. Prime Minister Çiller was confronted with domestic political difficulties and was seeking to overcome them with a foreign policy success. She began to convey the message to the Europeans that, if Turkey was given a firm calendar for accession, Turkey would be somewhat flexible regarding the joint Demirel-Denktaş Declaration of 1995 that demanded the simultaneous accession of Turkey and Cyprus to the EU.

Çiller's policy began to give rise to concern in some quarters in Turkey and made Denktaş uneasy. On 20 January 1997 President Demirel and Denktaş responded to the Çiller policy with a new declaration containing the following elements. Regional peace was being threatened by the military cooperation of the Greek-Cypriot government with Greece; to counter this policy, Turkey and the TRNC would continue to ensure an effective guarantee based on the 1960 Treaty of Guarantee; an attack on the TRNC would be seen as an attack against Turkey; joint military coordination and planning would be undertaken to deter such an attack; a common defense doctrine would be drawn up; in the event that Greece continued its activities aimed at setting up air or naval bases in Cyprus, similar facilities would be set up by Turkey in the TRNC; and the deployment of multinational forces to the island designed to dilute Turkey's guarantee would not be allowed. The declaration added that the green light given to the Greek-Cypriot government on the road to accession to full membership by the EU at Greece's prodding was a historic error that would destroy the process of intercommunal negotiations. The declaration stated that under the existing international treaties (see Box 7-38 above) Cyprus could only join an organization in which both Turkey and Greece were members, that membership of the EU could only come after a settlement of the Cyprus question, and that a decision to this effect had to be approved by the two peoples in separate referendums. It was also stated that each step that the Greek-Cypriot government took in the direction of EU membership would result in an acceleration of the process of integration between Turkey and the TRNC.

In addition the declaration affirmed that the representatives of the TRNC would form part of all Turkish delegations attending international meetings dealing with Cyprus where the TRNC was denied representation. Economic cooperation between the two countries would be expanded, and the economy of the TRNC would be strengthened with new cooperation projects. Finally, it stated that the mechanism for political consultation foreseen in the 1995 Demirel-Denktaş declaration would be expanded by including defense matters within its area of competence.

This step in the direction of integration with Turkey drew fire from the opposition in the TRNC. As Turkey hardened its policy, the EU responded by softening its approach to Turkey. The EU's Council of Ministers declared at its meeting of 24 February that talks and preaccession negotiations could not begin before there was a settlement in Cyprus and that the Turkish Cypriots would also take part when the talks and negotiations did take place. A divided Cyprus could not be admitted to the EU, and membership could be contemplated for the whole island only after a settlement.

But this softened tone was to prove temporary. The European Commission's report dated 15 July 1997 entitled Agenda 2000 did not include Turkey among the new candidates. The report also ignored the decision made in February by including Cyprus in the list of candidates.

This report was issued at about the same time that a new coalition government, the fifty-fifth government, assumed office in Turkey. It consisted of the Motherland Party, the Democratic Left Party, and the Democratic Turkey Party (DTP: Demokrat Türkiye Partisi) and included Bülent Ecevit and Şükrü S. Gürel, who were known for their hawkish views on Cyprus. The new government's program stated that the TRNC would continue to be supported in all fields and that the Cyprus issue involved not just the security of the TRNC but also the security of Turkey itself. The program stressed the principle of equality and confirmed that Turkey could not renounce Cyprus. This was the new government's response to the EU. The process of integration with the TRNC would begin.

Parallel to Turkey's new policy, Denktaş had developed a new thesis as he headed for New York to meet with Clerides on 9 July. Although the talks would ostensibly be based on federation, in reality they would be aimed at achieving a loose confederation in Cyprus.

Ankara's plans were put into implementation immediately. Gürel, the minister of state responsible for Cyprus, went to Nicosia in early July with an economic aid package. This was followed with a visit by Prime Minister Ecevit, who went to Cyprus in the company of seven ministers to participate in the commemoration of the Turkish operation in 1974.

A joint communiqué was issued following the talks held with the representatives of the TRNC. The communiqué dealt with the implementation of the policies that had been agreed upon. The TRNC would maintain its independent existence; but pending its recognition a special relationship would be established between the two countries in order to safeguard the TRNC's international interests. A framework agreement would be signed by the two countries for this purpose, and the functional and structural cooperation between the two foreign ministries would be regulated by a protocol. In addition, a joint defense doctrine would be formulated, a council of association would be set up that would bring together the two countries' parliaments and ministers, economic and technical cooperation would be expanded, the TRNC would have access to the TÜRKSAT satellite, and the two countries would work together in the fields of water management and the implementation of development plans.

The policy of integration received negative reactions both at home and abroad. It was argued that the TRNC would lose credibility if it transferred its sovereignty to Turkey while defending the principles of political sovereignty and equality at the negotiating table with its Greek counterpart. In the face of this criticism, the word "integration" was dropped and replaced with "special relationship."

At the EU's Luxembourg summit of 12 December 1997 it was decided to admit ten new countries into the EU. The expansion of the EU would include countries from Central and Eastern Europe as well as Cyprus; and accession negotiations with six of them, including Cyprus, would start on 31 March 1998. The decision on expansion did not include Turkey but mentioned a European strategy that would prepare Turkey for membership and a European Conference that would be convened for this purpose.

The decision of the Luxembourg Summit caused outrage in Turkey. Turkey decided to suspend the political dialogue with the EU and stay away from the European Conference. No meeting would be held with the EU if the subjects of Cyprus or Turkish-Greek relations appeared on the agenda. When accession negotiations with Cyprus began, the process of partial integration between Turkey and the TRNC would begin. When accession talks with the Greek-Cypriot government, claiming to be representing the whole island, did get underway on 31 March, the Turkey-TRNC Council of Association held its session and issued a declaration stating that Turkey and the TRNC would not accept the economic, political, and legal consequences ensuing from the accession talks with the Greek-Cypriot government, that the nature of the Cyprus question had changed and the formerly accepted framework and parameters for a settlement no longer applied, and that it would not be possible to advance toward a settlement unless the reality of two states on the island was recognized. The declaration also spoke of deepening bilateral relations in the political, economic, cultural, security, and educational fields and mentioned a number of specific projects.

The Luxembourg Summit brought fundamental changes not only to Turkey's relations with the EU but also to Turkey's Cyprus policy. As Turkey tightened its security relations with the U.S., it was also giving signs that there was going to be a parting of ways with the EU. This was hardly in conformity with the Turkish policy of Simitis. Actually, the Luxembourg Summit revealed that Greece was not the sole obstacle to Turkey's EU membership. The chief opponent of Turkish membership was Germany, but Greece continued to be seen as the villain in Turkey. Athens did not want to see a Turkey estranged from the EU and increasingly within the U.S. sphere when so many bilateral issues remained unresolved. It would take the Abdullah Öcalan crisis to bring about a thaw between Athens and Ankara.

3. The Öcalan Crisis

Since the 1980s Turkey had been involved in a "lowintensity war" with the PKK. This was the main reason for the international perception of Turkey as a politically and economically unstable country. The countries with which Turkey had disputes were in the process of forming alliances with one another, while they were all using this weakness for their own purposes. Obviously, one of these countries was Greece. Since the 1980s Greece had made the Lavrion camp available to PKK militants. This was a camp operated by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. Greece also maintained good relations with countries like Syria and Iran, which were pursuing similar policies. After 1996 these relations developed into alliances. Ankara kept complaining that PKK militants were being given shelter and military training and that Greece was providing military and economic assistance to the PKK, but these warnings and protests went unheeded. In rejecting Turkish protests, Athens claimed that it was supporting the rightful claims of the Kurdish people and insisted that the Lavrion camp was under UN control and harbored only political refugees. The issue of the PKK had become a persistent irritant and remained unresolved, plaguing relations between Greece and Turkey.

Interestingly enough, it was the PKK issue, and more specifically the Öcalan crisis, that brought about a thaw in bilateral relations.

When a covert operation was mounted on 16 February 1999 and the leader of the PKK was apprehended as he left the Greek Embassy in Kenya and brought to Turkey, this precipitated an economic and political crisis in Greece. It was later revealed that Öcalan went from Italy to Minsk. When he found out that he would not be able to stay there, he contacted Greek officials who arranged for him to be placed in a house 25 kilometers out of Athens on 29 January. When he ran into opposition from official quarters, he left Greece on 31 January. After failing to obtain landing rights in Belarus and the Netherlands, however, Öcalan's aircraft returned to Athens on the morning of 1 February.

Prime Minister Simitis was strongly opposed to admitting Öcalan to Greece on both occasions and ordered his immediate deportation. The revelation that Öcalan was in Greece would seriously damage relations with Turkey and confirm Ankara's long-standing allegations that Athens supported terrorism. It would also be a serious blow to Greece's international standing. Having been sent to Nairobi, Kenya, Öcalan refused to take up the offer to stay in the house of a Greek businessman and went to the Greek Embassy instead. When the CIA located Öcalan through his cell phone, the U.S. began to press the Kenyan government. As a result, the embassy was surrounded by the Kenyan police and Öcalan was asked to leave the country. When Öcalan left the embassy to proceed to the airport, he was apprehended and placed in a Turkish aircraft and flown to Turkey.

Greece's role in the process of Öcalan's seizure had greatly strengthened Turkey's hand. Ankara had harsh words for Greece, and Demirel made a statement warning Athens in a tone similar to the tone of the warning sent to Syria in October. In response, the Greek armed forces were placed on alert. Greek prestige was dented, with both the U.S. and the EU reproaching Athens. The reaction in Greece was mixed: one group declared that it had been a mistake to get directly involved in this episode and that it had always been wrong to give support to the PKK. The other group criticized the government for betraying the Kurds and surrendering Öcalan. Demands for the resignation of Simitis were coming from both camps.

Öcalan's capture sent shock waves through the Greek political establishment. Simitis announced that he had been kept in the dark. Instead of resigning, he dismissed minister of foreign affairs Theodoros Pangalos, minister of the interior Alekos Papadopoulos, and minister of public order Philipos Petsalnicos. He launched a thorough investigation to determine those who were involved in the case and dismissed a number of officials, starting with the head of the Greek Secret Service. The ministers of public order and the interior placed the blame for the affair on Pangalos, while Pangalos claimed that he only knew of Öcalan's whereabouts after he had entered Greece and that his only concern was to get rid of the man. Pangalos declared that the best way to do this was to dispatch him to Kenya. These events pointed to the existence of rogue elements within the Greek state acting on its behalf. The arguments over this were very similar to those in Turkey over the issue of the so-called Deep State.

This big row also had a positive aspect, however. The powerful figures in the cabinet of Prime Minister Simitis (whom he had not been able to get rid of due to political considerations within PASOK) had been undermined. Now Simitis had eliminated these politicians who wanted to maintain Papandreou's policy of confrontation with Turkey. Simitis was greatly relieved to be rid of the powerful nationalist-populist politicians, particularly Pangalos. These were the people who had been undermining the policies that Simitis was seeking to implement vis-à-vis

Turkey and the EU, and now his hand had been freed. Simitis appointed Georgios Papandreou as minister of foreign affairs. He was the son of Andreas Papandreou and the grandson of Georgios Papandreou. From the very beginning he had been aligned with Simitis rather than with his father.

From then on, the policy toward Turkey took shape, including improvement of bilateral relations and allowing the Öcalan episode to recede. The dialogue would be resumed, and Turkish-Greek issues would be brought within the framework of the EU. The first fruits of the new policy would be gathered at the 1999 Helsinki Summit.

B. The Rapprochement from the Earthquake of 17 August 1999 to the Helsinki Summit

Two Greek politicians made the resumption of dialogue between Turkey and Greece possible at a time when tension between the two countries had reached a breaking point: Simitis and Papandreou. At the time of the Öcalan crisis Georgios Papandreou was deputy minister of foreign affairs. He wrote a letter to Simitis from Brussels, calling for the resignation of those who were responsible for the episode. As soon as he became foreign minister after the resignation of Pangalos, Papandreou made statements calling for a dialogue with Turkey without regard to Greek public opinion. He declared that dialogue should not be made a hostage to provocations and obstruction. Simitis and Papandreou were convinced that a new approach was needed to Turkish-Greek relations and signaled their intention to undertake new diplomatic initiatives toward reconciliation.

The new approach from Athens was well received in Ankara. At a time when Öcalan was being tried and his statements about his Greek connection were constantly drawing hostile comment from the Turkish press, the official Turkish position was decidedly in favor of dialogue with Greece. This brought about a change in the anti-Greek position of the Turkish press. The provocative news and comment in the press gradually gave way to articles on the need to improve relations with Greece. In April Papandreou met with İsmail Cem, the Turkish foreign minister. This meeting gave the green light to the dialogue and established a new personal friendship between the two men, which would symbolize the new atmosphere between the two countries.

The Marmara earthquake that occurred on 17 August in Turkey accelerated the process of détente that was already underway. When the scenes from the earthquake region began to be aired on Greek television, there was a

Box 7-40. The Process of Détente and Greek Public Opinion

The thaw in Greece's policy toward Turkey during the tenure of Costas Similis was based on rational grounds, just as the softening of the Greek public mood toward Turkey was also based on rational grounds.

For centuries the Greek people had identified themselves as anti-Turkish. In a sense this was the social cement that kept them together. This negative identification of an individual or nation based not on what it is but on its antagonism against somebody or something, however, could have a corrosive effect. Nevertheless, given the obvious disparity between the size of the two countries and their populations, and given the threats coming from various quarters in Turkey from time to time, it was easy to understand why there was such an identification, compounded with fear, even if its effect was debilitating.

The accession of Greece to the EU in the early 1980s had the effect of bolstering Greek self-confidence. Europe was a shield against a threat from a nation that was bigger and more populous than Greece: Furthermore, the Simitis policies were no longer focused on conditioning the Greeks negatively, which was also having its effect. But the groundswell of support for the Turkish people after the 17 August earthquake was fed by the new self-confidence of the Greeks and at the same time helped to consolidate it.

As this self-confidence took root, it became more difficult for fanatical groups to harp on the "Turkish threat" despite the efforts of the Orthodox Church. Turkey will no doubt gain much from this change in Greece's mood.

(B. ORAN)

spontaneous movement among the Athenians to provide assistance to the victims. Soon the campaign spread to the rest of Greece. One of the first countries to send a rescue team to Turkey was Greece. When the Greek press (led by the mouthpiece of the Communist Party, Rizopastis) began to send messages of friendship to Turkey, the Turkish press reciprocated. The message was that the people were ahead of their governments in their yearning for peaceful relations between neighbors.

The action of the Greek NGOs had been quite spontaneous. It should not be forgotten, however, that the two governments had started a dialogue that had been going on for six months. What was important was that the people were tired of hostile statements and were prepared to help one another in difficult times if governments did not get in the way. The policies of nation-states that had been stressing differences for 200 years had not been able to obliterate the friendship between peoples, which drew its strength from 1,000 years of coexistence in the same region and the shared culture and memories that bound them together (Box 7-40).

The first tangible benefit of the new relationship with Greece was obtained at the Helsinki Summit of 10 December 1999, when Greece did not oppose the inclusion of Turkey among the candidates for membership of the EU.

The final document issued after the Helsinki Summit also included references to the question of Cyprus and the differences over the Aegean.

Paragraph 4 of the report dealing with the Aegean read as follows:

The candidate states are participating in the accession process on an equal footing... In this respect the European Council stresses the principle of peaceful settlement of disputes in accordance with the United Nations Charter and urges candidate states to make every effort to resolve any outstanding border disputes and other related issues. Failing this, they should within a reasonable time bring the dispute to the International Court of Justice. The European Council will review the situation relating to any outstanding disputes, in particular concerning the repercussions on the accession process... at the latest by the end of 2004.

Thus the need to find peaceful solutions to the differences between Greece and Turkey over the Aesean was being emphasized. If this proved impossible, the need to refer the issues to the International Court of Justice was reiterated. Turkey objected to the part dealing with the court but after clarification agreed that this was not an imperative but something to consider along with the other methods to be used when seeking solutions.

Paragraphs 9a and 9b of the Helsinki Summit's final document read as follows:

The European Council welcomes the launch of the talks aiming at a comprehensive settlement of the Cyprus problem on 3 December in New York and expresses its strong support for the UN Secretary-General's efforts to bring the process to a successful conclusion. The European Council underlines that a political settlement will facilitate the accession of Cyprus to the European Union. If no settlement has been reached by the completion of accession negotiations, the Council's decision on accession will be made without the above being a precondition. In this case the Council will take account of all relevant factors.

This signified that the decision on the accession of Cyprus would be made in 2002. Although this was qualified with the phrase "bearing in mind all relevant factors," Turkey objected. The most serious objection came from the TRNC delegation that had been carrying out bilateral negotiations with the Greek-Cypriot delegation in New York since 3 December. The TRNC delegation had gone to New York with the intention to press for a solution based on confederation. They declared that they were deeply disappointed by Turkey's decision to accept the EU Helsinki document, which meant they had lost an important bargaining chip.

Although the Helsinki decisions gave rise to arguments in Turkey, it was generally accepted that they were a step in the direction of membership and were considered a diplomatic success for Turkey. In Greece the government was declaring a victory. The Simitis government was reaping the benefits of its successful policies. The disputes in the Aegean and Cyprus had been linked to Turkey's membership in the EU. Both issues had been removed from the Turkish-Greek orbit and placed in the Turkish-EU orbit. The foundations of the policies that Greece would pursue in the twenty-first century were laid as far back as 1995. Now Turkey would have to bear this in mind and revise its traditional policies to conform to the new circumstances.

MELEK FIRAT

Sources (Relations with Greece)

Allison, Graham T., and Kalipso Nikolaydis. Yunan Paradoksu (original title: The Greek Paradox: Promise vs. Performance [Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press]). Trans. Bülent Tanatar. İstanbul: Doğan, 1999.

Bölükbaşı, Süha. "Boutros-Ghali's Cyprus Initiative in 1992: Why Did It Fail?" Middle Eastern Studies 31, no. 3 (July 1995): 460–82.

Constas, Dimitri (ed.). The Greek-Turkish Conflict in the 1990's. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.

Coufoudakis, Van. "Greek Foreign Policy in the Post-Cold War Era: Issues and Challenges." Mediterranean Quarterly 7, no. 3 (Summer 1996): 26–41.

Couloumbis, Theodore. "Strategic Consensus in Greek Domestic and Foreign Policy since 1974." Thesis 1, no. 4 (Winter 1997–98): 11–17.

Denk, Erdem. Egemenliği Tartışmalı Adalar: Karşılaştırmalı Bir Çalışma. Ankara: Mülkiyeliler Birliği Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.

Dodd, Clement H. (ed.). Cyprus: The Need for New Perspectives. Huntingdon, Cambridgeshire: Eothen Press, 1999.

— . The Political, Social, and Economic Development of Cyprus. Huntingdon, Cambridgeshire: Eothen Press, 1993.

- Gürel, Şükrü S. Tarihsel Boyut İçinde Türk-Yunan İlişkileri. Ankara: Ümit, 1993.
- İnan, Yüksel, and Sertaç Başeren. Kardak Kayalıklarının Statüsü. Ankara: n.p., 1997.
- İsmail, Sabahattin. 150 Soruda Kıbrıs Sorunu. İstanbul: Kastaş, 1998.
- Kallivretakis, Leonidas. Report on the "Limnia-Imia" Islets. Athens: Institute of Neohellenic Research Foundation, 1996.
- Karamahmut, Ali. Ege'de Temel Sorun: Egemenliği Tartışmalı Adalar Ankara: TTK, 1998.
- Kazamias, Alexander. "The Quest for Modernization in Greek

- Foreign Policy and Its Limitations." Mediterranean Politics 2, no. 2 (Autumn 1997): 71–94.
- Kurop, Marcia Christoff. "Greece and Turkey: Can They Mend Fences?" Foreign Affairs 77, no. 1 (Jan.–Feb. 1998): 7–12.
- Oran, Baskın. Türk-Yunan İlişkilerinde Batı Trakya Sorunu. Updated 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi, 1991.
- Rizopoulos, Nicholas. "Pride, Prejudice, and Myopia: Greek Foreign Policy in a Time Warp." World Policy Journal 5, no. 3 (Fall 1993): 17–28.
- Valinakis, Yannis. Greece's Security in the Post-Cold War Era. Ebenhausen-Isartal: SWP, 1994.

Relations with the Balkans

I. THE COLLAPSE OF SOCIALIST REGIMES IN THE EASTERN BLOC, THE BALKANS, AND TURKEY

The Balkans in the 1990s

The socialist regimes of Eastern Europe were collapsing in quick succession toward the end of 1989. The socialist regimes in the Balkans also met the same fate. Todor Zhivkov, who had ruled Bulgaria for thirty-five years, resigned and was replaced by foreign minister Petar Mladenov. Mladenov was the bridge to a more liberal sort of government and was soon replaced by Zhelu Zhelev and the government of the Union of Democratic Forces.

Romania's transition did not prove as smooth as Bulgaria's. Nicolae Ceausescu had been in power for twenty-five years and sought to resist the wave of changes sweeping across the Eastern Bloc. This led to a popular uprising. Ceausescu and his wife, Elena, a powerful figure in the administration, were apprehended as they sought to flee and were executed. The National Salvation Front, the left-of-center movement consisting of those who were in favor of change, came to power under the leadership of Ion Iliescu. It won the majority of the seats in the elections held in 1990 and formed the government.

When Enver Hoxha died in 1985, he was replaced as Albania's leader by Ramiz Alia, who undertook a series of economic and political measures in early 1990. Clearly, Albania had not escaped the changes taking place in the region. As a consequence of the violent demonstrations and uprisings that began in April 1990, relations were established with both the U.S. and USSR, and a multiparty system emerged within the country.

The change of regime in Yugoslavia followed a different pattern because of the special nature of this country's structure. Yugoslavia differed from the other Eastern European and Balkan countries in a number of ways. Its economic system was based on self-management and had been liberalizing gradually since the 1960s. Its ethnic makeup and federal structure and its foreign policy were also distinctive. The country rested on a delicate balance; with regime change, the process of disintegration set in. We shall examine the process of Yugoslavia's disintegration and its aftermath below.

The Balkan countries went through different experiences domestically in the process of change, but they all shared the following features.

1. They were all witnessing a strong resurgence of nationalism, which affected their foreign and domestic policies. Nationalism was a carryover from the nineteenth century and was the cause of much ethnic strife. The events of the 1990s helped cement the Balkans as an unsettled region of ethnic tension. Both the Balkan countries and the nonregional powers sought to avoid the negative associations that came with the term "Balkan" by coining the term "southeastern Europe."

This also meant that the Western countries were beginning to see the Balkans as a part of Europe. Although there was some unhappiness in Turkey over the discarding of the term "Balkan," which was a Turkish word, all of the regional initiatives and projects launched in this period carried the geographic term "southeastern Europe." Alongside this, however, the adjective "western Balkan" also began to be employed in the 1990s.

2. In a good number of Balkan states the former Communist leaders changed the label of their parties to "socialist" and sought legitimacy for their governments by embracing nationalist causes. Since these countries had no tradition of organized political opposition, the parties that came to power on a liberal platform were unsuccessful, due to their inexperience as well as the difficult conditions they faced. This brought the newly created socialist parties back to power. This cycle occurred in Bulgaria, Romania, and Albania. Slobodan Milosevic, the former leader of the Serbian Communist Party in Yugoslavia, was the sole leader who managed to stay in power continuously during both periods.

3. As a result of the transformation that took place in the Balkans during the 1990s, there was a noticeable rise in the international struggle for power over the region. In this period the Soviet/Russian influence began to fade. Russia sought to maintain a foothold in the region by focusing on the new Yugoslavia and Greece, while Germany and, to a lesser extent, Italy, the U.S., and Turkey managed to increase their influence.

Germany became influential economically and politically in Croatia and Slovenia, while the U.S. was able to insert itself into the region as a new factor after the Cold War, its influence being primarily in the military field. Washington established its military ties with Albania, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Macedonia and cooperated closely with Turkey in the process.

- 4. There was a proliferation of independent states in the region after the disintegration of Yugoslavia. The newcomers on the scene were Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Macedonia, in addition to Moldova.
- 5. During the Cold War, ideologies and political models had proliferated in the Balkans. Now the situation had altered; except for Yugoslavia, all were seeking to liberalize, privatize, and join Western organizations and institutions.
- 6. All of the countries were afflicted with the problems of transition. These included a serious weakening of the state and its institutions, a siphoning off of foreign aid funds to those close to the wielders of power, a shortage of entrepreneurs, a political process serving the interests of ethnic groups or special interest groups, and a climate that encouraged corruption, cronyism, and organized crime.

Turkey and Developments in the Balkans

Turkey was generally satisfied with the developments in the Balkans during the 1990s, so long as they did not lead to instability. Turkey hoped that henceforth there would not be a paramount power like the USSR wielding influence in the region. The breakdown of ideological rivalries would lead to greater regional cooperation. The economic and political difficulties confronting the region because of regime change as well as the disintegration of the USSR had left a power vacuum in the area, and Turkey had aspirations to fill this vacuum both politically and economically. Furthermore, the collapse of Yugoslavia had led to the emergence of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia, countries that wanted closer ties with Turkey. Albania was already on the best terms with Turkey, and even Bulgaria had shifted its course toward cooperation with Ankara.

Turkey had opened up its economy ten years earlier and had covered much ground in integrating itself with the global economy; now it planned to take advantage of this in its relations with its Balkan neighbors. Moreover, the presence of close to 10 million Muslims in the Balkans helped Turkey to make its influence felt in the region. These Muslims were distributed in the following manner: 3.5 million in Albania, 1.5 million in Kosovo, 1 million in Bulgaria, 2 million in Bosnia-Herzegovina, 350,000 in Macedonia, and 120,000 in Western Thrace. However, as in the case of the Turkic republics after the collapse of the USSR, especially the Turkish public's approach to the Balkans in the initial stages was emotional rather than realistic.

Turkey followed a policy in the Balkans that aimed at contributing to stability in the region, making its presence felt, and drawing the Balkans into projects that Ankara had initiated to provide Turkey with economic advantages. It went so far as inviting countries that were not coastal states of the Black Sea to participate in the Black Sea Economic Cooperation project.

The developments in the Balkans in the post–Cold War period were not all favorable to Turkey, as it appeared at first. They also produced ethnic strife, political turmoil, the rise of organized crime, and an environment that allowed the PKK to become active in the region. In other words, when the Cold War ended in the Balkans in the 1990s, hot wars broke out, creating instability in the region.

Before analyzing the effects of this situation on Turkey's Balkan policy, we shall examine the developments in Bulgaria after regime change and how they affected Turkish-Bulgarian relations.

II. REGIME CHANGE IN BULGARIA AND TURKISH-BULGARIAN RELATIONS

A. The Effects of Regime Change on Bulgaria's Domestic and Foreign Policies

As in the case of other Eastern Bloc countries, Bulgaria adopted the multiparty way of life in early 1990; the Communist Party reappeared as the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP). Meanwhile the country's dissidents organized themselves as a political party and took their place within the political system as the Union of Democratic Forces (UDF).

In November 1989 a group under the leadership of foreign minister Petar Mladenov carried out a putsch within the Communist Party and overthrew Zhivkov. At the end of December they stopped the campaign of intimidation and assimilation against the Turkish community. With the coming of political freedom to Bulgaria, the Turkish minority got organized. On 4 January 1990 the Movement for Rights and Freedoms (MRF) was established under the leadership of Ahmet Doğan (Box 7-41).

Box 7-41. The Movement for Rights and Freedoms (MRF)

The Bulgarian Turks set up the National Salvation Movement to counter the campaign of repression that got underway against the minority in 1984. When the socialist regime collapsed, the minority transformed the dissident organization into the Movement for Rights and Freedom (MRF) in January 1990 under the leadership of Ahmet Doğan. Although originally a movement, in March 1990 the organization turned itself into a regular political party.

In the Bulgarian Constitution it was forbidden to set up political parties on the basis of ethnicity. For this reason, and in order to contribute to social and political stability, the MRF-declared that it was not exclusively the party of the Turkish minority and accordingly admitted Bulgarians, Pomaks, and Gypsies as members. At the election held in July 1990, the MRF gained a total of twenty-four seats. Seventeen of these went to ethnic Turks, two to Pomaks, and four to Bulgarians. This indicated that the MRF did indeed represent the Turks as well as other minorities.

The party's statute declared that it did not advocate autonomy or independence and that it was against Islamic fundamentalism and religious fanaticism. The MRF made every effort not to appear to be a Turkish fifth column and sought to fit into Bulgaria's political landscape. It took initiatives to improve the condition of the Turkish minority and contributed to the improvement of Bulgaria's relations with Turkey. With its positive and moderating role in Bulgaria, the MRF was viewed as a model for the other regions in the Balkans that had problems with minorities, in particular for the Albanian minority of Macedonia.

Early in the 1990s the MRF enjoyed broad support among Turks and Pomaks because of its policies of upholding the rights of Turks and minorities. Subsequently the MRF failed to live up to the expectations of the Turks. The Turks also started forming new political parties. As a result, the MRF started losing support and was able to hold onto only fifteen members of parliament in the election held in 1994. The MRF participated in the election of 1997 in alliance with other parties. This alliance, the Union of National Salvation, obtained only 7.6% of the votes and got nineteen of its candidates elected to parliament.

(İ. ÜZĞEL)

In this way the Turkish minority in Bulgaria acquired political clout that enabled it to become a significant factor in Bulgaria's political scene.

In the election held in October 1991, the Union of Democratic Forces won a plurality and came to power. In the presidential election held in January 1992, Zhelu Zhelev was elected president with the support of the MRF. Zhelev was known as an opponent of the socialist regime in Bulgaria and the repression of the Turks. He strove to secure structural changes and strengthen democracy and to prevent vindictive measures being taken against the members of the previous regime. His objective was to achieve reconciliation in society.

In the 1990s Bulgaria faced political turmoil as well as serious economic and social problems. Power kept changing hands between the UDF and the BSP. During the Cold War, Bulgaria had been a predominantly agricultural country within the Eastern Bloc. Now it had lost both its markets and its protector, the USSR. The forced migration of 300,000 Turks in 1989 had been detrimental to agriculture. The imposition of economic sanctions on Yugoslavia was also causing hardship to Bulgarians. The economic difficulties had resulted in a weakening of the Bulgarian armed forces.

It was against this background that Bulgaria was formulating its domestic and foreign policies. The tendency of the BSP was to cultivate close ties with Russia and Greece while maintaining its distance from Turkey. On the other side, the UDF tended to be oriented toward the West and friendlier toward Turkey. Despite these tendencies, the circumstances were such that Bulgarian governments were compelled to entertain friendly relations with all the neighboring countries. This is why Bulgaria concluded friendship and good neighborliness agreements with all of its neighbors and supported disarmament projects in the Balkans.

Bulgaria sought to remain outside the rival camps that had been formed in the Balkans during the 1990s. Although the majority of Bulgarians belonged to the Orthodox Church and the country had close historical ties with first Russia and then the USSR, Bulgaria did not side with Yugoslavia and Greece during the war in Bosnia. Bulgaria did not respond to Greek efforts to draw it into the Athens-Belgrade axis and remained equidistant in its relations with Turkey and Greece. Its main foreign policy goal was membership in NATO and the EU. In 1993 parliament adopted a resolution requesting membership in NATO. To achieve this goal, Bulgaria gave emphasis to the protection of the rights of minorities, abolished the death penalty, and turned its face toward the West.

B. Developments in Turkish-Bulgarian Relations

Military Relations

Following regime change, Bulgaria faced serious economic difficulties. It began to seek a rapprochement with the West and made efforts to develop relations with Turkey. An important step in this direction was the visit of the Bulgarian chief of General Staff to Ankara in 1991. General Doğan Güreş, the chief of the General Staff, made a return visit to Sofia in December 1991, when he signed an agreement identified as the Sofia Document. This was followed by the Edirne Document signed at Edirne in May 1992. These provided for cooperation in military training and contained an understanding not to conduct military exercises within fifteen kilometers from the border. The two sides agreed to take confidence-building measures in the military field, and in 1992 they redeployed their troops away from the border. On 6 May 1992 the two countries signed an agreement on Friendship, Cooperation, and Security. It should be noted that Bulgaria had signed a similar agreement with Greece in October 1991. This was in conformity with Bulgaria's policy aimed at achieving talks among the three countries. While Bulgaria sought to get closer to the EU through its links with Greece, it sought to approach NATO through Turkey. During a visit to Bulgaria in March 1992, foreign minister Hikmet Çetin announced that Turkey supported Bulgaria's membership in NATO and declared that Turkish-Bulgarian relations should serve as a model for the other Balkan states.

Points of Disagreement

While Turkey and Bulgaria held similar views on the issue of Macedonia as well as on other Balkan issues during the 1990s, they diverged on the Yugoslav crisis. Both countries recognized the republics that broke away from Yugoslavia. Bulgaria did this in January 1992 and Turkey in February. By recognizing Macedonia, Bulgaria was diverging from Greece and getting closer to Turkey's position.

The two countries followed different courses in the Bosnian war, however. Turkey wanted the international community to intervene in the war, while Bulgaria defended a hands-off policy. In addition, the passage through Bulgaria of Turkish peacekeeping forces on their way to Bosnia in 1995 and Kosovo in 1999 created problems because of the opposition of anti-Turkish elements, especially among BSP members of parliament.

In July 1991 Greece made a proposal to demilitarize the border in Thrace, to which Bulgaria gave its consent. Turkey rejected the proposal, however, on the grounds that it did not include the Aegean islands.

There were some disagreements between Turkey and Bulgaria at the time when the Black Sea Economic Cooperation (BSEC) organization was being set up. Bulgaria wanted the BSEC to confine itself to the economic field, whereas Turkey envisaged that it also would have a political dimension. Bulgaria feared that this type of organization might serve as an alternative to its general policy of orientation toward the West. That is why Bulgaria did not sign the convention on culture within the BSEC and, along with Greece, refused to join the Parliamentary Assembly of the BSEC (see Box 7-48 below). Bulgaria also objected to free circulation among member states and the membership of Central Asian states. Although Bulgaria favored close relations with Ankara, it clearly had misgivings about contributing to the strengthening of Turkey's position in the Balkans.

From 1994 to 1997 the BSP had an absolute majority in the parliament. During this period there was a perceptible increase in PKK activities in Bulgaria, which began to irk Turkey. The PKK was using Bulgaria as a staging post for the Middle East, Turkey, and Western Europe. A Kurdish Cultural Study Association had been set up in Bulgaria along with other such organizations. Conferences were being organized, and these activities were being supported especially by BSP members of parliament. Turkey's complaints were being brushed aside with the explanation that the associations were not related to the PKK and that they had not committed any criminal act. Despite persistent requests made by Turkey, Bulgaria also refrained from declaring the PKK a terrorist organization. At Turkey's initiative, an agreement on combating narcotic drugs and terrorism was signed when the Turkish minister of the interior, Nahit Menteşe, visited Sofia in 1995.

Turkey was also upset when, during the BSP government's term in office, Bulgaria joined the project to build an oil pipeline from Burgaz in Bulgaria to Alexandroupolis in Greece for the purpose of transporting Caspian oil to the Mediterranean. The other partners in the project were Russia and Greece. The three countries signed a memorandum in June 1995 setting up the Trans-Balkan Oil Pipeline Company. The pipeline would be 320 kilometers long and would transport oil flowing through the Baku-Novorossiysk pipeline, which then would be shipped by tanker to Burgaz.

The company would be owned by Russia with 50% of the shares and Bulgaria and Greece with 25% each. This link appeared as an alternative to the Baku-Ceyhan pipeline. It also countered Turkey's objection based on the argument that the Baku-Novorossiysk pipeline formula constituted a serious ecological hazard to the Turkish Straits. Although this project has not been implemented, it was kept on the agenda by the multinational companies in conformity with their policy of transporting oil and gas over several different routes. In addition to this project, there was the Balkan Pipeline Consortium set up by the multinational oil companies. In this case, the oil would be transported over a distance of 890 kilometers from Burgaz all the way to the Albanian port of Vlore.

The disadvantage of these lines is that they require two extra marine terminals in the Black Sea and the extra expense of loading and unloading the oil on tankers plying between Novorossiysk and Burgaz. Improved Relations under the Kostov Government The BSP was unable to overcome Bulgaria's economic difficulties. Inflation became rampant, and corruption was on the rise. In 1997 the BSP lost power to the Union of Democratic Forces under the leadership of Ivan Kostov. With the change in government, relations with Turkey began to improve.

Both sides contributed to this improvement. As a consequence of the repression of the Turkish minority, Bulgaria had been placed on the Organization of the Islamic Conference's blacklist in 1986. Sofia needed Ankara's help in freeing itself from this burden (Demirtaş-Coşkun, p. 88). Turkey took action in the OIC after the BSP government fell in 1997 and Bulgaria was removed from the blacklist. Relations improved rapidly after that. In July 1997 Bulgarian president Petar Stoyanov visited Ankara, where he apologized for the repression of the 1980s without regard to the reaction of nationalist circles back home. In December prime minister Mesut Yılmaz visited Bulgaria, where he signed an agreement relating to the frontier. Yılmaz declared that never in history had bilateral relations been better. As a result of this friendship, Turkey engaged in tripartite cooperation with Bulgaria and Romania in 1997.

The situation in southeastern Turkey was unsettled at this time, and the same thing was true for the Balkans, the Caucasus, and the Middle East. In these circumstances, Ankara welcomed the new atmosphere of friendship with Bulgaria and was pleased to note the improvements in the lives of the Turkish minority in that country. Bulgaria's decision to redeploy its troops away from the border was also seen as a contribution to Turkey's security.

Unlike the 1980s, when it was in close alliance with Greece, now Bulgaria was avoiding getting too closely involved with Greece, perhaps because in its situation it depended on Turkey's help and support. It can be said that relations with Bulgaria were one of the few foreign policy success stories for Turkey in the 1990s.

Economic relations between the two countries were also developing well. Turkey was Bulgaria's third largest market and its eighth largest supplier. By the year 2000 the volume of trade had attained $710 million. Turkey's exports to its neighbor amounted to $251 million, while its imports reached $460 million. Turkey's agreement with Bulgaria, alongside Romania, to lower tariffs on imported industrial products contributed to the rising volume of trade.

With the simplification of formalities, 2,600 Turkish firms were established in Bulgaria, of which 1,000 proved durable. Some Turkish companies undertook the construction of large projects like the motorway from the Turkish border to Orizova and the construction of a dam within the upper Arda River project.

But the most significant change in Turkish-Bulgarian relations occurred in the situation of the Turkish minority.

Changes in the New Bulgarian Administration's Policy toward the Turkish Minority

The collapse of the socialist regime in Bulgaria brought a sharp change of policy toward the Turkish minority. In December 1989 a large number of imprisoned Turkish Bulgarians were released as a result of the amnesty law. The Bulgarian government set up a "round table" consisting of the representatives of all parties and social organizations in order to find a solution to the minority question. In March 1990 a law was adopted that allowed Bulgarian citizens to have Turkish names if they so wished.

With the changed conditions in Bulgaria, 154,000 ethnic Turks out of nearly 300,000 who were forced to leave in 1989 decided to return (Demirtaş-Coşkun, p. 33). Early in 1991 new legislation was enacted that allowed those who returned after migrating to Turkey in 1989 to recover their properties and receive help in finding jobs and being resettled. This legislation was known as the Doğan Law because it was enacted at the initiative of Ahmet Doğan, the leader of the MRF. The restitution of property did not go very smoothly, however. There was much friction between the returnees and the Bulgarians who had taken over the properties, and the ethnic Turks had to resort to protest demonstrations and school boycotts to recover their rights. The main opponent of the transfer of properties was the ultranationalist platform for the Defense of Bulgarian National Interests, which also opposed the restoration of the minority's political and cultural rights.

The Bulgarian Turks saw significant improvements in the enjoyment of their political, educational, religious, and cultural rights. In the 1990s eight Turkish newspapers started publishing, including Zaman, which published in Turkey. Education in Turkish, formerly forbidden, returned to schools. The printing of books in Turkish was also allowed. In 1990 the Islamic Institute was opened in Sofia, as well as three preacher schools in Turkish-populated areas and pedagogical institutes in Shumen and Kurdzhali to train schoolteachers. By the end of the 1990s Turkish deputy governors had been appointed to districts that were densely populated with Turks (such as Razgrad, Kurdzhali, Haskovo, Shumen, and Blagoevgrad), and more programs in Turkish were being broadcast by Radio Sofia.

The most significant indicator of the change in the official attitude to the Turks in Bulgaria was their freedom to organize political parties like the MRF and others. This allowed the Turks to integrate themselves into the political system. Although the MRF gave rise to opposition in Bulgarian nationalist and conservative circles amid claims that it was an ethnic party, the party took its place in the Bulgarian political system, thanks to its policies of steering clear of nationalist or religious themes, fielding non-Turkish and non-Muslim candidates, respecting the laws, and adopting moderate positions. Turkey also helped by refraining from actions that might stir up suspicion or fear among Bulgarians.

The ethnic Turks in Bulgaria established other political parties in addition to the MRF: the National Rights and Freedoms Party founded by a group that broke away from the MRF under the leadership of Güner Tahir, the Democratic Change Party under Mehmet Hodja, the Democratic Justice Party under Nedim Gencev, the Turkish Democratic Party under Adem Kenan, the Union Party established by Halis Okan, and the Turkish Democratic Rebirth Party established by Sabri Hüseyin. Although the parties reflected the political vitality of the Turkish minority, this situation led to the splitting of the Turkish vote and a consequent fall in the level of their representation in the parliament. In the election of June 2001, in which forty thousand Bulgarian nationals of Turkish stock living in Turkey also took part, the MRF was able to obtain nineteen parliamentary seats. Because of the two seats obtained by the MRF in the late count of votes, the Simeon II National Movement Party backing former king Simeon II failed to get an absolute majority in parliament. This turned the MRF into a key party for the second time.

Despite these positive developments resulting from the change in the Bulgarian government's approach, the Turkish minority faced some problems. One of them was that the country's economic problems affected the Turkish minority disproportionately, because most of the Turks were concentrated in the agricultural sector. In 1992 Turks replaced their mufti Nedim Gencev with Fikri Salih Hasan. The Bulgarian authorities refused to accept the newly elected mufti, however, and continued to recognize Gencev as mufti. This was a cause for unhappiness in the Turkish community (Özgür, pp. 201-3). Although the Turkish minority wanted to bring those responsible for the repressive measures of 1984 to 1989 to justice, neither Turkey nor the MRF wanted to see a settling of accounts that might affect bilateral relations. Indeed, these minor questions did not have any damaging effect on the course of relations. But the Turkish minority also had grievances against Turkey. The minority was unhappy about the visa formalities and the procedures for entering Turkey. This question was settled when Turkey lifted the visa requirement for Bulgarian nationals in July 2001. When Bulgarian nationals obtained the right to travel to EU countries without a visa starting in 2000, a considerable number of Bulgarian Turks in Turkey decided to return to their country of birth.

The changes in the treatment of the minority made a major contribution toward improving bilateral relations. The Turkish minority in Bulgaria was one of the rare and special cases where a minority helped improve relations between two countries.

In the 1990s Turkish-Bulgarian relations were exemplary, and this was in a region like the Balkans where disputes and conflicts were the norm. Compared to the fractious relationship of just a few years earlier, it was remarkable that relations were so good. There was so much trust between the governments that, even at a time when Turkey was going through a period of tension during most of the 1990s (like the Kardak crisis) with Greece and when the arms race between the two Aegean neighbors was increasing, Turkey and Bulgaria were able to move their troops away from their border areas.

The improvements in the condition of the Turkish minority and the resulting friendly relations between the two countries now constitute a model for the other Balkan countries struggling with minority questions. This situation was made possible thanks to the efforts and contributions of all three parties involved.

III. THE FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF YUGOSLAVIA AND TURKEY

Turkey and the new Federal Republic of Yugoslavia found themselves in opposing camps on the questions of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo (see Box 7-44 below). In addition, reports that an "Orthodox axis" was being formed in the Balkans and that the Serbs were helping the PKK only made relations worse.

The instability caused by the disintegration of Yugoslavia and examples of ethnic groups succeeding in their separatist aspirations were causing concern in Turkey. That is why at the initial stage Turkey was among those defending Yugoslavia's integrity.

In the process of disintegration, the leaders of both the Yugoslav Federation and the breakaway republics were visiting Ankara to seek support. In April 1991 Özal told the federal head of state that Turkey supported the territorial integrity of Yugoslavia. Macedonia's president Kiro Gligorov came to Ankara on 9–11 July and the president of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Alija Izzetbegovic, followed him on 15 July, both soliciting Turkey's recognition of their independence.

When the EU recognized Slovenia and Croatia on 15 January 1992, followed by Bulgaria's recognition of Slovenia, Croatia, Macedonia, and Bosnia-Herzegovina, the process of disintegration reached the point of no return. Not wanting to be completely left out, Turkey recognized all four newly independent republics on 6 February 1992. Previously Milosevic had visited Ankara on 22 January to dissuade Turkey from recognizing the foursome, but he failed in his mission. Soon after Turkey's act of recognition, the leader of the Kosovo Albanians, Ibrahim Rugova, came to Ankara on 11 February and had the opportunity to be received by a president of a foreign country for the first time when he met Özal. Although Turkey did not recognize Kosovo, Ankara did sign a security protocol with Macedonia. This precipitated the final break with the new Yugoslavia. These visits demonstrated how much the regional peoples valued Turkey's support.

As we shall examine in greater detail below, Turkey subscribed to the sanctions imposed on Yugoslavia by the UN because of the war in Bosnia. As a consequence, all trade with Yugoslavia came to an end, and Turkish workers in Europe had to find alternative routes bypassing Yugoslavia when traveling to Turkey. Turkey sided with the Muslims in the war in Bosnia and sought tougher measures against the Bosnian Serbs. When the chief of the Turkish General Staff, Doğan Güreş, retired in December 1994, he revealed that Turkey had been secretly providing weapons to the Bosnian side. This prompted the Yugoslav foreign minister to protest Turkey's action in a letter addressed to the UN secretary-general.

Turkey supported the Dayton Agreement ending the war in Bosnia and tried to improve its relations with Yugoslavia, in the conviction that Yugoslavia could be a key player in the restoration of stability in the Balkans. Furthermore, Ankara was uneasy about the close relations that Greece had built up with Belgrade and felt that Athens must not be allowed to establish an alliance with Yugoslavia. Turkey was not able to go very far in improving its relations with Yugoslavia, however, when the events that broke out in early 1998 in Kosovo degenerated into open war.

On the question of Kosovo, Turkey was once again aligned against Yugoslavia. When clashes first broke out, minister of foreign affairs Ismail Cem flew to Belgrade and counseled a peaceful resolution of the issue, but it was to no avail. Yugoslavia accused Turkey of helping the Albanian armed groups in Kosovo, while Turkey claimed that Yugoslavia was backing the PKK.

Turkey took part in the military action against Yugoslavia. In addition to enforcing the no-fly zone over that country and participating in the naval blockade, Turkish F-16 aircraft were also taking part in the bombing of Yugoslavia, according to press reports. Unlike NATO's intervention in Bosnia, Turkey had approved NATO action against Yugoslavia with reluctance. There were allegations that Turkey's participation in the military action was really prompted by Yugoslavia's supplying of PKK militants with missiles. When Yugoslavia declared war on NATO members, Turkey found itself in a state of war with that country.

When Milosevic lost his majority in the election of October 2000 and was replaced by Vojislav Kostunitsa, Yugoslavia returned to international organizations, including the UN, and was admitted to the Southeast Europe Stability Pact. Yugoslavia was gradually returning to stability. Turkey's relations with Yugoslavia began to improve, and foreign minister Ismail Cem visited Belgrade in better conditions.

IV. BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA AND TURKEY

Turkey's Active Diplomacy during the Bosnian War

When Slovenia and Croatia broke away from Yugoslavia and were recognized by first Germany and then the rest of the EU, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Macedonia did not want to remain in a federation dominated by Serbia and opted for independence. At the referendum held on 1 March 1992, the Bosnian Serbs kept away from the polls, and participation fell to 64%. But 99% of the votes cast were for independence, and Bosnia-Herzegovina declared independence on 3 March. The Bosnian Serbs did not recognize this outcome and proclaimed the Serbian Republic (Republika Srpska) at the end of that month, with the capital at Pale.

When the EU recognized Bosnia-Herzegovina's independence on 6 April 1992 (followed by the U.S. on 7 April), the Bosnian Serbs—supported by the Federal Yugoslavian army made up mostly of Serbs—invaded Bosnia. Having prepared for war earlier on, the Serbs were able to overrun 70% of Bosnia in a relatively short time.

Turkey was greatly upset by the war, and throughout the 1990s Ankara pursued a long-lasting and active diplomatic campaign to involve the international community in the war and to seek effective action to end hostilities.

Turkey took the following initiatives.

1. Ankara roused all the international organizations to which it had access into action. Among these were the UN Security Council, the CSCE, the Council of Europe, and the OIC. Turkey's most notable success was in getting the international community involved in the question.

Turkey made its greatest efforts to stop the war within the OIC, because Turkey held the rotating presidency of the OIC at the outbreak of the war. Turkey expected the Islamic countries to support the Bosnian Muslims out of religious solidarity and to apply pressure on the Western countries to adopt tougher measures against the Serbs. Turkey was also instrumental in setting up a contact group within the OIC to deal with this issue.

When Turkey assumed the presidency of the Council of Europe in May 1992, it fought within this organization to defend Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Turkey submitted an "Action Plan" for Bosnia to the UN in which it urged military measures to supplement the diplomatic pressure and humanitarian measures that were already in place. Turkey also sought to have the arms embargo on the Bosnians lifted.

One of Turkey's proposals to end the war and secure the territorial integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina called for NATO to intervene and mount military operations against the Serbs. Turkey advocated the aerial bombing of Serbian positions. NATO's action in this direction would come only in the summer of 1995 after the U.S. decided to intervene directly in the Bosnian war.

2. Turkey chose to pursue its diplomatic and military efforts on behalf of the Bosnians through international organizations and contributed to the forces established by the UN and NATO. Despite domestic pressures it refrained from unilateral actions. On 8 December 1992 the Turkish government obtained authorization from the TGNA to contribute forces to UNPROFOR (the United Nations Protection Force) to carry out international military action. Article 92 of the Turkish Constitution required such authorization before troops could be committed to operations beyond Turkey's borders. Turkey contributed eighteen F-16 aircraft to help enforce the no-fly resolution adopted by the UN Security Council on 31 March 1993. Naval units were also dispatched to the Adriatic Sea to enforce the blockade against the Serbs.

3. Turkey also acted in partnership with the U.S. to secure the Bosnian-Croat Federation, which came into being in March 1994. Ankara's contribution to this was very substantial.

During the Bosnian war, Turkey had a coalition government led by Demirel. Hikmet Çetin, the minister of foreign affairs, was personally committed to the Bosnian cause and visited Bosnia repeatedly in the course of the war. He also visited different capitals seeking backing for the Bosnians and raised the issue at international organizations.

Turkey's active diplomacy was not well received in Yugoslavia or for that matter in Greece, Russia, and Bulgaria. These countries defended a hands-off policy for the international community. The new Yugoslav prime minister, Milan Panic, came to Ankara on 12 August 1992 to plead his country's case.

Turkey was making a major effort to safeguard the territorial integrity of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Turkey was the first country to establish an embassy in Sarajevo. Nevertheless, Ankara kept its cool and refrained from unilateral intervention in that country without being influenced by the events in the region and the Islamist pressures coming from some segments of the Turkish public. Ankara was making every effort to keep in step with the other Western countries and in particular the U.S.

Turkey refrained from unilateral military intervention for the following reasons.

- 1. Turkey was maintaining troops in Cyprus, engaged in a low-intensity war in its southeastern provinces, and conducting military operations in northern Iraq from time to time. In these circumstances, it would be difficult for it to take on additional engagements in regions like the Caucasus or the Balkans.
- 2. It was evident that a Turkish intervention in the Balkans would not go down well in the region. When the rhetoric about "the Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China" emerged following the collapse of the USSR and the changes in regime in Eastern Europe, this had negative repercussions in the Balkans: every Turkish initiative was interpreted as an attempt to resuscitate the Ottoman Empire. Against this background, a unilateral Turkish military intervention would stir up not only its regional rivals Yugoslavia, Greece, and Russia but also countries like Bulgaria, Rumania, Croatia, and Macedonia, with which it was in the process of developing cordial relations.
- 3. Furthermore, Turkey did not have the technical means to carry out a military intervention. Turkish aircraft were not allowed to use Greek airspace. Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Albania were also against the use of their airspace. Even if the airspace had been accessible, the range of Turkish aircraft would allow them just a few minutes to carry out any mission in Bosnia. Turkey would only acquire the capability to project its power in 1995, when it took delivery of tanker aircraft that extended the range of its combat aircraft.

In its diplomatic contacts, Turkey advocated the lifting of the arms embargo imposed on Yugoslavia selectively in favor of the Bosnians because they had been the victims of aggression. Ankara also defended this view in international forums. But the Western countries opposed such a move, fearing that a lifting of the arms embargo would lead Russia to step up its arms deliveries to Serbia and thereby intensify the conflict. It was revealed after the war, however, that in the course of the conflict even the Iranians had been supplying arms to the Bosnians with the connivance of the U.S. As to the Bosnian Serbs, they were receiving their arms from Serbia as well as Greece, Romania, and Russia.

The U.S. came up with a six-point action plan in 1993, but Turkey did not consider this sufficient to put an end to the conflict. This plan was broader than the Vance-Owen Plan (put forward by Cyrus Vance and Lord David Owen) and contained new elements such as the establishment of a war-crimes tribunal and the stationing of troops in Bosnia. Turkey was not satisfied, because it did not include direct military intervention.

The Geneva Plan of July 1993 was a modified version of the Vance-Owen Plan. It envisaged the division of Bosnia-Herzegovina into three ethnic zones and would allow the Bosnian Serbs to establish close links with Serbia. This plan would award 52% of the land to the Serbs, although they accounted for 31% of the population of Bosnia. Turkey was opposed to this plan, because it legitimized the acquisition of land by the use of force.

The Bosnian-Croat federation established in March 1994 with the coaxing of the U.S. and Turkey had the effect of changing the course of the war. A number of developments brought about the end of the war. The arms embargo was being ignored to benefit the Bosnians and Croats, Belgrade had cut down its support for the Bosnian Serbs because of the effects of sanctions, the Bosnians and Croats were now putting up a united front against the Serbs, and finally the American attack on Serbian targets brought hostilities to an end.

In November 1995 an agreement on the future of Bosnia-Herzegovina was reached in Dayton, Ohio, through the efforts of the American special representative, Richard Holbrooke. The Bosnian Serbs were represented by the Yugoslav head of state, Slobodan Milosevic; the Croats by Franco Tudjman; and the Bosnians by Alija Izzetbegovic. As a result of the agreement, Bosnia-Herzegovina's territorial integrity was preserved; but the component entities of the state, and particularly the Serbian Republic, were given a wide range of rights and powers.

Turkey felt deep satisfaction over the ending of the war in Bosnia, which was consuming much of its energy in the foreign policy area. There was also relief that the war had not spread beyond Bosnia and Turkey did not have to face a wave of refugees seeking asylum. About twenty thousand Bosnians had sought refuge in Turkey in the course of the war.

Factors Motivating Turkey's Policies and Their Consequences

Although Islamist circles in Turkey kept criticizing the government for not being active enough, Turkey had acted with so much drive and determination during the war that it also came under criticism for concentrating its efforts too much in Bosnia, to the detriment of the Caucasus and other problem areas.

There were a number of reasons for the government's strenuous efforts in the Bosnian conflict.

- 1. It was important for Turkey to help preserve the Muslim Bosnian presence in Bosnia (Box 7-42). This had to do with Turkey's Europeanness and its European identity. The Bosnian Muslims were secular and close to Western culture. If Europe did not accept them, it would be difficult to see how Turkey itself could be accepted into Europe. That is why Turkey defended a Bosnian model that was multiethnic and multireligious.
- 2. After the Cold War, Turkey's strategic value had diminished. It had come to the fore during the Gulf War of 1991 and was now seeking to assert itself in the international arena as a regional power and make its presence felt in the Balkans. Turkey was supporting the side that enjoyed the sympathy of the Islamic and some Western countries as well as the general public and therefore enjoyed the advantage that came from being on the side of the victim.
- 3. Turkey was unhappy that its geographical link with the West was a theater of instability. Half of Turkey's foreign trade was being conducted with the EU; and during the troubles in Bosnia it had been compelled to use the longer and therefore more costly route through Romania and Hungary. Furthermore, the roughly 2 million Turkish workers in Western Europe and their families found it difficult to travel to and from Turkey because of the hostilities in Bosnia.
- 4. Because of its Kurdish question, Turkey was against the acquisition of territory by the use of force and against separatist movements started by particular groups. If the Bosnian Serbs had succeeded in breaking away through the use of force, and if this was acknowledged by the international community, it would set a bad precedent from the perspective of Turkey's internal situation.
- 5. It was a generally held view in Turkey that the Muslim Bosnians had been treated unfairly and that Turkey

Box 7-42. Bosnia-Herzegovina and Its Peoples in History

The Bosnians along with their other fellow Slavs started arriving in the Balkans in the seventh century. Starting in the ninth century, missionaries from Rome and the Byzantine Empire spread Christianity in the region. Those that adopted the Bogomil sect flourished in the fourteenth century and established a large state under the leadership of Ban Kulin. The Bogomil sect was considered heretical by mainstream Christians. In the period from 1461 to 1483 the Ottomans overran Bosnia-Herzegovina and in 1580 turned it into a dependency under a governor-general. The region was the Ottoman Empire's gateway to the West and as such had great strategic importance. By the sixteenth century 40% of the Bosnians had converted to Islam. The Bogomil faith is supposed to have made it easy to convert to Islam because the sect, which originated in Bulgaria, had no clerical establishment and did not require a specific place of worship. It is generally accepted that the Slavs of Bosnia converted to Islam of their own accord, because the Sufi sect, which adhered to a moderate interpretation of Islam, was dominant in the Balkans.

When Bosnia-Herzegoviria came under the control of Austria-Hungary, the Croatian element gained the ascendancy and there was much tension between Croats and Serbs. In this situation of intense rivalry between two opposing national groups, the Bosnian Muslims in general cooperated with the Croatians to preserve their identity.

The Serbs, along with the Ottomans, opposed the annexation of Bosnia-Herzegovina by Austria-Hungary in 1908. When the crown prince of the Austria-Hungarian Empire, Franz Ferdinand, visited Sarajevo on 28 June 1914, he was assassinated by a Serbian nationalist, Gavril Princip, a member of the Black Hand organization.

After World War I, Bosnia Herzegovina became part of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. The Bosnians found themselves trying to maintain their identity in the face of Serbian pressure. Their separate identity and their right of self-determination were only acknowledged in 1944 during the Tito era. The 1974 Constitution recognized the Muslim Bosnians as one of the constituent nations of Yugoslavia.

The Bosnians are mostly urbanized and fairly well educated. Although Islam did not play a large part in their daily lives, there was a rise in religious fervor among the Bosnians during the 1980s and 1990s, when nationalism was on the rise in Yugoslavia and the Balkans in general.

Upon the disintegration of Yugoslavia, Bosnia-Herzegovina declared its independence and was the scene of bloody ethnic conflict lasting for three and a half years.

(l. Uzgel

must pursue an active policy on this issue, even though there were differences over the degree of involvement that this situation warranted. Islamist quarters and those that had Balkan ancestry advocated a more active policy in this area and even urged unilateral intervention. In response to these tendencies, the coalition government felt that it could not remain passive.

But there was also a price to be paid for an active policy.

- 1. Turkey had to sever all links with the new Yugoslavia. Soon Yugoslavia was among the countries that were supporting the PKK against Turkey.
- 2. Even if Ankara did not wish it, Turkey's stand led to an impression of polarization in the Balkans.
- 3. On this question, Turkey found itself in the camp opposing Britain, France, and Russia. The rivalry with Russia in the Balkans, however, never attained the level it had reached in the Caucasus.

Turkey registered the following gains as a result of its Bosnian policies.

1. Ankara's active policies demonstrated that Turkey was an important actor in the Balkans. Lord David Owen and Cyrus Vance visited Ankara for consultation with the government before releasing their plan, and President Clinton sought the Turkish government's advice on a number of occasions. Turkey participated in UNPROFOR over the objections of Greece and Russia and sent aircraft to enforce the no-fly zone over Yugoslavia.

2. In its competition with Greece in the Balkans, Turkey found itself on the side of the oppressed and victims, earning the sympathy of others. Greece found itself outmaneuvered when it brazenly backed Yugoslavia and created the imbroglio in Macedonia.

Turkey's Relations with Bosnia-Herzegovina after Dayton

Turkey continued to have cordial relations with Bosnia-Herzegovina after the war. For the administration of Bosnia-Herzegovina, the most important postwar question was to devise ways to secure the functioning of the newly created, sui generis system of government. For this to happen, a balance had to be struck between the Serbs on the one hand and the Bosnians and Croats on the other. In this framework, Turkey started developing its military cooperation with Bosnia-Herzegovina jointly with the U.S., and this soon became the most important element of its bilateral relations with Sarajevo.

When the peace Implementation Force (IFOR) was established to secure the implementation of the Dayton Agreement, Turkey was quick to contribute a unit to the force. In addition to making a substantial contribution to the county's security, the Turkish unit earned the gratitude of the local population by engaging in the repair of damaged bridges, schools, and public buildings.

A second element of Turkey's cooperation was the military training program. This was part of the train and equip program initiated by the U.S., which was seeking to preserve the balance of power within Bosnia-Herzegovina through military aid. Starting in May 1996, soldiers and officers from the army of Bosnia-Herzegovina began to receive training in Turkey.

Furthermore, Turkey took part in the Steering Group of the Peace Implementation Council set up within the OIC.

Thanks to its military and political links with Bosnia-Herzegovina, Turkey increased its effectiveness in the Balkans and also gained an advantage over its rival Greece. As Bosnia-Herzegovina developed its relations with the EU and Greece in the economic and restructuring areas toward the end of the 1990s, however, Turkey's influence began to wane. The decision of Bosnia-Herzegovina to establish an embassy in the Greek-Cypriot sector in early 2000 caused bitter disappointment in Turkey, even though the decision was not implemented.

Turkey's economic relations with Bosnia-Herzegovina did not match its political and military relations. This was not because Turkey neglected Bosnia-Herzegovina's restructuring efforts after the war but rather due to scarcity of resources. Following the war, Turkey extended loans in the amount of $80 million through the Turkish Eximbank, of which $26 million was converted to a grant.

Bilateral trade remained limited, reaching a peak of only $50 million in 1999. The Foreign Economic Relations Council (DEIK) established a Turkey-Bosnia Business Council in May 1996 for its members. But Turkish businesses were short of financial resources and found it difficult to compete with EU members like France and Italy in that market. Turkish contractors and traders were confronted with an array of EU formalities. Nevertheless, Turkish construction firms like ENKA and Tekfen did manage to win some medium-sized contracts in Bosnia.

V. ALBANIA AND TURKEY

During the Cold War, Turkey had managed to entertain good relations with Albania. In the 1970s Albania pursued a policy of isolation, turning inward and closing itself off from the outside world. When the socialist regime collapsed in 1991, it found its economy and its social fabric in a very fragile condition. Albania was also plagued by problems with its neighbors: the Kosovo issue with Yugoslavia, the Albanian minority in Macedonia, and the issues of Northern Epirus and the Albanian minority with Greece.

Political Relations

Being surrounded with these problems, Albania was in search of an ally it could rely on to provide support. With a population that was about 70% Muslim and with many close ties going back in history, Albania saw Turkey as a reliable ally in the Balkans. Turkey viewed Albania as a secular country that was suspicious of Greece and began to cultivate its relations with Tirana.

At that time Turkey supported Albania's bid to join international organizations. Turkey played a major role in getting Albania into the Black Sea Economic Cooperation project. In December 1992 Albania applied for membership in both NATO and the OIC and managed to get admitted to the OIC despite the opposition of certain groups in Albania. It relied on Turkish support, especially in its NATO membership bid. When Albania joined the OIC, Turkey was no longer the sole country in the organization that was located in Europe and also secular, despite having a population that was predominantly Muslim. Albania and Turkey were also brought closer together by Ankara's participation in the measures taken against Yugoslavia during the Kosovo crisis, the refuge it provided to some of the displaced people of Kosovo, and the humanitarian aid that it furnished to the victims.

Military Relations

Political and military relations with Albania developed rapidly starting in the early 1990s. In November 1991 the chief of the General Staff paid a visit to Albania, and a military cooperation agreement was signed on 29 July 1992. In January 1993 the Albanian minister of defense came to Turkey, where he met his Turkish counterpart and the chief of the General Staff. The Albanian minister solicited Turkey's aid in restructuring the Albanian army and meeting its weapons requirements. These requests met with a favorable response from Turkey, which initiated a training program. Some Albanian officers came to Turkey for training, while Turkish officers undertook the training of a commando brigade and the presidential guard in Albania. Six hundred Albanian military personnel were trained in Turkey within the framework of this program, and joint naval exercises were also held.

Another military link between the two countries was Turkey's decision to contribute 800 troops to the Multinational Peacekeeping Force (ALBA) in April 1997. This force was formed by the UN to cope with the social turmoil that occurred in Albania following the eruption in early 1997 of the scandal caused by the pyramid schemes.

In March 1998 a protocol was signed by the chiefs of the General Staff of the two countries. Known as the Vlore project, it involved the modernization of the naval base at Pashalimani by Turkey and the construction of a school for training naval officers. The construction of the base was completed in 2001, and it was handed over the Albanian authorities.

Economic Relations

Economic relations with Albania did not attain the expected levels. The Albanian market was relatively small, and Turkey found it difficult to compete in this market with Italy and Greece. Turkey made available Eximbank loans in the amount of $50 million, but the first installment of $15 million remained unrepaid and the rest was never utilized.

Starting in 1995, Greece began to mend its relations with Albania. When the Greek president visited the country in 1966, an agreement was signed. After this, Albania relaxed the measures that had been in force in Northern Epirus, home to the Greek minority, and there was a noticeable improvement in relations. This also reflected in the economic relations between the two countries: Greece became Albania's second largest trading partner, after Italy.

As in the Bulgarian case, Albania distanced itself somewhat from Turkey when the Socialist Party came to power and moved closer to Greece.

VI. THE REPUBLIC OF MACEDONIA AND TURKEY

Macedonia was the only republic that became independent during the first phase of the disintegration of socialist Yugoslavia. The country's domestic situation and its foreign relations rested on precarious balances. Macedonia's population consisted of a complex ethnic mix and was surrounded by neighbors that refused to acknowledge its name, its identity, and its claim to be a separate nation (Box 7-43). The country's chief domestic problem was the Albanian population (about a quarter of the total population). The minority was the determining factor in Macedonia's relations with Albania. The population also included some Serbs and Bulgarians as well as about 100,000 ethnic Turks.

Although Macedonia faced difficulties with all of its neighbors, its worst problem was Greece. Greece prevented Macedonia from being recognized by the EU or from receiving economic aid from that source. Furthermore, Greece blocked its economic lifeline by closing the port of Thessaloniki to Macedonia's transit trade and carried out an economic embargo from the end of 1993 to 1995.

Being surrounded by Yugoslavia, Greece, Bulgaria, and Albania, Macedonia found it expedient to cultivate

Box 7-43. The Macedonian Question

Macedonia is one of the problem areas of the Balkans because of the complexity of its ethnic mix (the French call dishes containing different ingredients and mixed salad macedonia). At present Macedonia is geographically divided into three regions with the Aegean part located in Greece, the Pirin part located in Bulgaria, and the Vardar part making up the independent republic of Macedonia.

Under Ottoman rule, Macedonia was an administrative region. After the Ottoman-Russian war of 1877–78, all of Macedonia was awarded to Bulgaria. At the Congress of Berlin in 1878, however, Macedonia was restored to the Ottoman Empire on the condition that reforms would be carried out. Following this, Bulgarian foreign policy acquired a revisionist taint, pursuing the aim of recovering Macedonia.

In Macedonia itself, a movement known as IMRO (Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization), led by Intellectuals and motivated by nationalism, arose. Its motto was "Macedonia for the Macedonians". On 2 August 1903 the movement started an unsuccessful uprising, known as the linden uprising because it coincided with St. Ilinden's day.

With the Bucharest Treaty concluding the Second Balkan War in 1913, Macedonia was partitioned among Greece, Bulgaria, and Serbia. The portion allocated to Serbia came to be known as Southern Serbia, and it was only after World War II under Tito's rule that the Yugoslav Macedonian Republic came into being. This development upset Bulgaria and Greece, which both saw the entity as artificial and considered the move to be politically motivated

When Macedonia became independent following Yugo-slavia's disintegration, a new "Macedonian question" emerged. Bulgaria recognized the new state but denied the existence of a separate Macedonian nation. Greece went further and objected to the new state's name, its Constitution, its history, its flag, and the symbols on its currency, it was actually objecting to the existence of the state itself. The U.S. eventually acted as mediator, and an agreement was reached in New York in September 1995. Macedonia made adjustments to its flag, its name, and its Constitution to overcome Greek objections and was able to gain membership in the UN under the name "Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia." A good number of states (including Turkey, Bulgaria, the U.S., and Russia) recognize the country as the Republic of Macedonia. Macedonia has a domestic problem in the form of the Albanian minority.

(I. UZGEL)

its friendship with Turkey, the region's major actor. Turkey had found a new ally in the Balkans and was quick to start developing its relations with Skopje. After Turkey's recognition of Macedonia, the two countries signed a security protocol in Ankara on 18 May 1992. There were also advances in military relations. In March 1994 a delegation from the Turkish General Staff went to Macedonia to sign the Agreement on Cooperation in Military Training. This was followed by the Turkish minister of defense's visit in April 1994, and in April 1995 the Agreement on Cooperation in Defense Production was signed. Macedonia's military personnel were trained in Turkey under the terms of the 1994 agreement.

Turkey considered it imperative for Macedonia to survive from the perspective of both the security of the Turkish minority and the preservation of stability in the Balkans. That is why Turkey sought to get the EU and the U.S. to recognize Macedonia and was the first country to establish an embassy in Skopje in 1993.

Whenever foreign minister Hikmet Çetin went on visits to the countries of the region, Macedonia was included in the program. President Özal also visited Macedonia in February 1993. President Demirel signed an Agreement on Friendship and Cooperation in Skopje in July 1995.

Turkey supported Macedonia's bid to become a member of the Council of Europe and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE). In the period when the Greek embargo was in effect, Turkey provided petroleum and humanitarian aid and assisted Macedonia in the repayment of its debt to the World Bank. Macedonia was also included in the East-West Motorway leading to the port of Durres in Albania.

Turkey's trade relations with Macedonia (a country of 2 million inhabitants) remained limited despite the existence of a Turkish-Macedonian Business Council. Total trade fluctuated between $80 million and $120 million. Turkish contractors expressed an interest in the $3.2-billion Vardar Valley Project, involving the construction of dams and irrigation systems.

One of the most important reasons for Turkey's close links with Macedonia was Ankara's rivalry with Greece in the Balkans. In this way, Turkey strengthened its hand visà-vis Greece by increasing its influence in the area. At the same time, in strengthening its ties with a country with a predominantly Orthodox population, Ankara was able to refute the criticism that it was using Islamic elements to further its ends in the Balkans.

The Turkish Minority in Macedonia

In the 1990s nationalism was rampant in the Balkans. Yet Macedonia was able to remain peaceful by pursuing policies of moderation toward its minorities until armed clashes broke out in early 2001. The leadership of a seasoned politician like Kiro Gligorov was largely responsible for this. Domestic tension and potential conflict were defused to some extent by measures such as the establishment of a special committee to deal with nationalities issues, allowing Albanians and Turks to set up their own parties, and admitting them into the government.

According to the 1994 census, the Turkish minority consisted of about 100,000 people. In the past, Turkish culture and the language had been well preserved in Yugoslavia. The Turkish-language newspaper Birlik had been published uninterruptedly since 1944.

An important first step in the political life of the minority was the establishment of the Turkish Democratic Union during the transition to a multiparty system. This organization became a political party in June 1992 under the leadership of Erdoğan Saraç. In the election of October 1994, the Turkish Democratic Party was able to obtain only one seat in the parliament. This was due to the electoral system and the fact that the Turks were scattered throughout the country. The Turks were also unsuccessful in the 1999 election, but Adnan Halil did manage to obtain a cabinet post as the representative of the Party of the Democratic Alternative. He soon lost his job, however, when the government fell.

The Turkish minority was underrepresented in the civil service and faced problems in the field of education. Although the Turkish minority, unlike the Albanian minority, did participate in the referendum of September 1991 and voted for independence, it was not considered one of the founding elements of the state by the Macedonian authorities. Another difficulty was that the Turkish minority was caught in the middle whenever there was tension between Albanians and Macedonians in the country.

In the 1990s Macedonia was one of the countries with which Turkey had good relations. When relations between Skopje and Athens improved after 1995, the Greek economic presence in Macedonia began to make itself felt. Greek firms were very active in the course of privatizations and were able to take over enterprises in strategic sectors like communications and oil refining. Macedonia followed a course similar to Bulgaria's: by entertaining good relations with both Greece and Turkey, it was able to gain the economic and political support of both neighbors.

VII. ROMANIA AND TURKEY

Turkish-Romanian relations were trouble free even during the Cold War, and in the 1990s Romania became one of the countries in the Balkans with which Turkey had close ties. During this period Turkey supported Romania's membership in NATO, and bilateral relations revolved around the PKK's activities in Romania, dealing with organized crime, investments, and trade.

Turgut Özal was the second head of state to visit Romania after the fall of communism, where he signed an Agreement of Friendship and Cooperation in September 1991.

Romania was burdened with the issue of Dobruja with Bulgaria and the dispute with Hungary over the Hungarian minority and also suffered from serious economic problems. It was one of the first countries to take part in NATO's Partnership for Peace (PfP) initiative (see Box 7-17 above). When Romania signaled its wish to join NATO, Turkey supported this bid at all levels. Turkey made a special effort on behalf of Romania, Hungary, Poland, and the Czech Republic in NATO's 1999 expansion. This support contributed to the development of bilateral relations.

In the 1990s PKK activities in Romania were on the increase, and this was affecting relations. The PKK had chosen Romania because, like Bulgaria, it was a stepping stone between the Middle East and Europe and a convenient place for trafficking in weapons, humans, and drugs. Furthermore, the PKK was extorting money from the great number of business owners from Turkey operating in Romania. Turkish representatives visiting Romania frequently raised the issue of the PKK's activities there, and Bucharest agreed in May 1998 that the PKK was a terrorist organization.

The very substantial economic and trade relations with Romania constituted an important dimension of bilateral relations. In 2008 there were about seven thousand registered Turkish firms operating in Romania. This is because the country offers numerous incentives to investors and (with a population of around 20 million) constitutes a larger market than the other Balkan countries. In 1998 the volume of trade reached $800 million, with the target set at $1 billion. Turkish banks have set up branches, and Botaş (the Turkish pipeline company) has started cooperating with the Romanian gas company.

Starting in 1997, Turkish-Romanian relations have developed further through a tripartite cooperative arrangement that includes Bulgaria. The three presidents held meetings in Varna in October 1997, Antalya in April 1998, and Bucharest in 1999. At the Antalya meeting, the three foreign ministers signed an agreement on Terrorism, Organized Crime, Narcotic and Psychotropic Drugs, Money Laundering, and Trafficking in Arms and Humans. With a view to developing their economic cooperation, the three countries removed customs duties on industrial products. In 1999 Turkey's trade with these countries made up 76% of its trade with all Balkan countries.

Turkey's economic crisis at the end of 2000 shook the Turkish banking system, and banks like Demirbank and Bayındırbank operating in Bulgaria and Romania were taken over by the state. These developments had a very negative effect on the image of Turkish business in the Balkans. When contracting firms also began to fail along with the banks, the situation grew worse.

VIII. THE KOSOVO QUESTION AND TURKEY

One of the most complicated and difficult questions in the Balkans for Turkey was the dispute over Kosovo (Box 7-44). On previous occasions (whether it was the oppression of the Bulgarian Turks, the Bosnian war, or the problems facing Macedonia) Turkey had known exactly where it stood and was able to take effective action to deal with the issue. The question at issue in Kosovo, however, was the desire of an ethnic and religious group to break away from the central authority and unite with a kindred neighboring country. This left Turkey in a quandary. It would have been natural for Turkey, faced with a separatist movement at home, to support Yugoslavia. Furthermore, members of the Turkish minority living in Kosovo (12,000 people according to the disputed last census and 30,000 according to their own claim) were complaining that the Albanians were applying policies of assimilation (see Box 6-23 in Section 6). Turkey was also seeking to improve its ties and restore its trade with Yugoslavia after the estrangement caused by the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. But when the tension in Kosovo degenerated into armed conflict in March 1998, Turkey found itself in opposition to Yugoslavia and backing the Kosovar Albanians for the following reasons.

- 1. Most of the Kosovar Albanians were Muslims, and the Turkish public supported them. Furthermore, the image of the Serbs was very poor since the Bosnian war. No Turkish government could take the Serbian side in a Serb-Muslim confrontation in the Balkans. Even neutrality was out of the question.
- Turkey and Albania had close relations. The friendship of Albania was important for Turkey in the context of Ankara's relations with Greece.
- 3. Yugoslavia was committing serious violations of human rights in Kosovo, and its standing in the international community was extremely low. Even Britain and France were now aware that the Milosevic administration was a source of trouble in the Balkans.
- 4. Washington was in favor of taking drastic steps against Yugoslavia on the issue of Kosovo, and the U.S. stand was an important consideration for Turkey.

Turkey's first official contact with the Kosovo question occurred in 1992 when the leader of the Kosovar

Box 7-44. The Kosovo Question

Kosovo is one of the most intractable questions in the Balkans Serbia's King Lazar was killed at the battle that was fought with the Ottomans in June 1389 at Kosovo Plain, a short distance from Pristina, and the Serbis were crushed. The Ottoman Sultan Murat met his death on the battlefield at the hands of Milos Obilich. These events left a deep mark on the Serbian psyche. Kosovo remained under Ottoman rule until 1912, when it came under Serbian sovereignty. In the interwar years there was an intensive effort to Serbianize the province. After being under Italian occupation in World War II, Kosovo reverted to Yugoslavia. Under the 1946 Constitution, it became an "autonomous territory." The Albanians were unhappy to see Kosovo kept within the borders of Yugoslavia. In reaction, they became the first to rebel in Tito's Yugoslavia.

The demonstrations and disturbances that took place in 1968 enabled the Kosovar Albanians to obtain certain concessions like education in their mother tongue and having their own university. These rights were extended under the 1974 Constitution. Now the Kosovar Albanians were allowed to establish cultural ties with Albania, display their own flag next to the federal flag, have the right to veto decisions made by Serbia when they related to Kosovo, and have representation in the Presidential Council and other rights that flowed from their autonomous status. After that, the situation was reversed: there was a period of intense Albanification.

Kosovo's autonomy was brought to an end by Serbia toward the end of 1989, and the Albanians lost their rights. They responded by proclaiming the Kosovo Republic and cutting off all contacts with Serbian officials. The Kosovo Albanians started a campaign of passive resistance under Ibrahim Rugova and organized their own educational and health services, thereby creating a parallel state system.

This system lasted for about ten years but failed to yield the expected results. Then the Kosovo Liberation Army (Usktria Clirimtare Kosoves; UCK) resorted to armed struggle. The Serbs responded with ethnic cleansing. At Rambouillet, the U.S. proposed the stationing of NATO troops in Kosovo and a referendum on independence within three years, but that was rejected by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. This led NATO to start bombing Yugoslavia from the air on 24 March 1999 without the approval of the UN Security Council. Yugoslavia was eventually forced to submit to the U.S. plan. According to the plan, a peacekeeping force with NATO participation (Kosovo Force: KFOR) was deployed in Kosovo, and Yugoslav security forces withdrew from Kosovo except for the districts where the Serbian historic and religious sites were located. The Albanians who had been ejected from their homes began to return to their land.

The civilian administration in Kosovo was temporarily taken over by the UN Interim Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), with security coming under the responsibility of KFOR. Unlike the situation in Bosnia, the number of Serbs in Kosovo was dwindling, and KFOR was unable to prevent Albanian attacks on them.

Kosovo was declared independent on 17 February 2008. The U.S. and Turkey Were among those who recognized the new republic.

(l. Uzgel)

Albanians, Ibrahim Rugova, visited Ankara. On that occasion he was received by Turgut Özal, his first audience with a head of state. Rugova called on Turkey to recognize the self-proclaimed Republic of Kosovo during his meeting with Özal. Although his call for recognition remained unheeded, he did receive promises of political support.

The Kosovo question posed a number of problems for Turkish policy-makers in charting their course in the Balkans.

- 1. When the issue turned into armed conflict in 1998, it upset regional stability, which was highly valued by Turkey.
- 2. The Kosovo question was creating tension between Albania and Macedonia, two countries with which Turkey had good relations. This confronted Ankara with difficult choices.
- 3. As an important regional power, Turkey wanted to make its weight felt in this issue but was only able to support the separatist Albanians at the last minute because of its own difficulties with its separatist Kurds.

When tension in Kosovo led to armed conflict in February 1998, the international community's attention turned to the region. Ankara could not remain indifferent. An important Turkish initiative was foreign minister Ismail Cem's visit to Belgrade on 7 March 1998, after consultations with the UN secretary-general and the foreign ministers of Albania, Bulgaria, and Macedonia. Cem submitted a three-stage plan to Yugoslavian president Milosevic in Belgrade. According to the plan, hostilities were to cease forthwith, the agreement on education concluded in 1996 was to be implemented, and the rights provided in the 1974 Constitution were to be restored and brought up to date. In any case, autonomy had to be restored to Kosovo. Bearing in mind its own situation, Turkey reiterated its desire to see a solution that did not infringe on Yugoslavia's territorial integrity and sovereignty.

Turkey's policy in the 1990s sought to reconcile the autonomy of the Albanians with Yugoslavia's territorial integrity. Subsequently Ankara felt the need to add a further element to the equation: the principle of respect for the rights of all minorities in Kosovo. Belatedly, Turkey was seeking to ensure that the rights of the Turkish minority in Kosovo would be respected.

The Kosovo question led many in Turkey and elsewhere to draw parallels with the Kurdish question facing Turkey, mostly in quarters that were opposed to NATO's intervention in Yugoslavia and were seeking to draw attention to the inconsistency in America's policy. The debate

Box 7-45. Kosovo and the Turkish Southeast: Similarities and Differences

At the time when Yugoslavia was being bombed by NATO under U.S. leadership in March 1999, the media (both in Turkey and elsewhere) began to draw parallels between the Kosovo question and the Kurdish question in Turkey. Although the two issues have a number of similarities, there are also significant differences.

First, the similarities: (1) Both cases involve an ethnic group concentrated in a particular region that is different and considers itself different from the majority population. (2) This ethnic group is divided among more than three different countries in both instances and nurtures the long-term goal of bringing the three parts together. (3) In both countries there is a separatist movement (the PKK in Turkey, the UCK in Kosovo). The central authority seeks to suppress this movement, although the methods used differ in each case. (4) The affected regions in both countries are economically depressed areas. This means that the local populations are deprived, which leads to complaints that the economic hardship is deliberately induced by the central authority. The result is a general feeling of malaise that fuels separation.

Let us also examine the differences: (i) Albanians in Yugoslavia are concentrated mostly in Kosovo, where they make up 90% of the population. The Kurds are dispersed throughout Turkey.

especially since 1980. About half the people of Kurdish stock pres ently live in the major urban centers, and most notably in Istanbul, which is the city with the largest Kurdish population anywhere. (2) Although the Albanians have a kindred state in Albania, the Kurds have no such kindred state. (3) The Kosovar Albanians are completely different from the Serbs in their language, religion, and culture. Intermarriages between Serbs and Albanians were the lowest among interethnic marriages in the former Yugoslavia. In Turkey, however, there are great similarities between Turks and Kurds in their religion, sect, and culture. Also, intermarriage is a commonplace event. (4) Yugoslavia was a federal state during Tito's rule (and Kosovo enjoyed autonomy until it was abolished in 1989), whereas Turkey has always been a unitary state: (5) There was heavy repression in Kosovo from 1989 to 1999 in all walks of life and Albanian teachers, police officers, judges, and other public officials were sacked. As a consequence, the Albanians established their alternative administration with an education and health service and levied their own taxes. There was nothing akin to this in Turkey.

(İ. UZGEL)

in Turkey centered around the dissimilarity between the two situations, and an effort was made to reassure Turkish public opinion that as a member of NATO Turkey could not be faced with the kinds of international pressure facing Yugoslavia (Box 7-45).

As in Bosnia, Turkey's general line in this case conformed to the policies of the West in general and the U.S. in particular. In conformity with its general policy, Ankara supported the economic sanctions against Yugoslavia and participated in the NATO air exercises over Albania and Macedonia, which were carried out earlier than originally scheduled because of the events in Kosovo.

When the diplomatic contacts between the U.S. and Yugoslavia seeking a way out of the Kosovo impasse broke down, NATO's bombing of Yugoslavia began on 24 March 1999. This made a great impact on the course of the Kosovo problem and rendered Turkey's position even more delicate. As a member of NATO it had—even if reluctantly—endorsed the principle of bombing a sovereign country in violation of international law because that country had committed massacres among its minority group (Box 7-46). When some NATO military personnel that served in the region started developing cancer a year later, it became clear that NATO forces had used bombs containing depleted uranium, thus creating a hazard to both humans and the environment.

Turkey not only supported the decision to bomb Yugoslavia but also participated in the operations by sending eleven and later eighteen F-16 aircraft. At first the Turkish jets were engaged only in patrolling, but in the later stages they took part in the actual bombing. Turkey also sent a warship to the Adriatic Sea to enforce the blockade that was in force.

NATO kept up its operations throughout April 1999. When NATO sought permission to use Turkish air bases to enhance the effectiveness of the operations, Turkey agreed. On 27 April 1999 the cabinet decided to place the bases at Balıkesir and Bandırma at the disposal of NATO's combat aircraft, while the base at Çorlu was opened to aerial refueling tanker aircraft. Starting on 3 June, American aircraft and personnel began to arrive at these bases; but when Yugoslavia and NATO reached agreement in mid-June, the need to shift some of the operations to Turkish bases no longer existed.

The UN secretary-general set up a seven-nation group known as the Friends of Kosovo with which he could consult in the process of deciding Kosovo's future. The G-7 countries, Russia, China, the Netherlands, Greece, and Turkey were included in this group.

Turkey decided to contribute a force of 1,000 troops to serve in the multinational peacekeeping force (KFOR) that would be deployed in Kosovo. As a result of consultations with NATO officials, it was decided to deploy the Turkish contingent in the vicinity of the districts of Mamusa, Dragos, and Prizren, where the Turkish minority was concentrated. As the multinational force began to arrive in Kosovo, the Turkish contingent was able to get underway only on 30 June 1999, due to the delays caused

Box 7-46. The Bombing of Yugoslavia by NATO Forces and International Law

According to article 39 of the UN Charter, intervention such as bombing in a country can only occur if the UN Security Council determines that a breach of the peace, a threat to the peace, or an act of aggression exists. According to article 42, the UN Security Council must authorize all use of force.

The Security Council adopted three main resolutions with regard to Kosovo. With its resolution 1799, the council determined that in Kosovo there was a threat to the region's peace and security, as described in article 39 of the charter. It did not take the second step, however, calling for action as prescribed in article 42. Consequently, it cannot be claimed that NATO was acting in compliance with the UN Charter on the basis of resolution 1799:

An alternate view has been advanced that the action taken was humanitarian intervention. According to this view, if a state intringes on the fundamental humanitights of its own citizens and acts in a manner that affronts the collective conscience of humanity, the matter ceases to be an internal affair and intervention becomes justified. Furthermore, what was demanded in Kosovo was autonomy and not independence, so Yugoslavia's territorial integrity was not violated. The upholding of human rights is one of the main purposes of the UN

No rule that would make humanitarian intervention legal yet exists, however. There is no example of a clear out intervention based solely on humanitarian grounds, and such a rule would open the door to abuses. That is why most states and scholars reject this type of intervention. Consequently, it would be difficult to justify the Kospvo intervention on this basis.

(F. KESKIN)

by disagreements between NATO and Bulgaria over the passage of troops.

The result was that the Russian and Greek troops arrived earlier, giving these countries a tactical advantage. Critics in Turkey began to lament that their country's standing in the Balkans was declining. Turkish units were greeted with great enthusiasm in Prizren as they moved in to take up their positions. Following the restoration of order and notwithstanding Turkey's active role on behalf of the Kosovars during the crisis, the leaders of the Turkish community and Ankara were obliged to make a major effort to secure improvements in the condition of the minority. Turkish was no longer one of the official languages of the autonomous region, even though this right had been granted in the 1974 Constitution. The United Nations Interim Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK), the administering authority, reduced the number of Turkish-language classes and dropped the use of Turkish in electoral documents on the grounds that funds were lacking. The Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs had to intervene to reverse these decisions. Despite Turkey's efforts, Turkish was accepted only as a semiofficial language in Kosovo. The main party of the minority, the Democratic Unity Party, refused to take part in the election of October 2000 in protest.

IX. ALLEGATIONS ABOUT ORTHODOX AND MUSLIM BLOCS IN THE BALKANS AND TURKISH-GREEK RIVALRY

In the 1990s Turkey emerged as a major political and military power in the Balkans and began to develop its relations with most of the countries in the region. This led to a perception (particularly in Greece and the new Yugoslavia) that an Islamic axis was in the making. Before considering whether this perception was based on reality or was consistent, it should be noted that it was grounded on two developments.

In the 1990s new countries allied to Turkey emerged in the Balkans and the Central Asian republics gained their independence. This created much excitement in Turkey. Carried away by this excitement, president Turgut Özal and prime minister Süleyman Demirel frequently used the rhetoric of "the Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic Sea to the Great Wall of China," giving rise to concern in Russia and a number of Balkan countries. There was already a certain concern over Turkey's rising influence in the region, and the rhetoric that accompanied this only compounded the concern. Although it never became Turkey's official policy, it was known that some of the people in President Özal's inner circle harbored notions of Neo-Ottomanism and sought to apply these notions to Turkey's Balkan policies (Box 7-47).

The second reason was Turkey's developing relations with Albania, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Macedonia and the apprehension this was causing in both Greece and Yugoslavia. In particular, Greek and Serbian writers and politicians were claiming that a sort of "Islamic axis" was being created that included the three countries plus the Turkish and Muslim peoples of Greece, Bulgaria, Kosovo, and the district of Sanjak. The admission of Albania as a member by the OIC in December 1992 was perceived as a step in this direction. According to this approach, Turkey was revising Islam in the region under its leadership and using this as a vehicle to encircle the Orthodox countries.

Throughout the Yugoslavia crisis, Greece backed the Serbs in the name of historic friendship and Orthodox solidarity. Russia was backing these two countries; and as relations among the three got closer during the 1990s, speculation began to grow that they were out to create a

Box 7-47. Neo-Ottomanism in Turkish Foreign Policy

Neo-Ottomanism is a wave that came to the fore in Turkey during Turgut Özal's presidential term. This wave had its roots in the Turkish-Islamic synthesis that was being developed as of 1980. It has both domestic and foreign policy implications:

The idea stems from the notion that Turkey must come to term with its history and questions the break with the Oftoman past in the form of the Republic and the achievements of the Turkeish revolution. According to the holders of this view, Atatürk's reforms came from the top and destroyed the Turks' links with their own past. Concepts and practices relating to state-society and state-religion and secularism have been imposed by the civilian-military bureaucracy with a rigid statist mentality and need to be reinterpreted and redefined. The role of the state in the political and social spheres must be reduced, restrictions on religious orders must be lifted, civil society must be developed, the approach to ethnic and religious questions must be made more flexible, and the less confrontational Ottoman model should be employed in dealing with these issues.

The advocates of this approach had the feeling that not just the Turks but also people like the Bosnians in the Balkans and the Turcomans in northern Iraq recalled the Ottoman period and yearned to return to this past era.

In the sphere of foreign policy, this approach called upon Turkey to invoke its Ottoman past in dealing with the countries of the Balkans, the Middle East, and Central Asia and to play the role of their protector. A vacuum appeared in these regions at the end of the Cold War in the 1990s, and Turkey was the only country that could fill this void. In the turmoil that characterized the Balkans in the 1990s, Turkey recalled the roughly five hundred years of Pax Ottomanica in the region and assumed the role of peace-maker. This held true not only for the Balkans but also for the Middle East. Here too, Turkey was expected to play an active role and exert its influence at least in its periphery in places like northern irag.

In this context, maintaining the frontiers defined by the National Pact and the status quo, the foundation of Ataturk's foreign policy, was considered unimportant and too restrictive. This approach was obviously expansionist: its first target appeared to be Mosul, a region from which traditional Turkish foreign policy had stood aloof.

Neo-Ottomanism was espoused by certain marginal commentators and the racist Right in particular and remained a dream without finding its reflection in Turkey's foreign policy. The dream was effectively blocked by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the military establishment, the upholders of the traditional foreign policy. When Ozal's expansionist Mosul policies came to light, they were blocked by the chief of the General Staff, Necip Torumtay, who resigned in protest.

The novel and unusual foreign policy rhetoric coming from Turkey also stirred much suspicion and concern in Russia and among the Orthodox in the Balkans and gave rise to speculation in the Middle East that Turkey was being dragged down adventurist paths.

(İ. Uzgel)

"Slav/Orthodox axis" to which Romania and Bulgaria would also be drawn.

This polarization along religious lines was mainly based on history and the political conditions prevailing at that juncture.

True, in the 1990s there was a polarization in the Balkans, but it was difficult to argue that this was based on religion. First, contrary to Greek claims, the so-called Islamic axis was not homogeneous. For example, Macedonia had a population that was predominantly Orthodox and had approached Turkey to counter Greek pressure and to a certain extent because of problems with its other neighbors.

Second, it would be very difficult for Turkey to use the Turkish/Muslim minorities in the region for its purposes, and the condition of the minorities would hardly allow such a course to be taken. The only substantial Turkish minority in the region was in Bulgaria, but this minority was well integrated in Bulgaria's political life and was playing a positive role in the development of Ankara's relations with Sofia. As for the Bosnians, they were fighting for their own survival until the mid-1990s and were in no condition to become a part of any axis.

Finally, policies based on religion were incompatible with the nature of foreign policy. Policies were based not on the religion of a country but on the dictates of national interest. This is borne out by the close relations between Orthodox Macedonia and Turkey, while Bulgaria and Romania (both Orthodox) kept out of any bloc and maintained good relations with Turkey as well as with Greece and Yugoslavia. In fact, eager to become members of NATO, Bulgaria and Romania supported the alliance's military operation against Yugoslavia during the Kosovo crisis of 1999.

Turkey's rivalry with Greece in the Balkans was based not on religion but on economic and political considerations. When the Costas Simitis government came to power in Greece in 1996, Greek foreign policy was revised and relations with neighbors were mended. An agreement was reached with Macedonia; and relations with Albania, which had been under strain because of the questions of Northern Epirus and migrant workers, began to improve. There was a noticeable increase in high-level visits. Greece's new diplomatic initiatives were accompanied by intensified economic activities. In the case of Albania, Greece became the second most important partner (after Italy) in the fields of trade and investments. Greece became the top country in foreign investments in Macedonia. Greece overtook Turkey to become Bulgaria's fourthlargest trading partner, pushing Turkey into fifth place.

In Romania, however, Turkey was seventh, while Greece trailed in seventeenth position as a trading partner.

Greek investments in the region reached $3 billion. This dazzling economic and diplomatic performance was in large measure due to Greece's membership in the EU. As a result of the changes made by Simitis in Greek foreign policy, the EU began to see Greece as its representative in the Balkans. To cite an example, the Poland and Hungary Assistance for Economic Restructuring Program (PHARE) program, designed to help the countries of the former Eastern Bloc, provided funds to carry out infrastructure projects. The EU frequently placed the contracts for these projects with Greek firms. In the fields of energy, transport, and communications, Greece was used as the link to bind the future members to the EU. Greece used the Hellenic Telecommunications Organization (OTE) to take over telecom operations in the Balkans. In the privatization of refineries and other strategic public enterprises, Greek firms took an active part, with the backing of their government and the EU. Furthermore, Greece undertook to facilitate the accession of Balkan countries to the EU, promised to back their membership in EC councils, and took a leading role in the EU's regional initiatives backed by France. In October 1999 a meeting on the subject of Fields of Cooperation between the BSEC and the EU was held in Athens. At this meeting, Greek representatives proposed to take over the function of providing the link between the BSEC and the EU. Greece's efforts paid off when Bosnia-Herzegovina decided to recognize the Greek-Cypriot administration. This was a great disappointment for the Turkish public, which looked upon Bosnia-Herzegovina with much sympathy, and for the Turkish diplomats who had made such strenuous efforts to ensure the existence of that country.

Mostly in cooperation with the U.S., Turkey was active in the region in the political and military spheres. As conflict and instability in the region were gradually being overcome, Turkey's influence began to wane. The Turkish private sector was not much interested in the region (Romania being the exception). The share of the Balkan states in Turkey's foreign trade remained at 2.6% in the late 1990s. The Turkish Eximbank's loans to the region remained at a very low level and therefore proved inadequate to underpin Turkey's political and military influence. There were a number of causes for this.

- 1. For political reasons, Turkey's main effort was concentrated in the regions of the Caucasus and Central Asia, and there were serious difficulties in recovering the credits extended to the states of this region.
- The private sector was reluctant to invest in Balkan markets because of their relatively small size.

3. The EU had a negative approach to Turkish firms in the awarding of contracts and was prone to creating difficulties. Turkey sought to maintain its political influence in the region through its participation in the U.S.-led Southeast Europe Cooperation Initiative and the Multinational Peace Force Southeast Europe.

In the second half of the 1990s Turkey also undertook diplomatic initiatives to supplement its efforts to overcome ethnic conflicts and engage in military cooperation. Among these were the meetings of foreign ministers of southeastern Europe.

The Southeast European Countries Cooperation Process held in Istanbul in June 1998 was followed by a summit meeting in Antalya in October 1998. Turkey also took the initiative to bring the prime ministers together in Bucharest on 12 February 2000, where they signed the Charter of Good Neighborliness, Stability, Security, and Cooperation in Southeast Europe. After the Balkan Pact of 1934, this was the second document of this nature signed by the countries of the region.

Following the bombing of Yugoslavia, the Western countries were seeking to restructure the whole region. In this framework, Germany took advantage of its presidency of the EU to propose the Stability Pact for Southeast Europe, which received the backing of the EU. The Stability Pact was launched at the summit held at Sarajevo in July 1999, attended by over thirty heads of state and government. Turkey participated at the level of head of state. At the meeting, Turkey secured the inclusion of two items in the final declaration of the summit: that regional firms should also be awarded contracts in restructuring projects and that measures should be taken to combat terrorism. With the coming into effect of the Stability Pact, the process of turning the region into Europe's hinterland and incorporating it into the European system got underway. Turkey declared its support for the pact in its official pronouncements. Starting in July 2000, Turkey assumed the co-chairmanship of the Second Working Table dealing with Reconstruction, Development, and Cooperation in the Economic Field for six months. But Turkey had certain reservations arising from the likelihood that the countries of the region would neglect cooperation among themselves in their enthusiasm for early membership in the EU and NATO. Turkey was stressing the need for the regional countries not to forget the Process of Cooperation of the Southeast European States that was launched in 1988.

In the post—Cold War era, when Turkey found itself encircled in turmoil and conflict, Ankara was most active in the Balkans and experienced its most notable foreign policy successes there. This was due to a number of factors.

- 1. Turkey was more familiar with the Balkans than it was with the Caucasus, and Russian influence in this region was more indirect.
- 2. Turkey benefited from Greek pressure on Macedonia and the difficulties confronting Albania, although it had nothing to do with these developments.
- Turkey was finding itself on the side of the downtrodden, the victims of aggression, and the weak in the Balkans.
- 4. Turkey avoided injecting a religious dimension into its foreign policy and tried its best not to give a Muslim-Christian tinge to the conflicts in the region. This gave its foreign policy a modern look.
- 5. Turkey avoided the traps of pursuing adventurist policies or using Turkish or Muslim minorities for its own purposes when dealing with their host countries. It counseled a law-abiding course to its kin and resorted to diplomatic action only when the minority's rights stemming from international law were infringed.

6. Turkey cooperated with the West even though this did not go down so well with the Turkish public. In this framework, Turkey's cooperation with the U.S. held a special place. This became very clear in Ankara's relations with Albania, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Macedonia, particularly in the political and military fields. Turkish-U.S. cooperation went smoothly because the interests in the region of the two countries were convergent. Both were against the spread of Russian influence in the Balkans. As the superpower of the post-Cold War period, the U.S. was asserting itself in the Balkans and found it opportune to cooperate with Turkey, a country that pursued similar objectives even though its concerns were different. As Turkey increased its political and military influence in the Balkans as a regional country, it found it convenient to take advantage of the American capacity to get things done in this area.

X. BLACK SEA ECONOMIC COOPERATION (THE BSEC)

The Establishment of the BSEC

The Black Sea Economic Cooperation project was first mooted by the former Turkish ambassador to the U.S. in January 1990. The bureaucracy remained cool to the idea; but when president Turgut Özal took the idea up, the necessary demarches began to be made. Originally the project included the USSR, Bulgaria, and Romania in addition to Turkey. When these countries proved receptive to the idea, preparatory meetings were convened, first in Bucharest in March 1991 then in Sofia in April 1991 and in Moscow in July 1991.

When the USSR came apart in the middle of 1991, the newly independent states of Ukraine, the Russian Federation, Moldova, Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Armenia displayed interest in the BSEC. Greece and Yugoslavia also participated in the preparatory meetings as observers.

A meeting was held in Istanbul in February 1992 to get the former Soviet republics involved in the process. Eventually the BSEC came into being with the signing of the Istanbul Declaration on 25 June 1992 (Box 7-48). Turkey, Greece, Albania, Bulgaria, Romania, Moldova, Ukraine, the Russia Federation, Azerbaijan, Armenia, and Georgia became members of the BSEC. Israel, Slovakia, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Poland, and Tunisia became observers.

The purpose of the BSEC is to develop cooperation among its members in the fields of trade, economy, the environment, and science and technology. In this way, economic relations in a region encompassing 350 million people were to be revitalized. Furthermore, a platform would be created to help settle problems among the members of the Black Sea community. Article 5 of the declaration read as follows: "[the member states] confirm the intention to develop economic cooperation as a contribution to the CSCE process, to the establishment of a Europe-wide economic area, as well as to the achievement of a higher degree of integration of the Participating States into the world economy." Article 7 declared that the parties "[a]gree that their economic cooperation will be developed in a manner not contravening their obligations and not preventing the promotion of the relations of the Participating States with third parties, including international organizations as well as the EC and the cooperation within the regional initiative."

Article 11 of the Summit Declaration affirms that "the entire economic cooperation among their countries is open for the participation of other interested states recognizing the provisions of this Document." Article 14 declares that "the Participating States will act to improve the business environment…by facilitating…the prompt entry, stay, and free movement of businessmen,…providing support for small and medium-sized enterprises,…ensuring appropriate conditions for investment, capital flows, and different forms of industrial cooperation." Turkey was the country that stood to benefit most from these provisions Originally, one of the important objectives of the BSEC was the establishment of a free trade area. At the initial stages Turkey was seeking to further this objective but was not able to obtain the support of other participating states. It was not possible to conclude an agreement or a convention at the meeting in Istanbul to consider this issue, and the meeting ended with just a declaration.

As time went on, however, the BSEC became more institutionalized. The Secretariat started functioning in March 1995. In June 1998 a charter was signed at Yalta. With the ratification of the charter by members, the BSEC gained an international legal personality and turned into a regional economic organization. Henceforth it became known as the Black Sea Economic Cooperation Organization (BSECO).

The efforts to develop cooperation among BSEC members were not confined to trade but also encompassed financial cooperation, especially in the fields of transport and energy. Among the notable projects receiving support were the Black Sea Ring Corridor and the Black Sea Electrical Ring.

The BSEC's Place in Turkish Foreign Policy

The BSEC is important for Turkey because it was a Turkish initiative from the very beginning. Turkey was in a position to take this initiative as a result of its economic development during the 1980s. The changes occurring on the international scene were also propitious for such a political initiative.

The timing of the BSEC initiative must also be noted. Until the mid-1980s Turkey had sought to penetrate Middle East markets, but the drop in oil prices prevented this from happening. In these circumstances Turkey made its membership application to the EC in 1987. The EC informed Turkey in December 1989, however, that Turkey could not hope for membership in the near future. It was at this juncture that the BSEC project was taken up.

Turkey gave assurance both to the EU and to the members of BSEC that the project was not an alternative to the EU. On the contrary, the project would allow the former socialist countries to get involved in regional economic cooperation and gain experience. This would make it easier for them to integrate, should they become members of the EU one day.

For the foregoing reasons, Turkish business circles were enthusiastic supporters of the BSEC project. To a certain extent, this was due to the disappointment over the EU's decision and the desire to gain priority access to markets that were perceived as promising.

One of the features of the project was that Turkey had the upper hand politically and economically. Turkey had a ten-year lead over the other members in the field of economic liberalization and might be able to capitalize on this lead to gain political advantage in the region.

At first it was expected that Western firms would seek access to the new markets through Turkey and that the new structure would serve as a platform for penetrating these markets.

Box 7-48. The Organs of the BSEC

The chairmanship of the BSEC (Black Sea Economic Cooperation) rotates among members in alphabetical order. The most important organ is the Meeting of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs. The meetings are held once every six months. The Meeting of Ministers of Foreign Affairs (MMFA) is responsible for the functioning of the BSEC, the establishment of subsidiary organs, and the admission of observers.

Another important body of the BSEC is the Parliamentary Assembly, which was established in February 1993 by all BSEC participating states other than Bulgaria and Greece. Greece Joined the assembly in June 1995 despite Turkey's opposition

In December 1992 the decision was made to establish a BSEC International Secretariat in Istanbul. The secretariat began functioning in March 1995,

Although the BSEC is an intergovernmental organization, the private sector is also expected to participate in its cooperation activities. Special attention is given to supporting small and medium-sized enterprises and developing links among them and facilitating the free circulation of businesspeople. A BSEC Business Council has been established, consisting of the representatives of the business communities. The BSEC Business Council is a related body of the BSEC, with its secretariat in listanbul.

The Black Sea Trade and Development Bank is an important body within the framework of Black Sea cooperation. The bank is designed to provide financial resources to its members its headquarters is located in Thessaloniki, its president, is a Turkish national, and his deputy is a Bulgarian national. The bank began its operations on 1 June 1999.

In addition, the BSEC has Working Groups dealing with sectors like the environment, transport, tourism, science and technology, and telecommunications. There is also a center in Ankara dealing with statistics and the exchange of economic data.

(I. UZGEL)

Turkey was quick to note the political and economic vacuum in the region and sought to exploit the opportunities in good time. The Black Sea region had been neglected by Turkey until then, but now it was firmly on the agenda of policy-makers in its institutional dimension.

At the 1999 Istanbul Summit of the heads of state and government of the BSEC, it became clear from Demirel's statements that Turkey still harbored hopes of establishing a free trade area among member countries.

The Performance Record of the BSEC as an International Initiative

The BSEC remained an institution that failed to live up to expectations. It was an international organization in which all of the regional countries wanted to participate at the time of its inception; but once it was established, the members were reluctant to make the effort needed for the BSEC to achieve its ambitious goals.

The BSEC never came close to achieving the free trade area proposed by Turkey and remained a loose political and economic association. There were a number of reasons for this.

The members appeared to have no political will to ensure the success of the BSEC. A sign of this was that the BSEC Declaration was never approved by parliaments. Therefore the BSEC could not be registered with the UN as an international organization, making it impossible to tap the resources of the World Bank and the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. When the BSEC managed to become an international organization in 1999, this handicap was finally overcome.

Another sign of the lack of political will among members was their tendency to send representatives to meetings of working groups who were not in positions of responsibility. This showed that they did not expect the BSEC to produce worthwhile results. Furthermore, given the internal and external problems confronting them, they had different foreign policy priorities. None of them wanted to be left out, however, so they considered it preferable for the BSEC to continue as it was, even though it was ineffective.

Some members suffered from internal strife, while others had disputes and in some cases armed clashes with fellow members. Georgia went through a civil war; in Albania the central government collapsed; Armenia and Azerbaijan were at war; Greece and Turkey were in open rivalry; Ukraine and Russia were feuding over the Black Sea fleet; and Russia was fighting separation in Chechnya. As these countries focused on these pressing issues, they were unable to turn the BSEC into an effective vehicle for regional cooperation.

Other negative factors were the policies of Greece and Armenia that were blocking the BSEC's development. This is why complaints were voiced in Turkey that Greece had been admitted to BSEC membership even though it was not a littoral state of the Black Sea. Setting up the headquarters of the Black Sea Trade and Development Bank in Thessaloniki was also a cause for grumbling in Turkey.

From an economic perspective, none of the members (with the exception of Greece and Turkey) had complementary economies. All except Greece and Turkey were former socialist economies struggling with the same difficulties. Neither the international organizations nor Greece and Turkey were in a position to provide the financial resources that these countries required, leading to expectations that remained unfulfilled. The BSEC countries failed to achieve relatively simple objectives like eliminating double taxation.

The Black Sea Peace Force (Blackseafor)

A second Turkish initiative in the Black Sea region was the proposal to establish a Black Sea Cooperation Task Force among the littoral Black Sea states. This project's extent was narrower than the BSEC's and involved Turkey, Bulgaria, Georgia, Romania, Russia, and Ukraine. Their representatives met in Ankara in October 1998 and decided that a multinational force would be set up to engage in search and rescue missions, mine sweeping, environmental protection, and maintaining security. The agreement for the establishment of the force was signed in Istanbul on 2 April 2001. According to the agreement, Blackseafor would not be a permanent arrangement but would come into being once or twice a year when its services were required or for training purposes. It would be commanded during the first year by a Turkish admiral, with the command rotating among the different members in alphabetical order.

İlhan Uzgel

Sources (Relation with the Balkans)

Barışa Çağrı: Uluslararası Komisyonun Balkanlar Hakkındaki Raporu. İstanbul: Sabah Kitapları, 1997.

Bora, Tanıl. Yeni Dünya Düzeninin Av Sahası. İstanbul: İletişim, Büyükçolak, Mehmet. "War of Projects: Turkish-Greek Rivalry in the Balkans in the Post-Cold War Period." *Turkish Re*view of Balkan Studies 4 (1998–99): 131–40.

Çavuş, İsmail. "Restorasyon mu, Yoksa Yeni Siyaset mi." Yeni Türkiye, Türk Dış Politikası Özel Sayısı 1, no. 3 (Mar.—Apr. 1995): 290–93.

Demirtaş-Coşkun, Birgül. Bulgaristan'la Yeni Dönem, Soğuk Savaş Sonrası Ankara-Sofya İlişkileri. Ankara: ASAM, 2001.

Elekdağ, Şükrü. "Karadeniz Ekonomik İşbirliği." In Yeni Dünya Düzeni ve Türkiye, ed. Sabahattin Şen, pp. 217—22. İstanbul: Bağlam Yayınları, 1992.

Gönlübol, Mehmet, and Hakan Bingün. "1990–95 Dönemi Türk Dış Politikası." İn Olaylarla Türk Dış Politikası, pp. 708–14. 9th ed. Published by AUSBF Dış Münasebetler Enstitüsü. Ankara: Siyasal, 1996.

Grouev, Ivaylo. "The Bulgarian Model: Recent Developments in the Ethnic Landscape." European Security (Summer 1997): 84–89.

Kolat, Ayşe Yener. "Karadeniz Ekonomik İşbirliğini Olumlu ve Olumsuz Yönleri." Avrasya Etüdleri 3 (Fall 1996): 21–29.

Kosova ve Sancak Raporu. İstanbul: n.p., 1993.

Kut, Şule. "Yugoslavya Bunalımı ve Türkiye'nin Bosna-Hersek Politikası: 1990–1993." In Türk Dış Politikasının Analizi, ed. Faruk Sönmezoğlu, pp. 159–80. İstanbul: Der Yayınları, 1994.

- Loza, Tihomir. "Kosovo Albanians Closing the Ranks." Transitions (May 1998): 16–26.
- Lütem, Ömer, and Birgül Demirtaş-Coşkun (eds.). Balkan Diplomasisi. Ankara: ASAM, 2001.
- Mladenov, Branimir. "Bulgarian-Turkish Relations." Turkish Review of Balkan Studies 4 (1998–99): 141–48.
- Nedava, Ivanka. Bulgaria's Relations with Greece and Turkey and the Idea of Trilateral Cooperation. Sofia: Free Initiative Foundation, 1993.
- Nelson, Daniel. "Post-Communist Romania's Search for Security." In The Volatile Powder Keg: Balkan Security after the Cold War, ed. Stephen Larrabee, pp. 65–88. Washington, D.C.: RAND/American University Press, 1994.
- Oran, Baskın. "Balkan Müslümanlarında Dinsel ve Ulusal Kimlik." SBF Dergisi 48, nos. 1–4 (Jan.–Dec. 1993): 109–20.
- -----. "Türkiye'nin Balkan ve Kafkas Politikası." SBF Dergisi 50, nos. 1–2 (Jan.–June 1995): 271–78.
- Özer, Ercan. "The BSEC and the EU." Perceptions (Sept.-Nov. 1996): 72-86.
- Özgür, Nurcan. Etnik Sorunların Çözümünde Hak ve Özgürlükler Hareketi. İstanbul: Der Yayınları, 1999.
- Poulton, Hugh. Balkanlar, Çatışan Azınlıklar, Çatışan Devletler. İstanbul: Sarmal Yayınevi, 1993.
- Saraç, Erdoğan. "Makedonya." Yeni Türkiye, Türk Dış Politikası Özel Sayısı 1, no. 3 (Mar.–Apr. 1995): 285–89.
- Saybaşılı, Kemali, and Gencer Özcan (eds.). Eski Balkanlar, Yeni Sorunlar. İstanbul: Bağlam Yayıncılık, 1997.
- Schifter, Richard. "The Southeast European Cooperative Initiative." Mediterranean Quarterly (Fall 1998): 5–13.

- Schmidt, Fabian. "The Sandzak: Muslims between Serbia and Montenegro." RFE Research Report (11 Feb. 1994): 29–35.
- Şimşir, Bilal. Bulgaristan Türkleri. Ankara: Bilgi, 1986.
- Soysal, İsmail (ed.). Balkanlar. İstanbul: Eren Yayınları, 1993.
- Tahsin, Cemil. "Romen-Türk Dostluğunun Tarihi Temelleri." Yeni Türkiye, Türk Diş Politikası Özel Sayısı 1, no. 3 (Mar.— Apr. 1995): 302–6.
- Turan, Ömer. "Bulgaristan Türklerinin Bugünkü Durumu." Yeni Türkiye, Türk Dış Politikası Özel Sayısı 1, no. 3 (Mar.–Apr. 1995): 294–301.
- Türkeş, Mustafa. "Türkiye-Avrupa İlişkilerinde Balkanlar Faktörü ve Yeni Eğilimler." İn Türkiye ve Avrupa, ed. Atila Eralp, pp. 307–52. Ankara: İmge Yayınevi, 1997.
- Turna, Mehmet. "Türkiye-Makedonya İlişkileri." Avrasya Dosyası 3, no. 3 (Fall 1996): 69–88.
- Uzgel, İlhan. "Kosovo: Nationalism, Politics and the Question of International Intervention." Turkish Review of Balkan Studies 4, no. 1 (1998–99): 203–33.
- ——. "Türk Dış Politikasında Bir Rekabet ve İşbirliği Alanı Olarak Balkanlar." In En Uzun On Yıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 403–44. İstanbul: Boyut Yayınları, 1998.
- "Turkey's Stabilizing Role in the Balkans." In Turkey in World Politics, ed. Barry Rubin and Kemal Kirişçi, pp. 49– 69. Boulder: Lynne Rienner, 2001.
- Winrow, Gareth. Where East Meets West: Turkey and the Balkans. Exeter: Institute for European Defence and Strategic Studies, 1993.

The Issue of Human Rights

The International Environment

During the 1980s the issue of human rights was shaking Turkish foreign policy but remained manageable. In the 1990s this issue turned into a permanent crisis and became an important factor in foreign policy. There were four notable developments in the 1990s.

- 1. During the 1990s Turkey gradually began to be faced with the consequences of the responsibilities assumed previously, when (according to international conventions) Ankara had accepted the jurisdiction of the European Commission on Human Rights (ECmHR) in 1987 for individual applications and of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in 1990. As the ECmHR began to accept applications by individuals and refer them to the ECtHR, judgments finding Turkey responsible for violations began to be passed as of 1995. In the 1990s, in addition to their decisions, the new organs established under the conventions against torture were also beginning to find Turkey in breach of its international commitments and were placing it in an embarrassing legal situation.
- 2. In the 1980s the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE) and the European Parliament (EP) were taking Turkey to task on the issue of human rights. Gradually these organs began to focus on the Kurdish question. Turkey's practices with respect to human rights and minority rights were being questioned, and the appeals to Ankara to abide by its international commitments were making it difficult for Turkey to put up a credible legal defense.
- 3. As a result of these developments, the western and northern European countries began to look upon the Kurdish question as the determining issue in their relations with Turkey and began to use their financial and military aid as a lever to influence Turkey's behavior.
- 4. The U.S. attitude toward Turkey and its record on human rights also began to shift. During the 1980s the U.S. ignored Turkey's violations and gave it full backing, whereas in the 1990s Washington assigned Turkey a new role and began to insist on behavior that matched: compliance with democracy, human rights, and the rule of law.

The reason for this was that the 1990s were considered to be the beginning of "a new age" in the field of human rights. This was solemnly proclaimed in the Charter of Paris signed in November 1990 by the heads of state and government of the participants of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE). In 1990 the Soviet bloc came apart and the triumph of capitalism was acknowledged. The Charter of Paris proclaimed this triumph by asserting the principles of human rights, democracy, and the rule of law. During the 1990s these principles became the tools for determining the legitimacy of governments. The principles were recognized as the condition for securing order and stability on both the national and international levels. As a consequence, the violation of human rights began to be perceived as an international question.

Another development of the 1990s was the reemergence of minority rights as a major issue. This was closely linked with human rights but differed in some important ways. As the former socialist countries went about establishing their national states, action began to be taken at the international level to establish legal arrangements that would protect minorities and the rights of individuals belonging to minority groups. Measures were also taken at the institutional level to ensure the implementation of these arrangements (Box 7-49).

As the principles of respect for human rights, democracy, and the rule of law gained ascendancy politically and ideologically, they began to dominate the agendas of international organizations. The UN Commission on Human Rights intensified its control and follow-up activities through its working groups and rapporteurs. Although its decisions were not binding, they carried great political weight. The CSCE intensified and diversified its activities (after 1994 it became the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe: OSCE) and established

Box 7-49. Developments Relating to Minority Rights in the 1990s

During the 1990's minority rights (or rather the rights of individuals belonging to minority groups) were the fastest developing branch of international law. Minority rights came to the fore after World War I and remained more or less fixed after the adoption of the broad principle of respect for human. rights after World War II. In the 1990s, after the collapse of the socialist regimes of Eastern Europe, there was a resurgence of nationalism. This created an urgent heed to address the questions confronting ininorities in a manner that would safeguard peace and stability. The rights of individuals belonging to minority groups had already been raised within the CSCE since the 1975 Final Act of Helsinkl, But the Copenhagen Document adopted at the Human Dimension Conference in 1990 dealt with the issue in the most comprehensive manner. This was followed by the Report of the Meeting of Experts held in Geneva in 1991. The report dealt with the subjects relating to national minorities and the rights of individuals belonging to national minority groups and concluded that these issues did not constitute the exclusive internal affair of the host state. In 1992 It was decided to set up the post of high commissioner of national minorities. The high commissioner would have the responsibility of dealing with minority issues in the CSCF countries before they turned into armed conflicts

The rights of individuals belonging to minority groups were also taken up by other organizations. In 1992 the UN General Assembly adopted the Declaration on the Rights of Individuals Belonging to Ethnic, Religious, or Linguistic Minorities. The Council of Europe prepared two international conventions on the subject. One was the European Charter on Minority and Regional Languages, adopted in 1992. The other was the Framework Convention on National Minorities of 1995, which came into effect in 1998.

All of these arrangements had the same objective, to allow individuals belonging to minority groups to enjoy their human rights fully and to preserve their distinctive ethnic, religious, or linguistic identities. The minorities were not granted political rights as a group, and it was reiterated that they had duties toward the country of which they were citizens. This demonstrates that these rights were not meant as a first step toward the independence of minorities and were conceived as a matter of imperative necessity to safeguard national and regional peace and stability.

(G. ALPKAYA

new bodies such as the Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights and the Parliamentary Assembly. It developed its ability to intervene in disputes relating to national minorities by appointing a High Commissioner for National Minorities. The Council of Europe increased its membership and introduced comprehensive aid programs designed to assist the new democracies in this field. The PACE also expanded its activities in the field. Above all, the ECtHR was turned into a permanent and mandatory court in 1998 (Box 7-50).

Box 7-50. The Eleventh Protocol and the New ECHR

The Eleventh Protocol that came into force in November 1998 made important changes in the system of oversight in the European Convention on Human Rights (see Box 6-27 in Section 6). The previous system was ineffective because it was slow. It involved the decisions of the European Commission on Human Rights and the Committee of Ministers, bodies with no judicial identity (see Box 6-28 in Section 6), and it was optional and not mandatory. In the new system, the European Commission on Human Rights was abolished, the role of the Committee of Ministers was ended, and the court was restructured as a permanent body with compulsory jurisdiction. This meant that the optional system came to an end; all of the parties to the European Convention on Human Rights now came under its juridical oversight.

Under the new system, individual applications are first referred to a committee of three judges for scrutiny, if the committee decides that the application is receivable, it goes on to one of the seven chambers (lower courts in EGHR parlance), consisting of seven judges. If the chamber decides that the application can be received, it goes on to examine the substance At this stage, the ECHR carries out the only nonjudicial function within its purview and seeks a "friendly settlement" between the parties: if a friendly settlement cannot be reached, the chamber concludes the consideration of the case and decides whether the state concerned has or has not violated the ECHR. The decision is final, but in exceptional cases one of the parties can send the case for review by the Grand Chamber, the full court, consisting of seventeen judges: if the Grand Chamber agrees to consider the case, its decision is final. In the new system, the possibility for states to lodge an application has been preserved. When this happens, the case goes directly to a chamber without going through the committee stage, as is the case for individual applications

With its permanent and mandatory judicial oversight, the new system constitutes the first stage in the transition from an international to a supranational system of overseeing the protection of human rights:

(G. ALPKAYA)

These developments had a very significant effect on the EU. The Maastricht Treaty proclaimed that respect for human rights, democracy, and the rule of law were the basic principles of the EU and membership in it and relations with it were made conditional on respect for human rights.

Throughout this period the activities and the influence of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in the field of human rights were registering significant gains. The human rights organizations operating at the national level tightened their links with international NGOs and provided a constant stream of facts and opinions to individuals and organizations active in the field. They also became effective in acting as a pressure group to influence government policies.

The Situation in Turkey

As these developments were taking place, Turkey was still under the legal system imposed by the 12 September coup. This by itself was enough to focus international attention on Turkey. In addition, there were the difficulties caused by the PKK. During the 1990s the situation in Turkey with respect to human rights could be summarized as follows.

- 1. The struggle against the PKK resulted in new restrictive provisions being added to the 12 September legislation in the early 1990s. Among these, the Law to Combat Terrorism (TMK) had a special place (Box 7-51).
- 2. This situation not only led to massive violations of human rights in the southeastern region but also contributed to spreading and diversifying of human rights violations in the rest of the country. New restrictions were imposed on the freedom of thought, expression, assembly, and association; the right to enjoy due process of law was curtailed; and deaths from torture, extrajudicial executions, and cases of disappearing persons became everyday occurrences.
- 3. Toward the end of the decade it became apparent that the military operations to suppress the PKK had succeeded. In early 1999 Öcalan was captured and brought to trial. These developments removed terror as a pretext for legitimizing human rights violations. Furthermore, the accident that occurred at Susurluk in 1996 revealed the urgent need to convert Turkey to a nation under the rule of law and respectful of human rights as advocated by the U.S. and Europe (see Box 7-6 above). These developments arrested the rise in human rights violations and led to a diminution in the number of torture allegations. Turkey entered the new century as a country that was under an autocratic legal order, however, where human rights were being routinely violated. We shall now examine the place of human rights in the foreign policy of Turkey during the 1990s.

Human Rights and Turkish Foreign Policy

In 1990 Turkey took some positive steps that had international repercussions. One of the most important was to recognize the mandatory jurisdiction of the ECtHR. It was thereby accepted for the first time that human rights violations could be referred to an international legal body for a decision. The European Social Charter was also ratified in 1990, and a committee to look into human rights was established in the TGNA. Another development was the abolition of the death penalty for thirteen categories of crimes. There was also a negative development that year, however, when the State of Emergency decrees were promulgated (Box 7-52). These decrees applied in the re-

Box 7-51. The Law to Combat Terrorism (TMK)

The Law to Combat Terrorism (TMK: Terorie Mücadele Kanunu) came into effect on 12 April 1991 and left its mark on the 1990s. This law gave the most trouble to Turkey in the international sphere: It supplanted articles 140, 141, 142, and 163 of the penal code, which had been restricting freedom of expression for more than half a century, It also supplanted the law that forbade the Kurdish language (see Box 6-4 in Section 6). The TMK introduced the "crime of terror" in the broadest terms (also including the supplanted articles mentioned above), however, and imposed an even more restrictive regime. The law was severely criticized for violating the principle of equality and for blurring the legal definition of criminal acts. In 1992 the Constitutional Court invalidated the provisions that granted broad rights and conferred immunities on the police. In international platforms, the brunt of the criticism was directed at article 8 of the law: "Regardless of the method, purpose, or reason, no written or oral propaganda can be made or meeting, demonstration, or march organized with the aim of de stroying the indivisible unity of the Turkish State with its country and its nation" (Resmi Gazete Official Journal), 12 April 1991). This article made it possible to define all kinds of expression of opinion within the context of a "crime of terror" and therefore punishable. In this period the article was used primarily to prosecute any kind of thought or expression relating to the Kurdish question. A great number of intellectuals and dissidents who adopted critical attitudes on the issue of democracy or the Kurdish question along with those publishing their views were tried and condemned under the TMK. When these cases were referred to the ECtHR, it found violations in most of the cases on the grounds that these restrictions on the freedom of expression could not be considered to be justified in a democratic society. Under international presture, article 8 was amended in 1995 and was only repealed on 19 July 2003 under the sixth Adjustment Reform Package (to adjust Turkish legislation to EU norms) and by overriding a presidengion that was under a State of Emergency (OHAL in the Turkish acronym). The government used these decrees to deal with the Kurdish question, but their effect was immediately felt in Turkey's foreign relations. In May 1990 Austria announced that it was suspending arms sales to Turkey on the grounds that they might be used in the southeast.

(G. ALPKAYA)

Another cause for international concern was the lack of progress in combating torture either in the legislation or in practice. In 1990 Turkey was high on the agenda of the bodies established by two conventions that Turkey had ratified two years earlier. The Committee against Torture (CAT) established under the UN Convention against Torture decided in 1990 to conduct a confidential investigation on Turkey. The Committee for the Prevention of Torture (CPT) set up under the European Convention

Box 7-52. The State of Emergency Decrees

These decrees had the force of law and were known as the SS decrees because they frequently called for censorship and exile (in Turkish sansür ve sürgün). The decrees resulted in massive and systematic violations of human rights in the State of Emergency (OHAL) region. To cite one instance, decree 430 reads as follows: "The governor of the OHAL region or the governor of a province is empowered to ban the printing, copying, distri bution, or introduction into the region of any printed material that misrepresents activities in the region or causes a serious disturbance of public order or causes excitement among the people or prevents security forces from performing their duties through false information. They can also request the Minister of the Interior to ban such material without regard to whether it originated in the region or not" (Resmî Gazete, 16 December 1990). Also: "Individuals or groups that give the impression that they might disturb public order can be exiled from the region at the discretion of the governor of the OHAL region. More importantly, the decree states that "Inlo criminal, financial, or legal responsibility can be imposed on the Minister of the Interior, the governor of the OHAL region, or the governors of the provinces in the OHAL region for carrying out the duties foreseen by the present decree, nor can there be recourse to any judicial body against these officials. Individuals who suffered unjustified damage can demand compensation from the state."

(G. Alpkaya)

for the Prevention of Torture carried out its first ad hoc visit to Turkey in 1990 and thereby started a monitoring process that would go on throughout the 1990s (Box 7-53).

The 1991 Gulf War created a climate that facilitated Turkey's military operations in the southeast and opened the way to operations conducted in northern Iraq. But in particular the European reaction to this was very sharp. Shortly after President Bush's visit to Turkey, an air and land operation was launched against northern Iraq in August 1991 that lasted fourteen days. This led Switzerland to suspend arms sales, while Germany condemned the operation for being directed against civilians. This was followed by the suspension of German military aid to Turkey. That did not stop Turkey from carrying out further operations, however. In 1991 Vedat Aydın, the chairman of the Diyarbakır branch of the People's Labor Party (HEP), was abducted. His body was found two days later. That year the United Communist Party of Turkey was banned by the Constitutional Court for having the word "Communist" in its title and for being engaged in separatist activities because of its views on the Kurdish question. Many other such violations would occur during the 1990s.

Ten years after the military coup, in the election of 20 October 1991, the Demirel-İnönü coalition govern-

Box 7-53. The UN and European Committees on Preventing Torture

The Committee against Torture is the body set up under the UN Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment that was approved in 1984 and came into effect in 1987. The committee looks into and decides on individual applications regarding infringements of the convention and also examines cases brought to its attention by states. In situations where there is credible information about systematic torture taking place in one of the parties to the convention, the committee can appeal to that state to cooperate, carry out confidential investigations (including visits to the state), report on the case, and make its report public The committee exercised this function for the first time against Similarly, the European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punish ment that was approved in 1987 and went into effect in 1989 established a Committee for the Prevention of Torture. This committee carries out visits, prepares reports, and makes recommendations for preventing torture through international inspections and cooperation; in the event that a party to the convention should withhold cooperation or refuse to heed the recommendations to improve its practices, the committee can make its findings public. It did this twice (in 1992 and 1996) in the case of Turkey.

(G. ALPKAYA)

ment came to power on a platform of democracy, human rights, and the rule of law. Within the ranks of the Social Democratic People's Party (SHP) there were eighteen newly elected HEP deputies representing the southeastern (Kurdish) region. At the inaugural session of parliament, these deputies insisted on taking the oath in the Kurdish language. They were prevented from doing so, and this triggered a crisis in the TGNA that escalated until it reached a peak in 1994.

In March 1992 almost a hundred people in the towns of Cizre, Şırnak, and Nusaybin died in disturbances in connection with the Newroz festival. As a result of these incidents the Kurdish question became one of the major headaches of Turkish foreign policy. Germany imposed an arms embargo on Turkey; and, on Germany's initiative, the EC troika's ambassadors in Ankara expressed their concern to the minister of foreign affairs. Austria invoked the Human Dimension Mechanism of the CSCE, and Turkey was called upon to provide explanation within ten days. This was a mechanism that had been established four years earlier but had never been put into operation against any Western state. Austria's action forced Deputy Prime Minister İnönü to go to Austria to explain the Turkish position. The visit proved fruitless; Ankara then used the same mechanism to lodge claims against Austria, thereby preventing the CSCE from taking further steps.

As a result of these developments in June 1992 the European Parliament adopted a resolution on the "Rights of the Kurdish People" and the PACE adopted, for the first time, a comprehensive resolution on the Kurdish question. The resolution declared that the steps taken by Turkey in its legislation and at the international level were noteworthy developments but also noted that (despite the government's good intentions) serious violations of human rights continued to take place, including torture and disappearances. The resolution went on to state that the economic situation in the southeast was unstable and expressed concern over the increase in violence in the region. The PACE condemned the PKK's violence and noted that any response to terrorist provocation in a democratic state must remain within the rule of law. The PACE called on Turkey to heed its advice on preventing torture and to lift the state of emergency in the southeast. Turkey was also asked to withdraw its notification of derogation under article 15 of the ECHR, to respect the identity, the freedoms, and the rights of the Kurdish population (including the right to use the Kurdish language in television and radio broadcasts), and to initiate genuine political dialogue with people who considered themselves Kurds and wished to develop their ethnic, cultural, and linguistic identity peacefully and to obtain more political rights. directive was also adopted, empowering the Committee on Political Affairs and the Committee on Legal Affairs to monitor the state of human rights in Turkey and asking them to report to the PACE on their findings. When the Constitutional Court decided (within a fortnight of the adoption of the resolution) to ban the Socialist Party on the grounds that it was seeking "to create a minority within the nation" (Constitutional Court, Decision 1991/2, 10 July 1992), this was perceived as Turkey's determination not to change its course.

Certain amendments were made in the Turkish Penal Procedural Law in December 1992 to prevent torture, which was generally well received as a positive development. But this did not prevent the CPT from making a "Public Statement." This was the most severe sanction that the committee could apply, and it was exercising this sanction for the first time against Turkey. The committee announced that—notwithstanding the changes made in legislation and the promises given by the authorities—torture and mistreatment were widespread in Turkey, particularly in places under police control.

In 1993 human rights violations continued unabated, including forcible evacuation of villages. Typical violations of human rights were the cases of Metin Can and Hasan Kaya in Elazığ, who both disappeared; subsequently their bodies were found. The ECtHR decided in 2000 in these cases that Turkey was responsible for violating the right to life and the prohibition of torture. The court also determined that an effective investigation had not been carried out and that effective ways for seeking legal redress did not exist. Turkey had been found to be in breach of the provisions of the convention. The incident at Lice in October 1993 was also a typical case of the mass violation of human rights. Proper light still has not been shed on this case, where the town was under gunfire for two days. It was alleged that scores of people were killed or wounded and hundreds of homes and businesses were destroyed. In a report (dated July 1997) on human rights problems in Turkey and their international repercussions sent to the interested authorities, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs expressed the following opinion in connection with the appeal made by the inhabitants of Lice to the ECmHR:

It is to be expected that we shall lose most of the cases relating to the southeast. To minimize our liabilities, the proper course is to aim for a friendly settlement. In this way Turkey will not be found to be at fault...and will end up paying a lower compensation... There are 208 appeals coming from 257 individuals in connection with the events that took place at Lice in October 1993. It will be advisable to seek a friendly settlement in connection with these appeals... Furthermore, ways should be sought to pay damages to 200 of our citizens who suffered losses in the events but did not appeal to the European Committee on Human Rights. ("Dışişleri Bakanlığı İnsan Hakları Raporu")

This advice was heeded: following a friendly settlement, on 22 March 2001, Turkey paid compensation in the amount of 4 trillion 160 billion liras to appellants from Lice.

The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe concluded in its decision of June 1999 that during the period from 1991 to 1993 the security forces and their paramilitary auxiliaries such as the village guards had violated human rights in the course of combating terrorism and that the investigations in connection with these violations had not been properly conducted up to that time. In the cases that went to the court, most of the complaints dealt with events that took place during this period. As a rule, the court's findings were that Turkey had committed multiple violations of the convention.

In November 1993 the (UN) Committee against Torture issued its "Summary Account." The document stated that there was credible evidence of widespread and systematic torture in Turkey. These findings caused a sharp reaction from Turkey. Turkey argued that the reference to the "Kurdish minority" in a confidential report was an indication that the rapporteur was not impartial. It also argued that the allegations of torture referred to isolated cases resulting from the fight against terror. Despite all these negative factors, the internal events of 1993 had little impact on Turkey's foreign policy.

Unlike 1993, 1994 was a year of acute crisis for Turkish foreign policy. The People's Labor Party (HEP), which was perceived as the political representative of citizens of Kurdish extraction, was banned by the Constitutional Court in July 1993. When this happened, the ethnic Kurdish deputies belonging to HEP joined the Democracy Party (DEP). Lifting the parliamentary immunities of these deputies and subsequently arresting them triggered the crisis. Both the EP and the PACE adopted resolutions in April 1994, condemning the arrest of the DEP deputies and demanding their immediate release. The Turkish government responded to this by announcing a new "Democratization Package" on 18 May. The crisis continued to escalate, however, when the Constitutional Court decided to close down the DEP (Box 7-54).

In June the PACE adopted a resolution that concluded that the situation in Turkey had become even graver with the closing down of the DEP by the Constitutional Court and the trial of the DEP deputies in the State Security Court, where the prosecutor was demanding a death sentence. In its resolution, PACE reiterated that it was "fully conscious of the need to preserve the unity and the territorial integrity of the Turkish Republic" and accepted that "the task of finding a peaceful and democratic settlement that excludes separatism belongs to the citizens of this republic." The assembly noted that the solution to the serious problems and the grave situation in the southeastern region of Turkey had to be achieved by peaceful means. It added that it was of the opinion that "the Turkish authorities are committing a serious political error when, instead of seeking a dialogue with the elected representatives of a part of the Turkish people, they choose to eliminate them." The resolution also recalled that the Turkish authorities interpreted the request for constitutional reform to ensure cultural autonomy as "separatism" and "encouragement and support for terrorist activities" and drew attention to the fact that the measures taken

Box 7-54. The DEP Crisis

Starting in 1993, the struggle against the PKK was extended to include those legal organizations that were suspected of having links to the PKK. First the newspaper Özgür Gündem was targeted: a number of its employees were killed or went missing. The newspaper was prevented from functioning with repeated bans on its publication. This was followed by increased harassment of the Democracy Party (DEP). In February 1994 the party's secretary-general, Murat Bozlak, was attacked In his house and received seven gunshot wounds. This was followed by the bombing attack on the party's headquarters. The press began to carry statements indicating that the army was uncomfortable with the DEP. The DEP declared that the party would boycott the local elections due to take place on 27 March because of the campaign against it. The TGNA considered the issue of lifting the parliamentary immunity of the DEP deputies. Some of the deputies were taken under custody at the gate of the parliament building after they were stripped of their parliamentary immunity on 2 March. Others stayed in the building for two days and thereby delayed their detention until 4 March. The deputies were placed under arrest on 17 March. In June 1994 the Constitutional Court-banned the DEP. The trial of the arrested deputies got underway in August at the State Security Court, and in December they were condemned to serve prison terms of fifteen years. A number of complaints were lodged with the ECmHR. In March 2000 the ECtHR reached a verdict in connection with the appeal of Ozgur Gündem. The court decided that the campaign of intimidation waged against the newspaper and its personnel Infringed on article 10 of the ECHR It also decided in 1997 that there had been a violation in the length of the period that the DEP deputies had been kept under detention. The banning of the DEP also went before the court. Its decision, issued on 10 December 2002, was that the ban was in violation of article 11 of the convention dealing with freedom of association. Turkey was condemned to pay compensation in the amount of 200,000 euros against the DEP deputies threatened to lead to new violations of legality and human rights in a democratic society. The PACE called for changes in the Constitution to make it compatible with the Council of Europe's norms, decided to send a delegation to Ankara, and expressed the hope that Turkey would receive OSCE delegations to secure the implementation of human rights mechanisms.

(G. ALPKAYA)

This resolution was followed by a resolution adopted by the Parliamentary Assembly of the OSCE (PA-OSCE) in July. The resolution called for releasing the six Kurdish members of parliament, sending a PA-OSCE delegation to Turkey to secure their release, and activating OSCE's Moscow mechanism against Turkey.

The EP declared in September 1994 that the developments in Turkey were an attack on pluralistic democracy and decided to suspend the activities of the Joint Parliamentary Committee until the end of the DEP trial. The EP adopted a further resolution in December 1994 in which it referred to these developments, cited the new violations, and called for the suspension of the negotiations on the Customs Union and the postponement of the Council of Association meeting scheduled for 19 December. The Council of Association met anyway, but its decision was postponed to 6 March 1995.

In February 1995 the EP declared that the human rights situation in Turkey was so serious that the recommendation for a Customs Union could not be implemented. It went on to recall that the decision to establish a Customs Union depended on EP's ratification and added that this ratification would depend on the European Commission's reports regarding the measures taken in Turkey to ensure the rule of law. Nevertheless, on 6 March 1995 the Association Council adopted its decision 1/95 on the completion of the Customs Union.

Two weeks after the Customs Union went into effect, Turkey launched a major operation with 35,000 troops in northern Iraq, causing a great deal of commotion in European circles. The EU troika called for Turkey's immediate withdrawal, and Germany suspended the delivery of weapons to Turkey as well as the military portion of its financial aid. The EP also called on Turkey to withdraw and instructed the European Council and Commission to develop rules that would prevent the use of weapons originating in the EU in such operations.

The PACE adopted a resolution in April 1995 in which it condemned the Turkish operation in northern Iraq and called for a political solution to the Kurdish problem. Stressing that Turkey had made no substantive improvements in either its Constitution or its legislation, the assembly concluded that Turkey had not complied with its commitments under the Statute of the Council of Europe. The PACE recommended that the Committee of Ministers should call on Turkey: (1) to withdraw from northern Iraq; (2) to seek a peaceful solution to the Kurdish question in keeping with the statute of the Council of Europe and the principles contained in the Conventions of the Council of Europe; and (3) to establish a calendar for the revision of its Constitution and its legislation to conform to the principles and the norms of the Council of Europe. The PACE advised the Committee of Ministers to consider suspending Turkey's right to be represented, to ensure that Turkey gave an account of its progress in these three areas to the June session of the Parliamentary Assembly.

In June it was the turn of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Western European Union (WEU) to take up the issue of a solution to the Kurdish question when it called on Turkey to consider a formula that would provide a form of autonomy within the framework of Turkey's territorial integrity. The U.S. suspended the delivery of cluster bombs to Turkey, citing the human rights situation. These moves were indications that the pressure on Turkey was growing. Turkey responded by rejecting the criticism directed at it. The minister of state, Ayvaz Gökdemir from the Nationalist Action Party (MHP), even insulted three female members of the EP by labeling them "whores." At the same time, Ankara sought to ease the pressure by making some minor improvements in its legislation. In this framework, some articles of the 1982 Constitution were also changed.

Most of the changes in the Constitution related to the Turkish Grand National Assembly or the political parties. The number of deputies was raised from 450 to 550. It became easier for deputies to change parties. The rule by which deputies belonging to parties that had been banned would lose their seats was repealed. The leaders whose parties were being tried at the Constitutional Court under the threat of closure were allowed to speak at the trial. The opening date for parliamentary sessions was moved from 1 September to 1 October. It was decided that local elections would be held simultaneously with general or by-elections. The minimum age for voters and for membership in parties was lowered to eighteen. Citizens living abroad or under detention or arrest would be allowed to vote. Parties were free to establish women's or youth branches. University professors and students could now become political party members. The rules preventing associations, unions, foundations, cooperatives, and professional associations from establishing links with parties or cooperating with them were repealed. All of these changes moved in the direction of democratization, but the only amendment dealing with human rights was the lifting of the ban on the establishment of unions by public servants. Another change was the removal of the portion of the Constitution's preface that praised the 12 September coup and its authors.

These amendments came into effect in July 1995. It was obvious that these changes were designed to alleviate the pressure on Turkey and secure the approval of the Customs Union by the EP. This is proven by the fact that most of the legislation that would make possible the implementation of the few improvements made in the area of human rights was not enacted during this period. In October 1995 the notorious article 8 of the Law for Combating Terrorism was partially amended (see Box 7-51 above).

These initiatives were generally accepted as signs of sufficient goodwill. The Parliamentary Assembly of the OSCE adopted a balanced resolution in July 1995, based on the report of the OSCE team that had been to Turkey two months earlier, that cited allegations of violations and the explanations provided by the authorities. The PACE postponed the consideration of the situation in Turkey to 1996. After awarding the Sakarov Prize to Leyla Zana, the Democracy Party deputy who was serving a prison term, the EP canceled its previous decision to suspend the meetings of the Joint Parliamentary Committee and in December 1995 gave its approval to the Customs Union with Turkey. In giving its approval, the EP laid down the conditions of improvement in four major problems: human rights, democratization, the Cyprus question, and the Kurdish question. In addition, the parliament asked the European Commission to prepare an annual report on human rights in Turkey and the development of democracy.

In April 1996 the PACE adopted a resolution in which it noted that the amendments to the Constitution and the Law on Combating Terrorism were in keeping with the assembly's previous recommendations but insisted on the elimination of article 8 (which restricted freedom of expression), on finding a peaceful solution to the Kurdish question, and on the release of the jailed DEP deputies. The resolution placed Turkey under the monitoring procedure of the Committee of Ministers and called on the committee to encourage Turkey to adjust its legislation and its practices to the norms and principles of the Council of Europe. It also mentioned that the Committee of Ministers was not informing the assembly of the substance of its dialogue with Turkey. This indicated that diplomatic pressure was being applied on Ankara without the public being informed.

The Committee for the Prevention of Torture released its second "Public Statement" in December 1996. The committee made a general appraisal of the past four years that mentioned the torture implements that were found, the statements of victims, and the ineffectiveness of the succession of government directives and concluded that Turkey could bring the question of torture to an end by effectively controlling its security forces. The committee claimed that public prosecutors were in the habit of protecting the police against the allegations of torture victims. It stressed the need to allow those who had been detained to talk to their lawyers immediately and to be medically examined by an independent doctor and rejected the claims that torture incidents were isolated cases and the attempts to justify torture on the pretext of combating terrorism. After noting that torture was applied not just to these detained for political reasons but also to those detained for common crimes, the committee came to the conclusion that torture in Turkey had much deeper roots.

After the "Public Statement," Denmark lodged a complaint with the ECmHR in January 1997, accusing Turkey of torturing a Danish citizen of Kurdish extraction.

In 1997 Turkey made a special effort to take effective measures to improve its performance in the fields of human rights and establishing the rule of law. The fatal traffic accident at Susurluk that occurred in November 1996 had a strong influence in turning Turkey in this direction. In March 1997 the period of detention was shortened, and in April the committee that had been set up within the TGNA to investigate the Susurluk accident issued its report. The report contained a number of very important revelations about human rights violations. The Upper Council Coordinator of Human Rights was established in April (in April 2001 a law renamed it the Upper Council on Human Rights), and in July 1997 the MFA submitted to the government its already mentioned Report on Human Rights, containing recommendations for further improvements in the area of human rights,

It was expected that Turkey would be declared a candidate for accession to the EU at the Luxembourg Summit. The democratization package had been adopted to fulfill this expectation, but the summit was a disappointment for Turkey. Thus the democratization package was withdrawn, and relations with the EU were confined to the requirements of the Association Agreement.

In June 1998 the PACE adopted a resolution that was striking because it contained recommendations to Turkey that resembled proposals for postconflict rehabilitation at a time when Ankara was in an intensely introspective mood. The PACE called on the Ministerial Committee to make an appeal to Turkey to adopt the following measures, among others:

- A. to find a nonmilitary solution for the existing problems in the southeastern provinces;
- B. to protect the civilian population of the regions concerned against any kind of armed violence;
- C. to expedite and intensify its efforts to promote the economic and social development and reconstruction of the southeastern provinces;
- D. to sign and ratify the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities and the European Charter for Regional and Minority Languages and apply its provisions to the Kurds;
- E. to bring to light the fate of the missing persons;
- F. to adopt policies and take adequate measures to

- enable Turkish citizens of Kurdish origin to exercise their cultural and political rights;
- G. to restore the rule of law in the southeast of the country and in particular to lift emergency rule in the southeastern provinces, to ensure effective protection of villages, to exercise civilian control over military activity in the region, including the keeping of records and observance of human rights, and to prosecute anyone who violated human rights;
- H. to abolish the village guard system;
- I. to undertake additional effective measures aimed at the reconstruction and revival of the economy in the southeastern provinces;
- J. to take further steps to reconstruct schools and hospitals in the area.
- K. to implement in cooperation with international humanitarian organizations a comprehensive program designed to facilitate the return of the Kurdish population wishing to go back to their villages.

The PACE called for cooperation with international humanitarian and financial institutions to carry out these and the other recommendations made to Turkey. The PACE also adopted a directive on that date whereby it charged the committee to monitor the question of the "Kurdish minority" within the framework of the procedure to monitor compliance with the provisions of the convention.

There was also a noticeable change in the EP's approach to Turkey toward the end of 1998. In a resolution adopted in September, the EP called for the resumption of the political dialogue with Turkey and elimination of the measures to isolate Turkey that prevented it from making progress in its political system, in the living conditions of its people, and in the state of its human rights. This was to be done without prejudice to the criticism and warnings sent to Ankara on the subjects of human rights, democratization, and the Kurdish question.

The final crisis with Europe came at the end of 1998, with the departure of the PKK leader Abdullah Öcalan from Syria and the sequence of events that followed.

When Öcalan was captured in February 1999 and brought to Turkey (see Box 7-16 above), numerous warnings were issued to Ankara about the need for a fair trial and the need to avoid a death sentence, which was regarded as a certainty. Turkey had been condemned by the ECtHR in the case of the State Security Courts, which were found to be neither independent nor impartial, but Ankara did nothing about this finding. When Öcalan appealed to the ECtHR, Turkey acted quickly. In order to avoid being condemned once again, it amended its Constitution and the law governing State Security Courts in June, one month after Öcalan's trial had gotten underway. The amendment replaced the military judge in the State Security Courts (made up of three judges) with a civilian judge. This was followed by a guilty verdict against Öcalan and a death sentence issued by the court, which was upheld by the Court of Cassation in November. In December 1999 the ECHR issued a stay of execution order, whereupon the government delayed sending Öcalan's sentence to the TGNA for approval. Following the ECtHR's decision of interim measures, the issue was frozen for an indefinite period. Öcalan's appeal for an end to armed struggle and the compliance of the PKK ushered in a new era in which it would be very difficult for the government to use the terror argument to explain infringements of human rights. Furthermore, new international dynamics were taking shape that had a direct effect on Turkey and compounded its difficulties. For example, the European Committee against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) had begun to equate infringements of human rights in Turkey with racism.

In 1998 there were strong indications that, given the role that Turkey was expected to play in the new era, the question of human rights would somehow be overcome whether Ankara liked it or not. The North Atlantic Assembly, consisting of NATO parliamentarians, issued a report in 1998 expressing the view that if Turkey wanted to become a modern democracy it must separate domestic security issues from national security and ensure that the army devoted itself exclusively to national security. This was one of the many criticisms directed against Turkey in connection with human rights, but it was perhaps the most interesting one.

Throughout the 1990s Turkey had been supported in its fights against terrorism even as it was criticized for conducting the struggle without always heeding the principles of the rule of law, democracy, and human rights. After Öcalan was captured and the EU accepted Turkey as a candidate for accession in 1999, the criticism directed at Ankara turned into the conditions for membership in the EU. The new expectations were that the regime in Turkey would become more civilian and less military, that the rule of law would prevail, and that human rights would be respected.

Turkey's response to these expectations was uneven. Some timid steps were taken to adjust the legislation. The most notable was the amendment in December 1999 of the law (dating from 1913) regulating the trial of civil servants. Another important policy change with international implications was the decision in February 1999 to allow the Committee for the Prevention of Torture to publish its report. This was done to preclude the committee from putting out another public statement. In fact, at Ankara's request, the committee also published the preceding reports on Turkey. Furthermore, Turkey signed the UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights in August 2000. This was a major step forward for Ankara.

With the approval of the Accession Partnership Document and the adoption of the National Program, the process of amending the legislation dating from the 12 September coup began to gather pace. In October 2001 a constitutional amendment package was adopted. This was followed by a succession of amendment packages to the existing legislation, starting in February 2002. The first package made changes in the Turkish penal code, the Law to Combat Terrorism, and the law regulating the State Security Courts. The second adjustment package (adopted in April 2002) amended the legislation governing associations, political parties, and the press. The third package (adopted in August 2002) abolished the death penalty in peacetime and allowed for the teaching of Kurdish and publications in that language. The fourth and fifth packages (adopted in January 2003) broadened the scope of the changes introduced in the previous packages and made allowance for retrials in conformity with the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights. In January 2003 the Sixth Protocol of the European Convention on Human Rights abolishing the death penalty was signed. In addition to these comprehensive changes, the State of Emergency (in effect since 1987) was lifted on 30 November 2002. This was another important step forward for Turkey. Despite these changes, it is obvious that implementation will determine whether the question of human rights will cease to be a contentious issue in Turkish foreign policy.

GÖKÇEN ALPKAYA

Sources (The Issue of Human Rights)

"Dışişleri Bakanlığı İnsan Hakları Raporu" Açık Sayfa Dergisi, Ek 7 (Oct. 1997).

Gemalmaz, Mehmet Semih. Avrupa İnsan Hakları Komisyonu Önünde Türkiye-1: Kabuledilebilirlik Kararları. İstanbul: Beta, 1997.

TİHV İnsan Hakları Yıllık Raporları, HRFT (Human Rights Foundation of Turkey), Annual Reports, http://www.tihv .org.tr (also found on the websites of the United Nations, Council of Europe, and European Union).

Relations with Russia

FROM THE USSR TO THE RUSSIAN FEDERATION

In 1991 the USSR collapsed and the Russian Federation came into being. The most important event in Turkish-Russian relations that year was the visit of president Turgut Özal to Moscow from 11 to 16 March. This was the first presidential visit after Cevdet Sunay's visit back in 1969. Özal had lengthy talks with both Gorbachev and Yeltsin and met with the representatives of the Ahiska and Gagauz people (Turkish ethnic groups living in the Soviet Union). This visit coincided with the seventieth anniversary of the 1921 treaty and was the occasion for discussing the Middle East in the aftermath of the Gulf War and the issue of the BSEC. At the end of the talks, three important agreements were signed on 12 March. These were the Agreement for the Elimination of Double Taxation, the Agreement on Trade, Economic, Scientific, and Technical Cooperation, and the Treaty on Friendship, Good Neighborliness, and Cooperation, with a duration of twenty

The Agreement on Trade, Economic, Scientific, and Technical Cooperation established ambitious targets for bilateral trade in the coming years. Article 2 read as follows:

The contracting parties will strive to attain a volume of trade of 3 to 5 billion U.S. dollars in the coming years and 9 to 10 billion U.S. dollars toward 2000. To this end, they will take the necessary measures to use their resources more effectively and expand their long-term trade relations in a balanced and diversified manner. They will also facilitate the creation of favorable conditions for the development of trade relations between Turkish and Soviet institutions, enterprises, and firms within the framework of the legislation of the two countries.

The Treaty of Friendship, Good Neighborliness, and Cooperation was a reaffirmation by both countries of the principles of the Paris Charter. The treaty contained the mutual obligation to respect territorial integrity and political independence, to consult on regional issues, to communicate on military matters, to cooperate in the broadest way in the economic, cultural, and other fields, and to act in unison in combating terrorism. It showed how far relations between the two countries had come in recent years. The treaty was important because, in addition to dealing with relations with the USSR as a federation, it paved the way for cooperation with the individual federated units. Article 16 stated: "The parties are agreed that the development of the elations of the Republic of Turkey with the component republics of the Soviet Union will add substance to and broaden their bilateral relations. The Parties shall also encourage contacts and cooperation between cities and local administrations." Article 17 provided that "the Parties shall encourage the learning of the languages of the peoples of the USSR in Turkey and the Turkish language in the USSR."

After Moscow, Özal visited the Soviet Socialist Republics of Ukraine, Kazakhstan, and Azerbaijan, where he signed various agreements and established bilateral relations with these republics. During his visit to Azerbaijan, Özal opened the Turkish Consulate General in Baku and inaugurated direct air links between Istanbul and Baku and automatic telephone links between Azerbaijan and Turkey. A new leaf had been turned in Turkey's relations with Azerbaijan.

With the collapse of the USSR and the ending of the Cold War, the international system went into a process of restructuring. This process involved changes in production methods resulting from a scientific and technological revolution and the increasing importance of information. The Russian Federation declared its sovereignty on 12 June 1990. After the USSR left the international scene

Box 7-55. The Russian Federation's Foreign Policy: The "Near Abroad" and the Military Doctrine

At first the Russian Federation (RF) was in turmoil, and its policies were not just convergent with the policies of the U.S. and Europe but actually in their orbits. Starting in 1994, however, Russia also began to turn toward Asia and sought to free itself from thralldom to the West.

STREET OF A PARK OF THE STREET AND THE STREET AND THE STREET AND THE

The cleavage between Atlanticists and Eurasians that existed in domestic politics also manifested itself in foreign policy. But the RF's foreign policy did not seek confrontation with the West. Although it opposed the Partnership for Peace project signed in Brussels in 1994 that was designed to bring Eastern Europe within NATO's umbrella, eventually the RF did come to terms with NATO Undoubtedly, this was also a result of its need for IMF and World Bank loans.

The most stilking sign of a change in Russia foreign policy was the policy of the "Near Abroad" enunciated in February 1993. This policy was described as the RF's Monroe Doctrine. Russia claimed that the territories of the former USSR were areas of vital interest for the RF from the economic and security perspectives and sought to influence and control developments in these countries.

The Military Doctrine announced in November 1993 was an important element of this new policy. The document that contained the Military Doctrine was known as the Karaganov Doctrine. The army was also made responsible for internal security, and the principle that the RF would not be the first country to resort to nuclear weapons was abandoned. If was also announced that Russian troops could be stationed outside the country in order to ensure the security of the RF and the Commonwealth of Independent States. The sale of arms would be accorded priority in order to obtain financial resources for security requirements.

Russia established military bases in the Caucasus and Central Asia within the framework of the Near Abroad and Karaganov Doctrine. The West did not appear to object to the Russian troops guarding the borders of the countries in these regions, having in mind that it was not easy to establish stability in these countries. Taking advantage of this situation, Russia bolstered its control in the Caucasus by exacerbating regional disputes.

On 21 April 2000 Putin released the new Military Doctrine, which had taken three years to prepare.

Russia's Near Abroad policy and Military Doctrine were pursuing a number of objectives. One was to restore the economy, which had been shattered with the disintegration of the USSR. Another objective was to protect the Russian diaspora of 25 million people who remained beyond the RF's borders. The third objective was to prevent outside powers from gaining influence in these underdeveloped countries with rich energy resources.

(E: Tellat)

on 31 December 1991 when its legal existence came to an end, the Russian Federation succeeded the defunct state as its natural heir. In this process of succession, both Russia and Turkey were in search of new roles for themselves. This should not be forgotten in examining their bilateral relations. Another important point that must be borne in mind in appraising these relations is the political structure of the Russian Federation.

With the disintegration of the USSR, fourteen new states emerged to join the community of nations, in addition to the Russian Federation (the successor of the USSR). The RF's land area was twice the size of the combined surface of the other fourteen states, and its population was more than half of the total population of the USSR. Most of the natural resources were also located in the RF: 90% of the oil, 80% of the gas, 70% of the gold, and 62% of the electricity produced in the USSR came from the RF. Among the successor states, the RF had the most homogeneous population after Lithuania and Armenia. Unlike the USSR, the RF could count on the support of the West, because it no longer posed an ideological threat and had ceased to be a destabilizing element on the international scene. Furthermore, the RF was seeking to integrate itself with the capitalist world and was an important market for the products of the West.

During the 1990s the RF under Yeltsin's leadership was striving to join the international community by adopting the free market economy and the democratic parliamentary system. The efforts to establish the market economy, however, were often leading to oligarchic structures. In the early years of the twenty-first century the RF had lost the support of the West in its efforts to integrate and was now proceeding on its own in defiance of the West.

By the year 2000 Russia had a new president in Vladimir Putin. It continued to maintain friendly ties with the West while developing its relations with countries like China and Iran and seeking to maintain its predominance in the Near Abroad (Box 7-55). Armed with nuclear weapons, Russia continued to be a major actor on the global scene. This was also because it would be difficult to maintain stability in the Caucasus and the Balkans without Russia.

With the transformation of the USSR into the RF the region's importance for Turkey increased significantly. While new clashes of interests appeared with the RF and the new republics, new opportunities for cooperation had also emerged.

II. SOME OF THE PROBLEM AREAS

With the collapse of the USSR and the ending of the Cold War, Turkey lost the major card that it had been using for fifty years: namely, its strategic importance. Although this was a matter for concern, it rediscovered kindred peoples in Central Asia, which led it to entertain a dream that it had forgotten for three-quarters of a century. But Turkey's concern over its strategic position was groundless; nor was there much to rejoice about in the rediscovery of kindred peoples. The Gulf crisis and the developments in Yugoslavia caused Turkey to become a responsible ally of the U.S. in a region that was in turmoil. Moreover, as the RF recovered from the debacle of the USSR, it reasserted its primacy in the former Soviet territories, starting in 1994, and repositioned itself in confrontation with Turkey and other countries.

- , 1. At first the catch phrase "the Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic Sea to the Great Wall of China" uttered by Prime Minister Demirel in February 1992 and the attempt to introduce an expanded Turkish alphabet to Central Asia created uneasiness in the RF, a country with Muslim and Turkic populations. But rivalry gradually gave way to cooperation.
- 2. Turkey and the RF were also in confrontation in the Balkans. In both Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo, Turkey and Russia supported opposing factions. There was a tendency for those of the Orthodox faith (Russia, Yugoslavia, and Greece) to band together, which led to speculations that they were forming an axis against Turkey, Macedonia, and Albania.
- 3. When the USSR broke apart, the route through which the energy resources of the Caspian basin and the Caucasus would flow to global markets became a burning issue. In the ensuing competition between Turkey and the RF, both claimed that routes going through their respective territories were the sole option. The country that hosted a pipeline would enhance its strategic position and derive substantial financial rewards. The routes of the pipelines became a subject of intensive debate in both countries, even though ultimately the trajectory of the pipeline would be determined by the companies exploiting the oil and gas fields. When it became clear that the early oil would be piped to the Russian oil terminal of Novorossiysk (see Box 7-35 above), Turkey began to stress the danger this would pose to the Turkish Straits and issued two sets of regulations in 1994 and 1998 to regulate navigation. These also created difficulties between the two countries.
- 4. Another issue marring relations was the arms reductions in the northern Caucasus as agreed to by the USSR in the Treaty to Reduce Conventional Forces in Europe. On 17 September 1993 Russia sent a note to the signatories informing them that conditions had changed and that consequently it would not implement the reductions called for the treaty. Eventually new arrangements were negotiated in the treaty in May 1997, and Russia was given satisfaction.

5. Defense industries in Russia provided employment for large numbers of workers. After a period of uncertainty following the collapse of the USSR, these industries began to recover their former position. Soon Russia found itself exporting arms to fifty-one countries, including Turkey. Under an agreement signed on 30 October 1993, Turkey purchased armored vehicles, rifles, night-vision binoculars, and nineteen helicopters from Russia. These weapons proved highly useful in the struggle against the PKK at a time when Germany and the West had cut off the sale of weapons to Turkey because of violations of human rights. Turkey was the first NATO member that purchased arms from the RF.

The sale of Russian weapons to its neighbors, however, was a source of apprehension for Turkey. The most striking example was the S-300 crisis over the sale of missiles to Southern Cyprus. Following negotiations that began in 1995, an agreement was signed by Southern Cyprus on 4 January 1997 with Rosvooruzhenie (a Russian arms company) for the sale of S-300 missiles. Turkey declared that it could not remain indifferent to this sale. This was not the first time that Russia was selling arms, including missiles and planes, to Cyprus. This particular sale, however, had the potential to change the military balance on the island. With U.S. support, Turkey prevented the installation of these missiles. The problem was overcome with the installation of the weapons system in Crete.

6. The most serious issue between the two countries was their respective positions on the Chechen resistance and the PKK problems, which threatened their territorial integrity. As the PKK dimension appeared to come to an end in 1999, the Chechen war flared up once again that year.

The question of Chechnya came up when the territory declared its independence on 2 November 1991 during the Soviet period. In the summer of 1994 the pro-Dudayev forces captured Grozny. When Dudayev was killed on 21 April 1996 in a missile attack, it became possible to make peace. Russian forces withdrew, and an agreement was signed on 12 May 1997 (postponing until 31 December 2001 a permanent settlement of the question). Russia promised to make payments to Chechnya for the oil pipeline that crossed its territory and provide financial assistance. The first round of fighting had cost Russia $6 billion and ended with its forces defeated.

By the summer of 1999 the fundamentalist Muslims under the leadership of Shamil Basayev and Emir Hattab had established autonomous districts in Daghestan. Moscow held the Chechen administration accountable for these developments and launched an operation in Daghestan in September that led to the destruction of Chechnya and paved the way to Putin's presidency.

Chechnya is important for the RF in a number of ways. (a) Economic: a number of oil and gas pipelines from Central Asia go across Chechnya, and at this period there was an oil refinery in Grozny. (b) Strategic: Chechnya's independence could well result in Russia losing control over the Caucasus. (c) Territorial integrity: Chechnya could set a dangerous precedent for the 30 million people with different ethnic backgrounds living in the RF. (d) Security: the activities of Chechnya guerrillas were increasingly turning to terrorism, which could easily spread to other parts of the RF. (e) Internal politics: the administration of the RF was setting the clans in the country against one another. By supporting Doku Zavgayev, Yeltsin was seeking to score points over Gorbachev, who was supporting Dudayev. (f) Religion: growing fundamentalism could create serious problems for the RF and, by provoking Orthodox fanaticism, could lead to disintegration of the country. (g) Social: after Afghanistan, the country was now afflicted with the Chechnya syndrome, Families that had lost sons in Chechnya and wounded veterans who had not been rehabilitated were beginning to affect society, leading to a clamor to bring the fighting to an end somehow.

The RF began to fault Turkey for allowing Chechens to use its territory, for not preventing its citizens from fighting in the Chechen ranks against Russia, and for not stopping the flow of aid money to Chechnya. The hijacking of the ferry Avrasya in January 1996 provoked a major crisis in relations. The Chechens and their Turkish collaborators claimed that it was hijacked "for the freedom of the Caucasus people" (Hürriyet, 12 January 1996). When they were apprehended, they were tried not for hijacking the vessel but for forcing it to change course. Subsequently the culprits were allowed to flee from prison after they had been sentenced. A park in Istanbul was named after Dudayev, and a square in Ankara was renamed Dudayev Square. Dudayev was twice received by the prime minister in Ankara. Ankara claimed that this was the work of Chechen and Caucasus NGOs operating in Turkey, but nothing was done to check these activities. In the contrary, with the support of the local press, the government looked the other way.

When the second Chechen war flared up in the summer of 1999, Turkey followed a more cautious course. There were fewer mass protests like the ones that took place during the first war. As the Russian operation went on, Prime Minister Ecevit visited the RF from 4 to 6 November 1999. But when the minister of state, Abdülhaluk

Çay (who belonged to the right-wing Nationalist Action Party), made a speech in which he declared: "The war is only beginning, now that Grozny has fallen. There is no way to deprive a freedom-loving nation of its freedom" (Hürriyet, 23 February 2000; Yeni Şafak, 25 February 2008), Russia promptly sent a note of protest to Ankara.

A parallel could be drawn between Russia's approach to the PKK question and Turkey's approach to Chechnya. The approach of both governments was measured. But the Duma, which lacked real power, acted more emotionally. At its initiative, a Conference on Kurdistan's History was convened in Moscow on 22 February 1994. Subsequently a Kurdish House was opened on 25 January 1995 at Yaroslav (300 kilometers from Moscow). A Russian delegation visiting Ankara in February 1995 asked Turkey to stop supporting Chechnya, prevent the flow of arms and volunteers to the territory, and close down the Caucasus-Chechen Associations operating in Turkey. The delegation also drew attention to the 500,000 ethnic Kurds living in Russia. But Turkey was reluctant to heed these requests. The Kurdish Parliament in exile held its third meeting in Moscow from 30 October to 1 November 1995, with the permission of the Russian Duma. This in turn drew a protest from Turkey. The Duma went further and arranged for two Kurdish conferences to be held in Moscow in 1997. On 26 September 1997 the Duma issued a statement in which Turkey was accused of committing genocide against the Kurds.

The difficulties created by the PKK in Turkey's relations with the RF reached their climax when the leader of the organization, Abdullah Öcalan, left Syria on 17 October 1998 and sought refuge in Russia. On 4 November the Duma made an appeal to Yeltsin for Öcalan to be granted the status of political refugee in Russia. Owing to Turkey's sensitivity on this issue, Öcalan left Russia on 12 November and proceeded to Italy, where he was well received. His subsequent capture spared Turkey's relations from further deterioration (see Box 7-16 above). After the crisis blew over, it was noted that bilateral relations had been severely tested on the issue of the approach to terror and separatism but that they had withstood the test and went on to develop further.

III. FURTHER DEVELOPMENT OF COOPERATION

Despite the many disagreements enumerated above, Turkey's political, economic, and military relations with the RF continued to develop as bilateral contacts intensified. The basis for the developing relations was the Treaty on the Principles of the Relations between the Republic of Turkey and the Russian Federation signed in Moscow by Prime Minister Demirel on 25 May 1992, which came into force on 19 July 1994. During the talks held by Demirel on the occasion of the signing of the treaty, the Armenian attack on Nagorno Karabakh was condemned and the resolution of disputes through negotiations was proposed. In the joint communiqué, Demirel and Yeltsin affirmed that "they noted with satisfaction that Turkey and Russia shared the same views about relations with the CIS and notably the countries of Central Asia and felt the desire to contribute to the economic and social development of the CIS through joint action." Russia's ambassador in Ankara, Albert Chernishev, declared that Turkey's special interest in Central Asia was understandable.

Although the treaty signed in 1992 had the same content as the Treaty on Friendship, Good Neighborliness, and Cooperation signed in Moscow by Özal in March 1991 with the USSR, there were two differences. The preamble of the 1992 treaty contained a phrase that did not exist in the 1991 treaty: "aiming to contribute to peace and stability in the region where the continents of Europe and Asia meet, in which Turkey and Russia are located as neighbors." It was important for Turkey and Russia to underline that they were the two genuine Eurasian states. This indicated that they were confronted with similar problems and would resolve these problems through cooperation. Bilateral relations in subsequent years would be guided by this reality. In article 16 of the 1991 treaty there was a reference to developing relations between Turkey and the component Soviet republics that was dropped from the later treaty because they were now independent. This article was replaced with a reference to contacts and cooperation with "regions, cities, and local organs and administrations."

The 1991 treaty had little effect on relations, because the USSR collapsed soon after it was signed. The content of the 1992 treaty was similar to the content of the 1991 treaty but was quite different from the 1972 and 1978 agreements. A comparison of the two sets of documents can shed light on the state of bilateral relations in the 1990s.

- 1. The 1991 and 1992 documents were treaties and therefore had a binding effect that a document or a declaration would not have.
- 2. For the first time since 1925, the parties were described as "friends."
- 3. The parties undertook not to support the aggressor in the event of an aggression against one of the parties and to eliminate the consequences of aggression by working together in the UN and other international organizations. This implied solidarity in the face of aggression.

- 4. The two sides undertook to consult in the event of a threat to peace and security even if the threat was not directed at one of the parties. In addition, the parties agreed to hold periodic consultations on international and regional issues.
- 5. The parties agreed to encourage their parliaments, political parties, media organizations, trade unions, educational institutions, and local administrations to cooperate and establish contacts with their opposite numbers.

In addition to this basic document upon which bilateral relations were constructed, a steady stream of highlevel visits in both directions took place. During these visits, agreements were signed to regulate economic relations. The Foreign Economic Relations Council, established in 1986 to coordinate the private sector's foreign contacts, set up a number of bodies that made a significant contribution to the development of economic relations. Among these were the Turkish-Russian Business Council, the Turkish-Russian Association of Businessmen, the Laleli Association of Industrialists and Businessmen, and the Merter Association of Industrialists and Businessmen. The real driving force behind the expanding economic relations was the energy sector and the contracting business.

With the 1984 agreement Turkey had agreed to purchase natural gas from the USSR. The delivery of gas began in 1987 and increased gradually during the 1990s. An agreement was signed on 10 December 1997 to step up the delivery of gas, then running at 6 billion cubic meters, by a further 8 billion cubic meters by 2002. A subsequent agreement was concluded on 29 August 1997 to lay a natural gas pipeline on the bottom of the Black Sea. This would boost the delivery of gas from Russia by a further 16 billion cubic meters. This was known as the Blue Stream project and involved the laying of pipes along 392 kilometers through the Black Sea from Russia to the Turkish port of Samsun. Turkey planned to boost its power-plant capacity by 20% with natural gas supplied by Russia (Box 7-56).

Starting in 1987, Turkish contracting firms obtained contracts for construction jobs in the amount of $9.5 billion, half of which had been completed by the end of 1998.

Another sector that registered healthy growth was tourism. Turkey became the first foreign destination for Russian holiday-makers. After Germans, the Russians made up the largest number of visitors in 1997.

As a consequence of such developments, the RF became Turkey's second trading partner (following Germany) in 1997. In addition there was the unregistered trade as well as the gradually diminishing "luggage trade" through which Russian visitors imported large quanti-

Box 7-56. The Blue Stream

Always on the lookout to diversify its sources of energy. Turkey began to import natural gas from the USSR and later Russia Russia provided 50 to 60% of its natural gas by 2000, with the rest coming from Nigeria, Algeria, and Iran.

On 15 December 1997 an agreement was signed with the RF under which Turkey undertook to purchase 16 billion cubic meters of natural gas annually for twenty five years. The gas would be delivered by a pipeline laid on the seabed of the Black Sea, under a project named Blue Stream. The pipeline would have a total length of 1,213 kilometers of which 373 kilometers would be in Russia, 396 kilometers under the Black Sea at a depth of 2,150 meters, and 444 kilometers in Turkey from Samsun to Ankara. The Turkish portion would be build by Botas. There were also plans to extend the pipeline further to Israel and Egypt, Whereas Turkey was the seventh-ranked customer of Russia in natural gas in 2000, it would move up to second place after Germany when the Blue Stream came into operation.

In Turkey there was widespread criticism of the project on the grounds that it would prevent the import of much cheaper gas from Turkmenistan, that it would adversely affect relations with that country, that it would create excessive dependency on the RF, and that the decision had been influenced by Turkish contractors who stood to gain from the construction work. The project was completed in 2003, and its cost became a more heated issue.

(E. TELLAU)

ties of Turkish products as accompanied baggage. The Istanbul Stock Exchange became more sensitive to economic developments in Russia than to other Eastern European markets.

In June 1999 TÜSİAD commissioned Mensur Akgün and Turan Aydın to prepare a report on Turkish-Russian bilateral economic relations. The report's findings were as follows. (1) The RF was a large market in close geographic proximity to Turkey. (2) Of Russia's population, 11% (16.2 million people) were of Turkic stock. (3) Unlike the U.S. and the EU, Turkey gained access to the RF through interstate agreements. That is why economic relations were very much influenced by political considerations. (4) The RF's economy was going through a transition, which had an effect on relations. (5) The RF had provided new markets for Turkey in many sectors where Turkish products faced difficulties in EU markets. Whenever Turkey ran into difficulties in EU markets, it would have to turn increasingly to non-EU markets. (6) The relations with Russia were asymmetrical. While Russia was Turkey's second largest economic partner, Turkey was not among the first ten economic partners of Russia. But Turkey's place in Russia was rising fast. Turkey was Russia's sixth largest customer for natural gas and was expected to occupy second place by the early years of the new century.

Another platform where relations were developing was the regional cooperation project known as the Black Sea Economic Cooperation. The project had its legal basis in article 12 of the above-mentioned 1991 and 1992 treaties: "The Parties shall expend joint efforts to develop economic, trade, scientific, and technical cooperation between themselves and in the Black Sea region in order to achieve stability and prosperity in the region." In this framework, President Yeltsin's visit to Istanbul on 25 June 1992 was followed by President Demirel's visit to Moscow on 24 and 25 October 1996. The BSEC was established on 25 June 1992. When the eleven heads of state/government signed the BSEC Charter in June 1998 at Yalta and it obtained national ratifications afterward, the BSEC became a full-fledged international organization.

The visit of prime minister V.S. Chernomyrdin to Turkey on 15 and 16 December 1997 was a turning point in the development of bilateral relations. This was the first visit by a prime minister of the RF to Turkey. An effort was made during the visit to chart the course of bilateral economic relations over the next fifteen years. Seven important agreements were signed, including a long-term economic cooperation agreement, a protocol on cooperation in the field of energy, an agreement on the purchase of natural gas, an agreement on cooperation in the field of high technology, an agreement on mutual judicial assistance, an Agreement on the Promotion and Protection of Investments, and an Agreement for the Avoidance of Double Taxation. The latter two agreements came into effect in 2000.

Chernomyrdin's visit was followed by Prime Minister Ecevit's visit on 4 to 6 November 1999. This visit, which coincided with the intensification of the operation in Chechnya, was an indicator of the stability achieved in relations. Five separate documents were signed during this visit, including the Joint Declaration on Cooperation in Combating Terrorism. Turkey reiterated its interest in going ahead with the Blue Stream project, and measures to develop economic relations further were considered.

From 1992 to 1998 the volume of trade grew steadily, but the balance of trade was permanently in Russia's favor. During the 1990s the volume of trade, including the unregistered luggage trade, attained $15 billion. With the restrictive measures adopted by Russia in August 1996, however, there was a significant drop in the luggage trade.

When the RF entered a period of economic crisis on 17 August 1998, bilateral economic relations also suffered, as did the Turkish economy. In 1999 and thereafter, efforts were made to overcome the difficulties. Turkish businesses did not follow the example of others and did not abandon the Russian market. Russia's experience in 1998 was similar to Turkey's travails in 1994 when it was in the grip of an economic crisis, and both countries were learning to cope with the consequences of an economic slump.

Another important development was the five-day visit of the chief of the General Staff, Ismail Hakkı Karadayı, to the RF on 18 May 1998 at the time when the S-300 missile crisis was at its height. One of the items discussed during the talks was Turkey's $150 billion equipment modernization program and the possibility of cooperation with the RF in carrying out the project. It was decided to start preparations for the two countries to conclude an agreement on military cooperation. The visit was important not only for its security aspect but also for its political significance.

It is usual to attribute the development of Turkey's relations with the RF during the 1990s to the ending of the Cold War. Although this is true, it is not the full story. As we have already seen, relations began to develop after 1965, and a new phase was reached in 1980s when the stage was set for the developments of the 1990s. These developments were made possible by the CSCE process that got underway during the Cold War and the ensuing détente between the East and West.

In summary, although relations between Turkey and the RF are negatively affected by some problems, there is a great potential for expanded cooperation. During the Cold War, it was possible to overcome the political difficulties with the USSR through economic cooperation. In the new era similar developments in bilateral relations can be expected.

EREL TELLAL

Sources (Relations with Russia)

Akgün, Mensur ve Turan Aydın. Türkiye-Rusya İlişkilerindeki Yapısal Sorunlar ve Çözüm Önerileri. İstanbul: TÜSİAD, 1999.

Aliyev, Haydar. Dünya Siyasetinde Azerbaycan Petrolü. Trans. Abdullah Çiftçi and Ergun Kocabıyık. İstanbul: Sabah Kitapları, 1998.

Aydın, Turan, and Olgan Bekar. Türkiye'nin Orta ve Uzun Vadeli Çıkarları Açısından Türk-Rus İlişkileri. İstanbul: TESEV, 1997.

Bekar, Olgan. "NATO's Enlargement Russia and Turkey." Eurasian Studies 3, no. 1 (Spring 1996): 65–79.

Kamel, Ayhan. "İkinci Dünya Savaşının Bitiminden Günümüze Kadar Türk Rus İlişkileri" (1998). http://www.foreignpol icy.org.tr/turkish/dosyalar/akamel p.htm.

Kazgan, Gülten. "Türkiye-Rusya Ekonomik İlişkileri." Türk-İş Yıllığı 1997 2 (Ankara, 1997): 378–94.

Sariibrahimoğlu, Lale. Kurt Kapanında Kısır Siyaset. Ankara: İmge, 1997.

Tunçer, İdil. "Rusya Federasyonu'nun Yeni Güvenlik Doktrini: 'Yakın Çevre' ve Türkiye." In En Uzun On Yıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 445–71. İstanbul: Boyut Kitapları, 1998.

Relations with the Middle East

RELATIONS WITH ARAB STATES

The changes occurring in the international scene and Turkish internal developments during the 1990s had the result of drawing Turkey into the problems of the Middle East. After the disintegration of the USSR and the ending of the Cold War, the U.S. began to focus its attention on the Middle East. Washington's main objective was to control the rich oil resources of the region and ensure the uninterrupted flow of oil to the West at stable prices. Against this background, the insecurity and instability that reigned in the region following the 1991 Gulf War combined with the Kurdish question and the danger from reactionary religious forces compelled Turkey to review its threat assessment. During the Cold War, Turkey viewed the main threat as coming from the north, while after 1974 the main threat was seen as coming from the west. Now Turkey was forced to reassess its position and began to stress the threat that came from the south. During the 1990s Ankara's relations with Middle Eastern states were governed by regional security concerns that were compounded by Turkey's own internal problems.

A. The First Gulf War and Its Influence on Relations with Arab States

At the end of the Cold War, Turkey began to feel concern that its strategic importance to the West was diminished. These concerns were dissipated with the occupation of Kuwait by Iraq on 2 August 1990 and the subsequent Gulf War, which started with the allied attack on Iraq led by the U.S. President Özal felt that the opportunity should be seized: everyone must be made to see that, far from diminishing, Turkey's strategic value to the West had become even greater. Unlike the cautious group of decision-makers that included prime minister Yıldırım Akbulut, foreign minister Ali Bozer, and chief of the General Staff Necip Torumtay, Özal was convinced that Turkey should take advantage of the opportunities afforded by the Gulf crisis and pursue an active foreign policy. He sought to give direction to Turkey's foreign policy by means of telephone conversations with U.S. president George H.W. Bush.

Regardless of the differences among the decisionmakers, it can be said that Turkey pursued a moderate line in the early stages of the Gulf crisis. In the first official statement following Iraq's occupation of Kuwait, Ankara confined itself to calling for the withdrawal of Iraqi troops. This course must have heartened Baghdad, which sent its first vice-president, Taha Yasin Ramadan, to Ankara in August, one day before the UN Security Council adopted the resolution imposing sanctions on Iraq. He was the bearer of a message from Saddam Hussein to Özal containing two requests: that Ankara remain strictly neutral in the crisis and that it not implement the UN Security Council's economic sanctions. This meant that Ankara was being asked to continue operating the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık oil pipeline. Özal refused to accede to either request. Turkey complied with the sanctions imposed by the UN on 6 August by shutting down the pipeline two days later. It also moved troops up to the Iraqi border and opened its bases to U.S. aircraft.

Özal was seeking to demonstrate Turkey's strategic value by aligning it firmly with the West in the course of the crisis. He was also seeking to ensure Turkey's national security by helping in restoring stability in the Middle East. But Özal's ambitions went beyond these goals. He had a broad plan that included repossessing Mosul and Kirkuk, developing economic and trade ties with the region's Arab states, and making Turkey an effective member of the new security system that would be established there. Early in the crisis, the circumstances were propitious for considering such plans. Kuwait's occupation was bound to strengthen Iraq in the region, and this did not suit Saudi Arabia, Syria, Egypt, or Iran. This convergence of interests enabled these countries to cooperate among themselves as well as with the West and Turkey. But their cooperation was far from corresponding to Özal's expectations. Although Turkey's actions in providing military facilities and other support during the crisis were appreciated by the Arab states, they were not prepared to see Turkey included in the new security arrangements; nor would they contemplate any assertion of Turkish leadership in the region. Turkey considered the Gulf countries (in particular, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates) to be potential markets. It had plans to sell F-16 aircraft and armored vehicles to these countries and to enter into cooperation in defense industries with them. They were well disposed toward these plans while the crisis lasted but took no steps after it was over.

On 14 November 1991 the emir of Kuwait, Sheikh Jaber al-Sabah, visited Turkey. The joint communiqué issued at the end of the visit stated that there was an identity of views on the need to expand trade and develop transport links between the two countries, to hold periodic political consultations, and to develop the possibilities for cooperation in the field of defense. When Prime Minister Demirel visited Kuwait in 1993, however, he was informed by his hosts that there would be no purchases of arms from Turkey. Similar disappointments came from Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, and the negotiations for the sale of F-16s and armored vehicles ended inconclusively in 1997. Although Turkey had seen the Gulf states as potential markets, it was unable to conclude any defense deals with them. These countries were also extremely slow in providing the $3 billion in aid that they had promised at the time of the crisis to defray Turkey's losses. The UAE paid only $150 million out of the $500 million it had pledged. This indicated that they did not regard Ankara as a potential ally in preserving the stability of the Gulf region. Certain Arab countries went further and began to criticize Turkey's policy line. When the U.S.-led multinational force went into action against Iraq on 16 January 1991, the air base at İncirlik was at the disposal of the U.S. Air Force; and there was talk of making other Turkish bases available. This elicited negative reactions from Iran, Libya, Morocco, Jordan, and Algeria that openly condemned Ankara in official statements, while Syria conveyed its concern in a more discreet way. The foreign minister of Iraq, Tariq Aziz, described Turkey's action as "shameful" and blamed Ankara for "bowing before the Americans as they pursued their treacherous aggression against the Iraqi nation" (Ayın Tarihi, January 1991). He also blamed Özal for dragging Turkey into the American camp and pursuing policies that were incompatible with good neighborly relations.

Özal's policies did not draw fire exclusively from the Arab side and from Iran. There was little agreement among the Turkish public about Özal's actions. A good number of people, and notably the leader of the Democratic Left Party, Bülent Ecevit, declared that Turkey would always remain a neighbor of Iraq and therefore should pursue policies toward its neighbor that differed from Western policies. Shortly after Iraq's occupation of Kuwait, Ecevit had gone to Baghdad in his capacity as a journalist. Upon his return, he published a series of articles in the newspaper Milliyet in which he reflected the Iraqi explanation for the occupation of Kuwait and sought to show that the actions of Baghdad might be justified. When the U.S.-led action against Iraq got underway, the most realistic appraisal came from Ecevit. He declared that the U.S. used Iraq's occupation of Kuwait as a pretext and took advantage of the fact that the USSR was no longer in a position to check it in order to entrench itself in the region and become a de facto Middle Eastern state. Even if Iraq evacuated Kuwait, Ecevit claimed, the U.S. would not leave the Middle East. He also voiced his concern about the possibility of an independent Kurdish state in northern Iraq and underlined the need for Turkey to do all it could to preserve the territorial integrity of Iraq, Ecevit's views would soon become Turkey's official policy.

B. Turkish-Syrian-Iraqi Relations (1990–1995) in the Context of the Kurdish and Water Questions

The Gulf crisis did not lead to the fulfillment of Özal's expectations in the Middle East. Over the long term, the crisis had harmful effects on Turkey's interests. Above all, the local Kurdish question became an international issue. The vacuum of power that came into being in northern Iraq allowed the PKK to gain strength there. Turkey suffered material losses amounting to billions of dollars and began to worry about its territorial integrity as the U.S. gradually started to pursue a policy of setting up a Kurdish state. The PKK's strength attained its peak between 1991 and 1993, with a corresponding intensification of its activities in Turkey.

1. The Period from 1991 to 1993

When Turkey amassed troops on the Iraqi border following the eruption of the Gulf crisis, the PKK was forced to reduce its armed activities. The arrival of winter also contributed to this reduction. At this point the PKK held its Fourth Congress on 26–31 December 1990 to appraise the latest developments and readjust its policies. The new policy would shift the priority from armed military activities to political activities. This meant that the PKK would now seek to win the people of the southeast over to its side instead of using coercion against it. The peasants would be organized in order to provoke a popular uprising in the provincial centers and towns.

In the new circumstances, Turkey sought to find a way to settle the Kurdish question. Efforts were made to improve relations with the countries of the Middle East that were anxious to see Iraq weakened, especially Syria, which moved closer to the West and to Turkey for this reason. On 12 February 1991 the Turkish minister of foreign affairs, Kurtcebe Alptemoçin, started a week-long trip to Syria, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia. Alptemuçin held talks in Damascus with Syrian president Hafez Assad and foreign minister Faruq al-Shara, with whom he took up the situation in Iraq, the sharing of regional rivers, and border security. The joint communiqué released at the end of these talks clearly revealed the concern of both sides to preserve Iraq's territorial integrity. They expressed the desire to see no changes in the geography of the Middle East in the aftermath of the war and underlined that the nature of the future government of Iraq was up to the Iraqi people. The joint communiqué stressed the need for Turkey and Syria to increase contacts in the future and the need to establish mechanisms for more coordination and cooperation.

According to the communiqué, steps were taken toward improving border security. The Syrian leaders conveyed the message to Alptemoçin that they valued Turkey's stability and believed that it would contribute to the stability of Syria.

It became apparent, however, that the two countries remained far apart on the issue of sharing the waters of the regional rivers. Alptemoçin communicated Özal's proposal to hold a water summit in Istanbul in November. He also made an effort to ensure that the water issue did not poison relations with Syria. Nevertheless, the communique's language indicated that both sides had stuck by their respective positions. Syria wanted to see the waters allocated on the basis of quotas, while the Turkish position was that the waters should not be shared on the basis of allocation but should be used through joint projects. Turkey held that this would be the most rational way to utilize water and indicated its readiness to develop a variety of projects.

While Turkey sought to persuade Syria to stop assisting the PKK and stressed the need to preserve Iraq's territorial integrity, news began to be received that an independent Kurdish state might come into being in northern Iraq. Jalal Talabani was in the U.S. at the time to discuss the future of the Kurds, which led to the impression that the source of the news was in Washington. At this stage, President Özal got in touch with the Kurdish leaders in northern Iraq in an effort to curb the activities of the PKK in the region. Without advising either the General Staff or the MIT (the Turkish intelligence agency), he sent messages to Barzani and Talabani on 20 February 1991, calling for a dialogue. On 8 March the undersecretary of the MFA, Tugay Özçeri, held a meeting with Talabani and the representative of Barzani. Özal wanted to assume the role of protector of the Iraqi Kurds. His approach was the subject of heated debates at the meetings of the National Security Council. Those who advocated a "tough" line were convinced that Özal's policy of acting without consulting them might well hurt the interests of the state.

In March the Kurdish groups claimed to be in control in northern Iraq. But after surrendering on 28 February, the Iraqi army directed its attention to domestic foes. After first suppressing the Shiite uprising in the south, it turned its attention to the Kurdish uprising in the north. Half a million Kurds out of the million and a half that fled from the attack of the Iraqi army pushed their way to the Turkish border. In the face of international pressure, Ankara was forced to open the border to these refugees.

When the Kurdish groups loyal to Barzani that were in control of northern Iraq evacuated the region, the PKK got in touch with the government of Iraq, moved in, and took possession of the weapons and ammunition left behind. Baghdad was worried that the power vacuum in northern Iraq might be filled by Turkey. Consequently, Iraq was encouraging the PKK to take over the area and thus ensure the safety of its border with Turkey as well as the Mosul-Kirkuk region, which was frequently on the international agenda.

On 14 June President Özal had his first direct talk with Talabani, releasing a storm of protest in Ankara. Those who opposed Özal's move went as far as accusing him of treason and the followers of a tough line eventually prevailed. As a result, three operations were conducted against northern Iraq on 5 August and 11 and 25 October 1991. These operations met with a very negative reaction from the Kurds of northern Iraq, who accused Turkey of seeking to force them to get the PKK out of northern Iraq by inflicting punishment on them rather than on the PKK itself. The international reaction was equally negative, with protests coming from Russia, Germany, Greece, and Iraq.

Despite their negative reactions to the Turkish operations, the KDP and the PUK were convinced that they could not set up a Kurdish state in northern Iraq without Turkish approval and consequently continued to develop their relations with Ankara. That is why they sought to limit the activities of the Baghdad-supported PKK in their region. After his visit to Ankara in November 1991, Talabani sent a letter to Abdullah Öcalan, calling on him to declare a unilateral cease-fire for six months. Öcalan was in the political ascendancy at this point, and his reply was categorical: nothing could drag him down such a defeatist path.

While Turkey carried out its operations in northern Iraq, it also sought to get Damascus to cut off its support for the PKK. During his visit to Damascus on 14 April 1992, the minister of the interior, İsmet Sezgin, submitted the evidence of Syria's support for the PKK to his Syrian counterpart. The evidence submitted included the documents proving that Öcalan lived in Damascus and was protected by the Syrian secret service, the false identity papers found on PKK members, the locations of the PKK camps and training centers in the Bekaa Valley under the protection of Syrian Sam-7 missiles, the photographs of Syrians killed while fighting with the PKK, and the statements of twenty-five Syrian nationals that had been captured. Sezgin demanded that Syria honor its obligations under international treaties and prevent infiltrations across the border and other terrorist activities. The Syrians denied that Öcalan was in Syria but accepted that he might be in the Bekaa Valley. They also claimed that their responsibility in the Bekaa Valley was confined to keeping the peace among the different groups there. The Syrians pointed out that completely preventing infiltrations across the Syriah-Turkish border, which extended over 800 kilometers, would be extremely difficult.

After the talks, a security protocol was signed by the two countries on 17 April 1992. The protocol provided that the parties would cooperate in combating terrorism and prevent terrorists from moving across their common border; that members of groups proscribed by the other country would not be allowed to reside, organize, or engage in training and propaganda; that the members of proscribed groups that were apprehended would be deported to the other country; that information about prescribed groups would be exchanged; that the required measures would be taken to prevent illegal border crossings and smuggling; and that the two sides would cooperate to prevent armed incidents along the border. After the signing of this protocol, Syria closed down the camps of the Dev-Sol organization immediately and the Mahzum Korkmaz Academy belonging to the PKK in the autumn.

When foreign minister Hikmet Çetin visited Syria on 3 August 1992, Turkey's policy was clearly revealed. In his talks with Syrian president Hafez Assad and foreign minister Faruq al-Shara, Çetin made clear that, if Syria carried out all of its undertakings under the security agreement signed in April, Turkey would carry out all of its responsibilities and promises with respect to the Euphrates. Once again Ankara was underlining the linkage between the water question and PKK terror. As a matter of fact, as the intensity of terror mounted, so did the pressure of Turkish public opinion, which wanted to see the water flow in the Euphrates cut off to punish Syria for its support of the PKK.

In September 1992 a tripartite technical committee consisting of Syrian, Iraqi, and Turkish experts met in Damascus. The committee considered the climatic conditions and the hydraulic data relating to the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, exchanged information about the dams on the Euphrates River, and assessed the technical projects and proposals of the three countries to ensure the fair sharing of the waters of these two rivers in a manner that would satisfy all parties. No agreement was signed, however, because the Turkish delegation expressed the need to consult its government before consenting to a date for the agreement.

On 19 November Hikmet Çetin claimed that Syria was using the terror card in the negotiations on the water issue and went on to remind Syria of its vulnerability by declaring that Turkey could overcome terrorism through its own efforts but Syria needed Turkey's cooperation if it wanted to solve the water issue. Prime Minister Demirel made similar arguments, provoking an outcry in Syria. Syrian officials declared that talk about sovereignty over shared natural resources was unfair and violated international law, which called for the sharing of the waters of the Euphrates. They claimed that Turkish statements on the subject gave rise to concern about Turkey's intentions and projects and that these concerns were not confined to Syria but were spread across the Arab world. In December Syria's statements hardened in tone. In avoiding an agreement, Turkey was accused of violating international law, abusing its rights and appropriating what belonged to others, and being unwilling to develop relations. Syria referred the issue to the Arab League and called on Arab states to put pressure on Turkey. As relations became more strained, Syria began to revive old claims that Hatay was Syrian territory under Turkish occupation.

At the beginning of the First Gulf War, Syria had been in the process of mending its relations with Turkey. Subsequently, however, as the U.S. started to implement its plans to set up an independent Kurdish state in northern Iraq and Turkey appeared not to oppose these plans, Syria reversed its course. From the beginning of the Gulf crisis, Turkey had been stressing the need to preserve Iraq's territorial integrity. But when Talabani and Barzani united their forces, elections were held in northern Iraq in May 1992, a parliament and a government were set up, and the first steps toward a federated state were taken, Turkey adopted a new policy and sought to take advantage of the new circumstances prevailing in the region (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" in this section). As the first president of the Kurdish government in northern Iraq, Talabani paid a visit to Turkey on 9 June 1992 and declared that the PKK might have crossed into Iraq but was not in Kurdistan. In July 1992 Talabani and Barzani came to Ankara at Özal's request and went on to the U.S. after receiving Turkish diplomatic passports. It was now obvious that Turkey wanted to be involved in the developments taking place in northern Iraq. In response, the KDP and the PUK revised their policies toward the PKK in order to soften Ankara's opposition to a federated state and also to eliminate the PKK as a force in northern Iraq. They not only excluded the PKK from the political process that led to a federated state (including elections) but actively fought the PKK after making the decision in October to join their armed militias into a single force. When Turkey launched a new military operation at this point, the PKK was caught between two foes and was forced to retreat southward to the area under Iraq's control.

While Turkey appeared to be a part of the American attempts to set up an independent Kurdish state in northern Iraq, it was also pursuing its efforts to preserve the territorial integrity of Iraq. On 4 November the commander general of the Genharmerie, Eşref Bitlis, came to Erbil and reached an agreement with the Kurdish administration. The Turkish forces would be withdrawn from the region, and the Kurdish side would undertake to prevent the PKK from entering Turkey. On 14 April the foreign ministers of Turkey, Iran, and Syria met in Ankara and affirmed their intention to prevent the emergence of a Kurdish state in the region. They gave the impression that they had set up a regional alliance to oppose the American plans to establish a Kurdish state. In response, the Kurdish parliament in northern Iraq sent letters to the parliaments of the three countries, stating that they had no intention of interfering in the internal affairs of neighbors and would refrain from provoking the Kurdish populations of the three countries (Özdağ, p. 98).

At this juncture, the PKK was being squeezed by Turkey's developing relations and joint military operations with the region's powers and, not wanting to weaken its position further, declared a unilateral cease-fire on 20 March 1993. In the meantime the PKK took advantage of the rift between the KDP and the PUK because of the disagreement over the sharing of taxes derived from the border trade with Turkey to regain the support of Talabani. It also abandoned the strategy of seeking a peasant war that would result from popular rebellion and returned to the tactics of guerrilla warfare.

2. The Period from 1993 to 1995

For Turkey, 1993 was a turning point in the way it dealt with the Kurdish problem. Upon the death of Özal, Demirel became president and Çiller prime minister. A decision was made to deal with the problem by military means. The chief of the General Staff announced that Turkey was faced with a "low-intensity war" in the southeast region and affirmed that a military solution to the problem would be found. Despite the negative reactions of the Arab states to Turkey's rapprochement with Israel, there were signs of a major shift in Turkey's Middle East policy.

In November 1993 the Syrian prime minister refused to participate in a meeting with the prime ministers of Turkey and Iraq, declaring that no agreement had been reached on the sharing of the waters of the Euphrates River. Notwithstanding the disagreements over the question of water sharing, a protocol on security was signed by Turkey and Syria in that same month. The document signed bore the title "Joint Memorandum on Security Questions." In this document Syria described the PKK as a terrorist organization for the first time. The meeting on water sharing that had been postponed was held on 5 February 1994. At the meeting, Syria declared that there were no PKK camps in Lebanon, that Öcalan was not in Damascus, and that it would not allow the PKK to be active in Syria and called on Turkey to engage in bilateral talks to deal with the water issue. Turkey turned down the request, claiming that no agreement on the water issue could be concluded with Damascus without an atmosphere of cooperation that would allow the terror problem with Syria to be ended, even though the MIT had confirmed that there had been a drop in PKK members in Syria.

Meanwhile the U.S. was pursuing its double-track policy of establishing a Kurdish state and eliminating the differences between the KDP and PUK. These intensive efforts reached a peak with the Paris meeting of 23 July 1994. The agreement reached made no reference to Turkey's security concerns and said nothing about Iraq's territorial integrity or the situation of the Turcomans and Arabs in northern Iraq. The response to the Paris agreement came from foreign ministers Ali Akbar Velayeti, Faruq al-Shara, and Mümtaz Soysal at the meeting they held in Damascus on 23 August. All three countries declared that they were opposed to the establishment of a Kurdish state. Turkey went a step further and declared that the border crossing at Habur would be closed to the representatives of international NGOs and members of foreign parliaments.

The Paris agreement proved short-lived, owing to the clashes between the KDP and PUK. To prevent the PKK from getting fresh support from northern Iraq, Turkey undertook a cross-border operation in March and April 1995 code-named Operation Çelik. This was the largest such operation undertaken by the Turkish army and involved 35,000 troops. Although Turkey met with international criticism (from the U.S. and the EU, among others), another operation was launched in July.

Notwithstanding the security protocols and Syria's listing of the PKK as a terrorist organization, the PKK infiltrated the Turkish border in the summer of 1995 and attacked in Hatay, demonstrating that Damascus had not taken adequate measures. Turkey suspended the meetings on security and cooperation that had been scheduled to be held every three months. Although Syria appealed for the meeting to be resumed, Turkey refused. As a precondition, Ankara wanted Öcalan extradited to Turkey or deported to a third country and a tripartite meeting on security cooperation among Turkey, Syria, and Lebanon designed to end PKK activities in Lebanon. Meanwhile Turkey would keep on refusing to hold meetings on the water issue. But the Syrian-Greek defense agreement was seen in Turkey as the last straw. Under the terms of this agreement, in the event of an armed conflict between Syria and Turkey, Damascus would allow the use of its airspace by the Greek air force. Another issue that caused apprehension in Turkey was the expectation that the ongoing talks between Syria and Israel might lead to positive results. A possible peace between Syria and Israel might allow Syria to direct all of its attention to the north. While Turkey was hardening its stand against those countries that supported the PKK, starting with Syria, it was also busy improving its relations with Israel.

Faced with Turkey's inflexible stand on the water issue, Syria began to raise the issue in international forums. In December 1995 the question was brought to the attention of the Arab states. Having obtained the backing of eight countries (including Egypt and Saudi Arabia), Damascus delivered a note to Turkey, demanding the immediate resumption of bilateral talks. The note claimed that Syria was being harmed by Turkey's dams on the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, that Turkey's activities were polluting the water that was being released to Syria, and that this was contrary to international law. Immediately after the delivery of the note to Turkey, some members of the Gulf Cooperation Council (Saudi Arabia, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, the UAE, and Egypt) met in Damascus and released the Damascus Declaration. It called for a fair sharing of the waters of the Euphrates and took a critical stand on the construction of the Birecik Dam, which was part of the Southeast Anatolia Project. The criticism was rejected by the minister of foreign affairs, Deniz Baykal, who added that so long as Syria played host to the head-quarters of a terrorist organization it could expect no increase in the waters of the Euphrates.

Following the election of 24 December 1995, Turkey was grappling with the process of forming a government while its foreign relations were going through a difficult period. Stung by the pressure exerted by the PKK, Turkey sent a stern note to Syria on 23 January 1996, demanding the extradition of Öcalan. This was followed by the signing of the military cooperation agreement with Israel on 23 February 1996. Israeli pilots arrived in Turkey in April to conduct training exercises. Syria's response to these developments came at the meeting of the Arab League in Cairo on 13 March 1996, where it inserted the water issue in the agenda and thereby stepped up the pressure on Turkey. It was easy for Syria to get the Arab states aligned with it, in view of Turkey's close relations with Israel. The signature of the military cooperation agreement with Israel had provoked anger in Egypt, Saudi Arabia, and the rest of the Arab states as well as in Iran. Turkey received letters of warning, and Egypt's foreign minister Amr Musa paid a visit to Ankara but declared afterward that he was not satisfied with the explanations given to him.

In June the Motherland-True Path coalition government resigned and was replaced by the Welfare-True Path coalition government. This led to expectations that a new era might be dawning with respect to the Kurdish question and relations with the Arab states.

The Welfare–True Path Period When Relations Remained Unchanged (1996–1997)

The coalition of the Welfare and True Path parties was known as Refahyol in its Turkish acronym. Refahyol obtained a vote of confidence on 8 July 1996 and had the potential to repair Turkey's frayed relations with Arab states. However, this was not to be. The new government's foreign minister was Tansu Çiller. The senior partner in the coalition, the Welfare Party, regarded the Ministry of Foreign Affairs as too conservative and was not ready to allow it free rein in the conduct of foreign policy. Çiller was in a weak position politically because of the parliamentary investigations she had to face in connection with allegations of corruption. In a sense, she was a hostage to the Welfare Party. Furthermore, she was often absent from her office, and foreign relations were not high on her list of priorities. The minister of state, Abdullah Gül, had assumed a number of the MFA's responsibilities, while Necmettin Erbakan had placed relations with Sudan and Iran under the responsibility of the minister of state, Rıza Güneri. Another minister of state, Ahmet Cemil Tunç, was in charge of relations with Iraq and the Middle East.

The slogans of the Welfare Party had been "Turkey the leader" and "a foreign policy with character." When it assumed the reins of power, its stated aim was "to free Turkey from the exploitation of the West" and to align it with the Islamic countries with which it shared historical and cultural ties. In addition to realigning Turkey's foreign policy, the Welfare Party had the objective of turning the party into a political force that would carry weight in international Islamic political organizations. Soon after he assumed power, Erbakan held talks with one of the leaders of the Muslim Brotherhood, Seiful Islam al-Banna, on 29 July 1996. This was followed by a meeting with the leader of the Nedva movement, Rashid al-Gannushi. These contacts met with a negative reaction in Egypt and Tunisia. Relations with Egypt became even more strained when Erbakan met with president Hosni Mubarak on 6 August and asked him to show greater understanding for the Muslim Brotherhood. Erbakan had no inhibitions about meeting with representatives of foreign Islamist organizations during his foreign visits. The Welfare Party's deviation from the traditional foreign policy of the state was quick to draw fire from both the public and the institutions involved in formulating foreign policy.

The Refahyol government's program contained a section dealing with foreign policy that had been very carefully drafted. Although it announced that relations with Islamic states would be developed, an effort had been made to allay fears that radical changes would take place in relations with the West. It did not mention Operation Provide Comfort and stated that the obligations undertaken within the Customs Union would be honored to the extent that the EU carried out its obligations. The program included an undertaking to remain faithful to all strategic agreements but specified that these would not be allowed to encroach on national security or national interests. This was a way of saying that there would be no radical departure from existing relations with the West and with Israel while giving satisfaction to the Welfare Party's constituency. It was also underlined that the struggle against foreign-supported separatist terror would be pursued within the framework of the Constitution and the unitary structure of the state.

Prime Minister Erbakan's first trip abroad was to the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) on the twenty-second anniversary of the Cyprus operation. Immediately after that, Erbakan went off on his Asian tour in August, when he visited Iran, Indonesia, Malaysia, and Singapore. The MFA was kept out of the preparations for this trip. In addition to the official meetings there were many informal tête-à-tête meetings, which gave the impression that this was a private trip. During his talks with Iranian president Hashemi Rafsanjani, Erbakan declared that Turkey's intelligence agency MIT might be under the influence of the CIA and Mossad. This created an uproar in Turkey and turned the visit into a complete fiasco.

As Erbakan set off on his Asian tour, the minister of justice, Şevket Kazan, went to Baghdad accompanied by the minister of education, Mehmet Sağlam. During this visit, from which the Ministry of Foreign Affairs was excluded, Kazan proposed the holding of a terror summit to bring together Turkey, Iraq, Syria, and Iran. Iraq turned down this proposal, pointing out that it would not hold talks with Syria. Iraq also asked Turkey not to extend the term of Operation Provide Comfort, to resume trade with Iraq as Jordan had done, and to restore the border trade. Kazan's visit to Iraq produced nothing tangible. When Kazan praised Iraq's legal system for reducing the prison terms of convicts who memorized the Quran, however, he contributed to the loss of prestige for the Welfare Party that had begun with Erbakan's gaffe in Iran.

But there was worse to come when Erbakan undertook his trip to Egypt, Libya, and Nigeria in October. This trip revealed the perils of a foreign policy that was conducted by several centers of power in the country. Furthermore, the differences between the armed forces and the government and between the coalition partners became more noticeable. Difficulties cropped up at the preparatory stage. Preparations for the trip, which was to cover Egypt, Sudan, Libya, Nigeria, and South Africa, started in September. While the MFA was not involved in the preparations, Erbakan was in constant contact with the Libyan and Sudanese ambassadors. In response to the public clamor, Foreign Minister Ciller announced that the purpose of the trip was to secure the payment of overdue Libyan debts to Turkish contractors and added that the prime minister was free to go to any country he chose. Despite Ciller's announcement, the minister of the interior, Mehmet Ağar of the True Path Party, declared that he would not sign the cabinet decree authorizing the trip to Libya because of the statements that Khaddafi had made in support of the PKK and the Libyan policies that went against Turkey's interests in the southeast. Other deputies within his party supported Ağar's stand. The True Path Party (DYP) joined the Motherland Party (ANAP), the Democratic Left Party (DSP), and the Republican People's Party (CHP) in not sending any of its deputies on this trip (they had not been invited, in any case, and did not approve its program). These rows were not enough to deter Erbakan from proceeding with the visit.

Erbakan's tour was to begin in Egypt. Last-minute changes in the Egyptian prime minister's schedule led Cairo to ask for a postponement that forced Erbakan and his delegation to turn back when they were on the road to the airport in Ankara. This led to complaints in Turkey that Egypt was not taking the visit seriously. Erbakan finally went to Egypt on 4 October and proposed the creation of a group of Muslim countries that would engage in closer cooperation, to be known as the M-7 project. President Mubarak did not agree to the proposal. He wanted priority to be given to cooperation at the bilateral level and pointed out that the label "Muslim" applied to such cooperative groups might lead to misunderstanding. At the meeting in the presidential palace, the accompanying deputies were not admitted through the main gate. The Turkish flag was not hoisted at the airport during either the receiving ceremony or the departure. This was a visit full of scandals that produced no positive or tangible result.

The second leg of the trip was Libya and resulted in even worse scandals. On 6 October, following the meeting with Erbakan, Khaddafi held a press conference in his tent in the presence of his guest. His criticism of Atatürk and his reforms bordered on insult. Khaddafi then went on to comment on Turkey's domestic politics and declared that a Kurdish state should be created. This caused a diplomatic scandal that could not be easily explained or dismissed. These were Khaddafi's words:

It is only natural for Kurds to be independent, in Libya, in Iraq, and everywhere. It is futile to fight the nations seeking independence. Turkey has tried this in vain. The Arabs, like the Kurds, have fought in this region and earned their independence... I am now referring to the nation of Kurdistan. There must be a place under the Middle Eastern sun for this nation... After the First World War, Turkey lost its free will. Turkey has been invaded, bases have been established there, and these bases have been used against Iraq... We must all struggle until Turkey is able to regain its free will. (Hürriyet, 7 October 1996)

Khaddafi added that only the Welfare Party could secure the liberation of Turkey's will. Taking the floor, Erbakan refrained from rebuking his host. Instead he declared that Turkey was confronted not with a Kurdish question but with a terrorism question and added that the West and the Westerners were seeking Turkey's dismemberment. After the press conference, Khaddafi left for a meeting of the Islamic People's Command in the company of Erbakan. His offending remarks were not translated into Turkish. An anomalous situation had come about: the two leaders were going to hold a bilateral meeting, with Khaddafi participating as the head of the Islamic People's Command and Erbakan as a member of it. The talks went on for seven hours. When Khaddafi refused to agree to the insertion of the phrase "The PKK is a terror organization and we reject the terror of this organization and condemn it" in the final communiqué, Erbakan brought the meeting to an end.

Politically, this had been a debacle for Turkey. Nor had any progress been made in securing the payment of overdue Libyan debts to Turkish contractors. Libya proposed to settle the debt in the amount of $165 million with a down payment of $40 million, with the remainder to be paid in installments of $4 million. This was far from satisfying Turkish businesses.

While Erbakan remained silent in response to Khaddafi's provocations, the other delegation members (including the Welfare Party's minister of state, Abdullah Gül) were furious. The reaction in Turkey was even greater. Foreign Minister Ciller called on Khaddafi to watch his step and conform to the norms of friendship. She reminded him that Libya was one of the thirty-five states that emerged from the Ottoman Empire and added that Turkey was not about "to deny the history of our republic, or bring changes to our policies, or make concessions on the issue of the unity and integrity of our country upon the remarks of a Bedouin from the desert" (Hürriyet, 8 October 1996). Immediately after Erbakan's departure from Libya, Turkey's ambassador in Tripoli, Ateş Balkan, was recalled to Ankara for consultations. This decision was made by Çiller. The press claimed that either President Demirel or the chief of the General Staff, İsmail Hakkı Karadayı, was behind the decision.

Erbakan left Libya on 7 October and proceeded to Nigeria. This trip was uneventful but remained under the shadow of Libya. To sum up, the initiative, dubbed "the landing of Africa," had not opened new vistas for Turkish foreign policy as expected. It had been a disaster and caused the Welfare Party to lose much ground in Turkey.

During the Refahyol government's term in office, there were no changes in the armed struggle against the PKK; but important developments took place in northern Iraq.

Taking advantage of the differences between the KDP and PUK, Baghdad reached an agreement with the KDP and launched an operation against the PUK in northern Iraq on 31 August 1996. This evoked a positive response in Ankara, where it was seen as reaffirmation of the unitary structure of Iraq. These developments disturbed Washington, which took the initiative to bring the two parties together in Ankara. This brought the KDP, PUK, and Turkey together in what came to be known as the Ankara process. During these talks, differences emerged between Ankara and Washington. While Ankara supported the rapprochement between Barzani and Baghdad, Washington was seeking to bring the two Kurdish factions together in an alliance against Saddam Hussein.

The second round of talks in the Ankara process took place in October. Washington pressed the KDP and PUK to respond to Turkey's security concerns and obtained a promise from the factions to fight the PKK. Washington also got Ankara to recognize the legitimacy of the "provisional regime" in northern Iraq. It looked as if Turkey was departing from its policy of defending Iraq's territorial integrity that it had been pursuing since 1991. Nevertheless, its relations with Iraq were also getting warmer.

Following two operations that the Turkish army conducted in northern Iraq in November, talks were undertaken with Iraq to renew the agreement that allowed for hot pursuit, which had lapsed in 1988. Upon the instruction of UN secretary-general Kofi Annan, the Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline resumed operations on 10 December 1996. Turkey announced that it intended to raise the volume of its trade with Iraq to $500 million. Tariq Aziz responded by reminding Turkey that it would not be easy to enter the Iraqi market so long as its products remained overpriced. This was a sign that developing economic relations with Iraq would not be an easy task.

D. The Aftermath of the 28 February Episode and the Capture of Öcalan

As a result of developments in domestic politics during the Refahyol government's term in office, the National Security Council made a number of decisions on 28 February 1997. On 29 April the General Staff held a meeting with members of the media at which the new National Military Strategic Concept was announced. Under the new concept, reactionary religious movements and separatist terror were described as greater threats than foreign threats. Syria and Iran were identified as the powers supporting these threats. It was also announced that it might become necessary to apply political, economic, or even military measures against these states.

In the period under review, Turkey's Middle East policy had been based on improving relations with Israel while distancing itself from the Arab states, and the Refahyol government had not managed to change this orientation. Syria, Iran, and Iraq were identified as constituting the common threat to both countries when the minister of defense, Turhan Tayan, visited Israel in April 1997, and joint military exercises were scheduled. General Cevik Bir, the deputy chief of the General Staff, visited Israel in May, holding meetings with Israel's deputy minister of defense, David Ivry, and American officials. At these meetings, the steps that would be taken against Syria and Iran were considered, including the creation of a joint force to deal with a threat coming from these countries. The three countries would hold joint exercises, establish arms depots and stores in Turkey to deal with emergency situations, exchange communications codes and develop joint codes, and share intelligence.

As soon as these measures were announced, Iran, Iraq, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, and the Arab League expressed their concern over the tripartite alliance and the plans for joint exercises in the Mediterranean. The representative of Palestine in Ankara, ambassador Fuad Yassin, was more moderate in tone when he declared that they would accept the claim that the exercises were not directed at any other country until the opposite was proven.

The Arab states did not confine themselves to verbal protests. They also took initiatives to neutralize the effects of the Turkish-Israeli rapprochement. Despite its strained relations with Egypt, Iran sent its foreign minister, Ali Akbar Velayeti, to Cairo. Syria sent a delegation to Iraq for the first time in eighteen years. Syrian vice-president Abdulhalim Haddam went to Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the United Arab Emirates and asked for a determined stand to deal with the threat from the Turkish-Israeli alliance to the Arab nation. Syrian foreign minister Faruq al-Shara voiced similar concerns during his visit to Moscow.

Differences were beginning to emerge in Turkey about the course to follow in the Middle East. Just as there were those who advocated developing relations with Israel, others claimed that relations with the Arabs were being neglected and that ignoring regional balances would have undesirable consequences over the long run. The process unleashed by the 28 February decision had its own logic in domestic as well as foreign policy, however. The main threat was religious reaction and separatist terror, which inevitably called for tough policies toward the Arabs and particularly Syria. The first domestic consequence of this process was the replacement of the Refahyol government by the coalition made up of the Motherland Party (ANAP), the Democratic Left Party (DSP), and the Democratic Turkey Party (Demokrat Türkiye Partisi:

DTP; founded in 1997 by people who resigned from the DYP, it later joined another party in 2008—not to be confused with Demokratik Toplum Partisi: DTP, a Kurdish party founded in 2005).

From 1991 to 1993 the PKK's strength was at its peak. But after Turkey decided in 1993 to reject all compromise and adopted the policy of military repression, the PKK grew progressively weaker. As it lost ground militarily, the PKK compensated by developing its political side and began to win over the grassroots of the PUK, which was backing the PKK anyway. In the course of this process, the PKK was also undergoing a transformation. Its Marxist ideology was gradually yielding to a more pronounced Islamic identification. Ideological and personal differences were also beginning to surface among the PKK's leadership. The organization's second in command, Şemdin Sakık, was in conflict with Öcalan and had taken refuge with the KDP. When Iran entered northern Iraq on 2 March 1998, Turkey began to tighten its relations with the KDP and was thus able to capture Sakık after an operation conducted on 13 April.

As Ankara's relations with Israel developed and the PKK became weaker militarily and as Turkey increased its influence with the KDP and became a major player in the politics of northern Iraq, alarm bells began to ring in Syria and Iraq. This drove the two countries closer to one another. In response, Turkey took the initiative on 2 July and submitted a document to Damascus that was known as the Forum of Good Neighborliness, containing ten principles. Turkey indicated that its relations with Syria would improve and economic, cultural, and other forms of cooperation could take place if these principles were respected: preserving the inviolability of frontiers, peaceful settlement of disputes, cooperation against terror, respect for human rights, noninterference in domestic affairs, not resorting to force, undertaking to resolve differences through peaceful means, not allowing terrorist organizations to be used against the other party, respect for territorial integrity and independence, and not engaging in activities harmful to the other side in order to prevent disputes and misunderstandings.

Syria took no tangible steps to improve relations with Turkey. In August 1998 its minister of petroleum visited Baghdad and announced the decision to resume oil shipments through the pipeline leading from Iraq to Banias that had remained inoperative since 1982, when Iran and Iraq were engaged in war. This decision was seen as a first step toward an alliance to counteract the Turkish-Israeli rapprochement.

In the autumn of 1998 relations between Ankara and Damascus took a turn for the worse. In September 1998 Washington finally persuaded the representatives of the KDP and PUK to talk to each other after four years. The final communiqué released after the meeting revealed the differences between the policies of the U.S. and Turkey. The U.S. seemed determined to set up a Kurdish state in northern Iraq, while Turkey was not prepared to depart from its policy of preserving the territorial integrity of Iraq; the PKK's terror remained Turkey's principal concern, even if it occasionally appeared to give the green light to Washington's objective. Turkey had been excluded from the process set in motion in Washington and was expected to act with Syria and Iraq and oppose the U.S. policy. Instead Turkey hardened its line toward Syria.

Gen. Atilla Ateş, the commander of the land forces, delivered a speech in Hatay on 16 September 1998 in which he said: "Turkey has made every effort to establish good relations with Syria, but our patience is running out. Syria is a source of untold evil. Turkey has the power to deal with this evil. If Turkey does not get the response it has a right to expect, it will be free to take whatever measure it may deem to be appropriate" (Hürriyet, 17 September 1998). This was a sign that the crisis management mechanism was put in operation against Syria. Given that Ateş was a member of the National Security Council, it was obvious that he was voicing the official policy line and not expressing his personal views.

On 1 October President Demirel delivered a speech at the inauguration of the new session of the TGNA. The speech contained the following passage: "Syria is following a policy toward Turkey that is openly hostile. I declare to the world that we reserve our right to respond to Syria as it continues to provide active support for the PKK terror. I want to declare to all that our patience is about to come to an end" (Hürriyet, 2 October 1998). The message was that Turkey would resort to arms if it became necessary. Hüseyin Kıvrıkoğlu, the chief of the General Staff, made an even tougher statement the same day: "We are in a state of undeclared war with Syria" (Hürriyet, 2 October 1998). Ankara's warning to Damascus was not confined to the statements of high-ranking individuals. Military units were deployed to the regions adjacent to Syria, and preparations were launched for holding military exercises. By 5 October all diplomatic contacts with Syria had come to an end.

The first reaction to Ankara's tough stand came from Israel. Contrary to the expectations of Ankara and the Arab states, the Israeli administration declared that it would give Ankara neither political nor military support in the crisis between Turkey and Syria. Israel felt that the situation might harm the Middle East Peace Process, so it canceled the planned military exercise at the Syrian border and even deployed some troops away from the border. Among the Arab states, Iraq declared that it was standing by Syria, while Jordan and Saudi Arabia, along with Iran, counseled moderation. Muammar Khaddafi declared that he would consider an attack against Syria to be an attack against Libya. When the U.S. failed to give Turkey its backing, Ankara gave the green light to diplomatic initiatives after having completed its military preparations. Egypt's President Mubarak and Iran's foreign minister Kemal Kharrazi took up the role of mediators and engaged in shuttle diplomacy.

Positive developments were set in motion with this diplomatic engagement, and on 17 October 1998 Abdullah Öcalan left Syria. With this step in the right direction, the officials of the two countries met in Adana on 19 and 20 October. Following the talks involving the deputy undersecretary of the MFA, ambassador Uğur Ziyal, and the Syrian president of political security, Maj. Gen. Adnan Badr al-Hassan, they signed a document known as the Adana Agreement, in which Syria made the following commitments.

- 1. Öcalan was not in Syria at the time and would not be allowed to enter the country. Nor would elements of the PKK be allowed to enter Syria.
- 2. There were no active PKK camps in Syria at that time, and they would be prevented from reestablishing themselves in the future. Many members of the PKK had been arrested and brought to trial. The lists containing the names of these individuals had been handed over to Turkey.
- 3. Within the framework of reciprocity, Syria would prevent all activities on its territory that might be directed against Turkey's security and stability. Syria would not allow the PKK to secure arms, supplies, or funds from within its territory or to engage in propaganda activities.
- 4. Syria accepted that the PKK was a terrorist organization. Syria prohibited the activities of the PKK and its subsidiaries along with all other terrorist organizations.
- 5. Syria would not allow its territory to be used by the PKK for training or for shelter in camps or any other installations; nor would the PKK be allowed to engage in commerce. Members of the PKK would not be allowed to transit Syria on their way to a third country.
- 6. Syria would take all the necessary measures to prevent the head of the PKK terror organization from entering its territory and would instruct the border crossing points to ensure that this did not happen.

The agreement also provided for the creation of mechanisms that would ensure the effective and transparent implementation of these measures by the parties.

- 1. Direct telephone links would be set up immediately to connect the high-level security officials of the two countries and would be put to use right away.
- 2. The two countries would send two special officers each to their respective diplomatic missions, and these officers would be introduced to the local authorities.
- 3. Turkey proposed that a system be set up through which security would be increased within the context of combating terrorism. The Syrian delegation replied that the proposal would be submitted for the consideration of the Syrian authorities, and a reply would be given at an early date.
- 4. The parties decided to deal with PKK terrorism at a tripartite level, with the proviso that Lebanon would agree to such a course.
- 5. Syria agreed to implement the commitments contained in the document and to take the necessary steps to obtain concrete results.

As a result of this crisis, Öcalan had left Syria; but it was still debatable whether Turkey had been able to achieve the objectives it was seeking in its policies on dealing with the PKK. Since 1993 Turkey had gained the upper hand in its struggle with the PKK from the military point of view, but an important dimension of Ankara's policy was to prevent the organization from achieving its objective of politicizing its rebellion. When Öcalan left Syria and went to Greece, Russia, and then Italy, however, the process of politicization of the PKK was accelerated, and the issue became firmly embedded in the international political agenda. But Turkish-Syrian relations began to improve at a slow but steady pace after the Adana Agreement.

At first Turkish officials made cautious statements, declaring that Syria's actions would be closely watched to see whether it would honor its obligations. The diplomats of the two countries were discussing the principles that would be adhered to in their political relations. Much faster progress was being made in economic relations and on technical questions, however. In March 1999 draft agreements were prepared to eliminate double taxation and to promote cross-border investments, meetings of the Joint Economic Committee were held, and the volume of trade reached $700 million.

When President Hafez Assad died on 10 June 2000, the question arose whether the recent revival of Turkish-Syrian relations could be maintained during the succession. The deceased president's brother Rifad Assad had personal relations with the PKK, and Ankara distrusted him. But when the late president was succeeded by his son Bashar Assad rather than by his brother, Ankara was greatly relieved. Overriding objections, the new Turkish president Ahmet Necdet Sezer carried out his first foreign visit to Damascus to attend the funeral. With Turkey represented at the funeral at the highest level and with Bashar Assad displaying maximum hospitality to his Turkish host, it became clear that there would be no radical changes in Turkish-Syrian relations as a consequence of the change of leadership in Damascus.

Although Turkey had defeated the PKK militarily, it was still grappling with the Kurdish question, both domestically and in northern Iraq. The water issue still had not been resolved, even though Turkey's relations with Iraq and Syria were gradually being normalized. Although relations with Israel had been greatly developed, Turkey had not been able to turn this to its advantage in dealing with the balances in the Middle East. Nevertheless, Turkey's position in the Middle East in 2000 was much more comfortable than it had been in 1990. As a matter of fact, although Turkey's attention had been fixed almost exclusively on the Middle East in 1990, by the year 2000 the priority in foreign policy had shifted to Europe.

Melek Firat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Arab States)

- Akgün, Mensur. "Ortadoğu Maceraları." In Onbir Aylık Saltanat: Siyaset, Ekonomi ve Dış Politikada Refah Dönemi, ed. Gencer Özcan, pp. 163–78. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.
- Akmandor, Neşet, Hüseyin Pazarcı, and Hasan Köni. Orta Doğu Ülkelerinde Su Sorunu. N.p.: TESAV Yayınları, 1994.
- Altunışık, Meliha B. "Güvenlik Kıskacında Türkiye Ortadoğu İlişkileri." İn En Uzun On Yıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 329–54. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Büke, 2000.
- Aykan, Mahmut Bali. "Türkiye'nin Kuveyt Krizi Sonrasındaki Basra Körfezi Güvenliği Politikası: 1990–1996." In Türkiye ve Ortadoğu: Tarih, Kimlik, Güvenlik, ed. Meliha Benli Altunışık, pp. 19–66. İstanbul: Boyut, 1999.
- Bölükbaşı, Süha. Türkiye ve Yakınındaki Orta Doğu. Ankara: Dış Politika Enstitüsü, n.d.
- Denk, Erdem. Ortadoğu'da Su Sorunu Bağlamında Dicle ve Fırat. Ankara: Stratejik Araştırma ve Kültür Yayınları, 1997.
- İmset, İsmet G. PKK: Ayrılıkçı Şiddetin 20 Yılı (1973–1992). 5th ed. Ankara: Turkish Daily News Yayınları, 1993.
- Kirişçi, Kemal, and Gareth M. Winrow. Kürt Sorunu: Kökeni ve Gelişimi (original title: The Kurdish Question and Turkey: An Example of a Trans-State Ethnic Conflict). Trans. Ahmet Fethi. 3rd ed. İstanbul: Tarih Vakfı Yurt Yayınları, 1997.
- Mazlum, İbrahim. "Türkiye ve Sınıraşan Suların Güvenlik Bo-

- yutu." In En Uzun On Yıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 381–402. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Büke, 2000.
- Oran, Baskın. "Kalkık Horoz" Çekiç Güç ve Kürt Devleti. Updated 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi, 1998.
- Özcan, Gencer. "Ana Muhalefet Hükümetinin Ortadoğu Politikasından Kesitler." In Onbir Aylık Saltanat: Siyaset, Ekonomi ve Dış Politikada Refah Dönemi, ed. Gencer Özcan, pp. 217–42. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.
- ——. "Sonun Başlangıcı." In Onbir Aylık Saltanat: Siyaset, Ekonomi ve Dış Politikada Refah Dönemi, ed. Gencer Özcan, pp. 201–16. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.
- ———. "Yalan Dünyaya Sanal Politikalar." In Onbir Aylık Saltanat: Siyaset, Ekonomi ve Dış Politikada Refah Dönemi, ed. Gencer Özcan, pp. 179–200. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998.
- Özcan, Nihat Ali. PKK (Kürdistan İşçi Partisi): Tarihi, İdeolojisi ve Yöntemi. Ankara: ASAM Yayınları, 1999.
- Özdağ, Ümit. Türkiye, Kuzey Irak ve PKK: Bir Gayri Nizami Savaşın Anatomisi. Ankara: ASAM, 1999.
- Şen, Sabahattin (ed.). Su Sorunu, Türkiye ve Ortadoğu. İstanbul: Bağlam, 1993.
- Sever, Ayşegül. "ABD'nin İkili Çevreleme Politikası ve Türkiye." In En Uzun On Yıl, ed. Gencer Özcan and Şule Kut, pp. 355–80. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Büke, 2000.
- Tür, Özlem. "Türkiye-Suriye İlişkileri: Su Sorunu." In Türkiye ve Ortadoğu: Tarih, Kimlik, Güvenlik, ed. Meliha Benli Altunışık, pp. 105–28. İstanbul: Boyut, 1999.

Yavuz, Turan. ABD'nin Kürt Kartı. İstanbul: Milliyet, 1993.

II. RELATIONS WITH NON-ARAB STATES

A. Relations with Israel

1. The Revival of Relations

In 1990 Turkey raised the level of its diplomatic mission in Tel Aviv to an embassy. Following the Madrid Conference, an important milestone in the Middle East Peace Process (Box 7-57), the representations of Palestine and Israel in Ankara were raised to embassy level on 31 December 1991. The Turkish Consulate General in Jerusalem, closed since 1980, was reopened in 1992. There were five basic reasons for these changes in bilateral relations.

- 1. The newly initiated dialogue between the Palestinians and Israel, even though it was proceeding with great caution, had raised hopes that a just and lasting peace in the Middle East might finally be at hand. In these circumstances, Turkey was eager to establish a firm place for itself in the new Middle East by developing its relations with both sides.
- 2. As relations with the U.S. reached a high level of cordiality during Özal's term, there was a parallel effort to maintain close contacts with Israel. During the 1950s a

Box 7-57. The Middle East Peace Process

The initiative to eliminate the differences between Israel and the Arabs and to establish a lasting and just peace in the region under the influence of the U.S. is known as the Middle East Peace Process.

The peace process was initiated by the rapprochement between Israel and Egypt. Following the war of 1973, secret talks began in Morocco under the auspices of the U.S. in September 1977, leading to the Camp David agreements of 17 September 1978. These were the Framework Agreement for a Middle Eastern Peace and the Framework Agreement for Peace between Egypt and Israel. According to these documents, the parties had agreed to meet, along with the representatives of Jordan and the Palestinian people, in order to establish an autonomous Palestinian Administration in the West Bank within five years. The Camp David Accords were followed by a peace agreement between Egypt and Israel, signed on 26 March 1979. This signaled the establishment of diplomatic relations between Israel and an Arab state for the first time in Israel's history.

It proved impossible to implement the Camp David decisions fully, because the Arab states ostracized Egypt and because of Israel's treatment of the Palestinian refugees living in Lebanese camps in the course of the Israeli operation in Lebanon in 1982.

The Palestinian Intifada that erupted in the occupied territories in 1987 and the warm relations between the U.S. and the Arab states that emerged from the Gulf crisis of 1990 and 1991 led to a revival of the Middle East Peace Process. Through a U.S. led initiative, the Arabs, Israel, and the Palestinians got together at the Madrid Conference on 30 October 1991. The peace process involved both multilateral and bilateral contacts. On the multilateral plane, cooperation in the areas of the economy, the environment, water, refugees, and regional security was discussed. It was also intended to conduct bilateral talks between Israel on the one hand and Jordan, Syria, Palestine, and Lebanon on the other.

The negotiations between Israel and Jordan led to the signing of a peace agreement on 26 October 1994 and the establishment of diplomatic relations. The talks between Israel and Palestific were conducted in secret in Oslo, beginning in January 1993. The Oslo agreement, known as the Declaration of Principles, was signed in Washington on 13 September 1993 by Israell prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat, the leader of the PLO.

Under the terms of the agreement, in the first stage, Israel would gradually evacuate Gaza and Tericho by 13 April 1994 and an Autonomous Palestinian Administration (APA) would be set up in the region. In the second stage, the responsibilities in the fields of education, culture, health, social welfare, direct taxation, and tourism in the rest of the West Bank would be transferred to the APA. Following the elections to the Palestinian Council and the establishment of the Palestinian Police Force, the Israeli army would evacuate the remainder of the West Bank, and a final status agreement would be signed no later than May 1999.

The Gaza-Jericho Agreement was concluded on 4 May 1994. Israel subsequently began to pull out from the rest of the occupied territories as the transfer of power proceeded. But the assassination of Prime Minister Rabin by a Jewish fanatic on 3 November 1995 and the subsequent electoral victory on 29 May 1996 of the hard-line Likud Party under the leadership of Benjamin Netanyahu dealt a serious blow to the peace process.

Netanyahu's tough stance on the issue of peace prevented the final status agreement from being signed in May 1999 as planned. The agreement was also losing ground with the Israeli electorate. In the election held in May 1999, the pro-peace Labor Party came to power, under its leader Ehud Barak. On 4 September 1999 Barak signed the Sharm el-Shelkh Memorandum with Arafat. Within the framework of this agreement, Israel would speed up the evacuation of forces, release arrested Palestinians, and sign the final status agreement by September 2000. Nevertheless, the talks, that took place at Camp Bavid in August 2000 ended in deadlock, and the peace process got stalled.

At the Israeli-Syrian peace talks, no progress was achieved on the future of the Golan heights and the question of Lebanon. To signal his goodwill on the question of peace, Barak pulled back the Israeli army from southern Lebanon in May 2000 and expected Syria to do likewise in northern Lebanon, which was under Syrian control. With the death of Hafez-Assad in June 2000 the Israeli-Syrian peace process also stalled, because the new leader, Bashar Assad, was not ready to sit for peace talks with Israel before consolidating his power at home.

After the provocative visit of Likud leader Ariel Sharon to the Haram al-Sharif in Jerusalem on 23 September 2000, a second Intifada erupted among the Palestinians, completely blocking the Israell Palestinian dialogue. At the same time, Israel entered a period of political turmoil at home. In this situation Barak stepped down as prime minister, and the election of 6 February 2001 brought the hawkish Ariel Sharon to power. The peace process, was entering a difficult phase.

(Ç. ERHAN).

similar course had been followed by Prime Minister Menderes. One reason for this was the desire to gain the backing of the powerful Jewish lobby to counter the influential Greek and Armenian lobbies in the U.S. Congress. Turkey also needed the Jewish lobbies to improve its relations with Europe.

A number of activities were organized in Turkey, Israel, and the U.S. to mark the 500th anniversary of the events of 1492, when the Ottoman Empire granted refuge to the oppressed Jews of Spain. Contacts with the Jewish lobbies in the U.S. were greatly intensified within the framework of these celebrations, which were led by the 500th Anniversary Foundation established by the Jewish community of Turkey. As the volume of trade between Turkey and Israel expanded and the diplomatic rapprochement between them gathered pace, the support for Turkey by the Jewish lobby organizations also increased.

3. Syria, Iran, and Iraq were supporting PKK activities in Turkey. Turkey also had differences with Syria and Iraq over the sharing of the waters of the Euphrates and Tigris. The nature of the regime in Iran was a source of concern. All of this led Ankara to reach out to countries:

in the Middle East with which it could cooperate. Israel had serious problems with these three countries and no direct disputes with Turkey, so it was natural for the two countries to come closer.

4. As the Welfare Party gained strength in Turkey, the idea of developing economic and political relations with the Islamic countries of the Middle East was also gaining ground. Those who were opposed to the rising force of the Islamist movement in Turkey felt that by developing relations with the only Middle Eastern country that had a political and economic structure similar to Turkey's a dangerous drift toward the unknown in foreign policy could be reversed. As a result, the view began to gain strength that Turkey's basic goal of Westernization and modernization, pursued since the early days of the Republic, might be weakened if Turkey turned toward the more backward Islamic countries. It also began to be stressed more often that, instead of intensifying relations with Islamic countries that often let Turkey down in international platforms, it would be preferable to develop relations with Israel, a country that was ready to back Turkey in formal and informal ways.

5. Most importantly, to establish the "New World Order," the U.S. needed reliable allies in the region. Washington had been in close political and military cooperation with both Turkey and Israel for many years, and it was natural for the U.S. to encourage these two countries to intensify their relations so that it could rely with greater assurance on the support of the two pro-Western democracies in the region. With the termination of the Cold War, both Turkey and Israel were fearful that their strategic importance might be diminished in the eyes of the U.S. This led them to step up their cooperation with the U.S. as well as with each other in order to ensure an effective role for themselves in the U.S.-led New World Order in the Middle East.

Progress in Turkish-Israeli relations began to accelerate in 1992. The first high-level visit to Israel from Turkey was made by the minister of tourism, Abdülkadir Ateş, in June 1992. In the course of the visit, an agreement for cooperation in tourism was signed. This was followed by the visit of foreign minister Hikmet Çetin in November 1992, when he signed the memorandum containing the principles of mutual understanding and cooperation. This document provided the basic structure for future expanded cooperation.

These high-level visits were followed in 1994 and 1995 by the visits of Israeli president Ezer Weizman and foreign minister Shimon Peres and prime minister Tansu Çiller and president Süleyman Demirel. In the course of the visits, it was agreed that the two countries should cooperate to achieve a lasting and just peace in the region and that the necessary measures should be taken to prevent Iraq from again posing a threat to the region. It was also agreed that bilateral cooperation should be developed in the fields of trade, defense, tourism, agriculture, combating terrorism, and security. During her visit to Israel in 1994, prime minister Tansu Çiller described Turkey's cooperation with Israel as a "strategic relationship" (Hadar, p. 10). This demonstrated the multidimensional nature of relations between the two countries.

Despite this intensification of relations, Turkey's actions were still guided by the principles of balanced diplomacy in the first half of the 1990s. At a time when the Middle East Peace Process had been launched but a final settlement was still not in place, Turkey was reluctant to take concrete steps to give substance to the cooperation that had been proclaimed. Ankara condemned Israel's action in expelling a number of Palestinians in 1992. Turkey also reacted to Israel's bombing of Lebanon in 1993 by postponing the visit of foreign minister Hikmet Çetin to Israel. Furthermore, Turkey pursued its traditionally friendly relations with the PLO and extended a loan of $50 million to the Palestinian Authority in 1993.

As the peace process began to make good progress in the second half of the 1990s and Turkish misgivings over Syria began to rise, Turkey started getting closer to Israel in all the fields of cooperation.

2. Turkish-Israeli Cooperation

a. The Dimensions of Cooperation

Cooperation between the two countries was mostly concentrated in the military and economic fields. It was underpinned by the Framework Agreement on Military Training and Technical Cooperation of 23 February 1996 and the Free Trade Agreement of 23 December 1996.

Based on the Framework Agreement, Turkey and Israel had signed eleven separate agreements by 2000. Under the terms of these agreements, Turkey made its airspace available for the training flights of the Israeli Air Force, joint exercises were held, exchanges of students and instructors took place between the military academies of the two countries, joint activities were carried out in the area of protection from chemical weapons, and Turkey's radar facilities were made available to Israel to allow it to monitor in particular activities in Iran and Iraq.

The Turkish public took a close interest in the Agreement on Cooperation in Defense Industries signed on 28 August 1996. This agreement provided for the exchange of defense information and the training of Turkish and Israeli technical personnel. Simultaneously, the Israeli Aircraft Industry (IAI) undertook the modernization of fifty-four Turkish F-4 combat aircraft at a cost of $632.5 million. Satisfied with this work, Turkey awarded the contract for the upgrading of forty-eight F-5 aircraft to the same firm at a cost of $75 million. The first modernized aircraft were delivered to the Turkish Air Force in early 2000.

When the commander of the Land Forces, Gen. Hüseyin Kıvrıkoğlu, visited Israel in February 1998, one of the items on the agenda was Turkey's purchase of 1,000 Merkava tanks as well as Popeye-I air-to-land missiles. Turkey later decided not to purchase the Israeli tanks, which were considered unsuitable for Turkish terrain. Instead Turkey purchased fifty missiles worth $25 million plus night-vision binoculars and other electronic equipment. Israel purchased forty armored vehicles worth $12 million from Turkey.

Turkey was planning to spend $150 billion on defense by the year 2020. This naturally attracted the attention of Israel, which had a highly developed military-industrial capability. Israeli firms took advantage of the close relations with Turkey to bid for Turkish contracts for weapons systems. When Turkey entered the market for the purchase of attack helicopters in 2000, the IAI submitted a bid to supply these helicopters, which it had given the Turkish name of Erdoğan. But the contract was awarded to American firms. After this, there was talk of awarding Israel the contract for the upgrading of American-built M-60 tanks. The contract would involve the modernization of 160 tanks for $25 million. No progress had been made on this issue, however, by the end of 2000.

Another dimension of military cooperation was the holding of joint exercises. In April and August 1996 Turkish and Israeli aircraft carried out joint aerial-refueling exercises. In early 1998 the two countries' navies conducted a joint search and rescue operation code-named Reliable Mermaid in the Mediterranean with the participation of units of the U.S. Navy. Small-scale joint exercises were carried out by the two navies in the Aegean and Marmara seas throughout 1999. Although these exercises were suspended following the Marmara earthquake of 1999, further exercises were planned for 2001.

Concurrently with the intensified military cooperation between the two countries, a number of high-level military contacts took place. In February 1997 the chief of the General Staff, Ismail Hakkı Karadayı, visited Israel; his Israeli counterpart, Amnon Shakak, visited Turkey in October 1997. In the talks that took place in the course of these visits, two joint working groups were established to institutionalize military cooperation: the Defense Industries Working Group and the Political-Military Working Group. These groups met once every six months, alternatively in Turkey and Israel. The number of military attachés in the Turkish Embassy in Tel Aviv was raised to three.

During the second half of the 1990s significant progress was also made in economic and trade relations. The driving force behind this progress was the Free Trade Agreement (FTA) signed in 1996 that came into effect on 1 May 1997. This agreement was signed at a time when relations between the countries were very close. But the real reason for the agreement was the decision of the Council of Association of the EU dated 6 March 1995 with the title "Customs Union." The decision required Turkey to sign FTAs with all countries with which the EU had concluded an FTA, and Israel happened to be one of these. Under the terms of the FTA signed with Israel, the two countries had to lower customs duties by 12% immediately and by 40% by 1998, with all customs duties eliminated by 2000.

In addition to the FTA, the two countries signed an Agreement on Trade, Economic, Industrial, and Technical Cooperation, an Agreement on Reciprocal Promotion of Investments, and an Agreement for the Avoidance of Double Taxation. These agreements were the infrastructure of bilateral economic cooperation.

The Economic Cooperation Agreement was signed in the course of Prime Minister Yılmaz's visit in September 1998. Under the terms of this agreement, arrangements would be made to expand the volume of trade between Turkey and Israel. These arrangements included use of the port of Haifa by Turkish transport firms to gain access to the Middle East, raising the volume of trade to $2 billion in one year, bidding by Turkish and Israeli firms for contracts in one another's countries, undertaking of joint projects in the countries of Central Asia, and cooperation and exchange of information in agriculture and technology.

The major benefit of the FTA for Turkey was the possibility of selling textile products to the U.S. via Israel that could not be sold directly because of American quota restrictions. These products could be marketed in the U.S. as Israeli products if they had a 35% Israeli content. Furthermore, the special-status industrial zone of Irbid on the Israeli-Jordanian border was also being used to transship Turkish products to the U.S. The effects of the FTA can be clearly seen in the trade statistics. The volume of bilateral trade was $91 million in 1989. This climbed to $446 million in 1996 and reached $625 million in 1997 after the FTA came into effect. By 1998 the figure had reached $800 million.

In 1999 Turkey's exports to Israel amounted to $580 million and imports stood at $300 million, with the total volume of trade attaining $880 million. Turkey's exports consisted mostly of iron and steel products, copper and copper products, knitted products, cement, and synthetic yarns, while imports consisted of chemical products, plastics, cotton, electrical machinery and equipment, and vegetable seeds.

Economic relations were not confined to trade. Starting in the 1990s, investors in both countries began to invest in the other country. By 2000 the number of Israeli investments in Turkey had reached seventy-two. Although these investments accounted for only 0.6% of total foreign investments in Turkey, they represented a substantial share of investments in the GAP region. Turkish firms undertook construction work in Israel amounting to $200 million in 2000. Among these was a $75-million construction job at Ben Gurion Airport. This was the largest contract ever awarded to a non-Israeli firm.

After 1996 cooperation in the fields of education, culture and tourism also began to grow. From 1996 to 1990 close to twenty agreements were signed in these fields. Turkish and Israeli universities were granting scholarships to students from the other country, and the number of Israeli tourists visiting Turkey rose sharply. The decision to close down casinos in Turkey, however, led to a drop in the number of Israeli visitors from 300,000 to around 50,000 in 1999.

In the summer of 1999 President Demirel visited Israel, and decisions were made to develop relations in all fields to a higher level. When the Marmara earthquake hit on 17 August 1999, the work of the Israeli rescue teams in the stricken areas drew praise and admiration in Turkey. Israel's channel I TV station organized a campaign in September that netted $1,340,000 for the victims. On 25 October 1999 prime minister Ehud Barak came to Turkey and handed over the "Israeli Village" (consisting of 320 prefabricated homes) to those left homeless in the earthquake. These activities reflected the warm friendship that had developed between the two countries.

These relations received a setback in April 2000 when the Israeli minister of education announced in the Knesset that Israeli school textbooks would henceforth contain information on the Armenian Genocide. Turkey reacted negatively to the announcement, and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs made sure that no member of the Turkish cabinet attended the National Day reception of the Israeli Embassy in Ankara on 10 May 2000.

b. The Repercussions of Cooperation

The growing cooperation with Israel had differing repercussions in Turkey, in Israel, and in the rest of the Middle East.

In Turkey, one group (led by the military) had always been in favor of close relations with Israel. As cooperation intensified, this group welcomed the development. The press frequently carried comments on the need for Turkey and Israel to be on the best of terms. Another group (represented by the Welfare Party) looked upon traditional Zionism with suspicion and concern. This group opposed cooperation with Israel because it feared that it would alienate Turkey from the Islamic world, with which it wanted to be closely integrated. The group's sincerity was questioned, however, after two important agreements with Israel were signed in 1997, when the Welfare Party was in the government as the senior partner of the coalition.

Meanwhile the military cooperation with Israel began to draw fire in Turkey when it became apparent that Israel's sales included obsolete equipment. There was particular opposition in Turkey to Israel's efforts to sell Merkava tanks, which were designed for desert warfare and lacked maneuverability.

The sharpest criticism came from those who felt that Turkey had strayed too far from the policy of balance in the Middle East in favor of Israel. As a matter of fact, Turkey's relations with the other regional actors were either stalled or in regression. At a time when the Middle East Peace Process was underway, it was felt that this excessive concentration on Israel might produce undesirable consequences in the event of a shift in regional balances when the peace process succeeded. This had happened in the past in connection with the U.S.-led Baghdad Pact, when regional balances had been ignored; and it looked as if it was happening again, with Israel and Turkey following in America's footsteps. There were comments in the Western press about the parallels between the Baghdad Pact experience and the current cozy relationship between Turkey and Israel.

Ankara began to perceive the dangers posed by the current policies and started to take steps to restore the former balance by taking advantage of the opportunity presented by the death of Hafez Assad on 10 June 2000. Turkey was represented at his funeral by a high-level delegation led by President Sezer. Turkey also joined the other Islamic states in displaying a pro-Palestinian position when the Second Intifada erupted in the Palestinian territories. Turkey's policy of balance was formalized when former president Süleyman Demirel became a member of the UN's Investigation Committee to report on the events in Palestine.

The fact that the Turkish-Israeli relations reached a high level also met with different responses in Israel. Although Israel's business community and military establishment maintained their positive approach to Turkey, liberal politicians began to voice misgivings that were finding increasing support among the public.

- 1. The developing relations with Turkey might draw Israel into the disputes between Ankara and Damascus. This would be contrary to Israel's policy of normalizing its relations with Syria over the long term.
- 2. Israel was already the target of a number of terror organizations, and its relations with Turkey could turn Israel into a target for the PKK. In fact, actions against Israeli missions in Europe increased due to rumors that Israel had assisted Turkey with intelligence in the operation that resulted in the apprehension of Öcalan. Israel was wary of adding new issues to its long list of existing problems.
- 3. Israel's close relations with Turkey might have negative effects on its relations with Greece and the Greek part of Cyprus. As Israel's President Weizman declared during his visit to Cyprus at the end of 1998, Israel sought no confrontation with either Greece or Cyprus.

In the light of these considerations, Israel had good reasons to downgrade the strategic dimension of Turkish-Israeli relations and give more weight to the commercial and cultural aspects of the relationship. When Ehud Barak of the Labor Party became prime minister in May 1999, he declared to Turkish newspaper reporters that his priority was to achieve peace with Syria. Barak did not want Israel's relations with Turkey to worsen its relations with the other countries of the region.

The most negative reactions to Turkey's ties with Israel came from the Islamic countries of the region. Notwithstanding Turkey's declarations that its cooperation was not a pact directed against them, Ankara was unable to blunt the criticism that its policies kept generating. Starting in 1996, all the Arab League summits voiced the concern of the Arab world over Turkey's close ties with Israel, with Egypt and Syria leading the chorus. When six Israeli aircraft undertook training flights in Turkish airspace in April 1996, Egypt's foreign minister, Amr Musa, came to Ankara to obtain the details of the military cooperation agreement. Following Musa's trip, President Mubarak declared that he was not satisfied that the Turkish-Israeli military agreement was merely a training agreement and that it had no aggressive objectives. Syria used this opportunity to obtain the support of the other Arab states with regard to its differences with Turkey. In 1997 Syria's official mouthpiece, the newspaper al-Baath, criticized Turkey's cooperation with Israel in the following terms: "This undeclared alliance is seeking new gains at the expense of the Arabs and their legal rights in addition to undermining the peace process" (Bölükbaşı, p. 148).

These criticisms reached their peak in early 1998 in the course of the Reliable Mermaid exercise. Syria described it as "an element that will upset the balance in the region," while Iran claimed that it was "the product of the plan to develop the Zionist expansionist policies that were leading to permanent crisis in the region." Egypt accused Turkey and Israel of provocation and, after claiming that Turkey had entered an alliance with Israel, warned that "Turkey must know that all alliances beget counteralliances" (Bölükbaşı, p. 149).

Given the reactions from the countries of the region, the opposing voices heard in Israel, and the cooling off in relations in 2000, it can be assumed that the strategic dimension of Turkey's relations with Israel will begin to recede and the impression that the relationship has the nature of a military pact will be dissipated.

The Period of Stagnation in Strategic Cooperation

As noted above, the speech of an Israeli minister regarding the Armenian allegations of genocide brought about a crisis in relations between Ankara and Tel Aviv. As a result, no high-level Turkish representatives participated in the reception offered on 10 May 2000 by the Israeli Embassy in Ankara on the occasion of the founding of the state of Israel. This was the first sign that the development of relations that had been gathering pace since the mid-1990s had stalled. Throughout 2000 other signs followed, influenced by three separate factors.

1. After Öcalan was forced to leave Syria and was brought to Turkey after his capture in Kenya, a new dialogue was established between Damascus and Ankara. Turkey began to return to its old policy of maintaining a balance in the region; inevitably, this resulted in a review of the policy of intensive relations with Tel Aviv. Ankara saw the succession of Hafez Assad by Bashar Assad as a positive development for the peace of the Middle East as well as for Turkish-Syrian relations and demonstrated its desire to further the dialogue and economic relations with Syria.

A positive atmosphere had emerged at the talks held in Washington between Israel and Syria in 1999, and this also helped nudge Turkey toward a balanced policy. The possibility of peace between the two adversaries under U.S. prodding was a factor leading Ankara toward evenhandedness.

2. No more progress was made in the field of defense industries, where cooperation had been most intense. The contract for attack helicopters went to an American firm after the elimination of the Israeli-Russian consortium, and the tank modernization project was making no progress, following much talk that the contract would be awarded to Israeli firms. This caused considerable uneasiness in Israel. Prime Minister Barak came to Ankara on 28 August 2000 in the company of the defense ministry's undersecretary and officials responsible for defense industries to eliminate the hurdles; but Turkey refused to budge, conveying the message that relations with the U.S. had precedence over relations with Israel.

Israel's reaction to these developments came in the fall of 2000, when the Armenian allegations of genocide were placed on the congressional agenda in Washington. The Jewish lobby formerly had worked hand-in-hand with Turkey to prevent the genocide bills from reaching the floor of the Senate and the House of Representatives. This time, in parallel with the reluctant attitude of Tel Aviv, the lobby remained aloof until the last moment. The Jewish lobby took action only when President Clinton sent a letter to the Speaker of the House and the bill was removed from the agenda, demonstrating to Turkey once again that the course of Turkish-U.S. relations was intimately linked with the course of Turkey's relations with Israel.

Ankara's position vis-à-vis the Second Intifada (also known as the al-Aqsa Intifada) that broke out in the occupied territories was another factor. Following the talks held between the Israeli and Palestinian sides in 1999, it was decided to reach a final agreement by Octbber 2000. But it proved impossible to achieve an agreement on the basic issues. Tension began to rise as an agreement proved elusive, and the establishment of an independent Palestinian state was postponed indefinitely. The situation exploded when the leader of the Likud Party, Ariel Sharon, provocatively visited the Masjid al-Aqsa, a Muslim holy site in Jerusalem. This was the man who had overseen the massacre at the Palestinian camps in Lebanon in 1982, earning for himself the title of "the Butcher of Lebanon" among the Arabs. As in 1987, the Intifada began with isolated protest demonstrations and soon escalated into a general uprising throughout the occupied territories. The Second Intifada was no different from the First Intifada in its origin and development and in the harsh Israeli reaction it provoked. By the fall of 2001 about eight hundred Palestinians had been killed by the Israeli army. Scores of Israeli soldiers and civilians lost their lives as a consequence of Palestinian suicide attacks.

The Second Intifada demonstrated two things. One was the strength of those who opposed peace among both the Israelis and the Palestinians. The Likud Party, supported by the ultrareligious and nationalist elements as well as the Jewish settlers, displayed its utter opposition to the principle of "land for peace." On the Palestinian side, the terror organizations Hamas and Islamic Jihad, defying the leadership of Yasser Arafat, wanted a return to the objective of destroying Israel. The second thing it demonstrated was that peace in the region would not be reached without first settling the basic questions. The events showed that the final status of Jerusalem was the key to the whole peace process.

During the Second Intifada, the Israeli army responded to the Palestinian demonstrators with automatic weapons and attacked the buildings and coastal patrol vessels of the PLO in Gaza with helicopters. These actions got a very negative reaction from Ankara. Turkish leaders, including President Sezer and Prime Minister Ecevit, called for restraint and underlined that this was essential for the peace process to continue. Ankara's concern intensified when the Israeli policy toward the Palestinians became even tougher after Ariel Sharon became prime minister on 6 February 2001, following the election.

At this point Ankara made an effort to help in reaching a solution to this question. Although this was not a mediation effort in the formal sense, foreign minister İsmail Cem undertook shuttle diplomacy between Israel and Palestine and Egypt. Ankara was aware that its intensified cooperation with Israel was seen among the Arabs as a pact directed against themselves. Turkey also knew that this cast a shadow on the credibility of the role that it sought to assume in the Middle East and undermined its neutrality. That is why Ankara sought to diminish its visibility in Tel Aviv by calling for a postponement of the meeting of the working group on strategic and security cooperation scheduled to take place in the autumn of 2000. The group had been set up under the military cooperation agreement and was supposed to meet once every six months, but the meeting had not taken place by the end of 2000.

After this postponement, Turkish-Israeli relations received a second shock when President Sezer made a speech at the meeting of the Permanent Council for Economic Cooperation of the Islamic Conference, where he had harsh words for Israel's actions in the occupied territories.

Finally, a meeting was held in the Egyptian resort of Sharm el-Sheikh on 17 October 2000 to end the turmoil in the occupied territory. At the meeting, it was decided to set up an Investigation Committee under the aegis of the UN. When former president Süleyman Demirel was included in the committee, this restored Turkey's neutrality on the issues separating Israel and Palestine. Fifty-two years earlier Turkey had been made a member of the UN's Palestine Conciliation Committee; this helped to steer Ankara toward a neutral position, whereas previously it had been siding with the Arabs. The membership in the Investigation Committee had a similar effect in drawing Turkey toward more evenhandedness. After holding two meetings on 26 and 27 November, the committee went to the region in December to hold talks with the contending sides and issued its report on 30 April 2001. The report underlined that the events were unleashed by Sharon's visit to the Masjid al-Aqsa on 28 September 2000 with 1,000 followers and called for a cease-fire so that the parties could resume their peace talks. The report also listed the actions that needed to be taken to restore confidence between the two sides.

The events that took place from 1999 to 2001 showed that Turkey had abandoned its one-sided policy in the Middle East that it had been pursuing from 1995 to 1999. Henceforth it would follow a more balanced policy, bearing in mind its national interests. Nevertheless, relations with Israel did not stray too far away from their general course. High-level Israeli visits to Ankara continued as before. In April 2001 foreign minister Shimon Peres visited, and in July defense minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and chief of the General Staff Shaul Mofaz were in Turkey for contacts. Most controversial was the visit to Ankara of prime minister Ariel Sharon on 8 August 2001, which drew anti-Turkish reactions in Arab capitals.

During Sharon's visit in Ankara, Turkey called on Israel to take the necessary steps to restart the Middle East Peace Process, while Israel asked Turkey to persuade the Palestinians to abandon their armed struggle. This visit clearly showed Turkey in its role of facilitator in the Middle East Peace Process. At the same time, it indicated Turkey's determination to continue to develop its relations with Israel when the Turkish leadership played host to Sharon, a man that the Arab world regarded as the "Milosevic of the Middle East."

ÇAĞRI ERHAN AND ÖMER KÜRKÇÜOĞLU

Sources (Relations with Israel)

Altunışık, Meliha Benli. "Soğuk Savaş Sonrası Dönemde Türkiye-İsrail İlişkileri." In Türkiye ve Orta Doğu Tarih Kimlik Güvenlik, ed. Meliha Benli Altunışık, pp. 181–215. İstanbul: Boyut, 1999.

Bölükbaşı, Süha. "Türkiye ve İsrail: Mesafeli Yakınlıktan Stratejik Ortaklığa." Liberal Düşünce (Winter 1999): 138–52.

Demirer, Temel. "Pax-Americana Orta Doğu'da Ne Yapryor?" Özgür Üniversite Forumu 1, no. 4: 5-36.

Erhan, Çağrı. "Hilal ve Sion Yıldızı Türk-İsrail İlişkilerinin Dünü ve Bugününe Kısa Bir Bakış." Mülkiyeliler Birliği Dergisi 21, no. 202 (Aug.–Sept. 1997): 32–38.

Garih, Üzeyir. "Turkish-Israeli Business Relations: The View of a Businessman." In Actual Situation and Prospects of Turkey's Relations with Israel, pp. 69–84. Ankara: Friedrich-Naumann Foundation in Turkey, 1992.

Hadar, Levon T. "Orienting Jerusalem toward Ankara or Cairo?: Israel's New Geostrategic Debate." Mediterranean Quarterly 12, no. 3 (2001): 8-30.

Hürriyet. 1993-2000.

Karaosmanoğlu, Ali. "A Turkish View of Bilateral Relations with Israel." In Actual Situation and Prospects of Turkey's Relations with Israel, pp. 1–6. Ankara: Friedrich-Naumann Foundation in Turkey, 1992.

Köni, Hasan. "Mısır-Türkiye-İsrail Üçgeni." Avrasya Dosyası 1, no. 3 (Fall 1994): 40-50.

The Middle East Peace Process. Jerusalem: Information Division Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1997.

Milliyet. 1993-2000.

Nachmani, Amikam. "Israeli-Turkish Relations: The Laying of Foundations." In Actual Situation and Prospects of Turkey's Relations with Israel, pp. 7–36. Ankara: Friedrich-Naumann Foundation in Turkey, 1992.

Tavlaş, Nezih. "Türk-İsrail Güvenlik ve İstihbarat İlişkileri." Avrasya Dosyası 1, no. 3 (Fall 1994): 4–15.

B. Relations with Iran

1. Political Relations

The Clash of Ideologies

As pointed out in Section 6 (dealing with the 1980s), the real factor leading to a crisis in Turkish-Iranian relations based on ideological grounds was the Iranian administration's need to satisfy domestic public opinion. When Khomeini died in 1989, he was succeeded as president by Hashemi Rafsanjani, who was in favor of following a more moderate line in foreign policy. Ankara saw this as a positive development, and prime minister Yıldırım Akbulut's visit to Tehran in March 1990 helped in improving the atmosphere between the neighbors. When Khomeini was succeeded in the Supreme Leadership (Velayet-e Faqih) by the hard-liner Ali Khamenei, however, who led a group that supported the continuation of Khomeini's tough policies, Iran acquired an administration that was tugging in opposite directions (Box 7-58).

Ankara attributed Iran's support for the PKK (through the Guardians of the Revolution) and the periodic crises between the two countries over religious symbols to the activities of the conservative faction led by Khamenei and refrained from taking forceful counteraction in order to avoid embarrassing the moderates in Tehran. In April 1991 Rafsanjani came to Ankara but did not visit Atatürk's tomb and lay the customary wreath. When Turkey decided to overlook this breach of etiquette, it was seen as confirmation of Ankara's desire not to undermine the position of the moderates as well as its decision to freeze the

Box 7-58. The Structure of the Clergy and the State in Iran

Iran's political structure is reminiscent of the former USSR, which had a dual structure consisting of the party and the state. In Iran, the dual structure was made up of the state and the Shiite clergy. Historically, the Shiite clergy steered away from the state structure and tended to rely on a social and economic power base rather than a political power base. But it has currently become impossible for the clergy to stay clear of the political structure, because the ruling elite is now selected from among the clergy. All the key positions of the state are occupied by the clergy (usually the lower-ranking clergy), so the administration is structured not on the state but on the Shiite clergy. This dual structure went through two distinct phases:

In Khomeini's period from 1979 to 1989, the Supreme Leadership (Rahbar-e Engelab) was at the pinnacle of the state and had absolute control over everything. The top post of the religious hierarchy (Marja al-Taqlid) and the Supreme Leadership were both held by Khomeini. As a consequence Khomeini's religious rulings and political decisions were enmeshed; as the state came under the influence of religion, the clergy became politicized. The two wings started to merge in an inextricable manner.

In Ali Hosayni Khamenel's period after 1989, the Supreme Leadership was taken over by someone who was not at the top of the hierarchy. Consequently, Khamenel's pronouncements were considered to have only political significance, the position of Supreme Leader clearly took on a temporal character, and the process of politicization of the clergy was reversed. Twenty years after the proclamation of the Islamic republic in Iran, the religious standing of the clergy in the state administration has been diminished. They are perceived as politicians and bureaucrats, while the political influence of the clergy outside the administration has been eroded, with their effectiveness confined to religious affairs. As a result, the dual structure is now turning increasingly into a structure consisting only of the state.

(A. AKDEVELIOĞLU)

ideological tug-of-war between the two countries in the aftermath of the Gulf crisis.

A similar development was observed in Iran during the Refahyol government. Refahyol was perceived in Iran as representing Islamism in Turkey and as struggling against the army and secular circles. Consequently, Iran decided to support the Refahyol government, which was busy trying to form the D-8 group (Box 7-59). Erbakan's first foreign trip was to Iran in August 1996, and Rafsanjani paid a return visit to Turkey in December.

Relations with Iran had taken a turn that made the Turkish bureaucracy very uncomfortable for three reasons. (1) Turkey had signed a military cooperation agreement with Israel in February 1996, and Iran was conveying to Turkey its growing concern as Turkey and Israel drew closer. In these circumstances no rapprochement with

Box 7-59. D-8

The idea of setting up a group to promote cooperation among developing Islamic countries was first put forward by Turkey when Erbakan was prime minister, and the organization known as the Developing 8 (D-8) came into being in October 1996. Upon Turkey's initiative, the following countries became founding members: Turkey, Iran, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Malaysia, Indonesia, Egypt, and Nigeria. The first summit meeting of the organization took place in Istanbul in June 1997. At the meeting, it was announced that the organization was now functioning and that membership was open to all developing Islamic countries. The main decision-making organ was the council made up of the ministers of foreign affairs. The organization described itself as a forum and defined its objectives as raising the economic prosperity of its members, developing democracy, developing trade among its members, and so forth. To achieve its objectives, the group was to lobby in other international organizations while also engaging in activities itself. Although nothing concrete has emerged from the organization's activities, the organs of the organization meet regularly. 🚐

(A. AKDEVELIOĞLU)

Iran could take place, especially as Iran and Syria drew ever closer. (2) There was a general impression in Turkey that Iran was behind the assassination of Çetin Emeç, a journalist with secular views. (3) The support provided by Iran to the PKK was a constant source of irritation for Turkey. Iran was deliterately seeking to exploit the cleavages in Turkish society and precipitated a crisis on the occasion of Jerusalem Day, which was being marked every year in Iran. A function to mark this day was organized by the mayor of Sincan, a suburb of Ankara, to which Iranian ambassador Mohammad Reza Baqeri had been invited. In the course of the event, Baqeri made a speech in which he condemned Turkey's relations with Israel. This infuriated the Turkish army. The tension reached a peak in February 1997, when both sides recalled their ambassadors. Relations were normalized toward the end of the year, when Turkey had a new prime minister, Mesut Yılmaz. In March 1998 the two newly appointed ambassadors presented their credentials and assumed their duties.

The ideological rivalry acquired a new dimension in 1993 when it was alleged that Iran was involved in the serial assassination of Kemalist intellectuals in Turkey. In January the chief prosecutor of the State Security Court officially announced that the murderers of the journalist Uğur Mumcu had links with Iran. Slogans were heard accusing Iran of the crime at the funeral of Mumcu (attended by a large number of mourners), and an anti-Iranian wave swept through the press. The Iranian minister of the interior, who was visiting Turkey at the time, cut short his visit and returned home to express his disapproval, In February both Rafsanjani and Demirel released messages of mutual recriminations. The U.S. State Department supported Turkey by declaring that Iran might well have been involved in the murder of Mumcu. The Welfare Party alleged that this was a U.S. conspiracy to block the positive development of Turkish-Iranian relations that had been progressing since mid-1992. When the Turkish Eximbank announced in February that it would extend no more loans to Iran to finance Turkish exports, economic relations also began to deteriorate. In July Iran banned the sale of prominent Turkish writer Aziz Nesin's books when he sought to get the Turkish translation of Salman Rushdie's book The Satanic Verses published in Turkey. When Turkey stopped Iranian trucks from entering the country in August, the crisis reached its peak. The crisis was overcome with the signing in October of the Joint Turkish-Iranian Security Protocol.

The series of crises that began with the murder of Uğur Mumcu continued throughout the 1990s with the assassinations of more Kemalist intellectuals; but by 2002 the Turkish judicial system had not been able to reach a conclusion about the existence of a link between the murders and Iran.

The last ideologically rooted crisis in bilateral relations occurred in July 1999. Iran's university students had been protesting the conservative policies of the government by occupying university buildings when they were brutally dispersed by the security forces. Soon the student demonstrations degenerated into antiregime street fighting. When Prime Minister Ecevit spoke in support of the demonstrators, relations became tense. After it became known that the leaders of the demonstrations had been in contact with members of antiregime organizations in Turkey and the U.S., Iran's accusations against Turkey increased. As in the case of the previous crises, after a while relations returned to their normal course.

The periodic crises in bilateral relations were always used by both sides as a means for dealing with the disenchantment with the official ideology in their domestic politics.

The PKK Factor

At this time, the Turkish authorities frequently raised the issue of the alleged support that Iran was providing to the PKK. In April and May 1990 Iran's Ambassador Baqeri in Ankara called on all the party leaders to inform them of the good intentions of the Iranian regime. The party leaders (except for the leaders of the Welfare Party) all responded by voicing their concern over Iran's support for the PKK. In October 1990 a ship bearing the Greek-Cypriot flag carrying arms belonging to Iran was detained as it sailed through the Straits, and its cargo was confiscated. The Turkish authorities claimed that the arms were destined for the PKK. This precipitated a crisis that lasted for six months. The ultranationalist elements of the Turkish press asked why Turkey remained passive while Iran supported the PKK.

As the activities of the PKK in Turkey grew in 1992, Turkish-Iranian relations deteriorated further. Although there was no agreement on hot pursuit, Turkish units chasing a PKK group penetrated Iran up to a distance of four kilometers in August. Özal confirmed that Turkish units would enter Iran without hesitation. When Iran sought clarification on this statement, the minister of the interior, İsmet Sezgin, went to Tehran in September with a file containing evidence of PKK's ties with Iran. He accused Iran of allowing its territory to be used by the PKK and of providing logistic support for the terrorists. Sezgin also confirmed that Turkey had nothing to do with the Mujahedin-e Khalq (PMOI: People's Mujahedin Organization of Iran), the group opposing the Iranian regime. On 16 September 1992 the two ministers of the interior signed the Turkish-Iranian Security and Cooperation Agreement in Tehran. The agreement provided for the establishment of a joint security committee at the level of minister of the interior. After this reduction in tension, Iran delivered some PKK militants to Turkey. This was followed by Prime Minister Demirel's visit to Tehran in October. When Demirel returned, the Greek-Cypriot ship, along with its cargo of arms, was released by the Turkish authorities.

Each time the issue came up, Iran denied that it was supporting the PKK and responded by accusing Turkey of providing shelter to the regime's opponents. There were incidents that aggravated Iran's suspicions: former Iranian premier Shahpur Bakhtiar was killed in Paris in 1991 and five individuals related to the Iranian regime were arrested in İstanbul for involvement in the assassination. Nevertheless, Mujahedin-e Khalq members were never deported from Turkey. In turn, Turkey complained about the actions of Iranian agents on Turkish territory directed against opponents of the Iranian regime, similar to the ones that had occurred in the 1980s. In spite of these complaints, an Iranian dissident was killed in İstanbul in May 1990. This was followed by similar incidents on a number of different occasions.

Starting at the end of 1992, Iran began to arrest members of the PKK and Turkey did the same to the Iranian dissidents. Some of the arrested individuals were handed over to their respective authorities. When Demirel went to Tehran in July 1994, relations had been restored to a positive state.

The mutual accusations of support for the PKK and the Mujahedin-e Khalq continued throughout the 1990s; despite the agreements signed, no definitive outcome was in sight even in 2002. As the PKK lost its effectiveness in the first half of the 1990s, however, this issue, which had been poisoning relations, began to recede.

It is likely that the existing ideological rivalry will also recede as the moderates gain ground in Iran and as bilateral economic relations develop further.

. Competition and Cooperation in the Caucasus and Central Asia

When the USSR disintegrated in 1991, there was a race between Turkey and Iran to become a role model and to establish a zone of influence. But this did not last for long. When Russia reasserted itself in 1993, Iran and Turkey were pushed aside. Furthermore, the U.S. withdrew its support for Turkey in this area. Iran was not ready to see its relations with Russia deteriorating. Turkey had adopted the slogan "the twenty-first century shall be the Turkish century," while Iran's slogan was "the twenty-first century shall see the reawakening of Islam." But neither country had the financial and technological clout to establish its preeminence in the region.

In 1992, before Russia had staged its comeback in the region, all of the Central Asian countries plus Azerbaijan had become members of the Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO). This signified that Iran and Turkey had opted for cooperation in Central Asia rather than competition, because the mutual suspicions caused by the Western media had been in large measure dispelled. It became obvious that Iran was not about to export its regime to the region; nor was Turkey pursuing Pan-Turkic goals. From this point on, the two countries would engage only in economic competition in Central Asia, along with economic cooperation. That is why problems caused by Iranian actions such as creating difficulties for Turkish trucks on their way to Turkmenistan should be seen in an economic rather than political context.

While the two countries were acting constructively in Central Asia and pursuing conciliatory policies, the same could not be said for the Caucasus. From 1992 to 1993, when the Popular Front was in power in Azerbaijan under the leadership of Ebulfez Elchibey, Iran perceived a direct threat from that country; this also cast a shadow on Turkey's relations with Iran. Iran was justified in feeling threatened. One of Elchibey's foreign policy goals was the annexation of Iran's province of Azerbaijan. This drove Iran to side with Armenia on the dispute over Karabakh. Tehran viewed Turkey's support of Azerbaijan and especially of Elchibey with deep suspicion.

When Elchibey was toppled in a coup in June 1993, his successor, Heydar Aliyev, pursued a conciliatory policy toward Iran and sought to restrain the ultranationalists. This allowed Iran to adopt a more balanced position on the conflict between Armenia and Azerbaijan and also made it possible to remove the Azerbaijan hurdle in Turkish-Iranian relations. But the removal of the hurdle did not automatically lead to cooperation between Iran and Turkey. Iran still looked upon Turkey's close cooperation with Azerbaijan with some suspicion and continued its activities that were detrimental to Azerbaijan's interests and therefore to Turkey's. To counter Turkey's initiative in establishing the BSEC in the Black Sea region, Iran helped establish the Organization for Caspian Sea Cooperation and pursued policies that conflicted with Turkish interests on questions related to the status of the Caspian Sea and the transport of the region's oil. In the course of the twenty-first century, it can be expected that Iran will adopt a tougher line so long as Turkey and Azerbaijan keep getting closer and if nationalistic motives play a larger role in the rapprochement.

Uncertainty in Iraq

The crisis that erupted in the Gulf in August 1990 brought Turkey and Iran closer together. In November 1990 President Özal went to Tehran to appraise the situation with Rafsanjani. In December Ali Akbar Velayeti, the Iranian foreign minister, came to Ankara and proposed that Iran and Turkey adopt a common stand vis-à-vis the crisis. He came to Turkey once again in August 1991. The high point of the exchange of visits came when Rafsanjani visited Turkey in April 1991.

In the course of the Gulf crisis, Turkey participated actively in the UN embargo on Iraq and allowed the bases on its territory to be used against its neighbor. Iran was satisfied to see the worsening of Turkey's relations with Iraq. During the war, Iran preferred to remain neutral and took advantage of Iraq's weakened position to settle most of the outstanding questions left over from its war with Iraq to its own satisfaction. In the aftermath of the war, there were a number of questions with regard to Iraq that still remained unresolved in 2002. In this unsettled environment Turkish-Iranian relations were focused on three main issues.

1. Iraq's territorial integrity: this was the only issue on which the two countries pursued a common policy. Both countries harbored suspicions that the U.S. might be pursuing a long-term strategy that would lead to the breakup of Iraq into two or three separate entities. This compelled both countries to keep on stressing that they stood for the territorial integrity of their neighbor. At a meeting of foreign ministers in which Syria also participated, the three countries once again confirmed their support for Iraq's unity in their joint declaration.

Although no country, including the U.S., ever spoke against Iraq's territorial integrity, the uncertainty in Iraq kept Turkish and Iranian suspicions about the integrity of Iraq alive. Despite this identity of views, their relations with the Baathist regime differed markedly. Iran saw a replacement of the Baathist regime as a precondition for resolving the Iraqi question, while Turkey was prepared to collaborate with any regime in Baghdad that could maintain stability in the country. In other words, the two countries were united about the need to preserve the Iraqi state but divided over the regime.

- 2. The U.S. presence in the region: the Iraqi Kurds revolted once again after the defeat of Iraq at the hands of the U.S.-led coalition. But this time their support was not coming from Iran as in the past but from the U.S. Iraq succeeded in suppressing this uprising in a bloody way, leading to the uprooting of 1.5 million Kurds, who sought refuge in Turkey and Iran. Both countries agreed that the Kurds must be able to return to their homes in Iraq in full security. Up to this point, there was an identity of views between Ankara and Tehran. But Iran disapproved of Turkey's approach when Ankara got the Americans involved in returning the Kurds to their homes and then institutionalized the U.S. presence in northern Iraq through Operation Provide Comfort (see "Relations with the USA and NATO" in this section). Actually, the Turkish opposition parties and the public were also critical of this arrangement, even though neither the Welfare Party nor the parties of the Left were able to get rid of it when they were in the government. Turkey's support for the U.S. presence in Iraq enabled Iran to describe Turkey as "Satan's lackey."
- 3. The northern Iraq equation: Turkey and Iran were in different camps on this issue. Turkey's main concern was to get the PKK out of northern Iraq. For this it was necessary to get rid of the power vacuum there. To secure this Turkey was encouraging the two main Kurdish groups and the Turcomans to reach an accord with Baghdad while it conducted operations against the PKK. Iran was seeking to establish control over the Kurdish groups while it also carried out operations against Iranian dissident groups based in the region. The Kurdish groups were using Turkey and Iran to gain advantage against one another in their struggle for supremacy. As northern Iraq entered the twenty-first century in this environment of confusion, the two countries were on the alert and following one another's moves in the region with suspicion. When the U.S. occupied Iraq in 2003, Operation Provide Comfort came to an end, and the Iraqi factor in Turkish-Iranian relations took on a totally new shape.

2. Economic Relations

Economic relations became stagnant after the Iran-Iraq War but revived again when the Central Asian republics gained independence. Formerly, only Turkey was in the position of a transit country, but now Iran assumed this role for Turkey as Ankara sought to gain access to Central Asia.

The most important event in Turkey's economic relations with Iran in the 1990s was the signing of the agreement on the natural gas pipeline from Iran to Turkey, a project that had been under consideration since the 1960s. The agreement was given its final shape in 1996, when the Refahyol government was in power. Under its terms, Turkey committed itself to purchase 10 billion cubic meters of natural gas each year from Iran, which possessed the world's second largest reserves of this commodity. Botaş (the gas distributing company in Turkey) would finance only the construction of the Turkish portion of the pipeline, while Iran financed its portion. This arrangement was designed to evade the D'Amato Act, which imposed a U.S. embargo on companies investing more than $20 million in the Iranian hydrocarbon industry.

Iran concluded a similar agreement with Armenia. Owing to the lack of investments, Iran could only produce enough gas to meet its own domestic requirements. That is why it was planned for Iran to pipe natural gas from Turkmenistan to Turkey in the first few years of the contract, with Iran supplying its own production after the necessary investments in the gas industry had been made.

The implementation of the deal went on after Refahyol left the government; by 2001 the Iranian portion had been completed except for the measuring stations, while the Turkish portion was on the point of completion. Actually, the agreement had a "take or pay" clause that required the two portions of the pipeline to be completed simultaneously so that when Iran made the gas available Turkey had to buy it or pay for it anyway. Despite this clause, talks were held with Iran (of which the public was kept uninformed), and Tehran was prevailed upon to forgo Turkish payments for gas that had not been purchased. It was claimed that Turkey had been dragging its feet in the completion of the gas pipeline despite its need for gas because of the negative U.S. approach to this project as well as the unenthusiastic attitude of some in the Turkish bureaucracy. It was also claimed that Iran showed understanding because it was aware of Turkey's difficulties.

The delivery of Iranian gas, commencing in 2001, should gradually be built up to the level of 10 billion cubic meters per annum. This is expected to have a permanent positive effect on bilateral relations, similar to the temporary boost that the Iran-Iraq War gave to bilateral relations. This in turn should allow the two countries to place their relations on a sounder footing and to avoid the periodic crises of the past. This expectation was borne out by the positive developments in relations in the first half of 2001, which became manifest during the visit of foreign minister İsmail Cem to Tehran.

The second important event in economic relations after the gas pipeline project was the extension of the ECO. Notwithstanding the hopes raised by the increased ECO membership, however, there was widespread disappointment because the organization was unable to overcome the torpor of the 1980s. The failure of the ECO (and of its predecessor, the RCD) to achieve the long-term objective of setting up a common market was not due to the lack of political will among its members. The real problem was structural. The members were developing countries, exporters of raw materials and semifinished products. That is why their intraregional trade corresponded to only a small fraction of their total foreign trade. Actually, Turkey and to a some extent Iran had a certain industrial capacity that could enable them to break free from this structure. When they undertook the extension of the ECO to include more countries, they expected to exchange the raw materials of the new members for their industrial products. These hopes remained largely unfulfilled, however, due to lack of financing security and standardized products in the ECO. At the threshold of the twenty-first century, the ECO's realistic objective is not the achievement of a common market but rather the achievement of institutionalization to overcome the shortcomings referred to earlier.

Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu

Sources (Relations with Iran)

Arı, Tayyar. Basra Körfezi ve Orta Doğu'da Güç Dengesi, 1978–96. 2nd ed. İstanbul: Alfa, 1996.

Çetinsaya, Gökhan. "Türk-İran İlişkileri (1918–98)." Thesis, Ankara, Hacettepe Üniversitesi, 1999.

Dağı, İhsan. Orta Doğu'da İslam ve Siyaset. İstanbul: Boyut, 1998. Durdular, Ercan. "İran'ın Azerbaycan ve Ermenistan Politikası." Avrasya Dosyası 2, no. 1 (Spring 1995): 124–35.

Fuller, Graham. "Orta Asya'da İki Rakip: İran ve Türkiye." Strateji 1, no. 1 (1995): 173–88.

Menashri, David. Revolution at a Crossroads: Iran's Domestic Politics and Regional Ambitions. Washington, D.C.: Washington Institute for Near East Policy, 1997.

Mughisuddin, Oya Akgönenç. "Humeyni'den Sonra İran'ın Dış Politikasındaki Eğilimler." Avrasya Dosyası 2, no. 1 (Spring 1995): 158–73.

Oran, Baskın. Kalkık Horoz; Çekiç Güç ve Kürt Devleti. Updated 2nd ed. Ankara: Bilgi, 1998.

Şimşir, Bilal N. Bizim Diplomatlar. Ankara: Bilgi, 1996.

Tavaş, Nezih. "Türk-İran İlişkileri Kronolojisi." Strateji 1, no. 1 (1995): 189–218.

Tekin, Ali. İran'ın Dış Politikasında Terörizmin Yeri. Ankara: Uluslararası İlişkiler ve Stratejik Araştırmalar Merkezi, n.d. Tülümen, Turgut. İran Devrimi Hatıraları. İstanbul: Boğaziçi, 1998.

The Issue of the Turkish Straits

I. POSITIONS AND DEVELOPMENTS PRIOR TO THE 1994 TURKISH STRAITS REGULATION

Technological developments after 1936 led to an increase in the size of ships. There was also an alarming rise in the number of vessels using the Turkish Straits. These developments made it necessary to seek new arrangements to ensure the safety of navigation and of life and property and to protect the environment in the Straits and the region of the Marmara Sea. There were two differing positions about what these arrangements should be.

One was to repeal the Montreux Straits Convention and to replace it with a system that did not contain elements that could be used against Turkey. According to this view, the main source of trouble lay in article 2 of the convention. The terms of this article were so clear that it was impossible to evade them through internal legislation without violating the convention. Consequently, it was essential to change certain parts of the convention, starting with this article 2. This position was not adopted for the reasons that will be explained in connection with the Russian thesis regarding the 1994 regulation (see "The Views of the Parties on the 1994 Regulation" below).

The second position was to clarify imprecise portions of the Montreux Straits Convention with internal legislation without, however, violating it. This was the position that was preferred by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Undersecretariat of Maritime Affairs of the Office of the Prime Minister, and the Ministry of Transport. As a result, the Regulation on Maritime Traffic in the Straits and Marmara Region came into effect on 1 July 1994.

This regulation did not come about suddenly. Previously reports had been prepared by individuals, and particularly sea captains, who were familiar with the problems of navigation in the region. Only some of these reports reached those holding positions of responsibility and can be regarded as forming the preliminary basis of the 1994 regulation.

The first report was authored by captains M. Efruz Ineceli and Gündüz Aybay in 1968 and bore the title "Safety of Life and Property in the Istanbul Strait and Its Environment." It was submitted on behalf of the Graduates' Association of the Maritime High School. Some of the report's recommendations were incorporated in the Regulation of the Port of Istanbul of 1982 as well as the regulation of 1994. Among these were the limitations of the speed of ships to ten knots in order to avoid accidents and excessive bow waves and the establishment of two traffic lanes in order to separate north-bound and south-bound shipping.

A second report was prepared by the Association of Turkish Ocean-Going Captains and submitted to the Ministry of Transport in 1987. It bore the title "System for Separating Traffic in the Straits and the Sea of Marmara." This report (issued about five years after the Regulation of the Port of Istanbul) explained the advantages of the System for Separating Traffic (SST) and recommended that it be enforced in the entire region of the Turkish Straits.

The most controversial provision of the 1994 regulation was the rule for the temporary suspension of traffic. This rule was not foreseen in the above-mentioned reports, but it existed in the Regulation of the Port of Istanbul of 1965 as well as in the Regulations of the Ports of Istanbul and Canakkale dated 1982.

II. THE NEW REGIME ESTABLISHED BY THE 1994 TURKISH STRAITS REGULATION

The Regulation on Maritime Traffic in the Straits and the Marmara Region was adopted by the Council of Ministers on 23 November 1993 and came into force on 1 July 1994. The term "the Turkish Straits Region" used in this text means the Bosphorus (i.e., the Strait of Istanbul, the Sea of Marmara, and the Strait of Çanakkale or Dardanelles). It consists of seven chapters and six annexes describing the SST.

Article 1 of the 1994 regulation read as follows: "This Regulation has been prepared to regulate...maritime traffic in the Turkish Straits and the Marmara Region and applies to all shipping in these waters." This meant that it would apply to warships as well as merchant vessels. Article 2 contained definitions of some of the terms used in the regulation. For example "large ship" meant one that was 150 meters or longer.

Chapter II contained the General Principles and consisted of the rules that had to be observed by ships before they entered or passed through the region of the Straits. Some of the rules dealt with the criteria regarding the technical capabilities of vessels. The ships that did not conform to the criteria had to transit the Turkish Straits under the rules established by the Undersecretariat of Maritime Affairs (articles 6 and 10/2). The other rules dealt with the various notifications that ships had to make before entering the region.

Chapter III regulated navigation through the Straits region and contained the rules that ships had to observe once they were in the region of the Straits. Article 17 stipulated: "The normal speed of vessels in the Straits shall be 10 knots. However,... this speed can be exceeded to prevent collisions, making every effort not to cause waves that might inflict damage to the adjacent areas." Article 18 provided that, unless absolutely necessary, ships should not overtake the ships sailing ahead of them and should maintain a distance of at least eight cables (one cable = one-tenth of a nautical mile) from the ship in front. In addition, there were rules about notifications that had to be made during transit through the Straits.

The most significant rule in this chapter was contained in article 24, which stated: "Maritime traffic in the Straits can be temporarily suspended by the Administration [the Undersecretariat of Maritime Affairs] in order to allow construction work over the water or under, drilling work, firefighting, scientific work, sports activities, salvage and rescue operations, activities to prevent or eliminate marine pollution, operations related to accidents or pursuit of criminals, and similar situations to proceed."

The most noteworthy provision of chapter IV (entitled "Common Provisions for the Straits and the Marmara Region") was the one relating to large ships, because it also included oil tankers. Article 29 stated: "The owners or operators of large ships must notify the Administration at the planning stage of the voyage about the ship and its cargo if the ship is going to sail through the Straits and the Marmara Region. The Administration shall inform the applicants of its decision, which will be made in the light of the morphology and physical condition of the Straits, the dimensions and maneuverability of the ship, the safety of life, property, and the environment, and the conditions of maritime traffic." From this wording, it could be understood that permission might be denied in certain circumstances.

Article 30 provided that "nuclear-powered vessels or vessels carrying nuclear cargos or wastes that intend to sail through must obtain permission at the planning stage of the voyage from the Undersecretariat of Maritime Affairs and, if the ships are carrying dangerous or harmful substances, from the Ministry of the Environment."

Article 31 stated that "Turkish ships 150 meters long and longer that sail into the Straits must take on pilots. Foreign vessels will be warned to take on pilots for safety reasons." This meant that pilotage was not mandatory for foreign-flag vessels.

Chapter V of the regulation established rules that would minimize the risks posed by natural and constructed hazards and obstacles. Article 40 stated: "When the speed of the main upper current in the Istanbul Strait exceeds 4 miles per hour or when there are currents induced by strong southern winds, ships with a speed of less than 10 miles an hour, ships carrying dangerous cargos, large ships, and ships with a deep draft shall not enter the Straits and shall await the ending of these conditions." Article 38 placed a restriction on 58-meter and higher ships, declaring that they would not sail through the Istanbul Strait. Ships from 54 to 58 meters high would be escorted by the required number of tugs to ensure that the ships maintained their assigned course. The number and the power of the tugs would be determined by the administration.

Article 42 provided that, when large ships with dangerous cargos (including tankers) sailed through the İstanbul Strait, another ship with the same characteristics would not be admitted into the Straits before the first ship had exited.

Chapter VI dealt with the system of separating traffic at the Çanakkale Strait (Dardanelles). The main difference between the regulations that applied to the Istanbul Strait (Bosphorus) and those that applied to the Dardanelles related to large ships carrying dangerous cargos. Article 52 stated: "When a large ship with dangerous cargo enters the Çanakkale Straits, no ship in the same category will be allowed to enter the Straits from the opposite direction until this ship exits the Straits. If a ship in this category enters the Straits in the same direction, it will have to maintain a distance of 20 nautical miles from the ship ahead of it." In the case of the Istanbul Strait the second ship would not be permitted to enter from either direction.

III. REACTIONS TO THE 1994 TURKISH STRAITS REGULATION

Before making the 1994 Straits regulation effective, Turkey sought to prevent adverse reactions by informing the international community of the new rules that it was contemplating. Turkey also referred the matter to the International Maritime Organization (IMO) in order to be able to exercise its rights under the Convention on the International Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions of Sea of 1972 (COLREG 72), of which it was a signatory. Articles 1/d and 10 of COLREG 72 authorized its signatories to establish an SST but made this conditional on IMO's approval.

The sketches relating to the SST that were submitted by Turkey were approved, after some technical changes, in September 1993 by the Subcommittee on Safety of Navigation.

Actually, Turkey should have submitted to the IMO a few rules that would apply only to vessels of limited maneuverability. Instead it submitted the full range of rules contained in the 1994 Straits regulation. It even submitted the rules that were not included in the regulation but were being applied in practice. Ankara's intention in doing this was to ensure that ships sailing through the Straits were fully informed. But the IMO as well as the Russian Federation decided to start a debate on Turkey's document, which had been submitted only for information purposes. Shortly thereafter, the RF objected to the Turkish document, claiming that it contravened the Montreux Straits Convention, the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea, and customary rules of the law of the sea. Turkey refrained from responding to this action. Russia's views, which were supported by Ukraine, Bulgaria, Romania, Greece, and Oman, were incorporated in the final docu-

At the sixty-third session of the Maritime Safety Committee, held in May 1994, Turkey's scheme for separating traffic was approved, along with a document entitled "the IMO Rules and Recommendations."

Like the 1994 regulation, the IMO Rules and Recommendations contained the rules relating to navigation in the Turkish Straits region. In other words, there were two different sets of rules: the national 1994 regulation and the international IMO Rules and Recommendations. The second document created some problems for Turkey, because it differed from its national document. To cite an example, whereas Turkey's 1994 regulation contained rules that were mandatory, the rules in the IMO's document were optional. Another drawback of the IMO document was that it contained provisions that restricted Turkey's competence as the state bordering the Straits. For example, instead of referring to article 10 of the COLREG 72, which had been formulated according to Turkey's views, the IMO Rules and Recommendations referred to article 9, which restricted the competence of the state bordering the Straits in favor of the ships' masters.

At the debates on the item at the IMO, the RF claimed that the passage of certain Russian-flag vessels through the Turkish Straits was being delayed because of the rules of the 1994 regulation and submitted statistics proving its claim. The Russian delegation called for Turkey's Straits regulation to be disregarded.

The Turkish delegation drew attention to the large number of accidents in the region and claimed that the effectiveness and value of the traffic rules thus would be easily appreciated. The delegation pointed out that in the ten years prior to the coming into effect of the regulation there had been an average of twenty accidents at sea per year. In the first six months prior to the regulation twenty-two accidents had occurred. In the second half of 1994, after the regulation came into effect, the number of accidents had dropped to two.

After this, Turkey withdrew the issue from the IMO and sought to negotiate directly with the RF. Four meetings were held from 1994 to 1996 without making any progress. Russia kept insisting on either amending or removing the rules regulating the passage of large ships, while Turkey sought to keep the proposed changes at a minimum level.

When bilateral negotiations failed to yield results, the RF reintroduced the issue to the IMO in December 1996. The sixty-seventh session of the IMO's Maritime Safety Committee was the scene of heated debates between the RF and Turkey. Russia called for a "mission" to be sent to the Straits, while Turkey took this as an infringement of its sovereignty and rejected the proposal. At this point the Turkish representatives walked out of the meeting. Bulgaria supported the Russian proposal for a mission, claiming that its vessels were being unjustly delayed.

The OCIMF (Oil Companies International Maritime Forum) also submitted a paper at the meeting. This was the most comprehensive objection to the 1994 regulation. The paper argued that two large ships carrying dangerous cargos like petroleum should be allowed to navigate in the Straits simultaneously and that it would be enough to allow a sufficient distance between the two ships to ensure safety. This proposal was designed to weaken Turkey's case and increase the capacity of the Turkish Straits to handle more oil traffic. It can be presumed that such proposals were being made at the instigation of the oil companies that wanted to ship the oil produced in Central Asia to global markets through the Straits.

In spite of these unfavorable developments, the Maritime Safety Committee favored a continuation of the dialogue with Turkey and decided to form a working group of experts to consider the issue.

The subject was then taken up at the May 1997 meeting of the Working Group on Charting Ships' Courses. Although the Turkish view at the IMO had been that the issue of the Turkish Straits should be taken up only at a technical level, Turkey was not represented at the meeting of the working group. It merely sent two documents containing basic data on the Turkish Straits and statistical information. Some of this information was to prove troublesome for Turkey later on, because it showed that in practice Turkish-flag vessels were being held exempt from some of the rules of the 1994 regulation. Perhaps because of this finding, the working group prepared a draft report on the Turkish Straits that could have negative consequences for Turkey.

At the sixty-ninth session of the Maritime Safety Committee, held in May 1998, Turkey indicated that it was prepared to make certain changes in the 1994 regulation.
(1) Henceforth "deep-draft ships" would be 15 meters instead of 10 meters. (2) The minimum length for large ship would be raised from 150 meters to 200 meters. (3) Under article 21 of the 1994 regulation, only tugs could tow ships or other floating objects through the Straits. The amended text provided that other vessels registered as conforming to IMO standards and having the capacity to tow could also be used.

Another information sheet submitted by Turkey concerned Vessel Traffic Services (VTS). Turkey would establish a VTS system that would come into operation in 2000. With this system an electronic navigation center would be established to monitor and direct shipping through the Straits. The purpose of the center would be to ensure that ships did not come close to one another at dangerous turning points in the Straits.

The debates showed that the new situation represented a compromise between Turkey and the other members of the IMO whose ships utilized the Turkish Straits. The new Maritime Vessel Traffic and Information Control System in the Turkish Straits came into operation on 1 July 2003, at a cost of $45 million.

The subject of the Turkish Straits also came up at the seventieth session of the Maritime Safety Committee, held in December 1998. At this meeting, Russia, Bulgaria, and Greece continued their opposition to the principles of the 1994 regulation and their enforcement. Turkey responded by reminding the members that the IMO was intended to be a vehicle for cooperation and that the organization was being abused when it was turned into a political forum. Turkey also argued that the IMO could not be made to serve as a vehicle for discussing national legislation; nor could it be used to pass judgments on alleged violations of international law. It emphasized that not a single accident involving loss of life had occurred following the implementation of the 1994 regulation and the SST. This demonstrated the utility of the arrangements that were put in place. The Turkish delegation added that only 3.7% of the 50,942 ships that sailed through the Bosphorus had strayed out of the navigation lanes fixed by the SST. The delegation was stressing that the system was workable.

At the seventy-first session of the Maritime Safety Committee, held in May 1999, the Working Group on Charting Ships' Courses adopted the following decisions. (1) Within the framework of the maritime traffic system already in effect, two-way traffic for large ships would be suspended so that they did not meet at the narrow points of the Straits where they had to change course. (2) Ships transiting the Turkish Straits should be encouraged to comply with the Reporting System of the Turkish Straits and to take on pilots. (3) Turkey should be encouraged to set up its VTS system at the earliest possible date. (4) The traffic system approved by the IMO that was being implemented at the time was effective (in other words, the SST introduced in the 1994 regulation would be maintained). (5) No agreement had been possible on changing the system currently in effect, owing to Turkey's reluctance (this implied that Turkey would not be asked to change or drop any of the provisions of the 1994 regulation).

At this point the negotiations ended when Turkey was asked to inform IMO about the improvements to be made in its Vessel Traffic Services and its system of providing pilotage services.

At the conclusion of the seventy-first session of the committee, the negotiations within IMO over Turkey's internal legislation for regulating traffic in the Turkish Straits came to an end. The item had been dealt with in a manner that suited Turkey, and the issue was removed from the IMO's agenda, even if temporarily.

IV. THE VIEWS OF THE PARTIES ON THE 1994 REGULATION

The strongest opposition to the implementation of the 1994 Turkish Straits Regulation came from Russia. It felt that the regulation was designed to restrict navigation through the Straits in order to eliminate the possibility of transporting Central Asian oil with tankers via the Straits.

Turkey, however, insisted that the arrangements were intended to ensure the safety of life and property and to protect the environment in the face of growing maritime traffic.

In spite of this divergence of views, Russia did not invoke article 28 of the Montreux Straits Convention, which allowed parties to give notice of denunciation of the convention. It can be presumed that Russia did not take this course because of the provisions dealing with the transit of warships. These provisions were designed to uphold the interests of the riparian states of the Black Sea by placing restrictions on the passage through the Straits of warships of states other than riparian states and the time they spent in the Black Sea. If the convention were to come to an end and it proved impossible to replace it with another arrangement at an international conference, the general rules of international law applying to straits would also be applicable in the Turkish Straits. This would mean no restrictions on the passage of warships. A second reason for Russia's action might be that the current situation differed markedly from the international environment of 1936, when the convention came into force. At a conference that would be convened following a possible termination of the Montreux Straits Convention, there would be no way to keep out big powers like the U.S. and Germany. It was well known that the U.S. strongly favored the principle of free passage of warships through international straits.

In summary, Russia did not make any attempt to bring the Montreux Straits Convention to an end. Although at first there were claims at the IMO that Turkey had no right to impose its control over the Straits with its internal legislation, in the end the members accepted that Turkey did indeed have this right as a matter of principle.

In any case, Turkey had already established rules for separating traffic with its Regulation of the Port of Istanbul (adopted on 25 December 1965), such as setting a maximum speed of ten knots and establishing the principle that traffic could be suspended for imperative reasons. No objections had been made to these rules; nor had they been violated in practice.

The debates at the IMO centered on the argument that the rules contained in the 1994 regulation violated the Montreux Straits Convention. The respective positions of the parties in regard to the provisions of the 1994 regulation were as follows.

Large Ships (Article 29): according to article 29, for large ships to transit the Straits, it was necessary to provide information to the Undersecretariat of Maritime Affairs about the ship and its cargo at the stage when the voyage was being planned. From this wording it could be deduced that permission to transit the Straits might be denied. Those states that were against the 1994 regulation were advancing two objections. (1) Under the Montreux Straits Convention, merchant vessels passing through the Straits only needed to communicate to local officials their name, nationality, tonnage, destination, and last port of call in order to facilitate the collection of certain taxes or charges. It did not mention cargo among the information to be provided. Consequently, to ask for information about the vessel's cargo was contrary to the convention. (2) The convention provided for no formality other than sanitary control for merchant vessels. The information required by Turkey prior to passage, however, was an extra formality.

Turkey's position with respect to article 29 was the following.

- 1. According to IMO's Rules and Recommendations Turkey had the right temporarily to suspend two-way traffic when ships that did not have the capability to navigate in compliance with the system of traffic separation were sailing through the Straits. In such cases the System for Traffic Separation could also be suspended temporarily. For Turkey to be able to exercise this right in order to ensure the safe transit of such ships, it needed to have prior information about the ship and its cargo.
- 2. The passage of ships over 150 meters in length through the Straits significantly increased the existing risks. Therefore it was of vital importance to have the information with reference to large ships as described in article 29. Since the 1994 regulation had come into effect, such ships navigated accompanied by tugs and traffic in the opposite direction was suspended during their passage through the Straits. Turkey needed to possess the necessary information to be able to implement these rules.

Nuclear-Powered Ships or Ships Carrying Nuclear or Dangerous Cargos and Waste Materials (Article 30): under this article, such vessels must seek permission at the planning stage of their voyages. In other words, Turkey might deny freedom of transit to such vessels.

The states that opposed the 1994 regulation relied on article 2 of the Montreux Straits Convention, which provided that "merchant vessels shall enjoy complete freedom of transit and navigation in the Straits...under any flag and with any kind of cargo." In view of this provision, these states argued that the prevention of ships carrying such cargos from transiting the Straits would be contrary to international law.

Turkey based its arguments about providing prior information on article 30 on the 1989 Basel Convention on the Control of the Transboundary Transportation and Elimination of Dangerous Wastes. Turkey had adopted the provisions of this convention in its legislation. Based on the Basel Convention, ships carrying dangerous wastes could not pass through the Straits without obtaining Turkey's written permission.

But Turkey's argument was weakened by the fact that all of the signatories of the Montreux Convention were not parties to the Basel Convention. In addition, the Basel Convention related only to "wastes" and included no provisions regarding nuclear, hazardous, or harmful cargos.

Ships That Had to Take On Pilots (Article 31): under this article, Turkish flag vessels over 150 meters in length passing through the Straits must take on pilots. Foreignflag vessels should be advised to do likewise. Although pilotage was not made mandatory for foreign-flag vessels because of the provisions of the Montreux Convention, it made pilotage and towage optional for all merchant vessels without distinction of nationality. This article discriminated against Turkish-flag vessels and constituted a breach of the Montreux provision.

Prior Notification Relating to Navigation Plan I and II (Articles 7 and 8): the regulation required all ships carrying dangerous cargos and ships of over 500 gross tons to submit a Navigation Plan I to the traffic control centers twenty-four hours prior to entering the Straits and subsequently a Navigation Plan II. The Navigation Plan I contained information on the ship's name, flag, call sign, tornage, last port of call and destination, and cargo and whether it would request pilotage or not.

Those states opposing the 1994 regulation declared that, according to article 2 of the Montreux Convention, the communication required of ships entering the Straits should not include the nature of the cargo carried by the ship. For them, this too was contrary to the convention.

Turkey argued that it needed to obtain the information contained in Navigation Plans I and II beforehand in order to be able to exercise the authorization it had from the IMO to impose a one-way rule on traffic temporarily or to suspend the system of traffic separation completely. The Turkish authorities made clear that the IMO had already granted Turkey this right through the Rules and Recommendations relating to the Straits, so that it could ensure safe passage through the waterway.

The Suspension of Traffic for Emergencies (Article 24): this article drew the most criticism during the debates at the IMO, especially from Bulgaria and Russia. These countries claimed that traffic was interrupted for unacceptable reasons, causing serious financial losses. They also drew attention to the increased risk of accidents arising from the accumulation of ships at the entrance of the Straits when traffic had been interrupted.

Those opposed to the 1994 regulation made the following points about the suspension or interruption of the traffic.

- 1. The Montreux Convention contained no specific provision on interruption of traffic. But according to the usage in international law, traffic through international straits cannot be interrupted, even if only on a temporary basis. Furthermore, an attempt to delay traffic would be contrary to the principle of freedom of navigation contained in the Montreux Convention.
- 2. Use of the phrase "without any formalities" when describing freedom of navigation in the convention meant that passage could not be delayed for any reason.

Turkey advanced two arguments when defending the legality of this article.

- 1. Delaying traffic was obviously a restriction of the freedom of passage. But it must not be forgotten that freedom of navigation might be completely interrupted for long periods owing to an accident that could occur if such measures were not taken.
- 2. Since 1982 the Regulation of the Port of Istanbul (article 13) and the Regulation of the Port of Çanakkale (article 21) had both contained provisions that allowed traffic to be temporarily suspended for emergency reasons. In fact, this provision had already existed in the Regulation of the Port of Istanbul since 1965. In other words, Turkey had been exercising this right for fifteen years on the basis of its internal legislation. According to the available information, no objection had been made to this implementation until 1994.

V. THE TURKISH STRAITS REGULATION OF 6 NOVEMBER 1998

On 6 November 1998 Turkey adopted a new Straits Regulation that replaced the 1994 regulation. The new regulation contained a number of provisions that differed from those in the previous one. In some respects the new regulation had made passage easier, but in some areas the provisions were stricter.

The first noticeable change was in the title. The 1994 regulation's full title was "Regulation on Maritime Traffic in the Straits and the Marmara Region." The 1998 regulation bore the title "Regulation on Maritime Traffic in the Turkish Straits." The Montreux Straits Convention referred to the Straits. The name change was more in keeping with international law, because the 1994 document could mislead people into thinking that the Marmara Sea was distinct from the Straits. The new title was more in line with the Montreux Straits Convention, which declared that "Straits" stood for the Straits of the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmara, and the Bosphorus.

The new regulation contained other changes in terminology. The 1994 document referred to ships that did not intend to call in any port along the Straits as "ships in transit." The 1998 document referred to them as "ships in passage without stopover." The "transit passage regime" that became mandatory in 1982 when the UN Convention on the Law of the Sea came into effect placed additional restrictions on the competence of the littoral state controlling the waterway compared to other regimes. It is very likely that the term "transit" of the 1994 document was changed to "without stopover" in order to ensure that it did not coincide with the term "transit" in the 1982 convention.

Another change in terminology involved the nature of the passage of ships through straits. The 1998 regulation (article 50) declared that ships other than those that would pass without making a stopover would be exercising the right of innocent passage. Article 50 also declared that ships intending to pass without a stopover would be exercising the right of free passage as foreseen in the Montreux Straits Convention.

The regime of innocent passage is the one described in the 1958 Geneva Convention on Territorial Waters and Adjacent Areas and the 1982 UN Convention on the Law of the Sea.

In international law there is no such thing as "free passage" through straits. Perhaps the intention in using this term was to underline that the status introduced at Montreux for passage was sui generis.

But the real problem posed by article 50 was not the terminology used but the phraseology. This is how the article was worded: "Ships passing through the Turkish Straits without stopover shall be exercising the right of free passage provided in the Montreux Convention; the other ships will be in the innocent passage category and will have to comply with all provisions of Turkish legislation, including the obligation to take on pilots."

From this language, it can be deduced that ships passing through the Turkish Straits without making a stop-over would not have to comply with all the requirements imposed by Turkish legislation. But when all of the provisions of the 1998 regulation were taken into account, it would be seen that Turkey did not have this intention.

As explained earlier, the 1998 regulation contained some changes that were more in favor of merchant vessels than those in the 1994 regulation. The definition of a large ship was 150 meters and over in the earlier regulation; this figure was raised to 200 meters in the later regulation. This demonstrated that Turkey had taken into account the criticism it faced at the IMO. Similarly, to come under the category of "deep-draft vessel" a ship had to have a draft of 10 meters or over. Today this figure has been raised to 15 meters. Since deep-draft vessels faced greater restrictions when sailing through the Straits, it can be said that the new regulation allowed a greater number of ships to go through without facing such restrictions.

The new regulation also contained provisions that would facilitate and accelerate the passage of oil tankers through the Straits. The 1994 regulation had provided that, once a large ship carrying dangerous cargo was in the Straits, no other vessel in a similar category would be allowed into the Straits until the first ship had left the waterway. But article 25, paragraph (d), of the 1998 regulation provided that in such circumstances a similar vessel would be allowed to enter the Straits after a certain distance had been covered by the first ship.

In addition, an infringement on international law that had slipped into the 1994 regulation was put right in the 1998 regulation. Although the Montreux Straits Convention had decreed that "pilotage and towage were optional" for merchant vessels, article 31 of the 1994 regulation had made it mandatory for Turkish flag vessels over 150 meters in length to take on pilots. This clear violation was corrected in article 27 of the new regulation, which stated that it was "strongly advised" that ships passing through "without stopovers" take on pilots whether they were foreign-flag vessels or Turkish.

Bearing in mind the criticism directed at article 7 of the 1994 regulation regarding the requirement to provide a navigation plan, Turkey introduced article 6 in the 1998 regulation. This article rendered the matter more complex, however, and even more difficult to understand. It stipulated in paragraph (a) that ships conforming to certain specifications had to provide "Navigation Plan I as fixed by the Administration in accordance with the standards of the IMO" at least twenty-four hours prior to entering the Straits. The new arrangement, unlike the previous one, did not give details about the information required from ships. Compared to the previous arrangement, the language of the new version was less clear. For instance, it was not clear whether the data to be provided by ships included information about their cargos.

The new regulation of the Straits that came into effect on 6 November 1998 took into consideration the natural hazards that rendered passage more difficult to a greater extent than the older one did. New rules were introduced that might slow down navigation or at times interrupt it altogether. It is obvious, however, that the new rules would also make navigation safer. Article 41, paragraph (d), of the 1994 Regulation provided that traffic would be restricted to one way and traffic in the opposite direction would be stopped whenever visibility in any portion of the Bosphorus fell to less than half a mile. The new regulation provided in article 36, paragraph (b), that this measure could come into effect if visibility fell to one mile. But it also made the measure more restrictive, declaring that traffic would be stopped in both directions when visibility fell to less than half a mile (article 36/c).

A similar situation existed with regard to currents. The 1994 regulation had introduced certain restrictions according to the difference between the speed of the ship intending to pass through the Dardanelles and the speed of the current. If the difference in the speeds happened to be under four miles per hour (in other words, if the ship did not have the capacity to increase speed), it was not allowed to proceed (article 50/a). Article 43, paragraph (b), of the 1998 regulation, however, provided that, when the current in the Dardanelles exceeded six miles per hour, ships carrying dangerous cargos, large ships, and deepdraft ships would be barred from the Straits irrespective of the ships' speeds and would have to wait until the current fell to under six miles per hour.

The changes made in the rules governing visibility and current speeds were based on the experiences of experts in Turkey over more than three years during which the 1994 regulation had been in effect. But how these changes will be received by the other states and mariners that are users of the Straits will only be known in the light of experience.

The 1998 regulation also introduced changes in regard to applicability of the rules. Article 1 of the 1994 regulation declared that the rules applied to all vessels in the region of the Straits. This meant that they applied to both warships and merchant ships. The likelihood that such a rule would be observed, however, was remote. The principle of the inviolability of warships, which had become an accepted practice over many years, rendered the rule inapplicable. The sole recourse that a state bordering the Straits had when dealing with war vessels was to appeal to them to observe its law and regulations and, if the appeal went unheeded, to seek compensation for any resulting damages from the state to which the warship belonged.

The Montreux Straits Convention had a good number of limitations with respect to type and tonnage and length of stay that applied to warships passing through the Straits. When the rules of the 1994 regulation were added to these, the passage of warships became quite complicated. The 1998 regulation solved this situation with article 49, which exempted warships, auxiliary warships, and other state-owned vessels that were not merchant vessels from observing most of the rules introduced by this new regulation. Furthermore, such vessels would be exempt from the provisions of article 51, which stated: "The masters and members of the crew of ships that violate the provisions of this Regulation shall be subjected to the appropriate provisions of the legislation in force."

Kudret Özersay

Sources (The Issue of the Turkish Straits)

- Aybay, Gündüz. "Boğazlar Bölgesi Hakkında Yeni Tüzük." In Boğazlardan Geçiş Güvenliği ve Montreux Sözleşmesi, pp. 45–46. İstanbul: BETA, 1994.
- "Boğazlar ve Marmara Bölgesi Deniz Trafik Düzeni Hakkında Tüzük." Resmî Gazete 21815 (11 Jan. 1994).
- "Boğazlar ve Marmara Bölgesi Deniz Trafik Düzeni Hakkında Tüzükte Değişiklik Yapılmasına İlişkin Tüzük." Resmî Gazete 21967 (21 June 1994).
- "Çanakkale Liman Yönetmeliği." Resmî Gazete 17809 (11 Sept. 1982).
- Deniz Kuvvetleri Komutanlığı. Denizde Çatışmayı Önleme Tüzüğü. İstanbul: Deniz Kuvvetleri Komutanlığı, 1990.
- İneceli, Efruz. "İstanbul Boğazı'nın Deniz Trafiği ve Çevrenin Can-Mal Güvenliği." İstanbul, 1968.
- "İstanbul Liman Tüzüğü." Resmî Gazete 17671 (21 Apr. 1982).
- "İstanbul Liman Tüzüğü." Resmî Gazete 22749 (6 Sept. 1996).
- Özersay, Kudret. Türk Boğazlarından Geçiş Rejimi. Ankara: Mülkiyeliler Birliği Vakfı Yayınları, 1999.
- Soysal, İsmail. "The 1936 Montreux Convention, 60 Years Later." In Turkish Straits: New Problems, New Solutions, ed. İsmail Soysal, pp. 1–27. İstanbul: Orta Doğu ve Balkan İncelemeleri Vakfı, 1995.
- Tarhanlı, Turgut. "Innocent Passage Regime and Illicit Arms Trafficking through the Turkish Straits." In Turkish Straits: New Problems, New Solutions, ed. İsmail Soysal, p. 34. İstanbul: Orta Doğu ve Balkan İncelemeleri Vakfı, 1995.
- "Tehlikeli Atıkların Sınırlarötesi Taşınmasının ve Bertarafının Kontrolüne İlişkin Bazel Sözleşmesi." Resmî Gazete 21935 (15 May 1994).
- Toluner, Sevin. "Boğazlardan Geçiş ve Türkiye'nin Yetkileri." In Boğazlardan Geçiş Güvenliği ve Montreux Sözleşmesi, p. 11. İstanbul: BETA, 1994.
- "Türk Boğazları Deniz Trafik Düzeni Tüzüğü." Resmî Gazete 23515 (6 Nov. 1998).
- Türk Uzakyol Gemi Kaptanları Derneği. "Boğazlar ve Marmara'da Trafik Ayrım Düzeni Önerisi." Unpublished report.

SECTION 8

2001-2006

Turkey in the Chaotic Aftermath of 9/11

Table 8-1. The Administration of the Period 2001–2006

| RESIDENTS   | GOVERNMENTS  | MINISTERS OFFOREIGN AFFAIRS                     | SECRETARIES-GENERAL OF MFA                   |  |
|---|--|---|--|--|
|   | Fifth Ecevit GovernmentDSP-MHP-ANAP                          | İsmail Cem(30 June 1997–11 July 2002)       | Faruk Loğoğlu(1 Apr. 2000–24 Sept. 2001) |  |
|   | (28 May 1999–18 Nov. 2002)                                   | Şükrü Sina Gürel(12 July 2002–18 Nov. 2002) |  |  |
| Ahmet Necdet Sezer16 May 2000–28 Aug. 2007) | Gül GovernmentAKP(18 Nov. 2002–14 Mar. 2003)         | Yaşar Yakış(18 Nov. 2002–14 Mar. 2003)      | Uğur Ziyal(1 Oct. 2001-28 Nov. 2004)     |  |
|   | First Erdoğan GovernmentAKP(14 Mar. 200328 Aug 2007) | Abdullah Gül(14 Mar. 2003–28 Aug. 2007)     | Ali Tuygan(1 Dec. 2004–2 Dec. 2006)      |  |
| Abdullah Gül(28 Aug. 2007)                      | Second Erdoğan GovernmentAKP(29 Aug. 2007)               | Ali Babacan(29 Aug. 2007–2 May 2009)        | Ertuğrul Apakan(2 Dec. 2006–6 Aug. 2009) |  |

AKP (Adalet ve Kalkınma Partisi): Justice and Development Party.
ANAP (Anavatan Partisi): Motherland Party.
DSP (Demokratik Sol Parti): Democratic Left Party.
MHP (Milliyetçi Hareket Partisi): Nationalist Action Party.
(Table by Atay Akdevelioğlu)

The International Environment and Dynamics

The events of "9/11" heralded a new period in global politics. This period witnessed the efforts of the U.S. to establish a unipolar world where it would set all the rules. At that time, the EU was engaged in adapting itself to the changes brought about by expansion. The Russian Federation was still in the process of recuperation after the collapse of the USSR. In East Asia, China was busy trying to reconcile its regime with rapid economic growth.

I. THE EVENTS OF 11 SEPTEMBER 2001 AND U.S. HEGEMONY

There are differing views about the origins of U.S. hegemony.

One view is that this hegemony was established after World War II and that the U.S. has been in decline ever since the 1970s. Its present bellicosity is a consequence of the effort to arrest the ongoing decline. Another view holds that during the Cold War the USSR balanced the U.S. in the political and especially the military sphere for nearly half a century, allowing the U.S. to exercise its supremacy only in the economic and cultural spheres. According to this view, it was only after the collapse of the USSR that the U.S. emerged as a true hegemon or at least got seriously involved in establishing its hegemony.

This book is not a treatise on the theories of international political relations. It only seeks to place Turkey's foreign policy in its proper context by relying on these theories. Consequently, we are interested in these differing viewpoints for only one reason. As explained in the introduction, Turkey is a "strategic medium-sized power." States in this category do not like to see a single power dominating the region where they happen to be located. This is especially true for countries with fragile economies. Otherwise, they run the risk of losing their relative autonomy of action and becoming the outpost of the hegemonic power. To cite the example of the Ottoman Empire, this state was able to use the balancing power of Russia, France, and especially Germany to extend its life by about a full century at a time when England was the hegemonic power. Consequently, the important issue for Turkey is not the exact time when the U.S. hegemony was established, developed, and went into decline. These are debatable issues that are relatively theoretical. For Turkey, the real issue is whether there was a balance of power in the region of the Middle East, the Caucasus, and the Balkan Peninsula and when the present situation came about.

This balance existed at the time of the USSR, particularly during the 1970s. With the disintegration of the USSR, the balance came to an end, because no other country had the military power to match the U.S. This was crucial for Turkey. That is why we must examine the post-9/11 period when the U.S. sought to impose its global hegemony through forceful means and consider Turkey's foreign policy from this angle.

The U.S. entered this course by taking advantage of the events of 9/11, because it was the country benefiting most from globalization and because it was indisputably the strongest military power. At this point the U.S. did not possess economic supremacy (which is still the case), the most important of the three factors necessary to become a hegemonic power. This will be explained in detail when discussing the invasion of Iraq below. To cite an example, the EU as a whole had an economy that was larger than the U.S. economy. Japan and some East Asian countries were giving their U.S. competitors a hard time in many sectors. The U.S. was also on shaky ground politically, because its policy of occupation of Iraq lacked legitimacy. The occupation was based solely on certain allegations that were proven to be groundless within a year. The policy was supported by the horrors of 9/11, which were kept fresh in minds by the U.S. media. At any rate, although the U.S. possessed the means to pursue the operations in Afghanistan and Iraq single-handedly, it found itself unable to do so, pressing its strategic ally Britain and a large number of other countries to contribute to the operations, even if their contributions were often at a symbolic level.

The George W. Bush administration went about establishing and reinforcing its Pax Americana above all through U.S. military might, which was greater than that of its closest rival by a wide margin. But it is appropriate to separate this process into military means (that is, occupation) and other means.

A. The U.S. Occupation of Afghanistan and Iraq

The "post-9/11" era will probably be regarded not only as an important period of the "post-Cold War" world but as a distinct period of world history.

Actually, the supremacy of the U.S. in the new order was also beyond dispute during the Clinton administration, which lasted for two terms from 1993 to 2000. Clinton exercised this supremacy by means that did not cause hostility toward the U.S., however, and did not alienate countries. His policies of "humanitarian intervention" in Somalia, Bosnia, and Kosovo were based on multilateralism, close consultation with allies, and a stress on political legitimacy. Even when bombing Sudan and Afghanistan following the attack on the U.S. Embassy in Kenya, or Iraq when it expelled the U.N. weapon inspectors, the U.S. kept the concept of international legitimacy in sight. In Bosnia and Kosovo the U.S. had the backing of Islamic states for defending Muslims against Serbian aggression.

Even then, however, presidential advisor Anthony Lake came up with the concept of "rogue states," which meant that countries like North Korea, Iraq, Sudan, and Iran that opposed the U.S. had to be introduced to democracy. At the same time, a group of conservatives known as the neo-cons, operating under the banner of the "new American Century," was preparing the intellectual ground for the U.S. to become the undisputed hegemon. As explained in the assessment of the period from 1990 to 2001, Francis Fukuyama had already proclaimed the final global victory of the American system in 1989, and Samuel Huntington was presenting Islam in 1993 as the new enemy to compensate for the disappearance of communism as an adversary.

Even before efforts were made to put these ideas into practice, during the term of Clinton's predecessor, George H.W. Bush, who served from 1989 to 1992, the Defense Department had issued a report in 1992 stating that the U.S. political and military goal was to prevent the emergence of any possible rival to America. The report was not implemented at the time, but it demonstrated that the hegemonic power had studied its history lesson and was determined to make history (see Box Intro-3 in the Introduction).

After George W. Bush prevailed in the contested election of November 2000, the neo-cons were able to put their ideas into practice. At a time when the USSR had dissolved, Bush announced that the "Star Wars" project of former president Ronald Reagan (1981 to 1988) would be revived. The Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty with the Russian Federation was terminated. The concept of rogue states was developed with the addition of the "axis of evil." Countries that did not support U.S. policies such as Iraq, Iran, Syria, North Korea, and Yemen were proclaimed to be America's enemies. This was followed by the concept of failed states. But no enforcement measures were taken against them by Bush because, with the end of the Communist threat, no purpose would be served by such action.

The brazen act of terrorism that occurred on 11 September 2001 transformed everything. The atmosphere of profound fear that gripped the whole U.S. after this unexpected act of aggression was so great that Bush was reelected for a second term in 2004, notwithstanding the failure of the Iraq mission.

In this post-9/11 atmosphere, it was announced that Osama Bin Laden had been given sanctuary in Afghanistan by the Taliban, a group that had attracted the world's odium by destroying the ancient statues of Buddha. The neo-cons were determined to attack. This would help to appease the anger of Americans while providing a new chapter for the Law of Intervention that the U.S. had been seeking to put into place ever since the Gulf War of 1991. Afghanistan was occupied following an aerial bombing campaign that began on 7 October 2001 and was placed under the control of an international force. For the first time, NATO invoked article 5 of the Washington Treaty in reaction to 9/11, when the U.S. declared that it had come under attack and appealed to its allies to render all possible assistance. When Turkey sought to follow a similar course in connection with the PKK, it failed to obtain satisfaction. After the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) came into being and was placed under NATO control in August 2003, NATO undertook its firstever mission beyond the Euro-Atlantic region.

Terrorism was identified as the most serious threat in the New National Security Document released in September 2002. To combat terrorism the U.S. would carry out "preemptive war." This meant that, even before there was an imminent threat, the U.S. would strike without delay if the possibility of a future threat of terrorism was perceived.

The Patriot Act was adopted in this atmosphere, including provisions that allowed information to be gathered, such as who was reading which books and magazines in libraries across the U.S. At the same time, a Department of Homeland Security was established. Detainees were sent to the U.S. base of Guantanamo in Cuba, where they were held under inhuman conditions and without any legal protection. Detainees who could not be tortured in the U.S. were later shipped off in CIA planes to countries where torture was a regular part of police interrogation. This practice, known as extraordinary rendition, created a great stir in Europe when it came to light. In September 2006 President Bush admitted publicly that there were secret CIA prisons in a number of countries.

Even as the attack on Afghanistan was being carried out, the Bush administration made ready to attack Iraq and gave signs that Iraq would be followed by the other countries designated as belonging to the "axis of evil." It was proclaimed that the war against international terror would be a long-term affair. The void left by the demise of communism as the adversary of the U.S. would now be filled by international terrorism, drawing its source from Islam. In these circumstances, the Bush administration launched a campaign for world domination, based on securing U.S. economic interests through military action. This policy came to be known as the New Imperialism.

After Bush declared that Iraq was a part of the axis of evil in February 2002, the occupation of that country began on 20 March 2003 with Operation Shock and Awe. This operation left Iraq shattered and divided. U.S. secretary of defense Donald Rumsfeld described some countries, led by France and Germany, as forming part of Old Europe, while forcing the countries of Eastern Europe to side with its policies, causing a rift within the ranks of the EU.

The ostensible reason for the attack on Iraq was that Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction and was collaborating with al-Qaeda. All of the international search efforts following the occupation failed to yield any evidence of the existence of weapons of mass destruction. Eventually, the U.S. was forced to admit this and blamed George Tenet, the director of the CIA, for a lapse in intelligence gathering. The second pretext was also not sustainable, given that Saddam had never allowed al-Qaeda to operate in Iraq. It was essential for the U.S. to attack Iraq, however, in order to pursue its new policy not just in the Middle East but throughout the world. The attack on Iraq was based on the following reasons.

The Psychological and Sociopsychological Reason The psychological reason had to do with President Bush's state of mind. Having adhered to a form of fundamentalist Christianity with close links to Judaism in order to overcome a drinking problem, Bush began to see himself as the world's savior. This state of mind suited the neo-cons perfectly.

In regard to the aspect of social psychology, the U.S. public felt traumatized by a fear approaching panic after the events of 9/11. The same mass terror psychology was seen in the U.S. during the McCarthy era of the late 1940s and early 1950s (see "Appraisal of the Period" in Section 4). That terror had been induced from the top. This time, although encouraged by the administration, the roots of the terror psychology were firmly embedded among the U.S. public.

Furthermore, consciously or subconsciously, Americans felt humiliated. For the first time in its history, the U.S. was being hit in a most sensitive place by its own aircraft. Moreover, the attack had been planned by terrorists that had been trained and nurtured by the U.S. itself in the 1980s in order to strike at the USSR in Afghanistan.

Having been led to believe in the blessings of the American Dream, the U.S. public had inherited the hubris of nineteenth-century British and French imperialism following the failure of the USSR. At a time when they were savoring the feeling of pride that comes with global domination, Americans had been stricken by a disaster coming out of the sky. This was more than enough for many Americans to give unquestioning support to the policies of the neo-cons.

The Economic and Systemic Reasons

For a good number of years, the U.S. economy had been facing difficulties. The markets were depressed, and the Federal Reserve had to lower the interest rate thirteen times. The interest rate had dropped from 7% in 2000 to 1.25% in 2003. Taxes were also lowered, but these measures failed to turn the economy around. In fact, the expectation of further decreases in prices reduced demand, causing prices to fall further. With competition from low-priced Chinese products, U.S. producers were under the pressure of declining profits and slow growth prospects. This led to further widening of the trade deficit and ever-increasing current account deficits. These developments were also a by-product of cheap credit facilities induced by excess liquidity in the economy. At a time when taxes were being cut, the military interventions in Afghanistan and Iraq following 9/11 were causing the budget deficit to rise at an accelerating rate. In these conditions, capital movements began to shift toward speculation, with investments based on irrational as well as rational expectations. This in turn led to scandals like the Enron affair.

Furthermore, the U.S. was used to registering a foreign trade gap of roughly $150 billion every year; but because the U.S. was able to attract about $200 billion of foreign investments every year, this trade gap was sustainable. As foreign investments dwindled after 9/11, however, the huge trade gap started causing concern. There was a diminution of funds coming in particular from the Middle East due to fear of having these funds frozen by the U.S. government. The budget, which had shown a surplus during the Clinton administration, registered a deficit of $374 billion in 2003, when the trade deficit reached $489.4 billion. The total debt passed the $7 trillion mark. The trade gap climbed to $782 billion in 2005, and the U.S. trade deficit was $856.6 billion in 2006. This annual figure represented 6.5% of the U.S. gross domestic product in 2006, up from 6.4% in 2005 (BBC News, 14 March 2007). The Congressional Budget Office estimated that the federal budget deficit would attain $1.7 trillion over the next ten years. If the tax decreases were maintained, the deficit was expected to double (Washington Post, 17 August 2006).

For the Bush administration, the way to revive the economy was through Keynesian policies of a military sort. In other words, instead of having people dig ditches and then refill them, they would produce missiles and launch them. The top figures in the administration had come from the oil, automotive, or defense industries, which had a lot to do with the adoption of this policy. A number of examples can be cited. Vice-president Dick Cheney came from Halliburton; Condoleezza Rice, the presidential advisor who would later become secretary of state, from Chevron; Don Evans, the secretary of commerce, who had been in charge of the president's election campaign, from Sharp Drilling; and Donald Rumsfeld, the secretary of defense, from ABB (Asea Brown Boveri, Ltd.). All of the companies were related to the oil or defense industries or to both.

The Bush administration expected to derive two economic benefits from the war with Iraq. The price per barrel of crude oil produced by U.S. companies was expected to fall to $20, while in February and March 2003 this price was above $30 and was expected to rise drastically due to economic development in China and India. This would help revive the economy, and the defense industries would serve as a driving force for the other industries. Actually, the attack on Iraq was indirectly a war for oil. In addition to ensuring its own supplies of oil through control of Middle Eastern oil, the U.S. also wanted to squeeze its competitors, the EU and Japan, as well as the rising economic powers like China and India. All of them were dependent on Middle Eastern oil for meeting over 85% of their requirements. But the unexpected resistance of the Shia and the insurgency that resulted from the U.S. occupation of Iraq were to confound these calculations.

The Strategic Reason

The Bush administration was prepared to face the wrath of the masses on a global scale because it was pursuing the colossal goal of attaining permanent global hegemony. Because it was aware that a rival would emerge to challenge its hegemony at some point, it was determined to act as a "cycle breaker" to prevent this eventuality.

Both Iraq and the U.S. suffered from the occupation. Iraq lost because it was submerged in the chaos of civil war with no end in sight. The only success registered by the U.S. was getting rid of Saddam. It also succeeded for a while, thanks to the media, in hiding the true state of affairs from its own people. The lessons of allowing the public to see what was happening in Vietnam had obviously been learned. In all other respects, the U.S. was a loser. Once the war was ended, the U.S. found itself powerless, having lost control in Iraq. It could only attempt to have the soldiers and police of the Iraqi Civil Administration be killed in place of its own military personnel. This demonstrated that Iraq conformed to the Vietnamese pattern. Another effect was the massive loss of international prestige suffered by the U.S. because of the torture and sexual harassment that took place at the Abu Ghraib prison. This led to the announcement by Washington in August 2006 that the prison would be closed down. Then there was the unexpected rise in the price of oil to over $77 per barrel at one point, with its dire effects on the U.S. economy. (In July 2008 it was over $140.) Finally, perhaps the most telling adverse effect of the war was the tsunami-like rise in anti-Americanism on a global scale. This rise may have prepared the ground for terrorism to continue to rise in succeeding generations.

As a result of these negative developments, shortly after the invasion, the symbolic forces of America's allies in the coalition began to be withdrawn in 2004. UN secretary-general Kofi Annan described the occupation as illegal. In May 2006 the UN's Committee on the Prevention of Torture placed the U.S. on the list of countries that practiced torture.

The only winners in this situation were the Iraqi Kurds. A de facto state of Kurdistan, dependent on the U.S., had come into being even if it did not have a recognized legal status. This would have serious implications for Turkey in both its domestic and its foreign policies.

B. The Other Means for the Pursuit of U.S. Hegemony

The occupation of Iraq was the first step toward achieving unchallenged hegemony. Other means were also being employed to achieve this goal, however.

The Greater Middle East Project (GMEP)

The project included the swath of predominantly Muslim countries stretching from the Maghreb states all the way into Afghanistan. Its main objective was to open up these lands to the global economy in accordance with rules set up by the U.S. The project was to be implemented with the help of Israel and Turkey, while Syria and especially Iran were to be excluded.

At the G-8 summit of June 2004, the U.S. proclaimed its "Greater Middle East and North Africa Initiative" and announced that democracy should be introduced into the region. The reason for this change in policy was that the cooperation with authoritarian regimes in this area that had proved useful during the Cold War was no longer producing the desired results. It was becoming harder to control the opposition of the masses to these regimes and their U.S. backers. This became very apparent after the Islamic Revolution in Iran in 1979.

By "bringing democracy" it would be possible to deflect the public's anger toward the U.S. into relatively more democratic channels, while the regimes not under U.S. control (like those in Damascus, Baghdad, and Tripoli) would be overthrown. Obviously, it was possible that the successor regimes might put their national interests ahead of their relations with the U.S. But it was very likely that, as globalization progressed at an accelerating pace, the new regimes would improve their relations with the U.S. in order to keep their economies functioning smoothly.

The first country to submit to the pressure was Libya. In February 2004 it acknowledged its responsibility for the Lockerbie air disaster of 1988 and agreed to pay compensation to the victims. In May 2004 sanctions that were mostly economic were imposed on Syria for supporting terrorism, developing weapons of mass destruction, and destabilizing Iraq. In April 2005 Syria was forced to remove all of its troops from Lebanon.

In February 2005 local elections were held in Saudi Arabia, which announced that women might also be allowed to vote in the next election. In May 2005 Kuwaiti women were granted the right to vote and to be elected and a woman became a cabinet minister in charge of planning. Although these were preliminary timid steps, they were part of a long-term project that would yield fruits in the future. This project would create a middle class or bourgeoisie by supporting small-scale entrepreneurs with microcredits. It would also help in reinforcing nongovernmental organizations and civil society.

Naturally, intellectuals stemming from the lower bourgeoisie were likely to adopt anti-U.S. positions. But it can be presumed that Washington saw this as a preferable alternative to terrorism; in any case, it assumed that these intellectuals would mellow over time as they were increasingly exposed to globalization.

Resorting to force was a main pillar of the neo-cons' ideology, so it was inevitable that developments in the Middle East would lead to a violent outcome. In July 2004 Israel initiated the construction of a wall, similar to the former Berlin Wall, that would isolate the Palestinians. The UN General Assembly responded with a resolution that expressed disapproval of Israel's action, while the International Court of Justice declared the wall to be in contravention of international law. All of this did not prevent the U.S. from continuing to give Israel its unconditional support. The U.S. forced a suspension of financial assistance to the Palestinian Authority when Hamas came to power following an election. The U.S. subsequently supported the invasion of Lebanon by Israel, ostensibly to punish Hezbollah. This action led to widespread destruction in Lebanon and many deaths among innocent civilians. The call for a cease-fire was delayed for as long as possible; and even after the cease-fire the U.S. allowed Israel to pursue its armed action. All criticism directed at Israel was immediately branded as anti-Semitism.

The world was united in condemning Israel's action, with even the opposition in Israel and the ultra-Orthodox American Jews protesting the war. It was pointed out that the objective of the invasion of Lebanon was not the destruction of Hezbollah, which had been in existence for many years. The real target was Iran, which had been challenging U.S. hegemony in the Middle East by declaring that it would not end its research activities in the field of nuclear energy. Meanwhile the U.S. tolerated the action of North Korea, which announced in December 2002 that it was reactivating its nuclear program, which had been suspended since 1994. North Korea also withdrew from the Non-Proliferation Treaty in January 2003, declared that it would manufacture nuclear weapons in June 2003, and announced that it possessed such weapons in February 2005.

It is difficult to reconcile the prison conditions of Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib and the mass killings in Lebanon with the concepts of democracy and human rights that represented the superstructure of globalization in the 1990s. The toppling of the Salvador Allende regime that had come to power in Chile through elections was explained with the logic of the Cold War. It would not be so easy to explain the grounds for the economic strangulation of Hamas, however, which had come to power through elections and had renounced terror.

Eventually it became obvious that in the neo-con vocabulary "bringing democracy" stood for "aggression and occupation." Although increasing numbers of Americans realized this and expressed their disapproval, the real power centers seemed confident that such reactions would be tamed in time by the "system."

Efforts to Take Control of Eurasia

Although Russia appeared weak at the moment, the main American objective in Eurasia was to keep Russia under control so that it would not emerge as a potential rival. The method used for this was preventing the neighboring countries from becoming dependent on Russia by securing outlets for their energy resources through friendly countries like Turkey. At the same time, the U.S. was busy in detaching the countries of Eastern Europe from Russia by means of "multicolored" revolutions even as it established military bases on the territories of the former allies of the USSR.

The multicolored revolutions broke out under the influence of the U.S. When the Revolution of Roses got started in Georgia, it went unnoticed. The neighbors, including even Russia itself, made cooperative efforts in order to prevent bloodshed. It emerged subsequently that the Georgian dissidents had been in the former Yugoslavia to be trained in the art of making revolutions by American NGOs and most notably by the Soros Foundation. That is why, when it became Ukraine's turn, Russia stood firmly against the revolutionaries. This time the EU was backing the U.S., however, and Russia was forced to give way.

Notwithstanding the U.S. efforts, this process did not spread into the countries east of the Caspian Sea, because there were practically no civil society organizations in this region. If everything had proceeded according to the neocon plans, at some point the Greater Middle East Project would have merged with the Wider Black Sea Project. But the sequence of multicolored revolutions was derailed and the Greater Middle East Project proved to be a failure. At this point, Turkey began to perceive the looming U.S. hegemony in the Black Sea as a threat and started to cooperate with Russia, as we shall see below. In these circumstances the U.S. was forced to put its Black Sea plans on hold, at least for the time being.

The Use of International Organizations as Tools

U.S. deputy secretary of defense Paul Wolfowitz was appointed president of the World Bank, a sister organization of the IMF, where U.S. influence is preponderant. The Bush administration was set on broadening its world hegemony. For this it reinforced NATO, which had been established to check the USSR, even though the USSR was no longer on the scene. In March 2004 the membership of NATO was expanded to twenty-six, with the admission of Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Bulgaria, Slovenia, and Slovakia. As mentioned earlier, NATO would assume the command of the international force in Afghanistan in August 2003.

Meanwhile the U.S. was working on drawing Russia into its system by declaring in May 2002 that henceforth it would be a "limited partner" of NATO and would participate in its decision-making process but without the veto. The U.S. sought to press Russia in the Black Sea region, however, by concluding agreements with Romania in December 2005 and with Bulgaria in July 2006 to establish military bases on their territories. Against this move, Russia began to implement the pipeline project to ship its oil to world markets through Bulgaria and Greece.

As a result of these policies the U.S. has become such an unrivaled power in world politics that it is now impossible to examine international developments separately under the rubrics of "international developments" and "regional developments," as in previous sections.

c. Reactions to Bush's Policies

Although it was impossible to check Bush's policies (conceived by the neo-cons) by military means, there was much popular and political opposition to these policies.

Domestic Opposition

Having been terrified by events and kept jittery by the media, Americans gave strong backing to the Bush administration and granted him a second term as president. But a number of factors led to increased opposition among the public. First, the legitimacy of the Iraqi adventure was always perceived as somewhat doubtful. In addition there were the revelations about sexual depravity and torture in prisons and the growing number of casualties among U.S. military personnel. Then it became public that the CIA had fabricated the grounds (possession of weapons of mass destruction and so forth) advanced by the administration to justify the invasion of Iraq. The public disaffection was made worse by the rising price of oil during Bush's second term.

In June 2004 the U.S. Supreme Count ruled that detainees in Guantanamo suspected of terrorism had a right to a trial, where they would be charged and where they could properly defend themselves. Film director Michael Moore produced Fahrenheit 9/11, which revealed how the neo-cons used the attacks of 9/11 as a pretext for carrying out their plans that had been drawn much earlier. This film received the highest award at the Cannes Film Festival. In October 2003 the Iraq Study Group, which worked under the CIA, issued its first report, in which it was admitted that no weapons of mass destruction had been found in Iraq. The group's director, David Kay, also declared that nothing was found to substantiate the alleged link between Iraq and al-Qaeda. Kay resigned in January 2004. In May 2004 U.S. general Antonio Taguba issued his official report, in which he confirmed that sexual harassment and torture were systematically practiced at Abu Ghraib, One of the reasons for invading Iraq advanced by the Bush administration was Saddam's effort to procure uranium concentrate from Niger. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, who had been charged with investigating the affair, reported four months after the invasion got underway that the threat from Iraq had been exaggerated by the Bush administration in order to legitimize the invasion. In response, the fact that his wife worked for the CIA was leaked to the press.

The International Repercussions

International public opinion began to perceive the U.S. as a "terrorist state" for pursuing a foreign policy that took advantage of America's unrivaled position in the world. This policy gave rise to much revulsion among developing countries, especially those with Muslim majorities.

Even before the occupation of Iraq, previous developments were having an effect, with a series of leftist and anti-American governments coming to power in Latin America. In January 2002 Honduras reestablished diplomatic relations with Cuba after a break of forty years. Hugo Chávez returned to power in Venezuela that year following a coup and became a leader of the anti-Bush chorus. Left-leaning Lula da Silva assumed the leadership of Brazil. The first war-crimes court, which the U.S. had opposed, started functioning in July 2002 as the International Criminal Court. Japan joined the Kyoto Protocol (designed to forestall global warming) in June 2002, followed by Russia's signing of the document in November 2004. This caused embarrassment to Bush, who in 2001 had withdrawn from the protocol, a document that had been signed by his father back in 1992.

The anti-American wave gathered momentum following the occupation of Iraq. The antiglobalization movement selected the U.S. as its main target. As a result of the dollar's fall in value, some countries shifted their foreign exchange reserves to the euro and began to quote the price of oil in that currency. When it became known that the CIA was using European airports to move radical fundamentalists to face interrogation and possible torture in third countries, there was much anger in Europe. Condoleezza Rice, the secretary of state, was forced to visit these countries in order to contain the damage. In 2004 Spain, Honduras, the Dominican Republic, and the Philippines withdrew from the coalition and repatriated their troops from Iraq. In August 2004 the Supreme Court of Chile lifted the immunity from prosecution of the former dictator Augusto Pinochet. He was placed under house arrest in November 2005 for tax evasion and murdering his opponents. In October 2005 the socialist Tabare Vázquez was elected president in Uruguay. In December 2005 the leftist Evo Morales, an adversary of the U.S., was elected president in Bolivia. The Iraq Court held its final sitting in İstanbul. The Global and European Social Forums that opposed globalization held their meetings.

In this atmosphere, the U.S. was even held responsible for the tsunami disaster in Southeast Asia in gossip that circulated on the Internet.

II. DEVELOPMENTS IN THE EUROPEAN UNION

In addition to being a candidate for accession to the European Union, Turkey was greatly concerned with developments in the EU for the following reasons.

- 1. The main thrust of Turkey's foreign policy had always been in the direction of the West and particularly Europe. This relationship was expected to lead to eventual membership in the EU. Any development or change in the EU was bound to affect Turkey's candidacy.
- 2. There was no alternative to the U.S.; but given that the Russian Federation was engrossed in its own affairs, the likeliest possible challenger of the U.S. was the EU. As the EU gathered strength, Turkey would be able to breathe easier in the new balance that might thus be established.
- 3. Both the U.S. and Europe represented the "West"; but after 9/11 the U.S. veered sharply away from Western values. Guantanamo, Abu Ghraib, the Patriot Act, and the extrajudicial pressures on foreign nationals and even on U.S. citizens can be cited as examples of this veering away. These developments increased the importance of the EU for Turkey, which had been seeking modernization by adopting Western values ever since the reform period of the Tanzimat in the nineteenth century. This modernization effort became more systematic with Atatürk's reforms.

The EU went through at least three critical changes during this period.

1. Deepening: on 1 January 2002 twelve EU members undertook the most significant currency change ever attempted and adopted the euro as their single currency. Britain, which led the countries supporting U.S. policies, stayed out of this arrangement. The Constitutional Treaty, designed to provide a true legal framework for the Union, was shelved following its rejection by France in May 2005 and the Netherlands in June. The EU had entered a slack period in its integration and deepening process.

This signified that the relief and room for maneuver that Turkey expected from the EU's development as a challenger to the U.S. on the world scene had been postponed indefinitely.

2. Expansion: despite this setback, ten new members joined on 1 May 2004, thus raising the EU's membership to twenty-five. The new members were Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Malta, Poland, Slovakia, Slovenia, and the Republic of Cyprus. With this wave, the EU's population reached 450 million. Bulgaria and Romania were due to join in 2007.

This was a negative development from a Turkish point of view, because it raised the number of countries that had to consent to Turkey's membership. The new membership of the Republic of Cyprus would also pose serious problems for Turkey. The bill for admitting the new members was such that Turkey's membership could not be contemplated before about 2015.

3. Cleavage: the U.S. attack on Iraq caused a split within the ranks of the EU. France and Germany did not join the U.S.-led coalition. The former Communist countries of Eastern Europe probably felt that the EU would not be able to protect them from Russia despite their membership in the EU and chose to remain on friendly terms with the U.S. by following the superpower's lead. At first, even Italy and Spain took this course. From Turkey's perspective, this development led to two contrary results.

The first was that the EU's progressive strengthening had been checked: as a middle-sized strategic power, Turkey would find it harder to pursue a balancing act.

The second development involved the EU's lack of a military dimension, with no prospect for changing this situation in the foreseeable future. After 9/11 and the occupation of Iraq, it became apparent that the EU stood in need of a country with Turkey's strategic assets. This was articulated by the EU commissioner in charge of expansion, who declared in May 2003: "In the light of the developments in the crisis region, I consider it useful to include a secular and Muslim country in the EU" (Radikal, 8 May 2003). During 2003 and 2004 EU statesmen like Eneko Landaburu, Silvio Berlusconi, Joschka Fischer, Martin Schulz, Jack Straw, and Dominique de Villepin declared that Europe needed a military dimension, that this could only occur with the accession of Turkey, and that such a step would also help in cementing relations with Islam.

After 2004, however, these commonsense statements coming from the leadership of the EU began to dwindle, as the rising Islamophobia in European public opinion replaced the rational thinking of the leaders. Now there was an aversion toward all things Islamic. Obviously, this was also a very negative development for Turkey. Some of the changes occurring in Europe bordered on the irrational. For example, in January 2006 the municipality of one of the world's most cosmopolitan and civilized cities, Rotterdam, issued a "Code of Conduct" designed "to foster integration." It stated that people were disturbed to hear foreign languages in the streets and issued the following directive: "The burghers of Rotterdam shall henceforth use the common language, which happens to be Dutch" (Deutsche Welle, 25 January 2006).

If the level of paranoia can attain such heights in the Netherlands, it can be imagined how high the level was in Turkey. At about the same time, being prey to the fears described below in the subsection on "Politics," Turkey stopped the process of reform that came in the shape of EU Harmonization Packages. This, in turn, created tensions between Turkey and the EU.

The Domestic Environment and Dynamics

THE ECONOMY

A Catalogue of Weaknesses

As we have already seen, after 1990 the Turkish economy was restructured to integrate it fully with the infrastructure of globalization (that is, international capitalism). This was a Turkey that had not yet been able to complete its basic capital accumulation. Because of this, Turkey faced increasing ills, such as a large informal economy, corruption, smuggling, and especially tax evasion. At the same time, the whole economy, including in particular the central government's consolidated budget, had become utterly dependent on ever-increasing domestic and foreign borrowing to function. This led to vulnerabilities, which shook the economy at the slightest hint of political difficulty. To cite an example, it will be recalled that an argument between President Sezer and Prime Minister Ecevit at a meeting of the National Security Council in early 2001 led to the collapse of the Istanbul Stock Market and the repatriation of more than $6 billion in foreign-owned funds in just one week (see "The Domestic Environment and Dynamics" in Section 7). This led to a sharp devaluation of the Turkish currency and a serious slump in the economy.

In the course of adjusting to international market conditions, a dysfunctional and precarious economy that had not yet made the transition to a proper capitalist order was bound to run into severe turbulence in the 2000s.

The Bank Scandal

The Bank Scandal that occurred in 2000–2001 was much more serious than the Bankers' Scandal involving pyramid schemes that occurred during the Özal period. The Bank Scandal had two main causes. (1) In order to finance populist policies, politicians were resorting not to the treasury but to publicly owned banks to a degree that made their balance sheets unmanageable. The huge losses suffered by these banks forced them to borrow from other banks to manage their day-to-day operations. (2) Private banks had been stripped of their assets by their owners. Among these were former state banks like Etibank, Sümerbank, and others that had been privatized in the course of carrying out structural adjustment.

The origins of this scandal can be traced on one hand to the decision made during the 1994 economic crisis to remove the limit of the guarantee provided by the state for saving accounts deposited in both Turkish lira and foreign exchange and on the other hand to the legal weakness of the banking decree law, due to the Constitutional Court's cancellation of an authorization law that would allow the government to amend the banking legislation by decrees. Because of the unlimited guarantees to bankaccount holders and because these guarantees had been extended to include foreign-exchange accounts, it became necessary for the Savings Accounts Insurance Fund to meet the obligations of the insolvent private banks that were taken over by the fund. Because the fund lacked the necessary resources to settle outstanding claims, however, ultimately it was the treasury that had to foot the bill. The treasury was also forced to cover the accumulated losses incurred by state banks. These were practically as high as the outstanding claims on private banks. In the process, the privatized banks reverted to state ownership. In January 2002 the Law on the Restructuring of the Debts of the Financial Sector came into effect. Through this law, around $10 billion was transferred by the treasury to state banks. By April 2003 the owners of the failed banks had not repaid even 1% of the money they owed the Insurance Fund, but they still kept up their former luxurious lifestyle. In July 2003 a limit of TL 100 billion was set on savings accounts that were covered by insurance in order to appease public opinion. This coverage was subsequently lowered to TL 50 billion in July 2004.

In November 2003 the regulatory board of the banking sector revealed that the losses caused by the banking crisis amounted to a total of $47.2 billion. At that time, Turkey's total foreign indebtedness amounted to $144.3

Table 8-2. Basic Economic Indicators of Turkey, 2001–2006

|          |  |                        |                     |   | :                      |                          |                    |                   |                     | CURRENT              |
|----------|--|------------------------|---------------------|---|------------------------|--------------------------|--------------------|-------------------|---------------------|----------------------|
|          |  | EXCHANGE.              |                     |   | EXPORTS                |                          | IMPORTS            | EXTERNAL          | EXTERNAL            | ACCOUNT              |
| YEAR     | INFLATION(PPI)   | rate*(tl/$)       | GNP(MILLION $) | exports(million $)   | AS %OF GNP         | IMPORTS(MILLION $)  | AS %OF GNP     | DEBT (MILLION $) | DEBT AS %OF GNP | DEFICIT (MILLION $) |
| 2001     | 61.63  | 1,225,412              | 196,736             | 31,334  | 15.93                  | 41,399                   | 21.04              | 113,658           | 57.77               | 3,760                |
| 2002     | 50.11  | 1,505,839              | 230,494             | 36,059  | 15.64                  | 51,554                   | 22.37              | 129,700           | 56.27               | -626                 |
| 2003     | 25.56  | 1,493,068              | 304,901             | 47,253  | 15.50                  | 69,340                   | 22,72              | 144,300           | 47.33               | -7,515               |
| 2004     | 11.09  | 1,422,341              | 390,387             | 63,167  | 16.18                  | 97,540                   | 24.99              | 160,800           | 41.19               | -14,431              |
| 2005     | 5.89   | 1.344                  | 481,497             | 73,476  | 15.26                  | 116,774                  | 24.25              | 168,700           | 35.04               | -22,137              |
| 2006     | 9.34   | 1,435                  | 526,429             | 85,279  | 16.20                  | 137,321                  | 26.51              | 205,500           | 39.04               | -31,893              |
| Jume-Dat | harre Data collected from webwaces of the State Planning Organization. | oes of the State Plans | _                   | Indersecretarist of the Treasury and Statistics Institute of Turkey Ratios calculated by Hikmet Illushay. | ante, and Statistics I | netitute of Turkey Ratio | calculated by Hikm | ot I Iluğhav.     |                     |                      |

Yearly average exchange rates expressed in New Turkish Lira (YTL) after 2004, due to the deletion of six zeros from the value of the Turkish lira on 1 January 200, GNP: Gross National Product; PPI: Producers Price Index; TL: Turkish lira.

billion (Table 8-2). In other words, the total financial burden of the banking crisis amounted to more than a third of Turkey's foreign debts. This burden was the price of populist policies, delay in reenactment of the banking law, and even the corruption that had to be shouldered by state banks, while the media coined a special term to describe the crimes committed in private banks.

Prime Minister Ecevit's Illness

In May 2002 Ecevit was taken ill, but the nature of his affliction never became very clear. When he refused to transfer some of his powers to another cabinet colleague, the precarious balance of the economy became even more apparent. Each time there was a news item about the prime minister's health, this invariably led to a fall in the currency vis-à-vis the dollar, a further fall in stock markets, and a rise in the rate of interest paid by the treasury to domestic lenders. The interest rate jumped to 70% after having fallen to 52% at the end of April. When the treasury borrowed in July, the rate had risen to 79.2%. Standard & Poor's downgraded Turkey's rating from stable to negative. It has been reckoned that Turkey had to pay out an extra $14 billion in the form of interest to its foreign lenders as a result of Ecevit's illness.

The State of the Macro-Economy Hikmet Uluğbay adds the following comments on Table 8-2:

The most striking feature of Table 8-2 is the fact that during this period the GNP climbed from $196,736 million to $526,429 million. The figures indicate that in dollar terms there was an increase amounting to 167.6% in a period of just five years. The explanation for this unusually high rate of growth in the GNP is that the real increase in the value of the Turkish currency during the period accounted for most of this rise.

It will be recalled that in February 2001 the Turkish lira went through a steep devaluation, reaching a level of 1,600,000 to the dollar at one point and then falling back. It was this drastic devaluation of the currency that caused the GNP for 2001 to appear low in dollar terms. Whereas the Central Bank was selling dollars for TL 676,298 on 1 February 2001, on 9 November of that year the dollar had reached TL 1,557,240. This represented a devaluation of the Turkish currency by around 130%. This devaluation was much more drastic than warranted by economic facts; as a result, the market went through a correction. It will be noted in Table 8-2 that, although declining, the producers' price index was still at a very high level. And yet the value of the lira kept on rising against the dollar. The cumulative revaluation of the lira led to the extraordinary rise of 167.6% in the GNP during a period of five years. In real terms, Turkey's GNP went through a contraction of 9.5% in 2001, followed by growths of 7.9, 5.9, 9.9, 7.6, and 6.0% in the years that followed in constant prices.

Another distorting effect of the rise in the value of the Turkish currency during this period was the diminution of the proportion of foreign debts to the GNP. Although Turkey's foreign debts grew from $113,658 million to $205,500 million (corresponding to an increase of 80.8%), the proportion of the external debt to the GNP declined from 57.77% to 39.04%. The distorting effect of the rising value of the TL, which inflated the increase in the GNP as expressed in dollars, was the cause of the falling ratio of debt to GNP.

The rising lira was also responsible for the rising trade gap, which in turn led to a rising balance-of-payments deficit. The overvalued lira caused imports to rise faster than exports. The ratio of exports to imports fell from 75.69% in 2001 to 62.1% in 2006. This deterioration was caused by the rising volume of imports, made even worse by the increased price of crude oil. Whereas Turkey's bill for its imported oil and oil products was $8.3 billion in 2001, the bill in 2006 amounted to $28.6 billion.

Along with the ever-rising trade deficit, the balance-of-payments deficit continued to grow at a rapid pace during this period. Turkey did not run into a foreign exchange shortage, however, despite the large current account deficit. This was due to the picture of stability perceived in domestic and foreign financial circles, thanks to the stand-by agreement reached with the IMF at the end of 1999. This agreement was of great help following the 2001 economic crisis and was renewed by the new government formed by the Justice and Development Party (AKP) after the election of 2002. This period was also one in which there was plentiful international liquidity. The return in dollars on the interest of debts incurred by the treasury in the local market was higher than the returns derived from alternative markets, thanks to the overvalued Turkish currency. This situation led to an increased flow of short- and medium-term funds into Turkey. For the first time, the global economy experienced continued economic growth, even though the price of oil had been rising since 1999, with the rise becoming very sharp in 2005 and 2006. As global liquidity continued to increase during the period, Turkey had no trouble in obtaining funds from international markets.

The surplus liquidity began to be absorbed, however, by the U.S. Central Bank (the Fed) as well as by certain European Central Banks when they raised their discount rates in 2006. This led to an outward flow of funds from emerging markets, a situation that also affected Turkey. In May 2006 the Turkish currency lost up to 20% of its value, with the dollar reaching 1.5 New Turkish Liras in September 2006. But in the following months the New Turkish Lira gained value as a result of rising expectations in world markets, which accelerated a capital flow to Turkey. In April 2006 the value of the dollar was between 1.36 and 1.37 New Turkish Liras.

Uluğbay's summary of economic conditions clearly reveals that after the shock of 2001 the Turkish economy recovered nicely in the following period.

- 1. Turkey continued to grow, even though the growth rates started declining in the following years. In fact, in July 2003 it was revealed that, with a growth of 7.4% in the first quarter, Turkey was second after China in the international growth league (Milliyet, 1 July 2003). Standard & Poor's raised Turkey's credit noting from B- to B and then to B+ in November. Eventually, in August 2004, it was raised again to BB-.
- 2. As interest rates began to fall, the flow of funds into investments would accelerate.
- 3. The persistently high rates of inflation of the past fell to single-digit figures. A new currency was introduced on 1 January 2005 by eliminating 6 zeros from the Turkish lira, facilitating the transactions and accounting practices and bringing much relief to the nation.
- 4. In the context of the adjustments to conform to EU legislation, Turkey began to change its laws regarding transparency and combating corruption. But old habits were harder to change. In June 2002 the leader of the AKP, Tayyip Erdoğan, declared that about half of his fortune came from the valuables presented as gifts at his son's wedding (Cumhuriyet, 12 June 2002). Legislation was also adopted in June by which the rules requiring taxpayers to reveal the sources of their wealth were relaxed. It was decided that the sources of the capital of a company registered prior to 31 December 2002 would not be investigated.

On 1 January 2005 new measures were adopted to promote investments. Corporate taxes were reduced from 33% to 30%, the highest bracket of income tax was lowered by 5 points, and the VAT (Value Added Tax) rate on some products was lowered from 18 to 8%. The retail sale of petroleum products was thrown open to competition. It will be noted that all of these measures were designed to benefit the well-to-do.

- 5. The IMF has continued to provide much support, even if it is with the encouragement of the U.S.
- 6. The structural adjustments that were carried out have begun to yield the intended results. In addition to the short-term, speculative funds, foreign direct investments (FDI) have increased substantially. The treasury bulletins issued in June 2006 revealed that, despite the turbulence in financial markets experienced in May and June, 10,615 foreign firms got established in Turkey in the first half of 2006. In addition there was foreign participation in 2,338 Turkish companies, and 398 foreign companies established branches in Turkey. With the enactment of the Law on Direct Foreign Investments, the number of foreign firms that had set up operations in Turkey over the past fifty years grew by 130% in the three-year period from June 2003 to June 2006. Whereas actual foreign investment (which excludes commitments to invest) amounted to $1.215 billion in the first semester of 2005, this figure rose by 626.6% in the corresponding period of 2006 and reached $8.828 billion.

Furthermore, Turkish companies began to invest abroad. This was an indication that Turkish firms were abandoning the production of low-technology products in order to compete more effectively in international markets. Although this was a welcome move, there was a down side. Because it was necessary to keep real wages low in order to attract more FDI, this would have a depressing effect on wages, which were already much too low.

7. The Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan oil pipeline was completed, contrary to the expectations of many. Similarly, the Blue Stream natural gas pipeline laid on the seabed of the Black Sea from Russia to Turkey came into operation. It is expected that these pipelines will be followed by others to transport energy to Greece, Italy, and Israel via Turkey. This has already increased Turkey's strategic importance as an international energy hub.

Other developments, however, gave rise to serious concerns during the period.

1. The overvalued Turkish currency had a braking effect on exports, while it led to increased imports, causing the trade gap to grow wider.

- 2. This situation led directly to a growing deficit in the current account deficit, signifying that domestic savings were insufficient and consumption was excessive. This in turn led to the need to obtain foreign loans in order to invest as well as for public and private consumption.
- 3. Because of internal migrations, the falling numbers of people engaged in farming, and the rapidly growing number of well-trained youths, it has not been possible to reduce unemployment, despite a growing economy. This could lead to future social upheaval.
- 4. For these reasons, it is not certain that the improvement seen in the economy is sustainable. It is true that the U.S. for strategic reasons needs Turkey to pursue its Middle Eastern policies; hence the IMF has supported Turkey under the prodding of Washington. This has allowed Turkey to service its foreign debts, but at the cost of bringing the economy under the sway of the IMF. The agreement with the IMF signed by the AKP government contains a calendar and goes into such detail that it has practically supplanted the government's program. It is the IMF that determines what items shall be taxed and the direction of employment policy. The IMF instructed the government to "take over Pamukbank and keep Yapı ve Kredi Bankası under surveillance" and (without even waiting for the government to inform the Turkish public about this) issued a statement at its Washington headquarters welcoming the government's bank operation. In one respect, this was a good thing: governments had resorted to the IMF whenever they ran into economic trouble but, once relieved, reverted to their old practices, compounding their structural maladjustments. But from another perspective this was very bad, because it made the economy utterly dependent on external factors. This was bound to influence the country's foreign policy.
  - 5. The volume of debt kept rising.
- 6. Social security was being eroded at an accelerating pace. On 1 January 2007 the law regulating the gradual transition of the pension system to a new setup came into effect. Under the new scheme, the retirement age is being raised and pensions are being reduced. In 2006 the state stopped covering the cost of key medication like cholesterol-reducing drugs, forcing patients to allow their cholesterol levels to reach new highs in order to requalify for free medicines.

To sustain the production and export of industrial products that have been expanding since 2003, it is necessary for the exchange rate, interests, and wages to fall. This is likely to lead to social upheaval in a country like Turkey, where conditions differ markedly from east Asia.

Table 8-3. Structure of External and Domestic Debt, 2001-2006

| YEAR | EXTERNAL DEBT (MILLION $) | MEDIUM- ANDLONG-TERMEXTERNAL DEBT(MILLION $) | SHORT-TERM EXTERNAL DEBT (MILLION $) | SHORT-TERMEXTERNALDEBT AS % OFBXTERNAL DEBT | DOMESTIC DEBT (BILLION YTL) | DOMESTIC DEBT (BILLION $) | domesticdebt as %of gnp | INTEREST PAYMENTS AS % OF TAX REVENUES |
|------|----------------------------|---|---------------------------------------|---|-----------------------------|----------------------------|---------------------------------|--|
| 2001 | 113,658                    | 97,200  | 16,400                                | 14.44   | 122.2                       | 84.9                       | 50.9                            | 103.3                                  |
| 2002 | 129,700                    | 113,200   | 16,400                                | 12.64   | 149.9                       | 91.7                       | 42.8                            | 87.0                                   |
| 2003 | 144,300                    | 121,300   | 23,000                                | 15.94   | 194.9                       | 139.3                      | 42.7                            | 69.5                                   |
| 2004 | 160,800                    | 128,900   | 31,900                                | 19.84   | 224.5                       | 167.3                      | 40.2                            | 62.7                                   |
| 2005 | 168,700                    | 131,600   | 37,100                                | 21.99   | 244.8                       | 182.4                      | 37.7                            | 42.7                                   |
| 2006 | 205,500                    | 165,200   | 40,400                                | 19,66   | 251.5                       | 178.9                      | 33.2                            | 33.4                                   |

Source: Data collected from webpages of the Undersecretariat of the Treasury, Ratios calculated by Hikmet Uluğbay. GNP: Gross National Product; YTL: New Turkish Lira.

(Compiled and interpreted by Hikmet Uluğbay)

The Debt Situation

Hikmet Uluğbay's technical amplification on the state of Turkey's debts (Table 8-3) is as follows:

As the table reveals, the proportion of short-term external debts to total external debts rose rapidly until 2000, when it decreased by two percentage points. With the stability program that was put into effect at the end of 1999 with the financial backing of the IMF and the World Bank, the proportion of short-term external debt to the total external debt had fallen to 12.64% by 2002. It then began to rise again to over 20%, the levels attained prior to the stability program of 1999. In 1993, just before the economic collapse of 1994, this level stood at 27.51%.

Table 8-3 also reveals that the interest payments from the consolidated central budget were falling fast in relation to tax revenues. This was achieved at a time when the treasury's internal debts had grown by slightly over 100%. This was mainly the result of the fall in treasury borrowing rates in the domestic financial market. As explained earlier, substantial funds, both shortand medium-term, were flowing into Turkish financial markets as a consequence of the rises in international liquidity. This situation contributed to decreasing the interest rates for borrowing Turkish liras, making it possible to lower the proportion of tax revenues set aside to pay interest. But this positive development of course depended on the steady flow of foreign resources.

At a time when domestic and international debts were registering substantial real increases, the proportion of interest payments to tax revenues was falling. This did not signify that Turkey had finally overcome its problems. The downward trend could easily be reversed by negative internal or international developments. As a matter of fact, the contraction in international liquidity that took place in the first half of 2006 led to a flight of short-term funds from Turkey, which in turn led to a rise in the interest rate for domestic borrowing.

Uluğbay's analysis demonstrates clearly that the Turkish economy is still very vulnerable and highly sensitive to developments. The growth in the volume of short-term debts has a constraining effect on the country's relative autonomy (see Box 2-1 in Section 2). But the ratio of interest payments on the public debt to tax revenues has improved markedly. This ratio, which stood at 103.3% in 2001, had fallen to 33.4% by 2006. But this too depends on the international business cycle and faces the risk of changing for the worse when conditions deteriorate.

II. POLITICS

At a time when individual freedoms were being curtailed in Europe in the aftermath of 9/11, it would be hard to imagine that nationalism in Turkey, which had always kept individual freedoms under pressure, could be easily contained. As explained earlier, however, Turkey was under the influence of two opposing currents as a consequence of its special relationship with the EU: (1) the reforms being carried out in the area of human rights in the period from 2001 to 2004; and (2) a rise in the level of ethnic Turkish nationalism, starting in the latter part of 2004. This rise of nationalism, which followed a pattern similar to those prevailing elsewhere after 9/11, had the effect of diluting the human rights reforms being carried out.

A. Political Developments

The illness and hospitalization of Prime Minister Ecevit in May 2002 and the absence of an alternate to take over his responsibilities gave rise to serious political turbulence. This in turn led to the decision to hold an early election. In the election that took place on 3 November 2002, the AKP obtained 34% of the vote, giving it 364 seats in the parliament. The rest of the vote was distributed as follows: the CHP got 19.3% with 179 seats, the True Path Party 9.6%, the Nationalist Action Party 8.4%, the Youth Party 7.2%, the Democratic Popular Party 6.3%, and the Motherland Party 5.1%. The minimum number of votes required for representation in parliament being 10%, only the AKP and CHP were represented in parliament, with an additional 9 seats going to independent candidates.

The AKP held enough seats to change the Constitution if it chose to do so. Bülent Arınç of the AKP was elected Speaker of the TGNA, and Abdullah Gül formed the fifty-eighth government. With a minor amendment to the Constitution, the ban on political activity imposed on Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, leader of the AKP, was lifted. The ban had been imposed for an inflammatory speech he made in Siirt on 6 December 1997. With an election held in Siirt on 9 March 2003, Erdoğan won a seat in parliament and formed the fifty-ninth government on 14 March. At the local elections held on 28 March 2004, the AKP was able to increase its vote to 41%.

The newly formed AKP was able to come to power thanks mainly to the support of the rising Anatolian bourgeoisie that had benefited extensively from the credits provided by the publicly owned Halk Bankası during the Özal period. This class was more open to religious ideology, which it used to compete with the higher-level bourgeoisie of İstanbul. The Anatolian bourgeoisie was under the shadow of the İstanbul bourgeoisie until it started engaging directly in the export business and other economic activities. This meant that it would embrace political liberalism, even though it was based in conservative towns and had its roots in the Welfare Party (Refah Partisi: RP), an Islamist party, and its successor, the Virtue Party (Fazilet Partisi: FP).

This is why, once in power, the AKP actively pushed through the reform packages called for by the EU and already initiated by Ecevit's coalition government. New legislation was adopted that would not normally be expected from a party that was being described as Islamist. This new legislation in areas such as privatization, promotion of foreign investments, human rights, and democracy was in line with both the infrastructure and superstructure of globalization. During this period much progress was made in the field of human rights, an area that had been a major hurdle in Turkey's accession road to the EU. But the AKP was operating in an environment in which it felt, on one hand, the constant pressure coming from secular institutions (particularly the army) and, on the other hand, the need to satisfy its religiously inclined constituents. The AKP was also failing to tackle the corruption in its own ranks effectively. Taking advantage of these difficulties, the opposition was busy undermining the democratization measures being pushed by the AKP.

Some circles labeled the government's efforts as insincere and deceptive and alleged that they were designed to pave the way for Islamism to take over. But, as indicated above, the AKP depended on the newly emerging Anatolian bourgeoisie that was opening up to the international trade, all the while respecting Islamic practice. This being so, it was not under the constraints of the nationalism of the 1920s and 1930s and was therefore capable of pursuing alternative policies and overturning long-standing taboos.

The AKP pursued a rational line until about the end of 2004. The refusal of the European Court of Human Rights to consider Leyla Şahin's application to wear the Islamic head scarf, however, led to political tensions that drove the AKP to abandon its conciliatory line. The AKP was also coming under the influence of rising ethnic Turkish nationalism and beginning to sound like the CHP and the MHP in its rhetoric. As a consequence, the reform process slowed to a crawl.

B. The EU Reforms

Examining the reform process that began with the amendments to the Constitution in 2001 before we take up the subject of human rights will be useful in order to provide the intellectual background against which Turkey's important issues are being addressed. This will also make it easier to trace the modernization of the Turkish Republic from a historical perspective.

To date Turkey has gone through two major modernizations. The first phase consisted of the Kemalist reforms of the 1920s and 1930s. This revolution imposed from above was designed to achieve Atatürk's objective of attaining the level of "contemporary civilization." It was also designed to carry out the pledges made at Lausanne to Westernize the country. As a result of this revolution, a semifeudal empire was transformed into a nation-state and the sultan's subjects in the umma society were transformed into citizens.

If the second phase or wave of modernization initiated in the 2000s and designed to prepare the country for accession to the EU achieves its goals, Turkey will make the transition from a nation-state that refuses to recognize the citizen's subidentity or ethnic identity to a democratic state and from a compulsory citizen to a voluntary citizen.

Following the confirmation of Turkey's candidacy at the Helsinki EU Summit of December 1999, the Accession Partnership Document (APD) was issued in December of the following year. In March 2001 Turkey issued its National Program, containing the reforms that it pledged to carry out. After this the TGNA decided to call early elections and enacted a number of reform packages.

The Constitutional Reform of October 2001

Historically, constitutions have developed to protect citizens from the state. The Constitution of 1982, however, commissioned by the coup of September 1980, sought to "protect the state from citizens." In the process of reform, 34 articles out of a total of 177 articles of the Constitution were amended. Among these were the amendments that reinforced freedom of expression and amendments making it more difficult to restrict fundamental rights and freedoms. The concept of "proscribed language" was removed altogether. Henceforth it would be easier to form associations and harder to close down political parties. It was confirmed that the decisions of the National Security Council were of an advisory nature.

The EU Harmonization Packages

Eight different EU harmonization packages were adopted. A good number of laws were amended in the course of adopting these packages. We shall examine the amendments that relate directly to the subject of this book.

The First Package (adopted on 6 February 2002): article 312 of the Turkish Penal Code (TPC), corresponding to article 216 of the reformed TPC, was amended to extend freedom of expression to cover speeches that did not incite violence and did not constitute a tangible danger. A phrase was added to the article prohibiting statements that "humiliated a part of the population or insulted it in a manner that would offend human dignity." This was designed to protect disadvantaged groups. Detention terms were shortened as well as the terms for banning publications. Henceforth the next-of-kin of detainees would have to be notified of their detention.

The UN's twin covenants of 1966 were ratified by Turkey on 4 June 2003. Article 20 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights kept outside of the framework of freedom of expression "[a]ny propaganda for war" and "[a]ny advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence."

This provided the legal basis for penalizing those involved in making hate speeches in Turkey by excluding such activities from the protection afforded to freedom of expression.

The Second Package (adopted on 26 March 2002): formerly, the Law on Associations had not allowed the establishment of associations "that claimed the existence of minorities or that sought to preserve, develop, or disseminate languages and cultures that were not Turkish." The law was amended to lift this prohibition. Furthermore, the associations were now able to use posters in "languages forbidden by law." It became easier to organize meetings and demonstrations by removing some of the existing restrictions in the legislation governing such activities. In cases where the ECtHR imposed an obligation on the state to pay compensation to torture victims, the state reserved the right to claim this compensation from its agents who were responsible for the crime.

The Third Package (adopted on 3 August 2002): the death penalty was abolished and replaced with a life sentence for all crimes other than terror crimes and those committed in time of war or the threat of imminent war. The ban on the learning of languages and dialects "different from those traditionally employed by Turkish citizens" was lifted. It became possible to broadcast radio and TV programs in these languages. Non-Muslim foundations would be able to acquire real estate with the consent of the Council of Ministers and properties that were in their possession could be formally registered in the land register if they were not already registered. The possibility of having a retrial to comply with ECHR rulings was introduced.

The Fourth Package (adopted on 2 January 2003): a decision was made to enable Non-Muslim foundations to acquire real estate with permission from the Directorate General of Foundations, thus bringing them into line with other foundations. It became possible to prosecute agents of the state for torture without having to go through the procedure of an administrative investigation. Legislation was adopted that forbade the prison sentences imposed on those accused of torture from being converted into fines or postponed. Detainees held in prison had to undergo a medical examination before being interrogated and upon their return to prison after interrogation. The statements obtained from detainees without legal counsel would no longer be accepted as evidence in State Security Courts.

The Fifth Package (adopted on 23 January 2003): retrials would be allowed for those convicted up to that date and those facing trial after that date.

The Sixth Package (adopted on 19 June 2003; readopted upon the president's veto): freedom of expression was broadened by repealing the notorious article 8 of the Law to Combat Terrorism The definition of terror in this law was confined to acts involving violence or the use of force. Private radio and TV stations were allowed to broadcast in different languages. The terms of licenses granted to non-Muslim foundations for use of real estate were extended. Henceforth it would be possible to construct places of worship for all religions and denominations. All restrictions on giving certain names to children were lifted. The provision allowing for the shortening of sentences imposed for so-called honor crimes on the grounds of extenuating circumstances was repealed.

The Seventh Package (adopted on 30 July 2003): a change was made in the wording of article 159 in the penal code, corresponding to article 301 of the reformed penal code, dealing with "insulting Turkishness." If this act was committed purely with the intention of criticizing, it would be considered to be the exercise of freedom of expression and would no longer be a punishable offense. Article 7 of the Law to Combat Terrorism was amended to conform to the criteria of the ECtHR. This was done by adding the phrase "instigating violence." Provisions were introduced to accelerate the procedures for investigating and trying those accused of torture crimes. It became more difficult to try civilians in military courts. The learning of different languages was facilitated, and the NSC would no longer be consulted in the selection of these languages. Henceforth the secretary-general of the NSC would be appointed by the president upon the recommendation of the prime minister, thus opening the way for the appointment of civilians to this position. The provision obliging "Ministries and other public as well as private institutions to provide the secretariat general of the NSC with all the information and documents, both unclassified and classified, as requested" was repealed to protect the privacy of citizens.

The Constitutional Reform of May 2004

The AKP government introduced its last constitutional amendment on 7 May 2004. The death penalty was removed from the Constitution, and the State Security Courts were abolished. The representative of the General Staff would no longer sit on the Higher Education Council. The Court of Accounts was given the additional task of auditing public properties held by the armed forces.

One of the amendments was truly revolutionary. This was the new paragraph added to article 90, dealing with the ratification of international treaties, which read as follows: "In the event of a conflict between the existing legislation and the provisions of duly ratified international treaties relating to fundamental rights and freedoms, the provisions of the treaty shall prevail." This meant that much existing legislation containing antidemocratic provisions would no longer apply if it did not conform to the provisions of international treaties on human rights to which Turkey was a party.

The Implementation of Reforms

These were truly bold steps, for many in Turkey were convinced that the recognition of cultural rights and more democracy would cause the country to come apart. This came to be known as the "Sèvres syndrome." In fact, both the bureaucracy and the judiciary were resisting the implementation of the reforms. To overcome their resistance, the legislature was forced to take up the same reforms in a number of successive packages. To cite some examples, two separate laws had to be adopted to regulate the teaching of languages in special language courses. In the case of radio and TV broadcasts and non-Muslim foundations, three separate laws had been adopted. Although it was perfectly clear that the Kurdish language was widely used in the southeastern region of Turkey, the bureaucracy sought written instructions from Ankara. When an English-language school decided to add the Kurdish language to its curriculum, it was ordered that this be done in separate premises with a different director and secretary. Although there was no chair of Kurdology in any of the Turkish universities, it was decreed that only those who had majored in this subject could teach Kurdish. The task of creating difficulties for non-Muslim foundations was carried out by the General Directorate of Foundations.

The official spokespersons of certain influential institutions took steps to obstruct the implementation of reforms through covert or overt interventions. Gen. Tuncer Kılınç (the secretary-general of the NSC), for example, sent a classified letter, subsequently leaked to the press, addressed to the prime minister, in which he voiced his opposition to three of the reforms in the sixth package. In another leaked letter, dated 7 April 2003, that was sent to the concerned agencies through the office of the prime minister, the NSC advised that the registration of real estate belonging to non-Muslim foundations be delayed through "various administrative procedures" (Radikal, 6 May 2003). The most obstinate opposition came from the judiciary. In most of the trials relating to freedom of expression that had taken place as of late 2004, the courts acted as if the amendment to article 90 of the Constitution did not exist. Similarly, judges ignored the phrase "for the purpose of criticizing" that had been introduced in article 301 of the new penal code (corresponding to article 159 of the old code). The prohibition imposed on "hate speeches" in the new article 216 (formerly article 312) was designed to protect disadvantaged groups and minorities. But courts continued to interpret this language as if it was designed to protect the state and the majority group and used this provision to prosecute those allegedly "insulting Turkishness." Each time someone was denounced for having insulted Turkishness, the public prosecutors invariably started an investigation procedure and often decided that there were grounds for an indictment and a trial. The judges frequently violated the law by upholding the denouncers' requests to take part in the proceedings on the side of the prosecution. All of this demonstrated that the judiciary also considered itself duty-bound to "save Turkey." This tendency compromised the impartiality of justice (as discussed below).

C. Implementation in the Field of Human Rights

The Kurdish Question

Following the capture of Öcalan in February 1999 and the events of 9/11, it became much harder for the PKK to pursue its terrorist activities, forcing the organization to review its policies. Öcalan instructed his militant followers to leave the country. The armed wing of the organization changed its name from People's Liberation Army of Kurdistan (ARGK) to People's Legitimate Self-Defense Force (HSK). The political wing abandoned its label as the National Defense Front of Kurdistan (ERNK) and renamed itself the People's Democratic Units.

At its Eighth Congress held in April 2002, the PKK renamed itself the Freedom and Democracy Congress of Kurdistan (KADEK) and declared that it would pursue its activities for Kurdish rights through nonviolent means. Its spokesperson added, however, that the HSK would not be disbanded "for the purpose of legitimate selfdefense" (http://www.kurdistan.nu/psk/psk_bulten/hy _pkk_ve%20_kadek.htm). The organization changed its name once again to the Kurdistan People's Congress (KONGRA-GEL) at its Second Congress held on 11 November 2003. Notwithstanding this name changes, the U.S. included the PKK once more on the list of terrorist organizations in January 2004 under its new names. After the capture of its leader and the very unfavorable international environment that emerged for terrorism or armed struggle under any name, the PKK was left in disarray.

Logically, it would be expected that a country suffering from terrorism would take advantage of the weakness of the organization to take certain measures that involved granting some human rights like broadcasting in native languages or learning native languages in order to deprive the PKK of its propaganda tools. This would also involve promoting investments in the region to create employment opportunities and integrate the Kurdish demands into its political system by moving the scene of the struggle from the hills into the parliament.

But the country was able to tackle only the first part of these measures within the framework of EU reforms in the field of human rights. When even these reforms met with obstinate resistance from the bureaucracy at the implementation stage, citizens of Kurdish extraction, who had held high hopes for an improvement, were bitterly disappointed and angry. There was no mention of investments. Finally, the opportunity of redirecting Kurdish activities to the parliament was also missed when the Constitutional Court did the exact opposite in March 2003 by banning the Popular Democratic Party (HADEP). Previously formed "Kurdish parties" had met with a similar fate, The former deputies of the Democracy Party (DEP), banned in June 1994, had been imprisoned. As part of the EU reforms, they were given the right to a retrial in March 2003 but had to remain in prison until June 2004. As the ECHR kept deciding against the Turkish government and calling on Turkey to pay compensation to those whose villages had been burned down, Ankard began to resort to the friendly settlement procedure by compensating victims. In 2005 Turkey established Compensation Commissions for this purpose. In response, the ECHR ruled that, before resorting to the court, victims had to go through this procedure before they could be considered to have exhausted all the legal means at their disposal under their national legislation. By this ruling, the court decided to accept the new procedure as another means for legal redress.

The PKK, which had been without mass public support for a number of years, took advantage of the prevailing atmosphere and once again resorted to terror and mass demonstrations. In one instance, five thousand people fought the police at the funeral of four members of the PKK in Diyarbakır in March 2006, destroying seventy workplaces in the ensuing melee. The ambassadors of the EU countries in Ankara appealed to the Kurds to distance themselves from Öcalan, reminding them that the EU did not condone violence. The utterances of the mayor of Diyarbakır, however, were ominous: he said that Kurdish intellectuals would not condemn the PKK and that everyone must see that the Kurds had concluded for some time that coexistence had become impossible.

The milestones leading to this deplorable situation had been there for all to see. Among these were the trials initiated to restrict freedom of expression and the efforts of some to prevent the presentation of a scholarly report on minorities even by resorting to violence.

Trials Relating to Freedom of Expression and the Incident of the "Minority and Cultural Rights Report"

While the AKP as a party was behind the adoption of new human rights legislation, minister of justice Cemil Çiçek was pursuing a different course and causing a public stir. When referring to the conference on the subject of the Armenians during the collapse of the Ottoman Empire scheduled to take place at Boğaziçi University from 25 to 27 May 2005, he described this event as a "stab in the back directed at the Turkish nation" in his speech at the parliament (Radikal, 25 May 2005). In these circumstances, the conference was postponed to 23 September. On the eve of the conference (in the late afternoon of 22 September) the Fourth Administrative Court of Istanbul forbade the event on the grounds that there was "no information on who would say what" (Radikal, 23 September 2005). Bilgi University, one of the organizers, held firm, however, and the conference was held there. In October the Istanbul Regional Administrative Court overruled the interim decision of the lower court.

In October 2005 the journalist Hrant Dink, a Turkish citizen of Armenian descent, was condemned to six months' imprisonment for "insulting Turkishness" under article 301, paragraph 1, of the Turkish Penal Code. The Court of Cassation upheld this verdict. When Dink criticized this verdict in the press, he was prosecuted once again in December 2005 for attempting to influence the course of justice. The novelist Orhan Pamuk, 2006 Nobel Prize winner, was also tried under this provision in December 2005, with the prosecutor calling for a three-year sentence for having made a statement to a foreign journal in February 2005 on the Armenian and Kurdish issues. During the trials, the nationalists protested by resorting to violence in the vicinity of the courthouse. The trial was dropped at the request of the Ministry of Justice. This was attributed to the fear that a conviction would worsen the reaction that was building up against such trials, especially in international circles.

In this atmosphere, even the report issued by a consultative body attached to the prime minister's office was made the subject of a trial. The Prime Ministry's Consultative Council on Human Rights had been set up by a law dated 12 April 2001. It was one of the measures that had been taken to carry out the political criteria of the EU (the Copenhagen Criteria). The Consultative Council was called on to prepare studies and reports on ways to safeguard human rights and to serve the state in an advisory capacity when requested. "The Minority and Cultural Rights Report" (known as "The Minority Report") was issued in October 2004 and caused a big row, leading to subsequent complications. Professor Doğu Ergil's report of August 1995 and Professor Bülent Tanör's report of January 1997 on related topics had met similar fates (see "A Change in the Environment" in Section 7).

The Minority Report was a scholarly analysis that consisted of five chapters and a conclusion. The first chapter was about the concept of minority and its development, while the second chapter described how Turkey had encountered human rights problems because it had remained trapped in the 1920s. This chapter also dwelled on the difficulties that Turkey had faced because of its failure to implement the Treaty of Lausanne fully. Chapter 3 recounted the conflicts between the existing Turkish legislation and the contemporary concept of human rights and cited examples of this conflict. Chapter 4 described the very strict and restrictive interpretation of legislation by the administration and the courts, with examples of how this interpretation was giving rise to discrimination and causing international embarrassment to Turkey. Chapter 5 dealt with the causes of this situation, with emphasis on two points. The first point was conceptual: the label "Turk" (or "Turkish" in some cases) was used as the supra-identity to denote the identity of the whole nation. But it also was the label used to denote the dominant majority ethnic/religious group. This led to the alienation of the other infra-identities in the country. To overcome this drawback, it was proposed that "Turk" be replaced with the territorial denomination "Türkiyeli" (meaning "of Turkey," coming from or belonging to the land of Turkey, a term comparable to "British" instead of "English"). It was argued that this would have a salutary uniting effect.

The second point was historical and political: even the most innocent references to infra-identities stirred up fears of dismemberment of the country on account of the so-called Sèvres syndrome. The concluding section described how the monolithic system that had been perfectly natural in the 1920s and 1930s had been superseded and overtaken by events. In conformity with the goal set by Atatürk, calling for the attainment of the standards of modern civilization, it was proposed that the Constitution and legislation be scrutinized and brought up to date.

Because of its scholarly nature, the report was not expected to receive much notice among the public. Consequently, a press conference was arranged to publicize a summary of the report prepared for the benefit of the wider public. When disorder broke out during the proceedings in the presence of TV cameras and the summary report was torn up by a protester, the incident was fully covered in the press. Prime Minister Erdoğan then began to use the terms "supra-identity" and "infra-identity." Soon afterward, however, he was forced to reconsider and retract this due to the rising tide of ethnic Turkish nationalism. The official human rights body that had authored the report never met again. Minister of Justice Çiçek described the report as "intellectual nonsense" and "intellectual conspiracy" (Radikal, 19 November 2004). The author of the report, Professor Baskin Oran, and the president of the Prime Minister's Consultative Council on Human Rights, Professor İbrahim Kaboğlu, were indicted in November 2005 and accused of "insulting the judiciary" (article 301/2) and "sowing hatred and animosity among the public" (article 216). These crimes called for prison terms of five years. In May 2006 the court dropped the first charge and acquitted the two academics of the second charge. The chief prosecutor of Ankara appealed the court's verdict. (The report was finally acquitted by the Court of Cassation in July 2008.)

Although the report had not identified the Kurds as a minority, it nevertheless evoked the animosity of Turkish nationalists. But, more interestingly, it was also criticized by Kurdish nationalists, who argued that Kurds were not a minority but a founding and central element of the nation. Recalling the rights of non-Muslims indicated in the Treaty of Lausanne met with a strong reaction, however. All of this revealed how the mentality of the millet system of the Ottoman Empire, established in 1454 and formally repealed in 1839, was still very much alive. The millet system was based on the premise that Muslims were the "dominant millet." With the minority report, however, Turkey had been exposed to the concepts of supra-identity and infra-identity, which became regular features of ongoing debates on the nature of democracy in Turkey. (For the full story of the Minority Report case and its documents, see B. Oran, "The Minority Report Affair in Turkey," Regent Journal of International Law 5, no. 1 [2007]: 2–93.)

The Issue of the Deep State

In the trial on the Susurluk accident (see Box 7-6 in Section 7), the Court of Cassation upheld the convictions of fourteen defendants, including that of retired colonel Korkut Eken. The deputies Mehmet Ağar and Sedat Bucak escaped prosecution, thanks to their parliamentary immunity. The charges of murder and drug trafficking were dropped for lack of sufficient evidence. The cases of the former deputy head of the Special Operations Branch of the General Directorate of Security, İbrahim Şahin, and nine other police officers who were accused of not being able to account for weapons in their possession were dropped because of the statute of limitations.

After the Susurluk accident, the Yüksekova Gang affair (also known as the Uniformed Gang) was exposed in 1996. The subsequent trial resulted in a number of convictions. An official report (the Kutlu Savaş Report) revealed that a number of officers up to the rank of colonel, noncommissioned officers, village guards, special team members, PKK turncoats, and local administrators were engaged in collecting extortion money on behalf of the PKK, abducting individuals for ransom, and smuggling drugs. These people were also charged with nine unsolved murders. In the investigation that followed, it became apparent that an officer with the rank of lieutenant general was also implicated in the affair. None of this had come to light until the abduction and murder of the nephew of a former deputy from Hakkari in January 1996. In March 2001 the State Security Court of Diyarbakır handed down prison sentences of up to twenty-five years for thirteen defendants. The Court of Cassation overturned these sentences in 2002, however, on the grounds that the investigation had not been conducted thoroughly and lifted the arrest warrant in absentia that had been issued against a major sentenced to twenty-five years in prison. The objections of the chief prosecutor of the Court of Cassation were overruled, but the charge of conspiracy was proven, demonstrating that a crime gang indeed existed. When the case went back to the court in Hakkari, a retired major, a captain, a special-team member, a village guard, and a PKK turncoat were sentenced to prison terms ranging from thirty-one to four and a half years. Upon appeal, these convictions were also overturned.

The Hakkari court eventually brought the trial to an end in November 2005. This time there was no reference to forming a crime gang and the defendants in military uniform were acquitted for lack of evidence. Only the PKK turncoat who had exposed the gang was convicted, but he too was released by the Court of Cassation.

A very important new incident at Şemdinli, Hakkarı, came to light on 9 November 2005 and led to a reappraisal of many events taking place in Turkey. A bomb was hurled at the Umut Bookstore in Şemdinli, causing one death. The perpetrator was caught by the crowd and handed over to the police. It turned out that this individual was a PKK turncoat who worked in the intelligence branch of the Gendarmerie. Two noncommissioned officers of the Gendarmerie were sitting in a car close by, waiting for the bomber. The car's trunk contained sketches marking the location of the bookstore that had been bombed as well as explosives and long-barreled guns. The two officers were detained. The prosecutor was conducting an investigation at the site when shots were fired at him by a technical sergeant of the Gendarmerie, killing and wounding people in the crowd that had gathered. The incident received wide coverage in the press and led to demonstrations and disturbances in the region. Protesters at Yüksekova attacked police officers and started a fire at the health center.

When Sabri Uzun, the head of intelligence at the General Directorate of Security, released a statement in March 2006 noting that "locks are useless if the burglar is within the house" (Radikal, 23 March 2006), he was removed from his post. His personal wealth subsequently came under investigation upon the receipt of a "letter of denunciation," but he was cleared of all charges in August 2006. When the prosecutor investigating the Şemdinli Affair, Ferhat Sarıkaya, prepared an indictment including the name of Gen. Yaşar Büyükanıt (the commander of the land forces), he was fired and permanently banned from government employment and also from any sort of legal profession in April 2006. In the ensuing trial, the Van court sentenced the two noncommissioned officers to thirty-nine years in prison. This sentence was quashed by the Court of Cassation, which dedared that the defendants were fighting against terror; therefore they ought to be transferred to military court. That court released the two noncommissioned officers and the PKK turncoat at the first hearing in December 2007.

But retired lieutenant-general Altay Tokat made a statement to the weekly Yeni Aktüel that appeared on 27 July 2006. Even those who had doubts about the existence of the deep state had to reconsider their positions in the light of this statement. Tokat was already notorious for his assertion made on 12 August 1989, when he was stationed in southeastern Turkey, that "the state implements the same laws here as it does in Istanbul. Under my system, even grass could not survive, let alone people" (Milliyet, 13 August 1989). He speculated that the bomb that went off in Şemdinli was probably designed "to send a signal, to dissuade." He added that as a commander in the region he had ordered the use of explosives in the vicinity of newly appointed judges and prosecutors in order to give them a better grasp of the seriousness of the situation in the region.

All these incidents proved the existence of the "deep state," an open secret until then, and paved the way for a more transparent Turkey.

Torture

In this period a large number of public servants were put on trial for torture, but most of their cases were dropped because of the statute of limitations. Even when convictions were handed down to police officers, the sentences were suspended on the grounds that they were not likely to commit the same offenses again. Even when they turned out to be repeat offenders, they were not jailed, because "their past record could not be traced." The Bar Association of Diyarbakır took the Ministry of Interior to task for paying the lawyer fees of such accused policemen.

The only serious exception to such practices and abuses was the case of the "Children of Manisa," which had received much press coverage. Ten police officers were involved in this case, and all had been acquitted twice of torturing sixteen youths aged fourteen to twenty-six in a police detention center. After a long judicial process lasting seven years, the defendants were sentenced to prison terms of 60 to 130 months in October 2002.

The number of cases of torture and mistreatment that came before the courts increased by 3.3% in 2004 compared to the previous year. But the number of police officers under investigation decreased by 39.6%.

According to the 2005 report of the Human Rights Association, the practice of torture as well as the lack of accountability for committing torture persisted in 2005. Of the fifty-two cases of torture that had been referred by the lower courts to the Court of Cassation, about 69% ended with acquittals, 15% ended with suspended sentences, and only 15% resulted in convictions. Of the fifty-nine cases under the scrutiny of the association, thirty-five resulted in the case being dismissed due to lack of a ground for prosecution or lack of jurisdiction. Still, the European Committee for the Prevention of Torture stated in its report of September 2006 that torture in Turkey had ceased to be systematic and was only practiced in exceptional cases.

Religious Matters

The head scarf and secularism: when the Welfare Party was banned, it was replaced by the Virtue Party, which was also closed down. The legal grounds for banning the latter were handed down by the constitutional court in January 2002. The winner of the election of November 2002, the AKP, appeared to be proceeding with extreme caution, especially on the issue of the Islamic head scarf.

The first incident occurred when the newly elected Speaker of the TGNA, Bülent Arınç, and his wife, who was wearing this type of head scarf, went to the airport to bid farewell to President Sezer. Sezer then began to send two categories of invitations to presidential functions: with or without spouse, depending on whether the spouse wore the head scarf or not.

Some excesses were also committed in this area. It was announced that those wearing the head scarf would not be admitted to the Beyazıt Tower of İstanbul after it was opened to tourists, on the grounds that this was considered to be an official precinct. The worst excesses occurred after November 2005, when the European Court of Human Rights rejected Leyla Şahin's petition to attend university classes wearing a head scarf. In February 2006 the Administrative High Court upheld the dismissal of the director of a kindergarten who wore a head scarf to and from work, even though she removed it in the school. That same month, a male teacher of religion was denied the right to take a foreign assignment even though he qualified in the exam, because his wife wore a head scarf. It should be recalled that the AKP also had a part in creating the atmosphere that allowed these excesses. The rector of the University of Van was harassed and even kept under arrest for a period. On Children's Day (celebrated on 23 April every year) children are allowed to sit at the desks of high officials in order to motivate them to aspire to high office in the future. At the celebration in 2006, Arınç ceded his chair to a "child" who was twenty-one years old and a student at a vocational high school for training Muslim clerics and preachers.

Concerning the Alevis, the Ankara District Court ruled that the term "Alevi" denoted a religious sect and could not be used in the title of an association. Based on this ruling, it ordered the closing of the Cultural Association of Alevi-Bektaşi Institutions in February 2002. This decision was overruled by the Court of Cassation in November. In October 2004 an individual's request that the denomination "Muslim" be replaced with "Alevi" on his identity card was denied. An Alevi father went to court to have his son excused from the required course in religion at his school that only covered the Sunni sect of Islam. After a complicated legal battle, the father lost his case in May 2006, and his son had to attend the course. (The Alevis obtained satisfaction when the ECtHR decided on 9 October 2007 that compulsory religion courses were a violation of the ECHR [Radikal, 10 October 2007].)

In regard to non-Muslims, on 24 January 2003 a new regulation was introduced that recognized (even if only indirectly) the existence of non-Muslim foundations other than the Armenian, Greek Orthodox, and Jewish community foundations. It now became possible for these foundations to register their real estate under their own names. Because the Ottoman Empire had not recognized these foundations as legal persons prior to 1913, they had been unable to register their real estate acquired before that year.

Nevertheless, no substantial improvement took place in overcoming the practical problems of these foundations. The adjustment of legislation to meet EU standards ended the practice of preventing these foundations from acquiring new property and made it impossible for the state to take over their properties without compensation. In the draft law on foundations before the TGNA in 2006, however, three problems still remained unresolved: (1) the return of properties that had been taken over by the state; (2) the registration of unregistered properties; and (3) compensation for seized properties that had been sold to third parties. (This law was finally passed in February 2008 but brought no substantial improvement in regard to the grievances of the non-Muslim foundations.)

The draft law was unlikely to lead to a solution of the problem of compensation, which was the most intractable. Furthermore, there were signs that the government was not disposed to solve this problem in good faith. It became apparent in March 2006 that the orphanage belonging to the Greek Orthodox Patriarchate in Büyükada (the island of Prinkipo), which had not been in use since 1964, was now the property of the Treasury. It also became apparent that before the enactment of the law the treasury had been transferring to third parties the properties in its possession that had been seized without compensation from the foundations in the past. In addition to an office building in the shopping district of Istanbul, the latest instance of this practice was the land (14,000 square meters) belonging to the Monastery of Haghie Yorgi Kapris located on the island of Burgaz that had been taken over by the treasury. On 1 June 2006 this property was registered in the name of a Muslim foundation, administered by the state.

In secular Turkey the non-Muslims were considered to be in the "others" category rather than "Turkish." This encouraged various acts of violence like the sporadic attacks on the premises of the newspaper Agos, published by Armenians in Turkey. An ancient Greek Orthodox ritual of retrieving the cross from the sea on the occasion of the Orthodox Christmas was disrupted with noisy protests by ultranationalists calling themselves Ülkücüler (Idealists).

The most recent example of considering the non-Muslim citizens to be foreigners came from the State Inspection Council attached to the President's Office when it categorized non-Muslim pious foundations as "foreign associations and foundations" in its report dated 5 February 2006, dealing with real estate sales to foreigners.

The Administrative High Court, however, ruled that the Directorate General of Foundations could not take over the administration of non-Muslim foundations that continued to function even if they had been considered closed.

Starting in early 2005, persistent claims were put forward that Turkey was being threatened by missionaries. This led the Ministry of the Interior to issue a report revealing that in the past seven years only 344 people had converted to Christianity in a country of 70 million inhabitants. Even so, a Catholic priest was killed on 4 February 2006 as he prayed, while another was stabbed and wounded on 2 July 2006.

As deplorable as these crimes were, another shock came from the judiciary, always considered a bastion of secularism. An Australian journalist sued those who had alleged that he was a religious impostor in a television program. When he lost his claim for compensation, the final verdict of the Court of Cassation was as follows: "as a general practice, the state may take certain measures to safeguard the religious faith of the vast majority of its inhabitants" (http://hurarsiv.hurriyet.com.tr/goster/haber .aspx?id=3623481&tarih=2005-12-09).

But there were also certain positive developments. The Administrative High Court overturned the conviction of a radio station for engaging in propaganda on behalf of Christianity. The court declared that "freedom of religion also includes the right to seek to persuade neighbors" (http://www.danistay.gov.tr/kerisim/ozet.jsp?ozet =metin&dokid=24421).

People called "Sabetayists" were made scapegoats, as on many occasions when the Turkish society faced a crisis. These people were considered the followers of Sabetay, the descendants of Ottoman Jews who had converted to Islam in the seventeenth century. Although this conversion had occurred three hundred years ago, they were still not regarded as true Muslims and were referred to as "converts" or "followers of Sabetay." Books about them such as Efendi and Şebeke, written by one-time leftists, became bestsellers. The former deputy leader of the left-of-center DSP, Rahşan Ecevit, uttered these words in connection with the work of missionaries: "I am a Muslim and I cannot bear to see Islam in retreat in my own country. In our bid to join the EU, we are in danger of losing our faith" (Radikal, 3 January 2005).

This situation was blatantly discriminatory and created discord among citizens. It was a result of the mindless anti-Semitism that was on the rise as a reaction to Israel's treatment of the Palestinians. There was also an element of xenophobia, however, which was becoming endemic in Turkish society.

In the meantime the sale of property to foreigners became a favorite area for the release of xenophobic sentiments. The concepts of sovereignty and property were blurred, aggravating the paranoia that found its expression in the slogan "Our homeland is being sold to foreigners." At this point the Constitutional Court handed down the most abashed decision in its history in March 2005 to annul the legislation on the sale of property to foreign nationals, reflecting the court's ambivalence. The decision was confined to article 19 of the law on the sale of property to foreigners under certain conditions. It did not actually prevent the implementation of this article but merely suspended its implementation on a temporary basis. The court's decision contained this sentence. "This annulment does not mean that no property can be sold to foreigners. It only means that the legal safeguards and limitations are not considered to be adequate" (Sabah, 14 March 2005). In fact, it would be difficult to argue that the conditions were not adequate: in addition to the condition of reciprocity, the property had to be located outside a military, strategic, or other forbidden zone, foreign juridical persons could not purchase more than 300,000 square meters without special permission from the Council of Ministers, total sales to foreigners could not exceed 0.5% of the total surface of any particular province, and so forth.

Much disinformation was spread to influence public opinion during these proceedings. It was claimed that Israelis were buying vast tracts of land in the GAP (Southeast Anatolia Project) region. Actually, no Israeli had purchased any real estate in the GAP region, according to the General Directorate of the Land Registry. This information was confirmed by the General Staff, the MİT (National Intelligence Organization), and the Ministry of Defense. Israelis were not even among the ten largest purchasers of land in Turkey. It was also claimed that approval had been given to Syrians to buy land in excess of the allowed quotas in the province of Hatay. This situation dated from 1939, however, when Hatay united with Turkey and some property owners in Syria at the time opted to preserve their Syrian citizenship. As a matter of fact, no sales of land to Syrians had taken place in Hatay since 1939.

The Law to Combat Terrorism (TMK: Terörle Mücadele Kanunu)

Articles 216, 288, and 301 of the Penal Code that went into effect on 1 June 2005 placed serious restrictions on the freedom of expression. After this came the TMK, which represented a sharp retreat from the adjustments to EU legislation put into effect from 2002 to 2004. A very wide spectrum of acts like employing false seals, insulting the sovereignty symbols of the state, instigating someone to commit suicide, supporting conscientious objectors, undermining the reputation of the military, encouraging the military to disobey orders, exporting historic objects, and so forth came within the scope of the TMK, enacted on 29 June 2006. The courts handling such cases had jurisdiction to try even youths over fifteen, and those found guilty of terror by these courts could not have their sentences remitted. The law restricted defendants to only one lawyer to represent them, and only one close relation would be notified. If police officers were being tried, however, the state was authorized to pay the legal fees of three defense lawyers. The law allowed officers to use their firearms if a warning to halt was not heeded.

D. The Rise of Ethnic Turkish Nationalism

Until the middle of 2004 Turkey had been going through its second revolution from above, in its long saga on the road to modernization. At that point Turkey started to witness an explosive growth of nationalist sentiment.

This was a time when Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf was published simultaneously by twelve publishers, and a novel on the theme of a supposed U.S.-Turkish war, Metal Firtina (Metal Storm), as well as another based on the events of Turkey's war of liberation, Çılgın Türkler (These Crazy Turks), went through hundreds of editions.

In the field of foreign relations, the incident in which a number of Turkish military personnel were detained by American soldiers in Suleymaniyah, Iraq, and had hoods placed over their heads on 4 July 2004 led to an atmosphere in which even the ultranationalist Idealists (Ülkücüler), who had traditionally followed an anti-Communist line and were therefore pro-American, turned anti-American. Early in 2006, when books on the subject of Sabetay were on the bestseller list, a film was released with the title of Kurtlar Vadisi—Irak (The Valley of Wolves—Iraq). In one scene, the film's hero remarks: "Aren't American soldiers the tools of American capitalism?" The situation was no different in the Islamist camp. On 18 May 2006 a gunman penetrated the building housing the Administrative High Court and started shooting at the judges, supposedly because of a grievance over the Islamic head scarf. The gunman's father told a journalist: "Don't become tools of imperialism. This country harbors enemies of Islam, the Quran, and the nation" (Hürriyet, 12 August 2006).

Another milestone was registered on 21 March 2005. At the Newroz celebration to mark the advent of spring, four youngsters, some of them children, trod on the Turkish flag in the city of Mersin. The General Staff described the culprits as "so-called citizens" (Takvim, 14 April 2005), while the Senate of the University of Ankara issued a statement containing the same expression. These events marked the beginning of a new period. "Display the flag" campaigns were launched across the nation, and individuals were manhandled for distributing pamphlets asking for more democracy. In Trabzon the police had to intervene to stop a lynching. But the governor of Trabzon, Hüseyin Yavuzdemir, made statements in April 2005 and June 2006 in which he justified the actions of the lynch mob. On 30 August 2006 there was an attempt to lynch those who were demonstrating against the dispatch of Turkish peacekeeping forces to Lebanon. This time Istanbul's head of the Police Department, Celalettin Cerrah, displayed a similar mentality by declaring that "the reaction of our citizens is quite appropriate" (Sabah, 31 August 2006). The prosecutors failed to launch investigations against the would-be lynchers or merely charged them with offenses that called for minimum sentences.

This trend also affected public agencies. In March 2005 the Ministry of the Environment and Forests renamed certain species because it determined that "they had been deliberately misnamed in a way that might undermine the unitary character of the state" (BBC News, 8 March 2005). A type of red fox with the name Vulpes vulpes kurdistanica was renamed Vulpes vulpes, while Ovis armeniana, the Anatolian wild sheep, was renamed Ovis orientalis anatolicus, and roe deer known as Capreolus capreolus armenus became Capreolus cuprelus capreolus.

Such actions were undertaken by a coalition known as Kızıl Elma (Red Apple), consisting mainly of Kemalists, former Marxists, and an assortment of people adhering to the Turkish-Islamic Synthesis view. The common thread in this coalition was hatred of all that appeared to be "different" ("the other"), hidden behind a façade of "anti-imperialism" in order to lend it a measure of respectability. The former dichotomy of Left and Right disappeared when these two tendencies merged. These groups marched under the banner of nationalism and began to exert influence all over Turkey. This phenomenon was mainly a reaction to two events.

1. It was a reaction to globalization, as was the case all over the world. This reaction manifested itself as opposition to EU reforms that started at the end of 2001. These reforms were seen as designed to make Turkey subservient to imperialism, to dismember the country, to undermine its Islamic character, or to turn it into an Islamist country. Those who held such views failed to note that some of these goals were clearly contradictory. The poll conducted by Euro-Barometer in July 2006 revealed that support for the EU in Turkey had dropped to 43% from a level of 60% in the fall of 2005.

2. Another element was the renewal of terror by the PKK, starting in early 2005. This reaction came at a time when many EU reforms were telescoped into a short span of time. As explained earlier, the PKK had been caught between the capture of its leader Öcalan and the EU reforms. Kurds were angry to see EU reforms being blocked by the bureaucracy, however, and the PKK took advantage of this situation to renew its campaign of terror in order to be in the limelight once again. This was a typical example of nationalism begetting more nationalism.

3. Last but not least, this wave of anti-western, antinon Muslim and ultra-secularist Turkish nationalism was constantly provoked by the "Deep State", as the Ergenekon Trials would reveal starting from 2008. These trials began after concealed arms and ammunition were discovered in various parts of the country, as well as the bones of the victims of extrajudicial "operations" carried out by the Deep State. Even the gunman who raided the Administrative High Court on "religious grounds" was found to have links with the Ergenekon plotters. At the beginning of 2010, Ergenekon Trails were investigating no less than five military coup attempts that seem to have been averted between 2003 and 2008. The aim of these plots was to "save the country" by imposing the principles of Kemalism as applied in the 1930s, and also maintain the priveleges enjoyed by the military as the "guardians" of Kemalism.

Foreign Policy during this Period

Overview

The global wave of fear unleashed by the 9/11 attacks and the implementation of the policy of occupation by the neo-cons, who took full advantage of the reigning fear, suddenly plunged the world into a situation that was akin to that prevailing in the 1870s.

In the 1870s the world had entered the period of imperialism, when countries achieved their economic and strategic objective through the use of force (see Box Intro-7 in the Introduction). The overrunning of countries was justified by claims that the objectives being pursued were noble, as expressed in the mantra "the white man's burden" or "mission civilisatrice." Although Britain was the hegemonic power in the 1870s and thereafter, it was balanced to a certain extent by countries like France and Germany, because the gap in military technology at the time was negligible. As explained earlier, in the age of imperialism during the nineteenth century, the Ottoman Empire had been so anachronistic and left so far behind that it was able to last for another century only by taking advantage of the balance among the major powers.

After 2003 the neo-cons took advantage of 9/11 to justify their actions. They had adapted the objectives pursued in the nineteenth century to fit the twenty-first century. The stated objective was "to spread democracy." There was a difference, however: unlike the situation prevailing in the nineteenth century, no other power could balance the U.S. because of the huge gap in military technology.

I. RELATIONS WITH THE U.S.

Turkish-U.S. relations in this period were mainly shaped by the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

A. The U.S. Attack on Afghanistan --

For the neo-con policy-makers, the events of 9/11 were a true blessing. The U.S. launched a massive attack on Afghanistan in order to locate and capture Bin Laden. The Taliban government was toppled and replaced by the pliant Hamid Karzai regime. Afghanistan suffered needlessly, because Bin Laden was never captured.

Reactions in Turkey: in the course of the attack, Turkey announced that it would make its bases available to U.S. aircraft, provide logistic support, and even help train Afghan dissidents by sending special teams of experts. It would not have been possible for Turkey to deny the use of its bases and withhold logistical support when it was so dependent on the U.S. in the military, political, and economic fields. But certain individuals and institutions in Turkey provided active support for the U.S. attack. These can be divided into four separate groups. (1) Some believed that active support should be provided to the U.S. because it was bound to win and Turkey should thus enjoy the fruits of victory. (2) Others said that the Taliban, as the advocates of Sharia law, were a threat to the region and to Turkey and should be eliminated. (3) Some pointed out that, having been against terror, Ankara could not sit back and watch while an antiterror struggle was going on. (4) Finally, some were convinced that the war being waged by the U.S. was a just war because it was being fought in the name of high principles like democracy and

After the U.S. attack, Turkey provided military technical assistance to the Northern Alliance. It also provided a contingent of 290 men to the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF). Turkey was the sole Muslim country to do so. After receiving reassurances from the U.S., it even assumed the command of this force, taking over from Britain on 20 June 2002. Furthermore, Turkey placed the base at İncirlik at the disposal of American aircraft during the operation. Turkey would also assume command of the force once more later on, send helicopters, and provide Afghanistan with economic assistance. The former minister of foreign affairs, Hikmet Çetin, would act as NATO's senior civilian representative in Kabul for thirty-two months.

In August 2003 authority over ISAF would be taken over by NATO with the approval of the UN. When the force came under Taliban pressure in September 2006, it called for more Turkish troops in order to demonstrate that the struggle was not between Islam and the infidels.

B. The Invasion of Iraq The Prelude

During the attack on Afghanistan, there was no opposition in Turkey to sending troops and providing other forms of backing. After all, the issue had to do with the global interests of the hegemonic power and Afghanistan was outside Turkey's area of immediate concern. But in the case of Iraq the situation was much more controversial, for obvious reasons.

Turkey's relations with Iraq had always been much more intense and multidimensional. Above all, Iraq had been under Ottoman sovereignty from 1638 until World War I. Turkey gave up Iraq de facto under article 3/2 of the Treaty of Lausanne and gave up all its claims de jure with the 1926 treaty, which did allow Turkey a share of 10% of the revenues derived from Iraq's oil for a period of twentyfive years. Until General Kassem's coup in 1958, Turkey had excellent relations with Iraq. Both countries were concerned over the Kurdish question and were members of the Baghdad Pact, signed in 1955. Furthermore, nationalist circles in Turkey kept harping on the Turcoman element in the Mosul-Kirkuk region as well as the oil deposits in the area, thus keeping public interest in these issues alive. When Operation Provide Comfort 2 was launched, Turkey's interest in Iraq became focused on northern Iraq and the Kurdish issue (see Box 7-14 in Section 7).

The Invasion of Iraq and Its Aftermath

The U.S. strategy during the Second Gulf War was to invade Iraq through Kuwait in the south and Turkey in the north in order to converge on Baghdad from two directions and topple Saddam Hussein. The nature of the regime that would replace Saddam's dictatorship was uncertain. For an interim period, it was expected that a pro-American Iraqi general would take charge in Baghdad or an American general would be installed, based on the 1945 model of Gen. Douglas MacArthur's administration in postwar Japan. In any case the U.S. would hold sway over Iraq for "as long as necessary." Once having inserted itself into Iraq through Operation Poised Hammer, later renamed Provide Comfort, the U.S. presence would be extended over all of Iraq. In this grand plan, Turkey had been assigned a single role: to allow the U.S. to invade northern Iraq through Turkish territory.

This appeared to be the natural role for Ankara to play for a number of reasons.

1. Turkey was deeply in debt. Its domestic debt amounted to $100 billion, while its foreign debt stood at $140 billion; these debts could only be serviced through further borrowing. This would require the IMF's blessing, because Turkey did not meet the necessary criteria for borrowing in international markets. According to the Maastricht Criteria, the ratio of a country's public debt to its GDP was not to exceed 60%. In 2002 this ratio stood at 144% for Turkey. Ankara could only keep borrowing because the IMF was extending loans at the behest of the U.S., which saw Turkey as a close friend because of its geostrategic importance.

Turkey was also beholden to the U.S. because Washington had located Abdullah Öcalan in Kenya (perhaps through Echelon, its global eavesdropping system) in February 1999 and delivered him to Turkish agents at Nairobi airport. This event signaled the ultimate military defeat of the PKK. In addition, Turkey was eager to become a strategic partner of the U.S., ready to play the role of a key spearhead in the region.

2. Turkey was isolated, both in the region and in the international sphere. Its relations with the Arabs and with the EU had always been fraught with complications, and it continued to be burdened by the Armenian and Cypriot issues.

3. Above all, Turkey's fear of an independent Kurdish state in Iraq prevented it from opposing the U.S.

These factors were offset by other considerations, such as being a strategic medium-sized power and sharing a common border with Iraq.

On 16 June 2002 deputy secretary of defense Paul Wolfowitz and deputy secretary of state Marc Grossman, a former ambassador to Turkey, came to Ankara to engage in preliminary negotiations with a view to securing Turkey's backing. Turkey's reply was affirmative but also conditional: Iraq's territorial integrity must be preserved, the Kurds must not obtain exclusive control over Mosul and Kirkuk, any economic losses that Turkey might incur would have to be compensated, and Iraq should have a democratically chosen administration.

After several rounds of negotiations between the two countries' delegations, in December 2002 the U.S. decision was delivered to Turkey by Condoleezza Rice, who made it clear that the U.S. would enter Iraq whether or not Turkey sided with America. In January 2003 Washington requested formal permission to deploy its troops to İncirlik, Batman, and Diyarbakır and to make use of the facilities in these locations. Ankara was also given the warning that Turkey would have no part in Iraq's postwar restructuring if it failed to cooperate.

Turkey was confronted with a real dilemma. If it refused to cooperate, its relations with the hegemonic power would suffer, and it might even be subjected to sanctions. Furthermore, the AKP government had only assumed power recently and was being accused of harboring Islamist tendencies. In these circumstances, it might need to seek the legitimacy that it needed at home from abroad, which meant from the U.S. If it did cooperate, however, it would be complicit in the invasion of a fellow Muslim country that had nothing to do with international terrorism. Moreover, it would find itself stuck in the Middle Eastern quagmire and also in confrontation with the Kurds of northern Iraq. This would further complicate Ankara's relations with its own Kurdish element. The new AKP prime minister, Abdullah Gül, invited the foreign ministers of Iran, Syria, Egypt, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia to Istanbul for consultations, after which they issued a joint statement.

The First Motion in Parliament

In the meanwhile U.S. officials were inspecting the facilities in Turkey. Gen. Richard Myers, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, made a number of trips to Turkey. Ankara prepared the first motion under this pressure and secured its passage through parliament on 6 February 2003 (with 308 votes for and 193 against). This motion would allow Turkish ports and air bases to be modernized and reequipped in order to prepare them to receive U.S. soldiers and their equipment.

Meanwhile the press reported that negotiations were going on in connection with the economic aid package that would be furnished to Turkey to compensate it for any losses arising from an invasion. Apparently, Turkey would be given a grant in the amount of $2 billion, its debts to the U.S. arising from the Foreign Military Sales (FMS) program in the amount of $4 billion would be written off, and a grant in the amount of $6 billion would be provided for purchasing equipment under FMS. The aid package would contain loans in the amount of $20 billion. Turkey also sought written guarantees in connection with the Kurds.

After dragging on for some time, the negotiations ended with the signing of a memorandum of understanding on 27 February 2003. These negotiations had two consequences, with different effects.

1. The protracted negotiations caused the U.S. to lose much precious time. The opposition of France, Germany, and Russia to America's invasion plans gained momentum during this period, while millions of antiwar protesters throughout the world demonstrated in anti-American rallies. It took Turkey fifteen days to conclude the negotiations on secondary issues such as how this new American presence would be covered by the Status of Forces Agreement, meaning the laws and regulations that would apply to the 1,600 American technical personnel who would come to Turkey to modernize air bases and ports. Another such item was whether the imported equipment would be subject to value-added tax or not. Meanwhile Prime Minister Gül was visiting both Middle Eastern and EU capitals in search of a consensus to prevent war and to persuade Saddam to renew cooperation with UN weapons inspections. Simultaneously, a number of other leaders visited Ankara for consultations.

2, Turkey was a loser in this process. The long negotiations on economic aid allowed Turkey to gain time and gave the peace movement a chance to gather momentum. But it gave the world the impression that Turkey was a greedy bargainer. The picture that emerged was that Turkey was seeking maximum profit by allowing its territory to be used for aggression against a neighbor. A cartoon appeared in the U.S. showing Uncle Sam stuffing money into the belt and bra of a belly dancer who represented Turkey.

From 8 February to the end of the month the press contained reports that the U.S. side was threatening Turkey with dire consequences if negotiations were not concluded expeditiously, while the Turkish position was that no troop movements through Turkey would be allowed without a deal on the economic package. According to American sources, the U.S. had issued sixteen "last warnings" to Turkey to reach a final decision. The Turkish government was being pressed on two sides: both by the U.S. and by those in Turkey who believed that the country's interests were best served by siding with the powerful. Among the prowar voices were those of some pundits and TÜSİAD, representing the big business community. In addition, some voices in the media began to clamor for the oil resources of Iraq located in Mosul. They claimed that Turkey had historical rights to this oil and that this was the proper time to renew these claims. One columnist argued that Turkey should be demanding oil rather than cash. This led Prime Minister Gül to exclaim that they were tired of this unending pressure.

There was also a peace faction that included president Ahmet Necdet Sezer. This group claimed that war should be opposed on both moral and legal grounds. It held the view that "international legitimacy" was a prerequisite, under article 92 of the Constitution, for allowing the stationing of foreign troops in Turkey or for deploying Turkish forces beyond its borders. To resort to force would be possible under two circumstances: legitimate self-defense or a mandate from the UN Security Council, and both were absent in this case.

Those who would follow the U.S. lead advanced some of the following arguments. If Turkey refused to cooperate with the U.S., the stock market would collapse; Turkey could derive great benefits from additional exports and contracts; the invasion would bring democracy to Iraq; Saddam would be disciplined for possessing weapons of mass destruction and using them against his own people; Saddam fed terrorism, which was a threat to everyone; this was an opportunity to prove that Turkey and the U.S. were true strategic partners; with an invasion, Turkey would be in a position to prevent a Kurdish state from emerging in Iraq; the U.S. would strike even if Turkey withheld permission; Turkey would be allowing the transit of troops but would not be directly engaged in the war; and Turkey would be directly involved in the final reshaping of the Middle East.

The Second Motion

Eventually the time came to take up the parliamentary motion that would allow the transit of U.S. troops and military equipment. The opposition CHP was against the motion. In addition, there was quite a bit of opposition among the ranks of the AKP. One of those opposed was the Speaker, who made passionate speeches against the motion. The minister of state, Ertuğrul Yalçınbayır, declared that he was against the motion and added that he had signed the motion in the cabinet in order to avoid breaking ranks with the government and that he would vote no when the motion came up on the floor of the assembly. The National Security Council, where the military leaders were influential, released a communiqué on 31 January 2003 and called for observing "international legitimacy" as required by article 92 of the Constitution. This made the government's task more difficult and placed the burden of responsibility squarely on its shoulders.

A government motion was eventually prepared that would allow 62,000 foreign troops to come to Turkey while authorizing the Turkish government to deploy forces to northern Iraq. This motion was put to a vote on 1 March. The vote was by secret ballot, and the AKP decided not to require its deputies to observe party discipline in this case. This allowed 97 AKP deputies to deviate from the party line, leading to a result of 264 for and 250 against, with 19 abstentions. The 264 votes represented less than half of the 534 votes cast, so the motion failed to be adopted.

To understand the causes that led to this result, the following factors have to be borne in mind. The Turkish military remained aloof on the issue, the AKP's parliamentary group did not take a position, the voting was by secret ballot, the deputies were uneasy about getting Turkey directly involved in a hazardous adventure, some deputies were not comfortable with the idea of taking part in an attack on a fellow Muslim country, and some deputies with Kurdish roots did not approve of invading northern Iraq.

This was a fateful decision that angered the U.S. and had profound repercussions on Turkish internal politics. Above all, it reinforced Turkey's self-confidence. According to some polls, from 85 to 94% of the population was opposed to the venture, and the result of the vote was to align the people with their representatives.

The international media and public opinion as well as certain countries that had been taunting Turkey for providing "mercenaries" were now expressing admiration, even if only grudgingly. The newspaper Al-Quds wrote on 4 March 2003, "Turkey has refused to be bribed" (Radikal, 6 March 2003). A U.S. newspaper published a cartoon depicting Turkey as a belly dancer, knocking Uncle Sam into the air with a bump of her hip. In another cartoon, Bush was exclaiming "We want to see democracy in Iraq...but not in Turkey."

Others, however, wanted to see the motion resubmitted to the parliament, based on the following logic.

- 1. Even if Turkey denied permission to open a northern front, the U.S. would strike at Iraq anyway. This logic led to the following counterargument. Western sources had estimated that a short campaign would lead to 11% American and British casualties, while a long campaign could raise this figure to 38%. A short campaign would result in the price of oil falling to $20 a barrel, while a long campaign might raise the price to $100. A long campaign would also raise the cost of the operation to astronomic levels. A cautious America would never contemplate an attack without a northern front.
- 2. Turkey had disappointed the Americans and could expect Washington to make life difficult for Turkey in the economic sphere. Those who objected to this argument stressed that the IMF had two "showcase" countries: Turkey and Argentina, which happened to be bankrupt. If Turkey was allowed to go Argentina's way, this would create acute difficulties for the IMF. Turkey was a highly indebted country; hence, if it became insolvent, international creditors would also suffer. Although the U.S. was very important for Turkey, Turkey was no less important for the U.S. in the pursuit of its imperialist policies. Furthermore, despite the rejection of the motion, Washington did not appear to be too upset and was proceeding to rent storage facilities, office space, and hotels, particularly in the provinces of Şırnak and Mardin.

3. The U.S. would exclude Turkey from the conference table where the Middle East would be reshaped. Those who objected to this argument recalled how George H. W. Bush had kept Turkey out of this process after the First Gulf War even though Turgut Özal had volunteered all kinds of assistance and support. Besides, Turkey was compensated only partly at that time for its economic losses, which had been considerable. Furthermore, history was full of cases when the hegemonic power left its closest allies out of the circuit or in the cold when it had no further use for them.

4. In these circumstance, the U.S. would not oppose a Kurdish state.

Two days after the voting in parliament, an incident occurred that had important consequences. On 3 March 2003 a group of Kurds in Iraq defied Barzani's peshmerga fighters and spat on and burned a Turkish flag. In a strong reaction to this incident, the chief of the General Staff, Hilmi Özkök, declared that "we should be supporting those who are engaged in war" (Milliyet, 6 March 2003). On 6 March the U.S. Embassy began to rent land in the southeast, in addition to the office space and depots it had already rented. The embassy took steps to hire an "army" of 600 well-paid guides. Up to that time American supply columns had been confined to the port of Iskenderun. Now they were on the move toward Iraq.

The General Staff released a communiqué on 6 March stating that these movements were in conformity with the memorandum of understanding of 27 February. The undisclosed contents of the memorandum were thus revealed for the first time. This revelation led to furious arguments in Turkey over whether all of this had anything to do with the TGNA's first decision regarding the modernization of ports and air bases.

The U.S. sent Bush's special representative Zalmay Khalilzad to Ankara in March 2003 with the following message: "If you invade northern Iraq, you will incur the risk of your troops finding themselves clashing with Kurdish and U.S. forces" (Radikal, 19 March 2003). When a Turkish Special Force of 1,000 men entered Iraq a few days later to establish a safety zone along the border, the U.S. announced that it would not share its friend-or-foe codes with Turkey. Some members of this force wearing civilian clothing were apprehended and sent back to Turkey on 30 April. They were allegedly supplying arms to the local Turcoman minority.

The third motion: on 20 March 2003 the TGNA approved a third motion by a vote of 332 to 202. It is estimated that about 40 AKP deputies were among the dissenters. The motion authorized the deployment of Turkish troops to northern Iraq and allowed the use of Turkish air space by foreign air forces for a period of six months.

At dawn on the same day, Anglo-American forces began bombing Iraq and launched an invasion from bases located in Kuwait. The unexpected resistance of the Shia in the south delayed the capture of Baghdad until 10 April. After operating uninterruptedly since 1992, the U.S. brought Operation Provide Comfort to an end on 2 May, considering its mission accomplished.

With the launching of the invasion, the Kurds of northern Iraq warned Turkey not to enter Iraq, since the peshmerga fighters had been given orders to shoot if necessary. The peshmergas subsequently entered Kirkuk and set fire to the building housing the registry of land. This was a fateful step, because Turkey had drawn "red lines" with respect to Mosul and Kirkuk. Prime Minister Gül traveled to Damascus and held consultations with Syria and Iran. In response, the co-chairman of the U.S.-Turkish Friendship Group in the U.S. Congress, Robert Wexler, asked if Turkey was changing course. The U.S. ambassador in Ankara had addressed a similar question to Prime Minister Demirel in 1967 when Turkey started receiving economic credits from the USSR. Wolfowitz had even harsher words about Turkey's rejection of the motion of 1 March: "[T]he army should have reminded everyone that it was in Turkey's interest to support the U.S. Yes, we want Turkey to say: 'Yes, we made a mistake'" (Mehmet Ali Birand, Hürriyet, 7 May 2003). He added that Washington wanted a Turkey that could acknowledge its mistakes.

After this, the AKP gave the impression that it regretted the 1 March decision of the TGNA rejecting the second motion and sought to make amends. In June 2003 the government adopted a confidential decree. The validity of this decree was restricted to one year at President Sezer's request. The decree authorized the use of Turkish bases and ports to furnish Iraq with supplies for its reconstruction and also allowed the transit of foreign troops. After the occupation of Iraq, the U.S. was unable to deal with the insurgency that followed and appealed for a Turkish force of at least brigade strength to be stationed in Baghdad. Turkey had no desire to get involved in regions where pro-Saddam elements were at their strongest. Ankara also wanted a NATO umbrella to cover an operation whose mission would be confined to the distribution of humanitarian assistance.

At this stage, a small number of Turkish Special Forces personnel were detained for fifty-seven hours by U.S. soldiers at Suleymaniyah. In this incident, which occurred on 4 July 2003, the Turkish team was alleged to be plotting to kill the governor of Kirkuk. Turkish officials found it difficult to reach their counterparts in Washington because of the holiday. A similar incident had occurred on 30 April; but this time the Turkish personnel had their heads covered with hoods by the Americans. This created outrage in Turkey. It is likely that the Turkish Special Forces personnel were supplying weapons to the defenseless Turcomans, as in the previous incident. In carrying out its action, the U.S. must have calculated that it was in its interest not to alienate the Kurds, the only group that was prepared to collaborate with America.

The question of sending troops to Iraq became a subject of heated debates in Turkey. Some of the arguments centered around whether it was necessary to wait for a UN resolution or not. Employers' associations like TÜSİAD and TOBB were in favor of sending the troops. Reports appeared in the press on 22 August that Abdullah Gül had made this statement: "Our country's strategic interests cannot be confined to Anatolia. Turkey will claim its rightful share of the oil, but within the bounds of legality" (Derya Sazak, Milliyet, 22 August 2003). On 1 September the press reported that Özkök, the chief of the General Staff, known for his caution and restraint, had made a statement that you cannot win a prize in the lottery unless you buy a lottery ticket. He added that a norisk policy was extremely dangerous. Most media pundits agreed with the general's assessment.

From the end of July 2003 to the middle of September, threatening messages began to come from the Kurdish leadership and even some of the other communities of Iraq. Talabani warned Turkey that its forces were not welcome in Iraq, even if they remained under U.S. control. Saddam's followers threatened violence, and the elders of the Sunni community declared that Turkish soldiers would become targets. The leaders in Fallujah, a Saddam stronghold, warned the Turkish forces not to come or they would meet the same fate as the Americans. The Shia leader Muqtada al-Sadr declared that they would treat Turkish forces as occupiers. The foreign minister of Iraq, Hoshyar Zebari, who was a Kurd, affirmed that Turkish forces could not go through northern Iraq. Various Islamic clerics threatened to decapitate Turkish soldiers, claiming that it would be religiously legitimate to kill those in the service of the U.S. On 6 August and 7 October Turkish trucks were set on fire; on 16 August shots were fired on Turkey's Embassy in Baghdad; on 20 August the UN building was bombed and totally destroyed; and on 24 September Pakistan announced that it would not be sending troops even if a UN resolution sanctioned such a move.

Previously, on 29 July, Gül had declared that a UN resolution was not necessary to send troops and that the TGNA was empowered to make such a decision. He added that the government did not expect to run into any difficulties with a new parliamentary motion. Now Gül began to say that they would require an invitation from Iraq's Provisional Governing Council. On 24 September he ended up by stating that a UN resolution was needed.

The Americans also began to change their tune that month. Secretary of state Colin Powell announced that there was sensitivity against Turks, while the Washington Post wrote that it would be dangerous to play the Turkish card (http://yenisafak.com.tr/arsiv/2003/eylul/17/doi.html). Bush's approval rating fell to 51% as it became clear that no weapons of mass destruction would be found in Iraq. Kofi Annan declared in a speech that the Bush Doctrine was a challenge to peace.

The fourth motion: the TGNA held a closed session on 7 October and approved a new motion by 358 votes to 183. The motion authorized the government to send troops to Iraq, but the authorization was valid for only one year. The authorization was for sending 16,000 men to Iraq, where they would head south after crossing northern Iraq. It looked like the government wanted to appear to be complying with U.S. wishes.

Throughout October the Los Angeles Times kept writing about the disruptive effects of a possible Turkish presence in Iraq, while Mullah Krekar, the former leader of the Ansar-al-Islam, openly stated that Turkish troops would be regarded as targets. After this came the bombing of the Turkish Embassy in Baghdad. Some columnists in Turkey were warning that, if Turkish soldiers stayed home, Turkey would incur the risk of dismemberment. At a time when even Donald Rumsfeld was declaring that Turkish troops might not be coming to Iraq after all, Tayyip Erdoğan was still declaring that Ankara wanted to dispatch troops. But eventually the government announced that it would not make use of the parliamentary authorization.

During the process Turkey was trying hard to set up a security belt on the Iraqi border but failed in the face of the opposition that it encountered.

An assessment of Turkey's policies: on the issue of the invasion of Iraq the AKP policy-makers went through a number of zigzags. This was due to the desire to avoid angering the U.S. while seeking to avoid being drawn into the Iraqi quagmire. There was also the chronic anxiety regarding the Kurdish question. Domestic as well as foreign factors interacting under rather special circumstances caused these many ups and downs or recurring zigzags. Nevertheless, it was indicative of a weakness in foreign policy.

In the end, however, this ambivalence in the policy of a strategic medium-sized power like Turkey turned out to be fortunate for Ankara. It spared Turkey from getting trapped in Iraq, and its relations with its neighbor remained unharmed. Relations with the U.S. were also spared from serious damage because (as we will examine later) the Middle-East policies of the neo-cons depended on Turkish cooperation to a large extent.

C. Other Issues

Syria, Iran, and the Kurds

At this time, Washington sought to have Turkey firmly on its side on the issues of Syria and Iran. Had Turkey complied, it would have been utterly dependent on the hegemonic power at a time when it was just beginning to mend its relations with Syria. Throughout its history Turkey had been able to avoid strife with Iran. There was also the Kurdish issue. Juggling with these realities, Turkey sought to pacify the U.S. without alienating these neighbors.

In November 2005 a series of high-level visits of U.S. officials to Ankara took place, including the directors of the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and the CIA and the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. These visits were seen as part of the effort to obtain Turkey's support in the event of an operation against Iran, although Washington claimed that the U.S. had addressed no formal request to Turkey regarding such an eventuality.

To deal with Turkish foot-dragging on these issues, the U.S. used the Kurdish card. It branded the PKK in all its guises as a terrorist organization but did not allow it to be finished off. The U.S. refused to contemplate an operation against Kandil Dağı, the mountainous region in Iraq where the PKK had implanted itself. There was talk to the effect that the U.S. had allowed Osman Öcalan, the brother of the terrorist leader, to found a new political party. Washington never fully severed its links with the PKK. The U.S. was instrumental in the setting up of a Kurdish entity in northern Iraq that was steadily moving toward autonomy. This allowed Washington to wield permanent pressure on Turkey.

The Black Sea and the Greater Middle East Project
The Black Sea was one of the two important elements that the U.S. needed to spread its hegemony over Eurasia. As the construction of oil and gas pipelines went ahead, the area started to attract more U.S. attention. Washington began to call for changes in the Montreux Straits Convention that would remove limitations on the U.S. military presence in the region, while curbing Russia's role. The Turkish press claimed in May 2004 that the U.S. had proposed the expansion of the İncirlik air base and requested port facilities in Trabzon and Samsun on Turkey's Black Sea coast. These requests did not go down well in Ankara (see "Relations with the Caucasus and Central Asia" below).

At a meeting held at Sea Island in June 2003, the Greater Middle East Project was launched (its formal name was changed to Broader Middle East and North Africa Initiative in 2004). Tayyip Erdoğan was among the few regional leaders attending this meeting. At first Turkey was included among the twenty-two target countries that made up the region. The Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs raised objections to this and took formal steps to have the definition of target country changed. The reason for this was probably the desire to present Turkey as a European and not a Middle Eastern country. Turkey also wanted to play an active rather than a passive role in the project of the hegemonic power that was quickly gaining momentum. In the new version, Turkey acquired the status of democratic partner in the initiative, along with Yemen and Italy. Turkey was a country that was democratic, Western oriented, advancing on the road to EU membership, and secular. It had succeeded in transforming Islam. For these reasons, Turkey was initially presented as a "model" for the region. When this did not receive enthusiastic support among those concerned, Turkey was relabeled a source of inspiration.

At this time, Turkey started making appeals to its regional neighbors, calling for more democracy, more cooperation with the West, and more energy in eliminating shortcomings before blaming the West for everything that went wrong. This was most probably done to preempt any new U.S. military intervention that would further destabilize the region.

Turkey was focusing on those objectives of the U.S. project that aimed to transform Eurasia through democratic civil initiatives and NGOs. Erdoğan declared that Diyarbakır would be turned into the heart of the Broader Middle East and North Africa Initiative.

Economic Relations and Defense Industries

In the economic crises of 2001 the IMF left Argentina to its own devices, while Turkey received full support thanks to its strategic importance. This support reflected the U.S. interest in Turkey. During Ecevit's visit to the U.S. in January 2002, decisions were made to develop bilateral trade and economic relations. In line with these decisions, an Economic Partnership Committee was created, which resulted in the establishment of Specialized Industrial Zones.

On 8 May 2003 Erdoğan signed a $1.5 billion contract for the purchase of AWACS aircraft. An agreement was reached with a Turkish company to supply components for the American F-35 Joint Strike Fighter. U.S. firms declined to participate in the bidding to supply attack helicopters, however, a process that had been dragging on for a number of years. Turkey wanted to be the supplier of the helicopters' software, which the U.S. firms would not accept.

Toward the end of the AKP's first term in power in 2006, serious differences emerged in Turkish-U.S. relations. The U.S. became highly critical of some Turkish actions like the TGNA's rejection of the 1 March motion, the reception given to the leader of Hamas following the Palestinian election, the drift of Turkey's relations with the EU, the rising anti-Americanism sweeping the country, the description of the Fallujah operation as genocide by some AKP members, the failure of the prime minister to grant an appointment to the American ambassador over an extended period, and Turkey's desire to develop its relations with Syria and Iran. The tone of the criticism directed at the government was rising both among circles close to the U.S. in Turkey and among various think tanks in America.

Relations with NATO

There were two important milestones in Turkey's relations with NATO: the Prague Summit of 2002 and particularly the summit of June 2004 that took place in İstanbul, with the participation of George W. Bush. As expected, the Prague Summit was focused on 9/11; in addition, however, it included a decision to admit new members to NATO as well as a decision to set up a rapid intervention force to deal with chemical and biological threats. At the İstanbul Summit, decisions were made to expand ISAF's operations in Afghanistan, to transfer the responsibility for SFOR in Bosnia to the EU, to reinforce NATO's Operation Active Endeavor in the Mediterranean, and to strengthen ties with countries in the Caucasus and Central Asia within the framework of Partnership for Peace. The launching of a new process in the Middle East was of particular interest to Turkey. It was called the İstanbul Cooperation Initiative and would come under the Broader Middle East and North Africa Initiative.

The European Security and Defense Policy (ESDP)
Turkey recalled the decision adopted at the 1999 Washington Summit, calling for the strengthening of the consultation mechanism between the EU and NATO members that were not part of the EU. Turkey complained that this decision was not being implemented, leaving the consultation mechanism weak.

It would not make much sense for Turkey, a nonmember of the EU, to seek membership in the Committee on Policy and Security whenever it took up the subjects of security and defense. The most strident opposition to such a formula came from France, which saw Turkey as a U.S. surrogate.

One of the causes for Turkish concern was that the Rapid Reaction Force to be established by the EU within the framework of the ESDP might be used in the event of disputes over the Aegean or Cyprus. To relieve Turkey's misgivings, the Ankara Document was signed in December 2001, following protracted negotiations. Under this arrangement, Turkey would automatically be a participant in operations in which the EU would use NATO facilities. When NATO facilities were not used, however, Turkey's participation would depend on an invitation from the EU Council.

Although Turkey signed the Ankara Document, this arrangement was not considered fully satisfactory by either the Greek or the Turkish military. That is why Turkey used its veto in the North Atlantic Council to block the arrangement made between the two organizations that would allow the EU to take advantage of NATO capabilities and planning. This prevented NATO from turning over its mission in Macedonia to the EU.

The negotiations were eventually concluded in December 2002 when a new government came to power in Turkey. The agreement between NATO and the EU was signed in March 2003. Under the arrangement known as "Berlin plus," the EU obtained the right to use NATO's planning and capabilities. The agreement provided that, in the event of a crisis, the question would first be taken up in NATO; if NATO did not want to get involved, the EU would assume responsibility. In this way, the U.S. was able to ensure that the ESDP remained dependent on NATO.

D. The Growth of Anti-American Sentiment in Turkey

While all this was going on, anti-U.S. feelings in Turkey were on the rise. According to polls, 83% of the public perceived the U.S. as a threat. There were a number of reasons for this. As a consequence of neo-con policies, anti-U.S. sentiments, even hostility, were on the rise throughout the globe. As a result of the "hood incident" that took place in Suleymaniyah on 4 July 2003 and the resumption of PKK terror in mid-2004, the impression gained ground in Turkey that the U.S. supported the PKK and that Washington was working toward establishing a Kurdish state in northern Iraq.

In addition, people with various ideologies also harbored similar anti-American feelings. The Islamists were resentful over the U.S. actions in Fallujah, Abu Ghraib, and Guantanamo and over Israel's actions in Ramallah. The nationalists suspected that the U.S. was seeking to impose "moderate Islam" on Turkey. The Broader Middle East and North Africa Initiative was also bothering broad segments of the population.

The Bush administration, however, placed the responsibility for anti-American sentiments in Turkey on the AKP.

II. RELATIONS WITH THE EU

The EU's Progress Reports on Turkey and the related developments in EU summits can be summarized as follows.

A. The Progress Report for 2002 and the Copenhagen Summit

The report praised Turkey for its reforms but also pointed to the serious shortcomings in compliance with the Copenhagen Criteria, adding that accession talks could not begin before these shortcomings were addressed. Among the topics highlighted in this context were relations between civilians and the military, the condition of non-Muslim minorities, freedom of expression, the way the judiciary system worked, the violations of human rights, and corruption.

Elections took place in Turkey in the interval between the publishing of the report and the holding of the summit, with the AKP emerging as the winner. In the days preceding the summit Turkey expected that a date would be fixed for the commencement of accession talks, while the EU wanted to see Turkey retract its objections on the subject of the ESDP and give unconditional support to the Annan Plan, to pave the way for the membership of Cyprus.

As noted earlier, the first of these expectations was met with the Ankara Document of December 2001. Gül also promised to give unconditional support for the Annan Plan. The summit's final communiqué was then drafted, with the undertaking that accession talks would start conditionally in 2005 without further delay. The Turkish government greeted this as a victory. The elections in northern Cyprus brought Mehmet Ali Talat to power. Talat was a politician who favored a resolution of the Cyprus question.

In April 2003 the EU Commission issued the second Accession Partnership Document (APD) relating to Turkey. The chapter on Expanded Political Dialogue and Political Criteria included "border disputes" (meaning the Aegean disputes) and "Cyprus." In addition, steps to be taken by Turkey on freedom of expression, relations between civilians and the military, human rights, the situation in the southeast, and other such topics were listed.

Turkey's response to the second APD came in July 2003 with its National Program. Turkey again referred to the subjects of the Aegean and Cyprus in the introduction and not under the heading "Political Criteria." But the document's tone was highly conciliatory. At the same time, Turkey was adopting new harmonization packages.

B. The 2003 Progress Report and Summits

Despite all these efforts, the July 2003 summit at Thessaloniki and the Brussels Summit of December 2003 failed to adopt the decision to commence accession talks with Turkey. The Progress Report issued in October 2003 praised Turkey's reforms over the past year but noted that the political criteria had still not been met and recommended that no action be taken before the end of 2004.

C. The Annan Referendum of 2004, the Expansion of the EU, the Progress Report, and the Summit of 17 December 2004

The referendum held in Cyprus in April 2004 on the Annan Plan received a yes vote in Northern Cyprus but was rejected in the South. Nonetheless, with the coming into force of the Accession Treaty on 1 May 2004, Southern Cyprus became a member of the EU along with the nine other candidates. It did so as the Republic of Cyprus and purporting to represent the whole island.

This situation created a problem for Turkey because of the Ankara Agreement and the Customs Union between Turkey and the EU. Both arrangements required Turkey to bring all countries joining the EU within the scope of the agreement.

As we shall see, Turkey would extend the scope of the agreements to cover the new members by means of a ministerial decree in which the word "Cyprus" was employed instead of "Republic of Cyprus." This was to create problems with respect to the Additional Protocol. Turkey would also be faced with the question of opening its ports and airports to South Cyprus. Worse still, the issue would also mar Turkish-EU relations after mid-2005 and create serious difficulties for Turkey.

On 6 October 2004 the EU Commission issued three separate documents: the usual Progress Report, the recommendations to the council, and, for the first time, an Impact Study.

In the Progress Report, Turkey obtained what it had been seeking. The commission recommended to the council to commence accession talks during 2005 on certain conditions. But the report's language also contained drastic changes in the usual rules for accession talks and gave a strong impression that these procedures had been devised exclusively for Turkey. In addition, it stated that certain fields such as agriculture, free movement of people, and structural policies might be subject to protective measures on a permanent basis. Starting the talks appeared to be good enough for Turkey, however, and it kept quiet about these unusual conditions. In a sense Ankara voluntarily relinquished the possibility of negotiating for improved conditions before December 2004.

The Impact Study, which was an appraisal of the likely positive and negative effects on the EU of Turkey's eventual membership, had an interesting feature. It underlined that the international management of water resources and infrastructures would be an important issue of the EU. Some nationalist circles in Turkey interpreted this to mean that Turkey should allow transboundary rivers to be opened up to international exploitation in order to make a contribution to the Middle East Peace Process.

The resolution concerning Turkey that was adopted in the European Parliament on 15 December 2004 was another cause for satisfaction in Ankara. Although the resolution recommended the commencement of accession talks, it also referred in three different places to the absolute necessity for Turkey to recognize the Armenian Genocide and demanded action from Turkey on issues that had nothing to do with EU criteria.

Finally, at the Brussels Summit of 16–17 December, it was decided that negotiation with Turkey would get underway on 3 October 2005.

The Cyprus Issue

The Cyprus issue was intensely debated in the Final Communiqué of the summit and caused much tension in Turkish-EU relations. The final communiqué contained the following paragraph on the subject: "The European Council welcomes Turkey's decision to sign the Protocol regarding the adaptation of the Ankara Agreement, taking account of the accession of the ten new Member States. In this light, it welcomes the declaration of Turkey that 'the Turkish Government confirms that it is ready to sign the Protocol on the adaptation of the Ankara Agreement prior to the actual start of accession negotiations and after reaching agreement on and finalizing the adaptations that are necessary in view of the current membership of the European Union."

The situation with respect to the EU and Cyprus can be summarized as follows. When the EU expanded with the accession of ten new members, including Cyprus, on 1 May 2004, it became incumbent on Turkey to extend the scope of the 1963 Ankara Association Agreement to cover the new members. This would be done through a protocol with the new members.

On 12 May 2004 the Turkish cabinet announced its decision to extend the scope of the agreement to the nine new members without including Cyprus in the list.

The EU informed Turkey that this was unacceptable and warned that it might prevent a decision in the approaching summit of 17 December 2004 to start accession talks. In response, Turkey issued a new decree on 2 October 2004, where the island was included but was called simply "Cyprus."

The EU then insisted that the extension be carried out by means of a protocol. In the past Turkey had signed protocols only after the 1973 expansion. The extensions after the expansions of 1981 and 1986 had been carried out through decrees. The EU insisted on a protocol because it suspected that Turkey would not employ the term "Republic of Cyprus." This was precisely why the AKP government was seeking to avoid a protocol, which was liable to be interpreted as recognizing the South (the Republic of Cyprus) and forsaking the North (the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus). This would lead to serious difficulties in getting parliamentary approval for such a document.

As noted earlier, at the Brussels Summit of 16–17 December 2004 Turkey committed itself to sign the appended protocol. The paragraph was signed by minister of state Beşir Atalay.

The protocol would eventually be signed by Turkey on 29 July 2005, with the list of beneficiaries that included the "Republic of Cyprus." At the same time, Turkey released a communiqué, stating that the protocol did not imply Turkey's recognition of the Republic of Cyprus.

In response to this, on 21 September 2005, the EU released a communiqué, stating clearly that it would not allow any discrimination against the Republic of Cyprus.

As a matter of fact, it is anomalous for a candidate country to deny recognition to a country that is already a member of the EU. Furthermore, the use of Turkish ports by Greek-Cypriot shipping would create no special economic problems. Once Ankara had taken a position, however, there was no turning back. Had the government originally used the term "Republic of Cyprus," it would not have found itself obliged to conclude an international protocol and would have managed to get by with just a decree. Now that the issue has become an international problem, with the EU insisting on a protocol, it will be necessary to involve the TGNA. This is because the 1963 Ankara Agreement will be amended with a protocol, and under article 90 of the Constitution an international document can only come into effect with the approval of the TGNA. Turkey's position will be seriously weakened if the protocol is approved without the accompanying communiqué, while approving the two documents simultaneously would meet with serious opposition from the EU. When Oli Rehn, the commissioner responsible for enlargement, visited Ankara in October 2005, he made this quite clear when he declared that actual negotiations can only commence when Turkey formally approves the protocol and that nothing should be appended to the approved document that would imply that the Republic of Cyprus would not be recognized.

The Consequences of the Brussels Summit

This summit would have important consequences. In line with the decision of 2002 to start talks with Turkey "without delay," the summit confirmed that negotiations would commence on 3 October 2005, even though the phrase "without delay" was interpreted fairly loosely. The negotiating process would start with the screening of Turkish legislation and practices before moving on to the actual negotiations. This was the summit's most important decision. At Turkey's insistence, the final document also contained phraseology confirming that the negotiations would aim for full membership.

Turkey would be facing a tough agenda, because it had already been decided that the negotiations would be open ended, that there would be derogations that might be applied on a permanent basis, that the negotiations might not necessarily lead to full membership, and that a large country like Turkey would not be able to accede before 2014. Furthermore, the drafting of the passages dealing with Cyprus and the Aegean allowed the negotiations to be confronted with new obstacles in the future. All of this proved that Turkey was being treated differently from the other candidates. In these circumstances, the commencement of negotiations had been made conditional on Ankara's recognition of the Republic of Cyprus. Furthermore, it seemed that the accession of Turkey would depend on the circumstances that would prevail at least ten years later.

D. The Negotiating Framework Document

Following the summit, the EU started to prepare Turkey's Negotiating Framework Document, containing the following elements:

- For reasons related to the EU's budget, the talks would not be completed before 2014, regardless of Turkey's pace in carrying out its commitments.
- There would be four basic commitments that Turkey must carry out to bring the negotiations to a successful conclusion: full compliance with the Copenhagen Criteria; resolution of outstanding border disputes by peaceful means; a settlement of the Cyprus question; and extension of the Association Agreement to all new EU members. The last two conditions related to the opening of Turkish ports and airports to Republic of Cyprus—registered vessels and aircraft, in the context of the free movement of goods, and, eventually, recognition of the Republic of Cyprus by Turkey.
- In addition, the EU's capacity for absorption (which was considered implicit in the 1993 Copenhagen Criteria) would be taken into account.

After overcoming a host of hurdles, formal negotiations with Turkey began on 3 October 2005. Actually, what had begun was the screening and familiarization process. The actual negotiations started in June 2006, when the chapter on Science and Research was taken up and provisionally completed. After the beginning of the negotiations, the EU issued the Progress Report for 2005 in November, followed by the third Accession Partnership Document. The screening and familiarization process continued throughout 2005.

III. RELATIONS WITH GREECE AND CYPRUS A. Turkish-Greek Relations

After the Helsinki Summit of 1999, Turkish-Greek relations followed a smooth course. Greek foreign minister Georgios Papandreou visited Ankara on 20 January 2000. In addition to the signing of four technical agreements, it was decided to set up working groups consisting of soldiers and diplomats to take up matters related to military cooperation.

This visit was followed by the visit of Turkish foreign minister Ismail Cem to Athens on 4 February 2000, the first such visit in forty years. Five further technical agreements were signed in Athens.

Although the agreements that had been signed during this thaw were of a technical nature, practically all of them were of the confidence-building category designed to bring the two countries closer. The undersecretaries of the two foreign ministries held closed meetings called "exploratory contacts," where they focused on Aegean problems.

Improvements in bilateral relations appeared in a number of ways. For example, the Greek prime minister attended the wedding of his Turkish counterpart's daughter in July 2004. Greece no longer figured among the top threats to Turkish security in Turkey's National Security Document. Greece began to provide open support for Turkey's EU membership.

в. The Cyprus Issue

Developments Following the Helsinki Summit

The most striking effects of the Helsinki Summit were seen in Northern Cyprus. The Turkish Cypriots discovered that they could break free from their perennial dilemma of having to choose between Turkey and the Republic of Cyprus. They began to react against Denktaş's efforts to ignore the new conditions. In the presidential election of 15 April 2000, Denktaş managed to get elected only in the second round and through Turkey's direct intervention. Subsequently, the Turkish Cypriots began to demand that the police force (2,000 strong) be brought under the control of the Ministry of the Interior, as in all the other democratic countries. At the time, the force was attached to the Security Forces Command under the Prime Ministry. But in reality the Security Forces were commanded by a military officer from Turkey and therefore under the control of the Turkish Peace Force stationed on the island. The commander of the Security Forces described these efforts as "treason" and threatened those involved with punishment. The staff members of the newspaper that was reporting these issues in a critical tone were also accused of treason and were placed under detention. This action precipitated anti-Denktaş demonstrations at the very time when proximity talks under the aegis of the UN were in progress.

A New Denktaş Initiative: Direct Intercommunal Talks

In 2001 the U.S. was changing its strategy. The epicenter of crisis had shifted to the Middle East, and one of the natural allies of the U.S. in this region was Turkey. To serve a useful purpose as a key regional country, Turkey had to be strengthened through accession to the EU and had to overcome its most pressing difficulties. Ankara's line in Cyprus grew tougher in the course of 2001, however, under the impulse of antireformist elements.

At this juncture, on 14 April, the European Commission adopted a decision that weakened the positions of Turkey and the TRNC. Through this decision, the commission exempted Malta and Cyprus from the five-year restriction on the sending of workers to Europe, secure in the knowledge that no such movement was expected from these countries anyway. But this had an influence on the Turkish Cypriots, who were suffering from the effects of the economic crisis in Turkey. They began to apply for and obtain passports of the Republic of Cyprus in large numbers. While Denktaş came under fire from Turkish business circles for his intransigence, the president of the European Commission, Romano Prodi, declared that Cyprus would be in the wave of new accessions with or without a solution to the Cyprus question. He added that the EU stood ready to accept any solution that was approved by the two parties on the island.

Feeling pressed from all directions, Denktaş sought to recover the initiative with a new move. On 12 November 2001 he appealed to Clerides to engage in direct talks. This initiative drew a positive response from Clerides, who was also under pressure. The parties would now be engaging in direct talks for the first time since 1997.

Despite this apparently positive development, however, both sides were holding onto their positions. At a time when the opposition in the North was becoming louder and coming under increasing pressure, Turkey was becoming more solidly united on the issue of Cyprus, with even some elements of the "Left" joining a united front of hard-liners.

Toward the Copenhagen Summit

On 16 January 2002 the talks between the two Cypriot leaders were resumed. This time there was a widely shared view that the parties were closer than ever to an agreement. Both parties were seeking to influence the outcome of the Copenhagen Summit of December 2002, which would be making critical decisions on the question of the accession of Cyprus to the EU. Clerides's objective was to guarantee the membership of Cyprus, and he was determined not to be the party that walked away from the talks on the eve of the critical summit. Denktas wanted to convey the impression that he was in the negotiating process until the Copenhagen Summit made a decision on the commencement of Turkey's accession talks.

Concurrently, the EU was striving to bring about a solution by pursuing a dual-track policy. Although it did not want to admit a divided island beset by internal problem, it was also applying pressure on the Turkish side to settle by declaring that the accession of Cyprus was definite, even without a final settlement. It was also applying pressure on the Greek Cypriots to be conciliatory by gradually moving closer to Turkish positions. The European Council called on the European Commission to set up a liaison office in Northern Cyprus, while the commission allocated a sum of 208 million euros to the North for regional aid.

Meanwhile, in the local elections of 28 June 2002, Denktaş lost control of key cities to the Republican Turkish Party. While the opposition in Cyprus was questioning the links with Turkey, it wanted a settlement in Cyprus that would not exclude the mother country from eventual membership in the EU. On the contrary, it was stressing that a settlement would clear Turkey's path toward membership. Both sides forced themselves to continue with the negotiations throughout 2002.

The AKP's New Policy on Cyprus and the Copenhagen Summit

Having won the election of 3 November 2002, the AKP government wanted to reinforce its legitimacy through the EU's accession process. All obstacles on the path to accession would be removed one by one; but the AKP was forced to start with the taboo subject of Cyprus despite the risks, because this was the most pressing issue as the summit approached. The party's election manifesto declared that the establishment of a state administration consisting of two communities, as in Belgium, would be in accordance with the interest of both communities. This was a radical departure from the established state policy. The previous position of "no solution is the solution" was being abandoned and, instead of two states, the idea of one state with two communities was being embraced. This meant giving up the idea of a confederation and returning to the formula based on federation.

These internal disagreements were clearly visible at the Copenhagen Summit. Claiming that the EU would not set a date for the commencement of negotiations, President Sezer stayed away. Denktas also stayed away and sent his foreign minister, who declared that the Annan Plan was not acceptable as a basis for negotiations. Once again, the Turkish party had given the impression of being intransigent, while Clerides appeared to be conciliatory. The EU refused to accept this situation as final, and the Summit's Conclusions document declared that the EU was seeking a united Cyprus. The door had been kept open for the Turkish side once again.

As the deadline kept being extended, minor revisions were made in the Annan Plan to accommodate Turkish objections. The Turkish side had convinced itself that the negotiating process was going in its favor, but it had missed a crucial opportunity. Had the Annan proposals been accepted in Copenhagen as a basis for negotiation, the Annan Plan and accession of Cyprus to the EU would have been submitted to a referendum as a single package and a no vote in the South would lay to rest the hopes of the Greek Cypriots for EU membership. But the Greek-Cypriot administration and public were never confronted with such a dilemma. Thanks to the negative stand of the Turkish-Cypriot leadership, the election of 16 February 2003 resulted in the presidency of the former EOKA militant Tasos Papadopoulos, who was elected with the support of the AKEL party. There was no more need for him to be conciliatory.

The debate in Turkey grew more heated after Copenhagen, while the South breathed a sigh of relief. When the Turkish side walked away from the negotiations of 10–11 March 2003, Papadopoulos was further relieved from international pressure. On 16 April 2003 the South signed the accession agreement in Athens under the label "Republic of Cyprus."

Developments Following the Copenhagen Summit

Being conscious of the external pressure on Turkey, Denktaş made an unexpected decision on 21 April 2003 and opened the Green Line crossing points from 9:00 AM to 12:00 PM to traffic in both directions. Defying their leadership, close to 60,000 Greek Cypriots visited the North in one week, while 23,000 Turkish Cypriots crossed into the South. This was greeted with great satisfaction in European circles. Denktaş had killed several birds with one stone. The Greek Cypriots were able to see for themselves that living conditions in the North were far from being what they had been led to believe. They were obliged to present their passports to the TRNC authorities, which they had not recognized. The message was also conveyed to international circles that, if the parties were left to themselves and without outside pressure, it would be much easier to achieve a settlement through confidence-building measures taken in a step-by-step approach. The Turkish side also appeared in a conciliatory light, bringing down the tension within the TRNC.

The objective being sought by the TRNC was perfectly clear: to reiterate the equality of the two parties and remind everyone that there also was a state in the north. If a single-state solution proved unfeasible, the world would see that the alternative was two friendly states living side-by-side in Cyprus.

The Republic of Cyprus was quick to make its countermove. On 30 April it announced its new package of measures that would benefit the Turkish Cypriots. Starting on 10 May, they would be allowed to travel to the South in their cars. This meant that the Greek Cypriots accepted the validity of vehicle license plates granted by the TRNC. Turkish Cypriots would also be able to seek employment, they would be free to channel their export products through southern ports, and TRNC diplomas would be recognized.

Meanwhile international pressure on both sides was mounting for negotiations within the framework of the Annan Plan to get underway before May 2004. The EU was determined to make every effort to secure the accession of a Cyprus that had overcome the difficulties stemming from division. The UN also was eager to see its efforts bearing fruit and took full advantage of the EU-membership lever to achieve this end. The U.S. wanted to be able to support the accession of a Turkey that had overcome its difficulties in Cyprus, because this would demonstrate that the new international order was able to coexist peacefully with Islam.

Assumption of Power by Mehmet Ali Talat

In the election held on 14 December 2003 in the TRNC, the Republican Turkish Party (CTP: Cumhuriyetçi Türk Partisi) obtained nineteen seats, the National Unity Party (UBP: Ulusal Birlik Partisi) eighteen, the Democratic Party (DP: Demokrat Parti) seven, and the Peace and Democracy Movement (BDH: Barış ve Demokrasi Hareketi) six in the fifty-seat parliament. Until then the proportion of right-to-left votes had stood at around 70% to 30%. The increase in the number of seats obtained by the CTP and the BDH, which had campaigned under the banners of resolution of the issue, peaceful coexistence, and EU membership, demonstrated the desire for change among the Turkish-Cypriot people. Now most of the voters were younger people who saw their future in EU membership. The CTP was opposed to the Denktaş-Ankara duo and (reading Ankara's new mood correctly) directed its criticism at Denktaş, while affirming its readiness to pursue policies that were in tune with Ankara.

Following the election, the government was set up by the CTP under the leadership of Mehmet Ali Talat and the DP under the leadership of Serdar Denktas. With the son of Rauf Denktas assuming the position of deputy premier, it was clear that even the Right was finally coming to terms with change. The result of the TRNC election also strengthened the AKP government's hand. President Denktas himself got the message and was forced to act accordingly, even if he did so grudgingly.

Upon Annan's invitation, the Cypriot talks were resumed on 10 February 2004. This time Denktaş was kept under close surveillance by the undersecretary of the Turkish Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Uğur Ziyal, and the Papadopoulos tactic of forcing Denktaş to walk away from the negotiating table was successfully thwarted. In the end both Denktaş and Papadopoulos were able to agree that the Annan text as it stood would not be submitted to referenda if the parties failed to reach a compromise. In that case, the gaps in the text would be filled by the UN secretary-general himself. Everything went according to plan, and the date for holding the two separate referenda was set as 24 April.

The 24 April Referenda

In the Turkish sector, the parties of the Left and those in favor of the EU campaigned for a yes vote, while President Denktaş and the UBP sought a no vote. The leader of the DP, Serdar Denktaş, announced that he would vote no, although he instructed his party followers to vote according to their personal inclinations. In Turkey the government gave its support to the yes voters, but the opposition parties backed the no camp, with the CHP, the Nationalist Action Party, and the Democratic Left Party (DSP) in the forefront.

In the Greek sector, DIKO (the Democrat Party), the party of Papadopoulos, waged a "no" campaign by playing on the nationalistic feelings of the Greek Cypriots. In this context, the role of the Communist AKEL party was critical; but, true to its former self, it was unable to ignore the nationalistic wave sweeping the country. Although it did not object to the essence of the Annan Plan, it questioned its feasibility and sought guarantees from the Security Council, especially in connection with the military aspects of the plan. At this point the Russian Federation came into the picture and prevented the Security Council from making a decision by threatening to use its veto. This provided a façade of respectability for the AKEL's stand.

This outcome pleased AKEL as much as it gave satisfaction to Denktaş, who exclaimed, "May God bless Russia!" (Sabah, 23 April 2004).

The results of the two referenda held in Cyprus were as follows: in the North 64.9% voted yes and 35.1% voted no, while in the South the no votes prevailed by 75.8% to 24.2%. The Greek-Cypriot vote doomed the Annan Plan.

Although these results might appear to be a victory for the supporters of the status quo, they did free the Turkish side from the onus of being the intransigent party for the first time. The Turkish side's efforts to reach a settlement were widely acknowledged. The first reaction came from the EU when its foreign ministers released 259 million euros for assisting the TRNC to achieve economic development and break away from its economic isolation. This was followed soon afterward by a U.S. announcement that it was revising its Cyprus policy. Annan submitted a report to the Security Council in which he pleaded for "the lifting of the restrictions and obstacles that are needlessly isolating the Turkish Cypriots and preventing them from developing economically" (UN Security Council S/2004/437).

The lifting of the economic embargoes would help overcome the main obstacle confronting the Turkish Cypriots in their efforts to open up to the world and thus confirm the existence of two different sectors in the island. Although the efforts of Greece and the Republic of Cyprus within the EU were slowing the process, it would be hard for European values not to prevail over divisive tendencies over the long term. Divisive tendencies could continue only if Turkey pursued an erroneous path. In fact, both Papadopoulos and the leader of the AKEL, Dimitris Christophias, have felt it necessary to affirm that their rejection of the Annan Plan need not signify the end of the process.

IV. RELATIONS WITH THE MIDDLE EAST A. Relations with Arab States

Turkey's refusal to participate in the American operation against Iraq launched on 20 March 2003 generated much sympathy for Turkey in the Arab world. These feelings were reinforced by the visits to Syria and Iran in the days preceding the operation.

Syria, Iran, and Turkey drew closer as it became clear that a Kurdish state of one sort or another would emerge in northern Iraq following the occupation. Never before had Turkish-Syrian relations been friendlier. This relationship had its origin in the Adana Agreement of 1998 and continued after the death of Hafez Assad in 2000, when President Sezer went to Damascus to attend his funeral. The process gained momentum with the visit of Bashar Assad to Turkey on 6 January 2004. During this visit trade agreements were signed through which Syria recognized, even if only indirectly, that the province of Hatay was part of Turkey. During the drafting of the texts of the agreements, Syria did not question the wording describing the two countries' borders.

Despite the allegations that Syria was behind the murder of the former Lebanese premier Rafik Hariri and strong opposition, Sezer carried out his return visit in April 2005. The policies of the U.S. and Israel to isolate Turkey from Syria failed. This policy of friendship with Syria was crucial for a medium-sized strategic country like Turkey in need of establishing balances in the region. It probably also drew strength from the fear that Syria might confront a situation, as in Iraq, in which a power vacuum would offer the PKK a chance to become implanted there. On 22 August 2006, when the issue of sending a peacekeeping force to Lebanon was being debated in Turkey, Foreign Minister Gül visited Damascus to seek Syria's views, thus displeasing the U.S. once again.

The Arab countries were also deriving satisfaction from the AKP government's harsh criticism of Israel's policies toward the Palestinians.

In June 2004 Professor Ekmeleddin Ihsanoğlu, a Turkish academic, was elected secretary-general of the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC). This was another success in Turkey's Arab policies that occurred during the AKP's tenure of power. At the OIC's conference of foreign ministers held in June 2005, the TRNC participated as the "Turkish Cypriot State." It is very probable that the U.S. policies aimed at freeing the TRNC from its isolation played a role in this outcome.

B. Relations with Non-Arab States

1. Relations with Israel

The Souring of Relations

Throughout the 1990s Turkish-Israeli cooperation extended to military, economic, and other areas. In the new decade this cooperation began to undergo changes, and the trend became more pronounced when the AKP government assumed power.

The driving force of the close Turkish-Israeli relationship in the 1990s was Turkey's military effort to defeat the PKK. A number of factors intervened that would cool this friendship. Among these factors were Turkey's success in dealing with the PKK (even if it was only partial) and the eruption of the Second Intifada following Sharon's visit to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem. This brought the Middle East Peace Process to an abrupt end. To this must be added the different perceptions and expectations of the two countries regarding the U.S. occupation of Iraq.

In October 2000 Turkey voted for the UN resolution condemning Israel for violence against the Palestinians and for the illegal activities of Jewish settlers in the occupied territories. Turkey hardened its position as the number of Jewish settlements increased, the building of the security wall went ahead, and Arafat was besieged in his Ramallah headquarters in June 2002. Foreign minister Ismail Cem called on Israel to withdraw from the areas in the West Bank that it had reoccupied. In April 2002 Ecevit described the Israeli raid on the Janin refugee camp as genocide. Although these harsh words led to a crisis in bilateral relations, it proved short-lived when Ecevit toned down his rhetoric out of concern about losing the support of the powerful Jewish lobby in the U.S.

The criticism directed at Israel continued after November 2002, when the AKP took over the reins of government. Ankara was shaken by the news that Israel was contributing actively to the establishment of a Kurdish state in northern Iraq and that it was involved in the training of Kurdish peshmerga fighters. Erdoğan rebuked Sharon for his hard-line policies and qualified as "terrorism" the killing of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin in April 2004 and the subsequent murder of Abdel Aziz Rantisi. Turkey also voted against Israel when the decision of the International Court of Justice of 9 July 2004 ruling the Israeli security wall to be illegal was taken up by the UN General Assembly.

Despite all this, both sides did make some efforts to improve relations. In July 2004 Israeli deputy prime minister Ehud Olmert visited Turkey in order to help develop bilateral trade and economic relations. In Ankara he declared that his country was eager to continue its strategic relations with Turkey. In August 2004 Turkey sent a delegation to Israel. In January 2005, following Arafat's death, Abdullah Gül visited Israel and Palestine, where he discussed bilateral relations, the Palestinian elections, and Iraq. He indicated Syria's readiness to engage in peace negotiations and called for their resumption. Although Israel turned down Turkey's proposal, it did welcome the Turkish efforts in this direction. Gül caused apprehension in Israel by addressing the Palestinian parliament but not the Knesset and by calling on Israel to recognize the new Palestinian government that had been formed following Arafat's death.

In the election held on 25 January 2006, Hamas emerged as the winner, with 76 seats in the Palestinian parliament of 132 seats. When Hamas formed the new government, Israel imposed an economic embargo. It was at this juncture that Khaled Mashal, one of the Hamas leaders, visited Ankara, causing renewed tension in Turkish-Israeli relations.

Nevertheless, these relations maintained their normal course in the economic, trade, and military fields. Whereas exports to Israel amounted to $861 million in 2002, they registered an increase of more than 20%, reaching $1.067 billion in 2003. In the next two years exports hovered around the $1.1 billion level. In October 2003 the agreement for the sale of water from the Manavgat River to Israel was signed. The agreement was never implemented, however, and it was eventually canceled in 2006.

2. Relations with Iran

The international developments after 2000 all contributed to the improvement of bilateral relations with Iran, which had followed an unsatisfactory course in the past. The following factors helped bring about this improvement.

The Relaxation of Ideological Rivalry

Especially after the reelection of Mohammad Khatami for a second term as president, the inherent ideological conflict in Turkish-Iranian relations began to ebb. The time from 2000 to 2005 was the first period that was not marred by a crisis in bilateral relations. This was not surprising, because Khatami's main goal in foreign policy was to change Iran's image as a revisionist state bent on exporting its revolutionary regime.

The election of Mahmud Ahmadinejad as successor to Khatami in 2005 led to concern in Turkey that the former ideological rivalry and the recurrent crises it generated might return to spoil relations. But this concern proved groundless. Ahmadinejad's domestic policy was similar to Khomeini's, but in foreign policy he maintained the Khatami course. Although his rhetoric toward Israel and some other countries was reminiscent of Khomeini's, no hostility was displayed toward Turkey. On the contrary, he was even more conciliatory toward Ankara than his predecessor had been.

The U-Turn in Iran's Policy toward the PKK

In the 1990s the most serious question in bilateral relations had been Iran's support for the PKK. In a dramatic shift a few years after the turn of the new century, the support came to an end. In fact, Iran began to cooperate militarily with Turkey in the struggle against the PKK.

It appeared that Iran's PKK policies were not indexed to Iran's internal dynamics but rather to U.S. and PKK policies. Apparently, Iran was merely reacting to the actions of the U.S. and the PKK. Until about 2000 Tehran had seen the PKK as a vehicle for reducing the effectiveness of Ankara and Baghdad in the region.

Iran also hoped to transfer the grievances of its own Kurds to Turkey and Iraq by siding with the PKK. These expectations changed with the capture of Öcalan in 1999 and the occupation of Iraq in 2003. The PKK's relations with Iran also worsened as a result of the squabbles that erupted within the organization after 1999. But, above all, it was Tehran's perception that the U.S. had begun to use the PKK as one of the tools against Iran after the occupation of Iraq, as well as the actions of the PKK confirming this perception, that brought on the final rupture. The militant antiregime Mujahedin-e Khalq group began to leave Turkey and headed to the U.S. and Europe (where it could operate more freely) and also to bases in Iraq. This removed a major obstacle to good bilateral relations. Iran responded by repeatedly bombing the PKK base at Kandil Dağı in Iraq, which continued to be a major source of irritation for Turkey.

Similarity of Views regarding the Occupation of Iraq With the occupation, Turkey and Iran began to get concerned about the territorial integrity of Iraq and took a common stand against the possibility of a new state in northern Iraq. There was also an identity of views on the need for the occupiers to turn over the administration to Iraqis as early as possible and to evacuate the country.

But the positions of the two countries were divergent in three areas. Iran was openly opposed to Turkey sending troops to Iraq and supported the Shiite Arabs, while Turkey sought to obtain a fairer share of Iraq's resources for the Sunni Arabs and Turcomans that would be proportionate to their actual numbers. Iran was also resentful that Turkey was providing many of the supplies needed to sustain the occupation. But these were minor issues that would be easily sorted out with time.

Iran's Nuclear Policy

Contrary to expectations, Turkish-Iranian relations were not affected by U.S. allegations about Tehran's nuclear ambitions. As U.S. pressure on Iran mounted, Tehran's efforts to improve relations with Turkey also increased.

Although Turkey's rhetoric was not that different from Iran's, Ankara made an effort to ensure that there was no confrontation with the U.S. Turkey kept repeating that, as a party to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT) and its annexed protocols, Iran was bound to observe the provisions that gave Iran certain rights but also imposed responsibilities. Consequently, Iran had a right to engage in the peaceful use of nuclear energy, including the enrichment of uranium, but it also had to allow full supervision of its activities by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). Ankara also declared that if the IAEA and the Security Council uncovered serious lapses in Iran's nuclear program and decided to impose sanctions, Turkey would observe the sanctions. Assuming that the Security Council would make no decision that would reflect on its relations with Turkey, Tehran announced that it was satisfied with Ankara's approach to this issue.

The Natural Gas Pipeline, Transport, and Tourism
The gas pipeline linking the two countries came into operation in December 2001. Turkey's purchases of gas shifted the balance of trade in favor of Iran. The Iranian market was protected by high customs barriers; to compensate for this, Turkish products would be given a chance to become more competitive in this market by lowering the duties on all Turkish imports to 4%.

Rail passenger services between İstanbul and Tehran were resumed. Ankara also allowed the opening of rail services between Tehran and Damascus via Turkey to enable Iranian pilgrims to visit the holy sites in greater comfort. The number of Iranian tourists visiting Turkey grew to more than half a million. Some of these visitors were coming to purchase Turkish goods for subsequent resale in their country. The obstacles and formalities hampering the transit of trucks were reduced to a minimum.

Two events marred these favorable developments. Although the Turkish firm TAV (Tepe, Akfen, Vie) had completed the construction of the Imam Khomeini Airport, the Iranian parliament denied the company the right to operate the facility, as provided in the contract. The parliament also blocked the firm Turkcell from acquiring a majority share in Iran's first private cell phone operator, even though Khatami made a special effort on behalf of the Turkish company. But these events did not stop Turkish investments in Iran. Turkish firms that wanted to take advantage of cheap energy and labor were eager to invest in Iran just as they had been doing in the Balkan countries.

The Freezing of Contentious Issues between Azerbaijan and Iran

In the 1990s Baku and Tehran had been at odds over the status of the Caspian Sea and the issues of Nagorno Karabakh and Azerbaijani nationalism. In the following decade these issues did not disappear, but they were allowed to drop from the active agenda. This lessened the likelihood of a confrontation between Turkey and Iran.

The last incident in the dispute between the two countries over this issue occurred in 2001, when an Azerbaijani exploration vessel searching for oil in the Azerbaijani sector of the Caspian Sea was harassed by the Iranian navy. As a warning to Iran, Turkey sent a formation of F-16 aircraft on a visit to Azerbaijan.

V. RELATIONS WITH THE CAUCASUS AND CENTRAL ASIA

In the first decade of the new century two radical and contradictory changes occurred in Turkey's relations with the region. Turkey lost much of its interest in the area even as its importance there kept on increasing.

Turkey's Withdrawal from the Region

In this period Turkey withdrew from a region in which it had displayed so much interest in the 1990s for a number of reasons.

Internal reasons: after Turkey was declared a candidate for membership at the EU's Helsinki Summit of 1999, Turkey's attention shifted toward the EU around the middle of 2001. The economic crisis of 2001 also had the effect of focusing Turkey's attention on its domestic problems. The attention of the AKP government that took over in November 2002 was firmly fixed on the EU. Moreover, the countries of the region had not found what they were speking in Turkey and began to lose interest in the relationship. This naturally affected Ankara's perception of the area. One reason why Turkey had been so interested in the region was the impression in Ankara that, with the demise of the USSR, Russia had ceased to count. When the true situation became apparent, Turkey's interest started to wane.

External reasons: with its occupation of Afghanistan in 2002, the U.S. changed its strategy and began to get more involved with the region. It acquired bases in Uzbekistan and Kyrgyzstan (which were subsequently lost) and obtained the right to use Kazakhstan's air space and make emergency landings there. The U.S. also made its influence felt through the various revolutions that took place, including the Orange Revolution and others. The revolutionary movement had its origin in Georgia, where American influence was preponderant, and spread from there to Ukraine. But the wave was unable to spill across the Caspian Sea. In Kyrgyzstan the opposition took to the streets and succeeded in gaining power; but in Azerbaijan Ilham Aliyev held onto power by associating himself more closely with the U.S. The revolutionary governments that came to power in Georgia and Ukraine were not all that successful. But these events demonstrated that, despite everything, the U.S. was the most influential power in the region.

In addition, the EU was beginning to take an interest in the region by including the southern Caucasus within its neighborhood policy and was getting more involved in the Black Sea region. On the other side of the globe, China also began to take a closer interest in the region through the Shanghai Cooperation Organization. There were substantial Chinese investments in Kazakhstan. As the major global actors made their influence felt to a much greater extent, the Turkish presence was receding into the background.

The changes in government in some of the region's countries also led to a cooling of relations with Turkey. One example was the new leader in Georgia, Mikheil Saakashvili, who was putting greater stress on nationalism and religion. Among his actions was the placing of a huge cross in Batumi, just across the Turkish border. All of this made Turkey uncomfortable. Georgia felt a similar discomfort over Turkey's close ties to Eduard Shevardnadze in the period of the changeover and Ankara's coolness toward the Rose Revolution there, not to mention the contacts that were maintained with the Abkhazians. Furthermore, Georgia acted in concert with Romania and Bulgaria to draw the U.S. into the Black Sea area, leaving it out of step with both Russia and Turkey.

A similar process was underway in Kyrgyzstan, where Turkey stood by Askar Akayev until the last moment. As soon as the new regime took over, rumors began to surface about alleged irregularities and bribes relating to Turkish investments. Turkey's unconditional support of İlham Aliyev aroused anger among the public in Azerbaijan.

Another sign of this new trend was the end of the spread of Fethullah Gülen schools in the region. In fact, their numbers began to decrease. These schools started to experience difficulties in securing funding, owing to the economic crises in Central Asia as well as in Turkey. As doubts about these schools began to grow in Turkey, a similar pattern emerged in the region. Finally, when Gülen settled in the U.S., talk spread among the Russian public that his community was in the service of U.S. intelligence.

Turkey Ascendant in the Region: Energy Pipelines

The completion of the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan (BTC) oil pipeline and Kazakhstan's decision to join the venture were sure to give a boost to Turkey's standing in the region over the medium and long term, even if its immediate effect was slight.

In addition to the BTC, other pipelines were boosting Turkey's standing in the region. In 2006 the Baku-Tbilisi-Erzurum (BTE) gas pipeline was nearing completion. Contrary to the expectations of many, the Blue Stream project (with the partnership of the Italian energy giant ENI [Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi]) was completed and began to move natural gas on the seabed of the Black Sea directly from Russia to Turkey. Projects were initiated to ship natural gas to Greece and Italy through Turkey. Multinational oil firms, as well as the Russian energy giant Lukoil, went ahead with plans to construct oil refineries in Ceyhan. As a result of the chaotic situation in Iraq and the possibility that Iran might come under an American/ Israeli attack or have an embargo imposed on it, the price of energy began to spiral upward. This enhanced the importance of the pipelines crossing Turkey. In addition, new lines were being planned to carry oil from Samsun to Ceyhan. Finally, there were plans to connect the Turkish natural gas network with the Middle East under the Mediterranean Sea. As a consequence of these developments, the Caucasus began to be perceived not as a part of Eurasia but as a part of the Euro-Atlantic region. It was natural for the importance of Turkey, as a neighbor of the region, to rise at the same time.

VI. RELATIONS WITH THE RUSSIAN FEDERATION

Visits by the Russian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister

On 23–25 October 2000 prime minister Mikhail Kasianov paid a visit to Ankara that produced notable results. He proposed that Turkey become a strategic partner. Although the exact content of this proposal was not clear, soon afterward the littoral states of the Black Sea established the Black Sea Peace Force (Blackseafor) on 2 April 2001, with headquarters in Istanbul. Its task would be to engage in maritime search and rescue operations, humanitarian assistance, measures to clear mines, protection of the environment, and other tasks that the contracting parties might wish to assign. The agreement was ratified in August, and the first exercise was carried out from the naval base at Gölcük in Turkey.

The timing of foreign minister Igor Ivanov Ivanov's visit on 7-8 June 2001 was significant. Previously, the U.S. had announced its new energy policy. Turkey was blocking the European Security and Defense Policy, the public in Turkey was engrossed with the "White Energy" scandal that also involved the Blue Stream project, relations between Iran and Azerbaijan had grown tense in June, Russia had bombed Georgia for helping the Chechen insurgents, and Chechen militants in Turkey had attempted to highjack a plane, followed by a hostage-taking incident at the Swissotel in Istanbul. The agenda before the ministers included cooperation against terrorism, Turkish support against the Chechens, the construction of the Baku-Ceyhan pipeline, the prevention of the passage of nuclear wastes through the Straits, and cooperation in the Eurasian region. On 16 November 2001 the Action Plan for Cooperation in Eurasia was signed. The text laid stress on the Eurasian identity of both countries and, for the first time, went into a detailed description of various fields of cooperation.

Military Cooperation

Another milestone in relations was the signing of the Framework Agreement on Cooperation in the Military Field and Agreement on Cooperation in Military Training on 15 January 2002. These agreements were signed during a visit to Turkey by the Russian chief of the General Staff Anatoly Krashnin, which coincided with Prime Minister Ecevit's visit to the U.S. Under the provisions of these agreements, Russia would sell military technology to Turkey, and Turkey would manufacture Russian-designed equipment; the future Baku-Ceyhan pipeline would be jointly defended; the military academies would cooperate; and collaboration would extend into areas like the struggle against PKK and Chechen terrorists. Cooperation was also envisaged in the ongoing operation in Afghanistan.

When Romania and Bulgaria proposed the extension of the operations of NATO forces into the Black Sea region, Turkey and Russia blocked this. Turkey was worried about possible violations of the Montreux Straits Convention, while Russia was concerned about U.S. domination of the Black Sea. Both countries were in favor of preserving the existing balance in the Black Sea.

Visits by Members of the AKP Government

Even before the momentous events of 2003 had pushed the issue of relations with Russia into the background, Erdoğan went to Moscow prior to assuming his duties as prime minister and had a meeting with President Putin on 24 December 2002. This was followed by the visit of Foreign Minister Gül to Moscow on 23–25 February 2003. The issues taken up during the talks were cooperation against terrorism, the balance-of-trade deficit, difficulties in the implementation of the Blue Stream agreement, and problems encountered in navigation through the Straits.

One of the pressing issues in the agenda was cooperation against terrorism. In general, Moscow was satisfied with Turkey's approach to the Chechen question. Mustafa Yıldırım, who had taken thirteen persons hostage at the Marmara Hotel on 4 May 2002, was condemned to a prison term of thirty-six years on 12 July 2004. Following the Beslan hostage-taking incident, however, Russian minister of defense Sergey Ivanov announced that between 1999 and 2004 there were twenty-four Turkish nationals among the terrorists killed in Chechnya.

Economic Relations

For Turkey, the main concern in this field was the yawning trade gap. The volume of trade began to grow, especially after the natural gas projects came into operation. Trade, which stood at close to $10 billon in 1997, fell by about half as a consequence of the 1998 crisis but rose to $9 billion in 2004. Meanwhile the trade gap grew from $1.3 billion in 1999 to $2.7 in 2000 and then to almost $5 billion in 2004. The almost total disappearance of the luggage trade also contributed to the growth of the gap. With the disappearance of this trade, Turkey lost an important asset in its effort to overcome the gap. The luggage trade, which stood at $4 billion in 2002, fell sharply when limitations were imposed on the quantity and value of goods that could be imported by travelers, starting on 1 January 2003. All items over 50 kilograms in weight and $1,000 in value per traveler became liable to customs duties and VAT as they entered Russia.

Tourism, another element that helped compensate for the trade gap, maintained its buoyancy. The number of Russian visitors grew from 1 million in 2002 to 1.2 million in 2003 and to 1.7 million in 2004, placing the Russian tourists in second place after the Germans.

The Blue Stream project came into operation on 20 February 2003 and remained on the agenda all through the year. The "White Energy" scandal arose in large measure because Turkey had not been able to complete its domestic gas distribution network. Another item being discussed with Russia is the establishment of an oil pipeline that will bypass the Straits in order to alleviate the oil tanker traffic. The two routes being considered are the Samsun-Ceyhan line and the Black Sea—Aegean line from Kıyıköy on the Black Sea to Saros on the Aegean.

The construction of the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline, at a cost of approximately $3 billion, was begun on 25 June 2002, and the first oil reached Ceylan at the end of 2005. The line became fully operational in July 2006.

Putin was due to visit Turkey for the first time on 2 and 3 September 2004, but this had to be postponed to 5–6 December because of the hostage-taking at Beslan. The timing of this visit was seen as support for Turkey at a time when the European Summit was scheduled to decide on 17 December about beginning accession talks with Turkey. Following the visit, Gasprom and Botaş signed a framework agreement on energy cooperation.

In January and May 2005 Prime Minister Erdoğan made official visits to Moscow, followed by the Sochi summit in July. At this summit, it was decided to raise the volume of bilateral trade from $11 billion to $25 billion in three years.

Person-to-person contact between the two countries, which consisted mostly of the sex trade in the 1990s, acquired a completely different dimension, with mixed Turkish-Russian marriages reaching 80,000.

Bilateral relations developed positively during this period. This was in some measure due to the good relations that had been established with the USSR in its last decade of existence. The agreements signed with Russia during Putin's presidency demonstrated that more positive developments can be expected in the future.

VII. RELATIONS WITH BALKAN NEIGHBORS

Starting in 2000, the basic parameters in the Balkans underwent radical changes.

Stability and Borders

The old, warring generation gradually disappeared from the scene, and a certain measure of stability was established. Aside from the brief and (by Balkan standards) relatively bloodless Albanian uprising in Macedonia, peace and stability were gradually restored throughout the region. With the secession of Macedonia from Serbia, the process of disintegration of the former Yugoslav Federation was completed, with Kosovo remaining as the most contentious place. The negotiations over the final status of this territory under UN administration were going on in Vienna. (Kosovo unilaterally declared independence on 17 February 2008.)

The U.S. and the EU

The U.S. approach to the Balkan region underwent drastic changes in the new millennium. For the Bush administration, the Middle East and Central Asia had strategic priority, and the U.S. allowed the EU to assume responsibility in the Balkans, declaring that this was done in the name of cooperation. In line with this policy, the U.S. forces in the region were rapidly reduced. Whereas 20,000 American troops were stationed in Bosnia in 1996, their members had dwindled to about 5,000 troops spread out in Bosnia, Kosovo, and Macedonia by 2006.

When the EU assumed the political and economic responsibility for the region, it designated Greece (the sole EU member in the Balkans) as its representative and spokesperson in the region. Following a shift in its Balkan policy in 1996, Greece mended its relations first with Albania and then with Macedonia as it built up its economic presence in the region. Greece took over the responsibility for distributing and disbursing EU funds among the Balkan countries and assumed the task of preparing them for EU membership based on its own experience. In this framework, the EU's Thessaloniki Summit in 2003 opened up the perspective of eventual EU memberships for these countries. A bank was set up, with its headquarters located in Thessaloniki. Having achieved internal peace, Bulgaria and Romania were awaiting full membership in 2007, and all the Balkan countries found it in their strategic interest to pursue policies of friendship toward Greece.

In preparation for membership, the EU signed Stability and Partnership Agreements first with Macedonia and then with Albania and Croatia. The signing of a similar agreement with Serbia was postponed until Belgrade agreed to cooperate in the handing over of Ratko Mladic and Radovan Karadzic to the War Crimes Tribunal.

These developments made accession to the EU the main concern of the Balkan states and pushed Turkey into a marginalized position in the region. Other developments contributed to Turkey's marginalization in the Balkans: the economic crisis of 2001 that severely jolted the Turkish economy, Turkey's own concerns about accession to the EU, and the withdrawal of the U.S. from the region, which left Ankara without its main source of support.

VIII. HUMAN RIGHTS

In 1998 the ECHR reached a decision on the Titina Loizidou case relating to her property rights in Northern Cyprus, which went against Turkey. By agreeing to pay compensation in December 2003, Ankara was able to overcome this contentious issue. Ankara also agreed to reach a friendly settlement over the property of the Assumption priests.

During this period Turkey made very significant progress in the field of human rights legislation.

Turkey's progress was in three different categories. As explained earlier (see "Politics" above), the first category consisted of the comprehensive constitutional amendments introduced in October 2001 and the eight EU harmonization packages. The second category included the Turkish Civil Code of 22 November 2001, the Turkish Penal Code of 26 September 2004, and the Penal Procedural Code of 4 December 2004. These changes made significant improvements in Turkey's legislation. The third category was Turkey's accession to the principal human rights conventions, through which Turkey engaged itself to comply with international commitments. Among these were the Convention for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (adhered to on 16 September 2002), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights (adhered to on 13 September 2003), and the Thirteenth Protocol of the European Convention on Human Rights, completely banning the death penalty (adhered to on 20 February 2006).

With these arrangements, Turkey's legislative short-comings in the areas of democracy, human rights, the establishment of the rule of law, and, above all, the abolition of the death penalty were rectified to a very large extent. The interpretation and implementation of the new legislation by the administration and judiciary left much to be desired, however, and many of the old problems persisted.

The main reason for this was the judiciary's unwillingness or inability to adapt itself to the new legislation, because its mentality made it difficult to abandon old practices and conform to new rules. Therefore this period has been a time of transition in complying with human rights norms.

IX. THE ISSUE OF THE TURKISH STRAITS The Transit Regime

Positive Developments at the IMO (International Maritime Organization): Turkey had met with criticism at the IMO for its regulation of 1994 and 1998 governing navigation through the Turkish Straits. Starting in 1999, developments at the IMO took a more positive course for Turkey.

In May 1999 the decision was made to delete this question from the IMO's agenda on the condition that Turkey would establish a Vessel Traffic Services (VTS) system in the Straits and adopt the other necessary technical measures. This reversal on the IMO's part was not unrelated to the policies of the U.S. with reference to energy transport routes and particularly the Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan (BTC) oil pipeline. In fact, President Clinton was a witness at the adoption of the Istanbul Declaration regarding the BTC in November 1999, signed by Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Turkey.

The coming into operation of the VTS system in the Straits: parallel to these developments at the IMO, Turkey invited tenders for the Maritime Traffic and Information System in the Turkish Straits, and the actual building got underway in 2001. The system (consisting of thirteen radar towers) came into operation on 30 December 2003. This system enabled all ships to be monitored electronically twenty-four hours a day and advised captains on navigation conditions. From 2003 to 2005 there were some cases of ships breaking down, but not a single maritime accident in the Straits.

Changes in legislation: the transit regime that came into operation in 1998 was maintained until 2006. To cope with the increasing number of ships and their changing characteristics, however, certain changes to the 1998 regulation were introduced in October 2002. One of these changes was the requirement imposed on ships of over 200 meters laden with dangerous cargos to transit the Straits in daytime unless there were overriding reasons to do otherwise. In addition, it became mandatory for vessels over 500 gross tons and those carrying dangerous cargos to be in possession of internationally valid insurance policies and international environmental safety certificates.

The Straits and international energy transportation routes: during this period the outcome of the BTC pipeline issue was decided. The saga began in 1994 with the signing of an agreement in Baku, followed in 1998 by the signing of a memorandum of understanding by Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Turkey. The three national parliaments ratified the agreement in 2000, and actual construction began in 2002. The first shipment of oil arrived at Ceyhan at the end of 2005. Thus, in addition to the relief created by the new VTS system in the Straits, the congested waterway would henceforth be relieved of the tankers that had been transporting oil from Azerbaijan.

Early in 2004 a new threat to the Straits began to loom. As a result of the increased global demand for petroleum and the negative developments in the Middle East, there was talk of a fivefold increase in the flow of Kazakh and Russian oil through the Straits by 2010. This led to the consideration of the Samsun-Ceyhan oil pipeline project after 2004. At first, it was rumored that Russia and the oil companies were not much in favor of the project; but the Turkish government clarified the position after consultations with interested parties. In May 2006 the decree granting the responsibility to undertake the preparations for the project to an energy company was approved by the government. When realized, this project will turn Ceyhan into a world-class oil terminal and relieve the Straits of the flow of Kazakh and Russian oil, with all the threats that such flows imply for the waterway.

Conclusions: Turkey was successful in demonstrating the threats that excessive tanker traffic posed to the Straits. This helped Ankara in furthering its policy of routing energy pipelines through Turkish territory. The threat to the Straits is real, and Ankara used this threat with skill to achieve its goal of obtaining approval for its other projects. As a result, Ankara achieved its dual objective of carrying out its energy projects while also developing a new regime and technical infrastructure to ensure safety of navigation through the Straits.

The Effect of 9/11 on the Turkish Straits

In 2005 and 2006 the U.S. pursued a policy of enhancing its presence in the Black Sea. Inevitability, this policy placed the provisions of the Montreux Straits Convention on the international agenda.

1. After 9/11 the U.S. intensified its struggle against terrorism and, in this context, initiated Operation Active Endeavor in the eastern Mediterranean region. This enabled the U.S. to monitor maritime traffic in the Mediterranean. The U.S. sought a similar arrangement in the Black Sea region, with its network of energy transportation routes. In this connection, it concluded a treaty with Romania in December 2005 that provided for the establishment of an American naval base at Constanta.

- 2. The freedom of movement of the U.S. (as a non-littoral state of the Black Sea) in this area, however, was severely constrained by the terms of the Montreux Convention: in peacetime, nonlittoral states cannot maintain warships in the Black Sea in excess of a total of 30,000 tons (in specific situations, this ceiling can go up to 45,000 tons). Furthermore, their stay in the Black Sea cannot exceed twenty-one days.
- 3. Even if Turkey and Russia did not look upon the U.S. presence with much sympathy, the U.S. policy in this respect, if seriously pursued, would lead to a reinterpretation of the provisions of the Montreux Convention in a way that would dilute these limitations in order to conform to changing circumstances. Worse still, such a situation might even lead to arguments to revise the Montreux Convention (as occurred in the 1990s). This possibility would keep Turkish policy-makers preoccupied for some time to come.

X. GENERAL APPRAISAL OF THE PERIOD FROM 2001 TO 2006

Domestic Politics

With the events of 11 September 2001, the world entered a period of intensified fear and nationalism. This led to a serious erosion of freedom everywhere. Paradoxically, this was a period when Turkey was becoming much freer, thanks to the modernizing reforms being carried out to meet EU standards.

Nevertheless, it can be said that the general atmosphere gripping the world was also spreading to Turkey, where the Sèvres syndrome and the coming into power of an "Islamist" party made an already heavy atmosphere even more difficult. The slightest provocation was enough to bring lynch mobs out into the streets in city centers. For the first time in its history, Turkey was attempting to become a country of laws. Instead, it started heading toward becoming a "lynch state."

Foreign Policy

At this time, Turkey's foreign policy also began to take shape under the shadow of 9/11 and the U.S. effort to impose its hegemony on the Middle East by force of arms.

Even as Turkey struggled to adapt itself to the new conditions prevailing after the end of the Cold War, it had to make an additional effort to adjust to the changed conditions once again. Under normal conditions, it would be expected that the U.S. would easily succeed in giving direction to Ankara's foreign policy, at least in the short term. This was because one of the characteristic features of a strategic middle-sized power is that it feels it must always be on the agenda of the hegemonic power. Turkey needed the U.S. to be on its side for two important reasons. Turkey felt compelled to cooperate with the IMF (always under the strong influence of Washington) to shore up its economy, ever vulnerable because of widespread corruption and permanently threatened with recurring crises. Another reason for depending on Washington's backing was that Turkey had not been able to solve its foreign policy problems at a national level because of an unduly nationalistic approach to these issues. Notable among these unresolved issues were the Kurdish, Armenian, and Cypriot questions.

These expectations of continued U.S. influence over Ankara did not come to pass, however, because of the neo-con–inspired policies in the Middle East, which had two contradictory effects on Turkey.

- 1. The anxiety-producing effect: it should not be forgotten that a strategic middle-sized power only breathes free when balance is prevailing. At this time, there was no trace of balance in the Middle East. Furthermore, Turkey's border regions were in danger of being submerged in chaos both during the Gulf War of 1991 and during the attack on Iraq in 2003. Under these circumstances, Turkey could follow two courses.
- a. Turkey could comply with U.S. wishes. In this case, Turkey would become a "pivotal" state that was dependent on the U.S. In practice, this would drag Turkey into the Middle East quagmire and antagonize neighbors whose populations were predominantly Muslim. Turkey had gone through this experience during the Menderes period, from 1950 to 1960. It would also lead to a loss of the relative autonomy that Turkey had built up in the 1960s and 1970s.

b. Turkey could distance itself from the U.S. In practice, this would be a difficult option. As a strategic middle-sized power, Turkey could not afford to be dropped from the agenda of the hegemon. That is why Ankara agreed to send troops to Afghanistan in October 2001 and to Lebanon on 5 September 2006, without, however, getting caught up in the quagmire. The first decision was easy for the government; in the case of the second decision, however, it had to overcome the opposition of NGOs that had become more vocal and more experienced after the rejection of the government motion of 1 March 2003. But the government appeared more determined in this case, and the opposition of NGOs was overcome.

2. The opportunity-creating effect: the neo-con policies would not be able to dominate a region like the Middle East by relying exclusively on Israel. This offered numerous opportunities for Turkey.

For a strategic middle-sized power to breathe, a balance is as essential as oxygen. It is effective to the extent that there is a regional and global balance. These powers are particularly adept at establishing their relative autonomy, which is inherent in all countries. To achieve this, they sometimes have to produce their own oxygen (see Box Intro-6 in the Introduction).

If the U.S. had continued to pursue the policies of the Clinton administration, Turkey might have come under greater U.S. influence. But the neo-cons embarked on an imperialism that eliminated all semblance of balance. This policy made it essential for Washington to rely on Turkey in addition to Israel. This, in turn, led to much American pressure on Turkey but at the same time expanded Turkey's room for maneuver. In a Middle East where the existing balance had been upset, Turkey found the oxygen it required by moving closer to Syria and Iran during the crises in Iraq and Lebanon. On the issues of energy routes and the access of the U.S. Navy to the Black Sea, Turkey moved closer to Russia. Especially on the issue of revising the Montreux Convention (which represented balance for Turkey), Ankara established a kind of alliance with Russia. Turkey was almost pushed into following this course because of the neo-cons, who operated under the banner "those who are not with us are against us."

Turkey undertook the Blue Stream project with Russia in 1998, when Clinton was president and Turkish-U.S. relations were excellent. The objective that was being sought with this project was not balance. The real objective was to meet the growing demand for energy in Turkey, with the more sinister aims of profit and corruption lurking in the background. The Blue Stream project eventually turned into a rival of the East-West energy corridor that the U.S. had been backing so energetically. Blue Stream was used by Russia to frustrate American efforts to isolate it in the field of energy. Due to the need for balance/oxygen of a strategic medium-sized power both in its region and in the wider Black Sea area, a project that had been conceived to attain other objectives acquired a completely different purpose as well.

The effect of the Kurdish question: against the background of these developments, the Kurdish question continued, as always, to rob Turkish foreign policy of its rationality. Turkish policy vis-à-vis Iraq (especially northern Iraq) was always regarded in Turkey as being in the realm of domestic rather than foreign policy, because this policy was indexed directly and exclusively to Turkey's Kurdish question. Due to "Sèvres paranoia," Ankara had never been able to turn its own Kurds into "voluntary citizens." Instead they remained a collection of "compulsory citizens" and could therefore not be trusted. This automatically led to a policy of total opposition to any semblance of a Kurdish state in northern Iraq. Ankara began to draw "red lines" in a neighboring country that were beyond its capacity to enforce. Inevitably, this resulted in loss of prestige. For these reasons, Turkey's ability to formulate rational policies in the Middle East and particularly in northern Iraq remained constricted.

The AKP's Policies

In many ways, the AKP government that assumed power in November 2002 resembled Özal's Motherland Party administration. It by-passed the traditional institutions of the state and relied on Turkish citizens as advisors that had lived and worked in the U.S. Its foreign policy catered to the inclinations of the American Jewish lobby. It sought contacts with key individuals within the U.S. administration and maintained close links with think tanks that were close to the neo-cons. At the same time, the new government sought to expand its freedom of maneuver by tackling ossified questions such as Cyprus and the Kurds in order to minimize their influence on the direction of Turkey's foreign policy.

But the AKP had drawn the necessary lessons from the experience of the Welfare Party and Virtue Party. In addition, NGOs had developed significantly in recent years. As a result, the AKP did not follow in the Motherland Party's tracks. It made a special effort not to find itself at odds with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs or the army. Where it really differed from the Motherland Party, however, was in its ideology. The AKP was not bound to the ideology of the nation-state, with its strong attachment to the concept of assimilation—something that was out of step with modern practices. The AKP was not nationalistic. Thus, instead of focusing on the concepts of "Turkishness," it preferred the concept of "belonging to Turkey." Before it came under the influence of the wave of Turkish nationalism that swept the country after 2004, the AKP was quite close to modern ideas that found their expression within the context of the EU's Copenhagen Criteria. In other words, the AKP, which was the latest manifestation of the current that was a reaction to Kemalism, also adopted the practices of modernization that had been launched by Kemalism.

Obviously, the AKP, representing the fast-rising conservative "Anatolian capital," was never anti-West, as alleged by certain quarters in the latter part of 2006. On the contrary, it made a real effort to appease the U.S. over the 1 March government motion. This was clearly seen when the decision was made to send Turkish peacekeeping forces to Lebanon.

The report "Transatlantic Tendencies 2006" (issued by the joint American-German-Italian pollsters in September 2006) noted that those who looked upon the U.S. with sympathy in Turkey had fallen from 28% in 2004 to 20%. During the same interval, those who looked upon Iran with sympathy had risen from 34% to 43%. These changes had nothing to do with a reorientation of Turkey's foreign policy from West to East. The rapprochement with Syria, Iran, and Russia might in a way be related to the conservative Islamic tendencies of the AKP but in reality was the instinctive move of a strategic middle-sized power to establish a balance of power in the region.

Baskin Oran

Contributors

Authors

- Atay Akdevelioğlu (akdeveli@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Research Assistant in International Relations, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - 1919–1923: "Relations with Afghanistan," "Relations with the Indian Muslims and the Caliphate Movement."
  - 1923–1939: "Relations with the Middle East."
  - 1919–1923, 1945–1960, 1960–1980, 1980–1990, 1990–2001: "Relations with Iran."
  - Various boxes.
- Gökçen Alpkaya (alpkaya@politics.ankara.edu.tr),
  Associate Professor of International Law, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - 1980–1990 and 1990–2001: "The Issue of Human Rights."
  - · Various boxes.
- Tuğrul Arat (tarat@etu.edu.tr), Professor of International Private Law, University of Economics and Technology, Ankara.
  - 1960-1980: "Relations with the EEC."
  - 1980–1990: "Relations with the European Communities (ECs)."
  - 1990–2001: "Relations with the EU."

- Mustafa Aydın (maydin@khas.edu.tr), Professor of International Relations, Kadir Has University, Istanbul.
  - 1939–1945: "World War II and Turkey, 1939–1945."
  - 1990–2001: "Relations with the Caucasus and Central Asia."
  - Various boxes.
- Sanem Baykal (baykal@law.ankara.edu.tr), Associate Professor of European Union Law, Faculty of Law, Ankara University.
  - 1990-2001: "Relations with the EU."
  - Various boxes.

Front row (from left to right) Baskın Oran (ed.), Melek Fırat, Tuğrul Arat, Funda Keskin, Mustafa Aydın, Sanem Baykal.

Back row Atay Akdevelioğlu, İlhan Uzgel, Hikmet Uluğbay, Kudret Özersay, Çağrı Erhan, Gökçen Alpkaya, Erel Tellal

- Çağrı Erhan (erhan@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Professor of Diplomatic History, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - 1945–1960 and 1960–1980: "Relations with the USA and NATO."
  - 1945–1960, 1960–1980, 1980–1990, 1990–2001: "Relations with Israel."
  - 1960–1980: "Relations with the EEC."
  - 1980–1990: "Relations with the European Communities (ECs)."
  - · Various boxes.
- Melek Fırat (firat@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Professor of Diplomatic History, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - 1919-1923: "Relations with Arab Countries."
  - 1923-1939: "The Question of Sancak (Hatay)."
  - 1919–1923, 1923–1939, 1945–1960, 1960–1980, 1980– 1990, 1990–2001: "Relations with Greece."
  - 1945--1960, 1960--1980, 1980--1990, 1990--2001: "Relations with Arab States."
  - Various boxes.
- Ömer Kürkçüoğlu (kurkcuog@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Professor of Diplomatic History, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - 1919–1923 and 1923–1939: "Relations with Britain."
  - 1923–1939: "The Question of Sancak (Hatay)."
  - 1919–1923, 1923–1939, 1945–1960, 1960–1980, 1980–1990, 1990–2001: "Relations with the Middle East."
- Baskın Oran (oran@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Professor Emeritus of International Relations, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - · Preface.
  - Introduction: "Basic Factors Influencing Turkish Foreign Policy," "The Military, Political, and Economic Background of Turkish Foreign Policy," "The Guiding Principles of Turkish Foreign Policy," "The Ministry of Foreign Affairs."
  - 1919–1923: "The Armistice of Mudros," "The Peace Treaty of Sèvres," "The Armistice of Mudanya," "The Peace Treaty of Lausanne."
  - 1919–1923, 1923–1939, 1939–1945, 1945–1960, 1960–1980, 1980–1990, 1990–2001: "Appraisal of the Period."
  - 2001–2006.
  - · Various boxes.

- Kudret Özersay (kudret.ozersay@emu.edu.tr),
  Associate Professor of International Law, Eastern Mediterranean University, Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus.
  - 1923-1939: "The Montreux Straits Convention."
  - 1980–1990 and 1990–2001: "The Issue of the Turkish Straits."
  - Various boxes.
- Erel Tellal (tellal@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Associate Professor of Diplomatic History, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - 1919-1923: "Relations with the Soviets."
  - 1923–1939, 1945–1960, 1960–1980, 1980–1990: "Relations with the USSR."
  - 1990-2001: "Relations with Russia."
  - Various boxes.
- Ilhan Uzgel (uzgel@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Professor of International Relations, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
  - Introduction: "The Formulation of Turkish Foreign Policy."
  - 1919–1923 and 1923–1939: "Relations with Britain,"
     "Relations with France," "Relations with Italy,"
     "Relations with Germany."
  - 1923–1939: "Turkey and the Issues of International Security."
  - 1980–1990 and 1990–2001: "Relations with the USA and NATO."
  - 1980–1990 and 1990–2001: "Relations with the Balkans."
  - Various boxes.

Authors of Boxes and Tables

- Hakan Bingün, Doctoral Student, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
- Funda Keskin (keskin@politics.ankara.edu.tr), Associate Professor of International Law, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
- Hasan Köni, Professor of International Relations, Bahçeşehir University, Istanbul.
- Nimet Özbek, Research Assistant in International Private Law, Faculty of Political Science (Mülkiye), Ankara University.
- Hikmet Uluğbay (hikmetulugbay@yahoo.com), former Minister of State in charge of the economy.

Index

6–7 September 1955 events, 359, 375, 658, 794
12 March 1971 (military memorandum), 403,
433
12 September 1980 (military coup), 40, 42,
404, 515, 522, 527–30, 533–34, 540–46,
569–70, 583–85, 595–96
24 April 2004 Referenda, 928
24 January 1980 Package of Measures, 525–26
27 May 1960 (military coup), 40, 397,
400–402, 410, 432–36, 474–77, 499–500
28 February 1997 process, 44, 865–68

Abas, Hiram, 42 Abdel Nasser, Gamal, 328, 386 Abdulilah, Prince Regent (of Iraq), 369 Abdullah, King (of Jordan), 117, 369 Abdurrahman Bey, 120 Abkhazia/Abkhazians, 778 Abramowitz, Morton, 695 Abu Ghraib prison, 894, 895, 897, 923 Accession Partnership Document (APD), 742-45, 849, 923 Accession Treaty (1 May 2004; Republic of Cyprus), 923 Acheson, Dean, 321, 439 Acheson Plan, 439 Açıkalın, Cevat, 268, 277 Action Plan for Cooperation in Eurasia, 933 Adana Agreement, 266–68, 929 Adana Meeting, 266–68 Additional Protocol (1973), 509–16, 572, 730-32, 923 Administrative High Court, 911-13 Adrias (warship), 346 Aegean islands, 275, 345, 452–53, 459, 805–9 Aegean Sea, 453–56, 583, 587–88, 741 Afghanistan, 120-21: attack on, 595, 915, 922; occupation of, 892 Aga Khan, 122 Aga, Mehmet Emin, 793–94 Ağar, Mehmet, 659, 863, 909 Agenda 2000, 735–36, 811 Agos (newspaper), 912

Agreement on Cooperation in Military

Training, 691, 760, 828, 933

Ahmad Khan, 121 Ahmadinejad, Mahmud, 930 Ahmet Muhtar Bey, 97 Ahmet, Sadık, 793-95 Airborne Warning and Control Systems (AWACS) aircraft, 12 airspace, 457-58 Akayev, Askar, 755, 757-58, 932 Akaygen, Mehmet Enis, 208, 217 Akbulut, Yıldırım, 530, 534, 679, 857, 875 AKEL. See Progressive Party of the Working People (AKEL [Cyprus]) AKP, See Justice and Development Party (AKP) Akritas Plan, 436-37 Aksu, Abdülkadir, 605 Aktan, Gündüz, 707 Al Baraka Turk, 597 al-Gannushi, Rashid, 863 al-Qaeda, 893 Al-Quds (newspaper), 918 al-Sadr, Muqtada, 920 Alarko, 566 Albania, 164, 625-26, 827-28, 934 Albright, Madeleine, 649, 722 Alevi/Alawite, 911 Alexander, King (of Greece), 106 Alexandroupolis (Dedeağaç), 697, 820 Algerian war of independence, 372, 380, 475-76. Algiers Agreement (1975), 485-86, 557 Ali Galip, 155 Alia, Ramiz, 628, 817 Aliyev, Heydar, 47, 653, 669, 769-71, 878 Aliyev, İlham, 932 Allende, Salvador, 13, 896 Alptemoçin, Ahmet Kurtcebe, 859 Altan, Çetin, 486 Amanullah Khan, 120, 220 Amasya Declaration, 105 Amasya, Treaty of (1555), 217 America. See U.S. "American Century," 892 American Oil Company (Amoco), 695 American way of life, 320, 324

Ağrı uprisings/Mount Ağrı, 219

amicable settlement, 643 Amsterdam Treaty/Amsterdam Summit, 490, 715, 735-36 ANAP. See Motherland Party (ANAP) Anatolian Movement, 55-60, 65, 79, 105 Anendotos, 433 Ankara Agreement: of 1921, 167, 169, 170, 173; of 1963, 398, 503-8, 570, 572, 589, 730, 733, 738, 923-24 Ankara Convention (1930), 208–9, 807 Ankara Document (2001), 922-23 Ankara government, 91, 154, 916-17 Ankara Process, 686-87 Ankara Treaty (1925), 109 Annan, Kofi, 810, 865, 894 Annan Plan/Annan Referendum (2004), 923, 927-28 Ansar-al-Islam, 920 anti-Americanism, 408, 412, 428, 522, 894, 897, 913, 922-23 Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty, 522, 714,892 anticommunism/anti-Communist, 294, 303, ,309, 314, 328, 335, 349, 383, 408, 471, 485, 522, 630, 658, 660, 750, 913 anti-imperialism, 59, 79, 80, 90, 150, 304, 395, 400-401, 616, 913 anti-NATO sentiment, 39, 331, 467, 542 anti-Semitism, 382, 619, 895, 912 antiterror struggle, 916 antithesis, 77, 296, 690 anti-U.S. feelings. See anti-Americanism antiwar protesters, 917 AP. See Justice Party (AP) Apakan, Ertuğrul, 890 apartheid, 395, 637 Aphrodite Plan, 447 Andreas Apostolos (magazine), 353 Appalachia-Turkey Trade Project, 702 appeasement, 152, 163 Arab countries, 326, 368–69, 474–81, 595–610, 857-68 Arabism, 3, 475, 539 Arab-Israeli War: of 1948, 369, 383; 1967, 11, 338, 446, 477, 482; of 1973, 394, 483 Arab League, 382, 484, 860, 862, 873

Arab nationalism, 162, 168, 173 Arafat, Yasser, 484, 598, 874, 929 Aralov, S. I., 100, 150 Arapakis, (Admiral) Dimitris, 448 Arapoğlu, Konstantinos VI, 206 Aras, Tevfik Rüştü, 36-37, 151, 158, 164, 169, 176, 178, 179, 184~85, 188-90, 192, 211, 219, 345, 347 ARGK. See People's Liberation Army of Kurdistan (ARGK) Arınç, Bülent, 904, 910 Armée Secrète Arménienne pour la Libération de l'Arménie (ASALA), 134, 531-33, 535, 555, 601, 612, 773 Armenia/Armenian, 55-56, 67, 74, 304-5, 697, 879; bills, 535, 555-58, 666-67, 702, 706–8, 721, 773; and deportation, 56, 58, 130, 147, 773; diaspora, 56, 666, 697, 771-77; genocide, 56, 68, 555, 667, 699, 702, 706-8, 771-77, 872; lobby, 535, 555, 691, 699, 706-7, 869 Armenian National Council of America (ANCA), 776 Armenian National Institute, 706 Armenian National Movement, 771, 777 Army Post Offices (APO [U.S]), 333, 417 Aron paradigm, 9, 287 ASALA. See Armée Secrète Arménienne pour la Libération de l'Arménie (ASALA) Asea Brown Boveri, Ltd. (ABB), 894 Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC), 676 Askeri Elektronik Sanayii (Aselsan), 567, 721 Assad, Bashar, 868, 873, 929 Assad, Hafez, 601, 602, 705, 859, 860, 867, 872, 929 Assad, Rifad, 600, 601, 867 association agreement, 502, 732 Association of Industrialists and Businessmen of the Southeast (GÜNSİAD), Atalay, Beşir, 924 Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal, 23, 36, 150–51, 172–73, 210, 904. See also Kemal, M. Ates, Atilla, 44, 866 Athens Agreement (1961), 501, 503–4 Athens Treaty (1926), 207 atomic bomb, 298, 302, 327 Attila Line, 451 Australia, 205, 335, 336, 776, 912 Averoff, Evangelos, 363 Avrasya (ferryboat), 29, 657 "axis of evil," 893 Aybar, Mehmet Ali, 293, 323, 400 Aydemir, Talat, 267, 438, 476 Aydın, Vedat, 843 Aydınlar Ocağı (Hearth of the Intellectuals), 22-23, 529 Azadistan, Republic of, 119

Azerbaijan/Azerbaijani: Democratic Republic of, 312, 389, 524, 534, 653, 669, 708, 753, 767-71, 850; nationalism, 487, 653, 753-54; sector, 95, 96 Azerbaijan Popular Front, 753 Aziz, Tarıq, 858 Baath, 475, 599 Babacan, Ali, 890 Baghdad, 859, 879, 916, 919 Baghdad Pact, 162, 294, 306, 335–36, 338, 369-75, 377, 386-87, 872 Baker, James, 534, 678, 757 Bakhtiar, Shahpur, 877 Baku-Ceyhan pipeline/Baku-Tbilisi-Ceyhan pipeline (BTC), 690, 696-97, 722, 779, 787-88, 932, 933, 934 Baku Congress (1920), 90 Baku incidents, 753-55, 769-70, 775 Baku Summit, 765-66 Baku-Supsa pipeline, 779 Baku-Tbilisi-Erzurum (BTE) pipeline, 695, balance of payments, 135-36 Balfour Declaration, 115, 117, 381-82 Balkan Alliance, 350–53, 625–27 Balkan Conference (1930), 211 Balkan Entente Pact, 210–12, 345–46, 350–53 Balkan Pact, 177, 180, 191, 225, 243, 253, 257-58, 305, 350-53, 625-27 Balkans/Balkan, 623-31, 652, 691-93, 817-38, 934-35; Peninsula, 6, 207-8, 256-57, 268-69, 278, 623; policy, 693; wars, 250, Ball, George, 411, 414, 437 Ball, Max, 294, 330 Bandung Conference (1955), 294, 320, 441 Bank Scandal (2000/2001), 899–900 Bankers' Scandal (1981-1982), 526 Barak, Ehud, 872-74 Barış Derneği. See Peace Association Barzani, Masud, 599, 601, 686-87 Barzani, Mullah Mustafa, 475-76, 557, 599, 859, 861 Başoğlu, Muzaffer Şerif, 293, 320 Batı Çalışma Grubu. See Western Working Group Batman, 657, 916 Battle of İnönü: first, 80, 107; second, 81, 83, Battle of Sakarya, 81, 83, 100, 109 Batumi, 932 Bayar, Celal, 192, 237, 309, 325, 334, 350, 375, 389, 495-96 Baykal, Deniz, 605-7, 804, 862 Bayülken, Haluk, 477, 480, 513, 544 BDH. See Peace and Democracy Movement

(BDH: Barış ve Demokrasi Hareketi)

Bekir Sami (Kunduh), 80, 83-84, 86, 95, 108

Bekir Sıtkı Paşa, 222 Belarus, 88, 755, 778, 813 Belge, Murat, 642 Belgium, 65, 127, 324, 489, 566, 573, 687, 735, 927 Ben Gurion, David, 382, 387 Berkes, Niyazi, 320 "Berlin plus," 922 Berlin Wall, 319, 524, 579, 725, 750 Berlusconi, Silvio, 898 Bern Declaration (1976), 456-57 Berzenci, Mahmut (Sheikh), 118, 131 Beslan hostage-taking incident, 933 Beyazıt Tower, 911 Bil, Hikmet, 360 Bilgi University, 908 Bin Laden, Osama, 892 Bir, Çevik, 44, 865 Birgi, Muharrem Nuri, 38, 284 Bitar, Selahaddin, 475 Bitlis, Eşref, 74, 96, 116, 861 Bitsios, Dimitrios, 455-56 Bizim Radyo (Our Radio), 468, 469 Bizri, Afif, 378 Black Sea, 787; Black Sea-Aegean line, 934; coast of, 620, 921; Economic Cooperation, 753, 756, 780, 792-93, 818, 820, 827, 836-38, 855; region, 225-32, 301, 622, 632, 677, 753, 936 Black Sea Peace Force (Blackseafor), 933 Blitzkrieg, 257 Blue Stream natural gas pipeline, 696, 785, 855, 932, 933, 934, 937 Blum, Léon, 169 Boğaziçi University, 908 Bolivia, 897 Bolshevik, 88, 769, 778; and government, 88-89, 94-95 Boran, Behice, 320 Boratav, Pertev Naili, 293, 320 Bosnia, 338, 652, 692, 716, 790, 823–27, 922, 934 Bosnian War, 823-27 Botas, 934 bourgeoisie, 16, 22, 42, 63, 144, 146, 148, 202, 237-38, 285, 294, 317, 347, 398, 401, 432, 487, 590, 656, 659-60, 895; Anatolian, 904; and İstanbul, 198, 904 Boutros-Ghali, Boutros, 799-801 Bozcaada (Tenedos), 70, 103, 132, 186, 196-97, 203, 214, 353, 442 Bozer, Ali, 575–76, 578, 680, 798, 857 Bozlak, Murat, 845 Bradley, Omar, 326 Brazil, 12, 897 Bremner, Rory, 656 Brest-Litovsk Treaty (1918), 299 Bretton Woods, 285, 393, 538 Brezhnev, Leonid, 464-65 Brezhnev Doctrine, 465, 523-24

Briand, Aristide, 83 Bristol (Admiral), Mark Lambert, 311 Britain, 78-82, 114-15, 154-65, 254, 449 British Government Declaration (1959), British high commissioner, 157 Broader Middle East and North Africa Initiative, 921-23 Brussels, Treaty of (1948), 324 Brussels Line, 157 Brussels Summit, 713, 923–25 Brzezinski, Zbigniew, 522, 540, 674, 677 Bucak, Sedat Edip, 909 budget deficit, 526, 674, 894 Bulgaria, 211, 225, 245, 255, 257-58, 264, 272, 278, 306, 524, 531, 625–26, 834 Burgaz, 697, 820, 911 Bush, George H. W., 556-57, 857 Bush, George W., 653, 892; and anti-Bush feelings, 897 Bush Doctrine, 920 Büyükada, 911 Büyükanıt (General), Yaşar, 910 Byrd, Robert, 556, 698, 702

Çağlayangil, İhsan Sabri, 33, 39–40, 426, 445, 455, 456, 469, 477-79, 482-83, 509, 514, Cairo Conference, 117, 271-72, 273-74 Çakmak, Fevzi, 31, 37, 165, 240–41, 266 Caliphate Committee, 121-23 Caliphate Movement, 121-23 Callaghan, James, 451 Camp David accords/Camp David agreement, 481, 484, 544, 869 Çandarlı, 454 capitalism, 14, 15, 64, 433, 647, 651, 660 capitulation, 65, 67-68, 84, 127, 130, 132, 220 "captive Turks," 335 Cardiff Summit, 738, 739 Carr, E. H., 92 Carter, Jimmy, 429, 456 Carter Doctrine, 314, 522, 636 Casablanca Conference, 266 cascading, 649, 665, 700 Caspian Sea, 653, 694, 766, 780, 785-88, 852 Caspian Sea Initiative, 696 Caspian-Mediterranean Pipeline, 787, 820 casus belli, 802–3 Caucasus, 91, 253, 522, 652-53, 694-95, 709, 750-88, 790, 852-53, 878, 931-33 Caucasus Wall, 95, 96 Cebesoy, Ali Fuat, 87, 98 Celasun, Sedat, 639 Cem, İsmail, 765, 823, 831, 874, 925, 929 Cemal Paşa, 87, 89, 96, 120 center and periphery, 13 Central Asia, 3, 652-53, 691, 694-95, 709, 750-88, 790, 878, 931-33

Central Bank, 76, 171, 490, 491, 654, 744, 746, Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), 335, 419-20, 705, 893, 921 CENTO. See Central Treaty Organization (CENTO) Central Treaty Organization (CENTO), 309, 339, 373, 379-80, 389-90, 467, 474, Çerkes Ethem (Ethem the Circassian), 93 Cerrah, Celalettin, 913 Çetin, Hikmet, 755-56, 768, 773, 777, 803, 820, 824, 829, 860, 870 Chamberlain, Austen, 154 Chanak Crisis, 111, 124 Charter of Paris (1990), 840, 850 Chávez, Hugo, 897 Chechnya/Chechen, 657, 933; militants, 669, 771; question, 782, 852-53 chemical and biological weapons, 530, 564, 604, 639, 690 Cheney, Dick, 894 Chernishev, Albert, 755, 854 Chernomyrdin, V. S., 855 Chester Project, 59 Chevron, 695, 788, 894 CHF. See Republican People's Party (CHF: Cumhuriyet Halk Fırkası) Chicago Conventions (1944), 457-58 Chicherin, G. V., 94, 95, 96, 98, 100, 188-89 "Children of Manisa," 910 Children's Day, 911 China, People's Republic of, 298, 714, 894, 932; and split with the USSR, 464 Chotani, M., 121-22 CHP. See Republican People's Party (CHP: Cumhuriyet Halk Partisi) Christians/Christianity, 55, 64, 110-14, 125, 129, 156-59, 198, 205, 349, 475, 494, 664, 774, 826, 893, 912 Christophias, Dimitris, 929 Churchill, Winston, 254, 264-71, 272-73, 299-300 Ciano, (Count) G. G., 178 Çiçek, Cemil, 908, 909 Çiller, Tansu, 44, 714, 735, 766, 774, 802, 804, 806, 811, 862, 863, 870 civil law, 27 Clerides, Glafkos, 437, 448, 451, 461, 592, 802, 810, 812, 926 Clinton, Bill, 674, 704, 707-8, 802, 810 Cobra helicopters, 665, 701, 705 "Codes of Conduct," 898 Cohen, William, 687 Cold War, 7, 15, 287, 298, 319, 334–35, 368, 393-94, 432, 751, 891 Comintern, 90, 98, 250 Committee of Association, 505, 508

Committee on Policy and Security, 922

Common Defense Doctrine, 802-5

Common Market, 475, 495, 499, 507-12 Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS), 734, 754 communism/Communist, 93–94, 304, 433, Communist Information Bureau (Cominform), 286, 298, 351 Communist Party (KKE), 349, 581-82 Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU), 89, 304, 352, 464, 617-19 Compensation Commissions, 907 Confederation of Cypriot Workers (SEK), Confederation of Revolutionary Workers' Unions (DISK), 400, 525, 527 Conference of Asian States, 294 Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE), 30, 393-94, 465, 469, 636, 648, 836, 840 Congress of Berlin (1878), 828 Constanta, 936 Constantine, King (of Greece), 106-7, 195, 446 Constitution of 1961, 401, 433, 474, 508, 527 Constitution of 1982, 530, 572, 641, 670 Constitutional Court, 845, 907, 912 Constitutional Reform (May 2004), 132, 906 Constitutional Treaty, 898 Consultative Assembly, 639, 641 containment, 287, 298, 306, 652, 689–91 "contemporary civilization," 2, 3, 80, 904 continental shelf, 454-57, 583, 806, 809 Convention for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, 935 Copenhagen Criteria, 735, 738-45, 908, 923 Copenhagen Summit, 728-29, 925-26 Cougar helicopters, 720 Council for Mutual Economic Assistance (COMECON), 286, 298, 464 Council of Association, 502-16, 570-71, 573-75, 577-78, 589, 726-27, 729-31, 742–45, 803, 812, 846, 871 Council of Europe, 7, 324, 489, 490, 638-40, 824, 829, 844, 846 Court of Accounts, 906 Court of Cassation, 536, 908, 909 Court of Justice of the European Communities, 505, 506 Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 849 Cox, Percy, 157 Crane, Charles, 116 Crete, 852 Croatia, 652, 818 Cruise missile, 319, 535 CTP. See Republican Turkish Party (CTP) Cuba/Cuban, 689, 897; and missile crisis, 296, 410-12, 465 Cultural Association of Alevi-Bektaşi Institutions, 911

Curzon (Lord), George, 53, 73, 82, 127, 128, 154-56, 195, 197, 198-99, 201 Customs Union, 511, 515, 726-34, 803-4, 811, 846, 847, 871, 923 "cycle breaker," 894 Cypriot Trade Unions Committee (PTUC), Cyprus/Cypriot, 20, 78, 132, 434-37, 467-68, 699; question, 294, 350, 354-66, 406, 412-16, 426, 428, 432-40, 465, 533, 553-55, 584-85, 590-93, 621, 703-4, 741, 796-804, 924-29; Republic of, 354, 364-66, 434-36, 440, 449-52, 479, 639, 728-29, 852, 923, 925 Cyprus Is Turkish Party (KTP), 355-57, 360 Cyprus National Party (KEK), 355 Czech Republic, 205, 324, 713, 716, 717, 736, 830, 898

D-8, 876 Da Silva, Lula, 897 Damat Ferit Paşa, 65, 66, 69, 79, 80, 84, 100, 104, 105 D'Amato Act, 690, 879 Damianidis, Damionos, 205 Dashnak Party, 667, 772, 775–76 Davaz, Suat, 217 Davos process, 578, 588-90, 722, 791-93 Dawes Plan, 179 Dayton Agreement, 692, 823, 825 decolonization, 121, 306, 354, 368, 395, 633 "deep state," 360, 402, 657–60, 910–14 Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA), 406, 426-30, 534, 541, 550-53, 560, 583, 688, 697-98, 792 Defense Planning Committee, 542-43, 563, 586 DEHAP. See Democratic People's Party (DEHAP) DEİK. See Foreign Economic Relations Board (DEİK) Delors, Jacques, 576, 796 Demirel, Süleyman, 39-40, 47, 289, 399, 402, 422, 425-26, 443-46, 455, 483, 508, 756-59, 766, 774, 777, 782, 804, 810, 829, 860, 866, 870, 874 Democracy Party (DEP), 664, 706, 730-31, 802,845 Democratic Iraqi Front, 600 Democratic Left Party (DSP), 577, 769, 812, 864, 865, 928 Democratic Party (DP), 237, 238, 289-91, 294, 323-42, 349, 928 Democratic People's Party (DEHAP), 584 Denikin, (General) A. I., 89 Denktaş, Rauf, 362, 434, 437, 443-46, 460-

62, 479, 584-85, 590-93, 797-99, 810-

12, 925, 928 Denktaş, Serdar, 801, 928

Department of Homeland Security (U.S.), détente, 432, 465–66, 581 Dev-Genç. See Revolutionary Youth (Dev-Genç: Devrimci Gençlik) diaspora, 761, 767, 775, 781, 851. See also Armenian diaspora Dimitrov, Georgi, 628 Dink, Hrant, 908 Directorate General of Foundations, 134, 906, 912 Dirvana, Emin, 434 disarmament, 626-27, 677 Disaster of Asia Minor. See Mikrasiatiki Katastrofi DİSK. See Confederation of Revolutionary Workers' Union (DİSK) Dodecanese Islands, 70, 177, 244, 264, 278, 347-48,442 Doğan, Ahmet, 630, 818-19, 821 "Doğan Law" (in Bulgaria), 821 dominant power, 384, 485 Dominican Republic, 897 DP. See Democratic Party (DP) Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA), 422-23 DSP. See Democratic Left Party (DSP) Dublin Summit, 685-86, 727, 798 Dudayev, Jehar, 782 Dulles, John Foster, 288, 334, 371, 376 DYP. See True Path Party (DYP) Eagleton, William, 558

DEP. See Democracy Party (DEP)

Eastern Europe, 180-82, 194, 279, 285-87, 298, 321, 335-36, 383-85, 465, 489, 523, 579, 618-20, 650-52, 698, 710, 728, 738, 790, 812, 893, 896 Eastern Question, 10, 69, 78, 80, 102 Ecevit, Bülent, 40, 308-9, 339, 399, 406, 408-9, 419, 423, 448, 452, 455, 456, 471, 487, 549, 552-53, 627, 742, 768-69, 803, 812, 853, 874, 900 Echelon, 916 Economic Cooperation Administration (ECA), 318, 322 Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO), 486, 615, 756, 878 economic crisis: of 1994, 899; of 2001, 901 Economic Development Foundation (İKV), Economic Partnership Committee, 921 ecumenical, 205-6, 348, 796, 802, 804 Eden, Anthony, 170, 258, 264-65, 270-71, 356-57 Edinburgh Summit, 728 Efendi, 912

East-West Energy Transportation Corridor, early oil, 780

Eftim, Papa. See Erenerol, Pavli Eftim (Papa Eftim I) Ein Führer, 148 Ein Volk, Ein Reich, 148, 163 Eisenhower, Dwight, 287, 327, 334, 337 Eisenhower Doctrine, 309, 314, 336-40, 377-80,390 Eken, Korkut, 909 Elchibey, Ebulfez, 653, 760, 766, 768, 769, 774, 878 election of 2002, 901 Elekdağ, Şükrü, 555, 668 El Khoury, Bechara, 369 embargo, 398, 680, 681, 843 Emec, Cetin, 876 ENI. See Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi (ENI) Enron affair, 894 Ente Nazionale Idrocarburi (ENI), 932 Enver Paşa, 87, 89, 91, 93, 750 Enzeli, 218 EOKA and EOKA-B. See National Organization of the Cypriot Struggle (EOKA) Erbakan, Necmettin, 44, 452, 596, 690, 775, Erdoğan, Tayyip, 706, 709-10, 904, 909, 920, 921, 934 Eren, Erdal, 640 Erenerol, Pavli Eftim (Papa Eftim I), 110, 205-6, 214 Erenerol, Turgut. See Erenerol, Pavli Eftim Erenus, Bilgesu, 642 Ergil, Doğu, 659 Erim, Nihat, 423, 439, 511 Erk movement, 765 Erkin, Feridun Cemal, 300, 303, 410-12, 438, 467, 486, 506 Erkmen, Hayrettin, 428, 516 ERNK. See National Defense Front of Kurdistan (ERNK) Eroğlu, Derviş, 801 Ersin, Nurettin, 639 Ertegün, Münir, 281, 303 Erzurum Congress, 58 Esenbel, Melih, 38, 40, 284, 392 Esendal, Memduh Şevket, 216 Esmer, Ahmet Sükrü, 303 Estonia, 189, 205, 324, 523, 713, 736, 896, 898 Ethiopia, 113, 376, 387, 395, 407, 539, 544 Etibank, 899 Eurasia/Eurasian, 336, 694, 778, 896; and identity, 854, 933 euro, 744, 897, 898 Euro-Atlantic Partnership Council, 713 Euro-Atlantic region, 694 Euro-barometer, 913 Eurocorps, 712 Europe/European, 714-19; integration, 492, 725; movement, 489; Parliament, 556, 569, 570, 572, 637, 640, 727, 734, 840,

Eflak, Michel, 475

924; and public opinion, 533, 570, 666, 898

European Atomic Energy Community (EURATOM), 489

European Central Bank, 76, 171, 490, 491, 654, 744, 746, 900

European Coal and Steel Community (ECSC), 489, 569, 576, 730

European Commission/European Union Commission, 806, 811, 927

European Commission on Human Rights, 575, 840, 844

European Committee for the Prevention of Torture, 842, 847, 910

European Common Defense and Security Policy, 715-16

European Communities (ECs), 560, 569-79 European Community (EC), 395, 433, 490-92, 506-7, 569, 593, 727, 733, 736

European Convention for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, 843

European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), 638, 642, 844, 848, 905, 907,

European Conventional Forces Treaty (ECFT), 648-49, 782-83

European Council/European Union Council, 570, 575, 924, 927

European Court of Auditors, 490, 746

European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), 31, 536, 639, 809, 840, 842-45, 848, 904,

European Court of Justice, 490, 491, 569, 574, 746

European Currency Units (ECUs), 508, 571,

European Economic Community (EEC), 20, 406, 408, 452, 489-516, 531, 569

European Free Trade Association (EFTA), 493, 495, 512

European Rapid Reaction Force, 715. See also rapid reaction force

European Security and Defense Identity (ESDI), 694, 715-19, 740

European Security and Defense Policy (ESDP), 716-19, 922, 933

European Union (EU), 491, 569, 648, 725; and adjustment packages, 849; criteria, 144, 728, 736–48; deepening of, 798–99, 898; and expansion, 676, 713, 738, 898, 925; and full membership, 693-97, 726-34, 925, 934; and legislation, 491, 743, 744, 901; membership, 132, 503, 693-97, 726-34, 799, 815; and Progress Reportson Turkey, 738–39, 745, 923–25; reforms, 907; standards, 911; summits,

European Union Commission, 569, 923, 924 European Union Council, 569

Evans, Don, 894 Evren, Kenan, 40-42, 527-28, 530, 541-43, 571, 583, 596-97, 602, 614 exchange of populations, 110, 129, 197–210 Eximbank, 620, 696, 700, 702, 753, 784–85, 828, 877 Exindaris, Georgios, 206 "external Turks," 750-51, 756-57 Exxon, 695

F-4 (aircraft), 548, 552, 691, 721 F-16 (aircraft), 548, 552, 566, 680, 720, 722, 823, 832 F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, 922

Fahrenheit 9/11 (film by Michael Moore), 897 Faikoğlu, Ahmet, 795

Faisal, King (of Iraq), 117, 221, 222, 378

Faisal, King (of Saudi Arabia), 477

Faisal Finance Corporation, 597 Fallujah, 920, 922, 923

Far East, 676

fascism, 86

FBI. See Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI)

Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), 921

Federal Reserve Bank (Fed), 893

Feira Summit, 717

Fertile Crescent, 5, 113

feudalism/feudal, 64

Financial Commission, 76, 77, 110

Financial Protocol, 549, 571, 572, 574, 576, 578

Fischer, Joschka, 898

flexible response, 340, 412, 561–62

FIR. See Flight Information Region (FIR) Flight Information Region (FIR), 457-58

Follow on Forces Attack (FOFA), 340, 561

Ford, Gerald, 425-27

Foreign Aid Act, 318

Foreign Assistance Act, 549

foreign capital, 16, 143-44, 147-48, 291, 328-33, 397, 524-25, 661 foreign debts, 12, 15-17, 54, 76, 153, 193, 398-99, 410, 524, 531, 607, 653-54, 661, 903

Foreign Economic Relations Council

(DEIK), 42, 827, 854 foreign investments, 328-33, 661, 701-2,

784-85, 932

Foreign Military Financing (FMF), 698 Foreign Military Sales (FMS), 549–51, 698– 700, 719, 917

foreign trade gap, 291, 660-61, 785, 894, 933

Forsthoff, Ernest, 435

Fortress Europe, 493

forward defense, 711, 719

4th Army/Aegean Army, 452, 455, 458 FP. See Virtue Party (FP)

Framework Agreement on Cooperation in the Military Field, 933

France, 53, 71, 81-89, 106-10, 114-17, 126-39,

165-75, 235, 245-52, 377, 382, 493, 641, 677, 736, 898, 917 Franklin-Bouillon, Henri, 59, 82, 84, 108 Frederika, Queen (of Greece), 350 Freedom and Democracy Congress of Kurdistan (KADEK), 907 freedom of expression, 24, 354, 700, 739, 744, 748, 842, 847, 905-9, 912, 923 Friedman, Milton, 521

friend-or-foe codes, 919 Fukuyama, Francis, 651, 674, 892 fundamentalist Christianity, 893

G-8 summit, 895 Galiev, (Sultan) Mir Said, 89 Gamsakhurdia, Zviad, 653 Gandhi, Mahatma, 122 GAP. See Southeast Anatolia Project (GAP) Gasprom, 934 Gaudos, 805, 808-9 Gaulle, Charles de, 503, 509 Gencev, Nedim, 822 Gendarmerie, 75, 81, 83, 138, 197, 365, 433, 436, 779, 909

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), 10, 285, 503, 729

General Directorate of Foundations (VGM: Vakıflar Genel Müdürlüğü), 31, 906

General Directorate of Security, 909-10 General Directorate of the Land Registry, General Staff, 527, 530, 587, 600, 683, 809, 912 Generalized System of Preferences, 512-13,

Geneva Conference: 1964, 439; July 1974 (on Cyprus), 449-51; August 1974 (on Cyprus), 450-51

Geneva Convention (1958), 457

Geneva Convention on the Rules of War (1949), 558, 559

Geneva Plan (for Bosnia), 825

Geneva Protocol (1974), 449-51 genocide, 56, 68, 555, 667, 699, 776-77, 930. See also Armenia/Armenian genocide

Genscher, Hans, 572

geoeconomics, 675

geopolitics, 336, 673-75, 694

George, David Lloyd, 53, 82, 102, 104, 121-22,

Georgia, 304-5, 523, 653, 775, 777-80, 896 Georgia, Ukraine, Uzbekistan, Azerbaijan, and Moldova (GUUAM), 779

Gerede, Hüsrev, 217, 219

Gerger, Haluk, xiii

Germanos V (Patriarch), 104

Germany, 86-87, 178-83, 524, 573, 620, 843

Geylani, Rashid Ali, 259, 261

Giray, Safa, 680

Gizikis, (General) Phaedon, 447

glasnost, 575, 618, 622, 752, 784 Gligorov, Kiro, 829 Glion, 811 Global and European Social Forums, 897 global warming, 897 globalization, 15, 16, 521-22, 525, 647-51, 656, 661-65, 709, 895, 899, 913 Gökalp, Ziya, 119 Gökçeada (Imbros), 70, 214, 353, 442 Gökdemir, Ayvaz, 846 Gökmen, Oğuz, 38 Göksel, Hüsnü, 642 Golan Heights, 611 Gölcük, 933 Gönyeli, 436, 448 Gorbachev, Mikhail, 523, 617-18, 650, 752-56, 783-84,850 Grand National Assembly. See Turkish Grand National Assembly (TGNA) gray zone, 71 Great Depression (1929), 143 "Great Game," 763 Greater Middle East Project (GMEP), 895-96, 921 Greece/Greek, 102-11, 195-214, 314-16, 344-67, 432-62, 553-55, 581-93, 702-5, 922; civil war, 349; lobby (in U.S.), 554, 691, 699,869 Greek Cypriots, 347, 412-16, 434-37, 439-40, 443-52, 460-62, 550, 554-55, 584-85, 591-93, 703-4, 798-99, 802-15, 925-29 Greek Orthodox, 114, 171-73, 200, 204, 346-48, 353, 424, 796, 911; Patriarchate, 353, 792, 795-97, 911 Greek Resurrection Party, 349 Green Army, 92, 93 Green Belt, 44, 522, 528, 531, 539-40, 581, 595 Green Line, 703, 809, 927 Green-18, 586 Gregorian, 113 Grivas, Georgios, 358, 363, 364, 436–38, 440, 445-47 Gromyko, A. A., 467, 468, 617 gross domestic product (GDP), 894 gross national product (GNP), 10, 124, 144-45, 236-37, 290-91, 396-97, 524-25, 565, 653, 661, 674, 900-901 Grossman, Marc, 916 Guantanamo, 893, 895, 923 Gül, Abdullah, 709, 863-64, 904, 917, 919-20, 929, 933 Gülen, Fethullah, 695, 708, 932 Gulf Crisis, 18, 338, 790, 852, 857, 869 Gulf War, 679–82, 790, 857, 860, 892, 916 Gümrü, Treaty of, 97, 98 Güneri, Rıza, 863 Güneş, Turan, 451, 627 GÜNSİAD. See Association of Industrialists and Businessmen of the Southeast (GÜNSİAD)

Günver, Semih, 496–97
Gürel, Şükrü Sina, 812
Güreş, Doğan, 819, 823
Gürsel, Cemal, 410, 411, 412–16, 466, 472, 474
Gürün, Kamuran, 302, 503
GUUAM. See Georgia, Ukraine, Uzbekistan,
Azerbaijan, and Moldova (GUUAM)
Gyani, (General) G. J., 437

Habibullah Khan, 120
Habur, 685, 689, 861

Habibullah Khan, 120 Habur, 685, 689, 861 Hacianestis, Georgios, 111 Haddam, Abdulhalim, 865 HADEP. See Popular Democratic Party (HADEP) Haghie Yorgi Kapris, Monastery of, 911 Haig, Alexander, 542 Hakkari, 909 Halabja, 604 Halefoğlu, Vahit, 597, 602, 621 Halil, Adnan, 829 Halk Bankası, 904 Halki (Heybeliada) Theological Seminary, 797,802 Halliburton, 894 Hallstein Doctrine Hamas, 652, 896, 921, 930 Harbord, (General) James, 53, 59, 88 Hariri, Rafik, 929 Harrington, (General) Charles, 108-9 Hasanov, Hasan, 755 Hashemi, Yasin, 222 Hatay, 20, 84, 164, 167-75, 369, 862, 929 hate speeches, 905, 907 head scarf. See Islam/Islamic hegemonic power, 10, 534-35, 664, 671 Hellenism, 199, 447, 584 Helsinki Final Act (1975), 393, 394, 432, 470, 522, 524, 558, 636 Helsinki Summit, 575, 577, 648, 717, 740–42, 745, 814-15, 925 Helsinki Watch, 630, 794 Henderson, L. W., 378 Henze, Paul, 540, 677 HEP. See People's Labor Party (HEP) Hezbollah, 522, 530 Hezen Rizgariye Kurdistan (HRK), 602 high seas, 166, 273, 453-57, 786 Higher Education Council, 906 highjacking, 470, 933 Hinchak, 773 Hitler, Adolf, 21, 152, 162-63, 179-83, 254-56, 259-60, 336, 913 Hiyabani, Sheikh Muhammad, 119 Holbrooke, Richard, 703, 722, 810 Honduras, 897 honor crimes, 906 Hopkinson, Henry, 357

Hora (Sismik I), 455

Horzum, Kemal, 549 hot pursuit, 20, 161, 601-4, 614, 688, 865, 877 House of Commons (Britain), 122, 164, 267, 357 Hovanissian, Raffi, 775 Hoxha, Enver, 628, 817 Hoybun Society, 147, 219 Hrisostomos, Archbishop, 104 HSK. See People's Legitimate Defense Force (HSK) Hull, Cordell, 269, 275 human rights, 13, 74, 198-202, 522, 530, 554, 558, 574, 636-44, 666-67, 704-8, 725, 830, 840-49, 907-13, 935 Human Rights Association, 643, 910 Human Rights Commission, 840 humanitarian aid, 671, 698, 771, 772, 775, 778, humanitarian intervention, 665, 671, 684, 833, 892 Hungary, 86, 256, 257, 260-61, 324, 377, 393, 471, 524, 650, 713, 716-17, 825-26, 830, Hünkar İskelesi, Treaty of (1833), 78 Huntington, Samuel, 674, 675, 708, 892 Hussein, King (of Jordan), 378, 380 Hussein, Saddam, 530, 599, 679, 686-87, 857, 893, 897, 916 Hussein, Sharif, 116

ICBM. See Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles (ICBM) ideology, 4, 13, 16, 21, 103, 113, 147, 148, 216, 241, 298, 320, 328, 404, 408, 474-75, 487, 528, 540, 595, 613-19, 647, 650-52, 763, 771–73, 805, 866, 877, 895, 904, 938 İhsan Nuri, 219 İhsanoğlu, Ekmeleddin, 929 İlksel, Settar, 361 Imam Khomeini Airport, 931 Imbros. See Gökçeada imperialism/imperialist, 311, 401, 893, 915 Inayatullah Khan, 220 İncirlik airbase, 338, 430, 480, 548, 556, 683, India, 894 Indian Muslims, 79, 121-23 indirect attacks, 339, 402 individual application right, 638, 643, 841-43 individual possession, 905, 911 industrialization through import substitution (IIS), 14-15, 16, 147, 237, 397-99, 407 informal economy, 747, 899 infrastructure, 15, 16, 21-23, 42, 127, 131, 350, 485, 495, 507, 521, 524, 544, 648, 660, 670, 685, 729, 783-84, 904, 924, 936 İnönü, İsmet, 36-37, 82, 100-101, 107, 124, 127,

128, 131, 154-56, 166, 190-91, 204-5, 206,

208, 211, 237, 256, 271, 273-74, 320, 326, 384, 413-16, 433, 506 Insurance Fund, 899 Intercontinental Ballistic Missiles (ICBM), 340, 469 Intermediate Nuclear Forces (INF) Agreement (1987), 562, 711 International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), 931 international capitalism, 521, 524, 899 international circles, 9, 640, 908, 927 International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), 457-58 International Court of Justice, 439, 455, 456, 583, 587, 703, 707, 742, 806-7, 815, 895, International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 935 International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights, 935 international creditors, 918 International Criminal Court, 897 international legitimacy, 917, 918 International Maritime Organization (IMO), 883-87, 935 international market, 144, 286, 653, 690, 785, 899-902, 916 international media, 577, 771, 794, 814, 917, 918 International Monetary Fund (IMF), 10, 14, 285, 286, 289, 334, 398, 399, 526, 655, 902, 937 international organizations, 47, 201, 285, 398, 637, 640, 643, 740, 761, 771, 774, 779, 796, 799, 804, 823–24, 838, 840, 896 International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), 892, 915, 922 international system, 9–17, 35, 42, 44, 58, 92, 150, 285, 465, 561, 650, 689, 751, 850 international terrorism, 893, 917 internationalism, 304, 475, 650 Intifada, 535, 598, 612, 874, 929 Ioannides, (General) Dimitrios, 433 Ionian Islands, 103 Ionian state, 109 Iran/Iranian, 118, 119, 216-20, 388-90, 485-88, 549, 613-16, 780-81, 875-80, 921, 930-31; Islamic Revolution in, 430-431, 538, 549, 613, 895 Iranian Azerbaijan, 488 Iran-Iraq War, 535, 558, 599-601, 613-16 Iraq/Iraqi, 307, 340, 373-75, 379-80, 858-62, 878–79; attack on, 374, 857, 893–94, 898; Civil Administration, 894; invasion of, 681, 687, 892, 896, 914-21; Kurds, 72, 475-76, 485, 530, 557, 598-605, 613-14, 681-82, 686, 859, 879, 919; mission, 892; occupation of, 892-95,

929; oil, 161, 600, 614, 680; pro-Saddam elements, 920; Provisional Governing

Council, 920

Iraq Court, 897 Iraq Study Group, 897 Irmak, Sadi, 425–26, 454 irredentism, 19 İş Bankası (Türkiye İş Bankası), 308–9 Işık, Hasan Esat, 468 İskenderun, 167, 470, 919 Islam/Islamic, 528–29, 539–40, 708–10, 781, 811, 893; clerics, 55, 110, 201, 204, 794, 797, 920; and head scarf, 904, 910-13; and socialism, 89; states, 479, 863, 872; tendencies, 938 Islamic Revolution of Iran, 487-88 Islamism/Islamist, 657-60, 709, 904, 936; camp; countries, 876 Islamophobia, 898 İsmail, Shah, 8, 64, 119 Ismaili sect, 122 Israel/Israelis, 320, 383-84, 611-12, 861, 868-75, 929-30 İstanbul, 71, 272, 657, 885 İstanbul Conference, 157 İstanbul Cooperation Initiative, 922 Istanbul Declaration, 935 İstanbul Protocol (1913), 218, 219 İstanbul Regional Administrative Court, 908 İstanbul Stock Market, 899, 918 İstanbul Summit, 837 Italy/Italian, 85-86, 175-78, 898 Ivanov, Igor, 933 Ivanov, Sergey, 933 İzmir Economic Congress (1923), 14, 59 İzmir Fund, 122 Janin refugee camp, 929

Japan, 264, 676, 891 Jerusalem, status of, 598 Jesus, 114 lewish: immigration, 115, 162, 183, 381, 385; lobby, 370, 385, 556, 667, 689, 691, 777, 869, 874, 930, 938; settlements/settlers, 9, 117, 382-83, 611, 869, 874, 929 Jewish Agency, 384 Jewish National Council, 382 jihad, 598, 750 Jinnah, Muhammed Ali, 122 Johnson, Lyndon, 39, 303, 412 Johnson Letter, 412–16 Joint Chiefs of Staff (U.S.), 917, 921 Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement (JDCA), 404, 415, 420-21, 426-27 Jordan, 867, 869 Judaism, 893 Junkers, 179, 219 junta of colonels (Greece), 433, 434, 446, 451, 572 Jupiter missiles, 307, 340-41, 410-12, 465,

Justice and Development Party (AKP),
901–2, 917–18, 938

Justice Commandos for the Genocide of the Armenians (JCGA), 612

Justice Party (AP), 399, 423, 433, 443, 477, 482, 799

Kaboğlu, İbrahim, 909 Kabul, 118, 120–21, 220, 543, 915 KADEK. See Freedom and Democracy Congress of Kurdistan (KADEK) Kaklamanos, Dimitrios, 196 Kanatlı, Şükrü, 173, 350 Kandil Dağı, 931 Karabekir, Kazım, 97, 252 Karachi Treaty, 372 Karadzic, Radovan, 759, 935 Karahan, L. M., 95, 96, 98, 189 Karamanlis, Konstantinos, 349, 427, 433, 448-49, 451-57, 581-82 Karaosmanoğlu, Yakup Kadri, 389 Karayalçın, Murat, 47, 731 Kardak-Imia crisis, 554, 700, 702–3, 734, 805-9 Kars Treaty (1921), 97, 99–100, 109, 778 Karzai regime, 915 Kasianov, Mikhail, 933 Kassem, (General) Abdulkarim, 379, 475; and 1958 coup, 379, 916 KATAK. See Turkish Minority Association of the Island of Cyprus (KATAK) Kay, David, 897 Kazakhstan/Kazakh, 523, 649, 753, 780, 850, 932 KEK. See Cyprus National Party (KEK) Kellogg-Briand Pact, 183, 221, 243 Kemal, M., 19, 21, 36, 55–59, 79–81, 92–95, 103-5, 109, 111, 126, 130, 131, 157, 208 Kemalism/Kemalist, 19, 21, 148, 400, 528, 914, 938; reforms, 21, 217, 904 Kennan, George, 335 Kennedy, John F., 410-12, 416 Kennedy, Robert, 411-12 Kenya, 544, 665, 705, 813, 873, 892, 916 Keşan, 444 Keynesian policies, 521 Khalilzad, Zalmay, 919 Khamenei, Ali Hosayni, 875-76 Khatami, Mohammad, 930 Khiva (Khanate), 121 Khomeini, Ayatollah Ruhollah, 486–88, 538, 614, 780 Khrushchev, Nikita, 303–4, 309, 341, 352, 410-12, 464, 466 Kılınç, Tuncer, 906 King, Dr. Henry C., 116 King-Crane Commission, 116 Kırca, Coşkun, 339, 472, 548

Kirkuk, 857, 859, 919

Kirkuk-Yumurtalık pipeline, 614, 680, 689, 857, 865 Kissinger, Henry, 424-26, 448, 674 Kıyıköy, 934 Kızıl Elma (Red Apple), 913 KMTHP. See National Turkish Popular Party of Cyprus (KMTHP) Knatchbull-Hugessen, Hugh Montgomery, 251, 264, 277 Knesset, 872, 930 Koç, Vehbi, 320 Kocharian, Robert, 653, 667, 707, 767, Kolettis, Ioannis, 103 Kollias, Konstantinos, 443-44 Komer, Robert, 419-20 KONGRA-GEL. See Kurdistan People's Congress (KONGRA-GEL) Köprülü, Fuat, 37-38, 350, 357, 370, 385 Korean War, 325–26 Korutürk, Fahri, 466, 470, 485 Kosovo, 625, 692, 716, 830-33, 934 Kotur, 219 Krashnin, Anatoly, 933 Krekar, Mullah, 920 KTP. See Cyprus Is Turkish Party (KTP) Küçük, Fazıl, 364, 412, 434-35 Küçük, Yalçın, 642 Kuneralp, Zeki, 38 Kunuri (battle), 325, 328 Kurdish Republic of Mahabad, 312, 476 Kurdistan, 55, 66, 70, 72-73, 95, 155, 600-602, 853, 864, 894 Kurdistan Labor Party (Kurdistan Workers' Party) (PKK), 8, 43, 147, 531-33, 558, 559, 599-604, 642, 664-65, 684-87, 704-6, 820, 830, 842, 848, 858-62, 876-78, 907-10, 930 Kurdistan People's Congress (KONGRA-GEL), 907 Kurdology, 906 Kurds/Kurdish, 528, 553, 776; independence, 72-73, 685, 693, 861, 918; language, 530, 642, 660, 842-44, 906; nationalists, 12, 117, 146, 404, 433, 529-30, 657, 706; in northern Iraq, 72, 475-76, 485, 530, 557, 604, 613-14, 681-82, 859; parties, 599-603, 664; peshmergas, 476, 602, 919, 930; question, 44, 119-20, 131, 151, 154-62, 529-30, 535, 557-58, 638, 666-67, 704-6, 843-49, 921, 937-38 Kurtlar Vadisi-Irak (The Valley of Wolves-Iraq; film), 913 Kutlu Savaş Report, 909 ∕Kuva-yı Milliye. See National Forces (Kuva-yı Milliye) Kuwait, 596, 679-80, 857, 865, 919 Kyoto Protocol, 897 Kyprianou, Spyros, 462, 590-92

Kyrgyzstan, 694, 754, 780, 932 -

laicism, 3, 4, 293 Lake, Anthony, 892 land reform, 432 Landaburu, Eneko, 898 language, restrictions on, 629, 642, 660, 821, 833, 842-44, 906 "languages forbidden by law," 905 Latin America, 358, 512, 522, 677, 897 Latvia, 189, 324, 713, 736, 896, 898 Lausanne, Peace Treaty of, 14, 19-20, 31, 85, 86, 126-40, 167-68, 196-202, 224, 807 Law, Bonar, 195 Law No. 2932, 530 Law on Associations, 905 Law to Combat Terrorism (TMK: Terörle Mücadele Kanunu), 846–47, 849, 906, Law on Direct Foreign Investments, 902 Law of Intervention, 651, 671, 892 Law for the Promotion of Foreign Investments (LPFI), 330 Law on the Restructuring of the Debts of the Financial Sector, 899 League of Nations (LoN), 67, 134-35, 157-61, 168, 177, 183-85, 381 Lebanon/Lebanese, 598, 600, 611, 895 Lebensraum (living space), 163, 180, 336 Lemnos. See Limni Lend and Lease Law, 262, 264, 277, 313, 321 Lenin, V. I., 90-91, 187 Lenin-Roy Argument, 90 Lennox-Boyd, Alan, 361 Lesser Mount Ağrı, 219 Lesser Zap River, 158 liberalism, 143-47, 316, 674 liberalization, 523, 527, 650, 837 Libya, 610, 689 Lightning Group of Armies, 114-15 limited partner, 896 Limni (Lemnos), 196, 554, 563-64, 583, 585-86 Lithuania, 523-24 Little Entente, 176, 180, 207, 211 Litvinov Protocol (1928), 187, 189 Locarno Treaties, 188 Lockerbie, 895 Loğoğlu, Faruk, 646, 890 Loizidou case, 809, 935 London Conference: of 1921, 80-81, 86, 91, 107-8; of 1956, 358-59, 363-64; of 1964, 436-37, 440 London Treaty: of 1921, 80-81, 86; of 1959, 364-66, 434 Loraine, Sir Percy, 152, 163 Los Angeles Times, 920 "low-intensity war," 535, 638, 719, 861 lower bourgeoisie, 895. See also petty bourgeoisie Lukoil, 932 lynch mob, 936 Maastricht Criteria, 144, 745 Maastricht Treaty, 490, 715, 725, 727, 729 MacArthur, Douglas, 325, 916 Macedonia/Macedonian, 692, 792, 802, 827-29, 922, 934 Mackinder, Halford John, 336 Macmillan, Harold, 359, 361-63 Maghreb states, 895 Maginot Line, 251 Makarezos, Nikolaos, 433 Makarios, Archbishop, 356, 358-65, 412-16, 434-36, 440-41, 443-49, 461-62 Malaysia, 17, 44, 708, 721, 863, 876 Malenkov, G. M. 298, 304, 306 Malta, 728, 926 Mammelis, Dorotheos (Patriarch Dorotheos), 104 Manavgat River, 930 Manchuria, 185, 193 Mandate régime, 156, 160, 169, 170, 221, 382 Mansura (Erenköy), 440 Maraş, 62, 63, 71, 83, 106 Mardin, 657 Mare Nostrum, 244 Maritime Traffic and Information System, 935 Marshall, George, 321 Marshall Plan, 46, 238, 288–89, 302, 320–23, 329-30 Marxism/Marxist, 11 Mashal, Khaled, 930 Massigli, René, 174, 253 Mavros, Georgios, 451 Mazarakis, (General) Alexandros, 124 MBK. See National Unity Committee (MBK: Milli Birlik Komitesi) McCarthy, Joseph R./McCarthyism, 287, McNamara, Robert, 411, 439 Meclis-i Mebusan (Chamber of Deputies), 57, 69, 77, 78 mediation, 109, 353, 360, 378, 414, 431, 449, 583, 588, 593, 614-15, 768, 807, 874 Mediterranean, 177-78, 244, 692, 703, 729 Mediterranean Pact (1936), 152, 163 medium power/strategic medium power, 9-11, 898, 916, 921, 929, 936 Megali Idea (Great Ideal), 103, 204 Mein Kampf (Hitler), 913 Meir, Golda, 387

Melek, Abdurrahman, 173

705, 917, 919, 936

386, 495-96, 502

memorandum of understanding, 545, 548,

Menderes, Adnan, 38, 237, 289, 292, 296-97,

307-9, 325, 334, 350, 363-64, 373, 377,

Luxembourg Summit, 713, 721, 735-40, 812

Menemencioğlu, Numan, 180, 191, 240-41, 256, 266-67, 270-71, 276 Mensheviks, 89, 93, 96, 99 Meray, Seha L., 129 Meriç River, 82, 124, 131, 196 Mersin, 561, 564, 913 Metaksakis, Meletios, 109 Metal Firtina (Metal Storm), 913 MHP. See Nationalist Action Party (MHP) Michalakopoulos, Andreas, 206 Middle East, 113-23, 368-90, 446, 474-88, 543-47, 558-60, 595-616, 652, 679, 929-31; Peace Process, 548, 665, 691, 868-75, 924, 929; policies, 113-23, 477, 544, 598, 605, 652, 683, 865 Middle East Command, 305, 326-28, 369-71, 544 Middle East Pact, 327 middle-sized strategic power. See medium power/strategic medium power Mikrasiatiki Katastrofi (Disaster of Asia Minor), 103, 195 Military Assistance Program (MAP), 427, Military Coordination Center, 683, 686 millet system, 200, 205 Ministry of Defense, 25, 320, 426, 660, 719, Ministry of Education, 139, 293, 528, 657, 758, Ministry of the Environment and Forests, Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MFA), 23-35, 43, 47, 66, 408, 419, 431, 455, 460, 467, 477, 499, 508-10, 528, 533-34, 556, 754, 794, 799, 881 Ministry of the Interior, 534, 911-12 Ministry of Justice, 21, 332, 418, 908 minority/minorities/minority rights, 130, 132-35, 155, 195, 345, 353-54, 441-42, 648, 793, 840-49 Minority Report, 908–9 missionaries, 114, 764, 773, 826, 912 Missouri (U.S. battleship), 281, 293, 296, 303, 312-13 MİT. See National Intelligence Organization Mitsotakis, Konstantinos, 702, 791, 793, 795, 802 Mladic, Ratko, 935 Mobile Force of Hijaz, 114 moderate Islam, 522, 540, 923 Molotov, V. M., 193, 242, 248, 250-51, 253, 255, 268, 269, 279-80, 299, 300 Monroe Doctrine, 287, 314 Montreux Straits Convention, 178, 180, 191, 224-32, 245-47, 254, 256, 272-73, 278-

79, 299-302, 305, 312, 459, 632, 881, 885-

88, 936

Moore, Michael, 897

Morales, Evo, 897 Morrison, Allen L., 333 Moscow Conference, 269-70 Moscow Treaty, 98-100 most-favored-nation status, 179, 209-10, 219-20, 365, 385, 560 Mosul, 857, 859, 919; question, 154-57, 174, 188 Mosul-Kirkuk region, 681 Motherland Party (ANAP), 546-47, 573, 584, 726, 769, 799, 812, 864, 865, 938 Movement for Rights and Freedoms (MRF), 818, 821-22 Mr. X (George Kennan), 335 MSP, See National Salvation Party (MSP) Mudanya, Armistice of, 124-25 Mudros, Armistice of, 61-62, 83, 86, 102, 114-15 Müezzinoğlu, Ziya, 460 Muhiddin Paşa, 114, 118 Mujahedin-e Khalq, 613, 930 Mülkiye, 31, 32, 42, 534 multicolored revolutions, 896 Multilateral Agreement on Investments (MAI), 285, 651 Multilateral Nuclear Force (MLF), 404, 416-17, 468-69 multilateralism, 328, 892 multinational corporations, 932 Multinational Peace Force Southeast Europe, 835 Mumcu, Uğur, 529, 876-77 Musa, Amr, 873 Musavat (Egalitarian) movement, 93, 99 Muslims/Muslim, 3, 29, 56, 103-4, 111-16, 198, 203-4, 439, 677, 830, 853; countries, 30, 79, 89, 369, 370, 384, 477-78, 483-84, 557, 675, 751, 780, 833-36, 895, 915, 917, 918; majorities, 57, 113, 134, 827, 897, 937 Mussolini, Benito, 162, 175-77, 267 Mustafa Sabri, 214 Mustafa Suphi, 60, 92-93, 98 Myers, Richard, 917 Nadir, Asil, 592 Nadir Shah, 220

Nadir, Asil, 592
Nadir Shah, 220
Nagorno Karabakh, 767–71, 773, 854
Nairobi airport, 916
Nansen, Dr. Fridtjof, 198 nation building, 22, 148, 198, 487 nation-state, 2, 5, 11, 14, 16, 64–65, 111, 130, 198, 202, 216, 288, 763, 772, 905
National Committee for Strategic Research and Studies (SAEMK), 45
National Defense Front of Kurdistan (ERNK), 530, 907
National Defense Movement, 109
National Forces (Kuva-yı Milliye), 85, 104
National Guard (Cyprus), 440, 445–47

National Intelligence Organization (MIT), 24, 42, 45, 603, 659, 705, 859, 861, 863, National Military Strategic Concept (MASK), 865 National Organization of the Cypriot Struggle (EOKA), 357-60, 362, 446-47 National Pact (MM: Misak-1 Milli), 57–58, 80, 81, 85, 106, 117, 127, 129-30, 162, 167, National Program, 660, 739, 742–43, 746–48, 849, 923 National Salvation Party (MSP), 425, 447, 516, 596 National Security Council (MGK: Milli Güvenlik Kurulu), 39, 40, 44, 45, 447, 541, 546, 571, 639, 658, 739, 859, 918 National Security Council (NSC [U.S.]). 327, 335, 335 National Security Document, 892, 926 National Security Policy Paper (MGSB), 45 National Turkish Popular Party of Cyprus (KMTHP), 355, 359 National Unity Committee (MBK: Milli Birlik Komitesi), 38, 401, 410, 466, 471, 474, 502 National Unity Party (UBP), 584, 797, 801, nationalism, 22, 65, 109, 110, 623, 656, 781 nationalism/nationalists of the 1920s, 22, 81, 84,89 Nationalist Action Party (MHP), 45, 242, 401, 471, 514, 516, 762, 768-69, 846, 928 natural gas, 620, 752, 758, 788, 854, 931 Nazis/Nazism, 19, 56, 176, 285–86, 302 Nazi/Soviet Pact, 181 Near East, 113, 128, 198 neo-cons, 892, 893, 897, 915, 937 Neo-Ottomanism, 657, 668, 677, 709, 834 Netherlands, 898 neutrality, 4, 60, 81, 109, 119, 151, 173, 176, 181, 188, 205, 206, 209, 213, 218, 220, 222, 242-53, 258-59, 261, 264-65, 269, 301, 335, 344, 379, 383, 483, 488, 524, 599-600, 614-15, 830, 874 New Democracy Party, 452, 581-82, 791, 795 New Economic Policy (NEP), 187 New Imperialism, 893 New Look Strategy, 335-36 New National Security Document, 892 New World Order, 651, 671, 675, 679, 709, 791, 792, 795, 810, 870 Newroz, 913 Nice Treaty, 490, 746 9/11 attack (11 September 2001), 891-97 1929 Protocol, 184, 189–90, 245, 252, 299, 302

1936 Declaration, 134

Nixon Doctrine, 485, 544

Nixon, Richard, 393-94, 422-23

Noel, (Major) Emile, 155 nonalignment/nonaligned, 395, 407, 441-43, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), 571, 636, 648, 814, 841, 862 non-Muslim: foundations, 905, 906, 911; minorities, 911, 923 Non-Proliferation Treaty, 895 North Atlantic Cooperation Council (NACC), 713 North Atlantic Council, 715, 922 North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), 7, 287, 323-33, 368, 413-16, 465, 474, 561-67, 710-19, 740, 922; and command and control regions, 459-60; and early warning line, 459-60 North Atlantic Treaty Organization Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA), 331-32, North Atlantic Treaty Organization Treaty, 429 North Korea, 689, 895 Northern Alliance, 915 Northern Cyprus, 174, 440, 460, 533 northern Iraq, 72, 475-76, 485, 530, 557, 604, 613-14, 681-82, 687, 859 Northern Tier, 544 Norway, 253, 263, 327, 340, 512, 513, 576, 715-17,728 Notam No. 714, 458 nuclear energy, 333 Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty (NPT), nuclear weapons, 298, 307, 335, 539, 627, 639, 690, 711-12, 931 Nur, Dr. Rıza, 198, 200–202 Nurettin Paşa (Sakallı), 111 Nuri Said Pasha (Paşa), 221-22, 265, 369, 373-74 Nusairi, 113

Öcalan, Abdullah, 12, 13, 44, 705-6, 739, 791, 813-14, 848, 853, 860-61, 865-68, 873, 907, 916, 930 Öcalan, Osman, 921 official ideology, 320, 877 Oğuzistan, 119 oil embargo, 483-84, 776 Okyar, Ali Fethi, 157, 163, 167 Olcay, Osman, 543 Old Europe, 893 Oliver Delegation, 317 Olmert, Ehud, 930 Oman, 113, 407, 544, 608, 862, 883 Operation Active Endeavor, 922, 936 Operation Barbarossa, 255-57, 263 Operation Desert Fox, 689, 691 Operation Desert Storm, 679, 680 Operation Poised Hammer, 916

Operation Provide Comfort, 682-87, 697, 699, 707, 709, 863, 879 Operation Provide Comfort-2, 916 Operation Shock and Awe, 893 opium question (Turkey), 422-24 Oran, Baskın, 909 Orbay, Hüseyin Rauf, 102 Orbay, Kazım, 165, 220 Organization for Caspian Sea Cooperation, 878 Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), 7, 322, 399, 507, 620 Organization for European Economic Cooperation (OEEC), 321-22, 489-90 Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries (OAPEC), 483 Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), 7, 478-80, 544, 597-98, 630, 821, 827, 929 Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), 648-49, 769, 778-79, 788, 829, 840, 845, 847 Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC), 480-81 Orthodox Christians, 110, 819, 833-36, 852 Orthodox Christmas, 911 Orthodoxia (newspaper), 353 Ottoman: debts, 67, 76-77, 127, 135-36, 153, 166-67, 195, 237, 292, 308; Empire, 2, 64, 750; Jews ("Sabetayists"), 912; sovereignty, 67, 70, 102, 113, 916; state, 56, 57, 68-80, 85, 93, 102-6, 116, 119, 381, 629, 657 Ottoman Bank, 122, 167 Ottoman Public Debt Administration (Düyun-1 Umumiye), 16, 130-31 out-of-area question (NATO), 338, 563 Özal, Turgut, 18, 29-30, 40-42, 508-10, 525-26, 530-31, 533-34, 546-60, 573-78, 585-93, 603-4, 630, 679-85, 753, 760-61, 768, 798-99, 829, 833, 857-58 Özdemir Bey (Ali Şefik el Mısri), 118 Özkan, Necati, 355 Özkök, Hilmi, 919

Pace, Frank, 351

Pace, Frank, 351

Pachachi, Adnan, 477

Pact of Steel, 181

Pahlavi, Shah Mohammad Reza, 389

Pahlavi, Shah Reza, 216, 217, 219, 388–89,

485–88

Pakistan, 113, 306, 336–41, 371–76, 389, 443,

486, 535, 544, 546, 585, 615, 762, 876, 920

Palestine/Palestinian, 43–44, 115–17, 369,

373–75, 652, 670, 708, 868–70, 872–75,

People's Liberation Army of R

(ARGK), 907

perestroika (restructuring), 30

622, 752, 784

peripheral countries, 12, 143

Permanent Court of Internati
183, 185, 200, 204

permanent global hegemony, permanent revolution, 89

Persia/Persians, 216–17, 485, 7

peshmergas, 476, 602, 919, 930

895, 929–30; and elections, 922, 930;

Özsoy (opera), 217

Öztorun, Necdet, 546, 602

question, 381-84, 477-84, 598, 611-12; parliament, 930 Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), 481, 483-84, 598, 679 Palestinian Authority, 870, 895 Pamuk, Orhan, 908 Pangalos, (General) Theodoros, 203, 207, Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK), 542, 553, 573, 582, 791-93, 795, 802, 804 Pan-Turanism, 19, 241, 264, 751 Pan-Turkism, 19, 241, 653, 751, 759, 766, 777, 781, 878 Papadopoulos, Alekos, 813 Papadopoulos, Georgios, 433, 444 Papadopoulos, Tasos, 927 Papagos, (General) Alexandros, 349, 356, 357 Papanastasiou, Alexandros, 211 Papandreou, Andreas, 457, 522, 553, 578, 581-85, 702, 791, 802 Papandreou, Georgios, 433, 438–39, 441, 444, 814, 925 Paris Treaty, 347-48, 807 Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe (PACE), 637, 640, 840, 844 partition (Cyprus), 361 Partnership for Peace (PfP), 694, 695, 778, 830, 851, 922 PASOK, See Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) Patriot Act, 893 Patris (newspaper), 436 Pattakos, Stylianos, 433 Pax Americana, 288, 408 Peace Association, 293, 326, 572, 643 Peace and Democracy Movement (BDH: Barış ve Demokrasi Hareketi), 928 "peace at home and peace in the world," 19, 187,753 Peace Corps, 419, 557

peaceful coexistence, 90, 287, 617, 928 Pearl Harbor, 264, 287 Penal Procedural Code, 935 Pentagon, 700 People's Labor Party (HEP), 843, 845 People's Legitimate Defense Force (HSK), People's Liberation Army of Kurdistan (ARGK), 907 perestroika (restructuring), 303, 575, 617-18, 622, 752, 784 peripheral countries, 12, 143 Permanent Court of International Justice, 183, 185, 200, 204 permanent global hegemony, 894 permanent revolution, 89 Persia/Persians, 216-17, 485, 764

Petition of the Intellectuals, 642

"Peace Water" pipeline, 534, 608–10

petty bourgeoisie, 22, 32. See also lower bourgeoisie Phanar, Patriarchate of, 110, 205, 294, 348-49, Philippines, 335, 407, 539, 677-78, 897 Picot, Georges, 59 Pinochet, Augusto, 897 pivotal state, 13 PKK. See Kurdistan Labor Party (PKK) Plaza, Galo, 442-43 plebiscite, 58, 73, 117, 121, 127, 130, 156, 157 Podgorny, N. V., 441, 468-69 Poland, 152, 165, 173, 181, 185, 193, 235, 239, 246-47, 265, 280, 324, 393-95, 524, 553, 619, 650, 713, 716–17, 830, 835, 836 Polaris (missile), 412 Polaris-launching submarine, 416 Polatkan, Hasan, 403, 502 Polikroniadis, Spiridon, 208 Polish syndrome, 235, 258 political criteria (for joining the European Union), 728, 738–41, 744–45, 747–48, 908, 923 political liberalism, 311, 324, 904 Pontus, 103, 104 Popular Democratic Party (HADEP), 907 Popular Front, 878 post–Cold War era, 892 post-9/11 era, 892-93 postwar era, 86, 347 Potemkin, Grigory A., 244–45 Potsdam Conference, 299-301, 311-12, 632 Powell, Colin, 920 power vacuum, 93, 524, 558, 599-602, 684, 687-88, 818, 859, 879, 929 Prague Summit, 922 Pravda (newspaper), 321, 440 preemptive war, 892 Prime Ministry's Consultative Council on Human Rights, 908, 909 Prinkipo, 911 privatization, 525, 527, 553, 566, 655-56, 661, privilege, 38, 53, 65, 72, 76, 83, 84, 99, 105, 106, 128, 129, 138, 140, 199, 201, 205, 255, 289, 294, 320, 323, 333, 370, 419, 426, 434, 442, 464, 495-96, 512, 523, 574, 581, 582, 657, 663, 712, 728 pro-American, 237, 302, 336, 408, 522, 547, 709, 913, 916 Prodi, Romano, 926 Progressive Party of the Working People (AKEL [Cyprus]), 355-57, 440, 470 Psara, 454 psychological warfare, 335 public opinion, 28-29, 36, 38-40, 42, 45, 102, 104, 158, 265, 350, 356-61, 377, 434, 447, 467, 483, 533, 536, 585, 604, 608, 658, 681, 715, 756, 771-77, 800, 810, 860, 875 Putin, Vladimir, 650, 851, 933

Qajars, 119, 220 Qashqais, 217 Qasr-e Shirin, Treaty of (1639), 217 Qatar, 113, 566, 595, 608, 697, 862 Quebec Conference, 268–69 Quran, 528, 529

Raco, 114 radical fundamentalists, 897 radical Islam, 522, 540, 595, 679, 690, 708 Rallis, Dimitrios, 106-7 Ramadan War (1973), 485 Ramallah, 923, 929 Rantisi, Abdel Aziz, 930 Rapid Deployment Force (RDF), 338, 534, 543-46, 596, 621 Rapid Reaction Force, 715 rapprochement, 312-13, 347-50, 368-69, 477-78, 534, 548, 596-97, 691, 777, 791, 814-15, 861, 938 Reagan, Ronald, 550, 581 Reagan Doctrine, 314, 522 Realpolitik, 409, 533, 538, 771, 790 rebus sic stantibus, 224, 459 reconstruction plan, 320 Red Army, 96-97, 99, 193, 298, 621, 769 red lines, 919, 938 Refahyol government, 678, 691, 698, 708-10, 862-68, 876, 879. See also Welfare Party Regional Cooperation for Development (RCD), 486, 615 Regional Security and Cooperation Pact, 779 Rehn, Oli, 925 relative autonomy of the state, 55, 143, 409 Religious Affairs Directorate (Diyanet İşleri Başkanlığı), 528 Report of the Meeting of Experts (Geneva), 841 Representative Delegation (Heyet-i Temsiliye), 88, 115-17 Republican People's Party (CHF: Cumhuriyet Halk Fırkası), 142, 143 Republican People's Party (CHP: Cumhuriyet Halk Partisi), 148, 271, 293, 401, 447,864 Republican Turkish Party (CTP), 927, 928 Revanduz, 54, 118, 155, 599 revisionism/revisionist, 162, 184, 351, 930 revolution from above, 3-5, 21, 22, 913 Revolutionary Youth (Dev-Genç: Devrimci Gençlik), 401 Rhineland, 169 Ribbentrop, Joachim von, 180-81, 246, 254, 256, 259-60, 265 Rice, Condoleezza, 897, 916 Rizopastis (newspaper), 814 Rogers, (General) Bernard William, 40,

542-43, 561-62, 583

Rogers Plan, 40, 409, 460, 534, 536, 541–43, 554, 561–62, 570, 574 rogue states, 689, 714, 892
Romania, 253, 254, 272, 278, 625–26, 817, 829–80, 834
Rome, Treaty of, 489–90, 496, 502, 503
Roosevelt, Franklin Delano, 264, 272–73, 279
Rose Revolution, 896, 932
Rotterdam, 898
Rumsfeld, Donald, 714, 893, 920
Russia/Russian, 88–101, 751–56, 781–83, 850–56; tsarist, 88–89, 98–99, 189
Russian Federation, 618, 649, 714, 751–56, 762, 850–56, 885–86, 892, 933–34
Ryzhov, Nikita, 308–309, 411, 466, 468, 472

S-300 missile, 44, 704, 775, 810, 852 Saakashevili, Mikheil, 932 Sabancı, Sakıp, 45, 592 Sabetay, followers of, 912 Sabis, Ali İhsan (Paşa), 114 Sachaklian, (Colonel) Harry, 336 Sadabad Pact, 8, 151, 161, 192, 220–22, 243, 389 Sadak, Necmettin, 252, 292, 324, 357, 384 Sadat, Anwar, 480 SAEMK. See National Committee for Strategic Research and Studies (SAEMK) Safavids, 119 safe haven, 439, 603, 682–84 safety zone, 919 Sahin, İbrahim, 909 Şahin, Leyla, 904, 911 Said, Sheikh; uprising, 158, 159, 168–69, 202, 206 Saka, Hasan, 276, 312, 324 Sampson, Nikos, 424, 448 Sancak (Hatay), 167–175. See also Hatay San Remo Conference, 381 San Stefano, Treaty of, 628, 773 Saracoğlu, Şükrü, 36, 152, 165, 173, 192, 193, 240-41, 244-49, 253, 256, 258, 266, 276, 300, 499, 632 Saracoğlu Mission, 193, 246–49 Sarıkaya, Ferhat, 910 Saros, 934 Sarper, Selim, 279-80, 299, 410, 466 Sasson, Elihu, 385 Saudi Arabia, 335–36, 596–97, 610, 680, 858, Saydam, Refik, 164, 248 Schulz, Martin, 898 Schuman, Robert, 489 Schuman Declaration, 489 sea-launched ballistic missiles, 689 Sea God naval exercise, 587 Sea Wolf naval exercise, 587 secularism/secular, 4, 293, 709, 910-12 Security Forces Command, 925

SEK, See Confederation of Cypriot Workers self-determination, 103, 116, 354, 359–60, 475, 598, 797 self-government, 354, 356, 359, 363 Semdinli incident, 910 September 11. See 9/11 attack (11 September 2001) Serbia, 703, 825, 934 Sergius (Patriarch), 348 7:10 ratio, 424-28, 453, 550, 583, 700 Sevket Bey, Memduh, 217, 218, 219, 220 Sèvres, Peace Treaty of, 16, 47, 53, 63-77, 106, 108 Sèvres syndrome/Sèvres paranoia, 667-68, 906, 908, 936, 937 Sezer, Ahmet Necdet, 868, 872, 874, 910-11, 917, 927, 929 Sforza, (Count) Carlo, 81, 85, 86 Shanghai Cooperation Organization, 932 Sharett, Moshe, 383 Sharia law, 4, 5, 613 Shariatmadari, Mohammad Kazem, 487, 488 Sharon, Ariel, 869, 874-75, 929-30 Sharp Drilling, 894 Shatt al-Arab, 219, 220, 221, 222, 557, 614 Shepilov, D. T., 376 Shevardnadze, Eduard, 523, 617, 622, 653, 77,779 Shia/Shiite, 119, 534, 599, 682, 876, 894, 931 SHP. See Social Democratic People's Party SHP) side letter, 429, 534, 552, 697, 698 Simitis, Costas, 652, 671, 702, 740, 791, 804-9, 813, 834 Simko Aga uprising, 218 Şimşir, Bilal, 754 Single European Act (1987), 576, 729 Şırnak, 843, 919 Sisco, Joseph, 448 Sivas Congress, 58, 62 Sixth Fleet, 402, 408, 417, 422, 535, 541, 633 Slovakia, 205, 256, 324, 713, 736, 836, 896, 898 Slovenia, 324, 652, 713, 715, 736, 818, 823, 824, 896,898 smart sanctions, system of, 690 "so-called citizens," 913 Sochi summit, 934 Social Democratic People's Party (SHP), 577, 792, 799, 843 social engineering, 217 socialism in one country, 90, 618 Sökmen, Tayfur, 173 Somalia, 20, 43, 477, 544, 651, 665, 676, 892 Son Telegraf (newspaper), 347 Soros Foundation, 896 South Cyprus, 923 Southeast Anatolia Project (GAP), 598, 607-8, 702, 862, 912

Southeast Asia, 897

Southeast Asia Treaty Organization (SEATO), 335 Southeast Europe Cooperation Initiative, 626, 693, 835 southeastern region. See Turkey/Turkish, southeastern region southern Caucasus, 99 southern flank assistance, 193, 257, 262, 263, 327, 422 sovereignty, 753 Soviet aid, 53, 91, 308, 399, 467, 472 Soviet notes, 292, 313, 351, 372 Soviet Union. See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR) Soysal, İsmail, 188 Sovsal, Mümtaz, 801, 861 Spaak, Paul Henri, 489 Spain, 868, 869, 898 Special Operations Branch of the General Directorate of Security, 909 speculative capital, 16 Sputnik, 340-41 St.-Jean-de-Maurienne Agreement (1917), 71, 84, 116 Stability and Partnership Agreements, 934 Stabilization Force (SFOR), 692, 922 Stalin, Joseph, 187, 247–48, 267–68, 272, 278– 80, 299-300 State Inspection Council (DDK: Devlet Denetleme Kurulu), 911 State Planning Organization (DPT: Devlet Planlama Teşkilatı), 32, 397, 408, 508-9, 571, 726 State Security Courts (SSCs/DGM: Devlet Güvenlik Mahkemeleri), 642, 659, 905-6 statism, 147-48 Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA), 404, status quo, 5, 8, 19-21, 57-58, 65, 86, 143, 162, 178, 184, 207, 211, 359, 394, 458, 460, 536, 562, 600, 625, 651, 652, 669, 671, 702, 703, 799, 801, 834, 928 Stefanopoulos, Stefanos, 359 Straits. See Turkish Straits Straits Commission, 70, 72, 137-38, 230 Strategic Air Command (SAC), 288 Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) Treaties/SALT I/SALT II, 465-66, 621 Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI)/Star Wars, 539, 714, 892 strategic medium power. See medium power/strategic medium power strategic partner, 664, 678, 779, 918 Straw, Tack, 898 strengthened partnership, 370, 436, 584, 664, 678 Stresa Agreements, 177 structural adjustment, 286, 288, 400, 433, 655,

784, 899

Şu Çılgın Türkler (These Crazy Turks), 913 Sudan, 863, 892 Sudetenland, 163 Suez Canal, 370, 373 Suez crisis, 294, 375–77, 386–87 Suleymaniyah, 54, 127, 157, 599, 914, 920, 922 Sümerbank, 899 Sun-Language Theory, 167 Sunalp, Turgut, 439, 530, 546 Sunay, Cevdet, 423, 478, 485 Sunni/Sunnis, 119, 911 Sunni Arabs, 172, 931 superpower, 523, 673 Supreme Allied Commander, Europe (SACEUR), 416 Susurluk accident, 659, 909 Sweden, 187, 321, 493, 513, 641, 713, 728, 776 Swissotel hostage-taking incident, 933 Sykes-Picot Agreement, 53, 54, 70, 71, 74, 78, 115-16, 156, 381 synthesis, 44, 528–29, 535, 536, 540, 651, 657, 669, 834, 913 Syria/Syrian, 166, 169-72, 264, 294, 307, 475-77, 858-62, 866, 921; citizenship, 912; crisis, 377-79 Syrian National Assembly, 117

Taguba, (General) Antonio, 897 Tajikistan, 760, 762 Talabani, Jalal, 558, 604, 686, 861 Talat, Mehmet Ali, 923, 928 Talat Paşa, 86, 88, 126 Taliban, 770, 892, 916 Tan (newspaper), 293, 300, 312, 347 Tanör, Bülent, 660 Tanzimat, 638 Tara, Şarık, 42, 47, 592 Tarzi Mahmut, 120, 220 Tasvir (newspaper), 357 Tayyare ve Motor Türk Anonim Şirketi (TOMTAŞ/TOMTASCH), 179 Tehran Conference, 272-73 telephone diplomacy, 41, 679 Temple Mount, 929 Tengirşenk, Yusuf Kemal, 81, 82, 84, 98, 118 Tepe, Akfen, Vie (TAV), 931 Ter-Petrossian, Levon, 653, 666-67, 767, territorial waters, 453-56, 470, 541 terrorism/terrorist, 541, 930, 933; organizations, 382, 383, 603, 652, 862; state, 666, 897 Teutonia, 182 Tevfik Paşa (Grand Vizier), 65, 66, 81, 97, 114, 126 Thalweg line, 222 theocracy, 780 Theological Seminary of Heybeliada (Halki), 353, 796, 797, 802.

Theotokis, Spiros, 353 Thessaloniki Summit, 923, 934 Third World, 304, 308, 474 Thor (missile), 341 Thornburg, Max Weston, 289, 322 Tigris River, 606 TİP. See Turkish Labor Party (TİP) Tito, Josip Broz, 351, 627 TOBB. See Union of Chambers and Commodity Exchanges of Turkey (TOBB) Tokat, 71 Tokat, Altay, 910 Tornarides, (General) Nikos, 444 torture, 527, 842-49, 910 Torumtay, Necip, 534, 605, 680, 857 Trabzon, 913, 921 Train and Equip Program (Bosnia), 692 "Transatlantic Tendencies 2006," 938 transportation corridor, 694, 696, 775 Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality (1925), 158, 188, 243, 251, 257 Treaty of Friendship, Neutrality, Conciliation, and Arbitration (1930), 243 Treaty of Guarantee, 20, 365, 413, 448, 451, Treaty on Conventional Forces in Europe (CFE), 648, 711, 713, 782 Treaty on the Turkish-Iraqi Frontier and Good Neighborliness (1926), 160 Trikoupis, (General), Nikolaos, 111 Tripartite Alliance (1939), 163-65, 173, 235, 239-40, 246-50, 277, 280, 345-46, 632 Tripoli, 61, 114, 601, 864, 895 Trotsky, Leon, 88 True Path Party (DYP), 43-44, 577, 775, 792, Truman, Harry S., 287, 300, 312-13 Truman Doctrine, 7, 242, 287, 288, 293, 296, 302, 314-20, 369 tsunami, 897 Tudeh Party, 544 Tugay, Hulusi Fuat, 372 Tuomioja, Sakari, 437 Turan, 89, 92, 653 Turan, Şerafettin, 529 Turan, Socialist State of, 89, 92 Turanism/Turanist, 277, 669, 766 Turco-French Agreement (1921), 84, 167 Turcomans/Turkmens, 599, 604, 686, 688, 762, 879, 920, 931 Turkcell, 931 Türkeş, (Colonel) Alparslan, 401-2, 762 Turkey/Turkish: candidacy for European Union membership, 570-71, 582, 663-64, 726-35, 740-42, 928; economy, 12, 131, 143-47, 236-38, 250, 275, 289-92, 296, 317-23, 385, 397, 403-4, 421-22, 492-94, 525, 935; image, 577, 774, 918; lobby (in U.S.), 29, 122; military, 43-45, 74-75, 447-48, 551, 556; nation, 97, 126, 148, 369, 482, 571, 664, 908; nationalism, 65, 129, 658, 904, 909, 913-14, 938; peacekeeping forces, 719-22, 913, 926; ports, 535, 541, 854, 917; security, 43, 412; southeastern region, 842, 906 Türkgeldi, Ali Fuat, 347 Turkification, 144, 203, 759 Turkish Civil Code, 935 Turkish Communist Party, 93, 159, 471, 750 Turkish Cypriot State. See Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC/KKTC: Kuzey Kıbrıs Türk Cumhuriyeti) Turkish Cypriots, 434-37, 443-52, 460-62, 477, 584-85, 591-93, 803, 925-29 Turkish Grand National Assembly (TGNA), 19, 28, 31, 48, 80, 82, 85, 293, 364-66, 420, 447, 683, 846 Turkish Grand National Assembly Government, 83, 86, 106, 124-25 Turkish-Greek War, 106-11, 129 Turkish Industrialists' and Businessmen's Association (TÜSİAD), 45, 577, 707, 855, 917 Turkish-Islamic Synthesis, 528-29, 535, 536, 540, 657, 834, 913 Turkish Labor Party (TİP), 39, 400, 418, 486 Turkish Minority Association of the Island of Cyprus (KATAK), 355 Turkishness, 763-65, 906-7, 938 Turkish Orthodox Patriarchate, 796 Turkish Peace Force, 925 Turkish Penal Code (TPC), 908, 912, 935 Turkish Penal Procedural Law (CMUK), Turkish Petroleum Company (TPAO), 162, 294, 454, 587 Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC/KKTC: Kuzey Kıbrıs Türk Cumhuriyeti), 2, 535, 550, 554, 584--85, 590-92, 629, 761, 797-98, 803-4, 811-12, 863, 924 Turkish Resistance Organization (TMT), 362, 434, 440 Turkish Special Forces, 919-20 Turkish Straits, 6, 20, 100-101, 110, 191, 197, 275-76, 311-13, 787, 881-88, 935-36 Turkish Straits Regulation: of 1994, 881–86; of 1998, 886-88 'Turkish world stretching from the Adriatic to the Great Wall of China," 536, 664, 668, 756, 759, 781, 790, 824, 833, 852 Turkistan, 93, 765 Türkiye İş Bankası. See İş Bankası (Türkiye Is Bankası) "Türkiyeli," 908 Türkkan, Fahreddin (Paşa), 241 Türkmen, Abdülgani, 173 Türkmen, İlter, 40, 544, 601 Turkmenistan, 649, 762, 780, 788 Turkmens. See Turcomans/Turkmens

TÜSİAD. See Turkish Industrialists' and Businessmen's Association (TÜSİAD) Tuygan, Ali, 890

U Thant, 437

U-2 incident, 307–8, 341–42 UBP. See National Unity Party (UBP) Ukraine, 753, 850, 896 Ülkücüler, 911, 913 ultra-Orthodox American Jews, 895 Uluğbay, Hikmet, 144, 161, 289, 397, 403, 524, 900-903 Umut Bookstore, 909 Uniformed Gang. See Yüksekova Gang Union and Progress (Ittihat ve Terakki), 14, 19, 21, 77, 119, 144 Union of Chambers and Commodity Exchanges of Turkey (TOBB), 577, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), 88, 185, 187-93, 245, 249, 266, 298-310, 316, 394-95, 440, 464-72, 522-24, 538, 561, 617-22, 850-56; collapse of, 522-24, 617, 619, 649-51, 665-69, 753; and split with China, 464 United Arab Emirates (UAE), 680, 858, 865 United Nations (UN): administration, 590, 934; Charter, 324, 338, 354, 386, 636, 681, 684, 745, 756, 833; Committee against Torture, 845; General Assembly, 415, 476, 484, 611, 612, 621, 627; Human Rights Committee, 840; Peace Force, 437, 445, 449-50, 482; resolutions, 325, 424, 443, 449, 451, 460, 461, 475, 611, 612, 679, 683, 766, 824, 857; Security Council, 313, 325, 352, 356, 437, 440, 455-57, 585, 593, 611, 712, 800, 833, 918 United Nations Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD), 512 Universal Peace Congress (1929), 211 University of Ankara, 29, 293, 528, 913 University of Van, 911 Ürgüplü, Suat Hayri, 467 Uruguay, 897 U.S., 311-41, 410-31, 538-67, 673-723;

3., 311–41, 410–31, 538–67, 673–723; administration, 536, 539, 555, 697; arms embargo, 425–28, 460, 471, 535, 595; attack on Afghanistan, 915; and capitalism, 285, 311, 316; economy, 236, 285, 288, 538, 674; foreign policy, 316, 448, 538–39, 775; government, 4, 116, 316, 322, 333–34, 414, 422, 427, 429, 448, 683, 894; hegemony, 664, 891–97, 936–37; influence, 40, 285, 287, 398, 400, 531, 652, 688, 694, 710, 896, 937; intelligence, 335, 419–20, 705, 893, 921, 932; list of terrorist organizations, 907; media, 292, 318, 334, 419, 424, 540, 548, 896, 921; military bases, 417, 548, 680,

693; military personnel, 333, 417-18, 896, 918; NGOs, 334, 697, 700, 896; public, 262, 419, 424, 533, 683, 896, 918; soldiers, 380, 417, 679, 913; technical personnel, 917 U.S. Central Command (CENTCOM), 545

U.S. Congress, 288, 316, 424, 425, 427, 456, 471, 538, 547, 565, 691, 699, 704, 706, 772, 774, 776, 869

U.S. Embassy, 322, 323, 549, 558, 689, 701, 705, 892, 919

U.S. Navy, 311, 412, 871, 937

U.S. State Department, 25, 275, 287, 311, 313, 315, 317, 322, 324, 378, 410, 538, 541, 558, 675, 692, 699, 704, 877

U.S. Supreme Court, 365, 366, 897 U.S.-Turkish Friendship Group, 919 USSR, See Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

Uzbekistan, 754, 765, 780, 932 Uzun, Sabri, 910

Vahideddin (Sultan Mehmed VI), 65, 66, 126 Value Added Tax (VAT), 902, 917 Van Court, 910 Vance, Cyrus, 445, 825 Vaporcis, Maximos (Patriarch Maximos), 349

Vatani Party (Iraq), 222 Vatican, 709, 797 Vázquez, Tabare, 897 Veli Khan, Muhammad, 120

Venezuela, 897

Venizelos, Elefterios, 103-7, 127, 195-96, 198, 201, 203-5, 208

Versailles, Treaty of, 69, 87, 178-79, 183 Vessel Traffic Services (VTS) system, 935 veto, 313, 325, 365, 425, 435-36, 505, 543, 561, 564, 574-76, 584-88, 641, 713-15, 717, 719, 726, 740, 761, 792, 799, 804–4, 831, . 896, 906, 922, 928

Vichy government, 261

Vienna, 319, 461–62, 630, 650, 934; Summit, 738

Vietnam War, 314, 319, 394, 395, 469, 538, 701 Villepin, Dominique de, 898

Virtue Party (FP), 904, 910 von Papen, Franz, 180, 241, 244, 252, 254, 256, 259-62, 267, 276-77, 345 von Sanders, Liman, 114

War Crimes Tribunal, 825, 935 War of Liberation, 5, 19, 54-60, 91-93, 117, 150, 159, 708 Warsaw Pact, 11, 13, 627, 710 , Washington, George, 314 Washington Post, 769, 920 Washington Summit, 711, 715, 717, 718, 922 Wealth Tax Law (Varlık Vergisi), 238, 345-46,655 weapons of mass destruction, 896 Weizmann, Chaim, 117

Welfare Party, 44, 577, 657, 708-10, 714, 775, 863, 870, 872, 877, 904

West Bank, 598, 611, 929

western Anatolia, 7, 65, 78–79, 84, 103–4, 109, 176

Western Europe, 287–88

Western European Union (WEU), 577, 664, 694, 713-20, 740, 846

Westernism/Westernization, 21-23, 59, 80, 129, 150, 183, 324, 870, 904

Western Thrace, 195, 196, 203, 214, 257, 353-54, 442, 534, 589-90, 793-94, 801

Western values, 21, 80, 897–98

Western Working Group, 44

Westphalia, 63

Wexler, Robert, 919

Weygand, (General) Maxime, 165

White Army, 94, 100

White Books, 382

white energy scandal, 933, 934

"white man's burden," 915

White Revolution (Iran), 486-87

Wider Black Sea Project, 896

Wilson, Joseph, 897

Wilson, Woodrow, 104, 115, 183

Wolfowitz, Paul, 896, 916

World Bank/International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD), 10, 285, 286, 320, 375, 607, 655, 787, 896

World Islamic Union, 477

World Jewish Congress, 386. World Trade Organization (WTO), 10, 285, World War I, 56, 57, 64, 69, 72, 78, 85, 102, 103, 115, 117, 119, 121, 129, 131, 139, 143, 182-84, 210, 274, 277, 335, 381, 494, 521, 629, 650, 680, 769, 773, 826, 916 World War II, 10, 15, 181, 235, 243–82 World Zionist Organization, 381

xenophobia, 3, 577, 912

Yakış, Yaşar, 890 Yakovos, Archbishop, 796 Yalçın, Hüseyin Cahit, 308, 383-84 Yalçınbayır, Ertuğrul, 918 Yalta Conference, 279-280 Yapı ve Kredi Bankası, 902 Yassin, Sheikh Ahmed, 930 Yavuz, Fehmi, 419 Yavuzdemir, Hüseyin, 913 Yemen, 61, 113-14, 222, 368, 447, 544, 892, Q2.1 Yeni Aktüel (weekly), 910 Yezidis, 113, 155 Yıldırım, Mustafa, 933 Yılmaz, Mehmet Nuri, 802, 804 Yılmaz, Mesut, 44, 533, 630, 658, 769, 775, 792, 795, 799, 802, 804, 806–8, 871 Youth Party, 904 Yücel, Hasan Ali, 293 Yugoslay Federation, 934 Yugoslavia, 351, 464, 625-26, 630-31, 692-93, 822-23, 830-33 Yüksekova Gang, 909

Zahir Shah, Mohammed, 220 Zaim, (Colonel) Hosni, 369 Zebari, Hoshyar, 920 Zervudakis, Grigorius, 205 Zionism/Zionist, 381-82, 481, 484, 872 Ziyal, Uğur, 928 Zorlu, Fatin Rüştü, 38, 289, 296, 308-9, 339, 359, 363, 379, 387, 493, 495-96, 502

Detailed Contents

Preface (Baskin Oran) xi

A New Kind of Book • Approach, Form, and Content • Spelling, Explanatory Notes, and Acknowledgments xi.

Introduction: Turkish Foreign Policy in Theory and Practice

From Empire to Nation-State: Similarities and Differences in Foreign Policy 2

The Overall Framework of Turkish Foreign Policy (Baskın Oran) 3

- I. Basic Factors Influencing Turkish Foreign Policy 3
  - A. The Cultural Dimension 3

    Central Asian Middle Eastern–Islamic Western 3
  - B. The Historical Dimension 4
  - C. The Strategic Dimension 5
    - 1. Turkey's Geography 5
      Geostrategic Location Neighbors The Turkish
      Straits 5
    - 2. Turkey's Regional Security Rings and Its Dilemmas
      The European Perspective The Balkan Perspective •
      The Mediterranean Perspective The Middle East Perspective The Caucasus Perspective 6
    - 3. Turkey's Location and Global Power Axes 7
  - D. The Domestic Dimension 7

    The General and Historical Aspects The Specific PresentDay Aspect The Ideological Aspect 7
- II. The Military, Political, and Economic Background of Turkish Foreign Policy 9
  - A. Turkey as a Strategic Medium Power (SMP): Military-Strategic and Economic Dimensions 9 The Concept of a "Medium Power" • The Elements of an SMP: The Economic and Military-Strategic Dimensions 9
  - B. The Security Factor of Foreign Policy 11
    - The Domestic Setting of Turkish Foreign Policy
       The Military Circle The Economic Circle The PoliticalSocial Circle 11
    - The International and Regional System in Which Turkish Foreign Policy Operates 13
  - C. The Political Economy of Foreign Policy 14
    - 1. Industrialization through Import Substitution (IIS) 1

- 2. Integration in the International Economy 15
- 3. The Question of the Transition from the IIS Model to the Integration Model 17
- The Question of the Relationship of Security, Economy, and Foreign Policy in a Developing Medium Power 17
- III. The Guiding Principles of Turkish Foreign Policy 18
  - A. Maintenance of the Status Quo 19
    - 1. Preserving Existing Frontiers 19
    - 2. Preserving Existing Balances 20
    - B. Westernism 21

The Meaning and Roots of Westernism • The Rudder and Engine of Westernism: The Intellectuals • The Aydınlar in Turkey, the West, and Foreign Policy 21

The Implementation of Turkish Foreign Policy 24

- I. The Ministry of Foreign Affairs (Baskin Oran) 24
  - A. The Relative Autonomy of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs 24

The Ministry's Difficult Task • The Ministry's Personnel and Budget 24

- 1. Outside Sources Feeding the MFA's Autonomy 25
  The Nature of the Diplomatic Profession The Special Features of Turkey 25
- 2. Factors within the Ministry That Contribute to Relative Autonomy 26
  The Quality of Personnel The MFA's Bureaucratic Character The Rational Aspect of the Ministry's Bureaucracy The Closeness of the MFA to the Military Esprit de Corps 26
- B. Shortcomings and Weaknesses of the Ministry 37
  - 1. The MFA's External Shortcomings and Weaknesses

    Material Constraints Erosion of Responsibility 32.
  - 2. The MFA's Internal Shortcomings and Weaknesses "Memory" Policy Planning Alternative Policy Proposals The Question of Specialization 33
- II. The Formulation of Turkish Foreign Policy (İlhan Uzgel) 35
  - A. The Historical Dimension 35
    - 1. Leaders as Determining Factors (1919-1950) 36
    - 2. The Growing Influence of the MFA (1950-1960) 37
    - 3. The Rise of Public Opinion (1960-1980) 38
    - 4. The 12 September Period (1980-1983) 40
    - 5. The Rise of the Business World (1983–1991) 40

- The Increased Weight of the Military (1991 to the EU Harmonization Packages) 42
   The Leadership 47
- B. The Legal Background of Turkish Foreign Policy 47

SECTION 1. 1919-1923: THE TIME OF LIBERATION

Appraisal of the Period (Baskin Oran) 53

- I. The International Environment and Dynamics 53
- II. The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 54
- III. The Foreign Policy of the Period 57
  - A. Independence Based on Realism 57

    Revisionism and the Status Quo in the National Pact 57
  - B. Westernism Based on Balance 59

    The West versus the West The Soviets versus the West 59

The Armistice of Mudros (Baskın Oran) 61

Post-Mudros, Pre-Sèvres 62

The Peace Treaty of Sèvres (Baskin Oran) 63

- I. The Road Leading from the Shift in the Trade Routes to Sèvres 63
  - A. The Rise of Europe 63
  - B. The Decline of the Ottoman Empire 64
- II. The Story of the Signing of the Sèvres Treaty 65
  - A. The Ottoman Government's Counterproposals to the Draft Peace Treaty 66 Introduction: The Fundamental Contradiction of Sevres • Political Provisions • Izmir • Armenia • The Capitulations 66
  - B. The Counterreply of the Allies: An Ultimatum 68
  - C. The Ottoman Government's Decision to Sign 68
- III. Examination of the Treaty 69
  - A. The Frontiers 69

    The European Frontier The Asian Frontier One Treaty,
    Three Maps 70
  - B. Political Clauses 71 -
    - 1. İstanbul 71
    - 2. The Straits and the Commission 72
    - 3. Kurdistan 72
      The Three Related Articles The Subject of the Independence of Kurdistan 72
    - 4. İzmir 73
    - 5. Armenia 74
  - C. Protection of Minorities 74
  - D. Military Clauses 75

    Clauses Relating to the Army Clauses Relating to the Navy and the Air Force 75
  - E. Financial Clauses 76
  - F. Economic Clauses 77

    The Capitulations and Concessions 77

Relations with Western Europe 78

- Relations with Britain (İlhan Uzgel and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 78
  - A. Basic Factors Determining Relations 78

    The British Viewpoint The Turkish Viewpoint 78
  - B. Main Developments 80

- 1. The Occupation of Parliament 80
- 2. The London Conference (February 1921) 80
- 3. The Effects of the Turkish-French Agreement on Relations with Britain 81
- 4. From the Çanakkale Crisis to Mudanya 82
- II. Relations with France (Ilhan Uzgel) 83
  - A. The Bekir Sami-Briand Agreement and Its Rejection 83
  - B. The Turco-French Agreement of 1921 84
  - III. Relations with Italy (İlhan Uzgel) 85
- IV. Relations with Germany (Ilhan Uzgel) 86

Relations with the Soviets (Erel Tellal) 88

- I. The Foreign Policy of the Bolshevik Government 88
- II. Cooperation: Its Reasons and Agents 91

  Reasons The Actors: Unionists and Communists 91
- III. The Development of Relations 93
  - A. The Establishment of Relations and the TGNA's First Delegation 94
  - B. A Provisional Solution to the Armenian Question:
     The Treaty of Gümrü 96
  - C. The Second TGNA Delegation 97
  - D. The Moscow Treaty of 1921 98
  - E. The Treaties of Kars and Ardahan 99
  - F. Relations at Lausanne: The Question of the Straits 100

Relations with Greece (Melek Firat) 102

- I. Greek Aspirations in Anatolia and the Emergence of the National Struggle (1919) 102
   The Paris Peace Conference and the Greek Position • The Occupation of İzmir and Its Consequences 102
- II. The Turkish-Greek Struggle for Anatolia (1920–1922) 106

  The Greek Army's Advance in Anatolia The First Battle of Inönü The London Conference The Greek Army's Advance on Afyon and Eskişehir and the Second Battle of İnönü The Battle of Sakarya The General Offensive 106

Relations with the Middle East 113

- I. Relations with Arab Countries (Melek Fırat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 114
  - A. The Mudros Armistice and Subsequent Developments 114
  - B. Conflicting Interests over the Middle East at the 1919 Paris Peace Conference and the Arab Policies of the Representative Delegation (Heyet-i Temsiliye) 115
  - C. Arab Policies from the National Pact to Sèvres 117
  - D. Clashes with Britain and Kurdish Revolts 117
- II. Relations with Non-Arab Countries (Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu)118
  - A. Relations with Iran 118
  - B. Relations with Afghanistan 120
  - C. Relations with the Indian Muslims and the Caliphate

    Movement 121

The Armistice of Mudanya (Baskın Oran) 124

The Peace Treaty of Lausanne (Baskin Oran) 126

L The Peace Conference of Lausanne 126

- A. Preparations for the Conference 126

  The Question of Turkish Representation and Its Solution:

  Abolition of the Sultanate The Participating States and the Turkish Delegation The Turkish Delegation's Brief 126
- B. The General Features of the Conference and of the Signed Instruments 128

  The Organization of the Conference and Its General Atmosphere General Information about the Instruments Details of the Conference The Fundamental Importance of Lausanne 128
- II. The Peace Treaty (Instrument No. I) 131
  - A. Political Clauses 131

    Frontiers Capitulations Protection of Minorities The Concept of a Minority at Lausanne, Minority Rights, and Implementation 131

  - B. Financial Clauses 135
- III. Examination of the Other Noteworthy Instruments of the Conference 136
  - A. Convention Relating to the Straits (Instrument No. II) 137
  - B. Convention on Conditions of Residence and Business and Jurisdiction (Instrument No. IV) 138
  - C. Commercial Convention (Instrument No. V) 138
  - D. Declaration Relating to Sanitary Matters (Instrument No. X) 138
  - E. Declaration Relating to the Administration of Justice (Instrument No. XI) 139
  - F. Protocol Relating to Certain Concessions Granted in the Ottoman Empire (Instrument No. XII) 139
- IV. Differences between the Lausanne and Sèvres Treaties 140

SECTION 2. 1923-1939: RELATIVE AUTONOMY-1

Appraisal of the Period (Baskin Oran) 143

- I. The International Environment and Dynamics 143
- II. The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 143
  - A. The Period from 1923 to 1930 and Liberalism

    The Economy Politics 143
  - B. The Period from 1930 to 1939 and Statism

    The Economy Politics 147
- III. The Foreign Policy of the Period 148
  - A. Three Views on Atatürk's Foreign Policy 148
  - B. Foreign Policy in the East: The Kurdish Question 151
  - C. Foreign Policy in the West: The Question of Balance vs.

    Alliance 151

    The Search for a Balance of Power The Search for

    Alliance 151
- IV. General Appraisal 152

Relations with Western Europe 154

- I. Relations with Britain (Ilhan Uzgel and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 154
  - A. Developments after Lausanne 154
  - B. The Question of Mosul 154
    - 1. The Question of Mosul at the Lausanne Conference
      The Turkish Position The British Position 155
    - 2. The Halic Conference (Istanbul Conference) 157

- 3. The Question of Mosul at the League of Nations 157

  The Committee's Report The Decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice Why Turkey
  Lost Mosul 157
- 4. The 1926 Treaty and Turkey's Acceptance of the Revised Frontier 160
- 5. The Financial Aspect of the Treaty and Its Consequences 161
- C. Developments in the 1930s 162
  - 1. Direct Cooperation 162
  - 2. The Mediterranean Pact between Turkey and Britain 163
  - 3. The Road Leading to the Tripartite Alliance of Turkey, Britain, and France (The Ankara Pact) 163
- II. Relations with France (İlhan Uzgel) 165
  - A. Developments after Lausanne 165
  - B. The Question of the Ottoman Debt 166
  - C. The Question of Sancak (Hatay) (Melek Fırat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 167
    - 1. Developments in Sancak after Lausanne 167
    - 2. The Turkish-French Convention of 30 May 1926 168
    - 3. The Franco-Syrian Preliminary Agreement of 1936 and Its Effect on Sancak 169 The Sandler Report 169
    - 4. The Documents of 29 May 1937 170
      - a. The International Compacts Establishing the Sancak of İskenderun as a "Distinct Entity" 170 The Frontiers of the Sancak of Iskenderun • The Status of Sancak • The Constitution of Sancak 170
      - b. The Treaty Guaranteeing the Territorial Integrity of Sancak 172
      - c. The Agreement Guaranteeing the Turkish-Syrian Frontier 172
    - 5. The Creation of the State of Hatay and the Decision to Join Turkey 172 The Military Treaty • The Union with Turkey • Appraisal of the Hatay Issue 173
- III. Relations with Italy (Ilhan Uzgel) 175
  - A. The Period from 1923 to 1934 175
  - B. The Period from 1934 to 1939 176
- IV. Relations with Germany (İlhan Uzgel) 178
  - A. The Weimar Period (1923-1933) 178
    - The Establishment of Diplomatic Relations and Subsequent
      Political Relations 178
    - 2. Economic Relations 179
  - B. The Nazi Period (1933-1939) 179
    - 1. Political Relations 179
    - 2. Economic Relations 181
    - Cultural Relations and German Propaganda Activities in Turkey 182
- V. Turkey and the Issues of International Security (Ilhan Uzgel) 183

- A. International Security, Disarmament Efforts, and Turkey 183
- B. Turkey's Membership in the League of Nations 184
- C. The Mediterranean Security Conference of Nyon 185

Relations with the USSR (Erel Tellal) 187

- I. The Background of Relations 187

  Turkey The USSR 187
- II. Cooperation (1923-1936) 188
  - A. The Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality of 1925 188
  - B. The Trade Agreement of 1927 188
  - C. The 1929 Protocol 189
  - D. Relations in the First Half of the 1930s 190

    Protocol to Limit Naval Forces Prime Minister İsmet Paşa's

    Visit to the USSR 190
- III. The Parting of Ways (1936-1939) 191
  - A. The Montreux Conference 191
  - B. Preparations for War 192

    Turkey's Preparations The USSR's Preparations The Saracoğlu Mission 192

Relations with Greece (Melek Fırat) 195

- I. Relations at the Lausanne Peace Conference 195
  - A. Turkey and Greece on the Eve of Lausanne 195
  - B. The Basic Questions at Lausanne and Their Settlement
    - 1. Territorial Questions and Frontiers 196
      The Frontier in Thrace Islands of the Northern Aegean Sea 196
    - 2. Humanitarian Questions 198
      - a. The Exchange of Populations 198

        The Agreement between Greece and Turkey respecting the Reciprocal Restitution of Interned Civilians and the Exchange of Prisoners of War The Convention concerning the Exchange of Greek and Turkish Populations 199
      - b. The Question of the Patriarchate 200
    - 3. Financial Questions (The Question of Reparation) 202
- II. The Period of Tension (1923-1928) 202
  - A. Turkey and Greece in the 1920s 202
  - B. The Aftermath of Lausanne 204
    - 1. The Question of the Established (Établi) 204
    - 2. The Question of the Patriarchate 204
  - C. The 1925 Ankara and 1926 Athens Treaties 206
- III. The Period of Friendship (1928-1939) 207
  - A. The 1930 Agreements 208
    - 1. The Ankara Convention of 10 June 1930 208
    - 2. The Agreements of 30 October 1930 209
    - 3. Turkish-Greek Relations at Their Zenith: The Cordial Agreement of 1933 210
  - B. The Balkan Entente 210

    The Establishment of the Balkan Entente The Balkan

    Entente Pact 211
  - C. Relations on the Eve of World War II 212
  - D. The Results of the Friendship 213

Relations with the Middle East

(Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 216

- I. Relations with Iran 216
  - A. Iran's Adoption of the Kemalist Regime as Its Model 216
  - B. The Border Dispute 217
- II. Relations with Afghanistan 220

- III. The Sadabad Pact 220
  - A. The Events Leading to the Pact 220
  - B. The Preparatory Stage, Signing, and End of the Pact 221

The Montreux Straits Convention (Kudret Özersay) 224

- I. The Montreux Straits Convention 224

  The New International Situation Turkey's Initiatives Prior to 1936 Turkey's Note of 10 April 1936 Why the Note Received a Favorable Reception The Positions of the Participants 224
- II. The New Regime Adopted at Montreux 226
  - A. The Transit Regime and "Imminent Threat of War" 226
    - 1. Passage of Merchant Vessels 226
      - a. In Time of Peace 226
      - b. In Time of War 227
      - c. When Turkey Itself Is Threatened with Imminent Danger of War 227
    - 2. Passage of Vessels of War 227
      - a. In Time of Peace 22.8

        Rules Applicable to War Vessels of All States Rules

        Applicable to the Warships of Non–Black Sea

        Powers Rules Applicable to the War Vessels of Black Sea Powers 228

      - b. In Time of War 229
        Turkey Being Nonbelligerent Turkey Being
        Belligerent 229
      - c. When Turkey Itself Is Threatened with Imminent Danger of Wat 229
    - 3. Passage of Aircraft 230
  - B. The Lifting of the Restrictions Imposed at Lausanne 230

    Remilitarization of the Straits Abolition of the Straits

    Commission 230
  - C. Expiration of the Convention and Its Revision 230

SECTION 3. 1939-1945: RELATIVE AUTONOMY-2

Appraisal of the Period (Baskın Oran) 235

- I. The International Environment and Dynamics 235
- II. The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 236
- III. The Foreign Policy of the Period 238
  - A. Basic Objective and Strategy 238
  - B. Basic Tactics 239
    - 1. Legal Arguments 239
    - 2. Taking Advantage of Differences 240

      Differences between Axis Powers Internal Differences among the Allies The Opportunities Created by Turkey's Weakness Differences between the Opposing Parties and among the Allies 240
    - 3. Domestic Policies as Instruments of Foreign Policy 241
- IV. General Appraisal 242

World War II and Turkey, 1939–1945 (Mustafa Aydın) 243 Turkey's International Commitments at the Outbreak of the

- I. 1939-1941: The Belligerents Court Turkey 244
  - A. The Road Leading to War 244

The Italian Threat • The Joint Statements 244

- 1. The Saracoğlu Mission 246
- 2. The Tripartite Alliance 249
- B. Turkey's Efforts to Stay Out of the War 250
  The Question of Chromium Sales Italy's Belligerency and the Tripartite Alliance The Plan to Attack Baku Italy's Occupation of Greece 250
- C. Nazi-Soviet Bargaining over Turkey (The Hitler-Molotov Negotiations, November 1940) 254

  The Issue of Turkey and the Straits in the Course of Molotov's Berlin Visit The Nazis' Denunciation of the Soviets 254
- II. 1941-1943: German Pressure on Turkey 256
  - A. Turkey's Reaction When Germany Reached the Balkans 256
    The Importance of Bulgaria The Turkish-Bulgarian Declaration of Nonaggression The Turkish-Soviet Nonaggression Declaration The German Proposals •
    The Turkish-German Nonaggression Pact 256
  - B. The German-Soviet Conflict and Turkey 263
- III. 1943-1945: Northerly Winds toward the End of the War 265
  - A. Allied Efforts to Draw Turkey into the War 265
    The Casablanca Conference The Adana Meeting
    (The İnönü-Churchill Talks) The Quebec Conference •
    The Moscow Conference The First Cairo Conference
    (The Eden-Menemencioğiu Talks) The Tehran Conference and the Changed Soviet Position The Second Cairo Conference 266
  - B. The Crisis of Confidence: Tensions between Turkey and the Allies 274

    The Problem of the Export of Chromium to Germany

    The Question of German Ships Passing through the Straits 275
  - C. The End of the War and Turkey 276

    The Yalta Conference The Molotov-Sarper Meeting and the Soviet Note of 19 March 1945 Turkey at the End of the War 279

Section 4. 1945–1960: Turkey in the Orbit of the Western Bloc—1

Appraisal of the Period (Baskin Oran) 285

- I. The International Environment and Dynamics 285
  - A. A Bipolar System 285
  - B. The Eastern Bloc 285
  - C. The Western Bloc 287
    - 1. The USA 287
      Objective Methods 287
    - 2. Western Europe 288
- II. The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 288
  - A. The Economy 289

    Unrestricted Exposure to the Outside World (1946–1953) •
    The Consequences of Unrestrained Extravagance •
    The Economy's Dependency on Foreign Resources •
    An Unsatisfactory Model for Borrowing: 1958 289

- B. Politics 292
- III. The Foreign Policy of the Period 294
- IV. General Appraisal 296

From the Perspective of Joining NATO • From the Perspective of the General Nature of Foreign Policy 296

Relations with the USSR (Erel Tellal) 298

- I. Tension in Relations (1945–1953) 298
  - A. The USSR after the War 298
  - B. The Soviet Demands on Turkey and Their Consequences 298
    The Soviet Demands at Potsdam The Article of the Georgian Professors The Battle of Notes The Causes of the Soviet Demands The Consequences of the Soviet Demands An Appraisal of the Soviet Demands
- II. From Tension to Détente (1953-1960) 303
  - A. The USSR after Stalin 303
  - B. The Development of Bilateral Relations 304
    - 1. The Soviet Note of 30 May 1953 and Turkey's Reply 304
    - Turkey's Bloc Policy 305
       U.S. Bases and Activities in Turkey Turkey's Part in the Policy of "Containment" • The Syrian and Iraqi Crises • The Nuclear Missiles and U-2 Crises 305
    - 3. Economic Relations 308
    - 4. Menderes's Plan to Visit Moscow 309

Relations with the USA and NATO (Çağrı Erhan) 311

- I. Relations during the Transition to a Multiparty System 311
  - A. The Turkish Straits and the U.S. after the War 311

    The Visit of the Missouri and Turkish-American

    Rapprocrement The U.S.-Soviet Rivalry over the

    Straits 312
  - B. The Truman Doctrine 314

    The Background and the Objectives of the Doctrine The Enactment of the Doctrine, the Nature of the Aid, and Its Conditions The Reception of the Truman Doctrine in Turkey The Agreement of 12 July 1947 The Utilization of the Aid The Consequences of the Truman Doctrine 315
  - C. The Marshall Plan 320

    The Background of the Plan Turkey and the Marshall Plan The Utilization of the Aid and Its

    Consequences 320
- II. The Democratic Party Period-I (1950-1955) 323
  - A. The Road Leading to NATO Membership 323
    Reasons for Turkey's Interest in NATO Efforts to Secure Membership during the CHP Period The Korean War and Turkey's Decision to Send Troops The Proposed Mediterranean Pact Turkey in NATO 323
  - B. American Military and Economic Aid 328

    America's Reasons for Providing Aid Turkey's Reaction to the Aid The Volume of Aid and Its Utilization Privileges Granted to American Investors 328
  - C. Turkish-American Bilateral Agreements 330

    Principal Bilateral Agreements The Problems Arising from the Bilateral Agreements 330

- III. The Democratic Party Period—II (1955–1960) 333
  - A. Emerging Disagreements in Bilateral Relations 333
  - B. Turkish-American Cooperation in the Middle East 334

    Eisenhower and the New Look Strategy The Baghdad Pact and the U.S. The Eisenhower Doctrine Difficulties in the U.S. Plans for the Middle East 334
  - C. The Question of the Jupiter Missiles 340
  - D. The U-2 Incident and Turkey 341

Relations with Greece (Melek Fırat) 344

- I. Turkish-Greek Relations after World War II (1945–1950) 344
  - A. Greek Criticism of Turkey's Wartime Policies and Turkey's Response 344
  - B. Rapprochement in Turkish-Greek Relations 347
    The Paris Peace Treaty of 1947 The U.S. Factor in Relations and the Election of Athenagoras as Patriarch 347
- II. The Second Period of Friendship (1950-1955) 349
  - A. Reciprocal Visits and Strengthened Friendship 350
  - B. The Balkan Pact and Alliance 350

    The Background of the Balkan Pact and Alliance •
    The Balkan Pact The Balkan Alliance 351
  - C. The Effects of Friendship on the Minorities 353
- III. Friendship under the Shadow of the Cyprus Question (1955–1960) 354
  - A. Political Groupings in Cyprus 355
  - B. Demands for Enosis after World War II and Turkey's Reaction 356
  - C. The Internationalization of the Question and the Beginning of EOKA Activities 357
  - D. The London Conference and the Events of 6-7 September 358
  - E. Britain's Cyprus Proposals and Turkey's Espousal of the Partition Plan 359
  - F. The Solution: Independent Cyprus 363
    - 1. The Zurich and London Conferences 363
    - 2. The London Treaties and the TGNA 364
      - a. The Basic Treaty concerning the Establishment of the Republic of Cyprus 364
      - b. The Treaty of Guarantee 365
      - c. The Treaty of Alliance 365
      - d. The British Government Declaration of 17 February 1959 366

Relations with the Middle East 368

- I. Relations with Arab States (Melek Fırat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 368
  - A. The Period of Rapprochement with Arab States (1945– 1949) 368
  - B. From the Middle East Command Project to the Baghdad Pact (1950–1955) 369
    - 1. The Middle Eastern Command Project 370
    - 2. The Baghdad Pact 371

      Treaty of Friendly Cooperation between Turkey and

- Pakistan (2 April 1954) Turkey-Iraq Treaty of Mutual Cooperation (24 February 1955) 372
- C. The Middle Eastern Crises and Turkey (1956-1960) 375
  - 1. The 1956 Suez Crisis 375
  - 2. The Syrian Crisis of 1957 377
  - 3. The 1958 Iraqi Coup and the Establishment of CENTO 379
  - 4. Turkey and the Events of 1958 in Lebanon and Jordan 380
- II. The Question of Palestine (Çağrı Erhan and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 381
  - A. The Background of the Question 381
  - B. Israel's Independence and Turkey's Reaction 382
    - 1. The Partition of Palestine and Turkey 382
    - 2. The Establishment of the State of Israel 382
    - 3. The Arab-Israeli War and the Conciliation Commission for Palestine 383
    - 4. Turkey's Recognition of Israel 383
- III. Relations with Non-Arab States 384
  - A. Relations with Israel (Çağrı Erhan and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 384
    - Background of the Progressive Development of Relations with Israel 384
    - 2. Economic and Cultural Relations 385
    - 3: Political Relations 386
      - a. Israel's Attitude to the Baghdad Pact 386
      - b. Turkey's Policy toward Israel during the 1956 Suez Crisis 386
      - c. The Peripheral Pact 387
  - B. Relations with Iran (Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 388 Overcoming the Wartime Interruption • The Mosaddeq Period • From the Sadabad Pact to CENTO 388

SECTION 5. 1960-1980: RELATIVE AUTONOMY-3

Appraisal of the Period (Baskin Oran) 393

- I. The International Environment and Dynamics 393
  The Slackening of the Cold War The U.S. Retreat The Growing Strength of the USSR and the Third World The World Economy and Social Developments 393
- II. The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 397
  - A. The Economy 397

    The Years of Growth The Slump and Its Causes •
    The Foreign Debt Spiral 397
  - B. Politics 399
    From Democracy to "Double 12" 400
- III. The Foreign Policy of the Period 403

  The Years of Purposeful Foreign Policy The Nature of Foreign Policy 404
- IV. General Appraisal 409

Relations with the USA and NATO (Çağrı Erhan) 410

- I. The Period from 1960 to 1965 410

  The 27 May Coup and the U.S. 410
  - A. Relations during the Cuban Crisis 410

- The Background of the Crisis and Its Evolution Turkey's Stance in the Face of the Escalating Crisis Agreement between the U.S. and the USSR The Dismantling of the Jupiters The Consequences of the Crisis 410
- B. The Question of Cyprus and the Johnson Letter 412

  The U.S. Approach to the Question Johnson's Letter Inönü's Talks in the U.S. The Consequences of Johnson's Letter 412
- C. The Multilateral Force (MLF) 416

  The Establishment of the Multilateral Nuclear Force •

  Turkey's Approach to the MLF Turkey's Refusal and the End of the MLF 416
- II. The Period from 1965 to 1971 417
  - A. Questions Arising in Connection with American Military Personnel 417
    Increased Discontent over U.S. Military Personnel The Turkish-American Bilateral Agreement of 24 September 1968 417
  - B. The Public Perception of Relations with the U.S. 418

    The Views on Turkey's NATO Membership The Peace

    Corps Issue The CIA Scare and the Incident with

    Ambassador Komer 418
  - C. The Joint Defense Cooperation Agreement (JDCA) of 1969 420
  - D. Economic and Military Aid 421

    Economic Aid Military Aid 421

    421
- III. The Period from 1971 to 1980 422
  - A. The Opium Poppy Question 422

    The Background of the Question The Banning of Opium

    Poppy Cultivation in Turkey The Lifting of the Ban and a Return to Tense Relations 422

  - B. The Arms Embargo and the 7:10 Ratio 424
    The Shaping of American Policy after the Cyprus Intervention The Decision to Impose an Arms Embargo Turkish Reaction to the Embargo The Process of Lifting the Embargo: The DECA of 1976 and the 7:10 Ratio The Lifting of the Embargo and Its Consequences 424
  - C. The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) of 1980 428

    Problems That Emerged in the Course of Negotiations •

    DECA's Provisions 428
  - D. The Effects of Iran's Revolution on Turkish-American Relations 430

Relations with Greece (Melek Firat) 432

- I. Background of the Period 432
- II. The Period When the Cyprus Question Was the Determining Factor (1960–1974)434
  - A. The Independence of Cyprus and the Cyprus Policy of the 27 May Administration 434
  - B. The 1964 Crisis and Its Consequences 435

    The Emergence of Disputes in Cyprus and Makarios's

    Proposal to Amend the Constitution The Events of 1964 and the London Conference The Cyprus Question and the UN•U.S. Efforts to Solve the Cyprus Question Turkey's

- First Intervention The Soviet Union's Policy vis-à-vis the 1964 Cyprus Crisis The 1964 Cyprus Crisis and the Nonaligned Countries The Effect of the Cyprus Crisis on Minorities The Galo Plaza Report and the Resolution of the UN General Assembly 435
- C. The Thaw between the Demirel Government and the Greek Junta and the 1967 Cyprus Crisis 443
  The Demirel-Kollias Talks The Cyprus Crisis of 1967:
  Clashes at Geçitkale and Boğaziçi The Establishment of the Provisional Turkish Administration of Cyprus (PTAC) 443
- D. Turkey's Military Operations in Cyprus in 1974 and Their Consequences 446
  - The Circumstances That Led to the 1974 Operation 4.46
     The U.S. Position The Cyprus Policy of the Colonels •
     Developments in Turkey Up to 1974 and Their Effect on Cyprus 446
  - 2. The First Cyprus Operation 447
  - 3. The Geneva Conference and the Geneva Protocol 449
  - 4. The Second Cyprus Operation 451
- III. The Period When the Aegean Question Came to the Forefront (1975–1980) 452
- A. Questions Relating to the Sea Areas in the Aegean 453
  - 1. The Question of Territorial Waters 453
  - 2. The Question of the Continental Shelf 454
    Greece's Application to the UN Security Council and the International Court of Justice The 1976 Bern Declaration and the Montreux Summit 455
  - B. Questions Relating to the Airspace of the Aegean 457
    The Airspace The FIR Line 457
  - C. Questions Relating to the Military Balance in the  $\mbox{Aegean} \quad \mbox{458}$
    - The Question of the Militarization of the Aegean Islands 459
    - 2. The Question of the NATO Early Warning Line and Command and Control Areas 459
- IV. Developments in Cyprus (1975-1980) 460
  - A. Proclamation of the Turkish Federated State of Cyprus (TFSC) 460
  - B. The Intercommunal Talks 461

    The Agreement on Four Principles between Denktaş and Makarios The Ten-Point Agreement between Denktaş and Kyprianou 461

Relations with the USSR (Erel Tellal) 464

- I. Domestic and Foreign Policy of the USSR 464
- II. From "Normalization" to Cooperation 465
  - A. Factors Influencing Relations 465
  - B. Normalization (1960-1964) 466
  - C. Cooperation (1965-1980) 468
    - 1. High-Level Visits 468
    - The Declarations on the Principles of Good Neighborliness of 1972 468
    - 3. The Political Document on Good Neighborliness and Friendly Cooperation of 1978 470
- III. Economic Relations 471

Relations with the Middle East 474

- I. Relations with Arab States (Melek Fırat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 474
  - A. A Different Way of Seeing the Arab States after the Coup of 27 May 474
  - B. The Period of Rapprochement (1965-1971) 477
  - C. The Organization of the Islamic Conference and Turkey 478
  - D. Warm Relations (1973-1979) 480
- II. Relations with Non-Arab States 482
  - A. Relations with Israel (Çağrı Erhan and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 482
    - 1. Stagnating Relations 482
      - a. The Arab-Israeli War of 1967 and Turkey 482
      - b. Turkey's Reactions to the Burning of the Masjid al-Aqsa 483
    - 2. The Worsening of Relations 483
      - a. Turkey and the Arab-Israeli War of 1973 483
      - b. Turkey and the PLO 484
  - B. Relations with Iran (Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 485The Islamic Republic 487

Relations with the EEC (Çağrı Erhan and Tuğrul Arat) 489

- I. The Origin of the Turkey-EEC Relationship 489
  - A. The Factors Influencing Turkey's View of the EEC 490

    The Historical and Ideological Factors The Economic

    Factor The Political Factor 490
  - B. The Factors Shaping the EEC's Perception of Turkey

    The Historical and Ideological Factors The Economic

    Factor The Political Factor 494
- II. The Association Period 495
  - A. Toward Association 495

The Environment in Which Turkey Applied to the EEC •
The Initial Contacts • Questions Slowing Down the Negotiations • The EEC's Decision to Go Slowly • Turkey's Concern over EEC-Greek Relations • The Effect of the 27 May Coup on Relations • The New Turkish Thesis • The Greek Factor Once Again • The Beginning of Normalization • Negative and Positive Factors Affecting the Negotiations • Toward a Solution 495

- B. The Ankara Agreement 503

  The Main Text The Provisional Protocol The Financial

  Protocol 503
  - 1. The Organs Established by the Agreement 505
    The Council of Association The Committee of Association The Joint Parliamentary Committee 505
  - 2. Appraisal of the Agreement 505
    The Legal Aspect The Political Aspect The Institutional Aspect 505
- C. The Course of the Association 507
  - 1. The Preparatory Stage 507
    - a. Turkey's Position 507

      The Economic Background The Haste of Governments Bureaucratic Objections: Planners
      vs. Diplomats 507

- b. The EEC's Policy of Delay 509
  The Economic Reasons The Political Reasons 509
- c. The Process Leading to the Additional Protocol 509
- 2. The Transitional Stage 511
  - a. The Documents of the Transitional Stage 511

    The Additional Protocol The Financial Protocol •
    The Features of the Additional Protocol 511
  - b. Questions Arising during the Transitional Stage and the Freezing of Relations 512

    Economic Questions Political Questions Turkey's Request for Revisions in the Additional Protocol The Straining of Relations and the 1976 Crisis The Turkish Freeze in Relations The Intention to Seek Full Membership That Was Never Formalized 512

SECTION 6. 1980-1990: TURKEY IN THE ORBIT OF THE WESTERN BLOC-2

Appraisal of the Period (Baskin Oran) 521

- I. The International Environment and Dynamics 521
  - A. International Developments 521
    - 1. Globalization and Its Effects 521
    - 2. The Rise of the West and of the U.S. 522

      Human Rights, the "Green Belt," and the Carter

      Doctrine The Reagan Doctrine and the "Second Cold War" 522

    - 3. The Collapse of the USSR 522
- B. Developments in the Balkans and the Middle East 524
- II. The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 524
  - A. The Economy 524

    The Implementation of the 24 January Package of Measures from 1980 to 1987 The Economy after 1987 525

  - B. Politics 527
    The Efforts to Stem Anarchy The 12 September Coup and Islam The 12 September Coup and the Kurdish Question 527
- III. The Foreign Policy of the Period 531
  - A. Factors Affecting Foreign Policy 531

    The International Environment The Nature of the 12

    September Regime The Özal Factor 531
  - B. The Conduct of Foreign Policy 534
    Relations with the Hegemonic Power The Diversification of Relations The Internationalization of the Armenian and Kurdish Questions 534
- IV. Overall Appraisal 536

Relations with the USA and NATO (Ilhan Uzgel) 538

- I. Basic Factors Affecting Relations 538
  - A. U.S. Domestic and Foreign Policy in the 1980s 538
  - B. The U.S., Islam, and the Policy of the Green Belt 539
- II. The 12 September Period (1980–1982) 540
  - A. The 12 September Coup and the U.S. 540
  - B. Developments during the Period of Military Administration 541

- The Rogers Plan and Greece's Return to the Military Structure of NATO 541
- Developments in the Middle East and Their Effects on Turkish-U.S. Relations 543
- 3. The Issue of the Rapid Deployment Force 544
- 4. The 1982 Memorandum of Understanding 545
- III. The Özal Period (1983-1991) 546
  - A. The U.S. View of the Özal Administration 547
  - B. Political Relations 547
    - 1. Turkey, the Middle East, and the U.S. 548
    - 2. U.S. Aid 549.
    - 3. The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement of 1985 551
    - 4. Turkish-Greek Relations and the U.S. Factor in the Question of Cyprus 553
       The U.S. Position and Role in Turkish-Greek Relations •
       The Question of Cyprus and the U.S. 553
    - 5. The Question of the Armenian Bills 555
    - 6. The Kurdish Question and the U.S. 557
  - C. Economic Relations 558
- IV. NATO, Turkey, and the Development of Defense Industries in the 1980s 561
  - A. Changes in NATO's Strategy during the 1980s and Their Effects on Turkey 561

    Flexible Response and Turkey The Question of Turkey Assuming Additional Nuclear Obligations The Reduction in International Tension and the Question of the Reliability of NATO 561
  - B. The Out-of-Area Issue and Turkey 563
  - C. The Question of Lemnos 563
  - D. The Negotiations on the Reduction of Conventional Forces in Europe and the Mersin Crisis 564
  - E. The Modernization of the Turkish Armed Forces and the Development of Defense Industries 565
    Defense Industries and the Middle East The F-16 Project •
    The Turkish Private Sector and Defense Industries 566

Relations with the European Communities (ECs) (Çağrı Erhan and Tuğrul Arat) 569

- I. The Difficult Period 569
  - A. The Military Administration's Efforts to Maintain Ties with the West 569
    Initial European Reaction to the 12 September Coup The First Council of Association Meeting after 12
    September The Consequences of Greek Membership in the ECs for Turkey 569
  - B. Increasing Strains in Relations with the ECs 571
  - C. The Road Leading to the Application for Full Membership 573
    Özal and Relations with the ECs The Main Points of Discord Moves to Prepare the ECs for the Upcoming Application 573
- II. The Application for Membership and Its Aftermath 576
  - A. The Reasons for Applying 576

    The Economic Reasons The Political Reasons 576
  - B. Domestic and International Reactions to the Application 577

The Reaction of the ECs • Domestic Reactions 577

C. The Suspension of the Application 577

Turkey's Efforts to Secure the Acceptance of Its Application • The Commission's Report and the Council's Decision • The Unstated Reasons for the Suspension of Turkey's Application 577

Relations with Greece (Melek Firat) 581

- I. Developments during the Period 581
- II. Bilateral Relations during the 12 September Period and Developments in Cyprus (1980–1983) 583
  - A. Bilateral Relations 583
  - B. The Proclamation of the TRNC 584
- III. Rapprochement Efforts by the Özal Governments and Outstanding Questions (1983–1989) 585
  - A. The Question of Lemnos 585
  - B. Growing Tensions in Relations with Greece and the Attempts to Initiate a Dialogue 586
  - C. The Aegean Crisis of March 1987 587
  - D. The Davos Process 588

    The Summits of Davos and Brussels The Effect of the Davos Process on the Minority in Western Thrace 588

- IV. Developments in Cyprus during the Time of the Özal
  Governments (1983–1989) 590
  The Beginning of Intercommunal Negotiations The TRNC Policy of the Özal Governments Georgios Vassiliou and Renewed Hope for a Settlement of the Cyprus Question 590

Relations with the Middle East 595

- I. Relations with Arab States (Melek Fırat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 595
  - A. Relations with the Gulf States 595
  - B. Relations with the Organization of the Islamic Conference(OIC) 597
  - C. The Question of Palestine and Turkey 598
  - D. Difficulties with Iraq and Syria 598
    - 1. The Kurdish Question 599
      Developments in Iraq and Turkey: The Kurdish Question Takes Root in the Region The Iran-Iraq War: Syria and the Kurdish Movements Get Together to Fill a Vacuum Turkish Operations in Northern Iraq and Their Effect on the PKK Özal's Syrian Visit The End of the Iran-Iraq War and Turkey's Problem of Kurdish Refugees 599
    - 2. The Question of Water 605
      The Background The Launching of the Southeast
      Anatolia Project (GAP) The Peace Pipeline
      Project 605
  - E. Economic Relations with the Middle East 610
- II. Relations with Non-Arab States 611
  - A. Relations with Israel (Çağrı Erhan and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 611
    - 1. Israel's Regional Actions and Turkey 611
    - 2. The Effects of the Intifada 612
  - B. Relations with Iran (Atay Akdevelioğlu and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 613

- The Period of the Iran-Iraq War 613
   Questions Arising from Ideological Differences •
   Questions Arising from the Iran-Iraq War Turkish Neutrality in the Iran-Iraq War and Economic Cooperation within the Context of the ECO 613
- 2. The Aftermath of the Iran-Iraq War 615

Relations with the USSR (Erel Tellal) 617

- I. The USSR's Transformation 617
- II. Bilateral Relations 618
  - A. Economic Relations 619
  - B. Political Relations 621

Relations with the Balkans (İlhan Uzgel) 623

- I. Factors Affecting Turkey's Balkan Policies 623
  Historical Ties People of Balkan Extraction Living in Turkey •
  Geographic and Strategic Reasons The Turkish Muslim Minorities in the Balkans 623
- II. Turkey's Balkan Policy during the Cold War 625

  The Balkan Pact and Alliance The Stoica Plan Turkey and the Elimination of Nuclear Weapons in the Balkans Turkey's Transition to an Active Policy in the Balkans 625
- III. The State of the Balkans in the 1980s 627
- IV. Turkish-Bulgarian Relations and the Question of the Turkish Minority 628 Factors Affecting Turkish-Bulgarian Relations • Bulgaria's Policy toward the Turkish Minority • Turkey's Reaction 628

The Issue of the Turkish Straits (Kudret Özersay) 632

- I. The Straits from 1939 to 1980 632
- II. Problems That Arose from 1980 to 1990 634
  - A. The Reasons behind the Problems 634

    The Particular Features of the Bosphorus That Make

    Navigation Dangerous The Volume of Maritime Traffic •

    The Impediments and Inadequacies of the Montreux

    Convention 634
  - B. Some of the Questions That Emerged 635

    Maritime Accidents Environmental Pollution 635

The Issue of Human Rights (Gökçen Alpkaya) 636
The International Environment • The Situation in Turkey 636

SECTION 7. 1990–2001: TURKEY IN THE ORBIT OF GLOBALIZATION

Appraisal of the Period (Baskın Oran) 647

- I. The International Environment and Dynamics 647
  - A. International Developments: Globalization and Its Consequences 647
    - 1. The New Economic Order 647
    - The New Political Order 648
       The CSCE and the Charter of Paris CFE 1990 (Conventional Forces in Europe Treaty) 648
    - The Disintegration of the USSR and the Eastern Bloc and Its Consequences 649
    - 4. The New World Order 651
  - B. Regional Developments 652

- The Balkans The Middle East The Caucasus and Central Asia 652
- II. The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 653
  - A. The Economy 653

    The Structural Adjustment Program and Privatization 655
  - B. Politics 656
    Islamism, Kurdish Separatism, and the "Deep State" •
    A Change in the Environment 657
- III. The Foreign Policy of the Period 660
  - A. Foreign Policy against the Background of Globalization 661
    Turkey Trapped in the Debt Spiral An Asymmetrical
    Relationship with the EU Relations with the Hegemonic Power 661
  - B. The Aftermath of the Disintegration of the USSR and Turkish Foreign Policy 665
    - 1. Fluctuations in Turkey's Importance 665
    - 2. Human Rights and the Kurdish and Armenian Questions 666
    - 3. The Sèvres Syndrome 667
    - 4. New Initiatives in Turkish Foreign Policy 668

IV. General Appraisal 669

- A. Conditions in the Early Part of This Period 669

  The Internal Dynamics of the Period The External Dynamics of the Period 669
- B. The Salient Features of Foreign Policy during the Period, 670

Relations with the USA and NATO (Ilhan Uzgel) 673

- I. Main Features of U.S. Domestic Politics and Foreign Policy in the Post–Cold War Era 673
  - A. International Developments and Economic Revival 673
  - B. The Search for a New Strategy 674

    The U.S. and the EU The U.S., Japan, and the Far East •

    Defense Spending and Disarmament 676
- II. The Overall Framework of Relations 677
  - A. Turkey's Place in the Global Strategy of the U.S. 677
  - B. From Alliance to Enhanced (Strategic) Partnership 678
- III. Areas of Regional Cooperation between Turkey and the U.S. at the End of the Cold War 678
  - A. Turkey, the U.S., and the Middle East 679
    - The First Steps in Cooperation after the Cold War: The Gulf War 679
      - a. The Significance of the Gulf War for Turkish Foreign Policy 680
      - b. The Gulf War and Its Consequences for Turkey 680
    - 2. The U.S., Operation Provide Comfort, and Turkey's Half-hearted Cooperation in Northern Iraq 682
      The Origin of Provide Comfort Provide Comfort from Turkey's Perspective The Issue of a Kurdish State in Northern Iraq The Dublin Process Cooperation between Saddam and Barzani in Northern Iraq:
      Upsetting Regional Balances The Ankara Process and the Transformation of Provide Comfort into Operation Northern Watch 682

- 3. The U.S. in Turkey's Northern Iraq Policy 687
- The U.S. Policy of Dual Containment and Turkey 689
   Turkey's Role in the Containment of Iraq and Iran •
   The Consequences of Dual Containment for Turkey 689
- 5. The Turkish-Israeli Rapprochement and the U.S. 69:
- B. The Balkans and the Convergence of Turkish-U.S.

  Interests 691

  The Kosovo Question and the Bombing of Yugoslavia•
  The Reasons for Turkish-U.S. Cooperation in the Balkans 692
- C. The U.S. and Turkey's Relations with the EU 693
- D. The Caucasus, Central Asia, and Energy Corridors in Turkish-U.S. Relations 694 The Opening Up of Turkey to the Caucasus and Central Asia and the Stand of the U.S. • The U.S. Position on Pipelines • The Armenia-Azerbaijan Conflict and the U.S. 695
- IV. The Development of Turkish-U.S. Relations 697
  - A. The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement (DECA) and U.S. Military and Economic Aid 697

    The Defense and Economic Cooperation Agreement U.S. Military and Economic Aid U.S. Weapons Sales and the "Hidden Embargo" 697
  - B. Economic and Trade Relations 700

    Trade Relations U.S. Investments 701
  - C. Turkish-Greek Relations, the Cyprus Question, and the U.S. 702
     Turkish-Greek Relations and the U.S. The Question of Cyprus and the U.S. 702
  - D. The Kurdish Question and Human Rights 704
    The U.S. Position on the Kurdish Question The Apprehension of Öcalan and the U.S. The U.S. and Human Rights in Turkey 704
  - E. The Armenian Question 706

    At the State Level The Genocide Bill 706
  - F. The U.S., Political Islam, and Relations with the Refahyol Government 708 The U.S. after the Cold War and Political Islam • The Islamic Movement in Turkey, the Refahyol Government, and the U.S. 708
- V. The New Security Environment after the Cold War and Turkey 710
  - A. The Transformation of NATO and the New Strategy 710
    The London and Rome Summits and the New Strategy
    The New Military Strategy and NATO's New Role NATO's Changing Strategy and Turkey NATO's Expansion and Turkey The National Missile Defense System (Missile Shield) and Turkey 710
  - B. The Emergence of the New Defense Identity in Europe:
    The WEU, the CDSP, and Turkey 714
    The Development of the WEU and the CDSP Turkey, the WEU, and the ESDI ESDP 714
  - C. Turkey's Defense Industries and Arms Procurement/
     Production Projects 719

The Initiative to Create a National Defense Industry

Defense Projects and Turkish Foreign Policy Conclusion 720

Relations with the EU (Sanem Baykal and Tuğrul Arat) 725

- I. Turkish-EU Relations in the 1990s 725
- II. The Customs Union Instead of Full Membership 726
  - A. The Turkey-EC Council of Association and Growing Cooperation 726
    The Matutes Package The Council of Association Meeting
    after a Long Break 726
  - B. The Widening and Deepening of the European Union and Their Consequences for Turkey 727
    The Consequences of the Maastricht Treaty The Enlargement of the EU The Copenhagen Summit 727
  - C. The Customs Union 729
    - 1. Reasons for Turkey Wanting to Establish a Customs Union Political Reasons • Economic Reasons 729
    - 2. Concrete Steps toward the Customs Union 729
      The Decision to Establish the Customs Union •
      Negotiating the Customs Union Policies to Overcome the Obstacles The Adoption of the Decision on the Customs Union The Consideration of the Decision by the European Parliament 729
    - 3. The Customs Union: Its Substance and an Analysis 732
      The Substance of the Customs Union Analysis of the Decision on the Customs Union 732
- III. Relations with the EU in the Aftermath of the Customs Union 734
  - A. Difficulties in Turkish-EU Relations Despite the Customs Union 734
  - B. Turkish-EU Relations on the Eve of the Luxembourg Summit: A Report on Agenda 2000 735 Objections to Turkey's Candidacy • The Signing of the Amsterdam Treaty • Agenda 2000 and Turkey 735
  - C. The Luxembourg Summit 736
  - D. Developments after the Luxembourg Summit 738

    The Cardiff and Vienna Summits The European

    Commission's Progress Report for 1998 The Cologne

    Summit The European Commission's Progress Report

    for 1999 738
  - E. The Helsinki Summit and the Confirmation of Turkey's Candidacy 740
    The Factors behind the EU's Changing Attitude Lipponen's
    Letter and Turkey's Inclusion in the Enlargement Process 740
  - F. Turkish-EU Relations after Helsinki and the Accession Partnership Document (APD) 742
    The Meeting of the Council of Association on 11 April
    2000 The Release of the Accession Partnership Document by the Commission The Content and Nature of the APD The Adoption of the Accession Partnership Document The Commission's Progress Report
    for 2000 742
  - G. The Nice Summit and Turkish-EU Relations 746
  - H. The National Program 746

Relations with the Caucasus and Central Asia (Mustafa Aydın) 750

- I. Historical Background 750

  Turkey's View of the Caucasus and Central Asia during the Soviet Era Turkey's View of the Caucasus and Central Asia
  after the Cold War 750
- II. Relations with the Region and Changing Foreign Policy 752
  - A. The Gorbachev Period and Moscow-Centered Foreign Policy (1989–1991) 752
    The Sending of Delegations Recognition, Starting with Azerbaijan The Implementation of a New Policy 754
  - B. Relations Based on Emotion and Enthusiasm (1991–1993) 756
    The First Summit of Heads of State of Turkish-Speaking Countries and the First Disappointment (1992) 759
  - C. Disappointments and Facing Reality (1993–1995) 762

    The Issue of the "Turkish Model" The Second Summit of the Turkish-Speaking Countries (1994) 763
  - D. Relations with Azerbaijan in the Context of Nagorno Karabakh 767
  - E. From the Great Game to Regional Rivalry (1995–2000) 771
    - Relations with Armenia 771
       The Effect of the Diaspora in Armenia's Foreign Policy and the Allegations of Genocide Deadlock and Resolution 775
    - 2. Relations with Georgia 777
    - 3. Rivalry with Iran 780
    - 4. Competition with the Russian Federation 781
      The Chechen Question The CFE and Other Military Questions 782
- III. Economic Relations 783

  Loans Investments Trade The Energy Resources of the Caspian Basin and Turkey 783

Relations with Greece (Melek Firat) 790

- I. The First Steps toward Rapprochement (1990–1993) 791
  - A. The Search for a Dialogue with Turkey 791
  - B. Minority Questions 793
    - Developments in Western Thrace 793
       The Question of the Muftis The Sadik Ahmet Incident Changes in the Electoral Law 793
    - The Views and Policies of Patriarch Bartholomeos regarding the Patriarchate and the Orthodox Seminary 795
  - C. Developments in Cyprus 796

    A New Factor in the Question of Cyprus: The European Union Negotiations over the Boutros-Ghali Set of Ideas 798
- II. A Return to Strained Relations (1993-1995) 801
  - A. Greece's Adoption of the "Common Defense Doctrine" and Worsening Bilateral Relations 802
  - B. The Effects of Turkish-EU Relations on Turkish-Greek Relations and on the Question of Cyprus 803
- III. From Crisis to Friendship (1996-2000) 805
  - A. The Crises 805

- 1. The Crises of the Rocks and Islets in the Aegean 805
  The Kardak (Imia) Crisis The Island of Gaudos Crisis 805
- 2. Tension in Cyprus 809
  - a. Infringements of the Green Line 809
  - b. The Loizidou Case 809
  - c. The S-300 Missile Crisis 810
  - d. The Search for a Cyprus Settlement 810
    The Intercommunal Talks The EU, Cyprus, and Turkey 810
- 3. The Öcalan Crisis 813
- B. The Rapprochement from the Earthquake of 17 August 1999 to the Helsinki Summit 814

Relations with the Balkans (İlhan Uzgel) 817

- I. The Collapse of Socialist Regimes in the Eastern Bloc, the Balkans, and Turkey 817 The Balkans in the 1990s • Turkey and Developments in the Balkans 817
- II. Regime Change in Bulgaria and Turkish-Bulgarian Relations 818
  - A. The Effects of Regime Change on Bulgaria's Domestic and Foreign Policies 818
  - B. Developments in Turkish-Bulgarian Relations 819

    Military Relations Points of Disagreement Improved

    Relations under the Kostov Government 819
  - C. Changes in the New Bulgarian Administration's Policy toward the Turkish Minority 821
- III. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Turkey 822
- IV. Bosnia-Herzegovina and Turkey 823

  Turkey's Active Diplomacy during the Bosnian War Factors

  Motivating Turkey's Policies and Their Consequences Turkey's

  Relations with Bosnia-Herzegovina after Dayton 823
- V. Albania and Turkey 827

  Political Relations Military Relations Economic Relations 827
- VI. The Republic of Macedonia and Turkey 828

  The Turkish Minority in Macedonia 829
- VII. Romania and Turkey 829
- VIII. The Kosovo Question and Turkey 830
- IX. Allegations about Orthodox and Muslim Blocs in the Balkans and Turkish-Greek Rivalry 833
- X. Black Sea Economic Cooperation (The BSEC) 836

  The Establishment of the BSEC The BSEC's Place in Turkish Foreign Policy The Performance Record of the BSEC as an International Initiative The Black Sea Peace Force (Blackseafor) 836
- The Issue of Human Rights (Gökçen Alpkaya) 840

  The International Environment The Situation in Turkey •

  Human Rights and Turkish Foreign Policy 840

Relations with Russia (Erel Tellal) 850

- I. From the USSR to the Russian Federation 850
- II. Some of the Problem Areas 851
- III. Further Development of Cooperation 853

Relations with the Middle East 857

- I. Relations with Arab States (Melek Fırat and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 857
  - A. The First Gulf War and Its Influence on Relations with Arab States 857
  - B. Turkish-Syrian-Iraqi Relations (1990–1995) in the Context of the Kurdish and Water Questions 858
    - 1. The Period from 1991 to 1993 858
    - 2. The Period from 1993 to 1995 861
  - C. The Welfare-True Path Period When Relations Remained Unchanged (1996-1997) 862
  - D. The Aftermath of the 28 February Episode and the Capture of Öcalan 865
- II. Relations with Non-Arab States 868
  - A. Relations with Israel (Çağrı Erhan and Ömer Kürkçüoğlu) 868
    - 1. The Revival of Relations 868
    - Turkish-Israeli Cooperation 870
       a. The Dimensions of Cooperation 870
       b. The Repercussions of Cooperation 872
    - 3. The Period of Stagnation in Strategic Cooperation 873
  - B. Relations with Iran (Atay Akdevelioğlu and ÖmerKürkçüoğlu) 875
    - Political Relations 875
       The Clash of Ideologies The PKK Factor Competition and Cooperation in the Caucasus and Central Asia Uncertainty in Iraq 875
    - 2. Economic Relations 879

The Issue of the Turkish Straits (Kudret Özersay) 881

- I. Positions and Developments Prior to the 1994 Turkish Straits Regulation 881
- II. The New Regime Established by the 1994 Turkish Straits Regulation 881
- III. Reactions to the 1994 Turkish Straits Regulation 883
- IV. The Views of the Parties on the 1994 Regulation 884
- V. The Turkish Straits Regulation of 6 November 1998 886

SECTION 8. 2001–2006: TURKEY IN THE CHAOTIC AFTERMATH OF 9/11 (Baskin Oran)

The International Environment and Dynamics 891

- I. The Events of 11 September 2001 and U.S. Hegemony 891
  - A. The U.S. Occupation of Afghanistan and Iraq 892

    The Psychological and Sociopsychological Reason The Economic and Systemic Reasons The Strategic

    Reason 893
  - B. The Other Means for the Pursuit of U.S. Hegemony 895
    The Greater Middle East Project (GMEP) Efforts to Take Control of Eurasia The Use of International Organizations as Tools 895
  - C. Reactions to Bush's Policies 896

    Domestic Opposition The International Repercussions 896

II. Developments in the European Union 897

The Domestic Environment and Dynamics 899

- I. The Economy 899
  - A Catalogue of Weaknesses The Bank Scandal Prime Minister Ecevit's Illness • The State of the Macro-Economy • The Debt Situation 899
- II. Politics 903
  - A. Political Developments 904
  - B. The EU Reforms 904

    The Constitutional Reform of October 2001 The EU

    Harmonization Packages The Constitutional Reform of

    May 2004 The Implementation of Reforms 905
  - C. Implementation in the Field of Human Rights 907

    The Kurdish Question Trials Relating to Freedom of Expression and the Incident of the "Minority and Cultural Rights Report" The Issue of the Deep State Torture • Religious Matters The Law to Combat Terrorism (TMK: Terörle Mücadele Kanunu) 907
  - D. The Rise of Ethnic Turkish Nationalism 913

Foreign Policy during this Period 915

Overview 915

- I. Relations with the U.S. 915
  - A. The U.S. Attack on Afghanistan 915
  - B. The Invasion of Iraq 916

    The Prelude The Invasion of Iraq and Its Aftermath •

    The First Motion in Parliament The Second Motion 916
  - C. Other Issues 921

    Syria, Iran, and the Kurds The Black Sea and the Greater

    Middle East Project Economic Relations and Defense

    Industries Relations with NATO The European Security and Defense Policy (ESDP) 921

  - D. The Growth of Anti-American Sentiment in Turkey 922
- II. Relations with the EU 923
  - A. The Progress Report for 2002 and the Copenhagen Summit 923
  - B. The 2003 Progress Report and Summits 923
  - C. The Annan Referendum of 2004, the Expansion of the EU, the Progress Report, and the Summit of 17 December 2004 923

    The Cyprus Issue The Consequences of the Brussels

    Summit 924
  - D. The Negotiating Framework Document 925
- III. Relations with Greece and Cyprus 925
  - A. Turkish-Greek Relations 925
  - B. The Cyprus Issue 926

    Developments Following the Helsinki Summit A New

    Denktas Initiative: Direct Intercommunal Talks Toward the

    Copenhagen Summit The AKP's New Policy on Cyprus and the Copenhagen Summit Developments Following the

    Copenhagen Summit Assumption of Power by Mehmet Ali

    Talat The 24 April Referenda 926
- IV. Relations with the Middle East 929

S TO THE

968 Detailed Contents

- A. Relations with Arab States 929
- B. Relations with Non-Arab States 929
  - 1. Relations with Israel 929
    The Souring of Relations 929
  - 2. Relations with Iran 930
    The Relaxation of Ideological Rivalry The U-Turn in Iran's Policy toward the PKK Similarity of Views regarding the Occupation of Iraq Iran's Nuclear Policy The Natural Gas Pipeline, Transport, and Tourism The Freezing of Contentious Issues between Azerbaijan and Iran 930
- V. Relations with the Caucasus and Central Asia 931

  Turkey's Withdrawal from the Region Turkey Ascendant in the Region: Energy Pipelines 932

- VI. Relations with the Russian Federation 933

  Visits by the Russian Prime Minister and Foreign Minister Military Cooperation Visits by Members of the AKP

  Government Economic Relations 933
- VII. Relations with Balkan Neighbors 934
  Stability and Borders The U.S. and the EU 934
- VIII. Human Rights 935
- IX. The Issue of the Turkish Straits 935

  The Transit Regime The Effect of 9/11 on the Turkish

  Straits 935
- X. General Appraisal of the Period from 2001 to 2006 936

  Domestic Politics Foreign Policy The AKP's Policies 936

with the contribution of the kbt